Garcia v. City of Boston, 115 F.Supp.2d 74 (D.Mass. 2000). A pretrial detainee brought an action against a city, a hospital and the hospital's emergency psychiatric services program, alleging excessive force and denial of medical and psychological care. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants. The detainee had been arrested by the city police following a domestic disturbance and was taken to a police station where he was booked and placed in a cell. That evening the detainee made an apparent attempt to commit suicide by cutting his left wrist with the aluminum top of a juice container that had been given to him with his dinner. An ambulance was summoned but the detainee refused treatment. He was placed on the suicide list at the station and handcuffed to a bar on the wall in the booking area, where he could be closely monitored. The following evening the detainee again attempted to commit suicide when he obtained a book of matches and set fire to his own clothing while still handcuffed to the bar. He sustained burns and was taken to a hospital. Hospital personnel explored various mental health alternatives for the detainee but he was eventually returned to the police station and handcuffed to the bar, where he lit his shirt on fire fifteen minutes after returning from the hospital. The detainee's clothes were taken away and he remained in the booking area. Later that day the detainee pulled an officer's gun out of its holster, shot the officer and another prisoner, and was then shot by another officer. The district court held that the officials and hospital staff were not negligent in their failure to place the detainee in a state mental facility since the detainee was not eligible for placement while charges were pending. The court also held that firing of a gun at the detainee was not an excessive use of force because there was a clear need for the use of force, only one round was fired, and the detainee sustained only a limited injury. (Boston Police Department, Area B, District 2 Police Station, Massachusetts)

- U.S. District Court
MEDICATION
FAILURE TO PROVIDE CARE
- Page v. Norvell, 186 F.Supp.2d 1134 (D.Or. 2000). A state inmate brought a § 1983 action against the manager of a correctional institution's counseling treatment services, alleging violation of his Eighth Amendment rights arising from a diagnosis of bipolar disorder. The district court denied the manager's motion for summary judgment, finding that there were genuine issues of material fact as to whether the manager had caused the prisoner not to receive a medication review, and whether the manager purposefully misdiagnosed the prisoner's mental illness. (Eastern Oregon Correctional Institution)
- U.S. Appeals Court
COMMITMENT
SEX OFFENDERS
- Page v. Torrey, 201 F.3d 1136 (9th Cir. 2000). A detainee who was civilly committed to a state hospital under California's Sexually Violent Predators Act applied to file an in forma pauperis § 1983 action. The district court denied the application and the detainee appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded, finding that a detainee who was civilly committed to a state hospital was not a "prisoner" within the meaning of the of the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA) and that he ceased being a prisoner when he was released from custody by the California Department of Corrections. (California's Sexually Violent Predators Act)
- U.S. District Court
SEGREGATION
FAILURE TO PROVIDE
CARE
- Perez v. County of Westchester, 83 F.Supp.2d 435 (S.D.N.Y. 2000). A former prisoner brought a § 1983 action against a county and county jail physicians alleging that he was not properly treated for depression and other psychological problems while he was confined. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants. The court held that the physicians were not liable for violating the former prisoner's rights by placing him a medical isolation unit and taking away his clothing and personal items after he twice made suicidal overtures. (Westchester County Jail, New York)
- U.S. District Court
FAILURE TO PROVIDE CARE
PRETRIAL
DETENTION
- Thornhill v. Breazeale, 88 F.Supp.2d 647 (S.D.Miss. 2000). Survivors of a pretrial detainee who committed suicide while in custody brought a § 1983 and wrongful death action. The district court held that a sheriff and deputy did not act with deliberate indifference by placing the detainee in a cell with a non-breakaway shower rod and neglecting to remove his shoes. But the court denied summary judgment on the issue of whether the jail's lack of a written policy for suicide prevention was reasonably related to a legitimate governmental interest. The plaintiffs challenged the lack of a policy relating to the administration of cardiopulmonary resuscitation (CPR) to detainees who attempt suicide, and the lack of a written policy for detection and prevention of suicide. The detainee was jailed awaiting trial for allegedly raping his estranged wife. The sheriff and his staff were aware of the detainee's troubled mental history and that he had threatened suicide on two prior occasions. He was initially placed in the jail's mental holding cell where he was isolated from other inmates. He was placed on suicide watch which, according to an unwritten policy, required him to be checked approximately every fifteen minutes. Items with which he could injure himself, including his shoes, were taken from him. After three days without incident the detainee was moved to a juvenile cell in the same section of the jail that was equipped with a toilet and shower and had a non-breakaway shower rod. He remained on suicide watch. He was given his shoes and allowed to leave his cell to exercise and watch television one morning but a deputy forgot to remove his shoes when placing the detainee back in the cell. The detainee hung himself with his shoelaces from the shower rod. He had been observed alive approximately ten minutes before he was found hanging. After he was found hanging it took a period of time for the officers to open the cell and he was eventually cut down and checked for vital signs. Finding no vital signs no attempts were made to revive him. (Lamar County Jail, Mississippi)
- U.S. Appeals Court
COMMITMENT
DUE PROCESS
- U.S. v. Frierson, 208 F.3d 282 (1st Cir.2000). The district court conducted a hearing in the absence of an inmate which ended in an order to involuntarily commit the inmate to a medical center for treatment of mental disease and the inmate appealed. The appeals court reversed and vacated the district court decision. The appeals court held that the inmate had a statutory right to attend the hearing and that a telephone call to the prison and the inmate's non-responsiveness to an officer's efforts to get him to the phone did not provide the inmate with the requisite opportunity to participate in the hearing. The court noted that the hearing had been largely conducted by the time the call was made and the inmate, who had earlier said he wanted to attend any hearing, was not told that this call was his opportunity to participate in the hearing. (Federal Medical Center-Devens, Massachusetts)
- U.S. District Court
INVOLUNTARY
MEDICATION
PSYCHOTROPIC
DRUGS
- U.S. v. Keeven, 115 F.Supp.2d 1132 (E.D.Mo. 2000). A detainee sought judicial review of a determination that psychotropic medication could be administered involuntarily because she was a danger to herself and others, and to render her competent to stand trial. The district court held that the detainee was not entitled to an evidentiary hearing prior to the forcible administration of medication and that her due process rights were adequately protected. The court also found that a psychiatrist who conducted an administrative hearing qualified as a neutral hearing officer because he was not currently involved with the diagnosis or treatment of the detainee at the time of the hearing. (Federal Medical Center, Carswell, Texas)
- U.S. Appeals Court
PSYCHOTROPIC
DRUGS
INVOLUNTARY
MEDICATION
- U.S. v. Weston, 206 F.3d 9 (D.C.Cir. 2000). A district court upheld the decision of the federal Bureau of Prisons to involuntarily administer psychotropic medication to a pretrial detainee. The detainee appealed and the appeals court reversed and remanded, finding that the record did not support the district court's conclusion that the medication was essential for safety. (Federal Correctional Institution in Butner, North Carolina)

U.S. Appeals Court
FAILURE TO PROVIDE CARE

Williams v. Kelso, 201 F.3d 1060 (8th Cir. 2000). The executor of the estate of a jail inmate who committed suicide while in custody sued jail employees under § 1983. The district court dismissed state law claims against health care providers but denied summary judgment for the defendants on certain claims. The appeals court affirmed the grant of summary judgment and reversed the denial of summary judgment on the remaining claims. The appeals court found that even though a psychologist had instructed jailers to check the inmate's vital signs every four to six hours, their failure to follow this instruction over a period of about seven hours was a matter of negligence, at most, and did not show deliberate indifference. The appeals court also held that there was no requirement under the Eighth Amendment that the jailers provide immediate medical attention to a disoriented, confused, belligerent detainee who had been arrested on an alcohol related misdemeanor charge. The court held that jail supervisors were entitled to qualified immunity on the claim of deliberate indifference in failing to initially segregate the inmate from other inmates upon booking. According to the court, the jail officials gave the inmate his medication, placed him in the misdemeanor section of the jail, regularly observed him, had him examined by a psychologist and psychiatrist, and were in the process of transferring him to a treatment center when his suicide occurred, and the inmate had given no overt indication that he was a suicide risk. The court noted that the plaintiff's expert witness even offered the opinion that persons who exhibited the symptoms that the inmate presented do not generally harm themselves. (Faulkner County Detention Facility, Arkansas)

2001

U.S. District Court
MEDICAL CARE
CONDITIONS

Carlyle v. Aubrey, 189 F.Supp.2d 660 (W.D.Ky. 2001). A former prisoner brought a § 1983 action against a county jail alleging Eighth Amendment violations. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court held that the prisoner's medical needs were not treated with deliberate indifference, noting that medication was administered twice during the prisoner's one-day stay at the jail, he was intoxicated when arrested, and he admitted that his seizures caused memory loss. The court held that the prisoner was not subjected to unconstitutional conditions of confinement, even though water service in his cell was broken, he was forced to sleep on the floor, and he was fed only a bologna sandwich. The prisoner had admitted that he was offered drinking water on at least two occasions and that officers brought in water to flush the toilet. The court noted that although forcing a prisoner to sleep on the floor for extended periods may amount to an Eighth Amendment violation, the temporary inconvenience of one night spent on the floor does not. (Jefferson County Jail, Kentucky)

U.S. Appeals Court
SUICIDE
FAILURE TO PROVIDE
CARE

Comstock v. McCrary, 273 F.3d 693 (6th Cir. 2001). The personal representative of a prisoner's estate brought a civil rights action against prison medical personnel after the prisoner committed suicide while confined. The district court denied summary judgment for the defendants based on qualified immunity and the appeals court affirmed in part and reversed in part. The appeals court held that evidence was sufficient to establish that a prison psychologist subjectively perceived, and was deliberately indifferent to, the risk that the prisoner might commit suicide. The psychologist had released the prisoner from a suicide watch without making any reasoned assessment or evaluation of the prisoner's suicide risk at the time of release, despite concluding that the prisoner was sufficiently at risk to put him on suicide watch only one day before. The psychologist also admitted that he suspected that other inmates had targeted the prisoner as a snitch, a characterization that he knew was very perilous for the prisoner. (Reception and Guidance Center, State Prison of Southern Mich.)

U.S. Appeals Court
FAILURE TO PROVIDE CARE
SUICIDE

Domino v. Texas Dept. of Criminal Justice, 239 F.3d 752 (5th Cir. 2001). A prison psychiatrist appealed the decision of a federal district court that denied his motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity. The appeals court reversed and remanded, finding that the psychiatrist's incorrect diagnosis that a prisoner's suicide threat was not genuine, but was made to obtain secondary gain, did not amount to deliberate indifference. (Coffield Unit, Texas Dept. Crim. Justice)

U.S. Appeals Court
PSYCHOTROPIC
DRUGS

Fuller v. Dillon, 236 F.3d 876 (7th Cir. 2001). A prison inmate who had been given psychotropic medication against his will brought a § 1983 action against prison officials and medical personnel alleging violation of his due process rights. The district court granted summary judgment to the defendants and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the initial decision to medicate the prisoner was made by a treating psychiatrist, as required under the state's scheme for involuntary administration of medication. (Menard Psychiatric Center, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
SEX OFFENDERS

Rogers v. Illinois Dept. of Corrections Spec. Unit, 160 F.Supp.2d 972 (N.D.Ill. 2001). Present and former civil detainees in state correctional centers brought an action against psychologists who had recommended their confinement as "sexually violent persons" under Illinois' Sexually Violent Persons Commitment Act (SVPCA). The district court dismissed the claims of the present detainees, noting that they could petition for habeas corpus relief to challenge their current confinement. But the court found that the former detainees asserted a constitutional violation of equal protection by alleging that their race was a motivating factor for selecting them for confinement from a pool of eligible defendants, insofar as their race related to the race of their victims. The former detainees are all African-American offenders who committed crimes against at least one Caucasian victim. (Sheridan Correctional Center and Joliet Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. Supreme Court
SEX OFFENDER

Seling v. Young, 121 S.Ct. 727 (2001). An inmate who was being held under a state sexually violent predator statute petitioned for a writ of habeas corpus challenging the constitutionality of the law. The case eventually reached the United States Supreme Court, which held that the state supreme court's prior determination that the statute was civil rather than criminal precluded the inmate's double jeopardy and ex post facto challenge based on conditions of confinement. According to the Court, there is no federal constitutional bar to civil confinement of sexually violent predators with untreatable mental conditions, since the state has an interest in protecting the public from dangerous individuals with both treatable and untreatable conditions. (Community Protection Act of 1990, State of Washington)

U.S. District Court
PRIVACY

Swan v. U.S., 159 F.Supp.2d 1174 (N.D.Cal. 2001). A federal prison inmate brought an action against the United States and a prison staff psychologist alleging they failed to prevent an attack by another inmate, in violation of his Eighth Amendment rights. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants. The court held that the psychologist did not act with deliberate indifference to the inmate's safety and was under no legal duty to disclose the inmate's confidential communications regarding a possible risk of harm from other inmates, or to pursue, on the inmate's behalf, protection that would have required disclosure of the inmate's counseling session statements. The inmate claimed that he provided information to the psychologist prior to the attack, who should have acted to prevent it. (Federal Corrections Institute, Dublin, California)

U.S. District Court
INVOLUNTARY
MEDICATION
PSYCHOTROPIC
DRUGS

U.S. v. Weston, 134 F.Supp.2d 115 (D.D.C. 2001). An appeals court affirmed the decision of the federal Bureau of Prisons to administer antipsychotic medication to a detainee who allegedly killed Capitol police officers. On remand to the district court, the court held that the government would be permitted to treat the defendant involuntarily with such medication because it was appropriate and essential in order to render the defendant non-dangerous based on medical/safety concerns, and to restore the defendant's competency to stand trial. (Federal Correctional Institute, Butner, North Carolina)

2002

U.S. District Court
DELIBERATE
INDIFFERENCE
FAILURE TO PROVIDE CARE
PRETRIAL DETENTION

Bozeman v. Orum, 199 F.Supp.2d 1216 (M.D.Ala. 2002). The representative of the estate of a pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against a sheriff and officials at a county detention facility, alleging that the detainee's death was the result constitutional violations. The district court held that detention officers' use of force to restrain the detainee did not violate his Fourteenth Amendment right against the use of excessive force, even though the officers threatened to "kick" the detainee's "ass." The officers apparently punched or slapped the detainee, and the detainee died as the result of the officers' actions, but the court found that some level of force was necessary to restore order where the detainee was apparently undergoing a mental breakdown in his cell. The court held that nurses at the detention facility were not deliberately indifferent to the serious medical needs of the detainee when they failed to obtain treatment and medication upon learning that the detainee had been evaluated for mental health problems and prescribed medication in the past. The court noted that the nurses had no knowledge during intake beyond a "slight flag" of past evaluations for mental illness and that the detainee had medication to help him "rest." The court also found that the failure of the detention facility to implement a policy requiring staff to follow up on inmates who had acknowledged past mental health problems or evaluations for mental health problems, did not violate the detainee's Fourteenth Amendment right to adequate medical care. The court held that municipal jails are not required to provide on-site psychiatric care for their inmates, and that the detention facility was not required to train its officers in diagnosing or treating mental illness. (Montgomery County Detention Facility, Alabama)

U.S. District Court
DUE PROCESS

Galloway v. Suffolk County Correctional Facility, 232 F.Supp.2d 4 (E.D.N.Y. 2002). A parole violator filed a § 1983 action alleging that prison officials deprived him of his right to due process when they removed him from a substance abuse program. The district court denied the officials' motion for judgment on the pleadings, finding that the parole violator had a state-conferred liberty interest in continued participation in the program, and therefore could not be discharged from the program without a hearing, even though he signed an application stating that a decision to remove him from the program was final. The court held that the county prison's High Impact Incarceration Program (HIIP) was a "substance abuse program" governed by state Mental Hygiene Law. The program involved sixty days of intensive therapy and a six-month aftercare phase. (Suffolk County Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
ADEQUACY OF CARE

Hallett v. Morgan, 287 F.3d 1193 (9th Cir. 2002). In a class action, female prisoners at a state prison secured a consent decree that addressed health care concerns. The prisoners challenged the prison's attempt to end the decree, sought additional time for court involvement and moved to have prison officials held in contempt for past violations of the decree. The district court denied the prisoners' motions and granted the prison officials' motion to terminate the consent decree. The prisoners appealed and the appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part and remanded. The appeals court held that dental care and mental health care did not violate the Eighth Amendment, but ordered the district court to consider retrospective relief on remand. The court noted that the district court should have considered whether officials were in contempt for failing to comply with other medical care provisions of the consent decree. (Washington Corrections Center for Women)

U.S. Appeals Court
FAILURE TO PROVIDE CARE

Hallett v. Morgan, 296 F.3d 732 (9th Cir. 2002). A class of prisoners at a women's state prison who brought a § 1983 action against prison officials moved to extend jurisdiction over a consent decree for an additional period of time, to have prison officials held in contempt, and to compel discovery. The district court denied the motions and granted the prison officials' motion to terminate the consent decree. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The appeals court found that dental care and mental health conditions at the prison did not violate the Eighth Amendment. The appeals court found that officials' substantial compliance with the consent decree judgment was an acceptable defense to the prisoners' motion to hold the officials in civil contempt for past violations of the decree. The court remanded the case for reconsideration of allegations that the officials failed to comply with consent decree requirements regarding medical care. (Washington Corrections Center for Women)

U.S. District Court
FAILURE TO PROVIDE CARE

Merriweather v. Sherwood, 235 F.Supp.2d 339 (S.D.N.Y. 2002). Prison officials moved, under the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA), to dissolve a prison conditions consent decree entered 24 years earlier. Prisoners moved to postpone the automatic stay of the consent decree's provisions. The district court held that it lacked the discretion to postpone the automatic stay once the stay came into effect 30 days after the motion to dissolve was filed. The court noted that even assuming it had the discretion to postpone the automatic stay, the prisoners failed to show that they were entitled to a postponement, where the record did not demonstrate widespread or ongoing constitutional violations of rights to religious freedom, medical care, or access to counsel. According to the court, the prison was not constitutionally required to provide prisoners with the best possible mental health care, but merely with reasonable mental health care in accordance with the state's minimum standards for prison medical care. (Orange County Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
SUICIDE
FAILURE TO PROVIDE
CARE

Pelletier v. Magnusson, 195 F.Supp.2d 214 (D.Me. 2002). A personal representative for the estate of an inmate filed a § 1983 action, alleging that state employees violated the Eighth Amendment by failing to prevent the inmate from committing suicide. The appeals court denied the defendants' motion for summary judgment, in part. The court found that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether correctional officers were aware of clinical meeting notes that indicated that the inmate was very anxious and was hearing voices, and whether they were aware through logs and verbal communication with officers, that the inmate had earlier instances of decompensation. The court also found that summary judgment was precluded because of the spoliation of missing or tampered documents relating to the inmate's medical treatment, and whether a clinical social worker refused to act on a medical recommendation that the inmate required a psychiatric evaluation. (Maine State Prison)

U.S. District Court
SUICIDE
FAILURE TO PROVIDE
CARE

Pelletier v. Magnuson, 201 F.Supp.2d 148 (D.Me. 2002). A personal representative for the estate of an inmate who committed suicide in a state prison filed a § 1983 complaint in state courts, alleging Eighth Amendment violations. The district court granted summary judgment for all of the medical defendants, finding that the alleged missing or tampered documents relating to the deceased inmate's medical treatment did not establish that employees of the prison's contracted health care provider were deliberately indifferent to his serious medical needs. The court held that a social worker, medical doctor, and regional supervisor of medical services were not deliberately indifferent. The court found that a licensed psychiatrist was not administratively negligent for allegedly not knowing that the inmate was psychotic and suicidal at all times. The court noted that the decision to scale down the inmate's care was made by a treatment team and was not the result of financial considerations. (Maine State Prison)

U.S. District Court
EVALUATION

Terry Ex Rel. Terry v. Hill, 232 F.Supp.2d 934 (E.D.Ark. 2002). Pretrial detainees brought a class action against the Arkansas Department of Human Services, claiming that inordinate delays in providing evaluation and treatment of detainees who were referred by the court to determine their fitness to stand trial, violated their Constitutional rights. The district court entered judgment for the detainees. The court held that the inordinate delays amounted to prohibited punishment that violated the detainee's due process rights. The court also found that the officials displayed deliberate indifference to the detainees' circumstances, violating their Eighth Amendment rights. According to the court, the Arkansas Constitution speaks of the State's duty toward the mentally ill, and the Arkansas State Hospital, a division of the Department of Human Services, has responsibility for treating citizens committed by civil courts or by criminal courts for evaluation. (Arkansas State Hospital, Arkansas Department of Human Services)

U.S. District Court
SEX OFFENDER

West v. Macht, 235 F.Supp.2d 966 (E.D.Wis. 2002). Civilly-committed sex offenders brought a § 1983 action against employees of a state treatment facility. The district court held that security-related seclusion placements did not violate the offenders' substantive due process rights because they were rationally related to the purpose of maintaining institutional security and could not reasonably be characterized as punitive. But the court found that fact issues existed as to whether treatment-related placements were based on staff psychologists' reasonable professional judgment, because expert testimony asserted that the placements were not consistent with accepted professional norms. (Wisconsin Resource Center, Wisconsin Department of Health and Family Services)

2003

U.S. District Court
FAILURE TO PROVIDE CARE

Brooks v. Berg, 289 F.Supp.2d 286 (N.D.N.Y. 2003). An inmate brought an action against prison officials alleging that they denied him medical treatment for Gender Identity Disorder (GID) in violation of his rights. The district court denied summary judgment for the defendants. The court allowed the defendants to submit a new motion for summary judgment, in light of their concession that the inmate was entitled to treatment. The court noted that the defendants now admitted that the inmate was entitled to "the very medical treatment that was held to be required by this Court in its prior opinion." The court had held that Gender Identity Disorder was a serious medical need and that inmates with GID must receive some form of treatment. (Clinton Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
EVALUATION
DUE PROCESS

Oregon Advocacy Center v. Mink, 322 F.3d 1101 (9th Cir. 2003). Nonprofit organizations sued state officials, contending that delays by a state mental hospital in accepting mentally incapacitated criminal defendants for evaluation and treatment, violated the defendants' substantive and procedural due process rights. The district court entered an injunction requiring the hospital to admit criminal defendants within seven days of a trial court's finding of their incapacity to proceed to trial. The state officials appealed and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the hospital's delay in admitting incapacitated defendants violated their substantive due process rights. According to the court, under state law it is the state mental hospital, not counties, that has the duty to accept mentally incapacitated defendants for evaluation and treatment. (Oregon State Hospital)

U.S. Appeals Court
INVOLUNTARY
MEDICATION
PSYCHOTROPIC DRUG

Singleton v. Norris, 319 F.3d 1018 (8th Cir. 2003). A death row prisoner who was being forcibly administered psychotropic medication sought an order ordering a halt to the treatment. The state court denied his motions and he petitioned for a writ of habeas corpus seeking a stay of execution of his death sentence. The district court denied the petition and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that, on a matter of first impression, a state does not violate the Eighth Amendment or due process by executing an inmate who has regained competency through forced medication that is part of appropriate medical care. (State of Arkansas)

U.S. District Court
MEDICATION
INVOLUNTARY
MEDICATION

Whittington v. Vaughn, 289 F.Supp.2d 621 (E.D.Pa. 2003). A state prisoner who had been diagnosed as schizophrenic brought a § 1983 action against prison officials, alleging civil rights violations. The district court granted summary judgment for the officials. The court held that a unit manager's requests that the inmate take his psychotropic medication did not violate the inmate's due process rights. The court noted that although the inmate was urged to take his medication, and was punished for misbehavior that occurred when he was not taking his medication, and that he was never forcibly injected and was permitted to refuse medication. The court found that misconduct reports were "some evidence" that supported a hearing examiner's decisions to find the inmate guilty of misconduct, and that the examiner's denial of certain witnesses at the inmate's misconduct hearings did not violate the inmate's due process rights. (State Correctional Institution, Graterford, Pennsylvania)

2004

U.S. District Court
PRETRIAL
DETENTION
ADA- Americans with Disabilities Act

Bolden v. Stroger, 306 F.Supp.2d 792 (N.D.Ill. 2004). Pretrial detainees brought an action challenging a county's policy of barring individuals with mental illness from various pre-release programs, and its policy of discharging mentally ill individuals without providing them with medication and referrals necessary to manage their illnesses. The district court dismissed the action, finding that a court monitoring consent decree that had created pre-release programs at the jail was the proper forum for claims regarding eligibility for the programs, and for challenging the treatment of mentally ill detainees, even though the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) was not in existence at the time the decree was originally entered. (Cook County Jail, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
FAILURE TO PROVIDE CARE

Gates v. Cook, 376 F.3d 323 (5th Cir. 2004). A death row prisoner brought a suit on behalf of himself and other prisoners confined to death row, alleging that certain conditions of confinement on death row violated the Eighth Amendment's prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment. The district court found that a number of conditions violated the Eighth Amendment and issued an injunction designed to alleviate the conditions. The defendants appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part and vacated in part. The court held that the prison's accreditation by a national correctional association (American Correctional Association) was not proof that the conditions of confinement did not violate the Eighth Amendment. The court noted that compliance with association standards could be a relevant consideration, but was not evidence of constitutionality. According to the court, inmates were afforded insufficient mental health care, in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The court cited the isolation and idleness, squalor, poor hygiene, temperature, and the noise of extremely psychotic prisoners, which created an environment that was "toxic" to the prisoners' mental health. (Mississippi Department of Corrections, Unit 32-C, State Penitentiary in Parchman)

U.S. Appeals Court
PRIVATE PROVIDER
FAILURE TO PROVIDE
CARE

Morales Feliciano v. Rullan, 378 F.3d 42 (1st Cir. 2004). The government moved to terminate an injunction issued pursuant to a consent decree that addressed unconstitutional conditions of an inmate health care system. The district court denied the motion and the government appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that there was an adequate record of continuing constitutional violations and that the district court's order to privatize the system met the Prison Litigation Reform Act's (PLRA) requirements for narrowness, need, and lack of intrusiveness. The district court had found substandard conditions that included the following findings: one-fourth of all inmates who requested sick call did not get it; only 55% of all ambulatory care appointments actually took place; only 49% of specialist consultations deemed necessary for serious conditions were arranged; medically prescribed diets were routinely ignored; mortality rates were rising; and only 31.3% of inmates who had been diagnosed HIV-positive were receiving treatment. The appeals court voiced frustration with this case: "Like the legendary Phoenix, this class action litigation involving prison conditions in Puerto Rico is seemingly incapable of eternal rest...given the long and tortuous history of this litigation--two years ago, we acknowledged that 'the lore of this case is Byzantine.'" (Puerto Rico)

U.S. District Court
DUE PROCESS

Williams v. Consovoy, 333 F.Supp.2d 297 (D.N.J. 2004). A former state prisoner filed a § 1983 action against a psychologist and others, alleging that the decision deny parole violated his constitutional rights. The district court held that the psychologist was entitled to absolute immunity from liability because his assessment of the parole candidate was an adjudicative act. The psychologist performed the evaluation on the order of the state parole board, to assist it in making its parole determination. (New Jersey State Parole Board)

U.S. Appeals Court
SUICIDE

Woodward v. Correctional Medical Services, 368 F.3d 917 (7th Cir. 2004). The administratrix of the estate of a pretrial detainee who had committed suicide in a county jail brought a § 1983 action against a private contractor hired by the county to provide medical and mental health services at the jail, and against the contractor's agents. The district court entered judgment on a jury verdict against the contractor and the contractor's social worker, awarding $250,000 in compensatory damages and $1.5 million in punitive damages, and denied motions for summary judgment as a matter of law. The contractor appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the contractor's employee's lack of training and carelessness were relevant toward establishing deliberate indifference, even though the employee herself was not found liable. The court held that the fact that no previous suicides had occurred in the jail did not preclude the contractor's liability. According to the appeals court, the district court did not abuse its discretion by letting the punitive damages award stand. The estate proffered evidence that the contractor failed to adequately train its employees and condoned employees' failure to complete mental health intake forms and the social worker's practice of challenging suicide watch referrals. According to the court, employees knew that the detainee was suicidal but failed several times to place him on suicide watch, in violation of its own written procedures. The court found that evidence of an alcohol-impaired nurse, intake backlogs, and claims of delayed or denied medical care to other inmates was relevant to the contractor's state of mind and was therefore admissible. (Lake County Jail, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
CONFINEMENT
RESTRAINTS DELIBERATE INDIF-FERENCE

Ziamba v. Armstrong, 343 F.Supp.2d 173 (D.Conn. 2004). A state inmate filed a civil rights action alleging that prison officials failed to provide constitutionally adequate health care, failed to protect him from the use of excessive force, and used excessive force. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants in part, and denied it in part. The district court held that fact issues remained as to whether a prison supervisor adequately trained correctional officers with respect to the use of four-point restraints, and failed to respond to reports and complaints of use of force against the inmate. The court denied qualified immunity, finding that a reasonable prison official ought to have understood in 1998 that it was a constitutional violation to restrain a mentally ill prisoner for twenty-two hours, with no penal justification, no food or water, and no access to a bathroom. (Northern Correctional Institution, Connecticut)

2005

U.S. District Court
MEDICATION
FAILURE TO PROVIDE CARE
MEDICATION
SUICIDE

Atkins v. County of Orange, 372 F.Supp.2d 377 (S.D.N.Y. 2005). Jail inmates brought a § 1983 action against a county and corrections officers, alleging indifference to their mental health needs and mistreatment. The defendants moved to preclude expert witness testimony and for partial summary judgment. The district court granted summary judgment in part and denied it in part. The court held that the county was not deliberately indifferent to the serious medical needs of a jail inmate, despite the inmate's claim that he was given a "woefully inadequate dosage" of medication and was not treated in a timely manner. The court noted that the medical record revealed that the inmate was seen by the mental health unit and a psychiatrist within one day of her admission to the jail and was on a "close watch" until he was seen by mental health personnel. The court found that the county was not deliberately indifferent to the serious medical needs of another inmate who alleged that she was prescribed the wrong medication and was given inadequate care while she was acutely manic. The court stated that the record demonstrated that the inmate was provided with mental health care upon each admission to the jail and that she was kept on "close watch" to ensure her safety until she was able to be seen by mental health staff. The court ruled that the county was not deliberately indifferent by allegedly delaying psychiatric assessment of an inmate and delaying the administration of psychotropic drugs. The court noted that the inmate was on "close watch" during the period of delay to ensure the inmate did not harm himself or others, and the inmate was seen immediately by various professionals after his two suicide attempts. The court found no deliberate indifference based on a three-day delay between the time an inmate was booked and the time she was seen by a psychiatrist, or based on the fact that on several occasions she missed doses of her medication because she was out of her cell at the time of the scheduled administration of her medications. The court noted that there was no showing that the inmate was harmed as the result of the conduct, and that her medication schedule was switched to evenings to accommodate her as soon as the forensic clinic was notified that she had missed some of her medications. (Orange County Correctional Facility and County Commissioner of Mental Health, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
SUICIDE

Cook Ex Rel. Tessier v. Sheriff of Monroe County, 402 F.3d 1092 (11th Cir. 2005). The personal representative of the estate of a pretrial detainee who committed suicide while incarcerated brought an action against a sheriff, in his official capacity, asserting claims for deliberate indifference to the detainee's medical needs in violation of § 1983, negligent training and supervision of jail employees, and vicarious liability for the employees' negligence. The district court excluded the representative's expert witness testimony, precluded reference to other suicides at the facility, and granted judgment as a matter of law for the sheriff. The representative appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The appeals court held that the district court acted within its discretion in excluding evidence of other suicides at the jail. The court found that the plaintiff failed to establish that the detainee's suicide was foreseeable to the sheriff and therefore any deficiencies in the sheriff's training or supervision did not rise to the level of deliberate indifference. But the court held that evidence was sufficient to support a jury verdict on the plaintiff's claim that the sheriff was vicariously liable under state law for employees' alleged negligence. The court noted that the detainee made two written requests to see a psychiatrist, one on each of the two days immediately preceding his suicide, and that the detainee stated in one request that he was "mentally sick" and asked to see the psychiatrist "as soon as possible." Three deputies observed the detainee as nervous and anxious, and one specifically observed the detainee apparently having an anxiety attack and complaining of chest pains. (Monroe County Detention Center, Florida)

U.S. District Court
SUICIDE

Drake ex rel. Cotton v. Koss, 393 F.Supp.2d 756 (D.Minn. 2005). The legal guardian for an incapacitated person, who attempted to commit suicide while he was a pretrial detainee in a county jail, and the state human services department sued a county and various officials under § 1983 alleging Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment violations and a state law claim for negligence. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court held that the officials did not act with deliberate indifference in failing to recognize and respond to the risk that the detainee was suicidal, even assuming there was a 72-minute gap between the last time the detainee was checked and when he was found. According to the court, the officials did not know that the detainee presented a substantial risk of suicide, based on a physician's reports describing the detainee's depression as only "mild" or "situational." There was nothing in the reports to suggest that anti-anxiety medication would have helped prevent the detainee's depression and attempted suicide. The court held that the officials acted with discretion with respect to their placement and treatment of the detainee, and in accordance with a physician's orders, and they promptly took the detainee to the hospital when they discovered he had harmed himself, and were therefore entitled to official immunity as to the negligence claims. (McLeod Co. Jail, Minnesota)

U.S. District Court
SUICIDE

Estate of Adbollahi v. County of Sacramento, 405 F.Supp.2d 1194 (E.D.Cal. 2005). Representatives of the estates of two county jail detainees, and one inmate, who committed suicide while in their cells brought a § 1983 action. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants in part, and denied in part. The court held that the county was not liable for failing to train jail personnel in suicide prevention where the county had a policy of periodic observation of cell occupants. The court noted that an officer, lacking knowledge that a detainee was suicidal, made no observations, and falsely entered on duty logs that he had done so. The court found that summary judgment was precluded by material issues of fact as to whether a jail commander ratified or encouraged the practice of "pencil-whipping," which involved making false entries on records showing observations of cell occupants that were not actually made. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by material issues of fact as to whether the county knowingly established a policy of providing an inadequate number of cell inspections and of falsifying logs showing completion of cell inspections, creating a substantial risk of harm to suicide-prone cell occupants. The court ruled that the sheriff and jail commander had immunity under state law from liability claims that there were holes in the bunks that could be used for death by hanging, where use of the bunk holes for suicide was not foreseeable. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by material issues of fact as to whether a county jail nurse ratified, condoned, and encouraged the deliberately indifferent behavior of a social worker who conducted an allegedly perfunctory interview of an inmate who later committed suicide. The court found that summary judgment was precluded by material issues of fact as to whether a psychiatric services clinician satisfied applicable standards of care, under state law. (Sacramento County Jail, California)

U.S. District Court
SEX OFFENDER RECORDS
PRIVACY

Hubbs v. Alamao, 360 F.Supp.2d 1073 (C.D.Cal. 2005). A person who had been civilly confined at a state hospital as a sexually violent predator (SVP) brought a pro se § 1983 action alleging violation of his constitutional rights. The district court held that the plaintiff's right to privacy was not violated when the defendants reviewed his medical records when assessing whether he was a sexually violent predator. According to the court, the state had a compelling government interest in identifying, confining and treating SVPs that outweighed the plaintiff's right to privacy in his medical records. The court found that the plaintiff's civil conspiracy and equal protection claims were barred because they implied the invalidity of his commitment. (Atascadero State Hospital, California)

U.S. District Court
MEDICATION
FAILURE TO PROVIDE
CARE

King v. Frank, 371 F.Supp.2d 977 (W.D.Wis. 2005). A state prison inmate brought a § 1983 action against corrections officials, alleging undue restrictions on telephone usage and access to written publications, improper cell illumination, and failure to provide adequate mental health care. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the officials. The court held that the inmate was not deprived of a basic human need by the presence of a constantly illuminated nine-watt fluorescent light in his cell, even though he alleged that the light caused him sleeplessness and other problems. The court noted that a registered nurse and a psychologist both examined the inmate and concluded that he suffered no ill effects. The court found that the mental health care that the inmate received was adequate, noting that the inmate received treatment not only from the prison's psychological services unit, but also from his unit's supervisor as well. The court held that the inmate did not suffer inadequate medical treatment when a corrections officer responsible for distributing his prescription insomnia medication was unable to dispense it on one occasion because the prison had run out of the drug. The court found that the panic attack and similar symptoms claimed by the inmate could not have resulted from a single missed dose, and there was no showing of deliberate indifference. (Waupun Correctional Institution, Wisconsin)

U.S. District Court
SUICIDE

Martin v. Somerset County, 387 F.Supp.2d 65 (D.Me. 2005). The representative of the estate of a county jail inmate who hanged himself in his cell, sued the county, sheriff and jail officials alleging violation of the inmate's federal and state rights. The district court granted summary judgment in part for the defendants, and denied it in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by fact issues as to whether jail officials displayed deliberate indifference to the inmate in violation of the Eighth Amendment, prior to the hanging. The court noted that it was necessary to determine if a jail shift supervisor and a control room officer subjectively knew that the inmate was suicidal and whether they unreasonably disregarded the risk. The court found that an officer who merely assisted in cutting down the inmate was not liable for deliberate indifference, where he brought a seat belt cutter to the cell on orders of the shift supervisor, and when it failed to release the sheet the inmate had used to hang himself, he brought scissors. The court found officials did not show deliberate indifference after the hanging when they did not apply cardio-pulmonary resuscitation, noting that the inmate was warm and appeared to be breathing, and it was only a few minutes before an emergency medical team arrived. The court held that the county did not show deliberate indifference to the suicide-prone inmate when it established a suicide prevention protocol, noting that the thrust of this claim was that the officials failed to follow the protocol in supervising the inmate. (Somerset County Jail, Maine)

U.S. District Court
SUICIDE
DELIBERATE INDIF-FERENCE
STAFF

Perez v. Oakland County, 380 F.Supp.2d 830 (E.D.Mich. 2005). The father and personal representative of the estate of an inmate brought a suit under § 1983, alleging that the defendants violated the inmate's Eighth Amendment rights by failing to provide appropriate mental health treatment or monitoring when the inmate was being held in the county jail, leading to the inmate's suicide. The district court held that the county did not act with deliberate indifference in allowing the inmate caseworker, who allegedly lacked sufficient medical background or expertise, to make decisions affecting the health care needs of the inmate. The court noted that the challenged practice was widespread, with the "vast majority" of county jails allowing employees who were not psychiatrists, but who had been trained in suicide detection and prevention, to make determinations whether inmates were suicidal or potentially suicidal.

The court held that the father failed to establish that a deputy actually perceived a risk of placing the inmate in a single cell. The inmate had been placed in a single cell and no special watch status had been ordered by the inmate caseworker, who was responsible for cell assignments. The court held that the caseworker was entitled to qualified immunity because it was not established at the time of the inmate's suicide that the caseworker's actions of making determinations concerning the inmate's cell assignments, without first consulting the inmate's physician or psychiatrist, would violate the inmate's Eighth Amendment rights. According to the court, the jail psychiatrist did not disregard a known and serious medical need, where evidence demonstrated that even though the psychiatrist knew that the inmate was not taking his medication, he determined through his own direct evaluation that the inmate was suicidal. (Oakland County Jail, Michigan)

U.S. Appeals Court
SUICIDE

Snow ex rel. Snow v. City of Citronelle, AL., 420 F.3d 1262 (11th Cir. 2005). The administrator of the estate of a pretrial detainee who had committed suicide while in jail brought an action against a city, its mayor and several police department employees, alleging violations of the detainee's rights under the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment and asserting a state wrongful death claim. The detainee had been arrested for driving under the influence of alcohol or drugs. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants on the federal claims and dismissed the state law claims. The administrator appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, vacated in part, and remanded. The court held that police department employees who lacked a subjective knowledge of the detainee's potential for suicide were not liable, in their individual capacities, for any constitutional violations. The court noted that the employees had no knowledge of either the detainee's emergency room records showing that the detainee told emergency room staff she had attempted suicide four times before, or of doctor's notes showing that the detainee had suicidal ideation. The court denied summary judgment for one police officer, finding fact issues as to whether he believed that there was a strong risk that the detainee would attempt suicide and did not take any action to prevent her suicide. According to the court, the city's alleged lack of a suicide policy did not cause any constitutional violation. (City of Citronelle Jail, Alabama)

U.S. District Court
DELIBERATE INDIF-FERENCE
FAILURE TO PROVIDE
CARE

Scarver v. Litscher, 371 F.Supp.2d 986 (W.D.Wis. 2005). A state prison inmate sued officials seeking damages for their alleged indifference to his illness and challenging his conditions of confinement. The district court entered judgment in favor of the officials. The court held that the officials did not show deliberate indifference to the inmate's mental illness condition, because he was examined and prescribed various antipsychotic medications. The inmate alleged that the only deficiency in his treatment was that officials failed to provide art supplies when they were requested. The court found that there were fact issues as to whether the inmate was subjected to conditions that were severe enough to violate the Eighth Amendment, but that the officials had qualified immunity from the inmate's damages suit. The court held that placing the mentally ill inmate in a continuously-illuminated maximum security cell without windows was not clearly established to be an Eighth Amendment violation at the time they placed the inmate in the most extreme isolation section of the maximum security prison. (Wisconsin Secure Program Facility)

U.S. Appeals Court
INVOLUNTARY
MEDICATION

U.S. v. Evans, 404 F.3d 227 (4th Cir. 2005). A detainee appealed the decision of a district court to medicate a detainee against his will to render him competent to stand trial. The appeals court vacated and remanded with instructions, finding that the government failed to demonstrate that involuntary medication would "significantly further" its prosecutorial interest and that it was "medically appropriate." According to the court, the government did not disclose the particular medication and dose range that it proposed to give the detainee, or indicate that it considered the detainee's particular mental or physical condition in reaching its conclusions. (Federal Correctional Institution, Butner, North Carolina)

U.S. Appeals Court
INVOLUNTARY
MEDICATION

U.S. v. Rivera-Guerrero, 426 F.3d 1130 (9th Cir. 2005). The district court entered an order permitting a defendant, who was committed to a federal medical center, to be involuntarily medicated. The defendant appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded with instructions. The court held that the district court abused its discretion by denying the defendant's request for a continuance, which prevented him from presenting any evidence to rebut the government's medical assertions and precluded the development of the requisite medically-informed record. (Federal Medical Center, Springfield, Missouri)

U.S. District Court
INVOLUNTARY
MEDICATION

U.S. v. Rivera-Morales, 365 F.Supp.2d 1139 (S.D.Cal. 2005). After a defendant was determined to be incompetent to stand trial and was committed to the Attorney General for treatment, the government moved for an order directing the facility director to evaluate the defendant for future dangerousness. The district court held that the use of involuntary medication to restore the defendant to competency was inappropriate and ordered the defendant to be detained for an additional 30 days to determine if he was subject to state commitment. (Federal Medical Center, Butner, North Carolina)

2006

U.S. Appeals Court
PSYCHIATRIC CARE

Borello v. Allison, 446 F.3d 742 (7th Cir. 2006). A prisoner brought a federal civil rights suit against prison employees, alleging they were deliberately indifferent to the danger posed by leaving him in a cell with a mentally unstable cellmate, who attacked him. The district court denied the employees' motion for qualified immunity and they appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded, finding that the prison employees did not deliberately condone the cellmate's attack on the prisoner, in violation of his Eighth Amendment rights, when they reasonably responded to the prisoner's complaints by honoring his request to be transferred to another cell, and by immediately taking the cellmate to a psychiatrist when he began acting strangely, and by interviewing both men. The prisoner was attacked by his cellmate one week after the cellmate's psychiatric evaluation. (Menard Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
FAILURE TO PROVIDE
CARE
SEGREGATION

Clark-Murphy v. Foreback, 439 F.3d 280 (6th Cir. 2006). The estate of a state inmate who died of dehydration while in an observation cell brought two civil rights suits against prison employees, alleging deliberate indifference to the prisoner's medical needs in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The district court denied qualified immunity to 15 corrections officers and they appealed. The appeals court held that a captain and sergeant who assisted the inmate after he collapsed outside the mess hall were not subjectively indifferent to his serious medical needs in violation of his Eighth Amendment rights, and thus were entitled to qualified immunity. The court noted that each perceived that the inmate faced risks to his psychological health and took reasonable steps to ensure that officers in charge of the inmate's care secured psychological services for him, and that neither officer had any further contact with the inmate or any reason to believe that the inmate's medical needs were not being met. The court found that prison officers and a psychologist who were in the position to perceive that the inmate, who was acting strangely and had been locked in an observation cell and had not received the psychological assistance he needed, were not entitled to qualified immunity on the Eighth Amendment claim alleging deliberate indifference given their interactions with the inmate and their apparent failure to go up the chain of command when a referral did not secure assistance for the inmate. The court also found that the officers and psychologist were not entitled to qualified immunity on the claim that they were deliberately indifferent to the hydration needs of the inmate who died of dehydration after six days in an observation cell, as they could have perceived a serious risk to the inmate based on a heat wave, the fact that water was repeatedly cut off to inmate's cell during their shifts, and the reports of other inmates that the inmate had called out for water. The court found that a correctional nurse who worked just one shift shortly after the inmate's placement in an observation cell was entitled to qualified immunity from liability given her limited exposure to the inmate and the resulting absence of evidence that there was reason to believe that the nurse perceived that psychological help had not been obtained for the inmate or that his condition was deteriorating. (Bellamy Creek Correctional Facility, Ionia, Michigan)

U.S. Appeals Court
PRETRIAL
DETENTION
INTAKE SCREENING

Drake ex rel. Cotton v. Koss, 445 F.3d 1038 (8th Cir. 2006). The legal guardian for an incapacitated person who attempted to commit suicide while he was a pretrial detainee in a county jail, and a state department of human services sued a county and various officials in their individual and official capacities under § 1983, alleging violations of the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments, and asserted a state law claim for negligence. The district court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment and the guardian appealed. The appeals court affirmed. On rehearing, the appeals court held that county jailers' actions did not constitute deliberate indifference, and the jailers' decision not to assign a special need classification to the pretrial detainee was a discretionary decision protected by official immunity. According to the court, the jailers' actions of conducting well-being checks of the pretrial detainee only every 30 minutes, failing to remove bedding and clothing, and failing to fill the detainee's anti-anxiety prescription in a timely manner did not constitute deliberate indifference. The court found that the jailers' view of the risk was shaped by the diagnosis and recommendations of a psychiatrist, who indicated that the detainee was not suicidal but simply manipulative. The court noted that the jailers' decision not to assign a special need classification to the pretrial detainee, that would have required more frequent observation, was a discretionary decision rather than a ministerial duty, protected by official immunity. The detainee was discovered hanging by a bed sheet from a ceiling vent in his cell. He was not breathing and the jailers immediately set to work resuscitating him and then transported him to a nearby hospital. He survived, but suffered serious brain injuries as a result of the suicide attempt. (McLeod County Jail, Minnesota)

U.S. District Court
PRETRIAL DETENTION RESTRAINTS

Glisson v. Sangamon County Sheriff's Department, 408 F.Supp.2d 609 (C.D.Ill. 2006). A detainee brought a civil rights action against county defendants and a police officer, alleging various violations of his constitutional rights in connection with his arrest and detention. The defendants moved to dismiss. The district court dismissed in part and declined to dismiss in part. The court held that the detainee sufficiently stated claims under the Eighth Amendment and Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment against a jail and a correctional officer with respect to both his first and second detentions. The court found that the detainee, who was awaiting a probation revocation hearing, sufficiently stated a claim under the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments by alleging that the county jail maintained policies and customs that tolerated cruel and unusual punishment of convicted prisoners and pretrial detainees, and that the correctional officer strapped him to a wheelchair for several hours, forcing him to urinate on himself and to sit in his urine for several hours, while he was in a manic state. The inmate alleged that the jail and correctional officer knew of his mental condition because it was documented and that the officer's and jail's acts were intentional with malice and reckless disregard for his federally protected rights. The court held that the detainee sufficiently stated denial of access to courts claims against a county jail and correctional officers by alleging that the jail maintained a policy and practice of arbitrarily denying inmates' confidential consultations with their attorneys and that the officers directly participated in the arbitrary and capricious denial of his access to counsel. The court found that the detainee stated an equal protection claim against a county jail and officer by alleging that the jail maintained a policy and practice that discriminated against him because of his mental illness, and that an officer discriminated against him in terms of the type of confinement on the basis of his mental illness. (Sangamon County Jail, Village of Grandview Police, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
FAILURE TO PROVIDE CARE
RESTRAINTS

Hadix v. Caruso, 461 F.Supp.2d 574 (W.D.Mich. 2006). State prisoners filed a class action under § 1983 in 1980, alleging that conditions of their confinement violated their constitutional rights. Following settlement of claims by consent decree, and termination of the enforcement of mental health provisions of the consent decree, a prisoner moved to reopen the judgment regarding mental health care and for the issuance of preliminary injunction. The district court granted the motion. The court held that reopening the mental health provisions of the consent decree was warranted where many recurrent problems noted by physicians concerned “cracks” between medical and mental health care. The court noted that forcing separate enforcement actions on related topics would do a disservice to prisoners and administrators by forcing them to function under multiple enforcement regimes. According to the court, the prison’s failure to provide daily psychologist rounds to mentally ill prisoners in a segregation unit violated their Eighth Amendment rights, inasmuch as such prisoners often had psychiatric needs which could not be accommodated without rounds due to their lack of movement and the prisoners’ inability to request care, and that segregation often placed prisoners with mental illness at a heightened risk of mental decompensation and in conflict with correctional officers. The court held that the pattern and practice of non-treatment of prisoners with mental illness, and the uncoordinated treatment of prisoners presenting complicated cases with interdisciplinary problems, violated the Eighth Amendment, in that it deprived prisoners of necessary services for serious medical and mental health needs. The court found that the prison’s use of mechanical in-cell restraints, including “top of the bed” restraints consisting of chaining a prisoner’s hands and feet to a concrete slab, as disciplinary method and/or control mechanism constituted torture and violated the Eighth Amendment, notwithstanding a six-hour limit on bed restraints but which did not prohibit the use of other dangerous restraint devices at end of the six-hour period. (Southern Michigan State Prison, Jackson)

U.S. Appeals Court
INVOLUNTARY MEDICATION PRETRIAL
DETENTION

Hills v. Kentucky, 457 F.3d 583 (6th Cir. 2006). An arrestee brought a civil rights action against a treating psychiatrist at a state correctional psychiatric center where the arrestee was held, alleging constitutional violations arising out of his being forcibly medicated. The district court denied the psychiatrist’s motion for summary judgment on the ground of qualified immunity and the psychiatrist appealed. The court of appeals reversed and remanded, finding that the psychiatrist was entitled to qualified immunity. According to the court, a reasonable governmental employee in the position of the treating psychiatrist who prescribed medication to be forcibly administered to the arrestee would not have clearly known his conduct was unlawful, and thus, the psychiatrist was entitled to qualified immunity in the arrestee’s civil rights action against him. The court order that authorized the arrestee’s transfer to the center for treatment and examination after the court had found that the arrestee was not competent to stand trial on a burglary charge, stated that the treatment ordered included forced medication if necessary, and after seven weeks of treatment, the center’s mental health professionals concluded that the arrestee could benefit from antipsychotic medication. (Kentucky Correctional Psychiatric Center)

U.S. Appeals Court
DELIBERATE
INDIFFERENCE

Moots v. Lombardi, 453 F.3d 1020 (8th Cir. 2006). A state prisoner sued various prison officials, alleging that they were deliberately indifferent to his serious mental health needs and that they retaliated against him for filing a grievance. The district court entered summary judgment for the officials and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed and held that: (1) the failure to house the prisoner with cellmates of his choosing did not constitute deliberate indifference to his serious medical needs, where the officials had ample reasons for their action, including safety concerns, and the officials had no reason to know that their housing choices would have a serious negative impact on the prisoner’s mental health; (2) any failure to ensure that the prisoner’s medications were promptly transferred to solitary confinement did not constitute deliberate indifference to his serious medical needs, absent a showing by the prisoner that he suffered harm as a result; (3) a conduct violation for fighting did not constitute retaliatory discipline, where the prisoner was bruised around his eye, and the fact that a conduct violation was later expunged did not mean that there was not some evidence for its imposition; and (4) transfer to another prison did not constitute disciplinary retaliation, where he disputed neither the computation of his classification score nor the conclusion that his score made him ineligible to remain at the prison from which he was transferred. (Missouri Eastern Correctional Center)

U.S. Appeals Court
SUICIDE
DELIBERATE
INDIFFERENCE

Perez v. Oakland County, 466 F.3d 416 (6th Cir. 2006). The father and personal representative of an inmate’s estate brought a § 1983 action against a county, sheriff department, sheriff deputies, inmate caseworker, and psychiatrist alleging the defendants violated the inmate’s Eighth Amendment rights by failing to provide appropriate mental health treatment or monitoring while he was being held in a county jail, leading to the inmate’s suicide. The eighteen-year-old inmate had hanged himself from a bedsheet tied to a vent in his single cell. The district court granted the defendants’ motions for summary judgment and the father appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that a county policy allowing a caseworker, who was not medical personnel, to make decisions regarding housing assignments for mentally ill inmates did not demonstrate deliberate indifference. The court noted that the caseworker was well-trained in mental health needs and suicide, nothing established that the policy had ever resulted in suicide or attempted suicide by another prisoner in the county jail, and the father’s expert stated that prisoner screening and placement decisions were commonly made by non-medical officials. The court held that the caseworker was entitled to qualified immunity because it was not clearly established at the time of the suicide that a county jail caseworker could be found to be deliberately indifferent to an inmate’s medical needs by moving him to single cell housing without first consulting the inmate’s treating physician or the jail’s psychiatrist, even though the inmate had threatened suicide and attempted suicide in the past. The court noted that the inmate was not deemed suicidal when he was moved to a single cell, the inmate was not generally deprived of medical treatment involving his mental health needs, and prisoners had no general right to be correctly screened for suicidal tendencies. (Oakland County Jail, Michigan)

U.S. District Court
RIGHT TO TREATMENT

Price v. Wall, 428 F.Supp.2d 52 (D.R.I. 2006). An inmate brought a § 1983 suit against corrections officials, alleging that he was intentionally transferred to the facility where he was confined in an effort to frustrate his rehabilitation, in retaliation for his filing of a motion to compel compliance with a state court order, in violation of the First Amendment. The defendants moved to dismiss. The district court held that the inmate stated a First Amendment retaliation claim where he alleged that corrections officials intentionally transferred him to the facility in retaliation for his court action. According to the court, the question was not whether the defendants had a right to transfer the inmate, but whether such action was accomplished for an unlawful purpose. The inmate had been required, as a condition of his sentence, to complete certain rehabilitative programs, including psychological and psychiatric treatment while incarcerated. After not receiving any of the court-mandated treatment, the inmate filed a motion in the state courts seeking to compel the Department of Corrections to comply with the state court order. After several skirmishes, the Department of Corrections agreed to provide the inmate with the court-mandated treatment. The parties further agreed that if the inmate successfully completed the first round of treatment, the Department of Corrections would upgrade his classification status, permitting him to participate in further rehabilitative treatment as mandated by the state court. The inmate successfully completed his first round of treatment and appeared before a classification board for review of his classification status. Based on his successful completion of the initial round of treatment and pursuant to the agreement between the inmate and the Department, the board recommended that the inmate's classification be upgraded. But the defendants refused to permit an upgrade and instead launched no less than three separate, unrelated investigations into various matters, delaying the inmate's classification status upgrade and prohibiting him from participating in further rehabilitation. (Rhode Island Department of Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
CONFINEMENT
SEGREGATION

Scarver v. Litscher, 434 F.3d 972 (7th Cir. 2006). A state prisoner brought a civil rights action against officials at a "supermax" prison, alleging that his conditions of confinement had aggravated his mental illness. The district court granted summary judgment for the officials and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the officials did not unconstitutionally subject the prisoner to cruel and unusual punishment, absent evidence that they knew that the conditions were making his mental illness worse. According to the court, prison authorities must be given considerable latitude in the design of measures for controlling homicidal maniacs without exacerbating their manias beyond what is necessary for security. The prisoner alleged that the heat in the cells in the Summer interacted with his antipsychotic drugs and caused him extreme discomfort, and that the constant illumination of the cells also disturbs psychotics. The prisoner alleged that the low level of noise, without audiotapes, a radio, or any source of sound, prevented him from stilling the voices in his head. (Wisconsin Secure Program Facility)

U.S. Appeals Court
INVOLUNTARY
MEDICATION
PSYCHOTROPIC
DRUGS
DUE PROCESS

Spann v. Roper, 453 F.3d 1007 (8th Cir. 2006). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against a prison nurse alleging deliberate indifference and violation of the due process clause. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the nurse. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part and remanded in part. The court held that the nurse did not act with deliberate indifference in forcing the prisoner to take another inmate's medication. According to the court, summary judgment was precluded by fact questions as to: (1) whether the state prison nurse's mistaken conduct in forcing the prisoner to take psychiatric medication created a serious medical condition that the nurse knew of but ignored; and (2) whether immediate medical attention, such as pumping the prisoner's stomach, could have removed the medication before it was totally absorbed in the prisoner's system. The court found that the prisoner's due process rights were not implicated by the nurse's inadvertent administration of another inmate's psychiatric medication because the nurse's decision did not involve the treatment of an unwilling patient with psychiatric medication. A few minutes after taking the medication, the prisoner felt his legs collapse and the room spin. He awoke in pain in another room with a sore throat and dried blood. (Transitional Care Unit, Missouri)

U.S. District Court
DELAY IN CARE
SUICIDE

Thomas v. Walton, 461 F.Supp.2d 786 (S.D.Ill. 2006). A state prisoner brought civil rights claims against correctional officials, alleging use of excessive force, deliberate indifference to medical needs, and retaliation in violation of his First Amendment rights. The defendants' motion for partial summary judgment was granted in part and denied in part. The district court held that a one-day delay in providing access to a mental health professional following the prisoner's suicide attempt did not involve deliberate indifference and that a 10-day delay in providing medical attention was not deliberate indifference. The court found that the prisoner's repeated refusal to comply with an order to submit to a strip search during a cell inspection justified spraying him with the chemical agent. The court found that the spraying did not involve the use of excessive force, where the chemical was not used in a quantity greater than necessary to subdue the prisoner, secure his compliance with the order, and assure the safety of the officers. The court noted that the prisoner was being held in segregation in a maximum security prison and had a history of assaults on correctional officers. (Tamms Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
PRETRIAL
DETENTION DELIBERATE INDIF-FERENCE

U.S. v. Terrell County, Ga., 457 F.Supp.2d 1359 (M.D.Ga. 2006). The federal government brought a Civil Rights of Institutionalized Persons Act (CRIPA) action against a county, county sheriff, and various other county officials, seeking a determination that county jail conditions were grossly deficient in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. The district court granted the government's motion for summary judgment. The court held that the sheriff and other officials were deliberately indifferent to the jail's gross deficiencies in the areas of medical and mental health care for inmates, protection of inmates from harm, environmental health and safety of inmates, and fire safety, in violation of the due process clause. The court noted that the lack of funds is not a defense to, nor legal justification for, unconstitutional conditions of a jail, for the purpose of analyzing a deliberate indifference claim under the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Even if a defendant argues that it is planning or working towards construction of a new jail to remedy the unconstitutional conditions at the current facility, the failure to implement interim measures to alleviate those conditions demonstrates deliberate indifference, according to the court. (Terrell County, Georgia)

U.S. Appeals Court
EVALUATION

Williams v. Consvooy, 453 F.3d 173 (3rd Cir. 2006). A former state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against parole board members, a psychologist who contracted with the state to provide mental health services, and others, alleging that his arrest for a parole violation and the subsequent decisions of the parole board violated his Fourth and Eighth Amendment rights. The district court granted summary judgment for some parole board members and the arresting officer on immunity grounds, and granted the psychologist's motion for summary judgment. The former prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed and held that: (1) the claim against parole board members and the arresting officer was not cognizable under § 1983; and (2) the psychologist enjoyed absolute immunity. According to the court, regardless of the fact that federal habeas relief was no longer available, the parole revocation decision had not been rendered invalid, and success on the former prisoner's claims would necessarily invalidate a revocation decision. The court held that the private psychologist who contracted with the state to perform the evaluation and presented his findings to the adjudicative parole board, which then relied on his report and expertise in reaching its ultimate decision to deny the inmate parole, acted as an arm of the court and enjoyed absolute immunity from the inmate's § 1983 action alleging the wrongful denial of parole. (New Jersey State Parole Board)

U.S. District Court
PRETRIAL
DETENTION

Winters ex rel. Estate of Winters v. Arkansas Department of Health and Human Services, 437 F.Supp.2d 851 (E.D.Ark. 2006). The administrator of the estate of mentally ill pre-trial detainee/civil committee who had died of peritonitis while in custody of a sheriff sued the sheriff and the Arkansas Department of Human Services (DHS) under § 1983, the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), and the Rehabilitation Act. Following bench trial, the district court held that neither DHS nor the sheriff caused or contributed to the death of the detainee/committee, and they were not liable under the Due Process Clause, Eighth Amendment, Rehabilitation Act, or ADA. The court found that the sheriff had no policy or custom to apprehend and incarcerate acutely mentally ill persons, as indicated by the fact that the detainee may have been only person under civil commitment ever housed in the sheriff's detention facility. (Benton County Jail, Arkansas)

2007

U.S. District Court
DELIBERATE
INDIFFERENCE
FAILURE TO PROVIDE CARE
PSYCHOTROPIC
DRUGS

Anderson ex rel. Cain v. Perkins, 532 F.Supp.2d 837 (S.D.Miss. 2007). A daughter, as next friend of a jail detainee who suffered second-degree burns on her ankles, thighs, and buttocks while awaiting mental health commitment, brought a civil rights suit against a sheriff and a county. The sheriff moved for summary judgment on claims brought against him in his individual capacity. The district court granted the motion. The court held that the sheriff did not violate the detainee's right to be protected from harm, absent evidence showing that restraints were likely used to subdue her. The court found that the sheriff was not deliberately indifferent to the detainee's medical needs in failing to administer her anti-psychotic medications, where the detainee's refusal to take her medications prior to being taken into custody, coupled with her violent and psychotic behavior as the result of the refusal, was the basis for her commitment. The court found that the sheriff was not deliberately indifferent in failing to discover second-degree burns of an unknown origin on the detainee's ankles, thighs, and buttocks because jailers regularly observed the detainee through a viewing window in her cell door, but did not actually enter the cell to visually inspect the detainee for signs of injury. (Amite County Jail, Mississippi)

U.S. District Court
FAILURE TO PROVIDE CARE
MEDICATION

Baylis v. Taylor, 475 F.Supp.2d 484 (D.Del. 2007). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against various defendants, alleging deliberate indifference to his serious medical needs. The defendants moved for dismissal. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the inmate's administrative remedies with respect to his claim that prison personnel were deliberately indifferent to his serious medical needs were presumed to have been exhausted, for the purposes of the Prison Litigation Reform Act's requirement that administrative remedies be exhausted before a § 1983 action could be brought, since no further remedies were available to the inmate. The court held that the inmate failed to state a § 1983 claim for deliberate indifference to his serious medical needs against a prison doctor. The inmate alleged in his complaint that the doctor stopped prescribing a particular medication that the inmate deemed appropriate for treatment of his attention deficit disorder, but the court held that this indicated merely a difference of opinion as to treatment that did not rise to the level of an Eighth Amendment violation. According to the court, the inmate stated a § 1983 claim for deliberate indifference to serious medical needs against a prison psychologist by alleging that, despite his promises, the psychologist failed to provide the inmate with therapy for his attention deficit disorder, and failed to have the inmate revisit a psychiatrist. The court also found that the inmate stated a § 1983 claim for deliberate indifference to serious medical needs against a prison employee, with his complaint that alleged that the inmate had no teeth, that he presented himself for dental care, and that the employee refused to let the dental work go forward. (Delaware Correctional Center)

- U.S. District Court
FAILURE TO PROVIDE CARE
- Dickens v. District of Columbia*, 502 F.Supp.2d 90 (D.D.C. 2007). A decedent's sister brought a wrongful death action against a railroad and the District of Columbia after the decedent was struck and killed by a train shortly after his release from prison. The defendants moved to dismiss the complaint. The district court granted the railroad's motion and denied the District's motion. The decedent's sister alleged that her brother was severely mentally ill and was released from the D.C. Jail without adequate preparation and without informing his relatives, which led to his death. (District of Columbia)
- U.S. District Court
DELIBERATE INDIFFERENCE
SUICIDE
- Estate of Hill v. Richards*, 525 F.Supp.2d 1076 (W.D.Wis. 2007). The estate of a county jail inmate who committed suicide sued the social worker who interviewed the inmate shortly before her suicide, claiming deliberate indifference to the inmate's suicidal mental condition, in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The social worker moved for summary judgment. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by fact issues as to whether the worker was aware of a suicide risk, as the result of a statement by the inmate that she had poked herself with a thumbtack, and as to the adequacy of the worker's response to the inmate's statement. The court noted that expert testimony was not required to establish that the social worker violated the Eighth Amendment by being deliberately indifferent to the health and safety of the jail inmate; under those circumstances a jury of laypersons could conclude that there was a duty to protect the inmate. The social worker knew, from her experiences with the inmate, that the inmate had a history of depression, that she had been prescribed multiple medications for depression and that she previously had expressed a desire to die. The social worker also knew that the inmate had not been taking her medication for several weeks and that she was being housed in segregation at the jail, where neither other prisoners nor staff could easily monitor her. (Dane County Jail, Wisconsin)
- U.S. District Court
DELIBERATE
INDIFFERENCE
FAILURE TO PROVIDE CARE
- Giddings v. Joseph Coleman Center*, 473 F.Supp.2d 617 (E.D.Pa. 2007). A parolee brought a civil rights action against a parole officer and warrant officers who transported him back to prison from a halfway house, alleging that they were deliberately indifferent to his serious physical and mental health needs in violation of the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments. The defendants moved for summary judgment on the ground of qualified immunity. The district court granted the motion. The court held that the parole officer was entitled to qualified immunity from the Eighth Amendment claim that she was deliberately indifferent to the parolee's need for medical treatment for a self-inflicted cut on his arm, noting that the cut was not serious because the parolee did not experience significant blood loss or infection, and the officer was not indifferent to the cut as evidenced by her offer to take the parolee to the hospital the next day. The court ruled that the officer was entitled to qualified immunity from the claim that she was deliberately indifferent to parolee's mental health needs, where evidence did not show that the parolee's mental health needs were serious on the day he cut himself, as there was no indication of a genuine suicide attempt, and the officer was not indifferent to those needs as she sent the parolee to the mental health unit of the halfway house. (Joseph Coleman Center, Pennsylvania)
- U.S. District Court
DELIBERATE
INDIFFERENCE
INVOLUNTARY
TREATMENT PSYCHOTROPIC
DRUGS
- Hendon v. Ramsey*, 528 F.Supp.2d 1058 (S.D.Cal. 2007). A state inmate filed a § 1983 action alleging that prison medical officials involuntarily administered anti-psychotic medications without following proper procedures and in deliberate indifference to his medical needs. The officials moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the involuntary administration of anti-psychotic medications to the inmate did not demonstrate deliberate indifference to the inmate's serious medical needs, as required to establish an Eighth Amendment violation, where the officials administered the drugs in an attempt to treat the inmate's mental health crisis. But the court held that the post-deprivation remedies available to the California inmate after the officials forcibly administered anti-psychotic drugs were insufficient to protect the inmate's due process liberty interest in being free from involuntary medication. According to the court, although state law established procedural safeguards before inmates could be involuntarily medicated, the prison officials allegedly disregarded their duty to comply with those established pre-deprivation procedures. The court found that the inmate's right to be free from arbitrary administration of anti-psychotic medication was clearly established by existing case law in 2002, the time of this incident, and therefore state prison officials were not entitled to qualified immunity from liability. (California State Prison-Sacramento)
- U.S. District Court
FAILURE TO PROVIDE CARE RECORDS
SUICIDE
- Justus v. County of Buchanan*, 517 F.Supp.2d 810 (W.D.Va. 2007). The administrator of a pretrial detainee's estate filed a § 1983 action against a sheriff and county jail employees arising out of the detainee's jail suicide. The detainee had a history of schizophrenia, bipolar disorder, anxiety, paranoia, and delusions and had been hospitalized for these conditions several times in the three years prior to his suicide. His treatment records show that he was hospitalized because family members reported suicidal ideation and bizarre, violent, and sexually inappropriate behavior. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The court held that the sheriff's deputies' failure to provide the pretrial detainee with prompt medical care after they discovered him hanging in his cell did not amount to deliberate indifference to the detainee's serious bodily injuries, in violation of the detainee's due process rights. The court noted that, even though the detainee was still alive when they took him down approximately 13 minutes after discovering him, there was no showing of an affirmative causal link between their inaction and the detainee's death from hypoxic brain injury.
- The court found that the sheriff was not deliberately indifferent to the pretrial detainee's suicidal nature, and thus was not subject to liability under § 1983 for failing to take steps to prevent his suicide, even though a notation on an incident report two months before the detainee's suicide indicated that another prisoner reported that the detainee "was threatening suicide". The court found no proof that the report did not simply inadvertently escape the sheriff's knowledge.
- The court held that a reasonable sheriff would not have understood from existing law that the absence of an operating video surveillance system in the county jail would violate a suicidal pretrial detainee's constitutional rights, and thus the sheriff was entitled to qualified immunity from liability under § 1983, even though the jail policy and procedure manual required immediate repair of any defective security equipment, and the sheriff was aware that the equipment had not been operating for some time.
- According to the court, under Virginia law, the deputies' failure to provide the pretrial detainee with prompt medical care after they discovered him hanging in his cell did not amount to gross negligence as required to overcome their immunity from tort liability. (Buchanan County, Virginia)

U.S. Appeals Court
SUICIDE
RESTRAINTS

Norris v. Engles, 494 F.3d 634 (8th Cir. 2007). A county jail detainee, who had been diagnosed with manic bipolar depression, sued a jail official under § 1983, alleging due process violations arising from his physical restraint. The district court denied the official's motion for summary judgment based upon qualified immunity. The official appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded, finding that the official's alleged conduct of cuffing the detainee to a floor-grate toilet in an uncomfortable manner for approximately three hours, if proven, did not violate the detainee's substantive due process rights. According to the court, the official's alleged actions did not shock the conscience and thus did not violate the detainee's substantive due process rights, inasmuch as official took such action after the detainee, who had been diagnosed with manic bipolar depression, had threatened to pull out her own peripherally inserted central catheter (PICC) so that she would bleed to death, and after the detainee had shown that having her hands handcuffed behind her back was alone not an adequate form of restraint. (Independence County Jail, Arkansas)

U.S. Appeals Court
FAILURE TO PROVIDE CARE
ADA- Americans With Disabilities Act

O'Guinn v. Lovelock Correctional Center, 502 F.3d 1056 (9th Cir. 2007). A prisoner filed a pro se suit claiming prison officials denied him accommodation and treatment for mental illness, under the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) and the Rehabilitation Act. The district court dismissed the suit pursuant to the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA) and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the prisoner's suit did not arise under § 1983 and that exhaustion is required under PLRA. The court found that the prisoner failed to exhaust administrative remedies. According to the court, the prisoner's filing of grievances requesting a lower bunk due to poor balance resulting from a brain injury were not equivalent to claims of denial of mental health treatment, and the prisoner's complaint to the United States Department of Justice (DOJ) did not exhaust the prison's internal grievance process. The court found that the DOJ's investigation of the prisoner's claims did not satisfy the exhaustion requirement as the investigation did not terminate the prisoner's rights to pursue ADA and Rehabilitation Act claims internally. (Lovelock Correctional Center, Nevada)

U.S. District Court
EVALUATION
SUICIDE

Probst v. Central Ohio Youth Center, 511 F.Supp.2d 862 (S.D. Ohio 2007). A plaintiff, on behalf of the estate of her son who committed suicide while incarcerated at juvenile detention facility, brought a wrongful-death action against the facility, its superintendent, a non-profit provider that performed suicide evaluations at the facility and a social worker employed by the provider. The plaintiff asserted claims under § 1983 and state law. The facility and non-profit moved for summary judgment. The district court denied the motion. The court held that under the state compulsion test, the private provider that performed suicide evaluations at the juvenile detention facility was not a "state actor" for § 1983 purposes. The court noted that the facility did not exert any control over suicide evaluations and the provider performed evaluations on an as-needed basis using its own standards and procedures. According to the court, the facility had discretion to implement the provider's recommendations resulting from the evaluations. But the court held that the private provider was a state actor for § 1983 purposes because it was performing a "public function." (Central Ohio Youth Center)

U.S. Appeals Court
HOSPITALIZATION
ADA- Americans With Disabilities Act

Winters v. Arkansas Dept. of Health and Human Services, 491 F.3d 933 (8th Cir. 2007). The administrator of the estate of a mentally ill pretrial detainee/civil commitee who had died of peritonitis in a county jail sued a sheriff and the Arkansas Department of Human Services (DHS) under § 1983, the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), and the Rehabilitation Act. The district court entered judgment for the defendants. The administrator appealed and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the pretrial detainee was not discriminated against on the basis of his mental illness, as required to establish violation of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) or the Rehabilitation Act. The court noted that the detainee was arrested for criminal trespass, and although he was not treated for his peritonitis due to his inability to communicate because of his mental illness, the sheriff and other jail officials sought immediate treatment for the detainee's mental illness, and attempted to transport him to a state hospital, but he was denied admittance due to lack of available space. The court found that neither the Arkansas Department of Human Services (DHS) nor the county sheriff were deliberately indifferent to the serious medical needs of the detainee, nor was there a policy or custom to deprive mentally ill detainees of treatment. According to the court, the detainee died from a condition that neither defendant knew of or suspected, the sheriff and other jail officers attempted to get the detainee into a mental health treatment facility, but no facility would accept custody of him. (Benton County Jail, Arkansas)

2008

U.S. Appeals Court
DELIBERATE
INDIFFERENCE
MEDICATION

Gibson v. Moskowitz, 523 F.3d 657 (6th Cir. 2008). The representative of the estate of a mentally disabled inmate who died of dehydration in a state prison brought a § 1983 action against a prison psychiatrist and others, alleging deliberate indifference to serious medical needs, and asserting medical malpractice claims. The district court denied the defendants' motion for summary judgment, and subsequently entered judgment, upon a jury verdict, in favor of the representative. The court awarded $1.5 million in compensatory damages and $3 million in punitive damages. The psychiatrist appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part and reversed in part.

The court held that evidence was sufficient to support a determination that the inmate had an objectively serious medical condition and that the psychiatrist subjectively ignored the inmate's serious medical needs. The court found that the compensatory damages award was not excessive and that the representative was entitled to recover punitive damages. The court found that the punitive damages award was not excessive.

According to the court, the psychiatrist was in charge of the inmate's treatment team, he admittedly was aware that the temperature in the observation room where the inmate was held exceeded 90 degrees, and that the combination of the inmate's medication and the room temperature was potentially deadly. A psychiatric expert testified that the inmate's medication affected the part of the brain that regulated body temperature and dissipated heat, and another medical expert testified that the inmate's dehydration occurred over a period of several days. Evidence was presented that during that period, the inmate lost 42 pounds. The psychiatrist never asked for the inmate's temperature to be monitored, even when he had learned from a nurse and other prison employees that the inmate had vomited. The nurse had advised the psychiatrist that the inmate was suffering from dehydration and severe weight loss, and that his condition was deteriorating. The psychiatrist did not examine the inmate, change his medication, or move the inmate to a cooler room.

The case was remanded to the district court to provide justification for its allocation of $1.5 million in compensatory damages awarded by the jury between the § 1983 Eighth Amendment deliberate indifference claim and the medical malpractice claim. The court had allocated $683,500, representing Michigan's high-tier non-economic damages cap to the medical malpractice claim, and the rest to the deliberate indifference claim, but it failed to provide any explanation for the allocation. The appeals court held that the allocation did not follow intuitively from the evidence, since a higher standard of culpability was required for the deliberate indifference claim. (Riverside Correctional Facility, Michigan)

U.S. District Court
PSYCHOTROPIC
DRUGS
SEGREGATION
SUICIDE

Graham v. Van Dycke, 564 F.Supp.2d 1305 (D.Kan. 2008). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against medical providers working at a state correctional facility, alleging violations of her Eighth Amendment due process rights arising from a strip search conducted by a male officer. She also challenged her mental health confinement. The district court granted summary judgment for the medical providers. The court held that the prison doctor's decision to remove the inmate from her cell after she became agitated and demanded two psychotropic drugs and to place her in mental health segregation was not deliberate indifference. The court noted that the doctor's decision was based on the inmate's previous history of mental illness and the doctor's knowledge that the inmate previously had a bad experience using one of the drugs she requested. The inmate threatened to harm other inmates, and the doctor feared for the inmate's safety because she had access to scissors. The court found that removal of the female inmate from her cell into administrative segregation and removal of her clothing, after she became agitated and demanded psychotropic drugs, did not violate her privacy or Eighth Amendment due process rights, even though officers who performed such tasks were all male. According to the court, the inmate was on suicide watch, which required removal of clothing to avoid self-injury, removal was done pursuant to established procedure and was videotaped, and a staffing shortage rendered it impractical to include a female officer on the removal team. (Topeka Correctional Facility, Kansas)

U.S. District Court
MEDICATION
RIGHT TO TREATMENT
TRANSFER

Jarecke v. Hensley, 552 F.Supp.2d 261 (D.Conn. 2008). A prisoner who suffered from antisocial personality and borderline personality disorders challenged his mental health treatment and an attempt to transfer him to a correctional facility with dormitory housing, alleging violation of the Eighth Amendment. The prisoner moved for a preliminary injunction to prevent his transfer and to be prescribed lithium and assigned to a single cell. The district court denied the motion. The court found that the prisoner did not have a likelihood of success on the merits of his claim, and that the prisoner would not suffer irreparable harm without an injunction. The court noted that the prisoner's medical treatment was adequate, as lithium was generally not used to treat such disorders, and that no medical diagnosis precluded his transfer to a dormitory setting or required confinement in single cell. (Connecticut)

U.S. Appeals Court FORCED MEDICATION
PSYCHOTROPIC
MEDICATION

Obriecht v. Raemisch, 517 F.3d 489 (7th Cir. 2008). A state prisoner filed a pro se § 1983 action against prison officials alleging that he was denied procedural due process when transferred to a state facility and when he was forced to take psychotropic medications. The district court granted summary judgment to the officials and denied motions for reconsideration. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the prisoner failed to exhaust challenges to the transfers and forced medication. The court also found that the prisoner forfeited the argument that exhaustion should be excused because of an inadequate law library because that issue had not been raised in the district court. The court noted that a prisoner's exhaustion of administrative remedies before filing a § 1983 claim is required even if the prisoner believes his efforts in securing relief will be futile or if the administrative authority has no power to grant the requested relief. (Wisconsin Resource Center and the Wisc. Dept. of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
COMMUNICATION
FAILURE TO PROVIDE
CARE
SPECIAL HOUSING
SUICIDE

Osterback v. McDonough, 549 F.Supp.2d 1337 (M.D.Fla. 2008). Inmates sued corrections officials, alleging that conditions of close management (CM) status amounted to cruel and unusual punishment. Following the grant of the inmates' motion to certify the class, and issuance of an order entering the officials' revised offer of judgment (ROJ), the officials moved to terminate the ROJ pursuant to the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA). The district court granted the motion. The court held that corrections officers were deliberately indifferent in violation of the 8th Amendment when inmates on close management (CM) status who truly were suicidal or otherwise suffered from severe psychological distress declared psychological emergencies. According to the court, the officers failed to summon mental health staff, and inmates thereafter attempted to commit suicide or otherwise harmed themselves, or, in one case, actually committed suicide. But the court found no Eighth Amendment violations with regard to mental health screening procedures, access to mental health care, the level of mental health staff, and instances in which security staff interfered with the delivery of mental health services. The court held that termination of the revised offer of judgment (ROJ), which was previously adopted by the district court as a final order and judgment, was appropriate under the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA) in that isolated instances of prison staff's failure to appropriately respond to a bona fide psychological emergency of inmates in close management status did not create a current and ongoing violation of the class members' Eighth Amendment rights. (Everglades Corr'l Inst., Florida)

U.S. District Court
MEDICATION

Sauve v. Lamberti, 597 F.Supp.2d 1312 (S.D.Fla. 2008). A former prisoner brought a § 1983 action against a sheriff and correctional health services corporation, alleging that the defendants denied the prisoner access to medications while he was incarcerated. The district court denied the defendants' motion for summary judgment. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to the extent that a doctor employed by the corporation with which the county contracted for correctional health care services was aware of the prisoner's history of drug problems, mental health issues, and prior noncompliance with treatment at the time of his decision not to place the prisoner on medication. The court also found genuine issues of material fact as to whether the decision not to place the prisoner on medication for the first 49 days of his incarceration was based on the medical judgment of the doctor. The court held that summary judgment was also precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the corporation had a practice or policy that resulted in the prisoner being denied medication for 49 days during his incarceration. The court ruled that the sheriff failed to establish an entitlement to summary judgment, even though the former prisoner presented evidence only as to the private corporation with which the county contracted for correctional health care services because the county remained liable for constitutional deprivations caused by policies or customs of the corporation. (Broward County Jail, Florida, and Armor Correctional Health Services)

U.S. Appeals Court
MEDICATION RESTRAINTS STAFF

Shook v. Board of County Commissioners of County of El Paso, 543 F.3d 597 (10th Cir. 2008). County jail inmates brought a class action suit alleging that jail conditions for prisoners with mental health needs violated the Eighth Amendment's ban against cruel and unusual treatment. The district court denied the prisoners' motion for class certification and dismissed the suit. The appeals court reversed and remanded. On remand, the district court again denied certification, and the inmates appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that class certification could be denied due to unmanageability, namely the difficulty of crafting specific injunctive relief applicable to the class as a whole. The court noted that the plaintiff inmates variously complained that they were denied medications, inadequately supervised, or subjected to excessive force or excessive restraint, and the propriety of the jail's actions depended on circumstances that varied from class member to class member. (El Paso County Jail, Colorado)

U.S. District Court
DELAY IN CARE
DELIBERATE
INDIFFERENCE
EVALUATION
MEDICATION

Swift v. Tweddell, 582 F.Supp.2d 437 (W.D.N.Y. 2008). An inmate brought a pro se § 1983 action against a sheriff, deputies, and jail employees. The district court denied the defendants' motion for summary judgment. The court found that the jail employees were not deliberately indifferent to the inmate's serious medical needs, in violation of the Eighth Amendment, in connection with a delay in prescribing the inmate's "mental health" medications. The court noted that on the day that the inmate submitted a request for mental health clinic services, the jail nurse referred the request to the county Mental Health Department (MHD) pursuant to standard practice at the jail, but because the inmate did not appear to be an emergency case and because he made no further requests for mental health services, he was not seen by a psychiatrist from MHD for more than two months. He was prescribed Prozac but did not, according to the court, suffer serious adverse effects as a result of the temporary gap between his request for mental health care and his psychiatric examination. (Steuben County Jail, New York)

U.S. District Court
FAILURE TO PROVIDE CARE
SUICIDE

Tatsch-Corbin v. Feathers, 561 F.Supp.2d 538 (W.D.Pa. 2008). Survivors of an inmate who committed suicide sued a jail's forensic specialist under § 1983, claiming violations of the Fourteenth Amendment's prohibition against deprivations of life without due process. The district court denied the forensic specialist's motion to dismiss. The court found that the fact that the jail's forensic specialist lacked a contractual relationship with either the jail or a health care contractor retained by the county did not preclude her from being considered a "state actor," as required for imposition of liability under § 1983 in connection with the inmate's suicide. According to the court, her role was to provide mental health care to inmates, regardless of her other job responsibilities or the contractual nuances through which she came to work at the jail, and she could not have done so without the authorization of the state. The court found that the inmate's survivors alleged sufficient facts to establish that the forensic specialist should have known, or did know, that the inmate presented a suicide risk and failed to take necessary or available precautions to protect him. According to the court, alleged facts suggested that the inmate had made various threats to kill himself, which had been taken seriously enough by jail officials to warrant the request of an evaluation by a mental health professional, and he had a documented history of attempted suicide and psychiatric hospitalization, of which the specialist was allegedly aware. (Blair County Prison, Pennsylvania)

U.S. Appeals Court
INVOLUNTARY
MEDICATION
PSYCHOTROPIC
DRUGS

U.S. v. Green, 532 F.3d 538 (6th Cir. 2008). A pretrial detainee who had been determined to be mentally incompetent to stand trial on narcotics trafficking indictments, appealed the order of the district court for involuntary administration of psychotropic medications. The appeals court affirmed, finding that an important governmental interest was at stake in the prosecution, as required to support an order for involuntary medication. (Federal Medical Center, Rochester, New York)

U.S. District Court
INVOLUNTARY
MEDICATION

U.S. v. Moruzin, 583 F.Supp.2d 535 (D.N.J. 2008). A defendant was indicted on charges of bank robbery and jury tampering. The government moved for the involuntary administration of antipsychotic medication to the defendant to render him competent to stand trial. The district court denied the motion. The court held that the administration of medication would not significantly further the state's interests, that alternatives existed to involuntary administration of the drug Haldol, and that involuntary administration of Haldol was not in the defendant's best medical interest. (Federal Medical Center, Butner, North Carolina)

2009

U.S. District Court
COMMITMENT
DUE PROCESS
SEX OFFENDERS
TRANSFER

Bailey v. Pataki, 636 F.Supp.2d 288 (S.D.N.Y. 2009). Convicted sex offenders brought an action against state officials, alleging that their involuntary psychiatric commitment deprived them of constitutional due process protections. The defendants moved to dismiss for failure to state a claim, or, in the alternative, for a stay pending resolution of certain pending state court proceedings. The district court denied the motion. The court held that the allegations of the convicted sex offenders were sufficient to state a procedural due process claim against state officials for deprivation of the offenders' liberty interests in not being confined unnecessarily for medical treatment. The offenders alleged that: (1) they were involuntarily transferred to state-run mental institutions based on the certification of doctors designated by the New York State Office of Mental Health and the New York Department of Correctional Services, instead of independent, court-appointed doctors; (2) that some were never served with a notice of petition for their involuntary commitment; (3) that notice was not provided to any of the offenders' friends and family; (4) and that they were not provided an opportunity to request a pre-commitment hearing and an opportunity to be heard. The court found that the procedural due process rights of the convicted sex offenders, to certain pre-transfer procedural safeguards, including notice, an opportunity to be heard, and a psychiatric evaluation by court-appointed doctors, was clearly established at the time of their involuntary commitment and transfer from prison to a mental hospital, so as to preclude any claim of qualified immunity on the part of New York officials. The court noted that the offenders were certified for involuntary commitment after being examined for short periods of time lasting no more than 20 minutes, and once certified, all six offenders were transported in handcuffs and shackles where they were broadly evaluated for treatment. (New York State Office of Mental Health, New York Department of Correctional Services)

U.S. District Court
ADA-Americans with Disabilities Act
PSYCHIATRIC CARE

Burke v. North Dakota Dept. of Correction and Rehabilitation, 620 F.Supp.2d 1035 (D.N.D. 2009). A state inmate filed a § 1983 action against prison officials alleging statutory and constitutional violations, including interference with his free exercise of religion, lack of adequate medical care, retaliation for exercising his constitutional rights, failure to protect, refusal to accommodate his disability, and cruel and unusual punishment. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants. The court held that: (1) failure to provide Hindu worship services on Thursdays did not violate the inmate's equal protection rights; (2) the decision to reduce Hindu worship services at the facility did not violate the Free Exercise Clause; (3) restriction of the Hindu inmate's use of camphor, kumkum, incense, and a butter lamp during worship services did not violate the Free Exercise Clause; and (4) failure to find a qualified Hindu representative to assist the inmate in the study of his religion did not violate the Free Exercise Clause. The court found that the inmate's purported schizoid/sociopathic personality did not substantially limit any major life activity, and thus did not constitute a "disability" under ADA, where the inmate did not describe the nature and severity, duration, the anticipated duration, or the long-term impact of his mental impairment. The court held that the inmate failed to demonstrate that his mental impairment substantially limited his ability to care for himself. Similarly, the inmate's hepatitis C did not substantially limit any major life activity, and thus did not constitute a "disability" under ADA. (North Dakota State Penitentiary)

U.S. District Court
DELIBERATE
INDIFFERENCE
DUE PROCESS
SUICIDE

Cabral v. County of Glenn, 624 F.Supp.2d 1184 (E.D.Cal. 2009). A pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against a city and a police officer alleging violations of the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments and claims under California law. The city and officer filed a motion to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the detainee, a psychotic and suicidal individual who collided with the wall of a safety cell and broke his neck, failed to plead that a police officer, who extracted the detainee from his holding cell and used a stun gun and pepper spray on him following an incident in which the detainee rubbed water from his toilet on his body, was deliberately indifferent to the detainee's need for medical attention, as required to state due process claim under § 1983. According to the court, the detainee failed to allege that the officer knew he was suicidal and was not receiving medical care, or that the officer attempted to interfere with the detainee's receipt of such medical attention. The court found that the detainee's allegations that the officer used a stun gun, a stun-type shield and pepper spray in an attempted cell extraction while the detainee was naked, unarmed and hiding behind his toilet were sufficient to state an excessive force claim under § 1983. The court denied qualified immunity for the officer, even though the detainee had not responded to the officers' commands to come out of his cell. The court noted that the law clearly established that police officers could not use a stun gun on a detainee who did not pose a threat and who merely failed to comply with commands. (City of Willows Police Department, California)

U.S. Appeals Court
EVALUATION
SUICIDE

Cloaninger ex rel. Estate of Cloaninger v. McDevitt, 555 F.3d 324 (4th Cir. 2009). A former detainee, who had been seized by deputies for a psychological evaluation, brought a § 1983 action against deputy sheriffs and others alleging violations of the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments. The district court awarded summary judgment in favor of the defendants and the detainee appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court found that the deputies had probable cause to seize and detain the detainee for a psychological evaluation, after a dispatcher received a 911 call from a hospital to report that the detainee, who had called the hospital to report an adverse reaction to his prescription medication, had threatened suicide. The deputies knew that the detainee had made prior suicide threats, that police had responded to those threats, and that firearms had been found in the home. The court held that exigent circumstances existed to support the warrantless seizure of the detainee for psychological evaluation in his home. (Burke County, North Carolina)

U.S. District Court
FAILURE TO PROVIDE CARE

Coleman v. Schwarzenegger, 922 F.Supp.2d 882 (E.D.Cal. 2009). State prisoners brought class actions against a governor and other officials, alleging unconstitutional conditions of confinement as to the provision of medical and mental health care. After granting a correctional officer association's motion to intervene as a plaintiff, the motion to convene a three-judge panel was granted, to consider plaintiffs' request for order to reduce prison population. The court held that clear and convincing evidence established that overcrowding was the primary cause of the provision of inadequate medical and mental health care; (2) deficiencies in the provision of medical and mental health care could not be resolved in the absence of a prisoner release order; (3) reduction in the California state prison population to a system-wide cap was warranted; (4) the court's order was the least intrusive means necessary to correct the violations, as required by PLRA; and (5) reduction in the California state prison population to a system-wide cap of 137.5% was warranted. (California Department of Rehabilitation and Corrections)

U.S. District Court
DELIBERATE INDIFFERENCE
SUICIDE
SUPERVISION

Cuebas v. Davila, 618 F.Supp.2d 124 (D.Puerto Rico 2009). The mother of a man who committed suicide in a jail cell filed a § 1983 action on behalf of herself, her minor daughter, and her deceased son, claiming deprivation of constitutional rights by the arresting police officers and their supervisors, and seeking compensatory damages for pain and suffering due to the loss of her mentally ill son. The district court dismissed the case in part, and declined to dismiss in part. The court held that the mother, as sole heir of her deceased son, under Puerto Rico law, had Article III standing to bring a § 1983 suit on behalf of her son against the police officers and supervisors for alleged constitutional violations, since the mother inherited her son's cause of action. The court found that the mother's allegations that arresting officers and their superiors were deliberately indifferent to her son's risk of suicide in his jail cell following his arrest were sufficient to state a § 1983 claim that the son's due process rights were violated under the Fourteenth Amendment. The court held that the mother's allegations that the police officer in charge of detainees was deliberately indifferent to her son's risk of suicide were factually sufficient to state a § 1983 claim that the officer violated her son's due process rights, including allegations that the officer was aware of the likelihood that the arrestee might commit suicide, and that the officer did not take obvious steps to prevent the arrestee's suicide. The mother had explained to the officers that her son was mentally ill and that he had recently attempted suicide. The son was placed in a cell after his shoes and belt had been removed. At some point during that night he committed suicide. The mother alleged that he was not properly monitored while being held in custody, as he should have been, by the officers who were aware he was suicidal. She alleged that his cell was not adequately monitored even though the police officers who arrested him and who monitored him knew that he was mentally ill and had recently attempted suicide. (Puerto Rico Police Department, Salinas Police Headquarters)

U.S. District Court
FAILURE TO PROVIDE CARE
SUICIDE

Edwards v. District of Columbia, 616 F.Supp.2d 112 (D.D.C. 2009). The representative of the estate of a woman who committed suicide while being held in a District of Columbia jail brought an action against the District and the jail's medical services contractor in the Superior Court for the District of Columbia, alleging negligence in the provision of mental health care in ensuring that the woman was not a danger to herself. The representative also alleged that the District and contractor failed to adequately provide a medical response upon discovering the woman in the immediate moments after her suicide. The contractor removed the case to federal district court and moved to dismiss. The district court held that the representative was required to exhaust administrative remedies under the Federal Tort Claims Act (FTCA) on claims against the contractor before bringing an action under FTCA and that the court lacked subject matter jurisdiction over FTCA claims and claims against the District. (Dist. of Columbia Jail)

U.S. District Court
DELIBERATE
INDIFFERENCE
MEDICATION
PSYCHIATRIC CARE

Estate of Rice ex rel. Rice v. Correctional Medical Services, 596 F.Supp.2d 1208 (N.D.Ind. 2009). The estate of a prisoner who died while detained at a county jail, where he suffered from schizophrenia and various complications as the result of his refusal to take his medication and his self-imposed starvation, brought an action against a private hospital and a physician at the hospital. The estate alleged that the physician deprived the prisoner of his constitutional rights in violation of § 1983, and that the hospital and physician negligently failed, under state law, to provide adequate medical care and treatment to the prisoner. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants in part. The court held that an expert's summary judgment report, in which he stated, among other things, that the treating physician was fully aware that the deceased prisoner had been refusing food, drink, and medications, and that she had no reason to believe that the same pattern would not subsequently continue back in jail, was admissible. The court also found that the expert's summary judgment report that the physician who treated the schizophrenic prisoner prior to his death showed indifference to the prisoner's serious medical condition "by turning a blind eye to the likely outcome of a return to jail" was admissible. The court noted that the expert was not offering a legal conclusion as to the treating physician's subjective knowledge. The court found that the prisoner had a serious medical need, as an element of his alleged Eighth Amendment violation. The court noted that the prisoner went to a hospital because he was not taking his medications, was not eating, had lost 50 pounds in 13 months, and was uncommunicative. Medical records indicated that the prisoner had severe mental problems, including schizophrenia, which posed a risk of serious damage to his future health. The physician who treated the prisoner acknowledged the seriousness of his condition in her medical recommendation, and ten weeks after his hospital stay, the prisoner died from malnutrition. (Elkhart County Jail, Indiana)

U.S. District Court
ADA-Americans with Disabilities Act
MEDICATION

Flynn v. Doyle, 630 F.Supp.2d 987 (E.D.Wis. 2009). Prisoners at a state correctional institution brought a class action against a governor and other defendants, alleging that medical and mental health care provided to them at the institution violated the Eighth Amendment and Title II of Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA). The prisoners moved for a preliminary injunction and the district court granted the motion. The court found that the class of prisoners was reasonably likely to succeed at trial on the merits of its Eighth Amendment claims against a governor, institution and other defendants alleging that continued use of correctional officers to distribute medications at the institution posed a substantial risk of serious harm to members of the class. According to the court, the defendants knew of the risk but failed to take reasonable steps to abate it. (Taycheedah Correctional Institution, Wisconsin)

U.S. District Court
ADA- Americans with Disabilities Act
EQUAL PROTECTION

Flynn v. Doyle, 672 F.Supp.2d 858 (E.D.Wis. 2009). Female inmates filed a class action alleging that medical, dental, and mental health care provided to prisoners at a state facility violated the Eighth Amendment, Equal Protection Clause, Title II of Americans with Disabilities Act, and Rehabilitation Act. The officials moved for partial summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether there were systemic and gross deficiencies in staffing, facilities, and procedures at the state correctional facility that resulted in provision of inadequate medical care for female inmates. The court also found that summary judgment was precluded on the inmates' claim that the state violated Title II of ADA by failing to provide access to programs to inmates with mobility, visual, and hearing disabilities. The court found a genuine issue of material fact as to the effectiveness of accommodations offered to disabled inmates at a state correctional facility. The court found that the female inmates' allegation that the state provided inpatient mental health services for male inmates, but not for female inmates, was sufficient to state claim against the state under the Equal Protection Clause, despite the state's contention that the disparity was natural outgrowth of the historically small number of female inmates in the state. (Taycheedah Correctional Institution, Wisconsin)

U.S. District Court
DELIBERATE
INDIFFERENCE
INTAKE SCREENING
PRETRIAL DETENTION
SUICIDE
SUPERVISION

Francis ex rel. Estate of Francis v. Northumberland County, 636 F.Supp.2d 368 (M.D.Pa. 2009). The administrator of the estate of a detainee who committed suicide while in a county prison brought an action against the county and prison officials, asserting claims for Fifth and Fourteenth Amendment reckless indifference and Eighth Amendment cruel and unusual punishment under § 1983. The administrator also alleged wrongful death under state law. The county defendants brought third-party claims against a psychiatrist who evaluated the detainee, and the psychiatrist counter-claimed. The county defendants and psychiatrist moved separately for summary judgment. The court held that the County, which paid $360,000 in exchange for a release of claims brought by the estate of the detainee, would be entitled to indemnity on third-party claims against the psychiatrist who evaluated the detainee if a jury determined that the psychiatrist was at fault in the detainee's suicide. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to: (1) whether the evaluating psychiatrist knew the pretrial detainee was a suicide risk and failed to take necessary and available precautions to prevent the detainee's suicide as would show deliberate indifference to the detainee's medical needs; (2) whether the evaluating psychiatrist was an employee of the county prison entitled to immunity under the Pennsylvania Political Subdivision Tort Claim Act (PSTCA) or was an independent contractor excluded from such immunity; (3) whether the evaluating psychiatrist's failure to appropriately document the pretrial detainee's medical records led to the detainee's removal from a suicide watch; (4) whether the recordation of the pretrial detainee's suicide watch level was customary, precluding summary judgment as to whether the evaluating psychiatrist had a duty to record this information; (5) whether the evaluating psychiatrist's failure to communicate the appropriate suicide watch level to county prison officials resulted in the pretrial detainee's suicide; and (6) whether the evaluating psychiatrist communicated the appropriate suicide watch level for the pretrial detainee to county prison officials and whether the psychiatrist was required to record the watch level in the detainee's medical records. The court found that the county prison had an effective suicide policy in place and thus the psychiatrist who evaluated the pretrial detainee had no viable Fourteenth Amendment inadequate medical care and failure to train counterclaims under § 1983 against the county. According to the court, while at least one individual at the prison may have failed to carry out protocols for the diagnosis and care of suicidal detainees, the policy would have been effective if properly followed as was customary at the prison. The court held that the county prison warden adequately trained subordinates with regard to protocols for the care and supervision of suicidal inmates and adequately supervised execution of these protocols, and thus the psychiatrist who evaluated the pretrial detainee had no viable counterclaim under § 1983 against the warden for failure to adequately train or supervise under the Fourteenth Amendment. (Northumberland County Prison, Pennsylvania)

U.S. District Court
PSYCHIATRIC CARE
RESTRAINTS

Gay v. Chandra, 652 F.Supp.2d 959 (S.D.Ill. 2009). A state prisoner, who suffered from antisocial and narcissistic personality disorders, brought a § 1983 action against a psychiatrist who treated him in prison, alleging that conditions of confinement to which the psychiatrist subjected him violated the Eighth Amendment. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the psychiatrist in part, and denied in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the cell where the prisoner was restrained naked was excessively cold, and as to whether the psychiatrist knew that the prisoner would in fact be restrained naked in excessively low temperatures. Similarly, the court found fact issues as to whether the psychiatrist's decision not to allow the prisoner to wear any clothing while he was restrained denied the prisoner a "civilized measure" of life's necessities, and as to whether the psychiatrist was deliberately indifferent to the fact that the prisoner was restrained without clothes. According to the court, summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the psychiatrist's denial of food to the prisoner while the prisoner was restrained for 32 hours constituted an Eighth Amendment violation. The court found that the decision of the psychiatrist to use therapeutic restraints on the prisoner did not, in and of itself, violate the Eighth Amendment; where the psychiatrist's decision to restrain the prisoner was to protect the prisoner from harming himself. The court found that the psychiatrist was not entitled to qualified immunity in the prisoner's § 1983 action alleging Eighth Amendment violations arising from his medical treatment; where a fact issue existed as to whether the psychiatrist violated the prisoner's Eighth Amendment rights, and the prisoner's right to receive medical treatment for his serious medical needs, and his right not to be punished through conditions of his confinement, was a clearly established right. (Tamms Correctional Center, Ill.)

U.S. District Court
DELAY IN CARE
DUE PROCESS

Greene v. Furman, 610 F.Supp.2d 234 (W.D.N.Y. 2009). A state inmate brought a pro se § 1983 action against corrections officials, alleging various constitutional violations arising out of disciplinary proceedings instituted after he allegedly spit at another inmate. The district court dismissed the case. The court held that an allegation that a corrections officer issued a false misbehavior report against the inmate failed to state a claim for a due process violation. The court noted that the issuance of false misbehavior reports against an inmate by corrections officers is insufficient on its own to establish a denial of due process. According to the court, the allegation that the inmate, who was being escorted to a mental health appointment when he became involved in an altercation with another inmate and was not allowed to continue to his appointment, failed to state a claim for an Eighth Amendment violation. The court found that any delay in the inmate's mental health treatment did not cause him actual harm or put his health at risk, and there was no evidence that the delay resulted from any sadistic or otherwise impermissible motive. (Southport Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
ADA-Americans with Disabilities Act
FAILURE TO PROVIDE CARE

Hughes v. Colorado Dept. of Corrections, 594 F.Supp.2d 1226 (D.Colo. 2009). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against the Colorado Department of Corrections (CDOC), the Colorado Parole Board, and the operator of a residential community corrections facility, alleging failure to adequately respond to the prisoner's mental health needs in violation of his constitutional rights and the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA). The district court dismissed the complaint in part and denied dismissal in part. The court held that the prisoner's § 1983 claims against the Colorado Department of Corrections (CDOC) and the Colorado Parole Board were barred by the Eleventh Amendment, where Colorado had not waived Eleventh Amendment immunity, Congress had not abrogated state sovereign immunity for § 1983 claims, and both the CDOC and Board were state agencies. The court held that the prisoner's allegations of physical injury merely stemmed directly from his alleged mental illness and constituted only common manifestations of depression and anxiety, and thus were insufficient under the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA) to state a claim for money damages against the CDOC and the Board for alleged ADA violations.

According to the court, the prisoner's allegations were sufficient to plead a claim against the CDOC for discriminatorily denying the prisoner access to medical care in violation of Title II of the ADA. The prisoner alleged that the CDOC maintained a policy of assuring that inmates and parolees received required mental health treatment, that the CDOC intentionally failed to provide him mental health treatment while he was at the correctional facility, and that the CDOC denied his access to such treatment while on parole. The court noted that Title II of the ADA does not categorically bar a state parole board from making an individualized assessment of the future dangerousness of an inmate by taking into account the inmate's disability. (Sterling Corr'l Facility, Independence House, Colorado)

U.S. Appeals Court FAILURE TO PROVIDE CARE MEDICATION PRIVACY	Hunter v. Amin, 583 F.3d 486 (7th Cir. 2009). The sister of a pretrial detainee who committed suicide in a county jail brought an action on her own behalf, and as the personal representative of the estate of her deceased brother, against a jail psychiatrist, county sheriff, and the county, asserting claims under § 1983, as well as claims of medical malpractice. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants and the sister appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The appeals court held that the county jail's policy that prevented the pretrial detainee from speaking to the jail psychiatrist without a jail officer being present did not violate the detainee's constitutional rights, so as to serve as the basis for holding the county liable for the detainee's death under § 1983. According to the court, the pretrial detainee had a constitutional right to adequate mental health treatment, but there was no evidence suggesting that the detainee could not have received adequate mental health treatment in the presence of a corrections officer. The appeals court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the jail psychiatrist committed medical malpractice by discontinuing the medication of the detainee who later committed suicide. (St. Clair County Jail, Illinois)
U.S. District Court PAMII- Protection and Advocacy for Mentally Ill Individuals Act	Indiana Protection and Advocacy Services Com'n v. Commissioner, Indiana Dept. of Correction, 642 F.Supp.2d 872 (S.D.Ind. 2009). The Indiana Protection and Advocacy Services Commission (IPAS) brought an action against the Indiana Department of Correction, alleging violations of federal and state law in the conditions of custody of mentally ill prisoners. The Department moved to dismiss for lack of standing. The district court denied them motion. The court held that IPAS had an associational standing under the Protection and Advocacy of Mentally Ill Individuals Act (PAMII) to bring suit, and the action was not an intramural dispute between two state agencies that could be resolved by the governor. The court noted that mentally ill prisoners would have standing to sue on their own behalf for violations of federal and state law in the conditions of their custody, and the interests that IPAS sought to protect were not merely germane to the IPAS's purpose, they were its reason for existence. According to the court, IPAS was not a traditional state agency, was independent of the governor, was funded by the federal government under the Protection and Advocacy of Mentally Ill Individuals Act (PAMII), received no state funding and had authority independent of the state to pursue administrative, legal, and other appropriate remedies to ensure the protection of individuals with mental illness who are receiving care or treatment in the state. (Indiana Department of Correction)
U.S. District Court DELIBERATE INDIFFERENCE MEDICATION	Mastroianni v. Reilly, 602 F.Supp.2d 425 (E.D.N.Y. 2009). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against a sheriff and medical personnel at a county correctional center, alleging a violation of his Fifth, Eighth, and Fourteenth Amendment rights. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants in part, and denied in part. The court held that the inmate's treatment by the jail's director of psychiatry and its mental health group did not pose any particular risk of harm or result in actual adverse consequences to the inmate, as would constitute deliberate indifference to serious medical needs in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The inmate was seen by someone in the mental health department, including the director, on a regular basis, and when he saw the director, he examined the inmate and discussed his problems. The inmate's medications were changed during the course of his treatment as a result of meeting with practitioners in the mental health department, and on one occasion the inmate complained to the director about his medication being discontinued and the director reacted appropriately and had it reinstated. (Nassau County Correctional Center, New York)
U.S. District Court FAILURE TO PROVIDE CARE PSYCHIATRIC CARE	Proctor v. Applegate, 661 F.Supp.2d 743 (E.D.Mich. 2009). State prisoners brought a § 1983 action against Michigan Department of Corrections (MDOC) employees and multiple prison facilities, alleging violations of their constitutional rights. The defendants moved to dismiss on statute of limitations grounds and for failure to state a claim upon which relief could be granted. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that a prisoner's allegation in his complaint that an MDOC employee did not refer him for psychiatric treatment after he attempted to commit suicide sufficiently stated a § 1983 claim for an Eighth Amendment violation based on denial of medical treatment. (Michigan Department of Corrections)
U.S. District Court FAILURE TO PROVIDE CARE	Scott v. DiGuglielmo, 615 F.Supp.2d 368 (E.D.Pa. 2009). A state inmate filed an action seeking a declaration that he had serious and continuing mental health condition and had not been receiving adequate treatment, and an injunction ordering prison officials to make corrections to his prison charts. The district court granted the officials' motion to dismiss in part and denied in part. The court held that the inmate had standing to seek declaratory and injunctive relief against prison officials based on his claim that he had a serious and continuing mental health condition and had not been receiving adequate treatment, where the alleged denial of proper medical and psychiatric care was continuing, and there was a substantial likelihood that his injury would be addressed by the requested relief. (State Correctional Institution at Graterford, Pennsylvania)
U.S. Appeals Court COMMITMENT SEX OFFENDERS	Serna v. Goodno, 567 F.3d 944 (8th Cir. 2009). A patient of a state mental hospital, involuntarily civilly committed as a sexually dangerous person pursuant to a Minnesota sex offender program, brought a § 1983 action against a program official and against the head of the state's Department of Human Services. The patient alleged that visual body-cavity searches performed on all patients as part of a contraband investigation violated his Fourth Amendment rights. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants, and the patient appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that visual body-cavity searches performed on all patients of a state mental hospital, as part of a contraband investigation following the discovery of a cell-phone case in a common area, did not infringe upon the Fourth Amendment rights of the patient involuntarily civilly committed to the facility as a sexually dangerous person. According to the court, even though facility-wide searches may have constituted a disproportionate reaction, cell phones presented a security threat in the context of sexually violent persons, there was a history of patients' use of phones to commit crimes, and the searches were conducted in a private bathroom with no extraneous personnel present and in a professional manner with same-sex teams of two. (Minnesota Sex Offender Program, Moose Lake, Minnesota)

U.S. Appeals Court FAILURE TO PROVIDE CARE PSYCHIATRIC CARE	Vallario v. Vandehey, 554 F.3d 1259 (10th Cir. 2009). County jail inmates sued a county sheriff and a county's administrator of jail operations in their official capacities, alleging disregard of risks to inmates from restraint chairs and other devices, and the denial of access to psychiatric care for indigent inmates. The district court granted the inmates' motion for class certification and the defendants petitioned for interlocutory appeal. The appeals court granted the petition and remanded the case. The court held that the district court abused its discretion by misconstruing the complaint as alleging that denial of adequate mental health treatment affected all inmates, and abused its discretion by refraining from any consideration whatsoever of the action's merits. (Garfield County Jail, Colorado)
U.S. District Court FAILURE TO PROVIDE CARE SUICIDE	Vann v. Vandebrook, 596 F.Supp.2d 1238 (D.Wis. 2009). A prisoner brought a § 1983 action against a crisis intervention worker, registered nurse, and several corrections officers, alleging deliberate indifference to a serious medical need in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The prisoner moved to proceed in forma pauperis and for the appointment of counsel. The district court granted the motion to proceed in part and denied in part, and denied the motion for appointment of counsel. The court held that the prisoner stated a § 1983 claim against the intervention worker and the unknown officer where they were aware of the prisoner's suicide risk when the worker refused to place the prisoner in an observation program and the officer provided the prisoner with a razor and a nail clipper and left the prisoner unattended. The court found that the registered nurse's failure to provide treatment to the prisoner constituted deliberate indifference to the prisoner's serious medical needs, as required for the prisoner to state a § 1983 claim for violation of the Eighth Amendment, where the prisoner had sustained 133 self-inflicted wounds that were bleeding and the nurse merely inspected his wounds. According to the court, the corrections officers who performed an emergency cell extraction of the prisoner following his suicide attempt, transported him to a day room where the prison's registered nurse performed an inspection of the prisoner's wounds, thus precluding the prisoner's § 1983 claim against the officer for deliberate indifference to his serious medical needs in violation of Eighth Amendment. (Columbia Correctional Institution, Wisconsin)
U.S. Appeals Court INTAKE SCREENING MEDICATION SEGREGATION	Vaughn v. Gray, 557 F.3d 904 (8th Cir. 2009). A detainee's sister brought a § 1983 action against several officers and county employees alleging they were deliberately indifferent to the detainee's serious medical needs which resulted in his death. The district court denied the defendants' motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity and the defendants appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that a genuine issue of material fact existed as to whether jail officials deliberately disregarded the medical needs and condition of the detainee. The detainee was charged with first-degree sexual assault. During the jail's intake procedure, he completed a medical intake form, indicating that he had a history of mental illness, headaches, epilepsy/seizures, ulcers, and kidney/bladder problems, but indicating that he did not have a history of heart problems or high or low blood pressure. Although the detainee had no medications with him upon his arrival at the jail, his mother later brought his medications, including an anti-depressant. He received his medication for several days until the prescription ran out. He missed several doses before a new prescription arrived. During the time he was without medication, his cellmate told jail employees that the detainee had been ingesting shampoo and engaging in other odd behavior. The detainee was moved to an isolation cell to be monitored on an hourly basis. He was observed vomiting and asked to see a nurse but he was not provided access. He was later found dead in his cell. An autopsy determined that he died of natural causes: arteriosclerotic cardiovascular disease, causing a heart attack that resulted in his death. (Greene County Jail, Arkansas)
U.S. District Court DELIBERATE INDIFFERENCE FAILURE TO PROVIDE CARE MEDICATION PSYCHIATRIC CARE	Wade v. Castillo, 658 F.Supp.2d 906 (W.D.Wis. 2009). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against prison psychiatrists, alleging that the psychiatrists committed medical malpractice and exhibited deliberate indifference to his serious medical needs in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The psychiatrists moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part, and denied in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact existed as to whether the prisoner, who was diagnosed with a psychotic disorder, had a serious medical need at the time the prison psychiatrist discontinued the prisoner's medications, and whether the psychiatrist was aware that he was exposing the prisoner to a substantial risk of serious harm by taking him off the medications. The court held that the refusal of the prisoner's treating psychiatrist to prescribe psychotropic medication did not amount to deliberate indifference to the prisoner's serious medical need, as would violate the Eighth Amendment, where the psychiatrist did not prescribe medication because he was uncertain whether the prisoner had a psychotic disorder. The court found that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the prisoner's treating psychiatrist met the requisite standard of care for psychiatrists when he refused to prescribe psychiatric medication to the prisoner and in providing psychiatric care to the prisoner, and as to whether the psychiatrist's alleged negligence was a substantial factor in causing the prisoner's harm. (Green Bay Corr'l. Institution, Dodge Correctional Institution and Racine Correctional Institution, Wisconsin)
U.S. District Court SUICIDE	Wilson v. Taylor, 597 F.Supp.2d 451 (D.Del. 2009). The mother of a deceased prisoner, who died in his solitary cell as a result of asphyxia due to hanging after an apparent attempt to feign suicide, brought a § 1983 action against Delaware Corrections officials. The district court denied the defendants' motion for summary judgment. The court held that fact issues precluded summary judgment on the mother's § 1983 claim, custom or policies claim, deliberate indifference claim, qualified immunity grounds, wrongful death claim, and claim for punitive damages. The court found genuine issues of material fact as to: (1) whether the prisoner's detention was valid at the time of his death; (2) whether Delaware Corrections officials failed to train and or maintain customs, policies, practices, or procedures, relating to the prisoner's repeated release inquiry; (3) whether Delaware Corrections officials' ignored the prisoner's risk of hurting himself to get the attention of guards as to his repeated release inquiries; (4) whether a correctional officer acted in good faith and without gross or wanton negligence in throwing the prisoner against a bench in his cell while holding his throat and threatening him verbally; and (5) whether Delaware Corrections officials' conduct in ignoring the prisoner's repeated release inquiries was a proximate cause of the prisoner's ultimate death. The court also found that fact issues existed as to whether Delaware Corrections officials acted outrageously and with reckless indifference to the rights of others, precluding summary judgment on the mother's § 1983 claim for punitive damages. (Delaware Correctional Center)

2010

U.S. District Court
DELAY IN CARE
DUE PROCESS
PAMII- Protection and Advocacy for Mentally Ill Individuals Act
TRANSFER

Advocacy Center for Elderly and Disabled v. Louisiana Dept. of Health and Hospitals, 731 F.Supp.2d 583 (E.D.La. 2010). A disability advocacy organization and incompetent detainee's next friend brought an action against the Louisiana Department of Health and Hospitals and Department officials, challenging the Department's practice of subjecting incompetent criminal defendants to extended delays in parish jails before their transfer to a mental health facility. The defendants moved to dismiss. The district court denied the motion. The court held that the action fell within the Ex Parte Young exception to sovereign immunity, where the organization alleged an ongoing violation of the Fourteenth Amendment and sought prospective relief in the form of a permanent injunction requiring officials to accept custody of incompetent defendants and provide them with proper restorative treatment. The court noted that the Ex Parte Young exception to sovereign immunity holds that a suit is not barred when it is brought against state officials to enjoin the enforcement of an allegedly unconstitutional law. The court found that the disability advocacy organization had associational standing to bring the due process challenge where the organization was allied with and representative of its constituents, who had standing to sue in their own right. The federal laws under which the Advocacy Center was established include the Protection and Advocacy for Individuals with Mental Illness Act of 1986 ("PAIMI"). (Louisiana Department of Health and Hospitals, Feliciana Forensic Facility)

U.S. District Court
DELAY IN CARE
DUE PROCESS
TRANSFER

Advocacy Center for Elderly and Disabled v. Louisiana Dept. of Health and Hospitals, 731 F.Supp.2d 603 (E.D.La. 2010). A disability advocacy organization brought an action challenging the Louisiana Department of Health and Hospitals' practice of subjecting incompetent criminal defendants to extended delays in parish jails before their transfer to a mental health facility. The organization moved for a preliminary injunction. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the organization demonstrated a substantial likelihood of success on the merits of its due process claim, and demonstrated a substantial threat of irreparable injury if the injunction did not issue. The court found that the organization demonstrated that the threatened injury outweighed the damage the injunction might cause, and the organization demonstrated that the public interest would not be disserved if an injunction was issued. The organization claimed that the Louisiana Department of Health and Hospitals' practice of subjecting criminal defendants found to be incompetent to stand trial to extended delays in parish jails before their transfer to a mental health facility was not rationally related to the restoration of the defendants' competency, in violation of their due process rights, where incompetent defendants remained in parish jails because mental health facility was full, not because remaining in jail might restore their competency. The court noted that the organization presented evidence that continued incarceration in parish jails could exacerbate the incompetent defendants' mental conditions. The court held that inadequate funding could not excuse the Department's perpetuation of unconstitutional conditions of confinement. (Louisiana Department of Health and Hospitals, Feliciana Forensic Facility)

U.S. District Court
FAILURE TO PROVIDE CARE

Antonetti v. Skolnik, 748 F.Supp.2d 1201 (D.Nev. 2010). A prisoner, proceeding pro se, brought a § 1983 action against various prison officials, alleging various constitutional claims, including violations of the First, Fifth, Sixth, Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments. The district court dismissed in part. The court held that the prisoner's allegations were factually sufficient to state a colorable § 1983 claim that prison officials violated the Eighth Amendment by depriving him of needed medical care. The prisoner alleged that he was housed in segregation/isolation, leading to a mental health breakdown, and: (1) that he was seen by mental health professionals eight times over a five year period instead of every 90 days as required by administrative regulations; (2) that mental health professionals recommended he pursue art and music for his mental health but that prison officials denied him the materials; (3) and that the officials' actions resulted in the need to take anti-psychotic and anti-depression medications due to suffering from bouts of aggression, extreme depression, voices, paranoia, hallucinations, emotional breakdowns and distress, unreasonable fear, and systematic dehumanization. The court found that the prisoner's allegations were sufficient to state a colorable § 1983 Eighth Amendment claim for violation of his right to be free of cruel and unusual punishment where the prisoner alleged the exercise provided to him was to stand in a completely enclosed cage alone, in extreme heat or cold without water, shade, exercise equipment or urinals, and that as a result he suffered sunburns, cracked and bleeding lips and a lack of desire to exercise, resulting in a loss of physical and mental health. (High Desert State Prison, Nevada)

U.S. Appeals Court
EVALUATION
PRETRIAL DETENTION
SUICIDE
SUPERVISION
DELIBERATE
INDIFFERENCE

Clouthier v. County of Contra Costa, 591 F.3d 1232 (9th Cir. 2010). The estate of a pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against a county, mental health specialist, and two sheriff's deputies alleging they violated the detainee's due process rights by failing to prevent his suicide while he was confined. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants and the estate appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The court held that the estate had to show that the detainee was confined under conditions posing a substantial risk of serious harm and that correction officers were deliberately indifferent to that risk.

The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the mental health specialist at the jail, who was on notice of the pretrial detainee's suicidal condition, was deliberately indifferent to a substantial risk of harm to the detainee when she removed the detainee from an observation log and told deputies that the detainee could be given regular clothes and bedding. According to the court, it was clearly established at the time of detention that a reasonable mental health professional would not have removed key suicide prevention measures put in place by a prior mental health staff member, and therefore the specialist was not entitled to qualified immunity. The court found that the estate failed to establish that a sheriff's deputy at the jail knew that moving the detainee to the general population in the jail posed a substantial risk of serious harm to the detainee, where the deputy only knew that the detainee had missed meals and free time, and that the detainee had been taken off an observation log. The court noted that the deputy spoke to the detainee all weekend and noted he had a positive outlook on wanting to get out of the room, and earlier that day the mental health specialist found that the detainee was not actively suicidal at the time. The court held that the estate failed to establish that another sheriff's deputy knew that the detainee was suicidal and deliberately ignored that risk, where the deputy knew only that the detainee was suicidal and needed to be on 15-minute checks and the mental health specialist told the deputy to give the detainee his regular clothes and bedding. The court noted that nothing indicated that the deputy saw the detainee's knotted sheet. According to the court, the county did not have a longstanding custom or practice of moving pretrial detainees from an observation cell into the general population without consultation with mental health staff, or a longstanding practice of miscommunication between mental health staff and custodial staff. The court found no pattern of repeated wrongful conduct by county staff, and nothing that indicated another suicide resulted from the improper transfer of a detainee. The court found that the affidavit of the estate's expert, who opined that custodial staff and mental health staff did not work together as a team, was speculative and conclusory, and thus was insufficient to avoid summary judgment. The court noted that the factual basis for the expert's declaration was limited to a sequence of events and statements of participants surrounding the detainee's transfer to the general population in the jail, and the report did not address the key question of whether the alleged disconnect was so obvious as to have been deliberate indifference. (Contra Costa County Martinez Detention Facility, California)

U.S. District Court
PSYCHOTROPIC
DRUGS
DELIBERATE
INDIFFERENCE

Miller v. Beard, 699 F.Supp.2d 697 (E.D.Pa. 2010). An inmate brought a § 1983 suit against prison officials, a health care provider and medical personnel, alleging deliberate indifference to his serious medical needs under the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The court held that a prison nurse was not deliberately indifferent to the inmate's mental health issues, thus defeating his § 1983 claim of an Eighth Amendment violation, despite the claim that she engineered the discontinuance of his psychotropic medications by falsely accusing him of hoarding his medication. According to the court, the nurse had a reasonable subjective fear that the inmate was hoarding his medication. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether a physician failed to provide adequate treatment for the inmate after taking the inmate off powerful psychotropic medications, and whether the abrupt discontinuance of the medications had a negative impact on the inmate's mood and behavior. The court found that the injuries the inmate suffered as a consequence of the physician's refusal to provide him with asthma, allergy, and migraine medication were not "serious," thus defeating the inmate's § 1983 claim of an Eighth Amendment violation in deliberate indifference to his serious medical needs. (State Correctional Institution at Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania)

U.S. Appeals Court
PSYCHIATRIC CARE
SEX OFFENDERS
TRANSFER
DELIBERATE
INDIFFERENCE

Nelson v. Shuffman, 603 F.3d 439 (8th Cir. 2010). A pretrial detainee resident of the Missouri Sexual Offender Treatment Center brought a § 1983 action against 13 treatment center officials, alleging violations of his constitutional rights. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of six of the 13 defendants. The remaining seven defendants appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as follows: (1) as to whether the officials recklessly disregarded an objectively serious risk of harm to the pretrial detainee resident by placing him with a roommate who had a history of sexually assaulting vulnerable young males; (2) as to whether the pretrial detainee had a serious medical need and whether a treatment center official deliberately disregarded the need by failing to provide the psychological treatment she prescribed; (3) as to whether officials retaliated against the detainee resident for filing an abuse and neglect charge and several grievances complaining about treatment center officials' failure to provide him necessary psychological treatment; and (4) as to whether officials' transfer of the detainee resident to an unfinished ward that only housed one resident who was confined to shackles twenty-four hours a day was punitive and violated due process by imposing a punishment that had no legitimate institutional objective. (Missouri Sexual Offender Treatment Center)

U.S. Appeals Court
DELIBERATE
INDIFFERENCE
DUE PROCESS
PSYCHIATRIC CARE
SEGREGATION

Orv v. Larkins, 610 F.3d 1032 (8th Cir. 2010). An inmate brought a § 1983 claim against prison officials alleging his rights under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment and the Eighth Amendment were violated when he was kept in administrative segregation for nine months. The district court dismissed the complaint as frivolous and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the inmate's nine-month stay in administrative segregation did not constitute an atypical and significant hardship when compared to the burdens of ordinary prison life, as required to support the inmate's claim that his liberty interests under the Fourteenth Amendment were violated. The court found that prison officials who provided the inmate with anti-depressants, and later with anti-psychotic medication, during his nine-month stay in administrative segregation, were not deliberately indifferent to the inmate's worsening mental illness, as required to support the inmate's Eighth Amendment claim. (Eastern Reception, Diagnostic and Correctional Center, Missouri)

U.S. District Court
FAILURE TO PROVIDE CARE
PSYCHIATRIC CARE

Paine v. Johnson, 689 F.Supp.2d 1027 (N.D.Ill. 2010) affirmed in part 678 F.3d 500. The guardian of the estate of a pretrial detainee, who allegedly suffered from bipolar disorder, brought a § 1983 action against a city and city police officers, alleging civil rights violations in connection with the detainee's arrest and subsequent release from custody without being provided access to mental health treatment. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the detainee, who exhibited drastic and unnatural behavior throughout her 28-hour detention, had a serious mental health condition. The court also found a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the arresting city police officer, and other police employees, who witnessed the arrestee singing rap lyrics, taking her clothes off and dancing provocatively for different men, acting erratically, discussing the price of oil, and screaming bizarre and vulgar statements, among other things, had notice that the arrestee had a serious mental health condition that required medical attention. The court noted that a city police officer, who spoke on the telephone with the detainee's mother, and was informed by her mother that the detainee was likely bipolar and might be having an episode, had notice that the detainee had a serious mental health condition that required medical attention, precluding summary judgment.

The court also found genuine issues of material fact as to whether a city police officer, who had actual knowledge of the pretrial detainee's mental health condition based on observations of her behavior while in custody, placed the detainee in a position of heightened risk when she released the detainee from the police station and pointed her toward an area known for violent crime, without providing the detainee with food, money, or medication, and as to whether the officer's conduct "shocked the conscience." The court identified a fact issue as to whether the detainee would not have been raped and seriously injured absent a city police officers' failure to provide the detainee with psychiatric care. The court held that city police officers were not entitled to qualified immunity from the § 1983 claim brought by the mother of the detainee, for unreasonably failing to provide the detainee with mental health care under the Fourth Amendment, as it was clearly established that pretrial detainees were entitled to mental health treatment for serious mental health conditions. On appeal (678 F.3d 500), the appeals court held that the arresting officer was entitled to qualified immunity. The district court also denied qualified immunity for the city police officer who released the detainee, where the law was clearly established that the officer could not release the detainee from custody in a manner that increased her risk of harm. (Chicago Police Department, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
DUE PROCESS
DELIBERATE
INDIFFERENCE
SPECIAL HOUSING
SUICIDE

Silvera v. Connecticut Dept. of Corrections, 726 F.Supp.2d 183 (D.Conn. 2010). The representative of a pretrial detainee's estate filed a § 1983 action alleging that state prison officials' decision to house the detainee with a convicted inmate and their failure to provide adequate mental health care caused the detainee's suicide death. The officials moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that allegations that prison medical staff ignored abundant evidence demonstrating that the pretrial detainee was an acute suicide risk were sufficient to state a claim of deliberate indifference to his serious medical needs, in violation of the Due Process Clause. The court noted that evidence included a judge's instructions to keep him on suicide watch, the detainee's prior medical records, contemporaneous complaints and behavior, and examinations by medical staff, all of whom concluded that the detainee suffered from severe mental health issues. Nonetheless, officials placed him in a cell by himself, rather than in specialized housing, with access to materials with which he could hang himself, failed to check on him regularly, and ignored signs that his mental condition had deteriorated.

The court found that a state prison supervisor was not liable under § 1983 for the pretrial detainee's suicide death, even if the supervisor had some training with regards to caring for mentally ill detainees, and his subordinates failed to properly oversee the detainee's activities. The court noted that the detainee was placed in the general prison population based on a mental health professional's recommendation, the supervisor was not aware that the detainee posed an excessive risk of suicide, and subordinates were given proper orders to keep the detainee under constant surveillance and interact with him at frequent, irregular intervals. The court described the change in the detainee's conditions of confinement prior to his suicide. "Inmates housed in the Charlie Unit—apparently unlike those in the specialized housing unit where Mr. Lyle was held from May 11 until May 15—have the ability to turn the cell's lights on and off at will. Additionally, the Charlie Unit has bunk-style beds, which are outfitted with standard-issue sheets and pillow case—both of which would play a role in Mr. Lyle's suicide. Once transferred to the Charlie Unit, Mr. Lyle was given standard DOC clothing, whereas previously he had been given only a 'suicide gown.' "

According to the court, the pretrial detainee's right to due process was not violated merely because he was forced to share a cell with a convicted prisoner, absent an allegation that the detainee suffered an injury from being housed with a convicted inmate, or that placement with the convicted inmate was intended to punish the detainee. (Garner Correctional Institute, Connecticut)

U.S. Appeals Court
ADA- Americans with Disabilities Act JUVENILE SUICIDE
DELIBERATE
INDIFFERENCE

Simmons v. Navajo County, Ariz., 609 F.3d 1011 (9th Cir. 2010). Parents of a pretrial detainee who committed suicide while in custody brought a state-court action against various jail personnel, their supervisors, and their county employer, asserting claims under state tort law, § 1983, and the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA). The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants and the parents appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, vacated in part, and remanded. The court held that there was no evidence that a prison nurse knew the pretrial detainee who subsequently committed suicide was in substantial danger of killing himself, as required to demonstrate the prison nurse was deliberately indifferent to such risk in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. According to the court, although the nurse was aware that the detainee had previously attempted to take his own life, suffered from depression, and was at some risk of making another attempt, at the time detainee killed himself, over a month had elapsed since his suicide attempt, during which time the detainee received counseling, took antidepressants, and by all accounts, was doing better. The court found that prison nurses were not deliberately indifferent, under the Fourteenth Amendment, to the detainee who committed suicide, because they failed to ensure that the detainee had daily evaluations pursuant to the suicide prevention policy, absent evidence that they knew detainee was in a suicidal crisis. According to the court, the prison nurses' failure to retrieve the used gauze the pretrial detainee used to hang himself did not constitute deliberate indifference in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment, absent evidence that the prison nurses were aware the pretrial detainee had accumulated the gauze.

The court found that the teenage pretrial detainee waved the prison nurse away on the morning of the day he committed suicide, when the nurse tried to speak with him, because he was absorbed in watching television, did not show that the prison nurse was subjectively aware of the detainee's risk of suicide, so as to support a deliberate indifference claim against the prison nurse under the Fourteenth Amendment. (Navajo County Jail, Arizona)

U.S. Appeals Court
DELIBERATE
INDIFFERENCE RESTRAINTS USE OF FORCE

Thomas v. Bryant, 614 F.3d 1288 (11th Cir. 2010). Inmates incarcerated at the Florida State Prison (FSP) brought a § 1983 action against various officers and employees of the Florida Department of Corrections (DOC), alleging that the use of chemical agents on inmates with mental illness and other vulnerabilities violated the Eighth Amendment's prohibition on cruel and unusual punishment. The claims against individual correctional officers responsible for administering the agents were settled. After a five-day bench trial on the remaining claims against the DOC Secretary and the FSP warden for declaratory judgment and injunctive relief, the district court entered findings of fact and conclusions of law. The court ended final judgment and a final permanent injunction in the inmates' favor. The Secretary and warden appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that, notwithstanding his untimely death, the inmate who obtained declaratory and injunctive relief could still be the "prevailing party" entitled to attorney fees for the cost of district court litigation under the Civil Rights Attorney's Fees Awards Act (42 U.S.C.A. §§ 1983, 1988.) The court found that in reaching its conclusion the district court did not clearly err in finding that an inmate was sprayed with chemical agents at times when he had no capacity to comply with officers' orders because of his mental illness, or in finding that those sprayings caused the inmate lasting psychological injuries.

According to the court, the repeated non-spontaneous use of chemical agents on an inmate with a serious mental illness constituted an extreme deprivation sufficient to satisfy the objective prong of the test for an Eighth Amendment violation. The court noted that the inmate's well-documented history of mental illness and psychotic episodes rendered him unable to comply at the times he was sprayed, such that the policy was unnecessary and without penological justification in his specific case. The court found that the DOC's policy and practice of spraying inmates with chemical agents, as applied to an inmate who was fully secured in his seven-by-nine-foot steel cell, was not presenting a threat of immediate harm to himself or others, and was unable to understand and comply with officers' orders due to his mental illness, were extreme deprivations violating the broad and idealistic concepts of dignity, civilized standards, humanity and decency embodied in the Eighth Amendment.

The court held that the district court did not clearly err in finding that the record demonstrated that DOC officials acted with deliberate indifference to the severe risk of harm an inmate faced when officers repeatedly sprayed him with chemical agents for behaviors caused by his mental illness. The appeals court held that the district court did not abuse its discretion in concluding that injunctive relief was warranted and necessary, despite contentions that an inmate was currently incarcerated at a facility where he was not subject to DOC's chemical agents policy. The court noted that the permanent injunction against violations of the mentally ill inmate's Eighth Amendment rights from sprayings with chemical agents did not extend further than necessary to correct a constitutional violation and was not overly intrusive. According to the court, in addition to being closely tethered to the identified harm, the district court's permanent injunctive relief was narrowly drawn and plainly adhered to the requirements of Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA). (Florida State Prison)

U.S. District Court
EVALUATION
SEX OFFENDER

U.S. v. Broncheau, 759 F.Supp.2d 694 (E.D.N.C. 2010). Former federal prisoners who had been certified as sexually dangerous persons moved to dismiss the government's petitions for their commitment. The district court granted the motion and the government moved to stay the order. The district court denied the motion. The court held that a motion to determine mental competency was the proper way for the government to seek commitment, and the public interest was served by having a federal inmate transition from incarceration with a period of supervised release. (Adam Walsh Child Protection and Safety Act of 2006, Federal Bureau of Prisons)

U.S. District Court
INVOLUNTARY
MEDICATION

U.S. v. Burhoe, 692 F.Supp.2d 137 (D.Me. 2010). The government moved for order permitting involuntary administration of medication to render a defendant competent to stand trial on charge of possession of firearms after having been previously committed to a mental institution. The district court held that the government established an important governmental interest in the prosecution of the defendant, granting the motion. The court noted that the defendant was charged with the offense of possession of firearms after having been previously committed to a mental institution, arising out of an incident in which he allegedly fired a rifle at a state trooper and ultimately was shot by the police, and there were also state charges pending against the defendant for aggravated attempted murder and reckless conduct with a firearm, arising out of the same incident that brought about the federal charge. (Maine)

U.S. District Court
COMMITMENT
EVALUATION
SEX OFFENDERS

U.S. v. Graham, 683 F.Supp.2d 129 (D.Mass. 2010). The federal government brought a civil action seeking to commit a federal prison inmate as a sexually dangerous person pursuant to the Adam Walsh Child Protection and Safety Act. At the conclusion of a bench trial, the parties proposed findings of fact and conclusions of law. The court held that the government failed to establish by clear and convincing evidence that the inmate suffered from nonconsensual sex paraphilia as would make him sexually dangerous to others. According to the court, despite a criminal history involving three sex offenses, there was no evidence that the inmate was aroused by, fantasized about, or fixated on non-consenting partners. The court noted that the inmate's criminal history included a number of non-sexual offenses, including assault, battery, and petit larceny, which further indicated the paraphilia diagnosis was inappropriate, and the testimony and report of the government's licensed psychologist supporting a paraphilia diagnosis not only conflicted with conclusions of the court-appointed psychiatrist and psychologist, but contained a number of factual inconsistencies and evinced a reluctance to credit contradictory evidence, which pointed to a bias in finding that inmate suffered from paraphilia that detracted from a government psychologist's credibility. (Adam Walsh Child Protection and Safety Act of 2006, Federal Bureau of Prisons)

U.S. District Court
SUICIDE

Wells v. Bureau County, 723 F.Supp.2d 1061 (C.D.Ill. 2010). The estate of a 17-year-old pretrial detainee who committed suicide while in custody at a county jail brought an action against the county, county sheriff, and corrections officers, alleging claims pursuant to § 1983, the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), and the Rehabilitation Act. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the fact that the pretrial detainee, who committed suicide while in custody at a county jail, did not need a mental health professional when he was booked at the jail after being arrested on charges of illegal consumption of alcohol by a minor and possession of drug paraphernalia, was not dispositive of whether the detainee presented a serious need when he was booked at the jail approximately two weeks later after being arrested on charges of contributing to the delinquency of a minor.

The court held that information received by booking officers after pretrial detainee's suicide, including information that the detainee had been kicked out of his father's house, that the detainee was living in a tent, that the detainee and his girlfriend had a suicide pact, and that the detainee had commented to other inmates that if he was going to prison he would "shoot himself," was irrelevant to establishing what was in the officers' minds at time they were alleged to have been deliberately indifferent to the risk that the detainee would commit suicide. According to the court, the corrections officers lacked actual knowledge of a significant likelihood that the detainee would imminently seek to take his own life, or even of facts that would promote the inference of a subjective awareness of such a substantial risk, and thus the officers did not act with deliberate indifference to that risk in violation of due process, despite any alleged negligence in assessing and observing the detainee prior to his suicide.

The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the county sheriff's policy that correctional officers not personally observe prisoners during the overnight shift was constitutionally inadequate. From 10 PM to 6:30 AM, detainees are locked in their cells. During the overnight period from 11 PM on June 8, 2007, to 5 AM on June 9, 2007, Officer Keefer did eleven cell checks on Cellblock 2. While standing in the guard walkway, officers are able to look into two of the four cells and observe detainees in those cells, but officers are unable to see the detainees in the other two cells in the cellblock. During her checks, Officer Keefer personally observed the detainees in two of the cells in Cellblock 2 because she could see them from the guard walkway, but did not observe Wells in his cell because she was unable to see into his cell from the guard walkway. At 6:45 AM, when another officer let the detainees in Cellblock 2 out of their cells for breakfast, he discovered Wells hanging in his cell. (Bureau County Jail, Illinois)

2011

U.S. District Court
EVALUATION
INTAKE SCREENING

Chess v. U.S., 836 F.Supp.2d 742 (N.D.Ill. 2011). An inmate who suffered personal injuries in an assault by a fellow inmate brought an action against the federal government under the Federal Tort Claims Act (FTCA), alleging it failed to properly screen the fellow inmate upon intake and also failed to monitor him. The inmate had suffered second-degree burns when the other inmate threw a cup of scalding water onto his face and then physically assaulted him by hitting him with the cup and punching him. The parties cross-moved for summary judgment. The district court denied the plaintiff's motion, and granted the defendants' motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the government failed to comply with certain directives aimed at monitoring federal prisoners suffering from mental illness, for the purposes of its attempt to avoid liability to the federal inmate who suffered personal injuries in an assault by a fellow inmate under the discretionary function exception to the Federal Tort Claims Act (FTCA) waiver of sovereign immunity. The court found that the inmate's claims relating to a corrections officer's alleged failure to monitor inmates during lockup were not barred by the Federal Tort Claims Act (FTCA) discretionary function exception. According to the court, while there was a genuine issue of material fact as to whether Bureau of Prisons (BOP) officials complied with requirements to review the inmate's central file upon intake and to review the assaulting inmate's mental health on a monthly basis, the assaulted inmate failed to raise the issue for trial as to whether the Bureau's failure to review the assailing inmate's central file proximately caused his injury.

The court found that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact, as to whether, after his second placement, BOP officials knew or reasonably should have known that the inmate should have been segregated from the administrative population. The court also found genuine issues of material fact as to whether a correctional officer's alleged failure to monitor the unit at the time of the attack constituted negligence and proximately caused the attacked inmate's injuries. (Federal Bureau of Prisons, Metropolitan Correctional Center Chicago, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
FAILURE TO PROVIDE CARE

Davis v. Correctional Medical Services, 760 F.Supp.2d 469 (D.Del. 2011). A state inmate filed a § 1983 action alleging that prison medical officials failed to provide mental health treatment, failed to follow policies and procedures to prevent officers and other inmates from harassing him, and failed to provide adequate medical treatment for his broken nose. The district court granted the officials' motions to dismiss and for summary judgment. The court held that the failure of the prison's mental health administrator to speak to the inmate or to investigate his complaint regarding his treatment and his living conditions did not violate any recognizable constitutional right, as required to sustain the inmate's § 1983 claim against the administrator. According to the court, prison medical officials were not deliberately indifferent to the inmate's fractured nose, in violation of the Eighth Amendment, where the officials took an x-ray two months after the incident, the inmate did not complain about his nasal condition for seven months, once he did, the condition was consistently monitored and evaluated on several occasions, and the inmate was approved for surgery, but he refused to undergo the procedure. (James T. Vaughn Correctional Center, Delaware)

U.S. District Court
SUICIDE
INTAKE SCREENING
PSYCHIATRIC CARE

Smith v. Atkins, 777 F.Supp.2d 955 (E.D.N.C. 2011). The mother of a schizophrenic inmate who committed suicide at a jail and the mother of the inmate's children brought a § 1983 action in state court against a county deputy sheriff, jail officials, a medical contractor, and a nurse employed by the contractor, alleging that the defendants violated the inmate's Eighth Amendment rights in failing to provide adequate medical care. The defendants removed the action to federal court and moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motions. The court held that the deputy sheriff who happened to be at the jail delivering a prisoner when the inmate, who had been diagnosed with schizophrenia, committed suicide, did not know that the inmate was at a substantial risk of committing suicide or intentionally disregarded such risk. The court found that the deputy was not liable under § 1983 where the deputy did not know the inmate or anything about him, or have any responsibilities associated with the inmate's custody. The court also found that jail officials were not deliberately indifferent towards the schizophrenic inmate who was awaiting transfer to a state prison, as would violate the inmate's Eighth Amendment rights, because there was no indication that the officials subjectively knew that the inmate was at a substantial risk of committing suicide and intentionally disregarded that risk. According to the court, simply because the jail inmate, who was diagnosed with schizophrenia, had previously been on a suicide watch at the jail did not put jail officials on notice that he was suicidal during his subsequent incarceration two years later. The court held that jail officials' mere failure to comply with a state standard and a jail policy requiring a four-time per hour check on any prisoner who had ever been on a suicide watch did not violate the Eighth Amendment rights of the inmate. The court found that the mother of the inmate failed to show a direct causal link between a specific deficiency in training and an alleged Eighth Amendment violation, as required to sustain the mother's § 1983 Eighth Amendment claim against jail officials based on their alleged failure to train jail employees. (Bertie-Martin Regional Jail, North Carolina)

2012

U.S. District Court
ADA- Americans with Disabilities Act
DELIBERATE
INDIFFERENCE
DUE PROCESS
EVALUATION
SEGREGATION

Anderson v. Colorado, 887 F.Supp.2d 1133 (D.Colo. 2012). A mentally ill inmate sued a state, its Department of Corrections (DOC), the DOC's director, and a warden, asserting claims for alleged violations of due process, the Eighth Amendment bar against cruel and unusual punishment, the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), and the Rehabilitation Act. Following a bench trial, the district court held that: (1) denying the inmate in administrative segregation any opportunity to be outdoors and to engage in some form of outdoor exercise for period of 12 years was a serious deprivation of a human need; (2) the defendants were deliberately indifferent to the inmate's mental and physical health; (3) the inmate failed to establish that he was denied a necessary and appropriate medication in violation of ADA and the Rehabilitation Act; (4) the defendants had to assign a department psychiatrist to reevaluate the inmate's current mental health treatment needs and take steps concluded to be appropriate in the psychiatrist's medical judgment; (5) the inmate failed to establish a violation of his rights under the Eighth Amendment, ADA, and the Rehabilitation Act due to the alleged denial of treatment provided by a multidisciplinary treatment team; (6) the inmate had a due process-protected liberty interest in progressing out of administrative segregation; and (7) the new stratified incentive system that was being implemented with respect to inmates in administrative segregation, if used fairly, was consistent with due process. (Colorado Department of Corrections, Colorado State Penitentiary)

U.S. District Court
ADA- Americans with Disabilities Act
DELIBERATE
INDIFFERENCE
MEDICATION

Anderson v. Colorado, Dept. of Corrections, 848 F.Supp.2d 1291 (D.Colo. 2012). An inmate brought an action against a state, the Department of Corrections (DOC), the DOC's director, and a warden asserting violations of the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments as well as violations of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) and Rehabilitation Act. The inmate moved for partial summary judgment and to reopen discovery, and the defendants moved for summary judgment. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the maximum security prison's denial of outdoor exercise to the inmate for the more than 11 years of his incarceration was sufficiently serious and whether prison officials acted intentionally or with deliberate indifference. The court also found genuine issues of material fact as to whether the inmate's lack of outdoor exercise during his 11 years of incarceration caused his muscles to grow weaker, on the grounds that the inmate could demonstrate a physical injury. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether prison officials arbitrarily administered a demerit program that would allow the inmate to progress to higher levels and ultimately out of administrative segregation and into the general population, depriving him of a liberty interest without the due process guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment.

The court held that summary judgment was also precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether a primary reason that the inmate had not progressed out of administrative segregation and into the general population was that he was denied a prescribed non-formulary medication, such that his mental illness was improperly and inadequately treated, and whether prison officials were deliberately indifferent to the inmate's serious mental health condition when he did not receive certain medications prescribed by physicians for the treatment of his mental illness. The court also held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the inmate received adequate treatment for his mental illness, with regard to his Rehabilitation Act and ADA claims against the state and prison officials. (Colorado State Penitentiary)

U.S. District Court
SEGREGATION
SUICIDE

Disability Law Center v. Massachusetts Dept. of Correction, 960 F.Supp.2d 271 (D.Mass. 2012). A nonprofit organization, which represented mentally ill prisoners, brought an action against a state's Department of Correction, alleging that the Department and its officials violated the federal constitutional rights of prisoners by subjecting them to disciplinary and other forms of segregation for prolonged periods of time. After extensive negotiations, the parties jointly moved for approval of a settlement agreement. The district court granted the motion, finding the agreement to be fair, reasonable, and adequate. The court noted that the agreement addressed the fundamental issue of prison suicides by providing a process for minimizing the possibility that inmates with serious mental illnesses would be confined in segregation, and for reviewing their mental health while in segregation. The court held that the agreement did not order any "prospective relief," or in fact any "relief" at all, thereby precluding the applicability of the requirement of the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA), that prospective relief not extend further than necessary to remedy violation of a federal right. (Massachusetts Department of Correction)

U.S. Appeals Court
DELIBERATE
INDIFFERENCE
SUICIDE
SUPERVISION

Estate of Miller, ex rel. Bertram v. Tobiasz, 680 F.3d 984 (7th Cir. 2012). The minor siblings of an inmate who committed suicide brought a § 1983 action against correctional facility staff members, alleging deliberate indifference to the inmate's serious medical condition involving a long history of suicide attempts, self-harm, and mental illness. The district court granted qualified immunity to the management-level defendants and others, but denied qualified immunity to an intake nurse, psychology associate, and prison guards. The defendants who were denied qualified immunity appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the inmate's siblings adequately alleged that the intake nurse and a psychology associate were subjectively aware that the inmate was a suicide risk, as required to state a claim alleging deliberate indifference to the inmate's serious medical condition. The court found that the inmate's siblings adequately alleged that prison guards were subjectively aware that the inmate was a suicide risk. According to the court, the siblings adequately alleged that the intake nurse and psychology associate failed to take reasonable steps to prevent the harm from the inmate's suicidal tendencies, and that prison guards failed to take reasonable steps to prevent the harm from the inmate's suicidal tendencies. The court held that the intake nurse, psychology associate, and prison guards were not entitled to qualified immunity.

The court noted that the guards allegedly knew or should have known of the inmate's mental illness and suicide attempts because he was adjudicated mentally ill, he had court-ordered medications he refused to take the night he died, and he had a well-documented history of suicidal behavior. The inmate was housed in a unit where inmates in need of greater supervision were placed. The guards allegedly failed to call for medical attention despite finding the inmate with no pulse and not breathing on the floor of his cell with a white cloth wrapped around his neck, and waited to assemble an entry team and then applied restraints to the inmate before removing the ligature from around his neck. (Columbia Correctional Institute, Wisconsin)

U.S. Appeals Court
SUICIDE
PRETRIAL DETENTION

Luckert v. Dodge County, 684 F.3d 808 (8th Cir. 2012). The personal representative of the estate of her deceased son, who committed suicide while detained in a county jail, filed a § 1983 action against the county and jail officials for allegedly violating due process by deliberate indifference to the detainee's medical needs. Following a jury trial, the district court entered judgment for the personal representative, awarding actual and punitive damages as well as attorney fees and costs. The jury awarded $750,000 in compensatory damages and $100,000 in punitive damages. The district court denied the defendants' motion for judgment as a matter of law and the defendants appealed. The appeals court reversed the denial of the defendants' motion and vacated the awards. The appeals court held that while the detainee had a constitutional right to protection from a known risk of suicide, the jail nurse and the jail director were protected by qualified immunity, and the county was not liable. According to the court, the county jail nurse's affirmative but unsuccessful measures to prevent the pretrial detainee's suicide did not constitute deliberate indifference to his risk of suicide, where the nurse assessed the detainee twice after learning from his mother that he had recently attempted suicide, the nurse arranged for the detainee to have two appointments with the jail's psychiatrist, including an appointment on the morning of the detainee's suicide, the nurse contacted the detainee's own psychiatrist to gather information about the detainee's condition, she reviewed the detainee's medical records, and she responded in writing to each of the detainee's requests for medical care.

The court held that the county jail director's actions and omissions in managing jail's suicide intervention practices did not rise to the level of deliberate indifference to the pretrial detainee's risk of suicide, even though the director delegated to the jail nurse significant responsibility for suicide intervention before formally training her on suicide policies and procedures, and the jail's actual suicide intervention practices did not comport with the jail's written policy. The court noted that the jail had a practice under the director's management of identifying detainees at risk of committing suicide, placing them on a suicide watch, and providing on-site medical attention, and the detainee remained on suicide watch and received medical attention including on the day of his suicide. The court held that the county lacked a custom, policy, or practice that violated the pretrial detainee's due process rights and caused his suicide, precluding recovery in the § 1983 action. The court found that, even though the county had flaws in its suicide intervention practices, the county did not have a continuing, widespread, and persistent pattern of constitutional misconduct regarding prevention of suicide in the county jail. (Dodge County Jail, Fremont, Nebraska)

U.S. Appeals Court
SUICIDE
DELIBERATE
INDIFFERENCE

McCullum v. Tepe, 693 F.3d 696 (6th Cir. 2012). A deceased inmate's mother sued a prison psychiatrist under § 1983, claiming that he was deliberately indifferent to the serious medical need of the inmate, who hung himself from his bed. The district court denied the psychiatrist's motion for summary judgment and he appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the psychiatrist could not invoke qualified immunity. According to the court, a physician employed by an independent non-profit organization, but working part-time for a county as a prison psychiatrist, could not invoke qualified immunity in a § 1983 suit arising out of his activities at the prison. The court found that there was no common-law tradition of immunity for a private doctor working for a public institution at the time that Congress enacted § 1983. (Butler County Prison, Community Behavioral Health, Ohio)

U.S. Appeals Court
SUICIDE
JUVENILE MENTAL HEALTH
DELIBERATE INDIFFERENCE TRANSFER

Miller v. Harbaugh, 698 F.3d 956 (7th Cir. 2012). The mother of a minor who hanged himself while incarcerated at a state youth detention facility, on her own behalf and as the minor's representative, brought a § 1983 action against state officials, alleging deliberate indifference to the minor's serious mental illness. The 16-year-old youth had a history of mental illness and was known to have attempted suicide at least three times. The district court granted summary judgment for the officials. The mother appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that, even assuming that state supervisory officials' decision to use metal bunk beds in rooms of a youth detention facility that were occupied by residents who were mentally disturbed but did not appear to be imminently suicidal, amounted to deliberate indifference to the residents' serious medical needs, the law was not then so clearly established as to defeat the officials' defense of qualified immunity to the due process claim. The court found that a psychologist at the state youth detention facility, who had authorized the minor's transfer after learning of minor's unsuccessful participation in the facility's drug abuse program, was not deliberately indifferent to the minor's serious medical needs, in violation of due process. According to the court, even if he knew that the minor, who had mental health issues, presented a suicide risk and that the transferee facility was using metal bunk beds like that which the minor thereafter used to hang himself. The court found that the psychologist's involvement with the minor was minimal, the decision to make the transfer was made after the psychologist met with the facility's entire treatment staff, and the psychologist did not know which room at the transferee facility the minor would be given or that the facility's other suicide prevention measures would prove to be inadequate. (Illinois Youth Center, IYC Kewanee, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
INVOLUNTARY MEDICATION
TRAINING
DELIBERATE
INDIFFERENCE
DUE PROCESS

Olaniyi v. District of Columbia, 876 F.Supp.2d 39 (D.D.C. 2012). A pretrial detainee brought an action against the District of Columbia and the United States, asserting claims under § 1983 and the Federal Tort Claims Act (FTCA), arising from his detention and a separate incident involving a traffic stop. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The court held that past alleged deficiencies in medical services at the District of Columbia jail that were unrelated to unconstitutional forced medication of inmates could not have put the District on notice of the need for training to avoid an alleged due process violation arising from the detainee's being forcibly injected with a psychoactive drug while residing in the jail's mental health unit, and thus could not sustain a finding of deliberate indifference necessary to hold the District liable under § 1983 for an alleged due process violation. The court also held that the detainee failed to establish a pattern of similar due process violations by untrained or inadequately trained jail employees that could have put the District on notice of a need for more training with respect to forced medication of inmates, thus precluding the detainee's § 1983 due process claim against the District based on a failure to train theory. (Mental Health Unit of the District of Columbia Jail)

U.S. Appeals Court
DUE PROCESS
FAILURE TO PROVIDE
CARE
INTAKE SCREENING

Paine v. Cason, 678 F.3d 500 (7th Cir. 2012). The guardian of the estate of an arrestee, who allegedly suffered from bipolar disorder, brought a § 1983 action against a municipality and police officers, alleging civil rights violations in connection with the arrest and subsequent release from custody without being provided access to mental health treatment. The arrestee was raped at knifepoint after her release and either jumped or was pushed from a window, causing permanent brain damage. The district court denied summary judgment in part for the defendants. The defendants sought relief through interlocutory appeal. The appeals court affirmed in part, denied in part, and remanded. The appeals held that: (1) the arrestee, as a person in custody, had clearly a established right for police to provide care for her serious medical condition; (2) whether the police should have understood that the arrestee had a serious medical condition, and thus should have provided care, was a factual issue that could not be decided on interlocutory appeal; (3) causation was a factual issue not suited to resolution on interlocutory appeal of denial of qualified immunity; (4) the arrestee did not have a clearly established constitutional right for her release to be delayed pending mental-health treatment; (5) the arrestee had a clearly established due process right for the police to not create danger, without justification, by arresting her in a safe place and releasing her in a hazardous one while unable to protect herself; (6) the arresting officer was entitled to qualified immunity; (7) the watch officer was not entitled to qualified immunity; and (8) a detention aide was not entitled to qualified immunity. According to the court, a police officer who was responsible for preparing the arrestee's individual-recognition bond and collecting possessions that were to be returned on her release, and who received a telephone call from the mother of the arrestee regarding the arrestee's bi-polar condition and did nothing in response and who did not even note the call in a log, was not entitled to qualified immunity to the civil rights claims that the police had created a danger, without justification. The court found that the detention aide who was responsible for evaluating inmates, observed the arrestee behaving in a mentally unstable way, such as smearing menstrual blood on her cell walls, and transferred another person out of the arrestee's cell because of her inappropriate behavior, and yet did nothing to alert other personnel at the stationhouse, was not entitled to qualified immunity to the civil rights claims that the police did not arrange for medical treatment of serious conditions while the arrestee's custody continued. (Eighth District Station, Second District Station, Chicago Police Department)

U.S. District Court
SUICIDE
MEDICATION
PRETRIAL DETENTION
SUPERVISION
DELIBERATE
INDIFFERENCE

Ponzini v. Monroe County, 897 F.Supp.2d 282 (M.D.Pa. 2012). Survivors of a pretrial detainee sued prison officials, medical care providers and a corrections officer under § 1983 and state tort law, claiming that they were deliberately indifferent to the serious medical needs of the detainee, who committed suicide. The detainee allegedly did not receive his medication during his confinement. The survivors noted that one of the medications, Paxil, has "a short half-life and leaves a user's system very quickly," and that its withdrawal symptoms include "worsening of underlying anxiety or depression, headache, tremor or 'shakes', gastrointestinal distress and fatigue-, all of which were allegedly present in detainee during his incarceration." The detainee had also been taking Trazadone. The survivors alleged that during the period in which the detainee was incarcerated at the facility, officers were aware that the detainee should have been monitored closely and placed on a suicide watch. The survivors asserted that, although the detainee was not on a suicide watch, the inmate housed in an adjacent cell was on such a watch. An officer was expected to pass the neighboring cell, and by virtue of its location, the detainee's cell, every fifteen minutes. The survivors alleged that the officer falsified documents demonstrating that he properly made his rounds every fifteen minutes, and that officer failure to properly maintain a suicide watch on the detainee's neighbor facilitated the detainee's own suicide. The detainee killed himself by swallowing shreds of his own t-shirt. The court held that the survivors stated a § 1983 claim under the Fourteenth Amendment against prison officials for deliberate indifference to the serious medical needs of the detainee, who committed suicide allegedly as a result of a lack of daily medication necessary to treat depression and other psychological issues. According to the court, the complaint raised the possibility that prison officials knew that the detainee suffered from a severe medical condition and did not attempt to provide appropriate, necessary care in a timely manner. The court held that the survivors also stated a § 1983 claim under the Fourteenth Amendment against the corporate medical provider for deliberate indifference. (PrimeCare Medical, Inc., and Monroe County Correctional Facility, Pennsylvania)

U.S. Appeals Court
DELIBERATE
INDIFFERENCE
DUE PROCESS
PRETRIAL DETENTION
SEGREGATION
SUICIDE

Rice ex rel. Rice v. Correctional Medical Services, 675 F.3d 650 (7th Cir. 2012). Following a pretrial detainee's death while incarcerated, his parents, representing his estate filed suit pursuant to § 1983, alleging among other things that jail officials and medical personnel had deprived the pretrial detainee of due process by exhibiting deliberate indifference to his declining mental and physical condition. The district court entered summary judgment against the estate. The estate filed a second suit reasserting the state wrongful death claims that the judge in the first suit had dismissed without prejudice after disposing of the federal claims. The district court dismissed that case on the basis of collateral estoppel, and the estate appealed both judgments. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The appeals court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether jail officials were deliberately indifferent to the pretrial detainee's conditions of confinement, and whether his conditions of confinement were sufficiently serious to support his Fourteenth Amendment due process claim. The court noted that whether the detainee himself created the unsanitary conditions was a fact relevant to the claim, but given detainee's mental condition, it did not foreclose the claim. The court found that the estate failed to show that the detainee's assignment to an administrative segregation unit of the jail for approximately seven months violated the detainee's due process rights, where the estate failed to identify feasible alternatives and to tender evidence supporting the contention that the detainee likely would have fared better in one of those alternative placements. The court held that jail officials did not employ excessive force, in violation of due process, to the pretrial detainee who had been fighting with his cellmate and failed to comply with a directive that he step out of his cell which he refused to leave for 18 hours, by spraying his face with pepper foam, and placing him in a restraint chair. The court held that jail officials did not have notice of a substantial risk that the mentally ill pretrial detainee might be assaulted by other inmates, as required to support the pretrial detainee's claim of deliberate indifference in violation of due process. The court noted that while jail personnel were aware that the detainee had a hygiene problem, they had no notice that he was at risk of assault because of that problem, particularly within the more secure confines of the administrative segregation unit. The court found that neither jail guards or supervisors were deliberately indifferent to the risk that the mentally ill pretrial detainee might engage in a behavior such as compulsive water drinking that would cause him to die within a matter of hours and did not consciously disregarded that risk, and therefore they were not liable for his death under § 1983. According to the court, while a factfinder might conclude that the guards exhibited a generalized recklessness with respect to the safety of the inmates housed in the administrative segregation unit by failing to conduct hourly checks of the unit, there was no evidence that the guards or supervisors were subjectively aware of the possibility that the detainee might injure himself to the point of death before anyone could intervene. (Elkhart County Jail, Indiana)

U.S. Appeals Court
SUICIDE
TRANSFER
DELIBERATE
INDIFFERENCE

Rosario v. Brawn, 670 F.3d 816 (7th Cir. 2012). The father of a detainee who committed suicide while in police custody brought a § 1983 action against police officers, alleging deliberate indifference to the detainee's risk of suicide in violation of the detainee's right to due process under Fourteenth Amendment. The district court granted summary judgment to the police officers, and the father appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the police officers did not intentionally disregard a substantial risk that the detainee would commit suicide, as required for liability on a due-process claim alleging deliberately indifferent treatment of the detainee. The detainee committed suicide while being transported to a mental health facility after exhibiting self-destructive behavior. The officers failed to discover the detainee's razor blade, which he used to commit suicide. According to the court, their overall actions toward the detainee showed protection and compassion by searching the detainee, arranging for assessment of his mental condition, ensuring his comfort during transportation, and personally administering first aid despite his resistance. (Washington County Sheriff, Wisconsin)

U.S. District Court
INVOLUNTARY
MEDICATION
PSYCHOTROPIC
DRUGS

Santos v. Bush, 874 F.Supp.2d 408 (D.N.J. 2012). A mentally ill inmate brought an action under § 1983 against a doctor and a warden at the prison where he was formerly housed, alleging that the defendants forcibly medicated him without due process. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The court held that the prison warden was not involved in any of the mental health evaluations the inmate received or the development of his treatment plans, nor did the warden have any direct involvement, or even actual knowledge, of the specific circumstances surrounding the involuntary administration of psychotropic medication to the inmate, as would subject her to liability under § 1983 on the inmate's due process claims. According to the court, the warden's letter to the inmate's grandmother related to issues of the inmate's unwillingness to take psychotropic medication voluntarily was insufficient to demonstrate personal involvement, or knowledge and acquiescence, by the warden in approving or otherwise deciding whether the inmate should have been involuntarily medicated, as would subject the warden to liability under § 1983. The court found that the involuntary medication administration (IMA) procedure utilized by the New Jersey Department of Corrections (DOC), and the prison's involuntary administration of psychotropic medication to the mentally ill inmate, complied with substantive due process. According to the court, the procedure was reasonably related to the state's legitimate interests in responding to the dangers posed by the mentally ill inmate, providing inmates with treatment in their medical interest, and ensuring the safety of prison staff, administrative personnel, and inmates. The court found that the prison's administration of psychotropic drugs to the mentally ill inmate under its involuntary medication administration (IMA) procedure did not violate the inmate's procedural due process rights, where: (1) the inmate was diagnosed with a serious mental illness, based on a series of well-documented delusions, paranoid beliefs, and behaviors exhibited by the inmate; (2) at least four psychiatrists evaluated the inmate at various points during his treatment; (3) four separate treatment review committees (TRC) were convened during the inmate's treatment; (4) the inmate received notice of each TRC hearing; and (5) the inmate's involuntary medication was periodically reviewed in accordance with the IMA procedure. (South Woods State Prison, New Jersey)

U.S. Appeals Court
ADA- Americans with Disabilities Act
EVALUATION
SUICIDE
SUPERVISION

Shelton v. Arkansas Dept. of Human Services, 677 F.3d 837 (8th Cir. 2012). The administratrix of the estate of a mental health patient brought an action against various public officials and health professionals, alleging shortcomings in the way the medical professionals responded after the patient hanged herself while a patient at the facility. The district court dismissed the action. The administratrix appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the state actors' discovery of an unconscious voluntary mental health patient hanged in her room did not trigger duties related to involuntary commitment nor did it give rise to a constitutional-level duty of care. According to the court, after the state actors discovered the patient, she was no different than any unconscious patient in an emergency room, operating room, or ambulance controlled by the state actors, and, in such circumstances, the state actors owed patients state-law duties of care based upon standards for simple or professional negligence. The court found that the physician's decision to remove the mental health patient from a suicide watch was a medical-treatment decision, and therefore a claim based on that decision could not be brought pursuant to either the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) or the Rehabilitation Act, absent any allegation that the removal from suicide watch was influenced by anything other than the physician's judgment. (Arkansas State Hospital)

U.S. District Court
EVALUATION

Soneeya v. Spencer, 851 F.Supp.2d 228 (D.Mass. 2012). A state prisoner, a male-to-female transsexual, brought an action against the Commissioner of the Massachusetts Department of Correction (DOC), alleging violations of her Eighth Amendment rights. Following a bench trial, the district court held that the prisoner's gender identity disorder (GID) was a serious medical need and the treatment received by the prisoner was not adequate. The court found that the Commissioner was deliberately indifferent to the prisoner's serious medical need and the DOC's pattern of obstruction and delay was likely to continue, as required for the prisoner to obtain injunctive relief on her Eighth Amendment claim, where the DOC's policy for treating GID imposed a blanket prohibition on cosmetic and sex reassignment surgery without exception. The court noted that the transsexual prisoner's gender identity disorder was a "serious medical need" within the meaning of the Eighth Amendment, the prisoner's GID was diagnosed by a physician as needing treatment, and she had a history of suicide attempts and self castration while in custody. The court found that the treatment received by the transsexual prisoner was not adequate, although the DOC provided the prisoner with psychotherapy and hormone treatment, it failed to perform an individual medical evaluation aimed solely at determining appropriate treatment for her GID as a result of its blanket prohibition on cosmetic and sex reassignment surgery. (MCI-Shirley, Massachusetts)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEX OFFENDERS
DUE PROCESS
RIGHT TO TREATMENT

Strutton v. Meade, 668 F.3d 549 (8th Cir. 2012). A civilly-committed sex offender brought a civil rights action challenging the adequacy of his treatment at the Missouri Sexual Offender Treatment Center. The district court entered judgment in favor of the defendants, and the plaintiff appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court found that the offender had standing to bring the due process challenge to the adequacy of Missouri's four-phase treatment program for such offenders, where he demonstrated that his alleged injury of not advancing in treatment was not due solely to his own recalcitrance and could have been due to the lack of adequate treatment resources. But according to the court, the treatment received by offender did not shock the conscience, in violation of substantive due process. The court noted that although budget shortfalls and staffing shortages resulted in treatment modifications that were below standards set in place by the center's directors, temporary modifications in the treatment regimen of eliminating psychoeducational classes and increasing the size of process groups was neither arbitrary nor egregious, and the center sought to maintain essential treatment services in light of the challenges it faced. The court found that the treatment center's use of the "restriction table" and the later use of a restriction area in treating the civilly-committed sex offender did not shock the conscience, and thus did not violate offender's Fourteenth Amendment due process rights. A resident assigned to the Restriction Table, which was located near a nurses' station, was not permitted to speak to another person unless that person was also seated at the table, and was only allowed to leave the table for meals, classes, process groups, and for an hour of exercise. Residents would remain at the table from early morning until late evening. Despite its name, residents assigned to the Restriction Table were not physically restrained and were allowed to stand, stretch, get a drink of water, or use the restroom as needed. Use of the table was discontinued and it was replaced with a "Restriction Area." According to the court, residents assigned to a restriction table or restriction area retained a comparatively free range of movement and activities, including the ability to get up and stretch, to leave to attend group sessions and meetings, to converse with other residents, to work on homework or legal issues, and to play cards. (Missouri Sexual Offender Treatment Center)

U.S. Appeals Court
INVOLUNTARY
MEDICATION
DUE PROCESS

U.S. v. Loughner, 672 F.3d 731 (9th Cir. 2012). In a prosecution for attempted assassination of a Congresswoman, murder of federal judge, murder and attempted murder of other federal employees, injuring and causing death to participants at a federally provided activity, and related weapons offenses, the district court denied the defendant's emergency motion to enjoin an involuntary medication decision, and he appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that: (1) procedures used to determine whether the defendant ought to be involuntarily medicated complied with due process; (2) the Bureau of Prisons (BOP) medical facility did not act arbitrarily in finding that the defendant was a danger to himself and that antipsychotic medication was in his best interest; and, (3) due process did not require the BOP to specify a medication regimen before it could involuntarily medicate the defendant. (U.S. Medical Center for Federal Prisoners in Springfield, Missouri)

U.S. Appeals Court
DUE PROCESS
EVALUATION SENTENCE

U.S. v. Thornberg, 676 F.3d 703 (8th Cir. 2012). Following his apprehension more than six years after escaping from federal prison camp, a defendant pled not guilty, by reason of insanity, to the charge of escape from custody. The district court granted the defendant's first motion for a psychiatric evaluation, denied his second motion for a psychiatric evaluation, and sentenced him to 30 months in prison upon his conviction by a jury for escape. The defendant appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court found that although a forensic psychologist from the federal Bureau of Prisons did not review the indigent defendant's full medical history, a psychiatric evaluation determining that the defendant did not suffer from a severe mental defect was not deficient, precluding his claim of deprivation of due process by a single evaluation performed by a psychologist rather than psychiatrist, and by denial of his request for a second evaluation to assess his competency to stand trial. The court noted that the psychologist reviewed defendant's medical records dating from the time of his escape and concluded that his feelings of persecution from his family that allegedly coerced him to escape from prison were not evidence that he had delusions, as those feelings disappeared immediately after he escaped, and that his attempts to evade detection after escape could be seen as evidence of his understanding of the wrongfulness of his conduct. (Federal Prison Camp, Duluth, Minnesota)

2013

U.S. District Court
DUE PROCESS
EQUAL PROTECTION RIGHT TO TREATMENT

Barnes v. Ross, 926 F.Supp.2d 499 (S.D.N.Y. 2013). A mentally ill inmate brought a § 1983 action against the Commissioner of the New York Department of Corrections and Community Supervision (DOCCS) and employees of the New York Office of Mental Health asserting Eighth Amendment and equal protection claims. The mentally ill African-American inmate alleged that he and other minorities were subject to discriminatory treatment because of their race, in that white inmates were sent to the hospital for proper treatment, while African-Americans and Latino inmates were placed in observation for long periods and then were sent back to their cells, where they would harm themselves or try to commit suicide. The defendants moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that: (1) requirements of class certification were not satisfied; (2) the inmate failed to plausibly allege an Eighth Amendment claim of deliberate indifference to his serious medical needs; (3) the inmate stated a claim of racial discrimination in violation of the Equal Protection Clause; (4) the inmate adequately alleged the personal involvement of an employee; but (5) the inmate did not adequately allege the personal involvement of the Commissioner. The court held that the employees were not entitled to qualified immunity because the right of a prisoner to be free from racial discrimination was clearly established, and the inmate adequately alleged that the employees intentionally discriminated against him on account of his race. (Sullivan Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
DELIBERATE
INDIFFERENCE
DUE PROCESS
EQUAL PROTECTION RIGHT TO TREATMENT SUICIDE
TRAINING

Belbachir v. County of McHenry, 726 F.3d 975 (7th Cir. 2013). The administrator of the estate of a female federal detainee who committed suicide in a county jail filed suit against the county, county jail officials, and employees of the medical provider that had a contract with the county to provide medical services at the jail, alleging violation of the detainee's due process rights and Illinois tort claims. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of all county defendants. The administrator appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The appeals court found that the jail inmate who was detained by federal immigration authorities pending her removal hearing was in the same position as a lawfully arrested pretrial detainee. The court noted that a pretrial detainee was entitled, pursuant to the due process clause, to at least as much protection during her detention as convicted criminals were entitled to under the Eighth Amendment-- namely protection from harm caused by a defendant's deliberate indifference to the inmate's safety or health. The court asserted that persons who have been involuntarily committed are entitled, under the due process clause, to more considerate treatment during detention than criminals whose conditions of confinement are designed to punish.

The court found that the alleged conduct of a clinical social worker at the county jail who interviewed the detainee, in noting that the detainee suffered from a major depressive disorder, hallucinations, acute anxiety, and feelings of hopelessness, but allegedly failing to report those findings to the jail guards or any other jail staff or to recommend that the detainee be placed on a suicide watch or receive mental health treatment, amounted to deliberate indifference to the detainee's risk of suicide, in violation of the detainee's due process rights. The court held that a nurse manager employed by the medical provider was not deliberately indifferent to the detainee's risk of suicide, as would violate the detainee's due process rights, where the nurse manager treated the detainee for panic attacks and anxiety, and recommended that she be given a cellmate and transferred to a medical treatment area at the jail, both of which were done, and there was no showing that the nurse manager knew that the detainee was suicidal. According to the court, the county sheriff's and county jail director's failure to provide annual training to jail staff on how to recognize the risk of suicide in detainees, and their failure to implement a suicide prevention policy, did not render the county liable under § 1983 for the detainee's suicide during her detention at the jail, absent a showing that such failures caused the detainee's suicide. (McHenry County Jail, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court JUVENILE RESTRAINTS
FAILURE TO PROVIDE CARE
DELIBERATE
INDIFFERENCE

Blackmon v. Sutton, 734 F.3d 1237 (10th Cir. 2013). A former juvenile pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against various members of a juvenile detention center's staff, alleging they violated the Fourteenth Amendment rights guaranteed to him as a pretrial detainee. The district court denied the defendants' motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity. The defendants appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, and reversed in part. The court held that the eleven-year-old pretrial detainee's right to be free from punishment altogether was clearly established at the time the staff allegedly used a chair bearing wrist, waist, chest, and ankle restraints to punish detainee, for the purposes of the juvenile detention center's staff's qualified immunity defense. According to the court, the senior correctional officer approved a decision by one of his subordinates, a fully grown man, to sit on the chest of the eleven-year-old without any penological purpose.

The court found that the detainee's Fourteenth Amendment due process rights were violated when employees allegedly failed to provide the eleven-year-old detainee with any meaningful mental health care despite his obvious need for it. The court noted that prison officials who assumed a "gate keeping" authority over the prisoner's access to medical professionals were deliberately indifferent to the detainee's medical needs when they denied or delayed access to medical care. But the court also held that the detainee's alleged right to be placed in a particular facility of his choice while awaiting trial was not clearly established at the time the director failed to transfer detainee to a nearby shelter, for purposes of the juvenile detention center director's qualified immunity defense.

The court stated: "Weeks before eleven-year-old, 4'11," 96-pound Brandon Blackmon arrived at the juvenile detention center in Sedgwick, Kansas, officials there made a new purchase: the Pro-Straint Restraining Chair, Violent Prisoner Chair Model RC-1200LX. The chair bore wrist, waist, chest, and ankle restraints. In the months that followed, the staff made liberal use of their new acquisition on the center's youngest and smallest charge. Sometimes in a legitimate effort to thwart his attempts at suicide and self-harm. But sometimes, it seems, only to punish him. And that's the nub of this lawsuit." (Juvenile Residential Facility, Sedgwick County, Kansas)

U.S. District Court
FAILURE TO PROVIDE CARE

Coleman v. Brown, 922 F.Supp.2d 1004 (E.D.Cal. 2013). State prison inmates brought Eighth Amendment challenges to the adequacy of mental health care and medical health care provided to mentally ill inmates and the general prison population, respectively. The inmates moved to convene a three-judge panel of the district court to enter a population reduction order that was necessary to provide effective relief. The motions were granted and the cases were assigned to same panel, which ordered the state to reduce the prison population to 137.5% of its design capacity. The state moved to vacate or modify the population reduction order. The district court denied the motion. The three-judge panel of the district court held that: (1) the state's contention that prison crowding was reduced and no longer a barrier to providing inmates with care required by the Eighth Amendment did not provide the basis for a motion to vacate the order on the ground that changed circumstances made it inequitable to continue applying the order; (2) the state failed to establish that prison crowding was no longer a barrier to providing inmates with care required by the Eighth Amendment; and (3) the state failed to establish it had achieved a durable remedy to prison crowding. (Calif. Dept. of Rehabilitation and Corrections)

U.S. District Court
DELAY IN CARE
DELIBERATE
INDIFFERENCE
FAILURE TO PROVIDE
CARE
SEGREGATION
SUICIDE

Coleman v. Brown, 938 F.Supp.2d 955 (E.D.Cal. 2013). California state prisoners with serious mental disorders brought a class action against various prison and state officials, alleging failure to provide mental care in violation of the Eighth Amendment. After a three-judge court found that overcrowding was the primary cause of ongoing constitutional violations, and was affirmed by the United States Supreme Court, officials moved to terminate all prospective relief and vacate the judgment. The district court denied the motion, holding that: (1) there remained an ongoing violation of the Eighth Amendment in inadequate assessment, treatment, or intervention regarding prisoner suicides; (2) prisoners placed in administrative segregation units continued to face a substantial risk of harm; (3) prisoners continued to face delays in access to care; (4) prisons continued to have shortages in treatment space and access to beds; and (5) officials were deliberately indifferent in implementing policies to remedy the Eighth Amendment violations. (California Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation)

U.S. District Court
DELAY IN CARE RIGHT TO TREATMENT

Coleman v. Brown, 960 F.Supp.2d 1057 (E.D.Cal. 2013). California prisoners with serious mental disorders brought a class action against a Governor, alleging that due to prison overcrowding, they received inadequate mental health care, in violation of the Eighth Amendment prohibition of cruel and unusual punishment. Separately, California prisoners with serious medical conditions brought a class action asserting constitutional claims similar to those in the other action. In the case concerning mental health care, the district court found Eighth Amendment violations and appointed a special master to oversee the development and implementation of a remedial plan. In the case concerning medical care, the State stipulated to a remedial injunction, and, after the State failed to comply with that injunction, the district court appointed a receiver to oversee remedial efforts. A three judge district court panel consolidated the two cases and the panel entered a remedial order requiring the State to reduce its prison population to 137.5 percent of design capacity within two years. The Governor appealed. The United States Supreme Court affirmed the population reduction order. The district court subsequently denied the defendants' motion to vacate or modify the population reduction order, and directed the defendants to comply with the population reduction order. The defendants' moved to stay the order directing compliance pending appeal to the United States Supreme Court. The district court denied the motion, finding that: (1) the State was not likely to succeed on the merits of the prisoners' lawsuit challenging prison conditions; (2) the State would not be irreparably injured absent a stay; (3) issuance of a stay would substantially injure the prisoners; and (4) the public interest favored denying the stay. (California)

U.S. Appeals Court
EVALUATION

De'lonta v. Johnson, 708 F.3d 520 (4th Cir. 2013). A pre-operative transsexual inmate filed a § 1983 action alleging that state prison officials' continued denial of consideration for sex reassignment surgery as treatment for her gender identity disorder (GID) constituted deliberate indifference to her serious medical need in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The district court dismissed the complaint, and the inmate appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The court held that the inmate's allegation was sufficient to state a plausible Eighth Amendment claim against the officials, even though the officials had provided the inmate with hormone treatment and mental health consultations, and had allowed her to live and dress as a woman, where the standard protocol for treatment of GID indicated that sex reassignment surgery might be necessary for individuals who continued to present with severe GID after one year of hormone therapy and dressing as woman. The court noted that the officials failed to evaluate the inmate concerning her suitability for surgery, despite her repeated complaints as to the persistence of her symptoms and the inefficacy of her existing treatment. (Powhatan Correctional Center, and Buckingham Correctional Center, Virginia Department of Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
SUICIDE
SPECIAL HOUSING

Earl v. Racine County Jail, 718 F.3d 689 (7th Cir. 2013). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against a county jail and various jail officers, asserting claims for denial of due process and deliberate indifference to his serious medical condition. The district court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment, and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the inmate's five days on suicide watch were neither long enough nor harsh enough to deprive him of a due-process-protected liberty interest, where: (1) the only changes to the inmate's meals were that trays upon which food was served were disposable foam rather than plastic; (2) eating utensils were quickly removed after each meal; (3) the inmate was not denied bedding but was given a mattress and a blanket; (4) the inmate was denied writing materials for only the first 48 hours; and (5) rather than being prohibited human contact, deputies were assigned to closely and personally monitor the inmate to ensure his safety. The court found that jail officers were not deliberately indifferent to the inmate's allergic reaction to suicide garments in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The court noted that after the inmate told an officer about his allergic reaction to a suicide gown, the officer called a nurse who immediately examined the inmate and gave him cream and medication, and the officers appropriately deferred to the nurse's medical decision that the inmate did not need different garments because there was no sign of rash or bumps on the inmate. (Racine County Jail, Wisconsin)

U.S. Appeals Court
DELIBERATE
INDIFFERENCE
DUE PROCESS
FAILURE TO PROVIDE CARE
SUPERVISION

Goodman v. Kimbrough, 718 F.3d 1325 (11th Cir. 2013). The wife of a pretrial detainee who suffered from dementia and who was severely beaten by his cellmate filed a § 1983 action against jail officials in their individual capacities for alleged violation of the Due Process Clause by deliberate indifference to a substantial risk of harm to the detainee. The wife also asserted a supervisory liability claim against the sheriff in his official capacity and a state law claim for loss of support and consortium. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants. The wife appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that there was no evidence that jail officials were subjectively aware of a risk of serious harm to which the pretrial detainee was exposed from his severe beating by a cellmate, and that the officials deliberately disregarded that risk, as required to support the detainee's § 1983 claim of deliberate indifference in violation of the Due Process Clause. According to the court, the officers' failure to conduct cell checks and head counts and their deactivation of emergency call buttons constituted negligence but did not justify constitutional liability under § 1983. According to the court, jail officials' policy violations by failing to enter every cell in conducting head counts and in deactivating emergency call buttons did not constitute a custom so settled and permanent as to have the force of law. (Clayton County Jail, Georgia)

U.S. District Court
ADA- Americans with Disabilities Act
DELIBERATE
INDIFFERENCE
MEDICATION

Hahn v. Walsh, 915 F.Supp.2d 925 (C.D.Ill. 2013). The estate of a diabetic pretrial detainee brought an action against a city, police officers, a county, the county sheriff, and a jail medical provider, alleging under § 1983 that the defendants were deliberately indifferent to the detainee's serious medical needs. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motions in part and denied in part. The court held that a city police officer at the scene of the arrest who had no involvement with the diabetic detainee could not be held liable under § 1983 for being deliberately indifferent to the serious medical needs of detainee, who died from diabetic ketoacidosis after she was taken to a county jail. The court also found that city police officers who transported the detainee to the county jail, rather than a hospital, were not deliberately indifferent to the serious medical needs of the detainee, where the officers were entitled to defer to the judgment of the paramedics on the scene. According to the court, there was no evidence that the county sheriff knew of a serious risk to the health of the diabetic pretrial detainee and consciously disregarded that risk, that any prior deaths at the jail involved medical care provided to an inmate, much less that medical care involved an inmate with diabetes, or that the sheriff's decisions about certification of the jail's medical contractor had any adverse effect on the detainee, as would subject the sheriff to liability under § 1983, in his individual capacity, for his alleged deliberate indifference to the detainee's serious medical needs. The court found that the county's actions in shutting off water to the mentally ill, diabetic pretrial detainee's cell when the inmate was stuffing clothing into the cell's toilet did not violate the detainee's Fourteenth Amendment rights. According to the court, the estate's claim against the county that the detainee, who died of diabetic ketoacidosis after allegedly refusing diabetic treatment and food while incarcerated, was not properly treated for her mental illness and diabetes was not actionable under the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) or the Rehabilitation Act. (Champaign County Jail, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
DELIBERATE
INDIFFERENCE
EVALUATION JUVENILE PSYCHIATRIC CARE
PSYCHOTROPIC
DRUGS
SPECIAL HOUSING

Harrelson v. Dupnik, 970 F.Supp.2d 953 (D.Ariz. 2013). The mother of 17-year-old inmate who died while housed at a county jail brought an action in state court against the county, the county sheriff, the healthcare provider which contracted with the county to provide medical and mental health care at the jail, and employees of the provider, individually and on behalf of the inmate's estate, alleging under § 1983 that the defendants were deliberately indifferent to the inmate's serious medical needs. The defendants removed the action to federal court and moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motions in part and denied in part. The district court held that: (1) the county defendants' duty to provide medical and mental health services to an inmate was non-delegable; (2) intervening acts of the medical defendants did not absolve the county defendants of liability for alleged negligence; (3) the mother failed to state a claim for wrongful death; (4) the county was not deliberately indifferent to the inmate's rights; (5) the provider was not subject to liability; but (6) a fact issue precluded summary judgment as to an Eighth Amendment medical claim against the employees.

According to the court, the duty of the county and the county sheriff to provide medical and mental health services to the 17-year-old county jail inmate, who suffered from bipolar disorder and depression, was non-delegable, and thus the county and sheriff were subject to vicarious liability, under Arizona law, for the alleged medical malpractice of the healthcare provider which contracted with the county to provide medical and mental health services at the jail. The court noted that there was no evidence that the legislature intended to permit the county or sheriff to delegate their duties and obligations they owed to the inmate. The court found that the intervening acts of the contract medical provider, in allegedly failing to properly diagnose and treat the inmate's medical and mental health needs, both before and after the inmate received an injection of a psychotropic medication, were not so extraordinary as to absolve the county and the county sheriff of liability for their failure to protect the inmate.

The court found that there was no evidence that the county jail's policy or custom of placing inmates in protective custody for their own protection amounted to deliberate indifference to the constitutional rights of the inmate, who died while on protective custody status. According to the court, there was no evidence that the county had actual notice of a pattern of risk of harm or injury as a result of the county jail officials' use of isolation, or an administrative segregation policy in the juvenile detention housing unit at the county jail, or that any omissions in the county's policies necessarily gave rise to the situation in which the inmate, died from a purported cardiac event. The court found that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the inmate's prescribing physician knew of the inmate's serious medical need for a full psychiatric assessment, and failed to timely provide that assessment, and as to whether jail medical personnel were aware that the inmate was suffering from a reaction to a psychotropic medication or unknown serious medical illness, and, if so, whether they were deliberately indifferent. (Pima County Adult Detention Complex, and Conmed Healthcare Management, Inc., Arizona)

U.S. Appeals Court
DELIBERATE
INDIFFERENCE
DUE PROCESS
SUICIDE
SUPERVISION

LeMire v. California Dept. of Corrections and Rehabilitation, 726 F.3d 1062 (9th Cir. 2013). The estate, parents, and daughter of a mentally ill inmate who died in custody brought a § 1983 action against the California Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation (CDCR), CDCR officials, and prison staff. The plaintiffs sought to recover damages for alleged violations of the Eighth Amendment, based on the inmate's right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment, and the Fourteenth Amendment, based on the family's substantive due process right of familial association. The district court granted summary judgment to the plaintiffs. The appeals court affirmed in part, vacated in part, and remanded. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether: (1) withdrawal of all floor staff from a prison building which housed mentally ill inmates, for up to three and a half hours, created an objectively substantial risk of harm to the unsupervised inmates in the building; (2) the captain who called staff meetings, and a warden, who purportedly authorized the meetings, were aware of risks posed by withdrawing all floor officers from the building for over three hours; (3) any risk of harm could have been prevented with adequate supervision; and (4) the actions of the warden and the captain shocked the conscience.

The court also found genuine issues of material fact existed as to whether (1) floor officers who were the first prison personnel to arrive in the cell of the mentally ill inmate who apparently committed suicide were deliberately indifferent to the inmate's serious medical needs when they failed to provide cardiopulmonary resuscitation (CPR), despite being trained to administer it; (2) the officers' failure to provide medical care caused the inmate's death; and (3) the officers' actions shocked the conscience, precluding summary judgment as to the § 1983 Eighth Amendment medical claim brought by the inmate's family against officers and family's substantive due process claim against the officers. (California State Prison at Solano)

U.S. District Court
FAILURE TO PROVIDE
CARE
USE OF FORCE

Moses v. Westchester County Dept. of Corrections, 951 F.Supp.2d 448 (S.D.N.Y. 2013). The estate of a deceased prisoner brought a § 1983 action against a county, its department of corrections (DOC), and a corrections officer, alleging state and federal claims after the prisoner was beaten by the officer. The defendants moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court found that the family exercised reasonable diligence in pursuing the action, as required to equitably toll the limitations period for the § 1983 action. The estate alleged that the corrections officer "kicked and stomped" on the prisoner's head, causing injuries that eventually led to his death. The officer was indicted in county court for assault and the Federal Bureau of Investigations opened an investigation into allegations that the officer had used excessive force against the prisoner. The officer was eventually convicted of reckless assault. The prisoner's death also prompted a federal investigation into conditions at the jail, and investigators found a number of instances of the use of excessive force by jail staff, a failure to provide an adequate review system, and a failure to provide adequate mental and medical health care. (Westchester Department of Corrections, New York)

U.S. District Court
ADA- Americans with Disabilities Act
DUE PROCESS
EQUAL PROTECTION

Poche v. Gautreaux, 973 F.Supp.2d 658 (M.D.La. 2013). A pretrial detainee brought an action against a district attorney and prison officials, among others, alleging various constitutional violations pursuant to § 1983, statutory violations under the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) and the Rehabilitation Act (RA), as well as state law claims, all related to her alleged unlawful detention for seven months. The district attorney and prison officials moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motions in part and denied in part. The court held that the detainee sufficiently alleged an official policy or custom, as required to establish local government liability for constitutional torts, by alleging that failures of the district attorney and the prison officials to implement policies designed to prevent the constitutional deprivations alleged, and to adequately train their employees in such tasks as processing paperwork related to detention, created such obvious dangers of constitutional violations that the district attorney and the prison officials could all be reasonably said to have acted with conscious indifference. The court found that the pretrial detainee stated a procedural due process claim against the district attorney and the prison officials under § 1983 related to her alleged unlawful detention for seven months, by alleging that it was official policy and custom of the officials to skirt constitutional requirements related to procedures for: (1) establishing probable cause to detain; (2) arraignment; (3) bail; and (4) appointment of counsel, and that the officials' policy and custom resulted in a deprivation of her liberty without due process. The court held that the detainee stated an equal protection claim against the prison officials under § 1983, by alleging that the officials acted with a discriminatory animus toward her because she was mentally disabled, and that she was repeatedly and deliberately punished for, and discriminated against, on that basis. (East Baton Rouge Prison, Louisiana)

U.S. Appeals Court PSYCHIATRIC CARE	Quigley v. Tuong Vinh Thai, 707 F.3d 675 (6th Cir. 2013). The administrator of a deceased prisoner's estate brought a § 1983 action against a prison psychiatrist, alleging violations of the Eighth Amendment, as well as state claims for gross negligence. The district court denied the psychiatrist's motion for summary judgment and the psychiatrist appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to: (1) whether the psychiatrist violated prisoner's Eighth Amendment right; (2) whether the psychiatrist violated the prisoner's clearly established right; (3) whether the psychiatrist's treatment of the prisoner's depression was so reckless as to demonstrate a substantial lack of concern for whether an injury resulted; and (4) whether the psychiatrist's treatment of prisoner's depression was the proximate cause of prisoner's death. (Michigan Department of Corrections Guidance Center, and Correctional Medical Services, Inc.)
U.S. District Court DELIBERATE INDIFFERENCE SUICIDE FAILURE TO PROVIDE CARE	Randle v. Alexander, 960 F.Supp.2d 457 (S.D.N.Y. 2013). An African-American state inmate with a history of serious mental illness brought an action against officials of the New York State Department of Corrections and Community Supervision (DOCCS), correctional officers, and mental health personnel, alleging under § 1983 that the defendants were deliberately indifferent to his serious medical needs and that he was retaliated against, in violation of his First Amendment rights, among other claims. The defendants moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the correctional officers' alleged actions in forcing the inmate to fight a fellow inmate, and threatening to beat the inmate with a baton and engage in a joint cover-up if the two inmates did not "finish" their fight within a specified area of the prison, which ultimately resulted in the fellow inmate sustaining fatal injuries in the fight, had no legitimate penological purpose, and was far afield of the species of force employed to restore or maintain discipline. The court held that the alleged actions reflected indifference to inmate safety, if not malice toward the inmate, as supported by the inmate's § 1983 Eighth Amendment failure to protect claim. The court found that the inmate stated an Eighth Amendment inadequate medical care claim against mental health personnel. The inmate alleged that he had a history of serious mental illness, that his symptoms increased following a forced fight with a fellow inmate, that the inmate attempted suicide on three occasions, two of which required his hospitalization, that prison mental health personnel evidenced deliberate indifference to his medical needs, as they recklessly disregarded the risk the inmate faced as result of special housing unit (SHU) confinement, and that the inmate was confined to SHU despite a recommendation that he be placed in a less-restrictive location. (Green Haven Correctional Facility, Protective Custody Unit, New York State Department of Corrections)
U.S. District Court ADA-Americans with Disabilities Act PSYCHIATRIC CARE	Slevin v. Board of Com'rs for County of Dona Ana, 934 F.Supp.2d 1270 (D.N.M. 2013). A detainee brought an action against a county board of commissioners, detention center director, and medical director, alleging violations of his rights with regard to his medical care. The detainee alleged that, because of his mental illness, officials at the Detention Center kept him in administrative segregation for virtually the entire 22 months of his incarceration, without humane conditions of confinement or adequate medical care, and without periodic review of his confinement, causing his physical and mental deterioration, in violation of the Americans with Disabilities Act. The jury awarded the detainee $3 million in punitive damages against the Detention Center Director, and $3.5 million in punitive damages against the facility medical director. The jury fixed the amount of compensatory damages at $15.5 million, which included $500,000 for each month that detainee was incarcerated, plus an additional $1 million for each year since the detainee's release from custody. The defendants moved for a new trial or for reduction of the damages awards. The district court denied the motion, finding that the compensatory damages award was supported by substantial evidence and it would not be set aside on the ground that it was the product of passion or prejudices. The court also declined to set aside the punitive damages awards as excessive. (Doña Ana County Detention Center, New Mexico)
U.S. Appeals Court EQUAL PROTECTION RIGHT TO TREATMENT DUE PROCESS	Spavone v. New York State Dept. of Correctional Services, 719 F.3d 127 (2nd Cir. 2013). A state prisoner brought a suit against corrections officials under § 1983 and the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), alleging, among other things, that the defendants' denial of his request for a medical leave to obtain additional treatment for his post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD) violated his Fourteenth Amendment right to equal protection of the law and his Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment right to be free of cruel and unusual punishment. The prisoner had traveled to Nicaragua in the 1980s to join the Contra rebel forces and saw combat while fighting with them in that country's civil war. He also was working on the scaffolding of a building across the street from the World Trade Center on September 11, 2001, and was credited with risking his life to rescue several of his coworkers. He witnessed victims of the attack jump from the towers. The district court denied the defendants' motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity, and the defendants appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The appeals court held that the corrections officials were entitled to qualified immunity on prisoner's equal protection claim, and on the prisoner's Eighth Amendment claim. According to the court, even if the prisoner was in need of absolutely necessary medical care, neither official had reason to conclude that such care was not available to him in the prison, and thus there was a rational basis for distinguishing between leaves of absence for the treatment of mental illness as opposed to other sorts of illness for which leave was available. The court noted that there no evidence that either official thought that denying the prisoner's request for a leave of absence would cause him harm, much less harm so serious that it would be objectively unreasonable for them to believe that the policy of restricting leaves of absence for mental health treatment was consistent with prisoner's right to be free of cruel and unusual punishment. (New York State Department of Correctional Services)
U.S. Appeals Court INVOLUNTARY MEDICATION PSYCHOTROPIC DRUGS	U.S. v. Hardy, 724 F.3d 280 (2nd Cir. 2013). The district court granted the motion of the United States to authorize the Bureau of Prisons to medicate a mentally ill detainee without his consent, and the detainee appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that there was no basis for disturbing the district court's order authorizing involuntary medication of the pretrial detainee to reduce the danger he posed to Bureau of Prisons staff. The court noted that involuntary medication of the detainee to reduce the danger he posed to staff was warranted, where the detainee suffered from schizophrenia, the consensus of the testifying psychiatrists and psychologists was that antipsychotic medication was the treatment of choice for someone with the detainee's condition. The court noted that the detainee's past conduct, which included threats of harm, attempts to bite or hit officers, repeated throwing of liquids in their faces, and attempted and actual stabbings, indicated that he posed a danger to others. (United States Bureau of Prisons, Metropolitan Corrections Center, New York City, Metropolitan Detention Center, Brooklyn, New York)

2014

- U.S. Appeals Court
SUICIDE
FAILURE TO PROVIDE CARE
DELIBERATE
INDIFFERENCE
- Cano v. Taylor*, 739 F.3d 1214 (9th Cir. 2014). A former prisoner brought a § 1983 action against prison officials, alleging deliberate indifference to his mental health needs in violation of the Eighth Amendment, and violations of his right to freely exercise his religious beliefs and to have access to the courts, in violation of the First and Fourteenth Amendments. The district court granted summary judgment to the officials on the deliberate indifference claim and dismissed the remaining counts for failure to exhaust administrative remedies pursuant to the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA). The former prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, vacated in part, and remanded. The court held that the inmate's claims for injunctive and declaratory relief arising out of alleged constitutional violations that occurred while in prison were mooted by his release from prison. The court found that there was no evidence that prison mental health care providers were deliberately indifferent to the prisoner's medical needs, as required to support an Eighth Amendment deliberate indifference claim, where the prisoner was seen by mental health care employees regularly for his complaints, and evidence showed that the prisoner's suicide threats were manipulative in nature. (Arizona Department of Corrections)
- U.S. Appeals Court
FAILURE TO PROVIDE
CARE
- Carl v. Muskegon County*, 763 F.3d 592 (6th Cir. 2014). A pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against a psychiatrist, who served as an independent contractor to the provider of jail mental health services, claiming that the psychiatrist failed to provide necessary mental health services in violation of the detainee's Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment rights. The district court dismissed and the detainee appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded, finding that the psychiatrist was a state actor for the purposes of inmate's § 1983 claim. (Muskegon County Jail, Michigan)
- U.S. District Court
USE OF FORCE
SPECIAL HOUSING
RESTRAINTS SEGREGATION
SUICIDE
- Coleman v. Brown*, 28 F.Supp.3d 1068 (E.D.Cal. 2014). Nearly 20 years after mentally ill inmates prevailed on class action challenges to conditions of their confinement and a special master was appointed to implement a remedial plan, the inmates moved to enforce court orders and for affirmative relief related to the use of force, disciplinary measures, and housing and treatment in administrative segregation units (ASUs) and segregated housing units (SHUs). The district court granted the motions in part. The court held that prison officials' excessive use of force on seriously mentally ill inmates by means of pepper spray and expandable batons, pursuant to prison policies and without regard to the impact on inmates' psychiatric condition, was not yet remedied, as required by the prior judgment in favor of inmates. The court found that prison officials' changes in policies and practices of housing mentally ill inmates in administrative segregation units (ASUs) and segregated housing units (SHUs) were inadequate to remedy the systemic Eighth Amendment violations identified in the prior judgment in favor of inmates.
- According to the court, the placement of seriously mentally ill inmates in the harsh, restrictive, and non-therapeutic conditions of administrative segregation units (ASUs) for non-disciplinary reasons for more than the minimal period necessary to transfer the inmates to protective housing or a housing assignment violated the Eighth Amendment. The court noted that nearly half of the suicides in ASUs were by inmates placed there for non-disciplinary reasons, and such placement subjected inmates to significant restrictions including no contact visits, significant limits on access to both exercise yards and dayroom, eating all meals in their cells, being placed in handcuffs and restraints when moved outside their cells, and receiving mental health treatment in confined spaces described as "cages," with strip searches before and after treatment. (California Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation)
- U.S. District Court
ADA- Americans with Disabilities Act
- Cox v. Massachusetts Dept. of Correction*, 18 F.Supp.3d 38 (D.Mass. 2014). A mentally disabled state prisoner brought an action against a state department of correction (DOC) and various officials, alleging violations of the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments, Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), and Massachusetts Declaration of Rights. The defendants moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court found that the prisoner's grievance alleging he was improperly classified, resulting in a sexual assault, provided the DOC with sufficient notice to investigate, and therefore, the prisoner's claims under the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) were administratively exhausted. The prisoner alleged that the DOC did not keep him safe and that he was mentally challenged. According to the court, the prisoner's allegations that he was sexually assaulted by other inmates, that he suffered other abuses, that prison officials knew of the risk of harm to the prisoner, that his history of mental illness was well-documented, and that officials were responsible for policies, procedures, and training that led to his injury were sufficient to state a § 1983 claim against the officials for violations of the Eighth Amendment, and a claim under the Massachusetts Civil Rights Act, absent allegations of threats, intimidation, or coercion by officials. The court held that the prisoner's allegations that prison officials knew of his disability, that medical professionals encouraged staff to provide appropriate housing to prevent the prisoner from being targeted by other inmates, and that he was sexually assaulted after failure to provide appropriate housing were sufficient to state a failure to accommodate claim under the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA). (Massachusetts Department of Correction, Old Colony Correctional Center)
- U.S. District Court
SUICIDE
DELIBERATE
INDIFFERENCE
- Goodvine v. Ankarlo*, 9 F.Supp.3d 899 (W.D.Wis. 2014). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against Wisconsin Department of Corrections (WDOC) officials and psychologists, as well as an admissions officer at a mental health facility operated by the Wisconsin Department of Health Services (DHS), alleging that the defendants failed to prevent him from engaging in acts of self-harm, in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The court held that: (1) the psychologists were not deliberately indifferent to the inmate's need for protection against self-harm; (2) officers who interacted with the inmate during meal-tray pickup were not deliberately indifferent to his need for protection against self-harm; (3) a psychologist was not deliberately indifferent in failing to alert security staff after the inmate advised him that he was having “cutting urges;” and, (4) an admissions coordinator was not deliberately indifferent to the inmate’s need for adequate mental health care. The court also held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the sergeant who failed to contact the prison’s psychological services unit (PSU) after the inmate told the officer that he was “feeling unsafe” and needed to go to an observation area for additional monitoring “immediately” was aware that the inmate presented a serious risk of self-harm, but failed to take reasonable measures to protect him.

According to the court, summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether a correctional officer knew that the inmate who requested to be moved from disciplinary segregation to observation because he was suicidal was at a serious risk of self-harm, but failed to alert supervisory or psychological services unit (PSU) staff to conduct further evaluation before the inmate attempted suicide by cutting himself. Fact issues precluding summary judgment were also found by the court as to whether correctional officers who escorted mentally ill inmates to appointments with psychological services unit (PSU) and medical staff were deliberately indifferent to the mentally-ill inmate’s need for protection against self-harm when they failed to summon PSU staff or a supervisory official after the inmate, who had a history of cutting himself with sharp objects, expressed thoughts of self-harm. Summary judgment was also found to be precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether a captain’s decision to retain the mentally ill inmate at the prison, rather than transport him to a hospital after the inmate had changed his mind about refusing medical treatment, was reasonable under the circumstances. (Columbia Correctional Institution, Wisconsin)

U.S. District Court
FAILURE TO PROVIDE CARE

Graves v. Arpaio, 48 F.Supp.3d 1318 (D.Ariz. 2014). Pretrial detainees in the Maricopa County, Arizona, jail system brought a class action against the county and the county board of supervisors, seeking injunctive relief for alleged violations of their civil rights. The parties entered into consent decree which was superseded by amended judgments entered by stipulation of the parties. The defendants sought to terminate the remaining court-ordered injunctive relief regarding medical, dental, and mental health care for detainees. The district court denied the motion. The court held that: (1) termination of injunctive relief requiring the timely identification, assessment, and placement of detainees suffering from serious health conditions was not warranted; (2) termination of injunctive relief requiring the timely identification, assessment, and placement of detainees suffering from mental illness was not warranted; (3) termination of injunctive relief requiring the timely identification, segregation, and treatment of detainees with communicable diseases was not warranted; (4) termination of injunctive relief requiring that the detainees have ready access to care to meet their serious medical and mental health needs was not warranted; and (5) the detainees were the prevailing party for the purpose of awarding attorney’s fees. (Maricopa County Jail, Arizona)

U.S. District Court PRIVACY
SUICIDE
SUPERVISION
MEDICATION
SEGREGATION
SPECIAL HOUSING

Houston v. Cotter, 7 F.Supp.3d 283 (E.D.N.Y. 2014). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against corrections officers and a county, alleging a due process violation in connection with his placement on a suicide watch while incarcerated at a county correctional facility. The parties filed cross-motions for summary judgment. The district court denied the motions, finding that summary judgment was precluded by fact issues as to whether a protected liberty interest was implicated. The inmate alleged that the county had a policy or custom permitting classification officers to keep an inmate on suicide watch as a form of punishment, after mental health personnel had deemed a continued suicide watch unnecessary. The inmate remained on suicide watch for eight days after a psychiatrist and a social worker recommended his removal from the suicide watch. The court also found a genuine dispute of material fact as to whether the inmate’s conditions of confinement while he was placed on suicide watch imposed an atypical and significant hardship on him in relation to the ordinary incidents of prison life, such that it implicated a protected liberty interest. While on suicide watch, officials took away the inmate’s clothing and required him to wear a suicide-safe garment-- a sleeveless smock made of a coarse, tear-resistant material and Velcro. He was not allowed to wear underwear, socks, or any other undergarment with the smock. He was housed in a stripped cell in the Behavioral Modification Housing Unit. The cell contained a bare mattress and a blanket made out of the same coarse material as the smock. Corrections officers situated immediately in front of the Plexiglass cell window constantly supervised the inmate. According to the county, suicide watch inmates have access to the yard, a plastic spoon, a rubberized pen, the law library, showers, razors, and medical and mental health services, but the inmate claimed that he had no showers, telephone calls, prescription medications, food, or access to the law library while in the BMHU. (Suffolk County Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
SUICIDE
MEDICATION

Johnson v. Conner, 754 F.3d 918 (11th Cir. 2014). The mother and personal representative of a mentally ill inmate who committed suicide by hanging himself with bed sheet while in custody at a county jail filed suit against corrections personnel working at the jail at the time of the suicide, as well as various county entities. The mother alleged that jailers were responsible for administering her son’s medication daily, and failed to do so, that her son had previously attempted to commit suicide with a bed sheet while incarcerated, and that the jailers failed to take appropriate precautions with her son following that suicide attempt. The district court denied immunity to the jailers and the jailers appealed. The appeals court certified questions to the Alabama Supreme Court, which the Supreme Court declined to answer. The appeals court held that the statute extending immunity to county jailers did not apply retroactively to conduct which occurred prior to its enactment. (Barbour County Jail, Alabama)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEGREGATION
SUPERVISION

Keith v. DeKalb County, Georgia, 749 F.3d 1034 (11th Cir. 2014). The administrator of the estate of a pretrial detainee who was murdered by a fellow inmate in a jail’s mental health unit brought an action against a county, the county sheriff, and correctional officers, alleging under § 1983 that the defendants violated the detainee’s substantive due process rights. The district court denied the sheriff’s motion for summary judgment based on the doctrine of qualified immunity. The sheriff appealed. The appeals court reversed. The court held that while a correctional officer on duty at the time the detainee was murdered by a fellow inmate may have acted contrary to jail policy by using a cell phone within the jail, the administrator of the detainee’s estate failed to show that the use of personal cell phones within the jail was a widespread problem or that the county sheriff was aware that officers routinely violated the policy and failed to correct the problem. The court found that the sheriff was entitled to qualified immunity on the § 1983 due process claim that he was deliberately indifferent to the safety of the detainee, in failing to segregate mental health inmates with violent histories from those with nonviolent histories and by failing to separate mental health inmates charged with a violent crime from those charged with a nonviolent crime. According to the court, even if the sheriff violated the detainee's due process rights, it was not clearly established that he had a constitutional obligation to disregard the medical expertise of mental health contractors he hired to ensure that inmates' mental health was tended to. The court also found that the administrator of the estate of the detainee failed to show that the county sheriff was subjectively aware that the jail's policy of requiring detention officers to alert mental health staff when relocating mental health inmates to different cells within the same pod was disregarded on a widespread basis, as would have subjected the sheriff to supervisory liability under § 1983. (DeKalb County Jail, Georgia)

U.S. Appeals Court
PSYCHOTROPIC
MEDICATION

King v. Kramer, 763 F.3d 635 (7th Cir. 2014). The estate of a pretrial detainee who died while awaiting trial in a county jail brought a civil rights action against the county and the health care provider for the jail. Following reversal in part of the grant of summary judgment in favor of the county and the provider, the court entered judgment for the county and the provider on a jury verdict. The estate appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded, finding that: (1) the county was not liable for the death of the detainee who was found dead in his jail cell after jail medical staff rapidly tapered off his psychotropic medication, absent evidence that the county had an official custom or policy in place to deprive inmates of their prescribed medications; (2) the district court could not take judicial notice of a contract between the county and the provider; and (3) the indemnification agreement between the county and the provider was inadmissible to show liability. (La Crosse Jail, Wisconsin)

U.S. District Court
ADA- Americans with Disabilities Act

Meeks v. Schofield, 10 F.Supp.3d 774 (M.D.Tenn. 2014). A state prisoner, who allegedly suffered from paruresis, a mental anxiety disorder that made it difficult to urinate without complete privacy, brought an action against the Commissioner of the Tennessee Department of Correction, its Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) officer, a housing unit supervisor, a grievance board chairman, and a warden, asserting § 1983 claims for First Amendment retaliation and violation of his right to privacy, and alleging violations of the ADA and Title VII. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The court held that the prisoner failed to establish retaliation claims against the ADA officer, the housing unit supervisor, and the warden. The court found that the prisoner, who was assisting other inmates with their legal work, was not engaged in "protected conduct," as required to establish a First Amendment retaliation claim against the housing unit supervisor, where the prisoner was not authorized to help other inmates with legal work, and thus was in violation of department policy. According to the court, the state prison's decision to remove exterior bathroom doors and refusal to put at least one door back to accommodate the prisoner, who allegedly suffered from paruresis, a mental anxiety disorder that made it difficult to urinate without complete privacy, was not intentionally discriminatory and did not violate the ADA.

The court held that the transfer of the prisoner to a medical housing unit did not result in denial of access to prison programs and services available to the general population, so as to support an ADA claim of discrimination on the basis of a perceived disability. The court noted that the transfer was intended to accommodate the prisoner's complaints about bathroom doors being removed in the general housing unit, and the prisoner was allowed to continue his prison job, have access to the law library, and participate in the same activities he was allowed to participate in while he was housed with the general population. (Lois M. DeBerry Special Needs Facility, TN)

U.S. District Court
SUICIDE
SUPERVISION

Nagle v. Gusman, 61 F.Supp.3d 609 (E.D.La. 2014). Siblings of a mentally ill pretrial detainee who committed suicide brought an action against numerous employees of a parish sheriff's office, alleging a due process violation under § 1983, and asserting claims for wrongful death and negligence under state law. The siblings moved for partial summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The court held that: (1) a deputy had a duty to take reasonable measures to protect the detainee from self-inflicted harm; (2) the deputy breached his duty by failing to observe the detainee for long periods of time; (3) the deputy's abandonment of his post was the cause of the detainee's suicide; (4) the sheriff was vicariously liable; and (5) the deputy's repeated decision to abandon his post violated the detainee's due process right to adequate protection from his known suicidal impulses. According to the court, the detainee was suffering from psychosis and was suicidal while in custody, the detainee was placed on a suicide watch, suicide watch policies and training materials of the sheriff's office explicitly required officers to continuously monitor detainees on a suicide watch and to document that they had done so, and it was during one of the deputy's extended absences that the detainee succeeded in killing himself. The officer left his post at least three times during his suicide watch shift, to help another employee distribute meals to other inmates, to take a restroom break, and to visit the nurses' station. During these absences, the detainee went unobserved for an hour and a half, fifteen minutes, and two hours respectively. No other staff took the officer's place observing the detainee during the times when the officer abandoned his post. During the officer's final absence, an inmate notified an on-duty officer that the detainee was lying on the floor of his cell, unresponsive. It was later determined that the detainee had asphyxiated after his airway became blocked by a wad of toilet paper. (Orleans Parish Sheriff's Office, House of Detention at Orleans Parish Prison, Louisiana)

U.S. Appeals Court
PRIVATE PROVIDER
FAILURE TO PROVIDE
CARE

Parsons v. Ryan, 754 F.3d 657 (9th Cir. 2014). State prisoners, and the state's authorized protection and advocacy agency, filed a class action for declaratory and injunctive relief against senior officials from the Arizona Department of Corrections (ADC), asserting Eighth Amendment claims, based on allegedly serious systemic deficiencies in conditions of confinement in isolation cells, and in the provision of privatized medical, dental, and mental health care services. The district court granted class certification and prison officials appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court found that the prisoners were not merely aggregating many claims of individual mistreatment, and instead were alleging that ADC policies and practices of statewide and systemic application exposed all inmates in ADC custody to substantial risk of serious harm, to which the senior officials allegedly were deliberately indifferent, even if the risk might ultimately result in different future harm for different inmates. (Arizona Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court COMMITMENT DETENTION	Pierce v. Pemiscot Memorial Health Systems , 25 F.Supp.3d 1198 (E.D.Mo. 2014). A mental health detainee brought a § 1983 action against a medical director and a program director employed by the company that contracted to provide psychiatric services to a county hospital, alleging violations of her due process rights and Missouri law. The parties cross-moved for summary judgment. The district court denied the motion, granted the defendants' motion in part and denied in part. The court held that summary judgment on the issue of punitive damages was precluded by genuine issue of material fact as to whether the conduct of the medical director and the program director in continuing to detain the mental health detainee was motivated by an evil motive or involved reckless indifference to the detainee's rights. The detainee brought the action to challenge her detention in an inpatient psychiatric unit following the expiration of a 96-hour detention order. She alleged that her continued detention violated her due process rights under the United States and Missouri Constitutions, governing involuntary commitment procedures. (Pemiscot Memorial Hospital, Missouri)
U.S. Appeals Court SUICIDE DELIBERATE INDIFFERENCE PRETRIAL DETENTION	Pittman ex rel. Hamilton v. County of Madison, Ill. , 746 F.3d 766 (7 th Cir. 2014). By and through his guardian, a pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against a county and various jail officials, alleging the defendants were deliberately indifferent to his risk of suicide in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. The district court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment and denied the detainee's motion for a new trial. The detainee appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The appeals court held that a nurse and doctor were not deliberately indifferent, that there was no evidence that the sheriff or a captain knew of a substantial risk of harm for the detainee, and that the jail's suicide prevention policies and practices were not so inadequate that they violated the detainee's rights. But the appeals court also held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether a deputy and a sergeant were aware of the detainee's risk of suicide, where the detainee requested to see a crisis intervention person. According to the court, when an inmate presents an officer with a request to see a crisis intervention person and the officer also is aware that the reason for the request well may be a serious psychological condition that is beyond the officer's capacity to assess definitively, the officer has an obligation under the Eighth Amendment to refer that individual to the person who, under existing prison procedures, is charged with making that definitive assessment. (Madison County Jail, Illinois)
U.S. District Court FAILURE TO PROVIDE CARE DUE PROCESS	Revilla v. Glanz , 7 F.Supp.3d 1207 (N.D.Okla. 2014). Four pretrial detainees or representatives of their estates brought an action against a county sheriff, asserting claims under § 1983 and the Oklahoma Constitution, relating to allegedly deficient medical care. The sheriff filed a motion to dismiss. The district court denied the motion, finding that the plaintiffs stated a § 1983 claim against the sheriff for supervisory liability in his individual capacity, and a § 1983 claim against the sheriff for liability in his individual capacity. The court noted that the Due Process Clause of the Oklahoma Constitution protects pretrial detainees against the denial of medical attention. The plaintiffs alleged: (1) that the sheriff was responsible for ensuring that pretrial detainees received appropriate medical care; (2) that he was responsible for creating, adopting, approving, ratifying, and enforcing the policies that his subordinates allegedly violated; (3) that he failed to provide prompt and adequate care in the face of known and substantial risks to each detainee's health; and (4) that he had long known of systemic deficiencies in the jail's medical care. The plaintiffs cited numerous incidents and reports, as well as inmate deaths, which they alleged provided clear notice to the sheriff of seriously deficient medical and mental health care which placed inmates at a serious risk of injury or death. One such notice included a report by the United States Department of Homeland Security's Office of Civil Rights and Civil Liberties which "found a prevailing attitude among clinic staff [at the Jail] of indifference." (Tulsa County Jail, Oklahoma)
U.S. Appeals Court SPECIAL HOUSING SUICIDE SUPERVISION	Townsend v. Cooper , 759 F.3d 678 (7 th Cir. 2014). An inmate suffering from a significant mental illness brought a § 1983 action against prison officials, claiming that imposition of a behavior action plan in response to the inmate's disruptive behavior and threats of suicide violated his Fourteenth Amendment due process rights, deprived him of the minimal civilized measure of life's necessities and exhibited an indifference to his serious medical needs in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The district court granted summary judgment for the prison officials and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, vacated in part, and remanded. The court held that the behavior action plan resulted in an atypical and significant hardship compared to ordinary prison life, and thus, the inmate had a liberty interest in not being placed on the plan sufficient to support his Fourteenth Amendment due process challenge against the prison officials, where the plan involved removal of the inmate's personal property from his cell, provision of a bag lunch, provision of a paper gown, and limited access to toiletries. The court found that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether prison officials acted in disregard of a substantial risk of serious harm to the inmate, and a fact issue as to whether the behavior action plan was imposed for safety reasons or as a disciplinary measure. The court found that prison psychologists were not deliberately indifferent to the serious medical needs of the inmate when they placed the inmate on the behavior action plan, where the psychologists repeatedly visited the inmate, regularly adjusted the inmate's access to property that he could use to harm himself, and repeatedly placed the inmate on observation status to ensure his safety when he was suicidal. (Green Bay Correctional Institution, Wisconsin)
U.S. District Court EVALUATION MEDICATION	Trueblood v. Washington State Dept. of Social and Health Services , 73 F.Supp.3d 1311 (W.D.Wash. 2014). Pretrial detainees brought a class action against the Washington Department of Social and Health Services and two state hospitals, alleging that in-jail waiting times for court-ordered competency evaluations and restoration services violated their Fourteenth Amendment due process rights. The detainees moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion, finding that in-jail waiting times for court-ordered competency evaluations and restoration services violated the Fourteenth Amendment substantive due process rights of mentally incapacitated pretrial detainees. The court noted that detainees were incarcerated for many weeks, not because they were convicted, found to be dangerous, or posed a flight risk, but because Department of Social and Health Services and state hospitals did not have sufficient bed space or available staff to provide the services they were required to provide. Some detainees were held in solitary confinement due to space issues, exacerbating any mental illness, and the rate of medication compliance was lower in jail. (Washington State Department of Social and Health Services, Western State Hospital)

U.S. District Court MEDICATIONS PSYCHOTROPIC DRUGS FAILURE TO PROVIDE CARE	and Eastern State Hospital) Williams v. Board of Regents of University of New Mexico, 20 F.Supp.3d 1177 (D.N.M. 2014). A mental health detainee and his mother brought an action against a county, alleging medical negligence, negligence per se, intentional and negligent infliction of emotional distress, and loss of consortium, based on conduct while the detainee was being held at a county medical center and jail. The plaintiffs alleged that the detainee was not given his psychotropic medications while detained. The county moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion. According to the court, the New Mexico Tort Claims Act (NMTCA) did not waive the county's immunity for any of the detainee's claims. (Bernalillo County Metropolitan Detention Center, New Mexico)
U.S. District Court SUICIDE FAILURE TO PROVIDE CARE DELIBERATE INDIFFERENCE	Young v. Choinski, 15 F.Supp.3d 172 (D.Conn. 2014). A state prisoner brought an action against prison officials and personnel under § 1983, alleging deliberate indifference to his medical and mental health needs in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the prisoner failed to establish that his medical need was objectively serious, as required to support a claim against prison officials and personnel for deliberate indifference to a serious medical need in violation of Eighth Amendment. The court noted that, although the prisoner alleged he cut his arms with a metal object causing severe bleeding, none of wounds appeared to be bleeding on a video recording of the prisoner as he was escorted from his cell to a medical unit, the prisoner did not allege that the abrasions significantly interfered with his daily activities or caused him substantial or chronic pain, and he offered no evidence that the wounds required any further treatment beyond cleaning and antibiotic ointment. The court found that the prisoner suffered from a serious mental health need, as required to support claim against prison personnel for deliberate indifference to his serious mental health needs in violation of the Eighth Amendment, where the prisoner had been diagnosed with post-traumatic stress disorder, borderline personality disorder, and antisocial personality disorder, and the prisoner's health records reflected that he had made prior attempts and threats to commit suicide. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine dispute of material fact as to whether a corrections officer intentionally refused to take action to summon mental health or medical personnel to evaluate and treat the prisoner after he became aware of the prisoner's suicidal thoughts, and then the officer learned that the mental health unit had closed for the evening. (Northern Correctional Institution, Somers, Connecticut)
U.S. District Court SUICIDE FAILURE TO PROVIDE CARE DELIBERATE INDIFFERENCE	Young v. Choinski, 15 F.Supp.3d 194 (D.Conn. 2014). A prisoner, proceeding pro se, brought a § 1983 action against prison officials and personnel, alleging deliberate indifference to his serious medical and mental health needs, constituting cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the Eighth Amendment. After the district court granted the defendants' summary judgment motion in part and denied it in part, the defendants moved for reconsideration. The district court denied the motion. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine dispute of material fact as to whether a correctional officer was subjectively aware of the prisoner's serious mental health needs. The court found that the prisoner's complaint alleging deliberate indifference, failure to prevent and protect from self-harm, denial of medical care, and that a correctional officer failed to assist the prisoner with prompt medical attention was sufficient to state a claim against the officer for deliberate indifference to serious medical and mental health needs in violation of the Eighth Amendment. (Northern Correctional Institution, Somers, Connecticut) 2015
U.S. District Court SUICIDE MEDICATION	Hernandez v. County of Monterey, 110 F.Supp.3d 929 (N.D. Cal. 2015). The plaintiffs, current and recently released jail inmates seeking relief on behalf of a class, brought an action against the county, the sheriff's office, and the private company that administered jail health care facilities and services, alleging that substandard conditions constituted deliberate indifference in violation of the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments and failure to accommodate in violation of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA). The plaintiffs moved for a preliminary injunction. The district court granted the motion. The court held that the plaintiffs were likely to succeed on the merits in their action, alleging that county jail conditions constituted deliberate indifference in violation of Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments and failure to accommodate in violation of ADA. According to the court, there was significant evidence that the jail's policies and practices with regard to tuberculosis (TB) screening, suicide and self-harm prevention, alcohol and drug withdrawal, and continuing medical prescriptions, were noncompliant with contemporary standards and guidelines, placing inmates at risk and constituting deliberate indifference to their serious medical needs. The court noted that there was significant evidence that inmates with disabilities were excluded from access to exercise, religious services, and other meetings that were conducted in inaccessible locations, or from sign language interpreters, in violation of ADA. The court found that the plaintiffs were likely to suffer irreparable harm, absent preliminary injunctive relief, where the jail continued to fail to provide proper tuberculosis (TB) identification, isolation, diagnosis and treatment, to eliminate potential suicide hazards for unstable mentally ill patients, to continue community medications, and to properly treat inmates withdrawing from drugs and alcohol, and inmates with disabilities would continue to suffer access exclusion and lack of sign language interpreters. (Monterey County Jail, California)
U.S. Appeals Court SUICIDE	Jackson v. West, 787 F.3d 1345 (11th Cir. 2015). The estate of a detainee who committed suicide while in the custody of a county jail brought a § 1983 action against a county sheriff and against 10 corrections officers, alleging violation of the detainee's due process rights. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of three officers on qualified immunity grounds, but denied summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds with respect to the remaining officers. The remaining officers filed an appeal. The appeals court reversed, finding that the officers lacked a subjective knowledge of a strong risk that the detainee would attempt suicide, so that the officers did not act with deliberate indifference in failing to prevent the suicide. The court noted that the detainee had made explicit suicide threats and he was placed in the suicide prevention unit, as was proper protocol, and the detainee was released from that unit when prison medical staff later determined that he no longer presented such a risk. The court stated: "This case is troubling. The Marion County Jail tragically failed to keep Mr. James safe while he was incarcerated. Under our precedent, however, an officer is liable under § 1983 for the suicide of an inmate only if he had subjective knowledge of a serious risk that the inmate would commit suicide and he disregarded that known risk.” (Marion County Jail, Florida)

U.S. Appeals Court
DELIBERATE
INDIFFERENCE

Lee v. Willey, 789 F.3d 673 (6th Cir. 2015). A former prisoner brought a § 1983 claim against a part-time prison psychiatrist, alleging that he suffered sexual abuse by another prisoner as a result of the psychiatrist’s deliberate indifference to his health and safety in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The district court entered summary judgment in the psychiatrist’s favor. The former prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the district court’s ruling that the former prisoner did not submit a substitute prison grievance letter was not clearly erroneous, and the former prisoner failed to exhaust administrative remedies prior to bringing his § 1983 claim. (Charles Egeler Reception and Guidance Center, Michigan)

U.S. Appeals Court
SUICIDE
DELIBERATE
INDIFFERENCE

Letterman v. Does, 789 F.3d 856 (8th Cir. 2015). Parents of a deceased prisoner, who died from injuries suffered while in jail, brought a § 1983 action against a prison sergeant, lieutenant, and case manager, alleging that the employees were indifferent to the prisoner’s medical needs. The prisoner had been arrested for possession of marijuana and was given a 120 “shock sentence” in confinement. He became suicidal and was transferred to a padded cell at the request of mental health personnel. He was to have been personally observed every 15 minutes by staff and procedure required the prisoner to give a verbal response each time. After a shift change, the oncoming officer decided to monitor the prisoner via closed circuit television rather than making the required in-person rounds. During the shift, the prisoner injured himself in the cell and eventually died from his injuries. The district court denied the employees’ motion for summary judgment, based on assertions of qualified immunity. The employees appealed. The appeals court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether a prison sergeant, who was in charge of the unit where prisoner was kept, and a lieutenant, were deliberately indifferent to the risk of harm to the prisoner who died from injuries allegedly sustained in a padded cell. (Missouri Western Reception, Diagnostic and Correction Center)

U.S. Appeals Court
GID- Gender Identity Disorder
TRANSEXUAL

Reid v. Griffin, 808 F.3d 1191 (8th Cir. 2015). A prisoner, who was born male but identified as female, and who had performed a self-castration, brought a § 1983 action alleging that refusal by a prison, the prison medical director, the prison doctor, and the prison health psychiatrist to provide hormone-replacement therapy for Gender Identity Disorder (GID) was deliberate indifference to the prisoner’s serious medical needs in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the defendants were not deliberately indifferent to the prisoner’s serious medical needs. According to the court, in denying the prisoner estrogen-replacement therapy, the prison medical director, prison health psychiatrist, and prison doctor were not deliberately indifferent to prisoner’s medical needs in violation of Eighth Amendment, where numerous mental-health professionals evaluated the prisoner, but none had diagnosed Gender Identity Disorder (GID) or concluded that GID treatment was appropriate, and the prisoner had several other mental health issues for which the prisoner received treatment and monitoring. (Varner Super Max Unit, Arkansas Department of Correction)

U.S. District Court
INTAKE SCREENING

Sanders v. Glanz, 138 F.Supp.3d 1248 (N.D. Okla. 2015). A pretrial detainee's guardian filed a § 1983 action against a sheriff, the jail's private healthcare providers, and a booking nurse to recover for injuries that the detainee suffered from a severe assault by fellow prisoners. The defendants filed for dismissal. The district court granted the motions in part and denied in part. The court held that the detainee, who had been assaulted by other county jail inmates, stated a plausible municipal liability claim under § 1983 against the corporation that assisted in developing the sheriff's policies with respect to medical and mental health care of inmates, where the detainee alleged that the corporation shared responsibility with the sheriff to adequately train and supervise its employees, and that the corporation's policies, practices, and customs posed substantial risks to inmates' health and safety, but failed to take reasonable steps to alleviate those risks. The court found that the detainee's allegations were sufficient to state a plausible claim against the sheriff in his individual capacity by alleging that the sheriff was responsible for creating and enforcing regulations, policies, practices, and customs at the county jail, and that pursuant to those practices, policies, and customs, the jail maintained a longstanding, constitutionally deficient system of medical and mental health care. According to the court, the sheriff knew of substantial risks created by that system but failed to take reasonable steps to alleviate the risks, but instead took intentional and active steps to conceal the dangerous conditions at the jail, and the sheriff disregarded known and obvious risks of severe harm from lack of adequate mental health assessment and treatment, classification, supervision, or protection. (David L. Moss Criminal Justice Center, Tulsa County Sheriff, Oklahoma, Correctional Healthcare Management, Inc. and, Correctional Healthcare Management of Oklahoma, Inc.)

U.S. District Court
SUICIDE

Shepard v. Hansford County, 110 F.Supp.3d 696 (N.D. Tex. 2015). A husband brought an action against a county and a county jail employee under § 1983 alleging deliberate indifference to detainee health in violation of the right to provision of adequate medical treatment under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, following his wife’s suicide while in the county jail. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that: (1) the jail employee was entitled to qualified immunity; (2) summary judgment was precluded by a fact issue as to whether the jail employee violated the detainee’s rights, (3) the county had an adequate suicide risk prevention training policy, where employees were required to attend training to learn about suicide risk detection and prevention methods, and were required to read the county’s policy on conducting face-to-face suicide checks with detainees; (4) the county adequately trained employees on cell entry; but (5) a fact issue existed as to whether the county had an unwritten policy of understaffing the jail, precluding summary judgment. The court noted that it was not clearly established at the time of the suicide that an employee was required to abandon other duties to ensure that suicide watch checks were completed, and it was not clearly established that the employee was prohibited from providing a detainee with a towel in a cell with “tie-off points,” since the employee was not aware of any other suicides in that cell. According to the court, the jail cell entry policy prohibiting jail employees from entering a cell alone did not amount to training employees to be deliberately indifferent to the needs of detainees, and was not causally related to the detainee's death, and thus the county was not liable under § 1983 for deliberate indifference to detainee health. (Hansford County Jail, Texas)

U.S. District Court
MEDICATION

Shorter v. Baca, 101 F.Supp.3d 876 (C.D. Cal. 2015). A pretrial detainee brought an action against a county, sheriff, and deputies, alleging under § 1983 that the defendants denied her medical care, subjected her to unsanitary living conditions, deprived her of food, clean clothes, and access to exercise, and conducted overly invasive searches. The detainee had been classified as mentally ill and housed in a mental health unit at the detention facility. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to what policies governed classification of pretrial detainees who were mentally ill. The court found that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether jail conditions imposed on the detainee, including permitting the detainee, who was incarcerated for 32 days, to shower only three times, only permitting the detainee outside of her cell for recreation on one occasion, failing to clean her cell, failing to provide the detainee with clean clothing, and depriving the detainee of food, amounted to punishment. The court found that there was no evidence that county jail employees' alleged failure to adequately treat the detainee's blood condition caused her measurable harm, where there was no indication that the alleged denial of treatment caused the detainee any physical pain, or that any mental anguish the detainee suffered was related to denial of her medication. (Century Regional Detention Facility, Los Angeles County, California)

U.S. Supreme Court
SUICIDE

Taylor v. Barkes, 135 S.Ct. 2042 (2015). The widow of a deceased inmate brought a § 1983 action against the commissioner of a state department of correction (DOC), the warden of a state correctional institution, and others, alleging that they violated the Eighth Amendment in failing to prevent the inmate's suicide. The district court denied the commissioner's and warden's motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity. The commissioner and warden appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The U.S. Supreme Court reversed, finding that any right of an incarcerated person to proper implementation of adequate suicide prevention goals was not clearly established at the time of the inmate's death, and, thus, the commissioner and warden were qualifiedly immune from the widow's claim. (Howard R. Young Correctional Institution, Delaware)

U.S. District Court
EVALUATION
SEGREGATION

Trueblood v. Washington State Dept. of Social and Health, 101 F.Supp.3d 1010 (W.D. Wash. 2015). Members of a class of pretrial detainees suspected of being mentally incompetent, the next friends of such pretrial detainees, and a disability rights organization brought an action seeking a permanent injunction and a declaratory judgment establishing a time frame within which due process required that the Department of Social and Health Services provide a competency evaluation and restoration of services to such detainees. After a bench trial, the district court held that: (1) the disability rights organization had standing to bring the action; (2) the next friends of the pretrial detainees had standing to bring an action; and (3) due process balancing favored the interests of the pretrial detainees, and thus seven days was the maximum justifiable period of incarceration while awaiting a competency evaluation and restoration of services. A permanent injunction was ordered. The court noted that jails could not provide an environment or type of care required for such detainees, especially as they were often held in solitary confinement without access to medication, and that confinement in jails actively damaged detainees' mental condition and each additional day of incarceration caused further deterioration of the detainees' mental health, increased the risk of suicide and victimization by other inmates. (State of Washington, Department of Social and Health Services)

U.S. District Court
SUICIDE
FAILURE TO PROVIDE
CARE

White v. Washington County, Tenn., 85 F.Supp.3d 955 (E.D.Tenn. 2015). The mother of a county jail detainee who committed suicide in custody brought an action against the county, county sheriff, and the private contractor that provided health care services to county jail inmates, alleging federal constitutional claims and state-law negligence claims. The defendants moved to dismiss. The court held that claims against the private health care provider were "health care liability claims," under Tennessee law, for which the mother was required to file a certificate of good faith and a pre-suit notice of a potential claim, where the mother asserted that the provider failed to properly assess or provide adequate care for detainee's mental health issues. (Washington County Jail, Tennessee)

2016

U.S. Appeals Court
PSYCHIATRIC CARE

Saylor v. Nebraska, 812 F.3d 637 (8th Cir. 2016). A state inmate filed a § 1983 action alleging that prison officials retaliated against him by transferring and reclassifying him, that the transfer and classification review process violated his due process rights, and that officials were deliberately indifferent to his post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD). The district court denied the officials' motion for summary judgment, and they appealed. The appeals court reversed. The court held that the prison's medical officials were not deliberately indifferent to the inmate's post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD), in violation of Eighth Amendment, despite the inmate's contention that treatment that occurred after his treating psychiatrist left the prison rose to the level of cruel and unusual punishment. The court noted that officials attempted to provide the inmate with another psychiatrist at the facility, ultimately found him another psychiatrist at a different facility, continued medication as they saw fit within their independent medical judgment, and gave him his requested private cell. The court found that the officials' decision to transfer the inmate to another facility and to place him in administrative segregation was not in retaliation for his complaints about his medical care, in violation of the First Amendment, where the reason for the transfer was to provide the inmate with necessary psychiatric care after his treating psychiatrist's contract with the state ended and the inmate refused to meet with the facility's other psychiatrist. The court noted that the inmate was placed in administrative segregation because he refused to share a cell within any other prisoners, and there were no other private cells. (Nebraska Department of Correctional Services, Nebraska State Penitentiary, Tecumseh State Correctional Institution)

Szubielski v. Pierce, 152 F.Supp.3d 227 (D. Del. 2016). A state prisoner, acting pro se and in forma pauperis (IFP), brought a § 1983 action against prison officials, relating to his continuing classification for solitary confinement. At the screening stage of the case, the district court held that the prisoner stated a First Amendment retaliation claim against a prison warden and an Eighth Amendment claim regarding conditions of confinement. The prisoner complained of 24-hour cell confinement, limited recreation, extreme social isolation, environmental deprivation, limited telephone calls, and limited visits. The prisoner suffered from schizophrenia, severe manic depression, and an anxiety disorder. The court found that the prisoner's allegations that the prison warden retaliated against him after a civil rights advocacy organization filed a lawsuit challenging solitary confinement of prisoners, by keeping the prisoner in solitary confinement despite a classification committee's reclassification of the prisoner for medium-security housing, stated a First Amendment retaliation claim. According to the court, the prisoner's allegations that his continued solitary confinement, which had already lasted nine years, involved extreme social isolation, inadequate medical care, limited recreation, and environmental deprivation, stated a claim the under the Eighth Amendment regarding conditions of confinement. (James T. Vaughn Correctional Center, Delaware)

SECTION 31: PERSONNEL

Detention and Corrections Caselaw Catalog All Rights Reserved
CRS, Inc. 925 Johnson Drive, Gettysburg PA 17325 (717) 338-9100 www.correction.org/

The following pages present summaries of court decisions which address this topic area. These summaries provide readers with highlights of each case, but are not intended to be a substitute for the review of the full case. The cases do not represent all court decisions which address this topic area, but rather offer a sampling of relevant holdings.

The decisions summarized below were current as of the date indicated on the title page of this edition of the Catalog. Prior to publication, the citation for each case was verified, and the case was researched in Shepard's Citations to determine if it had been altered upon appeal (reversed or modified). The Catalog is updated annually. An annual supplement provides replacement pages for cases in the prior edition which have changed, and adds new cases. Readers are encouraged to consult the Topic Index to identify related topics of interest. The text in the section entitled "How to Use The Catalog" at the beginning of the Catalog provides an overview which may also be helpful to some readers.

The case summaries which follow are organized by year, with the earliest case presented first. Within each year, cases are organized alphabetically by the name of the plaintiff. The left margin offers a quick reference, highlighting the type of court involved and identifying appropriate subtopics addressed by each case.

1968

U.S. District Court
RACIAL DISCRIMINATION

Wilson v. Kelley, 294 F.Supp. 1005 (N.D. Ga. 1968), aff'd, 393 U.S. 266 (1968). Prisoners do not constitute a proper class for litigating racial discrimination in staffing. (Board of Corrections, Georgia)

1972

U.S. Supreme Court
TERMINATION
FREE SPEECH

Board of Regents v. Roth, 408 U.S. 564 (1972). Respondent brought this action claiming deprivation of his fourteenth amendment rights, alleging infringement of (1) his free speech right because the true reason for his nonretention was his criticism of the university administration, and (2) his procedural due process right because of the university's failure to advise him of the reason for its decision. Held: The fourteenth amendment does not require opportunity for a hearing prior to the nonrenewal of a nontenured state teacher's contract, unless he can show that the nonrenewal deprived him of an interest in "liberty" or that he had a "property" interest in continued employment, despite the lack of tenure or a formal contract. The lower courts therefore erred in granting summary judgment for the respondent on the procedural due process issue. 446 F.2d 806, reversed and remanded.

U.S. Supreme Court
TERMINATION
FREE SPEECH

Perry v. Sindermann, 408 U.S. 593 (1972). The respondent was employed in a state college system for 10 years, the last four as a junior college professor under a series of one-year written contracts. The Regents declined to renew his employment for the next year, without giving him an explanation or prior hearing. He then brought this action in the district court, alleging that the decision not to rehire him was based on his public criticism of the college administration and thus infringed on his free speech right, and that the Regents' failure to afford him a hearing violated his procedural due process right.

The district court granted summary judgment for the Regents, concluding that the professor's contract had terminated and the junior college had not adopted the tenure system. The court of appeals reversed on the grounds that, despite lack of tenure, nonrenewal of the contract would violate the fourteenth amendment if it was in fact based on his protected free speech, and that if he could show that he had an "expectancy" of re-employment, the failure to allow him an opportunity for a hearing would violate the procedural due process guarantee.

The United States Supreme Court agreed with the appeals court, holding:

1. Lack of a contractual or tenure right to re-employment, taken alone, did not defeat the employee's claim that the nonrenewal of his contract violated his free speech right under the first and fourteenth amendments. The district court therefore erred in foreclosing determination of the contested issue whether the decision not to renew was based on his exercise of his right of free speech. Pp. 596-598,

2. Though a subjective "expectancy" of tenure is not protected by procedural due process, the employee's allegation that the college had a de facto tenure policy, arising from rules and understandings officially promulgated and fostered, entitled him to an opportunity of proving the legitimacy of his claim to job tenure. Such proof would obligate the college to afford him a requested hearing where he could be informed of the grounds for his nonretention and challenge their sufficiency. Pp. 599-603.
430 F.2d 939, affirmed.

1974

U.S. District Court
SEARCH

Gettleman v. Werner, 377 F.Supp. 445 (W.D. Penn. 1974). Strip search of former corrections employee is proper when he had recently been seen passing contraband to an inmate. (State Correctional Institute, Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania)

1975

U.S. District Court
TRAINING
PAY PARITY

Alberti v. Sheriff of Harris Co., 406 F.Supp. 649 (S.D. Tex. 1975). The Court orders additional training for jail staff, orders county to budget for training and orders that jail staff receive parity with enforcement deputies in pay and hours. (Harris County Jail, Texas)

1977

U.S. District Court
TRAINING
STAFFING LEVELS
HIRING/
QUALIFICATIONS

Ahrens v. Thomas, 434 F.Supp. 873 (W.D. Mo. 1977), aff'd, 570 F.2d 288. The jail must be supervised by adequately trained officers on a twenty-four hour basis. There shall be sufficient officers on duty at all times to protect detainees against assault and to permit entry into living areas on a twenty-four hour basis. Any group and individual counseling programs which may be established shall be staffed by properly trained professionals. Correctional personnel shall be selected on the basis of merit. There should be a matron on call twenty-four hours daily if women are detained in the new facility. (Platte County Jail, Missouri)

U.S. Supreme Court
HIRING/
QUALIFICATIONS
EQUAL OPPORTUNITY PHYSICAL REQUIREMENTS

Dothard v. Rawlinson, 433 U.S. 321 (1977). After her application for employment as an Alabama prison guard was rejected because she failed to meet the minimum 120 pound weight requirement of a state statute (also establishing a five' two" minimum) Rawlinson, a college graduate who majored in correctional psychology, filed a charge with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, and ultimately brought a class action against correctional officials. Rawlinson challenged the requirements as violative of Title VII of the 1964 Civil Rights Act.

A three judge district court ruled in favor of Rawlinson on the basis of national statistics showing that the state's statute would effectively exclude over forty percent of the female population, but only one percent of the male population. The court found Rawlinson had made a prima facie case of unlawful sex discrimination, which the officials failed to rebut. The district court also rejected the officials' defense that the statute represented a bona-fide occupational qualification allowed under Title VII. Dothard appealed, and the Court affirmed in part and reversed in part.

HELD: "[T]he district court was not in error in holding that Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, as amended, prohibits application of the statutory height and weight requirements [excluding over forty percent of all women opposed to only one percent of all men] to Rawlinson and the class she represents." 433 U.S. at 322.

REASONING: a. "[T]o establish a prima facie case of discrimination, a plaintiff need only show that the facially neutral standards in question select applicants for hire in a significantly discriminatory pattern." 433 U.S. at 321. b. The state officials "produced no evidence correlating the height and weight requirements with the requisite amount of strength thought essential to good job performance. Indeed, they failed to offer any evidence of any kind in specific justification of the statutory standards." 433 U.S. at 331.

HELD: "In the particular factual circumstances of this case, however, we conclude that the district court erred in rejecting the state's contention that [the regulation establishing gender criteria for prison guard assignment]...falls within the narrow ambit of the 'bfoq' [bona-fide-occupational-qualification] exception." 433 U.S. at 334.

REASONING: a. "In a prison system where violence is the order of the day, where inmates' access to guards is facilitated by dormitory living arrangements, where every institution is understaffed, and where a substantial portion of the inmate population is composed of sex offenders mixed at random with other prisoners, there are very few visible deterrents to inmate assaults on women custodians." 433 U.S. at 336. b. "The likelihood that inmates would assault a woman because she was a woman would pose a real threat not only to the victim of the assault but also to the basic control of the penitentiary and protection of its inmates and the other security personnel. The employee's very womanhood would thus directly undermine her capacity to provide the security that is the essence of a correctional counselor's responsibility." 433 U.S. at 336.

CAUTION: As the court stated, it decided on the basis of the facts in this case. The court noted that Alabama's penitentiaries are evidently not typical and that expert testimony offered by experts for Rawlinson established that women guards could be used effectively and beneficially in a normal, relatively stable maximum-security prison. 433 U.S. at 236 N. 23. (Alabama Board of Correction)

U.S. District Court
TRAINING

Goldsby v. Carnes, 429 F.Supp. 370 (W.D. Mo. 1977). All jail staff is ordered to undergo forty hours of annual in-service training. Jail personnel shall be trained to recognize illness. (Jackson County Jail, Kansas City, Missouri)

U.S. District Court
PSYCHOLOGICAL SCREENING

Jones v. Wittenberg, 440 F.Supp. 60 (N.D. Oh. 1977). Staff training and psychological screening of staff are ordered. (Lucas County Jail, Ohio)

1978

U.S. District Court
TERMINATION

Brown v. Benton, 452 F.Supp. 28 (W.D. Okl. 1978). Termination of a guard based solely on results of background check is reasonable. (Oklahoma Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
ASSIGNMENT

Finney v. Mabry, 458 F.Supp. 720 (E.D. Ark. 1978). Court orders affirmative action program of recruitment, and orders the rotation of officers assigned to administrative segregation unit. (Arkansas Department of Corrections)

1979

U.S. District Court
PROMOTION
BFOQ
ASSIGNMENT
EQUAL OPPORTUNITY

Gunther v. Iowa State Men's Reformatory, 462 F.Supp. 952 (N.D. Iowa, 1979), aff'd, 612 F.2d 1079 (8th Cir. 1980) cert. denied, 100 S.Ct. 2942. Cynthia Gunther, a Correction Officer I (COI) at Iowa State Men's Reformatory, a medium security facility, brought an action charging the reformatory with violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act. Under Title VII, the plaintiff established a prima facie case of discrimination by showing that her request for promotion to Correction Officer II (COII) was denied on the basis of sex. A COII is a contact position within the prison.

Defendants had the burden of proof to show that a legitimate bona fide occupational qualification (BFOQ) exception existed under Title VII of the act. In granting the plaintiff's motion for a summary judgment, the court relied on three factors to find that no BFOQ existed: 1) the essence of the institution and its goals would not be undermined by not having men only, 2) there was no reasonable cause, that is no factual basis, to believe that all or substantially all women would be unable to perform safely and efficiently the duties of the job, and 3) the adjustments caused by hiring female COII's would not substantially impinge on the efficient and effective operation of the facility.

Specifically, the court found that administrative inconvenience in job assignments did not outweigh the federal right not to be discriminated against in employment. Thus, the prison may be required to arrange its schedule so that plaintiff has noncontact functions as a COII. (Iowa State Men's Reformatory)

U.S. Appeals Court
PAY PARITY

Ruffin v. County of Los Angeles, 607 F.2d 1276 (9th Cir. 1979), cert. denied, 445 U.S. 951 (1979). Female "deputy sheriffs" may be paid at higher rate than male "correctional officers." (Los Angeles County, California)

1980

U.S. Supreme Court
TERMINATION
DUE PROCESS

Owen v. City of Independence, Mo., 100 S.Ct. 1398 (1980), reh'g denied, 100 S.Ct. 2979. Following an investigation of alleged mismanagement of the police department's property room, and other irregularities in the department, the Independence, Mo. City Council moved that reports of the investigation be turned over to the news media and to the prosecutor for presentation to a grand jury. Additionally, the city manager was instructed to take appropriate action against persons involved. Accordingly, under powers granted him by the city's charter, the city manager dismissed Owen, the chief of police. Owen was given no reason for his dismissal, only written notice that his employment as chief of police was terminated.

Owen brought suit in the U.S. District Court for the Western District of Missouri under 42 U.S.C. Section 1983 against the city, the city manager, and the City Council in their official capacities. Alleging that his dismissal without notice of reasons and without a hearing violated his substantive and procedural due process rights, Owen sought declaratory and injunctive relief. The District Court entered judgment for the defendants. The Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed, holding that although the defendants had violated Owen's fourteenth amendment rights, all the defendants were entitled to qualified immunity from liability based on the good faith of the city officials. Owen petitioned the Supreme Court for a writ of certiorari, and the Court reversed the lower court decision.

HELD: "We hold...that the municipality may not assert the good faith of the officers or agents as a defense to liability under section 1983." 100 S.Ct. at 1409.

RATIONALE: A. The terms of Section 1983 create a species of tort liability that on its face admits of no immunities.... No mention is made of any privileges, immunities, or defenses that may be asserted. The act imposes liability upon every person and Monell held that these words were intended to encompass municipal corporations as well as natural persons. This expansive sweep of section 1983's language is confirmed by its legislative history. 100 S.Ct. at 1407-1408.

B. In discussing earlier decisions where the personal liability of various types of government officials was considered (such as the qualified immunity for prison officials and officers), Procunier v. Navarette, 434 U.S. 555 (1978), the Court stated: "Where the immunity claimed by the defendant was well established as common law at the time Section 1983 was enacted and where its rationale was compatible with the purposes of the Civil Rights Act, we have construed the statute to incorporate that immunity. But there is not tradition of immunity for municipal corporations, and neither history nor public policy support a construction of Section 1983 that would justify immunity accorded the city... 100 S.Ct. at 1409.

C. The principle of sovereign immunity from which a municipality's immunity for governmental functions is derived cannot serve as the basis for a good-faith immunity, as the city claims. Sovereign immunity insulates a municipality from unconsented suits altogether, the presence or absence of good faith is immaterial. Also the municipality's governmental immunity is abrogated by the enactment of a statute such as Section 1983 making it amenable to suit. 100 S.Ct. at 1413-1414. Also, the common-law immunity for discretionary governmental functions, which served only the purpose of preventing courts from substituting their own judgment on matters within the lawful discretion of a municipality, cannot serve as the basis for a Section 1983 good faith immunity, since a municipality has no discretion to violate the federal Constitution. 100 S.Ct. at 1415.

D. Strong public policy considerations are present. The purpose of Section 1983 is to provide protection to people wronged by abuse of governmental authority. In view of the qualified immunity enjoyed by most government officials, many victims of municipal wrongdoings would be left without a remedy if the municipality was allowed to assert good faith as a defense.

Concerns which may have justified qualified immunity for government officials [such as the injustice of subjecting an official to liability, particularly in the absence of bad faith, or the danger that such liability would deter the official's willingness to execute his office effectively] are less compelling when the liability of a municipality is at issue: "[K]nowledge that a municipality will be liable for all of its injurious conduct, whether committed in good faith or not, should create an incentive for officials who may harbor doubts about the lawfulness of the intended actions to err on the side of protecting citizens' constitutional rights." 100 S.Ct. at 1416.

In Summary the Court viewed its decision, together with prior decisions in the area, as properly allocating the costs of official misconduct: "...among the three principals in the scenario of the Section 1983 cause of action: the victim of the constitutional deprivation; the officer whose conduct caused the injury; and the public, as represented by the municipal entity.

The innocent individual who is harmed by an abuse of governmental authority is assured that he will be compensated for his injury. The offending official, so long as he conducts himself in good faith, may go about his business secure in the knowledge that a qualified immunity will protect him from personal liability for damages that are more appropriately chargeable to the populace as a whole. And the public will be forced to bear only the costs of injury inflicted by the 'execution of a government's policy or custom, whether made by its lawmakers or by those whose edicts or acts may fairly be said to represent official policy.'" (quoting Monell V. New York City Dept. of Social Service, 436 U.S. at 694). (City of Independence, Missouri)

1981

U.S. District Court
RETENTION PSYCHOLOGICAL SCREENING

Brandon v. Allen, 516 F.Supp. 1355 (1981). A Civil Rights Act suit was brought against a police officer and the Director of the Police Department seeking damages because of assault and battery committed on the plaintiffs by the officer. Default judgment was taken against the officer. The district court held that since the city police director should have known of officer's dangerous propensities the director was liable in his official capacity. For one to be held liable under Civil Rights Act of 1871 he must act under color of law and in doing so he must play an affirmative part in deprivation of the constitutional rights of another. Although the police officer was technically off duty at the time of the alleged assault and battery, he acted under "color of law" within the meaning of Civil Rights Act of 1871 because off-duty officers were authorized to be armed and were required to act if they observed commission of a crime.

Since the city police director should have known of officer's dangerous propensities the director was liable in his official capacity for violation of plaintiffs' civil rights when they were attacked by the officer, in that the director failed to take proper action to become informed of the officer's dangerous propensities. The officer's reputation for maladaptive behavior was widespread among fellow officers and although at least one officer personally informed police precinct supervisors of the fellow officer's morbid tendencies, no investigation and action were undertaken.

Police officers are vested by the law with great responsibility and must be held to high standards of official conduct. Officials of the police department must become informed of the presence in the department of officers who pose a threat of danger to the safety of the community. When knowledge of a particular officer's dangerous propensities is widespread among the ranks of police officers, the department officials ought to be held liable for the officer's infringement of another's civil rights. 42 U.S.C.A. Section 1983.

U.S. Appeals Court
PROMOTION
POLYGRAPH

Brown v. State of Tennessee, 693 F.2d 600 (6th Cir. 1982). Promotion may be denied for refusal to submit to a polygraph test. The Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals held that an employee's refusal to take a polygraph test in the course of his employment is a legitimate reason to discipline or terminate an employee as long as the law of the state permits polygraph testing and no disparate treatment results based on race, sex, national origin or religion. Brown was employed by the Tennessee State Department of Human Services and his duties included administering the food stamp program in Shelby County, Tennessee. When hired, Brown was routinely placed on a six month probation. His probation period was extended for three months due to a high error rate in his work. At the end of his nine months probation, Brown was demoted as a result of a poor performance evaluation.

During Brown's employment with the Department of Human Services, a burglary occurred in his office and a number of state records were stolen. Brown, along with several other agency employees, was asked to submit to a polygraph examination. Brown refused.

Some time later the Department of Human Services was consolidated with another agency and job positions were reorganized. As a result of the reorganization, a number of employees were promoted. Brown was not promoted, and he later learned that a female employee with his same job description had been promoted. Her job performance evaluations were similar or less satisfactory than his. Brown then filed suit alleging that sex discrimination was the reason that he was not promoted. The court found that Brown had been discriminated against on the basis of sex in that the female employee promoted was no more qualified than was Brown. The state appealed the decision of the lower court, and the decision was reversed.

Citing Texas Department of Community Affairs v. Burdine, 101 S.Ct. 1089 (1981), the Sixth Circuit found that the fact that a female employee had been promoted with similar qualifications was not sufficient to find for Brown. The court noted that the state set forth a valid reason for denying Brown's promotion. In Burdine, the U.S. Supreme Court stated that an employer can defend a case of discrimination by "articulating lawful reasons for his actions" through the use of admissible evidence. In the Brown case, this requirement was fulfilled when the state introduced evidence showing that although Brown could legitimately refuse to take the polygraph test, the state could discipline or terminate him for his refusal to do so. The discipline was denying Brown his promotion. In addition, the state had also shown that a female employee had been terminated for refusing to take the polygraph testing. Therefore, no disparate treatment could be shown. (Shelby County, Tennessee)

U.S. Appeals Court
EQUAL OPPORTUNITY ASSIGNMENT
BFOQ

Hardin v. Stynchcomb, 691 F.2d 1364 (11th Cir. 1982). Sheriff's department violates Title VII by failing to hire a female deputy. Denied employment as a deputy sheriff because it would have allegedly violated privacy of male jail inmates, a woman brought suit under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. The federal district court held that although there had been discrimination, it was justified, because there was a bona fide occupational qualification (bfoq), reasoning that allowing female deputies to work in the male section of the jail would have violated the privacy rights of the male inmates. On appeal the 11th Circuit Court of Appeals reversed, holding that such discrimination was illegal under Title VII.

Four men who applied for positions as deputies had scored lower than the female plaintiff on the examination. The plaintiff filed a charge of employment discrimination with the EEOC and later brought a class action suit against the Fulton County sheriff's department. (Fulton County Sheriff's Department, Georgia)

U.S. Appeals Court
HIRING/
QUALIFICATIONS
SUPERVISION

Hirst v. Gertzen, 676 F.2d 1252 (9th Cir. 1982). The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals sent back a Montana Civil rights case to the lower court based on allegations by the plaintiff concerning negligent hiring and failure to supervise a deputy sheriff. In 1975, Clayton Hirst, a Native American, was found dead in his jail cell in Cutbank, Montana, hanged by his belt. His family brought suit alleging that he had been electrocuted and then made to appear as though he had committed suicide or that he actually did commit suicide as a direct result of the negligence of the defendant city and county and their officials in negligently hiring and failing to supervise jail personnel.

The district court divided the trial into two parts. In the first portion, the jury determined that the victim's cause of death was suicide rather than electrocution. The second half dealt with the liability of the defendants, and the district court dismissed on all counts, finding no liability. The court of appeals remanded the case on two theories: (1) that the county and city and their officials had a duty under state law to exercise care in hiring and supervising correctional officers and (2) that the negligent hiring and failure to supervise resulted in a deprivation of constitutional rights under federal law. Under this theory, the court noted that the plaintiffs had alleged gross negligence, but even simple negligence (any failure to fulfill duties which should have reasonably been expected to be done) would be sufficient to find that the defendants were liable. (Glacier County Jail, Montana)

State Appeals Court
HIRING/
QUALIFICATIONS
TRAINING
SUPERVISION

Layton v. Quinn, 328 N.W.2d 95 (Ct. App. Mich. 1982). Judgment for county is reversed in light of failure to comply with court orders. The plaintiff, administratrix of the estate of the decedent inmate who committed suicide in the Wayne County Jail, alleged wrongful death and sought to recover damages. The inmate attempted suicide on the first day in jail, threatened to take his life three days later and was transferred to a disciplinary cell which was the farthest from the guard station. After two days in the cell he committed suicide. Prior to his incarceration, the Wayne County Circuit Court had issued orders to county officials concerning the admission, custody, care and treatment of inmates in the jail. The trial court granted accelerated judgment for the county defendants who claimed governmental immunity. This was reversed by the appeals court, citing the prior court orders which were so explicit that failing to comply must be deemed outside the protection of governmental immunity.

The original complaint alleged that the wrongful death was the result of negligence in the defendant's hiring, training and supervision of jail personnel. (Wayne County Jail, Michigan)

1983

State Appeals Court
WORKING CONDITIONS
STAFFING LEVELS
ASSIGNMENT

Delaware County Prison v. Com. Unemp. Comp. Bd., 455 A.2d 790 (Penn. App. 1983). Guard quits job because of hazardous working conditions; she is awarded unemployment benefits. The Unemployment Compensation Board ordered the Delaware County Prison to pay a former guard unemployment benefits on the basis that she had quit her job because of hazardous working conditions caused by inadequate staffing. The court agreed that the evidence supported the board's finding that voluntary termination was a result of necessitous and compelling reasons. The board determined that the guard had been left alone several times to oversee a large number of inmates, some not in cells. This duty normally required two or three correctional officers.

Although forced overtime seemed to have been prison policy, the plaintiff was required to work considerably more hours than her fellow workers. Because she attempted to perform her duties despite the conditions before she quit, and was willing to stay if the conditions had been corrected as promised, the guard was awarded benefits pursuant to Section 402(b) of the Unemployment Compensation Law. (Delaware County Prison, Pennsylvania)

State Appeals Court
TERMINATION

Department of Corrections v. Dixon, 436 So.2d 320 (Fla. App. 1983). Florida District Court of Appeal upholds dismissal of guard. The court determined that a guard who had been injured in a car accident was unable to perform his duties which included standing for long periods, climbing stairs and extensive walking. The guard had been reinstated with back pay by the Career Service Commissioner. The court found that the Department of Corrections had shown the inability of the guard to perform his duties after the off-duty car accident. (River Junction Correctional Institution, Florida)

U.S. District Court
PAY PARITY
EQUAL PAY ACT

Jurich v. Mahoning County, 31 Fair Emp. Prac. 1275 (BNA)(N.D. Oh. 1983). Matrons are to receive the same salary as jailers. In a suit filed against Mahoning County, Ohio, a matron alleged that her job as a matron-dispatcher was substantially equal to that of jailer and claimed that the county was in violation of Equal Pay Act, 29 U.S.C. section 206.

The federal court found that the job of jailer and matron-dispatcher were substantially equal, in that both required supervising, admitting, and searching prisoners. The court found that the lower number of female prisoners supervised by matron-dispatchers did not change the equality of the positions.

As the positions were found to be substantially equal under the requirements of the Equal Pay Act, and the county paid matron-dispatchers less than jailers, the court found discriminatory intent, in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. (Mahoning County, Ohio)

State Appeals Court MANDATORY RETIREMENT
BFOQ PHYSICAL REQUIREMENTS

Morgan v. Dept. of Offender Rehab., 305 S.E.2d 130 (Ga. App. 1983). Guards may be required to retire at age sixty-five. A correctional official challenged his involuntary retirement upon reaching the age of sixty-five. The appellate court affirmed such mandatory retirement for guards involved in frequent and direct contact with inmates since it was rationally related to state interests. An employer may discharge an employee on the basis of age when age is a "bona fide occupational qualification" (BFOQ) reasonably necessary to the normal operation of the particular business. Because physical stamina and ability generally declines with age, mandatory retirement at age sixty-five served to remove those whose fitness for supervision had presumptively diminished. (Georgia Department of Rehabilitation)

U.S. Appeals Court
AGE DISCRIMINATION
HIRING/
QUALIFICATIONS

Ramirez v. Puerto Rico Fire Service, 715 F.2d 694 (1st Cir. 1983). States are not immune from age discrimination suits. This action was filed by an applicant for a position with the Puerto Rico Fire Service, who had successfully passed all tests and had qualified for the position. The fire service refused to hire him because of his age. The Plaintiff filed the action under the Age Discrimination in Employment Act seeking back wages, injunctive relief and liquidated damages. The case was dismissed on the trial level on a motion by the defendants claiming that the eleventh amendment precludes suits against state governments. The First Circuit Court of Appeals reversed, holding that the eleventh amendment does not provide immunity from age discrimination suits and remanded the matter for further proceedings. (Puerto Rico Fire Service)

1984

U.S. Appeals Court
HIRING\
QUALIFICATIONS
PROMOTION ASSIGNMENT
EQUAL OPPORTUNITY
BFOQ

Garrett v. Okaloosa County, 734 F.2d 621 (11th Cir. 1984). Female officers win suit against Florida county; receive a total of $15,000. Four women sued Okaloosa County after they were denied consideration for vacant correctional officer positions.

The women were employed by the county as matron/dispatchers and had been trained and certified as correctional officers by the state of Florida. They were told that they would not be considered for any correctional officer vacancies at the jail because of a state regulation regarding female officers in male areas of the jail.

The women were eventually assigned as correctional officers two years later, after the state revised the regulation, but received less pay than their male counterparts.

The United States Court of Appeals found the county's argument defective because the regulation in question did not prohibit female correctional officers from supervising male inmates. The regulation required an officer of the opposite sex to be accompanied by an officer of the same sex.

Further, the court found that even if the regulation had prohibited the use of female officers, the mere fact that a state regulation might be discriminatory does not create a "bona fide occupational qualification" for a jurisdiction which follows the regulation. To prove a BFOQ exists the employer must show that sex is a qualification "reasonably necessary to the normal operation of that particular business or enterprise."

At trial, evidence showed that other Florida counties were using female officers long before the state changed the regulation. As a result of the court ruling, county officials were required to pay a total of $15,000 to the female officers. (Okaloosa County, Florida)

State Court
SUPERVISION

Kemp v. Waldron, 479 N.Y.S.2d 440 (Sup. Ct. 1984). State court finds that sheriff and subordinate could be liable for negligent supervision- prisoner sues as a result of assault by another prisoner. A New York court determined that the sheriff had a statutory duty to protect prisoners from harm while in his custody, and that he has discretion with regard to prisoner segregation.

The court referred determination of whether discretion was abused to a jury, along with a determination of the adequacy of supervision.

The county defendants were dismissed from the suit when the court found that they were not responsible for the sheriff's actions. However, the sheriff could be held liable along with the subordinate officer who failed to provide supervision. (Schenectady County Jail, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEARCH

Security and Law Enforcement Employees v. Carey, 737 F.2d 187 (2nd Cir. 1984). Warrantless strip search of guard not violation if there is a "reasonable suspicion." A Federal Appeals Court has ruled that a prison guard has a diminished expectation of privacy while on the job, but that random searches without cause are not permissible. (Wallkill Correctional Facility, New York)

1985

U.S. Appeals Court
HIRING\
QUALIFICATIONS
DISCRIMINATION

Aguilera v. Cook County Police and Corrections Merit Board, 760 F.2d 844 (7th Cir. 1985), cert. denied, 106 S.Ct. 237 (1985). Appeals court rules high school diploma is a reasonable requirement for corrections officers. The plaintiff, a Hispanic, claimed that the county violated his civil rights by denying him employment as a corrections officer because he did not have a high school diploma. The federal district court granted summary judgment for the county; on appeal, the Seventh Circuit agreed with the lower court finding.

Noting that the ruling did impact disproportionately against Hispanic people, the court was convinced that a diploma was an appropriate and necessary credential which was related to the demands of the job. The county argued, in part, that requisite ten week pre-service training for officers involved courses taught by college personnel. (Cook County Police and Corrections Merit Board)

U.S. District Court
PAY PARITY
EQUAL OPPORTUNITY

Brewster v. Pike, 608 F.Supp. 1163 (W.D. Vir. 1985). Female corrections officer entitled to equal pay; compensation board members liable. Joyce Brewster was an employee of the Wyeth County Sheriff's Department since 1968 and served as a full-time corrections officer since 1974. She filed suit against the state of Virginia because she was denied credit for two years service as a full-time deputy, even though the sheriff had certified that she had devoted more than fifty percent of her time to corrections duties (as required by Virginia statutes). The state compensation board refused to believe the certification in light of the low number of females which were housed. The federal district court found that, in fact, she committed a substantially higher proportion of time to corrections duties, ordered her to be paid as a deputy sheriff (retroactive) and to accrue seniority since 1975 (when the certification was made). Attorney fees in the amount of $18,800 were awarded. (Wyeth County Sheriff's Department, Virginia)

State Appeals Court
TERMINATION

Dept. of Corrections v. Helton, 477 So.2d 14 (Fla. App. 1 Dist. 1985). When the Florida Department of Corrections dismissed a nurse for neglecting her duties, the Career Service Commission reduced it to a suspension without pay for four months. A state appellate court let the commission's ruling stand, over objections from a dissenting judge. He said the nurse should have been terminated because the offenses she committed were serious, in view that they occurred in a prison setting. She left syringes on a desk, which could be found and used as weapons by inmates. Secondly, she neglected to examine an inmate's head wounds, and she worked under the influence of medication without seeking authorization to do so. He said it was a gross abuse of discretion in ordering her continued employment against the wishes of prison officials. (Department of Corrections, Florida)

State Appeals Court
DISCIPLINE
DUE PROCESS

DeVonish v. Scully, 496 N.Y.S.2d 485 (A.D. 2 Dept. 1985). A corrections officer was found guilty of harassing a female officer, refusing to show his I.D. card after ordered to do so by another corrections officer, and threatening that officer. The court found no violation in preventing the guard from attending the superintendent's proceeding during testimony of two inmate witnesses, since the restriction was necessary for security reasons, and the employee was allowed to listen to tape recordings of what the witnesses said. (New York)

U.S. District Court
DISCRIMINATION
BFOQ

Edwards v. Dept. of Corrections, 615 F.Supp. 804 (D. Ala. 1985). An employment discrimination action was brought by a man who was not appointed shift commander at a women's prison. Following a nonjury trial, the district court held that: (1) failure to promote the man to position of shift commander could not be justified on the ground that he would not have been promoted even in the absence of a discriminatory motive; (2) sex was not a bona fide occupational qualification for the position; and (3) the man was entitled to back pay and, if the position were open, reinstatement to the position of shift commander.

The employer, who admitted denying the man promotion to shift commander at the women's prison because of his sex but argued that he would still not have been promoted even if there were no discriminatory motive, bore the burden of establishing what it would have done absent a discriminatory motive.

The failure to promote the man, who had occupied the position of acting shift commander at the women's prison for nearly one year without any apparent difficulty, to the position of shift commander could not be justified on the ground that being female was a bona fide occupational qualification for that position. (Julia Tutwiler Prison for Women, Alabama)

U.S. Appeals Court
HARASSMENT

Hayes v. Vessey, 777 F.2d 1149 (6th Cir. 1985). Although a corrections officer was perhaps incompetent and held animosity toward a teacher because she was a woman, he was not liable for failing to protect her from being raped while he was on lunch break, ruled the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals.

The teacher claimed discrimination and denial of equal protection because the guard had not ticketed the rapist earlier in the day when discovered on the grounds without authorization. She claimed he set the tone for extremely lax security which caused her to be raped. He was not liable on such a theory because as a subordinate employee he had no authority to set a security policy, nor was he responsible for not ticketing the rapist earlier because such action was too remote from causation.

Another teacher allowed the rapist to regain entry during lunch by unlocking the gate in violation of school rules. Finally, even if the guard had been at his station during the fifteen minute attack, he would not have been able to hear the woman's cries for help. His station was located at the end of the hall, and her room was soundproof. The court reversed a jury's judgment against the officer for $200,000 in compensatory damages and $100,000 in punitive damages.

Also at issue was whether the teacher could collect from other prison officials for negligence in ignoring high levels of sexual tension, condoning an attitude of indifference toward danger to female employees, failing to require adequate security for female employees, assigning her to work in a remote area more dangerous than areas assigned to male teachers, and defeating automatic locking systems which led to the unauthorized entry of the rapist. The Court found no liability for the random act and ruled that the plaintiff's remedy in worker's compensation precluded suit. She received compensation disability benefits which contained special provisions for prison employees injured by inmates, provisions not applicable to other employees. (State Prison at Jackson, Michigan)

State Appeals Court
DISCRIMINATION

Ind. Dept. of Correction v. Ind. Civ. Rights, 486 N.E.2d 612 (Ind. App. 1 Dist. 1985). After remand, 464 N.E.2d 29, the Department of Corrections (DOC) appealed from judgment of the circuit court affirming a finding of Civil Rights Commission that the DOC unlawfully discriminated against a female applicant on the basis of her sex and ordered that DOC offer her the director of education position when the next vacancy occurred. The court of appeals held that: (1) the trial court's findings and conclusions were adequate; (2) the conclusion that the DOC intentionally discriminated against the applicant was supported by sufficient evidence; (3) the commission was entitled to conclude that DOC had failed to establish that sex was a bona fide occupational qualification based on security concerns and inmates' privacy rights; and (4) the Commission's remedial order did not exceed its authority.

The conclusion that the Department of Corrections intentionally discriminated against the female applicant for the positions of director and assistant director of education at the maximum security institution was supported by sufficient evidence, where the plaintiff presented substantial evidence that her qualifications were equal to or exceeded those of two successful male applicants, that the DOC had never hired a woman for a full-time position in the institution's education program and that the DOC was predisposed to discriminate against women seeking positions at the institution.

The Civil Rights Commission's finding that an employer had failed to establish the existence of a valid defense of a bona fide occupational qualification would be reversed only if the evidence was uncontradicted and led unerringly to a conclusion different from that reached by fact finder.

The Civil Rights Commission had authority to order the maximum security institution to consider proposed modifications in its physical plant as a remedy for sex-based employment discrimination. (Department of Corrections, Indiana)

U.S. Supreme Court
RETIREMENT
BFOQ

Johnson v. Mayor and City Council of Baltimore, 105 S.Ct. 2717 (1985). Mandatory retirement plan for fire fighters and law enforcement officers rejected by Supreme Court. City officials adopted a mandatory retirement requirement based on the federal fire fighter and law enforcement retirement statute (5 U.S.C. Section 835b), arguing that it represented a reasonable federal standard which could be applied to local employees. The city argued that the federal statute established a "bona fide occupational qualification" (BFOQ) and was thereby exempt from the federal Age Discrimination in Employment Act (29 U.S.C Section 621). The Supreme Court held that to establish a BFOQ exemption the employer must demonstrate that early retirement is necessary to the normal operation of business; permitting the city to rely on the federal statute would have the effect of extending the federal statute beyond its scope and negating the intent of Congress when it passed the ADEA. (City of Baltimore, Maryland)

U.S. Appeals Court
DISCRIMINATION
PROMOTION
ASSIGNMENT

Jones v. Hutto, 763 F.2d 979 (8th Cir. 1985). Court finds prison officials discriminated against black employees. Use of subjective criteria for determining who will be promoted resulted in discrimination against black employees, according to the Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals. Considering personality traits (listening and learning skills, maturity, trust, dependability), prison officials placed proportionally more white employees in higher level jobs. Although not all blacks were discriminated against, the defendants were held liable for the discrimination which did occur. (Arkansas Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
DISCRIMINATION

Jones v. Mississippi Dept. of Corrections, 615 F.Supp. 456 (D.C. Miss. 1985). Two black prison guards brought a civil rights action claiming racial discrimination in the employment promotion practices. The district court held that: (1) the first guard's allegations were insufficient to establish a prima facie case of disparate treatment; (2) evidence with respect to the second guard was sufficient to establish a prima facie case of disparate impact under Title VII; and (3) evidence was insufficient to establish that an oral examination process for promotion of prison guards was job related for purposes of rebutting a prima facie case.

In a disparate treatment case involving allegations of discrimination in promotion practices, Title VII plaintiff must show the following: that he belongs to a group protected by the statute; he was qualified for the position to which he sought promotion; he was not promoted; and after his nonpromotion, the employer continued to seek applicants not in the plaintiff's protected class or promoted those having comparable or lesser qualifications, not in the plaintiff's protected class.

The employer does not bear the burden of persuading the court that he was actually motivated by proffered reasons for allegedly discriminatory employment decision. Rather, the employer need only raise genuine issue of fact as to whether there was illegal discrimination involved in the plaintiff's discharge.

A black prison guard's allegations that he was denied promotion from sergeant to lieutenant, and that a white prison guard who was less qualified was promoted instead were insufficient to establish a prima facie case of disparate treatment, in light of the evidence that the plaintiff lacked the requisite one year and six-month experience as a sergeant necessary to qualify for promotion to lieutenant.

A black prison guard who brought unsuccessful action alleging discrimination in promotion employment practices was not required to pay defendants' attorneys' fees and expenses pursuant to 42 U.S.C.A. Section 1988, where the action was not frivolously brought. Besides providing evidence of business necessity of examination process, and thereby validating it, the employer may attack the plaintiff's case based on allegation of disparate impact in the employment practice by showing that statistical proof is unacceptable. (Department of Corrections, Mississippi)

State Appeals Court
TERMINATION

Kearney v. Coughlin, 488 N.Y.S.2d 300 (A.D. 3 Dept. 1985). Court upholds dismissal of superintendent for inability to deal with subordinates. During his probationary period, a deputy superintendent was found to be "abrasive and tactless" in his treatment of subordinates, although he performed his job well in other areas. He was dismissed because his position required leadership skills. The appeals court affirmed the dismissal. (Arthur Kill Correctional Facility, New York)

State Appeals Court
TERMINATION

Malone v. Dept. of Corr., La. Training Inst., 468 So.2d 839 (La.App. 1st Cir. 1985). A former correctional officer at an institution for girls appealed from an opinion of the State Civil Service Commission ordering his termination. The court of appeals held that: (1) the Civil Service Commission was not clearly wrong in ordering the officer's termination for failure to obey orders, and (2) termination, rather than suspension, was properly ordered. A correctional security officer's admission to the superintendent at the institution for girls and to the officer's superior that he tore up a statement he had written concerning an earlier unusual occurrence was sufficient to support the officer's termination, even though the superintendent neither saw nor heard the incident of tearing up the statement, as required by disciplinary rules. The correctional security officer was not being twice disciplined for the same offense when he was terminated for insubordination, even though he was earlier denied a merit increase for the same offense, in that denial of a merit increase is not considered a disciplinary action. (Louisiana Training Institute for Girls)

State Appeals Court
DISCIPLINE

Matter of Stowman, 491 A.2d 1275 (N.J. App. 1985). Officer not entitled to sworn testimony of witnesses. Charged with a violation of administrative regulations (safety and security), a corrections lieutenant was served with a notice of a minor disciplinary action. He was suspended for five days. The appeals court found that the short suspension did not reach constitutional dimensions, and that New Jersey law provides for a hearing by the Civil Service Commission only when a classified employee is suspended for more than five days. (Leesburg State Prison, New Jersey)

U.S. District Court
ASSIGNMENT
DISCRIMINATION
HARASSMENT

Snell v. Suffolk County, 611 F.Supp. 521 (D.C. N.Y. 1985), 782 F.2d 1094 (2nd Cir. 1986). Court finds that black and hispanic workers were subjected to racial harassment by co-workers. Sixteen correctional officers who were either Black or Hispanic sued the sheriff and the county for allegedly failing to stop verbal abuse and racial harassment from co-workers. A federal district court judge found the county liable for failure to correct a racially hostile work atmosphere. The district court jury found for each of three plaintiffs who had been publicly humiliated, awarding a total of $11,500. The district court judge concluded that the employees had been "subjected to vicious, frequent and reprehensible instances of racial harassment" that deprived them of their Title VII rights to a working environment which is free from racial harassment. The judge ordered the warden to appear before all correction officers and "declare that the county will not tolerate any correction officer's action discriminating against another correction officer because of his or her minority status." The judge also instructed the Warden to forbid the use of racial epithets, the posting or distribution of derogatory bulletins, mimicking officers in stereotypical fashion, and the use of racial, ethnic or religious slurs and humor. The district court ordered the warden to tell employees that such behavior would result in prompt and severe discipline. The Appeals Court affirmed. (Suffolk County Sheriff Department/Jail, Massachusetts)

1986

State Appeals Court
NEGOTIATION STRIKES

Capitol City Lodge v. Ingham County, 399 N.W.2d 463 (Mich. App. 1986). During a labor dispute with jail officers, a county moved to exclude jail security officers from required arbitration between the county and the police union. The Michigan Employment Relations Commission denied the motion, and the county appealed. The appeals court found no evidence that the strike would pose a threat to the community and also held that county jail security officers were not included in the same law that provided for compulsory, binding interest arbitration of labor disputes in public police and fire departments. (Ingham County Jail, Michigan)

State Appeals Court
DISABILITY

Comm. Dept. of Corrections v. Powell, 347 S.E.2d 532 (Va. App. 1986). The Commonwealth Department of Corrections in Virginia appealed the decision of the Industrial Commission that awarded a corrections officer a permanent disability rating of fifty percent over injuries to his arm which had been stabbed by an inmate. The department argued that the rating used by a physician should have considered the officer's ability to use his arm in any type of employment, not just his ability to use it under stressful or vigorous conditions.

The Court of Appeals of Virginia ruled that rating the arm under stressful conditions was the proper test, given that the guard could at any time be faced with the need to protect himself against assaulting inmates during a crisis. Also, a state statute did not mandate that the loss of an arm be measured in terms of an anatomical loss. The commission awarded the guard a permanent disability rating of fifty percent based on a doctor's findings that the guard had reached his maximum improvement stage and "was not going to get any better." The commission applied this evidence over the evidence of two doctors hired by the department whose findings were not as favorable to the guard. (Department of Corrections, Virginia)

State Court
ASSIGNMENT
SCHEDULE

Dept. of Corr. v. Corr. Officer, 514 A.2d 405 (1986). Correctional officer supervisors filed a number of grievances requesting overtime for the two and one-half hours per week which they had been working in excess of thirty-seven and one-half hours. The State Personnel Commission determined that the supervisors were entitled to such additional compensation from the date the grievances were filed to the date they executed a new contract plus thirty days of retrospective relief. The Superior Court, New Castle County, affirmed the basic decision but reversed the commission as to the thirty day retrospective relief, and the Department of Correction appealed. The Supreme Court held that once the union local was decertified, correctional officer supervisors were no longer "represented by an exclusive bargaining representative," and therefore merit system rules governed their work hours from the time of the local union's decertification until the supervisors elected a new union and executed a new contract. (Department of Corrections, Delaware)

U.S. Appeals Court
TERMINATION
DUE PROCESS
PROBATION

Dorr v. County of Butte, 795 F.2d 875 (9th Cir. 1986). A probationary regular employee of a county sheriff's department served at the will of the appointing authority. He had no reasonable expectation of continued employment. The power of the appointing authority to determine, on a purely subjective basis, whether a probationary employee had performed satisfactorily undercut any expectation of continued employment that might otherwise have risen. Thus, it was immaterial for due process purposes whether the employee's "probationary rejection" after his arrest was in reality a "disciplinary dismissal." (Butte County Sheriff's Department, California)

U.S. District Court
ASSIGNMENT
STAFFING LEVELS

Duran v. Anaya, 642 F.Supp. 510 (D.N.M. 1986). State prisoners sought a preliminary injunction to halt layoffs of staff and filling of staff vacancies. The District Court held that New Mexico prison inmates were entitled to a preliminary injunction prohibiting implementation of proposed staff reductions with respect to medical care, mental health care, and security where there was no evidence that staffing reductions of the magnitude contemplated would permit the maintenance of minimal constitutional standards in those areas. However, the court would not prohibit staff reductions other than those relating to medical care, mental health care and security where there was no evidence that any such proposed reductions would adversely affect the minimal constitutional rights of prisoners. A prisoner has a right to be reasonably protected from constant threats of violence and sexual assaults from other inmates, and failure to provide an adequate level of security staffing, which may significantly reduce the risk of such violence and assaults, constitutes deliberate indifference to legitimate safety needs of prisoners. The state has a constitutional obligation to make available to prisoners a level of medical care that is reasonably designed to meet routine and emergency health care needs of prisoners, including medical treatment for inmates' physical ills, dental care and psychological or psychiatric care. Gross deficiencies in staffing establishes deliberate indifference to prisoners' health needs. A lack of financing is not a defense to a failure to satisfy minimum constitutional standards in prisons. (Department of Corrections, New Mexico)

State Appeals Court
TERMINATION

Fields v. State Dept. of Corrections, 498 So.2d 174 (La. App. 1 Cir. 1986). A correctional officer who had been employed nearly ten years with the Louisiana State Penitentiary was terminated because he left his post without permission after twelve hours on duty to inquire as to why his replacement was late. He was scheduled to work from 4:45 a.m. to 4:45 p.m. When his relief guard didn't show up at 4:50 p.m., he left his post and went across to a connecting dormitory to use the telephone to call as to the whereabouts of his replacement. The court ruled that the single incidence of misconduct of the guard with permanent status was significant enough to warrant dismissal because it endangered the safety of the public and/or the inmates themselves. Even though testimony showed that it was common practice for guards to use the nearby telephone, it was not officially approved to leave a post without permission. (State Penitentiary, Louisiana)

U.S. Appeals Court
FREE SPEECH

Fiorillo v. U.S. Dept. of Justice, Bureau of Prisons, 795 F.2d 1544 (Fed. Cir. 1986). A correctional officer's statements to the press, suggesting that a female inmate and a female employee had been sexually attacked five years previously, did not qualify as a protected first amendment speech. Although portions of the officer's speech related to items about which the public was concerned in years past, the news was stale, and the officer's disclosures were made for personal reasons and not to inform the public of matters of general concern. Accordingly, prison authorities could consider these statements in deciding to demote the officer. The court concluded that the guard's statements to the press concerning a lawsuit which he had instituted because he was being denied promotion for having expressed criticism about prison conditions were made on behalf of the guard, and not "on behalf of the institution," so that he did not violate the rule prohibiting dissemination of material to the press on behalf of the institution. (Federal Correctional Institute at Terminal Island, California)

U.S. Appeals Court
DISCIPLINE

Fugate v. Phoenix Civil Service Board, 791 F.2d 736 (9th Cir. 1986). Appeals court upholds city police department policy concerning officer conduct and determines that officers did not have a constitutionally protected right of privacy to engage in sexual relations with prostitutes while on duty. Two married vice officers were discharged in 1978 after an investigation revealed that they had been intimately involved with prostitutes while on duty, that one prostitute was accepting city money from an officer as a paid informant, and that both relationships were carried on openly and publicly. The officers were discharged for violating a police department order which prohibited "conduct unbecoming an officer and contrary to the general orders of the police department." The officers appealed to the Phoenix Civil Service Board, which reinstated them but did not order back pay for the period of their suspension. The officers filed an action for back pay and injunctive relief in federal district court, asserting violations of their constitutional rights. The district court entered summary judgment for the city, and on second appeal the higher court concurred with the dismissal. While acknowledging that the city's policy was vague, the court found that it was intended to protect the legitimate interests of the police department, and that while the Constitution does not expressly guarantee the right of privacy, it is considered one of the "liberty" interests protect by the due process clause. (City of Phoenix Police Department, Arizona)

U.S. Appeals Court
DISCRIMINATION

Galvan v. Bexar County, Texas, 785 F.2d 1298 (5th Cir. 1986). Jail guard victim of age discrimination. The plaintiff was hired by the county as a detention guard in 1968. He was not a high school graduate and did not possess a GED certificate. When new requirements were passed by the Texas Commission on Law Enforcement Standards and Education, the sheriff was notified in January, 1978, that a GED certificate would be required, but the plaintiff was not notified until after the certification date had passed. After attempting to study for the GED exam, he submitted a letter of resignation stating that he believed he was qualified for his duties but could not pass the test. The commission later passed a "grandfather clause" which would have exempted the plaintiff from the requirement, but the sheriff refused to reinstate him upon request. The lower court found that the county had discriminated against the plaintiff in violation of the Age Discrimination in Employment Act of 1967. On appeal, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit affirmed the lower court finding. (Bexar County Jail, Texas)

State Court
SEARCH DRUG TEST

King v. McMickens, 501 N.Y.S.2d 679 (A.D. 1 Dept. 1986). The refusal of a corrections officer suspected of illegal drug activities to provide a sample for an urinalysis upon order of the Department of Corrections investigators was established by sufficient evidence. Dismissing a corrections officer for refusing to submit a sample for a drug urinalysis did not violate the fourth amendment rights of the officer. The officer's reasonable expectation of privacy as private citizen yielded to compelling governmental interests in insuring capable corrections officers when he became such an officer. Probable cause was not required to order a corrections officer to submit a sample for a drug urinalysis. The dismissal of a corrections officer for refusal to submit a sample for a drug urinalysis was not an excessive penalty, was not shocking to sense of fairness and was not disproportionate to the offense. (New York DOC)

State Court
TERMINATION

Musser v. County of Centre, 515 A.2d 1027 (Pa. Cmwlth. 1986). A corrections officers' unauthorized shackling and cuffing of an inmate, forced application of ointment to inmate's penis and testicles and forcible insertion of two inch spout into inmate's anus was conduct justifying the officers' discharge, and the arbitrator's determination that there was no cause for discharge did not draw its essence from the terms of a collective bargaining agreement. (Centre County Prison, Pennsylvania)

State Court
TERMINATION

Neb. Dept. of Correctional Serv. v. Carroll, 383 N.W.2d 740 (Neb. 1986). The Supreme Court of Nebraska affirmed the appellate court's ruling that the district court lacked authority to grant attorney's fees for expenses incurred at proceedings before the State Personnel Board and Equal Opportunity Commission. The attorney filed for attorney's fees after representing a Nebraska Department of Corrections employee in his suit alleging his dismissal was racially motivated. The commission ordered him reinstated with back pay, and the department appealed. The court could award the employee's attorney his fees and costs incurred for securing dismissal of the appeal. (Department of Correctional Services, Nebraska)

State Appeals Court
SEARCHES

People v. Whitfield, 488 N.E.2d 1087 (Ill. App. 5 Dist. 1986). A state appeals court found that the practice of searching a guard's car and his clothing were legal actions because the guard was on department premises and he had signed a waiver of his constitutional rights in regard to such a search as a condition of his employment. There were also signs posted in the prison parking lot warning of such searches. The search did not exceed the scope of consent, since only his clothing was searched and the guard had given consent to have his car searched. (Menard Correctional Center)

State Court
TRAINING

State Correctional Inst. v. Nelson, 503 A.2d 116 (Pa. Cmwlth. 1986). Prison officials were not at fault for a female trainee's lack of notice that she had only two chances to pass a handgun test. Her voluntary absence from class on the day the instructor orally informed trainees of the qualifications was the reason she did not receive the information, ruled the Commonwealth Court of Pennsylvania.

The applicant underwent probationary training for one month, completing all training requirements except the handgun qualifying test, which she failed to pass. The test was introduced just prior to her employment. About a month after failing the first test, she took another test, which she again failed. She was the only member of her class who failed the two tests. The court upheld her dismissal, finding no discrimination in that oral notice was given at class, and that she missed hearing about the qualifications due to her absence. (State Correctional Institution at Graterford, Bureau of Correction, Pennsylvania)

U.S. Appeals Court
DISCRIMINATION

Thorne v. City of El Segundo, 802 F.2d 1131 (9th Cir. 1986). City officials are immune from liability in this sex discrimination case because the law on unregulated, unrestrained employer inquiries into personal sexual matters was not clearly defined at the time, says the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. Deborah Thorne filed suit against the City of El Segundo, Calif., when the city refused to hire her as a police officer based on results of polygraph testing about her past sexual activities. Thorne alleged the city discriminated against her in the application process and violated her constitutional right of privacy. Although the trial court found Thorne had been discriminated against, she was awarded only $812 back pay from the date of refusal until the date she voluntarily resigned her position as clerk typist. Thorne appealed this award, and the appeals court determined the back pay should, in fact, have been continued until the date of the judgment.

The appellate court also concluded the city officials should not be found liable for their actions, because the constitutional right to privacy and free association, which was allegedly violated by conducting a broad, unregulated inquiry into her off duty sexual activities, was not a "clearly established statutory or constitutional right of which a reasonable person would have known." Although Thorne's case did establish this right, the court held the officials, at the time they questioned Thorne, could not be expected to "predict the future course of constitutional law."

Ruling the city officials immune from liability, the court remanded the case to the trial court for determination of the appropriate back pay. (El Segundo Police Department)

U.S. Appeals Court
WORKING CONDITIONS

Walker v. Rowe, 791 F.2d 507 (7th Cir. 1986), U.S. cert. denied in 107 S.Ct 597. Appeals court rules that due process clause does not assure safe working conditions for public employees and reverses lower court awards. On July 22, 1978, inmates of the Pontiac Correctional Center, a maximum security prison, were being returned to their cells after exercise in the courtyard. The prisoners killed three guards, injured others, and set fire to part of the prison. Three of the injured guards and the estates of the three deceased guards filed suit against the Director of the Illinois Department of Corrections, and the Assistant Warden of Operations at Pontiac, alleging that they deprived them of their constitutional right to a safe working environment.

A federal district court jury returned verdicts against the defendants totalling $706,845, and the district court added $145,792 in attorney's fees and costs. These recoveries were in addition to workers' compensation awards ($250,000 death benefits and burial expenses for each of the three deceased guards) and other benefits afforded by state law.

The United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit ruled: "Because we conclude that the constitution is not a code of occupational safety, we reverse the judgment." The court explained that "due process" does not mean "due care"- the constitution is designed to protect people from the state, not to ensure that the state provide safety or comfort. A special relationship must exist before the state can be held liable for harm to a person. If the state had forced the men to be officers at the correctional center, it would be required not to be indifferent to their working conditions. But the guards enlisted voluntarily and were free to quit at any time. According to the court, "...the state must protect those it throws into the snake pits, but the state need not guarantee that volunteer snake charmers will not be bitten."

The plaintiffs had argued that the corrections officials had control of several conditions which contributed to the attacks, including: failure to maintain metal detectors in operating condition; failure to conduct enough shakedown of inmate cells to find weapons; failure to "lock down" the prison although the officials knew or should have known that it was tense; failure to immediately issue shotguns to the tactical squad and order it to quell the disturbance. Although the court noted that the defendants had some level of control over these issues, their actions did not amount to constitutional violations.

Additional allegations which the court concluded were not directly within the control of the defendants included: design of the prison which created "dead spots" from guard towers; high staff turnover, vacancies and lack of sufficient staff; overcrowded conditions in the facility; the existence of prisoner gangs; the new phone system which had defects and was hard to use; the door and cage in the North Cell House were old and flimsy; and guards did not receive enough training in controlling the riots, and training which was provided was poor. (Pontiac Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
WORKING CONDITIONS

Washington v. District of Columbia, 802 F.2d 1478 (D.C.Cir. 1986). Reckless failure of state officials to remedy unsafe prison conditions did not deprive a correctional officer of his constitutional rights, according to a recent U.S. Court of Appeals decision. Preston Washington was attacked and severely injured by a prisoner while employed as a correctional officer at the Lorton Reformatory. Washington sought $20 million damages alleging reformatory officials had been warned of unsafe conditions at Lorton and were under court order to correct them. By failing to take remedial action the officials violated his constitutional rights, he argued.

The court noted, however, that not all injuries inflicted by persons acting under color of state law violate constitutional rights. While Washington had a liberty interest in "personal security," the officials sued had no constitutional duty to protect his security. Washington argued that prison guards have the same constitutional rights as prisoners. The court disagreed, distinguishing that prisoners are in custody involuntarily and prison officers work voluntarily. Therefore, the state had no constitutional obligation to protect Washington from the hazards inherent in that occupation. (Lorton Reformatory, District of Columbia)

1987

U.S. Appeals Court
DISCRIMINATION
WORKING CONDITIONS
ASSIGNMENT
SCHEDULE

E.E.O.C. v. Ithaca Industries, Inc., 829 F.2d 519 (4th Cir. 1987), cert. denied, 109 S.Ct. 306. An action alleging discrimination on the basis of religion was brought against a former employer by a former employee. When the federal district court entered a judgment for the employer, the former employee appealed. The appeals court held that the discharge of the employee for refusal to work on Sunday was not discriminatory when the employer demonstrated that it attempted to reasonably accommodate the employee's observance of Sunday. The employer established that it attempted to reasonably accommodate the employee's observance of Sunday religious practices and the employee's absolute refusal to compromise in any way on Sunday work issue precluded the employer from making a reasonable accommodation. The discrimination against some employees in order for others to observe their sabbath is not required by a statute prohibiting discrimination in employment on the basis of religion and requiring reasonable accommodation. The term "reasonable accommodation," as stated by the court, suggests a bilateral cooperation in the search for an acceptable reconciliation of the needs of the employee's religion and the exigencies of the employee's business. The employee made no good faith attempt to satisfy his needs through compromise. Thus, nothing the employer could do, except unconditionally surrender to the employee's demands would suffice. (Ithaca Industries, Inc.)

U.S. Appeals Court
DISCIPLINE
DUE PROCESS

Garraghty v. Jordan, 830 F.2d 1295 (4th Cir. 1987). A federal appeals court upheld the suspension of the Warden of the Nottoway Correctional Center for insubordination. After refusing to drive from the prison to Richmond, Virginia (one and one-half hours away) to discuss a problem with the Regional Administrator for the Virginia Department of Corrections, the Warden was ordered to report to the Administrator's office on the next regular business day. After being asked to explain why he had refused to come immediately to Richmond, the Warden stated that he had to attend to personal business at the time and that his shift had ended just prior to the conversation with the Administrator. The Administrator told the Warden that he found his explanation for his conduct insufficient to excuse him and that his conduct constituted insubordination, advising him he was suspended for five days without pay. While it was true that the Warden had a property interest in his employment and was thus entitled to notice of the charges against him and a meaningful opportunity to respond to those charges, his rights had been preserved, said the Court, which stated that he had received "all the hearing he was entitled to." The court concluded that, before he was suspended, the Warden was given an opportunity to be heard and to "present his side of the story." The court found that the orderly administration of the Corrections Department would become too disruptive by further formalizing the suspension process and escalating its adversary nature. The deprivation caused by short term suspension does not warrant pre-deprivation proceedings before a neutral party. (Nottoway Correctional Center, Virginia)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEARCHES

McDonell v. Hunter, 809 F.2d 1320 (8th Cir. 1987). A class action suit was brought by departmental employees under 42 U.S.C. Section 1983 regarding the legality of guard searches for contraband conducted by Iowa Department of Corrections prison officials. The district court's order was modified in part and affirmed with specific standards for various kinds of searches set forth by the appeals court. The department claimed that the searches are necessary to control and provide institutional security by monitoring the existence of contraband it was stated that the employees' forth amendment right against unreasonable searches was balanced with the need for prison security. The appeals court set forth the following guidelines: (1) searches of employee vehicles parked within the institution's confines may be conducted without cause and randomly as long as the choice of vehicles that are searched is systematic and they are done with uniformity; (2) vehicles parked outside the confines can only be searched based on a reasonable suspicion unless it is shown that inmates have unsupervised access to them, in which case the vehicles can be searched without cause and at random; (3) employees who have regular contact with prisoners on a day to day basis in medium or maximum security prisons may be subject to urinalysis testing which is performed uniformly or by a systematic random selection (urinalysis testing outside the random procedure must be based on reasonable suspicion "based on specific objective facts and reasonable inferences drawn from those facts in light of experience that the employee has used a controlled substance within the twenty-four hour period prior to the required test."); (4) strip body cavity searches require the reasonable suspicion standard that demands individualized suspicion specifically directed to the person targeted for the search. Finally, the court found that employees cannot be forced to waive their constitutional rights as a condition of employment--"Advance consent of future unreasonable searches is not a reasonable condition of employment." The state may only use a consent form which is in conformity with the above criteria. (Iowa Department of Corrections)

State Appeals Court
HARASSMENT
TERMINATION
DISCIPLINE

Oare v. Coughlin, 520 N.Y.S.2d 658 (A.D. 3 Dept. 1987). A state appeals court rejected a defendant's argument that, given his lengthy term of employment (22 years) and unblemished record, dismissal was too severe a punishment for sexually harassing female employees under his supervision. The defendant was a deputy superintendent who supervised 30 clerical people, 27 of whom were female. He was found guilty of sexually harassing the female employees by a lower court, although he denied these actions or attempted to portray them as innocent events. (Elmira Correctional Facility, New York)

State Supreme Court
PROMOTION
HIRING/
QUALIFICATIONS

Pulaski County Civil Service Com'n. v. Davis, 730 S.W.2d 220 (Ark. 1987). Employees of a sheriff's department filed a lawsuit against a county Civil Service Commission challenging the rules which required a high school degree or college hours as a requirement for promotion. The state supreme court found that the use of educational standards as a prerequisite for promotion eligibility violated the governing statute which provided that promotion be based solely on an open competitive examination. (Pulaski County Sheriff Department, Arkansas)

State Appeals Court
DUE PROCESS
TERMINATION

Said v. Lacky, 731 S.W. 2d 7 (Ky. App. 1987). A new deputy jailer had signed an agreement to accept temporary employment that he could be terminated at any time without notice. However, when he was terminated, he demanded a hearing and filed a lawsuit alleging wrongful discharge. The court found the agreement violated statutory law because a jail manual provided for "due process" when an employee was being terminated and, although this procedure had not been formally adopted, there were other instances when this procedure had been followed and this made it an established procedure. Thus, the employee was entitled to rights under the county administrative code as well as rights to written notice and a hearing. (Campbell County Jail, Kentucky)

U.S. District Court
PROMOTION
DISCRIMINATION

Shaw v. Neb. Dept. of Correctional Services, 666 F.Supp. 1330 (D.Neb. 1987). A female employee of the Nebraska Department of Correctional Services brought action against the Department and two of its administrators for violation of her Fourteenth Amendment equal protection rights. The district court held that: (1) the female employee established she was discriminated against on the basis of sex when she was denied a promotion in violation of both Title VII and equal protection clause for the Fourteenth Amendment, and (2) the employee was entitled to award of back pay, front pay, general compensatory damages, interest and taxable court costs. (Lincoln Post Care Center, Nebraska)

Court of Appeals
DUE PROCESS
TERMINATION
WORKING CONDITIONS

Sienkiewicz v. Santa Cruz County, 240 Cal.Rptr. 451 (Cal.App. 6 Dist. 1987). A detention officer petitioned for writ of mandate and sought damages for dismissal. The superior court denied the officer's petition, and he appealed. The appeals court, affirming, found that the officer was accorded due process by having an administrative hearing even though it occurred following his enforced leave of absence by the sheriff. The officer's suspension and dismissal was supported by evidence that he was psychologically unfit to perform the regular duty involving inmate contact, and the Civil Service Commission had the authority to terminate the officer from his employment. In suspending the detention officer based on psychological trauma suffered as a result of facial injury, the sheriff was entitled to rely on a letter written by the detention officer's attorney describing his medical condition and was not required to obtain additional medical information before suspending him. Under the California Fair Employment and Housing Act, a public employer may require an employee to meet physical or mental standards reasonably related to duties required by the job and the health and safety of the employee or others. The detention officer was assigned light duty at first, while his injuries to his face and jaw, suffered from an off-the-job motorcycle accident, were healing. Once restored to duty, he told his watch commander he had reservations about assuming full duty because he feared being hit in the face. (Santa Cruz County Detention Facility, California)

U.S. Appeals Court
BFOQ
EQUAL OPPORTUNITY
HIRING/
QUALIFICATIONS

U.S. v. Gregory, 818 F.2d 1114 (4th Cir. 1987), cert. denied, 108 S.Ct. 143. An action was instigated by four female applicants for positions with the Sheriff's Department when they complained that they were denied jobs because of their gender. The county sheriff failed to establish that gender was bona fide occupational qualification for correctional officers by failing to demonstrate why the county could not accommodate, through reasonable modification of the facility and the job functions, female correctional officers in order to minimize the clash between the privacy interests of the inmates and the safety of the prison employees on the one hand and the non-discrimination requirement of Title VII on the other. The case was remanded to the trial court for further proceedings. (Patrick County Jail)

1988

U.S. District Court
DRUG TESTING

American Federation of Gov. Emp. Council 33 v. Meese, 688 F.Supp. 547 (N.D.Cal. 1988). Prison employees' unions brought action against the Federal Bureau of Prisons, challenging the proposed program of mandatory drug testing. The district court issued a preliminary injunction. The program would have required all employees of the Federal Bureau of Prisons to have a urine test on two hours notice, even if there was no reasonable suspicion of drug use, wrongdoing, or negligence. According to the court, such a program would violate the Fourth Amendment. Arguments by prison officials that safety or security concerns justified the adoption of a lower standard than "reasonable suspicion" were not supported by the court, which found that Bureau of Prisons had presented no evidence indicating that drug-related safety problems exist or have existed--"The record contains not one instance of any safety problem resulting from employee drug use. Nor had the government shown any reason to anticipate that such problems are imminent." Although the Bureau cited thirteen instances in 1987 in which employees were involved in bringing drugs into institutions, the court ruled there was no evidence that those employees were drug users; therefore, less intrusive procedures could be used to control such activities. The court also prohibited the use of drug screening for employees involved in on-the-job accidents or unsafe activities, without individual reasonable suspicion. (Pleasanton Federal Correctional Institution, California)

U.S. Appeals Court
NEGOTIATION
WORKING CONDITIONS CLOTHING

American Fed. of Gov. Emp., Local 2441 v. FLRA, 864 F.2d 178 (D.C. Cir. 1988). An unfair labor practice charge was filed against the Bureau of Prisons for its refusal to negotiate with the union over its proposed changes in uniform for guards at that particular prison. The Federal Labor Relations Authority held for the Bureau, and the union petitioned for review. The appeals court denied the petition, and found that the Bureau was not required to bargain over the proposed imposition of a requirement that guards wear neckties and blazers on the job. In determining whether a federal agency has a duty to bargain with labor organization over the adoption of a particular policy, the Federal Labor Relations Authority determines if the proposed policy bears a direct and integral relationship to the agency's mission and, if so, whether the union's counter proposal would directly interfere with a mission-related purpose of the agency's new practice; if it would, the agency has no duty to bargain.

The Bureau of Prison's proposal to require guards to wear blazers and neckties bore a "direct and integral relationship" to the prison's mission, for the purpose of determining whether the Bureau was required to negotiate with the union over the proposal; the Bureau claimed a connection between the improved image of guards and the increased degree of cooperation from the inmates and the public, and there was evidence to support such an assertion. The counter proposals advanced by the prison guards' union directly interfered with the purpose behind the Bureau of Prison's proposal that guards all wear neckties and blazers, for the purpose of determining whether the Bureau was required to negotiate with the union over its proposal; the union proposed to eliminate proposed requirements. (Federal Correctional Institute, Morgantown, West Virginia)

State Appeals Court
DISCIPLINE
TERMINATION

Anaya v. New Mexico State Personnel Bd., 762 P.2d 909 (N.M.App. 1988). The New Mexico Personnel Board affirmed the Corrections Department's dismissal of two guards and the suspension of others after two inmates escaped, and the guards petitioned for review. The district court affirmed the Board's decision, and the guards appealed. The appeals court, affirming the lower court decision, found that the hearing officer could reasonably have found that the Department had a reasonable basis to conclude that the escape occurred on a certain date when the guards were negligent in counting inmates, there was substantial evidence to support a disciplinary action against the guards where evidence included interview statements made during the investigation of the escape and reports compiled by the state police and the penitentiary, and the imposition of harsher discipline on some guards than on other guards involved in the same incident was appropriate where some guards had previous unsatisfactory work evaluations. (Penitentiary of New Mexico)

U.S. Appeals Court
PROMOTION
DISCRIMINATION

Berl v. Westchester County, 849 F.2d 712 (2nd Cir. 1988). A county policy of promoting correction officer from a separate list of male and female officers violated Title VII. Two male correction officers who had been on a civil service eligibility list for promotion to sergeant but had not been promoted alleged sex discrimination. They were denied promotion based on interviews of the promotion board which cited their deficient or undeveloped leadership qualities. According to the lower court, under state law, correction officers did not possess a vested right to a sergeant appointment simply because they were among the top three candidates on the eligibility list. However, on appeal, the court ruled that the county violated Section 1983 and Title VII because there was no evidence that the officers were unqualified. (Westchester Correctional Facility, Valhalla, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
AGE
DISCRIMINATION
TERMINATION

Cooper v. Asplundh Tree Expert Co., 836 F.2d 1544 (10th Cir. 1988). According to a federal appeals court, an employee alleging age discrimination need not show that age was the sole reason he was fired, only that age "made a difference" in the employer's decision. In this non-corrections case, the plaintiff, who was employed as a foreman with Asplundh Tree Expert Company for almost 20 years, was discharged at age forty-nine and replaced by a thirty-three year old. He contended that he was fired even though his work was satisfactory. The company countered that the plaintiff had violated company rules by buying food during working hours, wearing spikes while climbing live trees and failing to have his crew wear hard hats on the job. The court found that the company did not uniformly enforce these rules, however. In fact, the man who replaced the plaintiff testified that he wore spikes on live trees for safety reasons. Further, a remark by a supervisor that he claimed was joke was taken serious by other employees, leading them to believe that "guys forty years old are too old to work here." Even though the company had raised non-discriminatory reasons for firing the plaintiff, the court concluded that age was a "determinative factor" in the company's action and ruled that the plaintiff was entitled to relief. (Asplundh Tree Expert Company)

U.S. Appeals Court
HARASSMENT
DISCRIMINATION

Eastwood v. Dept. of Corrections of State of Okl., 846 F.2d 627 (10th Cir. 1988). A federal appeals court ruled that a Department of Corrections investigator who asked irrelevant questions concerning the sexual history of a female employee who had charged a fellow employee with sexual assault was not entitled to qualified immunity. When the female employee reported the sexual assault incident, the departmental investigator allegedly told her that she would not be harassed or fired if she revealed everything about the assault. She filed a lawsuit claiming that she was threatened with termination if she did not sign a statement promising to forget the incident if the other employee resigned. The lawsuit also claimed that the investigator forced her to reveal facts about her sexual history. Furthermore, the investigator and several other Department of Corrections employees created an offensive work environment by harassing her with additional questions about her sexual history, "publishing offensive and insulting drawings" within the Department of Corrections facility, and repeatedly making insulting remarks, which led up to her resignation when she could no longer tolerate the abuse. The court found that under 42 U.S.C. Section 1983, these allegations were sufficient to state a claim. Since the unlawfulness of such questions were clearly established by prior case law establishing a right of privacy, citing Thorne v. City of El Segundo, 726 F.2d 459 (9th Cir. 1983), cert denied, 469 U.S. 979 (1984), ("unbounded, standardless inquiry" in personal life of applicant for police job violated right to privacy). An individual's interest in avoiding disclosure of personal matters and interest in being independent when making certain kinds of personal decisions are two kinds of privacy interests protected by the penumbra of the Bill of Rights. (Oklahoma Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
SEARCHES

Kennedy v. Hardiman, 684 F.Supp. 540 (N.D. Ill. 1988). A county corrections official received a phone call from a man purporting to be an FBI agent informing him that a correctional officer would be transporting heroin into the facility on that date. When the officer arrived, a body cavity search was conducted by three investigators who found no heroin. The correctional officer sued corrections officials alleging violation of his fourth amendment rights. The federal district court held that there was nothing improper in the plaintiff naming several defendants in their official capacities, as this was an entirely appropriate way to allege municipal liability and there was no reason to limit the plaintiff to a single official capacity defendant. The court also denied summary judgment for the defendants, ruling that jury must decide if the search was based on reasonable suspicion. Since the law regarding strip searches was clearly established and an anonymous tip would not provide "reasonable suspicion," prison officials were not be entitled to qualified immunity for the strip search. (Cook County Dept. of Corrections, Illinois)

Supreme Court
ATTORNEY

Mathis v. State, 531 N.Y.S.2d 680 (Sup. 1988). A prison guard who was a defendant in an inmate's federal civil rights and assault and battery action brought a proceeding for judgment annulling the determination of the Attorney General that the guard was not entitled under Public Officers Law to defense paid for by the state. The State Supreme Court, granting the petition in part, found that it was improper for the Attorney General to determine that the prison guard was not entitled to a defense, and the Attorney General was precluded from representing the guard due to a conflict of interest. It was found by the court that it was improper for the Attorney General to deny such a defense based on his determination that the officer was acting outside the scope of his employment. The facts presented were conflicting, with an arbitrator holding that the inmate probably struck the first blow. (Fishkill Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
DISCRIMINATION
FREE SPEECH
TERMINATION

Matulin v. Village of Lodi, 862 F.2d 609 (6th Cir. 1988). A female police officer brought an action against the village and village officials of Lodi following her discharge. The U.S. District Court entered a judgment in favor of the officer, and the defendants appealed. The appeals court, affirming in part and reversing in part, found that the statements made in a newspaper article by the officer concerning sex and handicap discrimination in the village police department involved a legitimate matter of public interest and were protected by the first amendment. The evidence was sufficient to establish that the officer's statements were a substantial factor in the decision to terminate the officer's employment. An award of $75,000 in compensatory damages was not excessive; but under Ohio law, the officer did not have a protected property interest in completing a probationary term in the office. (Village of Lodi Police Department, Ohio)

State Appeals Court
HARASSMENT PRIVACY
WORKING CONDITIONS

Mendez v. Superior Court (Peery), 253 Cal.Rptr. 731 (Cal.App. 5 Dist. 1988). An employee of a sheriff's office sued a deputy and the county for intentional and negligent assault and battery and intentional and negligent infliction of emotional distress in connection with a deputy's alleged sexual assault upon an employee. The county filed a motion requesting the discovery of the employee's sexual history with others at the sheriff's department, and the deputy filed a motion requesting discovery of the employee's sexual conduct with persons other than the deputy. The superior court denied the defendants' motions, and the defendants filed petitions for writs of mandate. Following its issuance of an order to show cause, the court of appeals, discharged the order, and denied the petition, finding that the fact that the employee's alleged emotional distress did not justify the defendants' requested discovery of the employee's sexual privacy. The discovery was not justified by the claim that the employee's alleged consensual sexual conduct with other employees might have some bearing on the applicability of the exclusive remedy doctrine of the workers' compensation system. The defendants' claim that the employee's sexual history bears upon her credibility did not justify the discovery. (Merced County Sheriff's Department, California)

State Supreme Court
TERMINATION

Monie v. State Personnel Bd., 424 N.W.2d 874 (Neb. 1988). The director of the Department of Correctional Services terminated a service technician at a correctional center following an incident in which he kicked, shoved and threw a beverage over an inmate. After the state personnel board affirmed the termination, the technician sought review. The district court reversed the termination order and ordered reinstatement of the technician with back pay. Further appeal was taken by the defendants. The supreme court, reversing and remanding with directions, found the decision to terminate the employment of the technician was made in good faith and for good cause and the agency followed proper procedures under the state rules, regulations and relevant statutes. (Omaha Correctional Center, Nebraska)

U.S. Appeals Court
FREE SPEECH
DISCIPLINE
TERMINATION

Page v. DeLaune, 837 F.2d 233 (5th Cir. 1988). An instructor-counselor in a state operated ex-offender program was fired after her supervisor overheard her telling another employee that she wished to talk to a higher authority about problems with the program and DeLaune. This conversation came just days after a staff meeting at which the higher authority announced an "open door" policy and invited observations or complaints about the ex-offender program. The fired instructor sued her supervisor and others contending that she had been fired for exercising her First Amendment right of free speech. The federal appeals court found that this was clearly a personnel matter internal to the program, not a matter of public concern--and therefore fell far short of turning this into a matter of public concern covered by the First Amendment. (Texas A & M University)

U.S. Appeals Court
HIRING/
QUALIFICATIONS PSYCHOLOGICAL SCREENING RETENTION

Parker v. Williams, 855 F.2d 763 (11th Cir. 1988). A former prisoner in a county jail who was kidnapped and raped by a former chief jailer brought a Section 1983 action against the former chief jailer, the county sheriff, the county itself, and individual county commissioners. Claims were also asserted under Alabama tort law. The United States District Court entered judgment on a jury verdict awarding the plaintiff compensatory damages of $100,000, and punitive damages of $100,000 against the sheriff and the county. The defendants appealed. The Court of Appeals certified the question to the Supreme Court of Alabama and received a response, 519 So.2d 442. Thereafter, the Court of Appeals initially held that: (1) the sheriff was immune from the state law tort claims; (2) the evidence supported the jury finding that the sheriff acted pursuant to an inadequate employment policy and the policy could fairly be ascribed to the county; (3) the sheriff was not entitled to qualified immunity; and (4) the county could not be held liable for punitive damages. On rehearing, however, the appeals court vacated judgments against the sheriff and the county. 862 F.2d 1471. According to the court, under Alabama law, the county was not vicariously liable for tort claims asserted against the sheriff arising from the chief jailer's kidnapping and rape of a county prisoner, since there was no employer-employee relationship between the county and the sheriff. The sheriff's gross negligence in hiring a chief jailer who kidnapped and raped a county prisoner supported county liability in a section 1983 action and the jury finding of specific gross negligence evidenced a more general finding that the sheriff's negligent act was traceable to a policy or custom of the county. Based on the theory that the sheriff created an official policy or custom of not performing reasonable background checks of potential jailers or on theory that he was grossly negligent in hiring or in training the chief jailer when he knew or should have known that the jailer was a convicted sex offender with various psychiatric problems, there would have been no reasonable grounds, based on established principles of law, for the sheriff to believe that hiring as the chief jailer, a convicted sex offender with a history of mental problems was a permissible action. (Macon County Jail, Alabama)

U.S. District Court DRUG TESTING
TRAINING

Poole v. Stephens, 688 F.Supp. 149 (D. N.J. 1988). A federal district held that a state corrections officer training academy did not violate the constitutional rights of corrections officer recruits by requiring mandatory random drug testing. The recruits, the court said, were aware of the peculiar circumstances and demands of the occupation for which they were training and thus had reduced legitimate expectations of privacy. The court also found no violation of equal protection because the department of corrections required random drug testing of recruits but only tested corrections officers upon reasonable individualized suspicion. (New Jersey Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
DISCRIMINATION
HIRING/
QUALIFICATIONS
BFOQ

Rasul v. District of Columbia, 680 F.Supp. 436 (D.D.C. 1988). A Muslim minister whose application for a job as prison chaplain had been rejected based on religious affiliation brought a Title VII action against the District of Columbia Department of Corrections and one of its officers. Both sides moved for summary judgment. The district court held that: (1) the Department of Corrections' policy of hiring prison chaplains on a denominational basis was on its face a violation of Title VII, and (2) the Department failed to demonstrate that Protestant religious affiliation was "bona fide occupational qualification" for a position as prison chaplain. To establish a prima facie case of religious discrimination under Title VII, the job applicant must demonstrate: that he belongs to a protected class; that he applied and was qualified for the position for which defendant sought applicants; that the application was nevertheless rejected; and that the position remained open and defendants continued to seek applications. The Department of Corrections failed to demonstrate that Protestant religious affiliation was "bona fide occupational qualification" for the position as prison chaplain, so that the Department violated Title VII when it rejected Muslim imam's job application solely on the basis of religious affiliation, where many of the chaplain's duties were purely administrative in nature, and the chaplain was not expected to preside over all of the religious services that he organized. The Department had recently begun to hire chaplains on a nondenominational basis and failed to demonstrate that a new policy had any adverse effect on the inmates' religious life. (Lorton Reformatory, District of Columbia)

U.S. Appeals Court
RACIAL DISCRIMINATION
SEX
DISCRIMINATION
DISCIPLINE

Sewell v. Jefferson County Fiscal Court, 863 F.2d 461 (6th Cir. 1988), cert. denied, 110 S.Ct. 75. A white female sergeant in a county corrections department brought an action against county corrections department officials alleging racial and sexual discrimination. The U.S. District Court entered judgment for the defendants, and appeal was taken. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that the trial court's finding that the corrections department officials had articulated a legitimate nondiscriminatory reason for the white female sergeant's demotions were not clearly erroneous. The actions of the white female endangered the safety of the other officers and the inmates, while those of a black male, the employee with whom her disciplinary actions had been compared, had not. The demoted corrections department sergeant was barred from a recovery under the deprivation to the civil rights statute for deprivation of property without due process, where the employee failed to demonstrate that remedies provided to her under state law were inadequate to rectify any errors. (Jefferson County Corrections Department, Kentucky)

U.S. District Court
DISCRIMINATION
EQUAL PROTECTION LIBERTY INTEREST
TERMINATION

Todd v. Navarro, 698 F.Supp. 871 (S.D.Fla. 1988). A discharged deputy sheriff brought action against the sheriff, 13 individual employees of the sheriff's office, and other persons acting in concert with the named defendants, alleging that she was fired solely because she was a lesbian in violation of her right to equal protection of the law. The district court granted the motion to dismiss, finding that homosexuals are not a suspect class accorded strict scrutiny under the equal protection clause. In the absence of authority showing the plaintiff was a member of a protected class or that her dismissal was not rationally related to a legitimate end, the defendants were entitled to judgment as a matter of law with respect to her equal protection claims. The action against the sheriff and commander failed to state a claim. Dismissal did not deprive the plaintiff of any protected liberty or property interest. Interest in reputation alone is not sufficient liberty interest in warrant an action in federal court on the ground of deprivation of liberty interest without due process of law. The fired deputy's lawsuit also claimed that two other employees entered a conspiracy with other employees to spread false statements about her throughout the department and also the fact that she was a lesbian. Her equal protection claim was based on the allegation that she was fired solely because she was a lesbian. The defendant sheriff and other defendant employees retorted that she was fired because of specific instances of misconduct, malingering and excessive absenteeism. (Broward County Jail, Florida)

U.S. Appeals Court
BFOQ
DISCRIMINATION
HIRING/
QUALIFICATIONS

Torres v. Wis. Dept. of Health & Social Services, 838 F.2d 944 (7th Cir. 1988), cert. denied, 109 S.Ct. 1133, 109 S.Ct. 1537. Male correctional officers at a women's maximum security prison brought a sex discrimination suit. The federal appeals court held that: (1) the prison officials did not offer a distinct security justification for the claimed bona fide occupational qualification; (2) the privacy interests of the inmates were protected by existing procedures at the prison and, thus, did not justify the plan; and (3) that theory that having female guards in the living units would promote the rehabilitation of female inmates was not supported by sufficient facts to meet the burden of bona fide occupational qualification exception. A policy that designated specific positions at a women's maximum security prison as available only to women was "continuing violation" for purposes of determining whether male correctional officers filed timely EEOC charges after demotions and continued to exclude all male correctional officers from positions covered by plan. To establish bona fide occupational qualification defense, defendant clearly may not justify a refusal to hire members of one sex merely by pointing to stereotypes about differences between women and men. Wisconsin prison officials had no distinct security justification to require that only women be hired for specific positions at a women's maximum security prison for purposes of determining whether they established bona fide occupational qualification defense. Wisconsin prison officials did not meet their burden of proving existence of serious conflict between privacy interests of the female inmates and employment rights of male correctional officers for purposes of determining whether officials had bona fide occupational qualification defense to charge that male correctional officer were demoted pursuant to a policy that designated specific positions at a women's maximum security prison as available only to women; prison was operated in a manner that was very sensitive to privacy interests of its inmates and afforded them a good deal of privacy from correctional officers of both sexes. (Taycheedah Correctional Institution, Wisconsin)

U.S. Appeals Court
BFOQ
EQUAL OPPORTUNITY SEX
DISCRIMINATION

Torres v. Wisc. Dept. of Health & Social Services, 859 F.2d 1523 (7th Cir. 1988), cert. denied, 109 S.Ct. 1133. Male correctional officers at a women's maximum security prison brought a sex discrimination suit. The U.S. District Court found that prison officials failed to establish that sex was a valid bona fide occupational qualification (BFOQ), and appeal was taken. The court of appeals affirmed. After granting a rehearing en banc, the court of appeals, reversing and remanding, found that the prison officials were asked to meet an unrealistic, and therefore unfair, burden when they were required to produce objective evidence, either from empirical studies or otherwise, displaying a validity of their theory that the rehabilitation of the inmates in the women's maximum security facility would be enhanced by employing only female correctional officials in certain positions. In view of the absence of empirical studies, efforts of the officials should have been evaluated on the basis of totality of the circumstances as contained in the entire record, to determine whether they established a BFOQ defense. (Taycheedah Correctional Institution, Wisconsin)

U.S. District Court
HIRING/
QUALIFICATIONS
PROMOTION
RACIAL DISCRIMINATION
WORKING CONDITIONS EQUAL OPPORTUNITY
DISCIPLINE

Yarber v. Indiana State Prison, 713 F.Supp. 271 (N.D. Ind. 1988). A prison guard brought a civil rights action. The district court found that three of four claims were within the scope of EEOC charges, and the prison guard could use statistics to support his claims concerning discrimination in employee disciplinary procedures. The guard's claim concerning the racially discriminatory work environment was reasonably related to his EEOC charge that the prison hired black employees to meet the state hiring goals but then attempted to "get rid" of them as quickly and as often as possible. The guard's claim regarding racially motivated harassment and poor treatment was reasonably related to EEOC charges concerning racially motivated disciplinary measures. The guard's allegation of retaliatory transfer in work assignments was reasonably related to EEOC charges of racially motivated disciplinary matters and racially discriminatory work environment. The guard's claim concerning the denial of promotion was not reasonably related to EEOC charges of discriminatory work environment and racially motivated harassment and treatment. (Indiana State Prison)

1989

U.S. District Court
DRUG TESTING

American Federation of Govt. Em. Council 33 v. Thornburgh, 720 F.Supp. 154 (N.D. Calif. 1989). Action was brought challenging the plan for mandatory, random testing of all employees of the Federal Bureau of Prisons. The district court issued a preliminary injunction. On petition for reconsideration, the district court found that the plan for mandatory, random testing of all Bureau employees regardless of job function could not be justified. According to the court, the mandatory, random testing of all employees of the Federal Bureau of Prisons was not justified by objective evidence nor targeted at the employees' performance of specific job functions and thus was invalid. The court noted that the plan in question was not supported by objective evidence, as in Skinner v. Railway Labor Executives Ass'n, 109 S.Ct. 1402 (1989) (demonstrated causal link between drug use and past train accidents) nor targeted at employees who perform specific job functions justifying the high level of governmental intrusion, as in National Treasury Employees Union v. Von Raab, 109 S.Ct. 1384 (1989) (employees involved in interdiction of drugs or carrying firearms). (Pleasanton Federal Correctional Institution, California)

U.S. Appeals Court
TERMINATION SEARCH

Brennan v. Hendrigan, 888 F.2d 189 (1st Cir. 1989). A discharged correctional officer brought a civil rights action against correctional officials and state troopers involved in an investigation that led to his discharge. The U.S. District Court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment, and the officer appealed. The court of appeals affirmed the decision, finding that the officials and state troopers were entitled to qualified immunity with respect to the officer's fourth amendment claims, and the officer did not have a viable liberty interest claim. According to the court, officials acted reasonably in detaining the officer, searching him, and seizing the fruits of that search during the course of the investigation into allegations that the officer had engaged in illegal transactions with inmates. Troopers did not become involved in the investigation until the officer had been detained and searched and the fruits of that search seized, and thereafter merely asked the officer to sign a Miranda form, questioned him about transactions, and sent him home on request that he return to the state police barracks for further questioning on the following day. The public employer's failure to afford a name-clearing hearing for the discharged employee is cognizable under Section 1983 as a deprivation of liberty interest only if the discharge is grounded on charges which stigmatize the employee and only if the employer creates and disseminates a false and defamatory impression about the employee in connection with his discharge; moreover, the stigmatization must occur in the course of the discharge. (Middlesex County House of Correction, Billerica, Massachusetts)

U.S. Appeals Court
WORKING
CONDITIONS

de Jesus Benavides v. Santos, 883 F.2d 385 (5th Cir. 1989). Jail detention officers who were injured during the course of an attempted escape by jail inmates filed a federal civil rights action against the jail officials. The officers were unarmed and on duty when they were attacked. They claimed that the sheriff was aware of a persistent pattern of contraband smuggling in the jail, that the Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) had specifically warned the sheriff that a jailbreak was "imminent," and that the sheriff acted "callously and in utter disregard" for institutional security in failing to respond to these problems. They also complained that the commissioners and the judge had failed to provide sufficient funds to the jail to ensure its safe operation. The U.S. District Court dismissed the suit, and the plaintiffs appealed. The appeals court found that the local jail detention officers who were injured by jail inmates that were attempting to escape did not have a Section 1983 action against the government officials in charge of the jail for reckless or grossly negligent failure to prevent, adequately guard against, or protect those injured from an attempted escape and accompanying inmate violence, stating, "The issue presented is whether those who, in the course of their duties as local jail detention officers, are injured by jail inmates attempting to escape, have a second 1983 claim against the government officials in charge of the jail where the injury would not have occurred but for those officials' callous indifference or grossly negligent failure to prevent, or to adequately guard against, or to protect those injured from, the attempted escape and accompanying inmate violence." The claim fell squarely within traditional state tort law and did not give a rise to a constitutional claim. (Webb County Jail, Texas)

State Appeals Court
TERMINATION

Dept. of Corrections v. Local No. 246, 554 A.2d 319 (D.C. App. 1989). The Department of Corrections fired a correctional officer for off-duty misconduct. The officer filed a timely grievance pursuant to the collective bargaining agreement and a hearing was held before an arbitrator. The arbitrator ruled in favor of the officer. The Department sought review by the Public Employee Relations Board, but the PERB declined to review the arbitrator's decision. After the Department refused to reinstate the officer, the union brought action to enforce the arbitration award. The superior court granted the union's motion for summary judgment, and the Department appealed. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that the officer's off-duty conduct of agreeing to split the cost of a bag of heroin with a former inmate and assaulting the former inmate when the deal fell through and a subsequent misdemeanor conviction based on the assault did not entitle the Department to dismiss the officer. The officer could only be dismissed for "cause," and the officer's conduct was not one of the twenty-one types of "cause" listed in the act. The Department of Corrections' failure to give a correctional officer written notice of an insubordination charge before the arbitration hearing on the officer's dismissal violated the officer's statutory rights and at least arguably affected the officer's constitutional right to due process of law. (District of Columbia Jail)

U.S. Appeals Court
FREE SPEECH
TERMINATION

Frazier v. King, 873 F.2d 820 (5th Cir. 1989), cert. denied, 110 S.Ct. 502. After being stymied in her attempts to correct nursing practice violations first by her supervisor and later by the warden, the plaintiff contacted the Louisiana State Board of Nursing. She reported that inmates were being denied medical care and that nurses were changing doctors' orders, completing prescription forms and making medical diagnosis. In making her charges to the board, she forwarded copies of inmate records to them.

After learning of her actions, the warden called her into his office and accused her of making malicious, derogatory and slanderous statements. Shortly thereafter, she was fired on the grounds that she made malicious statements and that she had violated department rules when she had copied confidential inmate records without the inmates' consent. The nurse then brought a suit against numerous state officials under the federal civil rights statute for violations of her rights under the first and fourteenth amendments and under state law for claims of retaliatory discharge and infliction of emotional, physical, and mental injuries. The U.S. District Court entered judgment from which the defendants appealed. The appeals court found that the discharged nurse was not barred from bringing a federal civil rights suit seeking lost wages, compensatory and punitive damages and attorney's fees following the Louisiana Civil Service Commission determination that she was entitled to reinstatement with back pay, under federal law or Louisiana principles of res judicata. The nurse's speech involved a matter of public concern, disruption from the nurse's "whistle-blowing" was minimal interest when weighed against the exposure of unethical medical practices affecting hundreds of inmates, and the warden's warning that the nurse would lose her job if she filed a complaint with the State Board of Nursing was sufficient evidence that her speech motivated the decision to fire her. The court also found that the state officials were not shielded by an eleventh amendment grant of sovereign immunity or by qualified immunity. (Wade Correctional Center, Louisiana)

U.S. Appeals Court
DISCRIMINATION
SCHEDULE
DISCIPLINE

Jenkins v. State of La., Thru Dept. of Corrections, 874 F.2d 992 (5th Cir. 1989), cert. denied, 110 S.Ct. 871. A former correctional center employee brought an action against a former employer under Title VII for religious and racial discrimination. The U.S. District Court entered judgment for the former employer, and the former employee appealed. The appeals court affirmed the prior decision finding that the determination that the former employee was not disciplined for failing to comply with an employment requirement that conflicted with religious beliefs was not clearly erroneous, in the Title VII action wherein the employee claimed that he was disciplined for failing to work on Saturdays and wherein the employer claimed that the employee was disciplined for falsifying medical excuse slips. The court also found that the former employee failed to prove claims of racial discrimination and discriminatory discharge was not clearly erroneous. Under Title VII, an employer engages in unfair employment practice by discriminating against an employee because of the employee's religious practices or beliefs unless the employer cannot "reasonably accommodate" the employee's needs without "undue hardship" on the employer's business. An employer may not use the employee's conduct in other respects as pretext for discrimination prohibited by Title VII. "Constructive discharge" occurs, for Title VII purposes, when the employer deliberately makes the employee's working conditions so intolerable that the employee is forced into involuntary resignation. Although the black employee presented testimony that white employees were reprimanded rather than discharged for breaking various rules, including transferring a prisoner to the wrong dormitory, striking an inmate, and failing to deliver a prisoner to a designated area, the prison officials were not obliged to consider these infractions as serious as falsifying sickness reports, and the black employee provided no evidence that others had been guilty of falsifying medical excuses. (Hunt Correctional Center, St. Gabriel, Louisiana)

U.S. District Court
STAFFING LEVELS
WORKING CONDITIONS

Smith v. Dodrill, 718 F.Supp. 1293 (N.D. W.Va. 1989). Prison guards injured during a prison takeover riot brought a civil rights action against the Commissioner of West Virginia Department of Corrections. The Commissioner moved for dismissal of action. The district court granted the motion and found that the guards, who alleged that the Commissioner failed to provide adequate facilities and personnel to properly provide for their security, safety and care, failed to establish deprivation of a federal right, and therefore failed to state a cause of action under the federal civil rights statute against the Commissioner for injuries sustained during the riot. While the due process clause forbids the state itself from depriving individuals of life, liberty, and property without due process of law, its language cannot fairly be read to impose affirmative obligation on the state to ensure that those interests do not come to harm through other means. The guards were not in custody nor compelled to be guards, but instead enlisted for service. A West Virginia statute imposing a duty upon employers to maintain places of employment in reasonably safe condition did not create a contractual property interest for the employee which would allow the employee to bring a federal civil rights action against the employer for violation of that duty. (West Virginia State Penitentiary, Moundsville)

State Appeals Court
DISCRIMINATION
HARASSMENT
WORKING CONDITIONS

State v. Human Rights Com'n., 534 N.E.2d 161 (Ill.App. 4 Dist. 1989). The Illinois Human Rights Commission determined that a state employee had been subjected to sexual harassment by her immediate supervisor in the state corrections department and that she was discharged in retaliation for opposing his sexual harassment, and the employer appealed. The appellate court, affirming the decision, found that evidence supported a determination that the supervisor's use of gender specific sexual terms in reference to the employee and others constituted conduct of a sexual nature which was harassing. The evidence sustained a finding that the employee was discharged in retaliation for opposing sexual harassment. An award of lost benefits in addition to back pay was not an abuse of discretion. The supervisor's use of gender specific sexual terms in reference to the state employee, her daughter and other women constituted conduct of a sexual nature interfering with the employee's work performance which created an intimidating, hostile or offensive working environment in violation of sexual harassment provisions of the Human Rights Act, given the context in which comments were made, the nature and frequency of comments and the supervisor's failure to desist despite repeated requests from the employee to do so. The employee was ordered reinstated and awarded $81,465.27 in back pay, $23,131.50 for lost benefits, $2,160 for medical expenses and $18,068.75 for attorney fees. (Illinois Department of Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
HIRING/
QUALIFICATIONS
TERMINATION

Terry v. Cook, 866 F.2d 373 (11th Cir. 1989). County sheriff's department employees who were discharged from their positions upon the election of a new sheriff brought a civil rights action against the sheriff and the county. The U.S. District Court dismissed the claim, and appeal was taken. The appeals court, affirming in part, reversing in part and remanding, found that the sheriff had absolute authority to decline to reinstate those deputy sheriffs who did not support him in the election campaign, and the assertion by the clerks, investigators, dispatchers, jailers and process servers in the sheriff's office that the new sheriff replaced all the employees who had opposed his election stated a claim for the violation of the sheriff's department employees' civil rights. Under Alabama law, loyalty to an individual sheriff and goals and policies he seeks to implement through his office is an appropriate requirement for the effective performance of a deputy sheriff; thus, the sheriff had absolute authority without violating the first amendment to decline to reinstate the deputy sheriffs who did not support him in the election campaign. The court noted that public employment may not be conditioned upon requirements that violated constitutionally protected interests. But they held that a public employee's protection is not absolute. The court must balance "the interest of the employee, as a citizen, in commenting upon matters of public concern and the interest of the state, as the employer, in promoting the efficiency of the public services it performs through its employees." Because of the variety of situations in which critical statements may be the basis for discharge of a public employee, there is no general standard for determining in whose favor the balance is struck, said the court. (Lawrence Co., Ala.)

U.S. Appeals Court
BFOQ
HIRING
QUALIFICATIONS
SEX
DISCRIMINATION

U.S. v. Gregory, 871 F.2d 1239 (4th Cir. 1989), cert. denied, 110 S.Ct. 720. The government brought an action against a sheriff alleging discriminatory employment practices against women. The U.S. District Court dismissed. Appeal and cross appeal were taken. The appeals court, affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. On remand, the district court determined that the government failed to carry its burden of proof, and the government appealed. The court of appeals, reversing and remanding, found that the district court was clearly erroneous in refusing to consider the sheriff's admissions and the government's statistical evidence of discriminatory hiring practices regarding his policy of not hiring women for deputy positions in the Title VII action. After a full trial without a jury, the court dismissed the complaint, ruling that the deputy sheriff position in Patrick County are not covered under Title VII because they fall within the "personal staff" exemption. United States v. Gregory, 582 F.Supp. 1319 (W.D.Va. 1984). On remand, the court found that the positions of road deputy, investigator, and shift supervisor fell within the "personal staff" exemption, as originally concluded, and also found that with respect to the fourth deputy position, that of a corrections officer, maleness was a BFOQ. On appeal, the Fourth Circuit once again reversed, finding that the "personal exemption" did not apply and that the defendant had failed to prove that a female corrections officer could not be accommodated by reasonably rearranging job responsibilities within the jail. (Patrick County Jail, Virginia)

U.S. Appeals Court
FREE SPEECH

Zook v. Brown, 865 F.2d 887 (7th Cir. 1989). A deputy filed a suit alleging that his constitutional rights had been violated when he was disciplined for endorsing a particular ambulance service during a public debate over ambulance services in the county. The district court rendered a judgment for the defendants, and the deputy appealed. The appeals court, affirmed in part and remanded in part. On remand, the district court determined that one county sheriff's department standard was unconstitutionally applied, and the deputy and county appealed. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that the standard regarding advertisements by officers was constitutional on its face and as applied to the deputy; the standard regarding public speaking by officers on behalf of the department was unconstitutional as applied to the deputy; the county was liable in damages for the unconstitutional application of the standard; and the deputy was entitled to attorney fees. A county sheriff's department standard prohibiting officers from engaging in testimonials or advertisements without prior approval of the sheriff was not unconstitutional on its face; the officers' rights to speak on public issues was not commensurate with the speech rights enjoyed by the general public, the sheriff's department had a valid concern in maintaining impartiality, the standard did not totally preclude the officers from speaking on matters of public concern, and the standard was couched in terms sufficiently unambiguous to render discriminatory enforcement unlikely. (Champaign County Sheriff's Department, Illinois)

1990

State Supreme Court
TERMINATION

Allman v. Koehler, 554 N.Y.S.2d 842 (A.D. 1990). A city correction officer sought a review of his dismissal by the corrections commissioner. The State Supreme Court transferred the Article 78 proceeding. The Supreme Court, Appellate Division, affirming as modified, found that even though evidence supported a finding that the officer used excessive force against an inmate in going to the aid of a fellow officer who was struggling with the inmate, the dismissal was disproportionate to the offense and "shocking" to one's conscience." (New York Department of Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
TERMINATION
DUE PROCESS

Brewer v. Parkman, 918 F.2d 1336 (8th Cir. 1990). A terminated deputy sheriff brought a civil rights action alleging that he was terminated in violation of his due process and First Amendment rights. The U.S. District Court found that the deputy was terminated without a hearing in violation of his due process rights, ordered that a hearing be conducted and awarded the deputy back pay from the date of his termination. Appeal was taken. The court of appeals, affirming the decision, found that the deputy had a property interest in employment protected by the due process clause. It was also found that the deputy did not waive his right to a pretermination hearing as a letter was written by his attorney inquiring about a date for a hearing. The district court could award back pay as the award of back pay and/or granting a hearing to a deputy sheriff who was terminated in violation of due process, was equitable in nature; the court did not attempt to compensate the deputy for violation of his due process rights, but rather attempted to restore the deputy to the position in which he would have been absent a violation of his rights. (St. Francis County, Arkansas)

U.S. District Court
HIRING/
QUALIFICATIONS
RACIAL DISCRIMINATION

Cadwell v. NYC Dept. of Corr., 750 F.Supp. 140 (S.D.N.Y. 1990). A black male who was denied a position as a correction officer brought a Title VII action. The district court found that the black male had no Title VII claim. The majority of the people who received the position were minorities and the male produced no evidence that would demonstrate that he was treated less favorably than other candidates in circumstances from which a racially discriminatory motive could reasonably be inferred. (New York City Department of Correction)

U.S. District Court OFFICER ON PRISONER ASSAULT
USE OF FORCE DETENTION

Cawthon v. City of Greenville, 745 F.Supp. 377 (N.D. Miss. 1990). Plaintiffs brought a suit against a city under Section 1983, alleging their constitutional rights were violated pursuant to municipal policy when they were assaulted by a desk sergeant after they were brought to the station to be booked on various misdemeanor charges. On the defendant's motion for summary judgment, the U.S. District Court found that the city could not be held liable under Section 1983 for the desk sergeant's assault on the arrestees, based on the assertion that the city knew of the sergeant's alleged propensity for violence, yet failed to take sufficient steps to protect the public, absent evidence of deliberate indifference on the part of the city. Through the police chief, the city consistently implemented reasonable safeguards to respond to each new bit of information it received about the sergeant, and although the chief underestimated the sergeant's irascibility, his error did not rise to a level of deliberate indifference. The police chief's failure to deliver a more adequate reprimand to the desk sergeant on a prior occasion could not be construed as a conscious policy decision, custom or practice which could be the basis of municipal liability. It was also found that the failure of witnessing officers to intervene to prevent the desk sergeant's use of excessive force against arrestees, and the police chief's later failure to issue reprimands for that passivity did not establish a police department practice of abusing or tolerating excessive force against the general public, sufficient to constitute a municipal custom, for purposes of Section 1983 liability. Though the officers did not physically confront the desk sergeant, who was a superior officer, one officer shouted his disapproval of the desk sergeant's actions and several others immediately went to the radio room to summon the lieutenant. (Greenville Jail, Mississippi)

U.S. District Court
EQUAL PROTECTION
SEX
DISCRIMINATION

Csizmadia v. Fauver, 746 F.Supp. 483 (D. N.J. 1990). Male prisoners challenged a policy of allowing female guards to patrol housing units where they might see naked prisoners, and the guards challenged the prison policy of designating certain positions as "male only" or "female only." Upon consolidation of the actions, the federal district court found that the inmates had no clearly established privacy or free exercise right in not being viewed naked or in states of undress by opposite-sex corrections officers at the time they filed the Section 1983 action against corrections officers and officials, thus officials were entitled to qualified immunity against the inmates' claims for damages. It was also found that the corrections officers did not have a clearly established right to serve in all staff positions involving opposite-sex inmates at the time they filed the suit complaining of the corrections department's gender-based restrictions, and thus the department officials were entitled to qualified immunity against the officers' claims for damages. (New Jersey Department of Corrections)

State Supreme Court
DRUG TESTING

Department of Corrections v. Colbert, 391 S.E.2d 759 (Ga. 1990). A state prison fire chief whose employment was terminated when he tested positive for marijuana during a random drug test filed a petition for administrative review. Following administrative affirmance of the decision to terminate, the superior court entered a judgment determining that the drug testing policy was unconstitutionally overbroad in that it applied to every employee, and the Department of Corrections appealed. The State Supreme Court found that the state's interest in preventing illegal drug use by state prison employees outweighs the privacy rights of those employees, and thus a random drug testing policy applicable to all prison employees was not unconstitutionally overbroad. The very nature of a prison, the court said, coupled with "the pervasiveness of drugs in the criminal community" and a past history of staff members bringing in illegal drugs "demands strict regulation." (Georgia State Prison)

U.S. Appeals Court
DISCRIMINATION
PROMOTION
TERMINATION

Gilty v. Village of Oak Park, 919 F.2d 1247 (7th Cir. 1990). A black police officer who was not promoted to sergeant, and who was later discharged, brought a civil rights action against the village. The U.S. District Court granted the village's motion for summary judgment, and the officer appealed. The court of appeals, affirming the decision, found that in view of the fact that the officer misrepresented his academic credentials in seeking the promotion, the officer did not have a viable claim for disparate treatment or disparate impact in connection with the promotion decision or for the retaliatory discharge in connection with the discharge decision. (Village of Oak Park Police Department, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
DISCIPLINE
HARASSMENT

Hirschfeld v. New Mexico Corrections Dept., 916 F.2d 572 (10th Cir. 1990). A correctional department employee brought an action against the department alleging sexual harassment and constructive discharge. The U.S. District Court entered judgment for the defendants, and appeal was taken. The court of appeals found that the department was not liable for an officer's sexual harassment of the employee. The officer was not acting within the scope of his employment in his actions toward the typist, the department took remedial action upon learning of the officer's misconduct, and there was no evidence that the officer had any supervisory authority over the typist's position or that he invoked authority over subordinate guards in order to facilitate his harassment of the typist. In addition, it was found that the corrections department employee was not constructively discharged where a reasonable person would not have found the employee's situation so intolerable as to warrant immediate resignation. Although expert testimony linking the employee's depressed state to the harassment was uncontroverted, the court's determination that such evidence was not credible was not clearly erroneous. (Central New Mexico Correctional Facility)

U.S. Appeals Court
DEMOTION
LIBERTY INTEREST
PROBATION
SUSPENSION

Hopkins v. Stice, 916 F.2d 1029 (5th Cir. 1990). A demoted Texas Department of Corrections employee brought an action against the department and a supervisor, alleging that his suspension, demotion, and probation deprived him of a property interest in his position and that the release of related information to the news media deprived him of a liberty interest in his reputation. The U.S. District Court dismissed the claims against the department and supervisor in his official capacity, entered judgment on jury verdict for the employee, and set aside the nominal damages and future lost earnings awards. Cross appeals were taken. The court of appeals found that the employee failed to overcome the supervisor's qualified immunity defense on the property interest claim. Public officials are immune from liability unless their conduct violated clearly established constitutional or statutory norm, which question is not necessarily answered by certainty of legal rule. The official enjoys qualified immunity if a reasonable official would be left uncertain of the application of the standard to the facts confronting him. It was also found that the employee failed to show a causal connection between the supervisor's conduct and injury to the employee's liberty interest. The employee produced no evidence that the supervisor published or caused the publication of the information leading to the investigation of the employee, precluding recovery on the employee's Section 1983 claim that release of the information deprived him of a liberty interest in his reputation; the supervisor had no authority over the person who improperly released the employee's name and recommended disciplinary action to the news media, and there was no evidence that the supervisor had any role in denying the employee a name-clearing hearing. (Texas Department of Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
DRUG TESTING

Molinelli v. Tucker, 901 F.2d 13 (2nd Cir. 1990). A prison guard who was required to undergo urinalysis testing brought a civil rights action against prison officials. The U.S. District Court denied the officials' motion to dismiss on grounds of qualified immunity, and the officials appealed. The appeals court, reversing and remanding, found that law was not "clearly established" at the time of the 1986 urinalysis that the urine testing was a search under the fourth amendment, entitling the prison officials to qualified immunity. (Sing Sing Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
TERMINATION
SEX
DISCRIMINATION
WORKING CONDITIONS

Porras v. Montefiore Medical Center, 742 F.Supp. 120 (S.D.N.Y. 1990). A former unit chief for a mental health services hospital provided at a state prison filed an action against her former employer and supervisor. On the defendant's motion for summary judgment, the U.S. District Court found that the plaintiff failed to establish her disparate treatment and hostile work environment sex discrimination claims. There was no evidence indicating how her treatment differed from similarly situated males or that any managerial levels employees who had work records comparable to those of the plaintiff remained employed by the prison without being yelled at by her supervisor, and the plaintiff was replaced by a woman. (Montefiore-Rikers Island, New York)

U.S. District Court
SEARCHES

Scoby v. Neal, 734 F.Supp. 837 (C.D.Ill. 1990). Employees at the department of corrections brought an action seeking declaratory judgment and injunctive relief from a prison rule allowing the strip search of employees. The district court, granting the motion for summary judgment, found that the strip search rule contained no probable cause or reasonable suspicion requirement and, thus, violated the fourth amendment. An administrative directive which authorized body searches upon probable cause did not contain similar limiting language for strip searches. The state's alteration of an unconstitutional strip search policy for prison employees did not correct the defect of the lack of probable cause requirement, and, thus, the eleventh amendment did not prohibit declaratory relief. (Danville Correctional Center, Illinois)

State Appeals Court DRUG TESTING
PRIVACY

Seelig v. Koehler, 554 N.Y.S.2d 201 (A.D. 1 Dept. 1990). An Article 78 proceeding was brought seeking a judgment enjoining implementation of a corrections department directive authorizing additional mandatory random drug tests for probationary corrections officers. The petition was dismissed by the state supreme court, and appeal was taken. The supreme court, appellate division, affirming the decision, found that two additional random, unannounced, drug tests of all probationary correction officers were supported by substantial governmental interest and did not constitute unreasonable searches and seizures or a violation of the right of privacy, though samples were obtained under direct observation, in that the membership in a paramilitary force such as the Corrections Department diminishes the individual's privacy expectations and since, even with advance notice, over two percent of the probationers had tested positive for drug use in recent years. The court found no additional privacy interest implicated by the direct observation of officers, since they were already required to submit to other drug tests requiring a urine sample under direct supervision. (New York Corrections Department)

U.S. District Court
RACIAL DISCRIMINATION
SEX DISCRIMINATION

Sims v. Montgomery County Com'n., 766 F.Supp. 1052 (M.D. Ala. 1990). Two groups of officers in a county sheriff's department filed class action lawsuits alleging that the department illegally discriminated against them on the basis of their sex and race. The district court found that the sheriff's department policy permitting only female correctional officers to be assigned to the county jail wing where female inmates were housed violated Title VII and a consent decree. The policy severely restricted the employment opportunities for female officers by restricting their ability to gain experience in other aspects of jail management and by restricting their ability to work more desirable shifts, and was not justified by inmate privacy concerns, which could have been effectively resolved through nondiscriminatory measures like those used for male inmates, particularly in light of evidence indicating that the true motive behind the policy was a concern that male officers could not control themselves with female inmates. In addition, the policies and conduct of the county sheriff's department employees, including conduct of the sheriff and jail administrator, supported a finding that sexual harassment permeated all ranks of the department and was so pervasive and severe as to render working conditions in the department psychologically intolerable for female officers. It was also found that the African American employees established class claims that racial harassment in the sheriff's department had created a hostile working environment. The African American employees also established class claims that the county sheriff's department officials engaged in a pattern and practice of intentional discrimination on the basis of race. Evidence firmly established a pattern of practice of discrimination against black officers in the areas of discipline, promotions, transfers and job assignments, and there was evidence reflecting that racial bias was widespread and deep rooted and that it routinely affected the decisions of the many administrators and supervisors, including the sheriff and high level commanders in the enforcement division. The sheriff's department failed to establish an affirmative defense to liability for racial harassment claims due to the victims' failure to take advantage of available avenues for relief. Evidence reflected that the sheriff's department did not view provisions of the county employee handbook and personnel regulations prohibiting racial harassment as applying to the department, the department clearly did not have procedures calculated to encourage victims of harassment to come forward, most white officers in the department did not know what conduct constituted racial harassment in violation of law or perceive that conduct as a serious infraction, and the county administrator and personnel board did not have authority to resolve discrimination complaints by the sheriff's department employees. (Montgomery County Sheriff's Department, Alabama)

1991

U.S. District Court
HARASSMENT

Corrente v. State of R.I., Dept. of Corrections, 759 F.Supp. 73 (D.R.I. 1991). Correctional officers brought a civil rights action against the Governor of Rhode Island, the Director of the Department of Corrections, union officials and union members alleging that they were harassed and subjected to threats after reporting an assault on an inmate by fellow correctional officers and identifying the officers responsible for the assault. The defendants moved to dismiss. The U.S. District Court found that the correctional officers failed to state a Section 1983 cause of action against the Governor based on the alleged harassment as the correctional officers' assertion that the governor knew of and acquiesced in the harassment was purely conclusory and failed to state exactly what was reported to the governor and what he actually knew of the harassment. It was also found that the correctional officers failed to state a cause of action for civil rights conspiracy against union officials and members as the complaint did not contain any allegations that the defendants were motivated by the intent to deprive the victims of equal protection of the law or that the defendants conspired to injure the plaintiffs on account of their attendance or testimony in the court. The correctional officers did, however, state a Section 1983 cause of action against the Director of the Rhode Island Department of Corrections by alleging that the Director not only knew of the harassment of the correctional officers for their reporting the assault, but failed to act to cure the incidents of harassment when he had an obligation to do so. (Rhode Island Adult Correctional Institution)

U.S. District Court
DISCRIMINATION
TRANSFERS
RACIAL DISCRIMINATION

Fiorenzo v. Nolan, 755 F.Supp. 801 (N.D. Ill. 1991). White officers who were members of the sheriff's police department filed suit, claiming that their constitutional rights were violated by their lateral transfers. The sheriff and chief moved for summary judgment. The district court found that no evidence showed that the county sheriff had delegated to the chief of the sheriff's police department final, policy-making authority that would have permitted holding the county liable for alleged constitutional violations that occurred when the chief laterally transferred four white police officers who were replaced by black officers. There was also no evidence that the county sheriff's police department had a de facto policy of racial or political discrimination that would have permitted holding the chief of the department liable in his official capacity for the alleged constitutional violations as a single transfer decision involving only four officers could not amount to custom or usage. (Cook County Sheriff's Police Department, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
DRUG TESTING

Ford v. Dowd, 931 F.2d 1286 (8th Cir. 1991). A police officer brought a civil rights action against the police chief and the city, alleging the urinalysis to which he was required to submit was unreasonable. The U.S. District Court granted summary judgment for the defendants, and the officer appealed. The court of appeals found that the police chief could not require the officer to submit to drug testing based on an unsubstantiated rumor that the officer associated with drug dealers where there was no specific allegation that the officer used drugs. In the absence of uniform or systematic random selection of employees subject to drug testing, the government may enforce drug testing of public employees where the employees are chosen only on the basis of a reasonable suspicion. (Pagedale Police Department, Missouri)

U.S. District Court
DEMOTION
RACIAL DISCRIMINATION
TERMINATION

Hicks v. St. Mary's Honor Center, 756 F.Supp. 1244 (E.D. Mo. 1991), reversed, 970 F.2d 470, affirmed, 113 S.Ct. 954. A former prison guard shift supervisor sued the prison and former superintendent, alleging Title VII and Section 1983 violations. The district court found that Title VII was not violated through the demotion and subsequent termination of the supervisor as prison officials set forth legitimate, nondiscriminatory reasons including the fact that unsupervised employees had abandoned their posts under his supervision, and there was a record of numerous violations of prison regulations within a short period of time. The appeals court reversed the lower court, finding that the black employee met his burden of showing that the reasons given for his demotion and discharge were mere pretexts for discrimination. (St. Mary's Honor Center, Missouri Department of Corrections and Human Resources)

U.S. District Court
SEIZURE WITHHOLDING CORRESPONDENCE

Knight v. Lombardi, 952 F.2d 177 (8th Cir. 1991). A state inmate brought a suit against corrections officials for violation of his First and Fourteenth Amendment rights in connection with seizure of certain mail addressed to him. The U.S. District Court dismissed the suit, and the inmate appealed. The court of appeals, affirming the lower court decision, found that investigative and security interests justified interception of the inmate's mail from a particular addressor as part of an investigation into the possibility that the inmate was having an affair with a female prison guard, and the interception did not violate the inmate's First Amendment rights. The guard would be violating prison rules by having an affair with and corresponding with the inmate, and the prison authorities were concerned that the guard might use her knowledge of prison security to help the inmate escape. It was also found that the inmate did not state a viable procedural due process claim in connection with an allegation regarding the lack of notice of seizure of certain mail addressed to him, even though he alleged that notice was required by internal prison regulations. Although the failure to promptly notify the inmate of the seizure was arguably in violation of procedural due process, there was no allegation or evidence of injury flowing from that violation, and undisputed facts showed that the inmate failed to avail himself of available prison procedures to review the propriety of withholding the mail. (Missouri State Penitentiary)

U.S. District Court
SEARCHES

Profitt v. District of Columbia, 790 F.Supp. 304 (D. D.C. 1991). A jail guard brought a Section 1983 action against the District of Columbia, claiming damages arising out of a strip search and visual bodily cavity search performed by prison officials to determine whether she was smuggling drugs into the jail. The U.S. District Court found that the search was reasonable; an anonymous telephone call had provided officials with the guard's name, place of employment, shift she would work that night and a specific quantity of cocaine she would be transporting. In any event the officials performing the search had qualified immunity as it was not clearly established at the time of the searches that reasonable suspicion was necessary. The guard did not state a cause of action for common-law claims of intentional infliction of emotional distress, assault and battery, or false imprisonment. The legal authority which the jail officials had to conduct the search was a valid defense, and the searches were conducted reasonably and in accordance with applicable regulations and could not be characterized as wanton, outrageous in the extreme, or calculated to cause serious mental distress. (Dist. of Columbia Dept. of Corr.)

U.S. Appeals Court
DUE PROCESS
TERMINATION
SEX
DISCRIMINATION

Reed v. Shepard, 939 F.2d 484 (7th Cir. 1991). A discharged female civilian jailer brought an action against the sheriff and sheriff's department alleging a violation of Section 1983 and Title VII. The U.S. District Court directed the verdict for the defendants, and the discharged jailer appealed. The court of appeals found that the jailer's termination from the sheriff's department without notice and a hearing did not violate her right to due process under the Fourteenth Amendment. The jailer was an at-will employee and neither the fact that she was issued and wore a uniform of a sheriff's deputy or received the county sheriff's rules and regulations manual made her a deputy entitled to notice and a hearing before termination. The court also found that the discharge of the jailer was not improperly based on sex; the testimony of other civilian jailers showed that "disparate treatment" of which the female complained was based upon a person's position with the sheriff's department (civilian jailer versus deputy sheriff) as opposed to sex. (Vanderburgh County Sheriff's Department)

U.S. Appeals Court
TERMINATION

Upton v. Thompson, 930 F.2d 1209 (7th Cir. 1991), cert. denied, 112 S.Ct. 1262. In separate cases, former deputy sheriffs sued sheriffs, claiming that their discharges were impermissibly motivated by their political party affiliations, thus infringing on their First Amendment rights. Two U.S. District Courts denied summary judgments to the sheriffs on grounds of qualified immunity, and the sheriffs appealed. After consolidation, the court of appeals found that the sheriffs were entitled to qualified immunity, since it was not clearly established at the time of the firings that the deputies were protected from patronage firings under prevailing doctrines. (Kankakee Co. and Carroll Co., Illinois)

U.S. District Court
HIRING/
QUALIFICATIONS
RACIAL DISCRIMINATION

Washington v. Lake County, Ill., 762 F.Supp. 199 (N.D. Ill. 1991). A former sheriff's department jailer brought an action against the county, the department, and his superior in his individual capacity alleging a racially discriminatory discharge. On the defendant's motion for summary judgment, the U.S. District Court found that the jailer was not entitled to relief under Title VII on his claim, where the employer, following discharge, discovered that the jailer had misrepresented his criminal record on his employment application. The jailer's subjective intent in filling out his application form did not detract from an undisputed fact that an answer he gave to a conviction question was objectively false, and it strained credulity to believe that knowledge of his prior convictions would not have affected the hiring decision. (Lake County Sheriff's Department, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
DISCRIMINATION
PROMOTION

Wilson v. Bailey, 934 F.2d 301 (11th Cir. 1991). White male deputy sheriffs who were denied promotions brought a reverse discrimination action. The U.S. District Court entered judgment for the defendants and the plaintiffs appealed. The court of appeals, affirming the decision, found that it was not illegitimate for the sheriff to consider race or gender in making promotions from a certified list of eligible candidates where race and gender were not dispositive factors and the decision to promote was made pursuant to an affirmative action plan. (Jefferson County Sheriff's Department, Alabama)

U.S. District Court
TERMINATION

Zicarelli v. Leake, 767 F.Supp. 1450 (N.D. Ill. 1991). A prison guard brought a civil rights action alleging violations of his First Amendment rights after he was fired for testifying on behalf of the defense in an Illinois death penalty hearing. The district court found that the prison guard's testimony at the death penalty hearing was a matter of public concern, and the Department of Corrections failed to show any disruption or impairment of functioning of its officer that outweighed the prison guard's First Amendment right to testify. Furthermore, even if the guard had violated a department policy, the department did not show any relationship between the guard's action and the purpose of the policy prohibiting testimony at trials involving inmates. (Cook County Department of Corrections)

1992

U.S. District Court
DRUG TESTING

American Fed. of Gov. Employees v. Barr, 794 F.Supp. 1466 (N.D. Cal. 1992). A union brought an action to enjoin an allegedly unconstitutional drug testing program for Federal Bureau of Prisons employees. On the defendants' motion for summary judgment, the district court found that the Bureau could conduct a random urinalysis only of employees in primary law enforcement positions with access to firearms, licensed physicians and dentists with regular patient contact, and employees in primary law enforcement positions in regular direct contact with inmates. According to the court, the Bureau may constitutionally test those employees in primary law enforcement positions who apparently cause accidents or engage in hazardous practices involving personal injury that requires prompt medical treatment or resulting in more than $2,000 in damages. However, the testing following any accident involving personal injury regardless of extent would leave too much discretion to local officials. In addition, the standard allowing testing where the same employee has had more than one accident or unsafe practice during any twelve month period was incurably vague. Reasonable suspicion of off-duty drug use or impairment could serve as grounds for testing only of the same employees as are subject to random testing; other employees could be tested on reasonable suspicion of on-duty drug use or impairment. (The United States Department of Justice for Employees of the Federal Bureau of Prisons)

U.S. Appeals Court
TRAINING
HIRING/
QUALIFICATIONS

Benavides v. County of Wilson, 955 F.2d 968 (5th Cir. 1992). A former jail inmate and his spouse sued the county and the sheriff, seeking compensation for injuries sustained while the inmate was in the county jail. The U.S. District Court entered judgment for the sheriff and the county, and appeal was taken. The court of appeals, affirming the decision, found that the county jail inmate who was injured in a fall in his cell and was subsequently allowed to lie paralyzed for 18 hours without medical assistance being summoned, did not establish that the county and the sheriff had adopted a policy of improperly training jail personnel. The county and the sheriff had established compliance with state requirements for jailer personnel and the inmate had not shown, beyond conclusory statements of an alleged expert, that the standards were inadequate. It was also found that the inmate did not establish a triable case that the sheriff and county had established a deliberately indifferent policy of screening employees, even though two of his jailers had been treated for suicidal depression and alcoholism; the sheriff had been furnished with letters from their doctors indicating their fitness to return to work, and they had satisfactory work records. The spouse of the inmate did not have action under Texas law for intentional infliction of emotional harm; it was necessary to establish direct emotional shock from seeing the husband in a paralyzed state, without prior warning, and the wife had been told what happened by authorities prior to first seeing her husband. (Wilson County Jail, Texas)

U.S. District Court
TERMINATION

Blair v. Graham Correctional Center, 782 F.Supp. 411 (C.D. Ill. 1992), affirmed, 4 F.3d 996. A prison employee brought an action under Title VII alleging that his employer and his union had discriminated against him on the basis of his religion which required him not to work from Friday sundown to Saturday sundown, when he was discharged for excessive absenteeism after refusing to work on Saturdays. According to the court, the prison's attempts to work with the prison workers' union and other agencies to have the employee reassigned was a reasonable attempt to accommodate the employee's religious beliefs, and neither the employer nor union were liable under Title VII for failing to give the employee a schedule which would accommodate his religious beliefs when, under terms of the collective bargaining agreement, the employee was not entitled to such a schedule. (Graham Correctional Center, Hillsboro, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
ASSIGNMENT
EQUAL PROTECTION

Canedy v. Boardman, 801 F.Supp. 254 (W.D. Wis. 1992), reversed, 16 F.3d 183. A male prison inmate brought a Section 1983 civil rights suit alleging that a female prison guard's participation in a strip search and daily observations of male inmates violated the inmate's Fourth Amendment right to personal privacy. The district court found that the female prison guard's observation of male inmates during a strip search and in various stages of undress did not violate the male inmates' right of personal privacy. The institution had a responsibility to maintain security and to accommodate the rights of female employees to equal employment opportunities. The appeals court reversed the decision and ruled that the inmate was entitled to a reasonable accommodation to prevent unnecessary observations of his naked body by female guards. (Columbia Correctional Institution, Portage, Wisconsin)

U.S. District Court
FREE SPEECH
PROPERTY INTEREST
TERMINATION

Heideman v. Wirsing, 840 F.Supp. 1285 (W.D. Wis. 1992). A former deputy sheriff brought a civil rights action against a sheriff and county arising from his termination, alleging that he was fired in violation of his First Amendment right to express his political views, and alleging claims under Wisconsin law. The defendants moved for summary judgment and a dismissal of the claims. The district court found that the deputy sheriff did not have a Section 1983 First Amendment claim against the sheriff. However, a fact issue as to whether the deputy sheriff had a right under the employment agreement not to be fired for his political views so as to give him a property interest in his employment precluded summary judgment for the county on the due process claim. The former deputy sheriff also stated a cause of action under Wisconsin law against the county for breach of contract arising from the termination of his employment. The deputy sheriff alleged that he had a right under the employment agreement not to be fired for his political views. (Prince County, Wisconsin)

U.S. Appeals Court
ASSIGNMENT
FAILURE TO PROTECT PROTECTION FROM HARM

L.W. v. Grubbs, 974 F.2d 119 (9th Cir. 1992). A registered nurse at a medium security custodial institution for young male offenders brought a Section 1983 action against her supervisors arising out of a situation in which she was raped and terrorized by an inmate. The U.S. District Court dismissed the action, and the nurse appealed. The appeals court, reversing and remanding, found that the nurse could maintain a Section 1983 claim against her supervisors on the basis that they created a dangerous situation. The supervisors assigned the nurse to work with the inmate despite knowing of his history of violence against women, that he was likely to assault a female if left alone with her, and that the nurse would be alone with the inmate. (Oregon)

U.S. District Court BACK PAY
SEX
DISCRIMINATION

Schaefer v. Tannian, 793 F.Supp. 146 (E.D. Mich. 1992). Female officers and applicants found to be victims of a police department's adjudicated discrimination in hiring, assignment, promotion and compensation moved for an award of back pay. The district court found that the female officers and applicants were entitled to an award of back pay, despite the department's asserted good faith, previously awarded relief including retroactive seniority, passage of time from the initial complaint and the alleged resulting difficulty in calculating a back pay award, and alleged adverse effects to officers who might be laid off and to taxpayers. The court ruled that the back pay award was necessary to make plaintiffs whole. (Detroit Police Department, Michigan)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEARCHES

Scoby v. Neal, 981 F.2d 286 (7th Cir. 1992). Correctional officers brought an action seeking declaratory judgment and injunctive relief from a prison rule allowing strip searches of employees. The U.S. District Court granted summary judgment for the defendants as to damages on qualified immunity grounds, and later issued another order, purportedly granting injunctive and declaratory relief finding the strip search rule which contained no probable cause or reasonable suspicion requirement to be unconstitutional. The prison officials appealed and the plaintiffs cross-appealed. On remand, the district court found that injunctive relief had become moot and that the defendants were entitled to qualified immunity as to liability for damages, and the officers appealed. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that the supervisory officers of the corrections center were entitled to qualified immunity as to claims by correction officers that their Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment rights were violated when they were subjected to strip searches, conducted in an effort to suppress narcotics being smuggled into prison. There was no clearly established right for correctional officers to be free of warrantless body cavity searches as of March 1987, when the incidents occurred. (Danville Correctional Center, Danville, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
DEMOTION
FREE SPEECH

Stough v. Gallagher, 967 F.2d 1523 (11th Cir. 1992). A deputy sheriff brought a civil rights action against a sheriff following his demotion. The U.S. District Court denied the sheriff's motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity, and the sheriff appealed. The court of appeals, affirming in part and reversing in part, found that the sheriff's demotion of a deputy for having campaigned for the sheriff's opponent violated clearly established First Amendment law in 1988, so that the sheriff was not entitled to qualified immunity. However, deputy sheriffs are not employees and both their selection and retention is under the absolute control of the sheriff under Florida law, so that deputy sheriffs have no property interest in their positions or any particular rank. (Orange County Sheriff's Office, Florida)

U.S. Appeals Court
RACIAL DISCRIMINATION
TERMINATION

Washington v. Lake County, Ill., 969 F.2d 250 (7th Cir. 1992). An African-American county employee who was fired brought an action against the county, the sheriff's department, and his superior alleging racially discriminatory discharge. The U.S. District Court granted summary judgment for the defendants, and the discharged employee appealed. The court of appeals, affirming the decision, found that the employee, who had lied about prior convictions on his employment application and was later fired before the lie had been discovered, could not recover under Title VII. The county produced evidence showing that knowledge of the employee's convictions would have led to his immediate discharge and the employee produced no affirmative evidence that he would not have been fired if treated in a race-neutral fashion. (Lake County Sheriff's Department, Illinois)

1993

U.S. Appeals Court FAIR LABOR STANDARDS ACT GRIEVANCE

Albright v. U.S., 10 F.3d 790 (Fed. Cir. 1993). Federal prison guards sued to recover overtime pay under the Fair Labor Standards Act (FLSA) and overtime, night differential, Sunday premium, and holiday pay under the Federal Employees Pay Act (FEPA). The Claims Court granted in part and denied in part the government's motion to dismiss for lack of subject matter jurisdiction, and the guards appealed. The appeals court found that the provisions of the Civil Service Reform Act (CSRA) which mandated that, in absence of a specific exclusion, contractual grievance procedures would be the exclusive means of settling employee grievances, applied retroactively to government employees whose claims accrued, but were not administratively pending, before the CSRA's effective date. (Federal Bureau of Prisons)

U.S. District Court
ATTORNEY
PROPERTY INTEREST

Hall v. California Dept. of Corrections, 835 F.Supp. 522 (N.D.Cal. 1993). A correctional officer whose request for legal representation in a civil action against him by a prison inmate had been denied brought a Section 1983 action against the Department of Corrections and officials, and the defendants moved to dismiss. The district court found that the officer had a constitutionally protected property interest in legal representation in a civil suit based on an act occurring within the scope of the employee's duties. However, procedural due process did not require a predeprivation hearing before the public employee was denied the constitutionally protected property interest resulting from a statutory right to legal representation. Postdeprivation procedures that allowed state employees to seek full compensation for property loss suffered provided sufficient due process to adequately protect employees' constitutional interests. (Correctional Training Facility, Soledad, California)

U.S. Appeals Court
PROMOTION
RACIAL DISCRIMINATION

Hayes v. North State Law Enforcement Officers Ass'n., 10 F.3d 207 (4th Cir. 1993). Nonminority police officers sued a city contending that its race-based promotion policy for police sergeants violated the equal protection clause. The U.S. District Court granted partial summary judgment for the police officers after concluding that the department's promotion practices violated the equal protection clause, and enjoined the city from using race-based criterion for its employment decisions. The city appealed. The appeals court, affirming in part, vacating in part, and remanding, found that the opinion of the chief of police that effective law enforcement required racial diversity justifying a race-based promotion policy was not, alone, sufficient to support promotion of police sergeants based on race. In addition, reports prepared in response to the urban riots in the city of Detroit in the 1960's were not sufficient to support the city's claim about the need for diversity in effective law enforcement. It was also found that the city's race-based promotion policy was not narrowly tailored to accomplish the asserted purpose of achieving effective law enforcement through diversity. However, an injunction issued by the district court enjoining all use of racially-based criteria by the city in its employment decisions was broader than necessary to give police officers who were denied a promotion because they were nonminority officers complete relief. The district court was required to issue an injunction properly tailored to only the wrong found in the case, which was the use of racial preferences as criteria for promotions to the rank of police sergeant. (Charlotte Police Department, North Carolina)

U.S. Appeals Court
EQUAL OPPORTUNITY

Jordan v. Gardner, 986 F.2d 1521 (9th Cir. 1993). Female inmates brought an action challenging the constitutionality of prison regulations permitting cross-gender clothed body searches. After granting rehearing en banc, the court of appeals found that the prison policy requiring male guards to conduct random, nonemergency, suspicionless clothed body searches of female prisoners was cruel and unusual punishment that violated the Eighth Amendment. It was noted that the policy inflicted "pain" for Eighth Amendment purposes, where many female inmates had been sexually abused prior to their incarceration, so that unwanted intimate touching by men was likely to cause psychological trauma. In addition, the cross-gender clothed body searches were "unnecessary" for Eighth Amendment purposes, where prison security was not dependent upon such searches, and the searches did not ensure equal employment opportunities for male guards. The determination that the searches violated the inmates' Eighth Amendment rights warranted a permanent injunction that prohibited nonemergency, suspicionless clothed body searches by male guards. (Washington Corrections Center for Women)

U.S. Appeals Court
RACIAL DISCRIMINATION
TERMINATION

Smith v. Arkansas Dept. of Correction, 995 F.2d 869 (8th Cir. 1993). A black prison guard brought a Title VII action against his former employer following his discharge. The U.S. District Court entered summary judgment in favor of the employer, and the guard appealed. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that evidence was insufficient to establish that the discharge of the guard was racially motivated. Evidence showed that the guard was discharged on grounds that he had falsified written information and physically and verbally abused an inmate. (Arkansas Department of Correction)

U.S. District Court
SEX
DISCRIMINATION
HARASSMENT

Stafford v. State, 835 F.Supp. 1136 (W.D.Mo. 1993). A corrections officer brought an action against the State of Missouri and employees of the Missouri Department of Corrections, claiming sex discrimination and sexual harassment. After a jury returned a verdict for the corrections officer on Section 1983 claims against two supervisors, various motions were filed. The district court found that one supervisor was entitled to judgment as matter of law, and that evidence supported the finding that another supervisor engaged in sexual harassment of the corrections officer. The supervisor made the corrections officer's working conditions intolerable on the two days a week they worked together, thereby creating a sexually hostile atmosphere in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. The court also found that evidence did not support a finding that the corrections officer was constructively discharged by the supervisor's sexual harassment. The supervisor's conduct was sporadic and, at most, distasteful. The corrections officer and supervisor ceased working together several months before the corrections officer's resignation, and the corrections officer testified that she was not subjected to any harassment or discrimination at her new position. The court found that the state was liable under Title VII for sexual harassment committed by the supervisor. (Missouri Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
PRIVACY
SUPERVISION

Thompson v. City of Arlington, Tex., 838 F.Supp. 1137 (N.D. Tex. 1993). A police officer sued a city police department and individual employees of the city alleging that their requirement that she disclose mental health records violated her civil rights. The city required her to disclose records as they were created in her treatment, following a suicide attempt, as a condition for considering her for reinstatement to full duty. The defendants moved to dismiss. The district court found that the privacy interests of the police officer in her mental health records were outweighed by the public interest of the city police department in having full information in their hands as to whether the officer was mentally capable of performing her job. The scope of information sought by the city police department was not constitutionally too great. The court found that the individual defendants were protected by the doctrine of qualified immunity; however, the allegations stated a claim against the city under Title VII and the Texas Commission on Human Rights Act. (Arlington Police Department, Arlington, Texas)

U.S. District Court
HARASSMENT
RACIAL DISCRIMINATION
RETALIATION
SEX
DISCRIMINATION

Anthony v. County of Sacramento Sheriff's Dept., 845 F.Supp. 1396 (E.D. Cal. 1994). A black female deputy sheriff brought a Section 1983 action against a county, county sheriff's department, supervisors, co-workers, and a civilian jail employee, alleging sexual and racial harassment and retaliation for her defense of black inmate rights. The defendants moved to dismiss. The district court found the deputy sheriff sufficiently alleged an action under color of law as required to state a cause of action under Section 1983 arising from retaliation for her defense of black inmate rights. The job of a deputy sheriff includes the responsibility for the well-being of inmates. The defendants allegedly abused the position and responsibility given to them by the state in retaliating for a speech protesting the improper treatment of the inmates. In addition, the deputy sheriff sufficiently alleged an action under color of law as required to state a cause of action under Section 1983 arising from racial and sexual harassment by the defendants. The complaint depicted the work environment made racially and sexually hostile by related attacks on the plaintiff personally, on the abilities of black law enforcement personnel generally, and on black inmates. The alleged pattern of harassment directly involved discriminatory assertion of law enforcement authority. (Sacramento County Sheriff's Department, California)

U.S. District Court
DISCRIMINATION
DUE PROCESS
TERMINATION

Baum v. Webb, 863 F.Supp. 918 (E.D. Ark. 1994). Employees of a sheriff's office who were terminated after the newly elected sheriff took office brought action against the sheriff alleging that their First Amendment rights had been violated. The district court found that the sheriff could not consider political activities of employees in making employment decisions notwithstanding the fact that the employees were hired by the former sheriff whose term expired on the day before the sheriff took office. In addition, the employees who alleged only that the termination violated the employee handbook did not state a claim for which relief could be granted under the federal civil rights statute. The court found that the sheriff met the burden of establishing that the employees in the criminal investigation division and the patrol division would have been terminated even had procedural due process been observed. However, the sheriff impermissibly considered the political activity of a jail matron as the motivating factor in the decision to terminate her. As a result, the matron's First Amendment rights were violated. (Independence County Sheriff's Office, Arkansas)

U.S. Appeals Court
DISCRIMINATION
SCHEDULE
TERMINATION

Beadle v. Hillsborough County Sheriff's Dept., 29 F.3d 589 (11th Cir. 1994). A former employee of a county jail brought a suit against the sheriff's department, contending that the department violated Title VII by failing to accommodate his Seventh Day Adventist religious belief which precluded his working from sundown Friday to sundown Saturday, and by ultimately discharging him because of his refusal to work during that period. The U.S. District Court entered judgment in favor of the sheriff's department and the plaintiff appealed. The court of appeals, affirming the decision, found that the department's neutral rotating shift system and its authorization of shift swaps within the system represented reasonable accommodation to the plaintiff's religious beliefs, and his discharge from employment for refusing to work on his Sabbath did not violate Title VII. (Hillsborough Co. Sheriff's Dept., FL)

U.S. District Court
FREE SPEECH
TERMINATION

Cooper v. Smith, 855 F.Supp. 1276 (S.D. Ga. 1994). A former deputy sheriff brought an action against a sheriff, claiming that the sheriff's decision not to renew the deputy's commission was motivated by the deputy's criticism of the sheriff. On the sheriff's motion for summary judgment, the district court found that the deputy's conversations with the State Bureau of Investigation and portions of his letter to the acting chief deputy of the sheriff's department were related to matters of public concern. The court found that the deputy's First Amendment interests in speech concerning alleged corruption in the sheriff's department outweighed the interest of the state. However, the deputy failed to state an equal protection claim where the deputy had not proven that any other employees were similarly situated to him. (Camden County Sheriff Department, Georgia)

U.S. Appeals Court
DISCRIMINATION
FREE SPEECH
TERMINATION

Garcia v. Reeves County, Tex., 32 F.3d 200 (5th Cir. 1994). Former employees of a sheriff's office sued the newly elected sheriff under Section 1983 alleging that their terminations violated due process and the First Amendment. On the sheriff's motion for summary judgment, the U.S. District Court denied the motion and the sheriff appealed. The appeals court found that under Texas law, the county commissioners court had no authority to modify the sheriff's department employees' at-will status by adopting a county personnel manual requiring just cause for discharge, and thus, the manual did not give terminated employees a cognizable property interest in continued employment that would serve to deprive the sheriff of qualified immunity in the action. Also, proof of a hotly contested political race and subsequent firings of the sheriff's office employees did not establish that the employees were fired because of their political affiliation in violation of the First Amendment. However, the court found that a genuine issue of material fact as to whether one employee of the sheriff's office was fired due to her political affiliation precluded summary judgment in favor of the sheriff. (Reeves Co. Sheriff's Office, Texas)

U.S. District Court DRUG TESTING
PRIVACY

Hansen v. California Dept. of Corrections, 868 F.Supp. 271 (N.D. Cal. 1994). An employee of the California Department of Corrections brought a suit seeking a temporary restraining order to prevent a member of the staff from observing her as she produced a urine sample pursuant to an agreed upon drug test. The district court found that the department could not require that visual observation take place, absent a showing of a specific reason to fear that the employee would tamper with the sample. The court noted that visual observation of an employee undergoing a urine test is only appropriate when deemed to be necessary in order to ensure reliability of a sample. (California Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
FREE SPEECH AND ASSOCIATION
EQUAL PROTECTION
TERMINATION
RETALIATION
PROPERTY INTEREST
DISCRIMINATION

Hughes v. Bedsole, 913 F.Supp. 420 (E.D.N.C. 1994). A former shift supervisor at a county jail filed suit against the county sheriff's department and others following her termination, alleging sex discrimination, violation of her free speech rights, and other claims. The court ruled that the plaintiff's termination was not in retaliation for her exercise of free speech that occurred when she allegedly complained to the county chaplain and sheriff about understaffing at the jail. The court found that her complaints did not involve matters of public concern, but rather that she was "simply grouching" about the conditions of her own employment. The plaintiff alleged a male staff member was not terminated for a similar incident (allowing jail doors to be unlocked); the court found that evidence failed to establish with certainty that the male employee was responsible for the unlocked doors, and that an equal protection violation did not occur. The court found that the sheriff's failure to demote the shift supervisor to road patrol, rather than terminating her, did not constitute handicap discrimination in violation of the Federal Vocational Rehabilitation Act because the employee alleged she was capable of performing both duties. The court also found the supervisor did not have a property interest in her job sufficient to support a due process claim, and that the supervisor was not subjected to sex discrimination. (Cumberland County, North Carolina)

U.S. Appeals Court
DEMOTION
FREE SPEECH
TERMINATION

Kolman v. Sheahan, 31 F.3d 429 (7th Cir. 1994). Employees of a county sheriff's department brought an action against the sheriff, alleging they were demoted or terminated because of their political affiliation. The U.S. District Court granted the sheriff's motion to dismiss and for summary judgment, and the employees appealed. The appeals court found that the allegations of the sheriff's department employees that they were terminated or demoted from positions in the department's electronic monitoring unit when the sheriff who belonged to a different political party was elected, were sufficient to state a First Amendment political patronage claim. However, a state statute prohibiting termination or demotion of deputy sheriffs without a hearing before the county merit board did not apply to the employees. (Cook County Sheriff's Department, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
FREE SPEECH
PROBATION
TERMINATION

Lawrenz v. James, 852 F.Supp. 986 (M.D.Fla. 1994), affirmed, 46 F.3d 70. A discharged correctional officer brought a civil rights action against a superintendent of a correctional facility and the Secretary of the State Department of Corrections for violating his First Amendment rights of free speech and association. On the defendants' motion for summary judgment, the district court found that the superintendent of the correctional facility was entitled to qualified immunity for his decision to terminate the probationary correctional officer for wearing a "White Power" t-shirt with a swastika and firing a rifle in the air at an outdoor barbecue on Martin Luther King Day. The superintendent was acting within the scope of his discretionary authority when he made the decision to terminate the officer, and there was no clearly established law that the superintendent violated in terminating the officer. In addition, the correctional officer's wearing of the t-shirt and discussing with his peers his perception of racial discrimination at the correctional facility were not matters of public concern, entitled to First Amendment protection. His beliefs relating to the swastika and the strength of white people were purely matters of personal interest, and his speech was never publicly aired. The incident received media attention only after the officer was arrested for firing the rifle. The court also found that the superintendent's interest in the effective operation of the correctional facility superseded the officer's First Amendment interests. (Charlotte Correction Institution, Florida)

U.S. Appeals Court
DEMOTION
FREE SPEECH

Mitchell v. Thompson, 18 F.3d 425 (7th Cir. 1994) U.S. cert. denied 115 S.Ct. 191. A demoted deputy brought an action against a county sheriff and the sheriff's chief deputy, alleging that he was demoted for refusing to support the sheriff's bid for reelection, in violation of various constitutional and statutory guarantees. The U.S. District Court denied the defendants' motion to dismiss, and the defendants appealed. The appeals court, reversing and remanding with instructions, found that the defendants were entitled to qualified immunity from the deputy's claims. At the time of the deputy's demotion, law was not clearly established as to whether a sheriff could demote a deputy for political purposes. (Kankakee County, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
DISCRIMINATION
TERMINATION

Moyo v. Gomez, 40 F.3d 982 (9th Cir. 1994), cert. denied, 115 S.Ct. 732. A black prison guard sued the Department of Corrections under Title VII alleging that he was fired for protesting against and refusing to cooperate with discrimination against black inmates. The U.S. District Court dismissed the action for failure to state a claim and the guard appealed. The appeals court, reversing and remanding, found that the prison guard could have stated a retaliation claim if he could show that he was discharged for refusing to discriminate against black inmates. In addition, the prison guard could have stated a retaliation claim if he could show that he was discharged for acting on the reasonable belief that a violation of Title VII had occurred. The prison guard should have been allowed to amend his Title VII complaint to state a claim for discrimination with regard to the terms and conditions of his employment. (California Medical Facility)

U.S. Appeals Court
SCHEDULE

Rumsey v. N.Y. State Dept. of Corr. Services, 19 F.3d 83 (2nd Cir. 1994) U.S. cert. denied 115 S.Ct. 202. Correctional employees brought an action against the New York State Department of Correctional Services challenging rescheduling of employees' pass days to coincide with their military reservist obligations. The U.S. District Court entered judgment in favor of the employees and awarded damages. On cross appeals, the court of appeals affirmed in part, reversed in part and remanded. The appeals court found that the alteration of pass days to correspond with military reservist obligations violated the seniority provisions of the collective bargaining agreement. However, the alteration of pass days did not deprive the employees of "incident or advantage of employment," in violation of the Veterans' Reemployment Rights Act. The employees were not entitled to recover pay for days on which they used accrued personal leave or sick time rather than notifying the Department of their military duties. In addition, even if employees had stated a substantial equal protection claim, which they did not, enforcement provisions of the Veterans' Reemployment Rights Act supplanted any Section 1983 claim, precluding an award of attorney fees under Section 1988. (New York State Department of Correctional Services)

U.S. Appeals Court
FREE SPEECH
TERMINATION

Zorzi v. County of Putnam, 30 F.3d 885 (7th Cir. 1994). A former dispatcher in a sheriff's office sued a county and a former and current sheriff, alleging that her termination and refusal to rehire her violated her rights of political association and due process, and her right to seek redress in courts. The U.S. District Court denied the former sheriff's and county's motions for summary judgment based on qualified immunity, and entered a preliminary injunction ordering the dispatcher reinstated. The defendants appealed. The appeals court found that the dispatcher's lawsuit, alleging that the sheriff fired her for her political support of the state's attorney involved matters of public concern, as required to warrant First Amendment protection against retaliation by a public employer, and as required for a preliminary injunction ordering the dispatcher's reinstatement when the county refused to rehire her because of the pending lawsuit. Political speech, the fact that a public employer would fire an employee for political speech or support of a candidate, and the sheriff's underlying dispute with the state's attorney, were all matters of public concern. (Putnam County Sheriff's Department, Illinois)

1995

U.S. District Court
BFOQ
SEX DISCRIMINATION

Carl v. Angelone, 883 F.Supp. 1433 (D. Nev. 1995). Male and female correctional officers brought an action against the Director of the Nevada Department of Prisons alleging that the director intentionally discriminated against them on the basis of their gender by transferring male officers out of, and female officers to, women's correctional facilities. The director moved for summary judgment. The district court found that the director could not base a claim of qualified immunity on a bona fide occupational qualification (BFOQ) defense. BFOQ is an affirmative defense to liability, and allowing the defendant to base a qualified immunity defense on BFOQ would in essence reverse the burden of proof, requiring the plaintiff to demonstrate that the defendant could not have reasonably believed a BFOQ defense applied. Where discrimination is on the basis of gender, the employer bears the burden of proving that a job qualification or function justifying discrimination is reasonably necessary to the essence of the defendant's particular business. The employer must prove that gender is a legitimate proxy for a qualification or a function because there is a substantial basis for believing that all or nearly all employees of the affected gender lack the qualification or ability to perform that function or it is impossible or highly impractical for an employer to insure by individual testing that its employees will have the necessary qualifications for the job. Issues of fact precluded summary judgment based on a BFOQ defense. (Nevada Department of Prisons)

U.S. Appeals Court
PRIVACY PSYCHOLOGICAL SCREENING
DUE PROCESS

Flynn v. Sandahl, 58 F.3d 283 (7th Cir. 1995). A corrections officer brought a § 1983 action seeking an injunction to prevent a warden from ordering him to submit to a psychological examination. The district court granted summary judgment for the warden based on qualified immunity. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the warden did not deny the officer due process by failing to provide him with a hearing in which he could challenge the necessity of the examination. The court also found that even if the warden's order violated the officer's right to privacy, the officer's right would give way to considerations of public interest. The warden had informed the officer of the complaints that were the basis for the examination and the officer refused the warden's offer to meet to discuss the complaints. The officer's coworkers had complained that the officer had threatened them with physical harm. The court noted that corrections officers must be able to depend on one another to carry out their duties and to protect each other. (Shawnee Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
DRUG TESTING

Garrison v. Department of Justice, 72 F.3d 1566 (Fed. Cir. 1995). An employee of the Federal Bureau of Prisons was removed from his job after refusing to provide a urine sample for a drug test. Bureau officials had learned about alleged recent drug use from the employee's brother during a routine background check. The brother had stated that he had seen the employee buy and use marijuana recently and gave specific information about the frequency and location of his drug use and purchase transactions. The district court reviewed the Bureau's decision to remove the employee and found that the Bureau had no reason to question the reliability of the information on which they based their decision to require the employee to submit to a drug test. The court found that the employee's removal, following warnings that his refusal could result in removal, was warranted. (Federal Bureau of Prisons, Kansas City)

U.S. Appeals Court
FREE SPEECH
SEX DISCRIMINATION
TERMINATION

Hughes v. Bedsole, 48 F.3d 1377 (4th Cir. 1995). A former shift supervisor at a county jail brought an action against the county sheriff's department alleging sex discrimination and violation of her free speech rights. The U.S. District Court entered summary judgment for the department and she appealed. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that the supervisor's expressions of concern about understaffing and improper training were not the substantial or motivating factor behind her discharge for purposes of her claim that she was unconstitutionally discharged for exercising her free speech rights. Her employer asserted that she was discharged because of two security violations involving an unlocked door that had occurred during her shift. (Cumberland County Jail, North Carolina)

U.S. Appeals Court
FREE SPEECH

Keeney v. Heath, 57 F.3d 579 (7th Cir. 1995). A guard at a county jail filed a § 1983 action alleging violation of her Fourteenth Amendment right to marry. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that even though the inmate whom the guard had married had been transferred to a different facility, a regulation which forbids employees from becoming socially involved with inmates in or out of jail did not violate the guard's constitutional rights. The court noted that the regulation was justified by the fear that if the guard became romantically involved with the inmate after his transfer to another facility she might become a facilitator of unlawful communication between him and others. The court also noted the officials' concern that allowing staff to become socially involved with inmates would provide an enhanced incentive for inmates to "romance" guards, and would raise serious problems with inmate morale. (Tippecanoe County Jail, Indiana)

U.S. District Court
DISABILITY
PHYSICAL REQUIREMENTS
TERMINATION

McDonald v. State of KS, Dept. of Corrections, 880 F.Supp. 1416 (D.Kan. 1995). A former correctional officer sued a state, the Department of Corrections, and its representatives, for disability discrimination and negligent and intentional infliction of emotional distress. On the defendants' motion for summary judgment, the district court found that the former correctional officer failed to meet the burden of proving that the requested accommodation for his heart and other medical problems was reasonable. He requested that he rotate among positions in which he would have little contact with inmates, no occasion to respond in situations of physical emergency, and no need to stand, walk, lift, bend, squat or climb stairs. There was no existing rotation and no individual positions were vacant. The court also found that, under Kansas law, the former correctional officer could not recover for tort of outrage or intentional infliction of emotional distress, as there was no conduct that could be regarded as extreme and outrageous. The warden had made extraordinary efforts to help him save his job while meeting legitimate correctional and security needs of the facility, and the former correctional officer neither alleged nor proved that he suffered extreme and severe emotional distress. Also, under Kansas law, the former correctional officer could not recover for negligent infliction of emotional distress, where he alleged no negligent conduct. (Lansing Correctional Facility, Kansas)

U.S. District Court
AGE DISCRIMINATION
TERMINATION

Montgomery v. Brookshire, 880 F.Supp. 483 (W.D. Tex. 1995). A terminated deputy brought an Age Discrimination in Employment (ADEA) claim against a county. The district court found that the county's stated reason for discharge of the deputy sheriff, i.e., that the deputy was insubordinate when he said the sheriff's department could "go to hell," was not pretextual. The deputy did not dispute that he made the statement. (Ector County Sheriff Department, Texas)

U.S. Appeals Court
RETALIATION
HARASSMENT

Spicer v. Com. of Va. Dept. of Corrections, 66 F.3d 705 (4th Cir. 1995). A female employee of an all male prison sued corrections officials alleging sexual harassment and retaliation. The district court granted injunctive relief on a hostile environment claim and awarded attorney's fees. The appeals court vacated and remanded with instruction, finding that the prison acted immediately and effectively to eliminate the offensive conduct and that the employment action taken against the employee would have been taken even without any retaliatory motive. The court noted that the record indicated that the employee was removed from a work committee because of philosophical differences with the warden about the committee, because of staff and inmate complaints, and because she chaired work committee meetings when she was not authorized to do so. The employee had complained about alleged remarks made to her by fellow employees, and alleged retaliation by her employer in response to her filing of a sexual harassment complaint with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission. (Buckingham Correctional Center, Virginia)

U.S. Appeals Court
CLOTHING
FREE SPEECH

Troster v. Pennsylvania State Dept. of Corrections, 65 F.3d 1086 (3rd Cir. 1995). A state corrections officer brought a suit alleging violation of his First Amendment rights as the result of a regulation which required him to wear an American flag patch on his uniform. The district court denied a preliminary injunction and the appeals court affirmed, finding that the officer's refusal to wear the flag patch was not constitutionally protected as a means of symbolic protest. According to the court, a compelled speech analysis--rather than a symbolic protest analysis--was the proper vehicle for his constitutional challenge because the message the officer wished to communicate was simply opposition to the regulation on compelled expression grounds, and his preferred method of communicating his message was to violate the regulation. (State Correctional Institute at Greensburg, Pennsylvania)

U.S. Appeals Court
TERMINATION
FREE SPEECH

Andersen v. McCotter, 100 F.3d 723 (10th Cir. 1996). An intern with the Utah Department of Corrections sought injunctive relief against the Department and monetary relief against various corrections officials claiming she was fired in retaliation for exercising her First Amendment free speech rights. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants, but the appeals court reversed and remanded. The appeals court held that the intern, even as an unpaid government volunteer, was entitled to First Amendment protection and that the defendants were not entitled to qualified immunity. The court found that whether the plaintiff's interest in voicing criticism of proposed changes in the Department's sex offender policy outweighed the Department's interest in enforcing its code of conduct required remand to the district court. The plaintiff was a university student who was receiving college credit and being paid for 20 hours of work per week as an intern with the state Board of Pardons. The plaintiff was working at a community corrections center when the Department announced proposed changes in its sex offender treatment program. During an interview with a television station the plaintiff criticized the proposed changes, expressing her concern that the changes could result in the premature release of potentially dangerous sex offenders into the community. The court noted that she confined her comments to expressing her own opinion and did not disclose any confidential information. The day after the interview she was informed by the Department that she was being terminated because she had said "something negative about the Department." (Bonneville Community Corrections Center, Utah)

U.S. District Court
42 U.S.C.A. Sec. 1983
FREE SPEECH REGULATIONS

Blanken v. Ohio Dept. of Rehabilitation & Correction, 944 F.Supp. 1359 (S.D. Ohio 1996). A prison food service coordinator sued corrections officials claiming that a grooming policy which required short hair violated the Religious Freedom Restoration Act (RFRA) and the free exercise clause. The inmate practiced Native American Spirituality and was a member of the Hokshichankiya Society; he identified four essential tenants of his Native American Spirituality: the Sweat Lodge, the Sacred Pipe, the Vision Quest, and the growth of hair. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants, finding that although the employee had made a prima facie showing that his sincerely-held religious beliefs were substantially burdened, the corrections department's compelling interest in safety, discipline and esprit de corps justified the regulation. The court held that the regulation was the least restrictive means of furthering the department's compelling interest in safety and discipline. The court found that alternative means, such as allowing male staff to pin up long hair or tuck it into a collar--as female staff were allowed to do--would not achieve the department's goals. (Orient Correctional Institution, Ohio)

U.S. District Court
ADA-Americans with Disabilities Act
DISCRIMINATION
DISABILITY

Burke v. Comm. of Virginia, 938 F.Supp. 320 (E.D. Va. 1996). A former employee of the Virginia Department of Corrections sued the department alleging employment discrimination in violation of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA). The district court granted the defendant's motion for summary judgment. The court held that the employee, who could not perform as a correctional officer because he suffered from attention deficit and hyperactivity disorder and developmental expressive and receptive language disorder was not "disabled" within the meaning of ADA. The Department had provided him with comparable, alternative positions to the correctional officer position, defeating any claim of impaired life activity. The plaintiff also failed to name a single accommodation that would allow him to perform the duties of a correctional officer adequately, according to the court. The court found that even if the employee had a disability under ADA, he could not adequately perform the essential functions of the correctional officer position. The court also found that individual defendants were not proper parties in an ADA suit absent evidence that they made personnel decisions of a nondelegable nature with respect to the plaintiff's employment. The court described the four requisite elements that the plaintiff must establish to make a prima facie case: (1) that the plaintiff was a member of a protected class under the statute; (2) that he was discharged; (3) at the time of his discharge he was performing his job at a level that met his employer's legitimate expectations; and (4) that the discharge occurred under circumstances that would support a reasonable inference of discrimination. The plaintiff had been hired as a correctional officer and was sent to a corrections academy to obtain certification. The plaintiff did not receive passing grades, despite being re-tested twice, and he was ultimately not certified. After the Department concluded that the plaintiff's limitations disqualified him from being a correctional officer, they offered him the position of "Motor Vehicle Operator B" which provided the same salary as the correctional officer position. The plaintiff refused that job and was ultimately given another position within the Department but resigned less than a year later. (Virginia Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
RACIAL DISCRIMINATION
DISCIPLINE
TERMINATION
TITLE VII

Eldridge v. Morrison, 970 F.Supp. 928 (M.D. Ala. 1996). An employee brought an action against a corrections department and officials alleging violation of Title VII, § 1983 and other statutes. The district court held that the employee failed to establish a prima facie Title VII claim of race discrimination based on his suspension and termination. The court also held that the employee failed to establish a prima facie Title VII claim of retaliation. The black employee alleged racial discrimination because he received a five-day suspension for violating a correctional facility rule while a white employee received only a reprimand for violating the same rule. The court found that the two employees were not similarly situated because the black employee had previously been disciplined 13 times while the white employee had been disciplined only twice. (Staton Correctional Institution, Alabama)

U.S. District Court
RETALIATION
HARASSMENT

Fleming v. South Carolina Dept. of Corrections, 952 F.Supp. 283 (D.S.C. 1996). An employee sued her employer, a state corrections department, alleging retaliation in violation of Title VII. The district court denied the employer's motion for summary judgment, finding that the employee's refusal to submit to a supervisor's sexual advances was a protected opposition of an unlawful employment practice, and that a genuine issue of material fact existed regarding whether transfers and a lower performance evaluation were causally related to the protected activity. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by the existence of genuine issues of material fact regarding the deliberateness of the employer's actions, the intolerability of the working conditions, and whether the employer retaliated in the form of creating a hostile work environment. The court found that a reasonable person could have found that alleged harassment was hostile and abusive where evidence was presented that the correctional officer was repeatedly transferred and was left on her post without relief. The court noted that officers had to rely on co-workers and supervisors to protect their safety and well-being. (Ferry Correctional Institution, South Carolina)

U.S. District Court DRUG TESTING
PRIVACY

Hansen v. California Dept. of Corrections, 920 F.Supp. 1480 (N.D.Cal. 1996). A female correctional officer who was subjected to direct observation of her urination during drug testing brought suit against corrections officials, seeking damages under § 1983 for unlawful search and violation of her right to privacy. The district court found that some defendants were entitled to qualified immunity as it was not clearly established at the time of the testing that direct observation under the presented circumstances violated constitutional norms. The court found that supervising officers were not absolutely immune from damages under California law as they did not exercise discretion, and that the immunity of the other defendants could not be determined on summary judgment. The court found that direct observation of the procedure violated the officer's right to privacy guaranteed by the California Constitution, absent reasonable, individualized and articulable suspicion of the intent to tamper with the sample. (CTF-Soledad, California)

U.S. District Court
UNION

Israel v. Abate, 949 F.Supp. 1035 (S.D.N.Y. 1996). A corrections officer union and its President sought declaratory judgment to enjoin the Department of Correction (DOC), city officials and the city from prohibiting union members from posting and distributing union fliers at a control building of a correctional facility. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants, finding that the content of the fliers, which encouraged union members to vote for the continued employment of union officials and warning of the implications of defeat, was not a matter of public concern and therefore was not entitled to First Amendment protection. According to the court, the primary purpose of the fliers was to further internal union interests and did not address the impact of the vote on the DOC or the general public, expenditures of tax money, breaches of public trust, or the integrity of DOC officials. The court ruled that the DOC reasonably restricted the hand distribution of the fliers in the control building--a non-public forum. The court noted that even if the control building was a forum, the restriction was necessary to serve a compelling state interest, and that the union had numerous other fora to disseminate their message, which had been used by the union in the past. The court found that the officials were entitled to qualified immunity. (Rikers Island Complex, New York City)

U.S. Appeals Court
TERMINATION
DUE PROCESS

Jackson v. Long, 102 F.3d 722 (4th Cir. 1996). Jailers who had been discharged brought a § 1983 action against a sheriff in his individual and official capacity. The district court denied the sheriff's motion for summary judgement based on qualified immunity and the sheriff appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded with instructions. The appeals court held that the jailers did not have a protected property right in continued public employment because North Carolina statutes granted sheriffs the exclusive power over employment decisions. Therefore, firing the jailers without a hearing was not denial of due process despite a statute and county policy that provided sheriff's employees with procedural protections and created a personnel advisory board which could make recommendations to the sheriff. The appeals court also found that the sheriff was entitled to qualified immunity from the jailers' § 1983 action alleging that they were deprived of liberty interest in their reputations. The appeals court found that the jailers' failed to state a § 1983 claim against the sheriff in his official capacity. The sheriff had received a complaint from a female inmate that she had been raped by a jailer. The sheriff conducted a brief investigation and then referred the matter to the North Carolina Bureau of Investigation. While the criminal investigation was continuing the sheriff dismissed both the accused jailer and the matron on duty on the floor where the incident allegedly occurred, and issued a press release announcing his action. Criminal charges against the jailer were eventually dropped and the matron was never criminally charged. (Buncombe County, North Carolina)

U.S. Appeals Court
WORKING CONDITIONS PROTECTION FROM HARM

Liebson v. New Mexico Corrections Dept., 73 F.3d 274 (10th Cir. 1996). A librarian who was assaulted by a prison inmate while she was working at a prison brought a civil rights action against prison officials. The librarian alleged that the officials, who had changed the hours during which a guard was in the library, failed to protect her. The district court denied the officials' motion for summary judgment and they appealed. The appeals court reversed the case and remanded it, ruling that prison officials were not liable under either the special relationship theory or the danger creation theory. The court found that even if the librarian alleged an actual due process claim, those rights were not so clearly established that reasonable officials would have understood that their conduct violated those rights at the time of the assault. The court also ruled that there was no special relationship between prison officials and the librarian which would trigger an affirmative duty on the part of the officials to protect the librarian from assault by inmates; the librarian's presence in the prison library, both before and after the guard was removed, was completely voluntary and she was free to come and go each day of her employment. (New Mexico State Penitentiary)

U.S. District Court
TERMINATION
PROPERTY INTEREST

Penland v. Long, 922 F.Supp. 1085 (W.D.N.C. 1996). A discharged jailer and shift supervisor brought a civil rights action against the sheriff who discharged them. The district court denied summary judgment to the sheriff, finding that the plaintiffs had a property interest in their protected employment and that the rights allegedly violated by the sheriff were clearly established at the time. The court cited a statute which created a personnel advisory board for the sheriff's department to determine facts and make recommendations to the sheriff in cases of employee suspension or dismissal. The court found that the sheriff implicated the plaintiffs' liberty interests when he made a statement that allegations of a sexual assault had been made by an inmate, that the jailer and supervisor had been dismissed, and that the matter was under investigation. According to the court, these statements implied that the assault occurred and that the jailer and shift supervisor were involved. The court found that a jury could find that the sheriff acted with reckless disregard for the truth by discharging the plaintiffs while the state was conducting its investigation, and before it was learned that the inmate who had made the allegations had a history of treatment for a mental disorder and a history of making false allegations of sexual abuse. (Buncombe County Jail, North Carolina)

U.S. District Court
TRAINING
TERMINATION

Ryder v. Freeman, 918 F.Supp. 157 (W.D.N.C. 1996). An employee of a correctional facility operated by the North Carolina Department of Corrections filed suit against correctional officials, alleging that a component of the state's required training program violated her constitutional rights. The employee asserted that a training program which required employees to be sprayed by chemical mace denied her the right to be free from bodily harm. The district court dismissed the case, finding that the training requirement had a rational basis and did not shock the conscience so as to require the strict scrutiny of a substantive due process claim. State officials argued that they required officers to be sprayed with mace so that they would be deterred from using mace unless absolutely necessary, and to teach them how to react with more sensitivity to an inmate who had been sprayed with mace. Under the corrections department policy, the officer would have been terminated from employment if she refused to participate in the required training. (North Carolina Department of Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
FREE SPEECH

Shimer v. Washington, 100 F.3d 506 (7th Cir. 1996). An inmate brought a suit challenging a corrections policy which prohibited correctional employees from writing directly to the state Prisoner Review Board on behalf of prisoners who had filed petitions for clemency. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants but the appeals court reversed and remanded. The appeals court found that the inmate's third-party standing did not preclude his challenge, and that concerns about whether legitimate penological concerns outweighed the potential chilling effect of the policy of guards' protected speech precluded summary judgment. The inmate alleged that prison guards would have written letters to the Board, but for the policy, and the court found that he showed that the policy could hinder the flow of information and that he suffered an injury in fact. (Illinois Department of Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
DISCRIMINATION
RACIAL DISCRIMINATION
HIRING/
QUALIFICATIONS

Wittmer v. Peters, 87 F.3d 916 (7th Cir. 1996). White correctional officers who unsuccessfully applied for lieutenants' positions in boot camps for young offenders sued officials alleging that preferring black correctional officers for the positions violated their equal protection rights. The district court found no discrimination and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court found that the preference that administrators of a county boot camp gave to a black male applicant on the ground of his race did not violate equal protection. The court noted that a black lieutenant was needed because black inmates were believed unlikely to play the correctional games if some blacks were in authority in the camp; 70% of the inmates were black but only 6% of the staff members were black. (Greene County, Illinois)

1997

U.S. District Court
PROMOTION
RACIAL DISCRIMINATION
TITLE VII

Beckett v. Dept. of Corrections of Delaware, 981 F.Supp. 319 (D.Del. 1997). An African-American correctional sergeant who was denied promotion brought an action against a corrections department and officials claiming race discrimination in violation of § 1983 and Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. The court found that the sergeant failed to make a sufficient showing of racial discrimination on the part of the warden to impose Title VII liability on the department, but held that summary judgment for the defendants was precluded on the Title VII and § 1983 claim that officials had acted with racial animus. The court found that genuine issues of material fact as to whether corrections officials had manipulated the partially subjective promotion process to the disadvantage of the sergeant precluded summary judgment on the sergeant's equal protection claim. (Sussex Correctional Institution, Delaware)

U.S. Supreme Court
HIRING/
QUALIFICATIONS

Board of County Com'rs. of Bryan County, Okls. v. Brown, 117 S.Ct. 1382 (1997). Respondent Jill Brown brought a claim for damages against petitioner Bryan County under 42 U.S.C. Sec. 1983. She alleged that a county police officer used excessive force in arresting her, and that the county itself was liable for her injuries based on its sheriff's hiring and training decisions. She prevailed on her claims against the county following a jury trial, and the Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit affirmed the judgment against the county on the basis of the hiring claim alone. The United States Supreme Court held that the Court of Appeals' decision "cannot be squared with our recognition that, in enacting Sec. 1983, Congress did not intend to impose liability on a municipality unless deliberate action attributable to the municipality itself is the 'moving force' behind the plaintiff's deprivation of federal rights." (Bryan County, Oklahoma)

U.S. District Court
DISCIPLINE
FREE SPEECH

Button v. Kibby-Brown, 970 F.Supp. 649 (C.D.Ill. 1997). A prison chaplain brought a § 1983 action claiming officials retaliated against him for exercising his First Amendment rights. The chaplain had gone outside of the chain of command to discuss a concern with a corrections department deputy director, angering his Warden and Assistant Warden. The chaplain was disciplined with a written reprimand for discussing and disclosing matters of a sensitive and personal nature with inmates, after allegedly telling a group of inmates that he might be fired for "going to bat for" another inmate. The district court dismissed the claim, but the appeals court reversed the dismissal. On remand, the district court held that the chaplain's conversation with the deputy director following denial of his request to tutor an inmate was not a matter of public concern and was thus not protected by the First Amendment. The court noted that in spite of the chaplain's attempt to turn the conversation into one involving a breach of contract and unfair treatment of an inmate, the chaplain spoke more like a disgruntled employee whose statements were primarily of personal interest. (Jacksonville Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
WORKING CONDITIONS PROTECTION FROM HARM

Cerka v. Salt Lake County, 988 F.Supp. 1420 (D.Utah 1997). A county jail employee filed negligence and due process claims against a sheriff and county alleging that she was exposed to a contaminated ventilation system. The district court dismissed the case, finding that the employee had no life, liberty or property interest in a safe and healthful workplace. The employee began to experience respiratory problems while employed as a nurse at the Salt Lake County Metro Jail, and collapsed at work six months later. The employee claimed that her collapse was the result of a severe and permanent brain injury caused by a jail ventilation system contaminated with sewer leakages. The court held that the employee's claim was barred by the exclusivity provision of the Utah Workers' Compensation Act, which it found to be the employee's sole remedy for her claims. The court noted that employees were notified that workers in the jail could be exposed to a contaminated ventilation system. (Salt Lake County Metro Jail, Utah)

U.S. District Court
FREE SPEECH
PROPERTY INTEREST
RETALIATION
TERMINATION

Connor v. Clinton County Prison, 963 F.Supp. 442 (M.D.Pa. 1997). A former county prison employee brought an action against a county prison and prison officials alleging violation of provisions of the Pennsylvania whistleblower law resulting from her termination. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court held that an employee who did not have an employment contract and was not covered by a collective bargaining agreement was an at-will employee and had no property interest in her position. The court found that the employee's private log of workplace activities, including a claim that her supervisor requested that she prepare work release for an inmate that did not have proper documentation, was not speech on a matter of public concern for the purposes of her claim that the public employer violated her free speech rights by terminating her after a supervisor read the log. The employee's allegations that she was terminated for documenting that a prison warden had violated the prison's internal policy was not a report of wrongdoing that implicated the Pennsylvania whistleblower law, where there was no indication that the employee intended to make the issue one for public debate. The plaintiff had worked as a secretary/records clerk. (Clinton County Prison, Pennsylvania)

U.S. Appeals Court
RACIAL DISRIM-INATION
TITLE VII
TERMINATION
FREE SPEECH

Day v. Johnson, 119 F.3d 650 (8th Cir. 1997). Jail employees sued a sheriff and sheriff's department for race discrimination in violation of Title VII and for retaliation in violation of § 1983 for speaking out about jail conditions. The district court ruled for the employees and ordered the sheriff to place them in captain-level positions. The sheriff appealed and the appeals court reversed and dissolved the injunction. The appeals court held that evidence was insufficient to show that the sheriff's stated reason for the terminations--poor performance--was a cover up for racial discrimination. The court noted that the jail's problems were thoroughly aired in media reports that the employees never challenged, and the sheriff made his own first-hand observations from visiting the jail several times and interviewing employees. The appeals court also held that the head of the jail intake area spoke to the district court about jail conditions on orders from his superior and as the sheriff's department's public information officer, not as a concerned citizen, and thus his speech was not protected by the First Amendment. (Pulaski County Jail, Arkansas)

U.S. District Court
TERMINATION

Harter v. Vernon, 980 F.Supp. 162 (M.D.N.C. 1997). Two former deputy sheriffs sued a county and a sheriff alleging that their employment was terminated in retaliation for their failure to work on the sheriff's reelection campaign. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court found that the fact that the deputy sheriffs were neutral during the campaign did not preclude their dismissal under the Elrod-Brant exception to the First Amendment's prohibition of political termination. According to the court, the deputy sheriff whose position required him to engage in law enforcement activities as a road deputy was a policymaker who could lawfully be terminated for political reasons, as was the deputy sheriff who was a sworn law enforcement officer working in a communications center. The court noted that if sheriffs may require loyalty of their deputies, then they must have some discretion to determine what constitutes disloyalty. (Rockingham County, Virginia)

U.S. Appeals Court
DISCIPLINE
EQUAL PROTECTION
RACIAL DISCRIMINATION

Holifield v. Reno, 115 F.3d 1555 (11th Cir. 1997). A black doctor sued his former employer for employment discrimination and retaliation in violation of Title VII. The district court granted summary judgment for the employer and the appeals court affirmed. The court held that evidence was insufficient to support a discrimination claim. The court found that peer reviews, performance appraisals, and the testimony of supervisors, colleagues and medical staff were fatal to the retaliation claim because it showed that the work for which the doctor was responsible was not properly performed. The court found that a non-minority doctor who was transferred for allegedly poor performance was not treated more favorably for the purposes of a Title VII analysis because the employer presented legitimate non-discriminatory reasons for transferring and later terminating the black doctor. (Federal Correctional Institution, Marianna, Florida)

U.S. District Court
DISCIPLINE
DUE PROCESS
TERMINATION
LIBERTY INTEREST

Jefferies v. Wyandotte County Bd. of County Com'rs, 979 F.Supp. 1372 (D.Kan. 1997). A former deputy sheriff brought a § 1983 action against a county board and a municipality alleging constitutional violations arising out of his discharge. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants in part, finding that the county personnel policy guide--which listed various employment infractions and corresponding penalties and which had a disclaimer stating that the guide does not create a contract between the county and the employee--was insufficient to show an implied-in-fact employment contract between the county and a deputy under Kansas law. The court held that the county was not liable for any violation of the deputy sheriff's liberty interest in his continued employment arising out of actions of the sheriff. However, the court found that a genuine issue of material fact precluded summary judgment as to whether an employer's policy created an implied-in-fact employment contract under Kansas law. The court also found that summary judgment was precluded on the deputy sheriff's First Amendment claim, whether political association was an appropriate qualification for a deputy sheriff and whether the deputy sheriff's discharge was politically motivated. The court found that the former employee failed to show a due process violation arising out of his pretermination hearing despite his claims that he did not receive advance notice of the hearing and that he was not given the opportunity to respond to charges. (Wyandotte County Sheriff's Department, Kansas)

U.S. District Court
SUSPENSION
RETALIATION
DISCRIMINATION

Macklin v. Huffman, 976 F.Supp. 1090 (W.D.Mich. 1997). A state employee brought a § 1983 action in state court against corrections officials alleging that they retaliated against him for filing discrimination complaints. The case was removed to federal court where the district court granted summary judgment for the defendants and remanded the case to the state court. The district court held that the employee was not entitled to a hearing prior to being suspended pending investigation of his alleged sexual misconduct. The court reasoned that his loss of pay was temporary, his lost income was relatively insubstantial, the allegations against him came from an independent source, and the state had an interest in preserving the integrity of its investigation and the safety and security of the employee, his accuser and others. The case was remanded to state court because the Eleventh Amendment barred his § 1983 claim against a state official. A female prisoner had told prison officials that she observed the plaintiff participating in a sexual activity with another prisoner. The employee was suspended for 15 days while the charge was investigated by the police and corrections officials. Following the investigations the employee was reinstated with back pay. (Camp Branch, Michigan Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
DISCIPLINE
FREE SPEECH
EQUAL PROTECTION

Mascetta v. Miranda, 957 F.Supp. 1346 (S.D.N.Y. 1997). A county corrections officer brought a § 1983 action against the county, warden and other supervisory officials, alleging that he was subjected to retaliation in violation of his rights under the First, Fourth, and Fourteenth Amendments, and New York state law. The district court denied the defendants' motion for summary judgment, finding that the officer's alleged statement concerning lax prison security rose to the level of public concern, so as to be protected by the First Amendment. The court held that the county corrections department's interest in the functioning of its institutions and in disciplining one of its officers did not outweigh the officer's freedom of speech. The court found that the officer's allegations that his property was taken from his locker when the warden and supervisors broke into his locker while he was under suspension, established seizure, precluding summary judgment for the defendants. Also, the court held that summary judgment was precluded on the officer's equal protection claim alleging selective prosecution, based on the officer's allegations that other officers involved in the same incident were neither investigated nor subjected to disciplinary charges. The officer alleged that the defendants retaliated against him for voicing his opinion on two separate issues, and that they conspired to frame him and fabricate false disciplinary charges against him in order to coerce him into resigning. The officer had criticized a fellow employee for allegedly violating security procedures, and had criticized an assistant warden for "pressuring" him into buying a defective automobile from the assistant warden's wife. (Westchester County Department of Correction, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
TERMINATION
DUE PROCESS

Merritt v. Reed, 120 F.3d 124 (8th Cir. 1997). A former prison employee brought a § 1983 action against a warden and personnel officer alleging violation of his due process rights when they terminated him from employment as a correctional officer without giving him an opportunity to respond to charges, thereby affecting his good name within the employment community. The district court denied the defendants' motion for summary judgment and they appealed. The appeals court reversed, finding that the employee failed to show that the defendants made the reasons for his termination public, as required to support his claim that they violated his liberty interest in his good name. The court found that neither the warden nor the personnel officer informed any prospective employers of the reasons for the plaintiff's termination, and that any publication of the reasons occurred at the hands of a third party. The plaintiff was discharged from employment for providing false information on his job questionnaire; he had stated on his application that he could perform the job functions of correctional officer, but later informed an instructor at the training academy that he could not run, jog, or jump pursuant to his doctor's orders. (Varner Unit, Arkansas Department of Correction)

U.S. District Court
SEXUAL HARASS-MENT
HOSTILE WORK
ENVIRONMENT

Saunders v. Hunter, 980 F.Supp. 1236 (M.D.Fla. 1997). A female corrections officer brought a suit against a county sheriff, her supervisors and her co-workers asserting violation of § 1983 and state law. The district court found that the co-workers did not act under "color of law" in sexually harassing the officer, but that the officer had sufficiently alleged that the supervisors had acted under color of law in creating a hostile work environment. The court also found that neither the sheriff nor the supervisor were entitled to qualified immunity with regard to the officer's § 1983 claims, and that the officer's allegations were sufficient to state a § 1983 claim against the sheriff in his official and individual capacities. The officer alleged that a supervisor hosed her down while other male officers held her, that supervisors failed to take action on her sexual harassment complaint, that a supervisor had given her a lower evaluation based on her harassment complaint, that a supervisor had commented that he would do anything to prevent the officer from attending a law enforcement academy, that a supervisor had refused to provide back-up for the officer and that the investigation into her harassment complaint created a hostile work environment. (Collier County, Florida)

U.S. District Court
DISCIPLINE
LEGAL SERVICES

Smylis v. City of New York, 983 F.Supp. 478 (S.D.N.Y. 1997). An assistant warden brought a § 1983 action against a city to recover for the city's failure to provide a defense and indemnity in a suit by inmates. The district court dismissed the action. The assistant deputy warden had pleaded guilty to departmental charges in connection with two incidents involving the use of force against inmates and was disciplined. The two incidents resulted in § 1983 actions by the inmates, and the city declined to represent the assistant warden. The court commented that "this has not stopped plaintiff from invoking the very civil rights laws under which he has been sued by inmates against the Corporation Counsel in an effort to make a federal case out of this straightforward issue of New York municipal law." (New York City)

U.S. Appeals Court
FAILURE TO PROTECT PROTECTION FROM HARM

Wallace v. Adkins, 115 F.3d 427 (7th Cir. 1997). A state prison officer sued prison officials under § 1983, alleging they failed to protect him. The district court granted summary judgment to the officials and the officer appealed. The district court affirmed, finding that prison guards who are ordered to stay at their posts are not in the kind of custodial setting required to create a special relationship based on an alleged affirmative duty of the state to ensure the safety of its employees for the purposes of the Fourteenth Amendment. The court also held that the officer failed to show that the officials affirmatively placed him in a position of danger that he would not have otherwise faced for the purposes of a due process claim. The court began its decision by stating "...the job of a prison guard is not an easy one, as this case illustrates." The officer was assigned to duty in a cellhouse where a particularly violent inmate was housed. The inmate had specifically threatened to kill the officer several years earlier. The inmate attacked the officer, stabbing him 13 times. The officer claimed that prison officials failed to take preventive measures that would have protected him. The court concluded that there was no doubt that the officer was in danger from the inmate on the morning of the attack, and that the officials knew of the danger, but according to the court "...these are the risks of the guard's job." (Indiana State Prison)

U.S. District Court
TERMINATION
FREE SPEECH

Weicherding v. Riegel, 981 F.Supp. 1143 (C.D.Ill. 1997). A former state correctional officer who had been terminated for his association with the Ku Klux Klan (KKK) brought an action against corrections officials alleging that his termination violated the First Amendment. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the officials, finding that they were entitled to qualified immunity from the officer's First Amendment claims. The district court found that the officer's associational activities, including holding KKK rallies at his house and the distribution of KKK literature involved a matter of public concern for First Amendment purposes, but that it was not clearly established at that time that the officer's associational interests outweighed the correctional facility's interests in promoting racial harmony in the facility. (Graham Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
RACIAL DISCRIMINATION
RETALIATION

Wilson-Simmons v. Lake County Sheriff's Dept., 982 F.Supp. 496 (N.D.Ohio 1997). A corrections officer sued a sheriff's department alleging race discrimination and retaliation. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants, finding that the officer failed to establish a prima facie case of race discrimination. The officer alleged that other correction officers were using the jail's electronic mail system (e-mail) to make racial slurs against her. Although she complained to a supervisor, she refused to provide any information about the e-mail so that he could investigate. The officer submitted a written request asking to review the e-mails of five corrections officers for a month. The Sheriff's Department did not refuse the request but notified her that the cost of the request amounted to over $2,500 to reconstruct the e-mails. The officer was asked to narrow her request or to provide additional information, but she refused. The court found that the officer suffered no adverse employment action for the purposes of a race discrimination claim, based on either the existence of allegedly racist e-mail or the employer's response to the officer's complaints. The court also found that the loss of the officer's overtime sheet did not constitute an adverse employment action for the purposes of her retaliation claim because she was not deprived of any pay earned and although she suffered a slight delay in receiving overtime, there was no suggestion that the event constituted anything other than a clerical oversight. The court held that the assignment of the officer to maximum security inmates did not constitute an adverse employment action because the assignment was a routine part of her duties and other officers were assigned to maximum security inmates more often than she was. (Lake County Jail, Ohio)

1998

U.S. District Court
TERMINATION
FREE SPEECH

Anderson v. McCotter, 3 F.Supp.2d 1223 (D.Utah 1998). A student intern at a half-way house for sex offenders brought suit against state corrections officials claiming that she was terminated in violation of her First Amendment rights for giving a television interview that was critical of a proposed policy change at the facility. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants but the appeals court reversed and remanded. On remand, the district court entered judgment for the defendants. The district court held that the intern's free speech rights were overcome by the state's interest in maintaining the security and efficiency of its sex-offender treatment and rehabilitation facility. The court noted that even if the decision to fire the intern violated the First Amendment, officials were entitled to qualified immunity because the intern was a volunteer and the law was not clearly established concerning discharge of volunteers in retaliation for speaking on matters of public concern. The court found that the intern's television interview addressed a matter of public concern. (Bonneville Community Correctional Center, Utah)

U.S. District Court
SUPERVISION
HIRING/QUALIFICATIONS

Bednar v. County of Schuylkill, 29 F.Supp.2d 250 (E.D.Pa. 1998). A county prison inmate brought a § 1983 suit against a prison physician and others alleging deliberate indifference to his serious medical needs, negligent hiring, negligent supervision and medical negligence. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court held that the physician's failure to diagnose the inmate's hip fracture and failure to order an x-ray was not deliberate indifference to the inmate's serious medical needs, where there was no evidence that the doctor recognized the inmate's need for an x-ray and refused to order it, or that the doctor possessed the requisite mental intent to sustain a deliberate indifference claim. The court held that the county was not liable to the inmate for failing to adequately screen him before hiring him, even though the physician had five previous medical malpractice actions filed against him, and had his staff privileges suspended at one hospital based upon "chart delinquency." The court noted that the previous actions had been settled or dismissed, the physician was licensed to practice medicine in the state, and he had experience as an emergency room physician as well as a prison physician in two state correctional facilities. The court also held that the county prison warden was not liable to the inmate for failing to supervise the doctor, even though the warden failed to provide the doctor with a copy of the prison's written policies regarding medical treatment, and the warden had knowledge of four accident reports concerning the inmate. (Schuylkill County Prison, Pennsylvania)

U.S. Appeals Court
GRIEVANCE
FREE SPEECH
DEMOTION

Campbell v. Arkansas Dept. of Correction, 155 F.3d 950 (8th Cir. 1998). A prison warden brought a § 1983 action against a state correction department claiming violation of his free speech and due process rights. The district court entered judgment upon jury verdict against the officials and ordered reinstatement or front pay. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part and remanded. The appeals court held that the warden's activities in speaking out about corruption and the lack of security in a prison, which resulted in a large amount of media attention, addressed matters of public concern and were protected under the First Amendment. The appeals court found that evidence supported the jury's finding that the decision to demote and transfer the warden was motivated by his protected speech. The court denied the officials qualified immunity because it was clearly established that prison security and operations were matters of public concern and that the warden had a right to bring security problems to light. (Tucker Maximum Security Unit, Arkansas Department of Correction)

U.S. Appeals Court
EQUAL PROTECTION
TRAINING

Fournier v. Reardon, 160 F.3d 754 (1st Cir. 1998). A corrections officer brought a § 1983 action alleging that county officials violated his rights in connection with his being placed under "house arrest" by being handcuffed during a training course. The district court denied the defendants' motion to dismiss, but the appeals court reversed, finding that the officer was not "seized" within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment, and the officer's due process rights were not violated. A drill instructor allegedly handcuffed the officer's hands behind his back and informed him that he was being placed under "house arrest" for entering the instructor's office without asking permission. The officer could have objected, but did not. The court found that any possible negative consequences for his continuing employment that might have resulted from an objection were not relevant to whether a violation of his right to be free from seizure occurred. The court held that the corrections officer did not have a constitutional right under the due process clause to safe conditions during his basic training course. The court also found that the possibility that the drill instructor would not have placed a non-recruit under "house arrest" was not a basis for an equal protection claim by the corrections officer. (Essex Co. Sher. Dept., Mass.)

U.S. District Court
ASSIGNMENT
DUE PROCESS
SUSPENSION

Hummel v. McCotter, 28 F.Supp.2d 1322 (D.Utah 1998). A former employee of a state department of corrections brought a § 1983 action against DOC supervisors, a probation officer, and an assistant state attorney general based on their conduct in connection with his prosecution for criminal child abuse and his subsequent dismissal from the DOC. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants. The court found that the employee's suspension without pay and his reassignment did not violate procedural due process. The court held that the probation officer had judicial branch immunity from § 1983 actions. The employee had been reassigned from his post as a hospital guard to a tower guard, following his conviction for misdemeanor child abuse. The employee alleged that the reassignment was a demotion, but the court found that the state had a legitimate interest in removing a convicted child abuser from a publicly-prominent position. (Utah Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
SUPERVISION
TRAINING
HIRING/QUALIFI-CATIONS

Kesler v. King, 29 F.Supp.2d 356 (S.D.Tex. 1998). Former inmates from Missouri who had served time in a privately-operated unit leased from a county in Texas brought a § 1983 action. The district court found that the county sheriff, his chief deputy, and a county official in charge of the detention center's emergency response team were not entitled to qualified immunity from claims alleging the use of excessive force, failure to train or supervise staff, or failure to screen job applicants. The suit addressed staff actions that had become nationally-publicized through a videotape that depicted staff use of force, including the use of stun guns and dogs. The court held that triable issues existed regarding whether the sheriff's conduct was extreme and outrageous. A private firm, Capital Correctional Resources, Inc. (CCRI) leased 512 of the detention center's 1,163 beds at a cost of $10/bed per day plus expenses. In 1996 CCRI entered into a contract to house low- to medium-security inmates from Missouri. The terms of CCRI's contract with the county included the following provisions: all CCRI hiring and training decisions and policies are subject to the sheriff's review and approval; the county and the sheriff are obligated to provide CCRI with all information necessary for the screening of applicants; the county and sheriff are obligated to certify all jailers prior to their assuming duties; and the sheriff is required to monitor CCRI's operations. CCRI hired, with the support of the sheriff, a warden for the privately-operated portion of the facility. The sheriff subsequently asked CCRI to hire two individuals, one as a lieutenant and one as a sergeant, each of whom had been previously convicted and had served sentences for a 1983 beating of a department of corrections inmate, and they were hired by CCRI. The court held that a defendant's conduct of allowing a canine unit dog to bite five inmates without provocation during a shakedown was not objectively reasonable and the defendant was not entitled to qualified immunity from liability. The court also denied qualified immunity for another defendant who failed to intercede to protect the inmates from excessive force used by officers, failing to stop an officer from allowing a dog to bite inmates, and failing to remove an officer who was using his stun gun on inmates. (Brazoria County Detention Center, Texas, and Capital Correctional Resources, Inc.)

U.S. District Court
PROTECTION FROM HARM
TERMINATION

Kohl v. Smythe, 25 F.Supp.2d 1124 (D.Hawai'i 1998). A former state prison employee alleged First and Fourteenth Amendment violations in a § 1983 suit. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants, finding that the employee's complaint did not state a claim that he had a constitutionally protected liberty interest in a continuing position. The court held that prison officials were not liable for any violation of the Fourteenth Amendment by failing to provide the employee with a personal security guard. The employee, a recreation specialist, alleged that he was terminated in retaliation for his repeated complaints regarding the lack of his safety at the prison, which the court found did not substantially involve matters of public concern. The court also held that failure to comply with the Occupational Safety and Health Act (OSHA) does not, in and of itself, create a private cause of action. (Halawa Corr. Facility. Hawai'i)

U.S. District Court
FREE SPEECH
TERMINATION

Mills v. Meadows, 1 F.Supp.2d 548 (D.Md. 1998). A former captain in a county sheriff's department sued the current sheriff and others alleging discharge in retaliation for his political affiliation. The district court granted summary judgment for the sheriff, ruling that because the captain held a policymaking position within the department, he could be discharged by the new sheriff due to his political affiliation. The court held that the public's interest in the efficient fulfillment of the responsibilities of the sheriff's office outweighed the former captain's freedom of speech interest. The captain was one of the top half dozen or so officers in the 230 member department and played a significant part in the implementation of the sheriff's policies. (Harford County, Maryland)

- U.S. District Court
DISCIPLINE
- Smylis v. City of New York, 25 F.Supp.2d 461 (S.D.N.Y. 1998). An assistant warden who was disciplined after he pleaded guilty to administrative charges, sued a city and others claiming his guilty plea was coerced in violation of due process and the state's civil service law. The district court held that the plea was voluntary and he was therefore not deprived of a property interest without due process of law. The warden was threatened with criminal prosecution and loss of his job if he did not plead guilty, but he was advised by counsel. The warden was involved with two incidents of use of force against inmates. (Bronx House of Detention for Men, New York City)
- U.S. Appeals Court
ADA-Americans with Disabilities Act
DISCIPLINE
DISCRIMINATION
HOSTILE WORK
ENVIRONMENT
TRANSFERS
GRIEVANCE
- Wallin v. Minnesota Dept. of Corrections, 153 F.3d 681 (8th Cir. 1998). A corrections officer sued a state corrections department, corrections officials, and co-workers, alleging violations of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) and deprivation of due process. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants and the appeals court affirmed. According to the court, the officer failed to show that his discharge occurred under circumstances giving to the inference of disability discrimination. The court found that the officer could not maintain an ADA claim for a hostile work environment. Although a co-worker called that officer called that officer an "alcoholic fucker," the correctional facility promptly investigated the remark and reprimanded the co-worker. On three occasions another co-worker suggested to the officer that seeing a psychologist was a good method to obtain vacation time. The officer also found cartoons of psychiatrists beds had been drawn on his calendar. The appeals court held that the correctional facility did not violate ADA when it failed to transfer the officer. The officer asked to be transferred to escape harassment by co-workers, but made no connection between his transfer requests and his disability. The officer suffered from alcoholism and depression and contended that similarly-situated employees were disciplined differently than he was. The court noted that the officer's misconduct was more egregious than that of the other employees he cited. (Minnesota Correctional Facility at Stillwater)
- U.S. Appeals Court
TERMINATION
FREE SPEECH
- Weicherding v. Riegel, 160 F.3d 1139 (7th Cir. 1998). A former prison sergeant brought an action against a warden and others alleging that his termination for engaging in white supremacist activity violated his free speech rights. The district court entered summary judgment for the defendants and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that prison officials' interests in safety outweighed the former sergeant's interest in engaging in protected speech. The sergeant appeared on a local newscast in which he stated that a white supremacist rally would be held on his property and was identified as a prison guard. (Graham Correctional Center, Illinois)
- U.S. Appeals Court
DISCRIMINATION
FREE SPEECH
TERMINATION
CONTRACTORS
- Zinn v. McKune, 143 F.3d 1353 (10th Cir. 1998). A nurse who was employed by a private corporation that had contracted with a state corrections department to provide medical services sued corrections officials alleging discrimination, retaliation, violation of Title VII and violations of § 1983 and the Kansas law protection whistleblowers. The district court entered summary judgment for the defendants and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the nurse was not an employee of the corrections department for the purpose of Title VII, where she received compensation from the medical corporation rather than the department, and was supervised and evaluated by the corporation. The appeals court found that the nurse failed to show the existence of a causal connection between her whistle-blowing and any retaliation against her. (Prison Health Services, Osawatomie Correctional Facility, Kansas)
- 1999
- U.S. District Court
WORKING CONDITIONS
- Abarca v. Chevron U.S.A. Inc., 75 F.Supp.2d 566 (E.D.Tex. 1999). Prison employees and prison inmates, more than 1,000 total, sued the owner and operator of a pipeline and contractors who sold, installed and maintained the pipeline's valves, alleging assault, negligence, gross negligence, strict products liability, and cruel and unusual punishment arising out of a pipeline leak near the prison. The plaintiffs were forcibly exposed to gas when they were unable to be evacuated and the inmates were confined to their cells. The district court found that there was no federal question for which federal jurisdiction existed, dismissing the case. (Texas Department of Corrections, Liberty County, Texas)
- U.S. Appeals Court
INVESTIGATION
- Ahlers v. Schebil, 188 F.3d 365 (6th Cir. 1999). A corrections officer who was arrested for alleged sexual misconduct with a female detainee brought a § 1983 action against investigating correctional officers and a state investigator, seeking damages. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the detainee's accusation of sexual assault was sufficient, standing alone, to establish probable cause for the officer's arrest. The court noted that sheriff department records confirmed the window of time in which the alleged assault could have occurred. (Washtenaw County Jail, Michigan)
- U.S. District Court
FREE SPEECH
TERMINATION
RETALIATION
- Allen v. Iranon, 99 F.Supp.2d 1216 (D.Hawaii 1999). A jail physician brought an action under § 1983 claiming that corrections officials had engaged in an illegal conspiracy to retaliate against him for exercising his First Amendment right to speak out about inmate abuse. The district entered judgment for the physician, finding that the officials had engaged in an illegal conspiracy and that he had been constructively discharged. According to the court, the physician was inappropriately locked out on three separate occasions and was the subject of several internal affairs investigations and was inappropriately passed over for a better-paying position. The court awarded lost wages in the amount of $91,000, $10,000 for emotional distress and humiliation, and $10,000 for loss of reputation, but declined to award punitive damages. (Halawa Correctional Facility, Hawaii)

U.S. Appeals Court
RACIAL DISCRIM.
HARASSMENT
HOSTILE WORK
ENVIRONMENT
RETALIATION

Allen v. Michigan Dept. of Corrections, 165 F.3d 405 (6th Cir. 1999). An African-American employee brought a Title VII action against a state corrections department alleging race discrimination, harassment and retaliation. The federal district court granted summary judgment in favor of the department and the employee appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The appeals court held that the employee failed to establish a prima facie race discrimination case based on department promotion practices. But the appeals court held that supervisors' alleged actions, including subjecting the employee to derogatory racial insults, created a hostile work environment. The supervisors' alleged actions included subjecting the employee to derogatory racial insults, not allowing him to serve as an acting sergeant while allowing a less experienced white employee to do so, failing to discipline a white co-employee allegedly caught removing the lock from the employee's locker with bolt cutters, constantly observing him closely, and leaving a note signed "KKK" demanding that he withdraw his bid for promotion. (Jackson Correctional Facility, Michigan Department of Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
ADA-Americans with Disabilities Act HIRING/QUALIFIC.
PSYCHOLOGICAL SCREENING

Barnes v. Broward County Sheriff's Office, 190 F.3d 1274 (11th Cir. 1999). An applicant for the position of detention deputy brought an action against a county sheriff's office under the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) and the Age Discrimination in Employment Act (ADEA). The district court entered summary judgment in favor of the applicant on his claim that pre-employment psychological testing violated ADA and permanently enjoined the county from continuing such a practice. The district court entered summary judgment in favor of the sheriff's office on the remaining claims and denied the applicant's request for attorney fees. The applicant appealed the attorney fee decision and the appeals court affirmed, finding that the applicant was not entitled to attorney fees absent evidence that the discontinuation of psychological testing affected his relationship with the county at the time the judgment was rendered, or that he directly benefited from the injunction. (Broward County Sheriff's Officer, Florida)

U.S. Appeals Court
TERMINATION
DUE PROCESS
DISABILITY

Duncan v. Wisconsin Dept. of Health & Family Serv., 166 F.3d 930 (7th Cir. 1999). An employee who had been terminated from his position as a youth counselor at a state correctional facility sued state officials in their individual and official capacities, under the Rehabilitation Act, the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) and § 1983. The district court entered summary judgment in favor of the officials on the individual capacity claims, and judgment as a matter of law in favor of the state and officials as to the remaining claims. The appeals court affirmed, finding that evidence that the agency regarded the employee as disabled was insufficient for submission to the jury. The appeals court also held that the employee received all the process he was due prior to his suspension without pay and his termination. According to the court, a tenured state employee is entitled under the due process clause to an oral or written notice of charges against him or her, an explanation of the state's evidence, and an opportunity to present his or her side of the story--as long as the state also gives the employee a right to a full post-termination hearing. The employee had alleged that the state agency had concluded that he had an impairment that would have disqualified him from a broad range of jobs, not just from his job as a youth counselor at a correctional facility, and therefore the agency regarded him as disabled. The court held that the fact that the agency transferred him to another unit indicated that the agency thought he could work successfully in a slightly different environment. (Ethan Allen School, Wisconsin Department of Health and Family Services)

U.S. Appeals Court
TERMINATION
RETALIATION

Graning v. Sherburne County, 172 F.3d 611 (8th Cir. 1999). A former employee sued a county and a sheriff alleging that her termination violated her due process and political association rights, and that their posting of a notice about her termination constituted defamation. The district court entered summary judgment for the county and sheriff and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the termination was not causally connected to the employee's support of the sheriff's electoral opponent and therefore did not violate her political affiliation rights. The court also found that the posting of a notice about the termination did not defame her. The notice stated that she had been dismissed because she breached confidentiality. She had acknowledged that she disclosed the contents of a memo involving departmental business to her husband, and that she was aware that all department business was considered confidential. (Sherburne County, Minnesota)

U.S. Appeals Court
TERMINATION
FREE SPEECH

Jantzen v. Hawkins, 188 F.3d 1247 (10th Cir. 1999). A candidate who was terminated from his position as deputy sheriff upon announcing he would run against the incumbent sheriff brought an action against the sheriff and county commissioners challenging his termination. He was joined in the action by deputy sheriffs and a jailer who were terminated after supporting the candidate. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants but the appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part and remanded. The appeals court found that political affiliation and/or beliefs were not the substantial or motivating factors in the candidate's termination. The appeals court found that fact issues existed as to whether the termination of the deputies violated the First Amendment, precluding summary judgment. According to the appeals court, the county board of commissioners was not liable for any First Amendment violation that occurred when the sheriff terminated the jailer and deputies who had supported the candidate. (Sheriff and Board of County Commissioners, Canadian County, Oklahoma)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEX DISCRIMINATION
TITLE VII
RETALIATION
EQUAL PROTECTION

Maniccia v. Brown, 171 F.3d 1364 (11th Cir. 1999). A female deputy sheriff employee sued her county sheriff-employer alleging disparate treatment and retaliation in violation of Title VII and the Florida Civil Rights Act. The district court granted summary judgment for the sheriff and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the alleged misconduct of male employees was not sufficiently similar to the misconduct for which she was disciplined to support a claim of disparate treatment. The court noted that the female employee had committed four policy violations, including misuse of confidential information, while the male employees each committed only a single incident of misconduct of a less serious nature. The court also found that the fact that the employee was reassigned 15 months after filing a sexual harassment grievance against her supervisor, and was terminated 21 months after filing the grievance, failed to establish a retaliation claim under Title VII. The female employee had been reassigned from road patrol to work in the jail as a corrections officer. (Santa Rosa County, Florida)

U.S. District Court
FREE SPEECH
TERMINATION

Massey v. Helman, 35 F.Supp.2d 1110 (C.D.Ill. 1999). A prison physician who claimed he was wrongfully dismissed from his federal prison position in violation of his First Amendment rights brought suit against a federal prison and prison officials. The district court dismissed the case, ruling that the physician was required to bring his claim through the procedures set forth in the Civil Service Reform Act (CSRA). The physician had alleged that he was discharged in furtherance of the unconstitutional policy of depriving inmates of their Eighth Amendment right to medical care. (Federal Correctional Center, Pekin, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
TERMINATION

Massey v. Helman, 196 F.3d 727 (7th Cir. 1999). A physician sued prison officials claiming he was terminated from employment for asserting claims on behalf of his inmate-patients. The district court dismissed the action and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the physician who was allegedly terminated for openly opposing the medical treatment of certain prisoners lacked standing to assert claims on behalf of the prisoners. (Federal Correctional Institution, Pekin, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
ADA-Americans with Disabilities Act
DISABILITY
HARASSMENT
RETALIATION
TERMINATION

Mistretta v. Volusia County Dept. of Corrections, 61 F.Supp.2d 1255 (M.D.Fla. 1999). A former county employee who suffered from panic disorder brought an action against corrections officials and a county. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants. The court held that a supervisor's verbal reprimands of the employee were not adverse employment actions nor was the employee subjected to severe and pervasive disability-based harassment. According to the court, although county officials might have been aware that the employee suffered from emotional problems and stress, there was no evidence that the county knew that the employee had limitations from a recognized mental disorder that needed treatment and reasonable accommodation in order for him to perform on a daily basis. The court held that alleged "punishment" workloads and workstations assigned to the employee were also assigned to non-disabled co-workers as well. (Volusia County Department of Corrections, Florida)

U.S. Appeals Court
ADA-Americans with Disabilities Act
DISCRIMINATION
WORKING CONDITIONS
DISABILITY

Muller v. Costello, 187 F.3d 298 (2nd Cir. 1999). A state corrections officer who suffered from asthma which was aggravated by second-hand smoke brought an action against the state alleging discrimination and retaliation in violation of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA). A district court jury entered a verdict in favor of the officer on both the discrimination and retaliation claims. The appeals court affirmed to the extent supported by the retaliation claim. The appeals court found that evidence that the officer was foreclosed from a class of jobs was insufficient for submission to the jury on the officer's ADA claim. But the appeals court upheld the jury's verdict which awarded damages and the district court's equitable awards of reinstatement and back pay, in their entirety. The jury awarded a total of $420,300 which it subdivided into $135,000 for the officer to receive additional education to find different employment and $285,000 for pain and suffering and mental anguish. The officer had been diagnosed with "severe bronchitis with a strong asthmatic component" and his doctor recommended that the officer have "no exposure to tobacco smoke while at work." The officer's correctional facility had a policy that allowed smoking in housing units and the officer was assigned to a housing unit after his diagnosis. The officer filed numerous grievances with the department regarding the lack of health and safe working conditions at the facility. (Midstate Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
TERMINATION

O'Connell v. County of Northampton, 79 F.Supp.2d 529 (E.D.Pa. 1999). A former warden of a county prison brought an action claiming that certain county defendants violated his civil rights and that all defendants defamed him in violation of Pennsylvania state law. The district court granted summary judgment to the defendants, finding that the warden's resignation was voluntary and therefore precluded his claim that the county defendants deprived him of a liberty interest in having his name free of the stigma attached to the accusations of his alleged sexual harassment. The court noted that even if the warden had been effectively discharged based on accusations of his alleged sexual harassment of a correctional officer, his failure to seek a "name-clearing" hearing would bar his claim that the county defendants deprived him of a due process liberty interest. (Northampton County Prison, Pennsylvania)

U.S. District Court
TERMINATION
FREE SPEECH
UNION

Orr v. Trumbull County, 77 F.Supp.2d 853 (N.D.Ohio 1999). A former county corrections officer brought a § 1983 action against a county and a sheriff alleging that he was discharged, in violation of his right to free speech and association, in retaliation for his statements concerning the sheriff department's hiring practices and his association with union members. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants, finding that the officer's associational activities and his statement about hiring practices did not touch upon a matter of public concern and were not protected by the First Amendment. (Trumbull County Sheriff's Department, Ohio)

U.S. District Court
RACIAL DISCRIM.
DISCIPLINE
RETALIATION

Pollard v. Montgomery County, 66 F.Supp.2d 1218 (M.D.Ala. 1999). A black correctional officer brought a retaliation and discrimination action against a county alleging that his ten-day suspension, the increase in disciplinary actions against him, his assignment to a control booth post, the denial of his request to use a week's accrued vacation time, and the requirement that he produce a doctor's note to use any of his sick leave, were in retaliation for having filed an EEOC complaint. The district court granted summary judgment for the county finding that the county presented legitimate, non-discriminatory reasons for its actions. (Montgomery County, Alabama)

U.S. District Court
TITLE VII
SEXUAL HARASS.
DISABILITY
ADA-Americans with Disabilities Act

Powell v. Morris, 37 F.Supp.2d 1011 (S.D.Ohio 1999). A former secretary at a medium security prison brought an action against a state corrections department and various officials and staff, alleging violation of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) and Title VII sexual harassment. The district court held that the secretary failed to establish a case of discrimination or retaliation under ADA. According to the court, although depression may qualify as a disability under ADA, there was no evidence that the secretary's depression and anxiety substantially limited her ability to work. The court also held that the defendants could not be held liable under Title VII for the sexually offensive conduct of inmates, where the prison maintained policies reasonably calculated to minimize sexual harassment by inmates and to protect the safety of its employees. But the court denied summary judgment on the Title VII claims based on the conduct of supervisors. The court ordered more proceedings to determine if the prison exercised reasonable care to prevent or correct sexually harassing behavior on the part of its supervisors, and whether the secretary unreasonably failed to take advantage of preventive or corrective opportunities that were provided by the prison. (London Corr'l Institution, Ohio)

U.S. Appeals Court
TERMINATION
DISCRIMINATION
RETALIATION

Pulliam v. Tallapoosa County Jail, 185 F.3d 1182 (11th Cir. 1999). A former correctional officer at a county jail filed a suit claiming that the jail retaliated against him, in violation of Title VII and § 1983, by terminating his employment because he had filed a charge against the jail with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC). The district court entered judgment in favor of the jail and the appeals court affirmed. The officer's EEOC complaint had alleged discrimination on the basis of race and disability, and unlawful retaliation for his protected complaints of discrimination. (Tallapoosa County Jail, Alabama)

U.S. Appeals Court
RACIAL DISCRIMINATION
TERMINATION
HOSTILE WORK
ENVIRONMENT
RETALIATION
TITLE VII

Richardson v. New York State Dept. of Corr. Ser., 180 F.3d 426 (2nd Cir. 1999). A former employee brought an action against a state corrections department asserting hostile work environment, racial harassment and retaliation claims under Title VII. The district court entered summary judgment in favor of the department. The appeals court affirmed in part, vacated in part, and remanded. The appeals court found that fact issues existed as to whether the alleged incidents that occurred at one correctional facility--including a co-worker's use of the word "nigger"--created a hostile work environment, and whether the department was liable for the alleged harassment by co-workers and supervisors. The appeals court found that the employee established a prima facie case of retaliation based on the alleged harassment by co-workers. The employee alleged that she found manure in her parking space, hair in her food, and scratches on her car, and that several of these incidents occurred shortly after deposition notices were served. (Auburn Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
DEMOTION
PROBATION
FREE SPEECH

Ross v. Clayton County, GA., 173 F.3d 1305 (11th Cir. 1999). A county correctional officer brought a § 1983 action against a county, warden and other individuals alleging that his demotion for associating with his probationer brother violated his procedural due process and First Amendment rights. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants on remand from the appeals court. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the officer did not have a protected property interest in his rank as sergeant and his demotion did not violate his free association rights. The appeals court held that the county's interests in enforcing a rule prohibiting employees from associating without permission with known inmates, active probationers or parolees were well-founded, given the county's special need in the law enforcement context to employ persons who acted with good judgment and to avoid potential conflicts of interest. The court noted that the flexibility that was created by the rule's exception for those who obtained permission enhanced the rule's reasonableness. (Clayton County, Georgia)

U.S. District Court
TERMINATION
DISCRIMINATION

Rucci v. Thoubboron, 68 F.Supp.2d 311 (S.D.N.Y. 1999). A former corrections officer brought a § 1983 action against a county and superior officers alleging gender discrimination and violations of the free speech and search and seizure clauses. The district court held that assigning the female plaintiff to work a night shift in a female unit at a correctional facility did not constitute gender discrimination. The court also held that the defendants had probable cause to arrest the plaintiff for tampering with public records. The court also found that the investigation of the plaintiff for an incident in which a touch-screen monitor shattered while she was alone in a control room was not motivated by the plaintiff's gender. (Putnam County Sheriff's Department, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
TERMINATION
DUE PROCESS

Schacht v. Wisconsin Dept. of Corrections, 175 F.3d 497 (7th Cir. 1999). A former prison officer brought a § 1983 action in state court against the Wisconsin Department of Corrections and individual co-workers. The case was removed to federal district court where the official capacity claims were dismissed and summary judgment was granted against the former officer on all other claims. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the officer, who was terminated on charges of theft of state property and failure to provide complete and accurate information during an investigation, failed to establish that his due process rights had been violated. According to the court, the officer had a pre-termination interview at which prison officials gave him notice of the charges and asked him if he would like to respond, and he had adequate post-termination administrative remedies he could have pursued under state law. The officer was employed by the department for eleven years before he was terminated. (Oakhill Correctional Center, Wisconsin)

U.S. Appeals Court
DISCIPLINE

U.S. v. Walsh, 194 F.3d 37 (2nd Cir. 1999). A corrections officer who was convicted of violating an inmate's constitutional rights appealed his conviction on three counts of violating 18 U.S.C. § 42, which makes it a criminal act to willfully deprive a person of rights protected by the Constitution or laws of the United States while acting under the color of law. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the officer's acts constituted punishment and rose to the level of a constitutional violation. The corrections officer was found to have stepped on an inmate's penis and to have perpetrated other assaults on inmates. The officer, who was six feet two inches tall and weighed over 300 pounds, instructed an inmate to kneel and put his penis on a horizontal bar of his cell, and then stood with his full weight on the penis for a few seconds. The court concluded that the officer was acting under the color of state law, noting that the officer was "on duty and in full uniform, was acting within his authority to supervise and care for inmates under his watch when the assaults occurred." (Orleans County Jail, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
PROTECTION FROM HARM

White v. Lemacks, 183 F.3d 1253 (11th Cir. 1999). A nurse and the administrator for another nurse's estate brought a § 1983 action alleging substantive due process violations against a sheriff, deputy sheriff, and county, based on an incident in which the nurses were attacked and beaten by a county jail inmate while they worked in the jail infirmary. The district court dismissed the case and the appeals court affirmed. According to the appeals court, the fact that a government employee would risk losing her job if she did not submit to unsafe job conditions does not convert a voluntary employment relationship into a custodial relationship, and therefore does not entitle to employee to substantive due process protection from workplace hazards, including harm caused by third parties. The nurses worked for Prison Health Services, Inc, which was under contract to provide medical services to the county jail. As a condition of their job, and while performing their nursing duties at the jail, they were required to be in close contact with inmates, and their freedom of movement and ability to flee or otherwise protect themselves were limited. The nurses were attacked and brutally beaten by an inmate who also subdued a deputy who had been assigned to protect the nurses. (Clayton County Jail, Georgia)

2000

U.S. Appeals Court
FREE SPEECH

Andersen v. McCotter, 205 F.3d 1214 (10th Cir. 2000). A student intern at a halfway house for sex offenders was terminated for giving a television interview that was critical of a proposed policy change at the facility. The intern brought a civil suit alleging her termination violated her First Amendment rights. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants but the appeals court reversed and remanded. On remand the district court found for the defendants and the intern again appealed. The appeals court affirmed the dismissal of the case, finding that the corrections department's interest in efficient and safe operation of the facility outweighed the intern's interest in speaking on a matter of public concern. According to the court, the intern's speech had a detrimental impact on her relationships with her superiors and impeded her ability to perform her duties, and her speech posed a real threat to the effectiveness of the sex offender treatment program and to the safety of the halfway house staff and the public. The intern had been critical of the department's plan to privatize the treatment program. (Utah Department of Corrections, Bonneville Community Corrections Center)

U.S. Appeals Court
PROMOTION
RACIAL DISCRIMINATION

Elwell v. Dobucki, 224 F.3d 638 (7th Cir. 2000). An applicant brought a § 1983 action alleging that a state correctional facility violated his equal protection rights by denying him the position of lieutenant because he was white. The district court entered summary judgment for the defendant and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the defendant warden was entitled to qualified immunity because it was not clearly established in 1992 that his alleged action would violate the applicant's equal protection rights. The warden allegedly departed from his usual policy of preferring in-house candidates in order to increase the number of African-American lieutenants in the facility. (Graham Correctional Facility, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court FREE SPEECH DISCIPLINE	Flores v. San Diego County, 206 F.3d 845 (9th Cir. 2000). A corrections deputy sued a county sheriff and others under § 1983 alleging violations of his rights to free speech and due process. The district court dismissed the claim and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the deputy could not maintain a First Amendment claim based on his alleged fear of future disciplinary action based on his speech. The deputy had taken his personal firearm to a local business for servicing and became involved with a dispute involving the servicing of the weapon. A representative of the business said he knew the sheriff and would call him and complain of his conduct. The deputy responded by saying he would inform the deputy sheriffs association that the business was providing poor service. A complaint was filed against the deputy alleging that he misused his position. The deputy received a three-day suspension for "conduct unbecoming." (San Diego County Sheriff's Department, California)
U.S. District Court SEXUAL HARASSMENT HOSTILE WORK ENVIRONMENT TITLE VII SEX DISCRIMINATION	Gonzalez v. New York State Dept. of Correct. Ser., 122 F.Supp.2d 335 (N.D.N.Y. 2000). An Hispanic female corrections officer brought an action against a state corrections agency alleging race and sex discrimination under § 1983, Title VII and state law. The district court dismissed the § 1983 claims, finding them barred by the Eleventh Amendment. But the court found that the officer's Title VII claims were timely and that a white male co-worker's alleged ongoing pattern of harassment and discrimination, which occurred on a daily basis, was sufficiently pervasive to constitute a hostile work environment in violation of Title VII. The co-worker's actions allegedly included continual use of foul language, sending sexually explicit magazines and books to the female officer's home, refusing to assist the officer in potentially dangerous situations, and intentionally bumping into the officer on at least two occasions. According to the plaintiff, the white male co-worker used raced-based derogatory terms such as "nigger" and "spic" in her presence, and referred to women as "bitches." The court found that the state department's failure to take action for over one year to stop the male co-worker's harassment, or to permit her to change her position, despite numerous complaints, was sufficient to render the department liable under Title VII for creating a hostile work environment. (Fishkill Correctional Facility, New York)
U.S. Appeals Court TERMINATION FREE SPEECH	Hale v. Mann, 219 F.3d 61 (2nd Cir. 2000). A former director of a state juvenile detention facility sued the state alleging his termination violated the Family Medical Leave Act and his First Amendment rights. The district court entered judgment in favor of the state and the appeals court affirmed in part, vacated in part and remanded. The appeals court held that a genuine issue of material fact existed as to whether the director engaged in protected speech by forwarding to a state corrections commission an investigative report about a riot that was prepared by a facility staff member that was critical of the state. (State of New York Office of Children and Family Services)
U.S. District Court TERMINATION	Harford v. County of Broome, 102 F.Supp.2d 85 (N.D.N.Y. 2000). A former county corrections officer brought an action against a county and a village under § 1983 as a result of disciplinary actions. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants. The district court held that termination of the officer for violating a rule by failing to inform his agency that he had been charged with criminal misconduct did not violate due process. According to the court, the requirement was reasonably related to the county's objective of maintaining the integrity of the corrections agency. (Broome County Jail, New York)
U.S. Appeals Court TITLE VII TERMINATION ADA- Americans with Disabilities Act	Hoskins v. Oakland County Sheriff's Dept., 227 F.3d 719 (6th Cir. 2000). A female former deputy sheriff, who had been discharged after an injury rendered her unable to restrain inmates, brought an action against the sheriff's department alleging disability discrimination in violation of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) and gender discrimination in violation of Title VII. The district court entered summary judgment in favor of the department. The appeals court affirmed, finding that restraining inmates was an essential function of the deputy's position and that allowing the deputy to rely on the assistance of others in restraining inmates was not a reasonable accommodation. The appeals court also found that reassigning the deputy to an intake position was not a reasonable accommodation, nor was assigning the deputy permanently to a position which was normally assigned to deputies on a rotating basis. The appeals court held that the female deputy was not similarly situated to male deputies who were accommodated by the county and therefore failed to establish a prima facie Title VII claim. The court noted that the male deputies were accommodated temporarily while they had restrictions from their doctors, unlike the female deputy who was permanently restricted from performing an essential job function. (Oakland County Jail, Michigan)
U.S. Appeals Court RETALIATION	Hudson v. Norris, 227 F.3d 1047 (8th Cir. 2000). An employee of a state corrections department sued department officials under § 1983 and a state civil rights act alleging that the officials retaliated against him for giving testimony in a lawsuit between a former coworker and the department. The district court denied summary judgment to the officials in their personal capacities on the First Amendment claim and they appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The appeals court held that the employee provided sufficient evidence of a causal link between his testimony and the adverse employment actions he suffered, as required to make a case of unlawful retaliation under the First Amendment. The court also found that a reasonable finder of fact could conclude that a deputy director, prison warden, assistant warden, and internal affairs investigator unlawfully retaliated against the employee and were not entitled to qualified immunity on either the First Amendment claim or the free speech claim under the state civil rights act. The court found that the reasons given by the officials for taking adverse actions against the employee shortly after his testimony were false, and that the employee's work record had been exemplary. (Arkansas Department of Correction)

U.S. Appeals Court
FREE SPEECH
RETALIATION

Jeffes v. Barnes, 208 F.3d 49 (2nd Cir. 2000). Corrections officers who publicly criticized alleged assaults of county jail inmates by other officers, and who assisted in a federal investigation, brought a § 1983 action against the county, sheriff and other county officials asserting First Amendment claims based on alleged retaliation. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants as to official capacity claims and claims against the county. The officers appealed and the appeals court vacated and remanded. The appeals court held that material issues of fact as to whether the alleged retaliation was caused at least indirectly by the sheriff precluded summary judgment. (Schenectady County Jail, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
TERMINATION
FREE SPEECH

Knight v. Vernon, 214 F.3d 544 (4th Cir. 2000). A former jailer brought a § 1983 action against a sheriff and county for violation of her free speech and due process rights. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants and the jailer appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part and remanded. The appeals court held that the jailer's political allegiance to the sheriff was not an appropriate requirement for performance of her job as a jailer and that fact issues precluded summary judgment on her political firing claim. According to the court, the First Amendment protected the jailer from discharge for failing to support the sheriff in a primary election because the jailer's duties were routine, circumscribed and ministerial and the jailer did not engage in law enforcement activities on behalf of the sheriff and was not entrusted with broad discretion. (Rockingham County Jail, North Carolina)

U.S. District Court
TERMINATION
FREE SPEECH

Kujawski v. Board of Com'rs of Bartholomew Cty, 104 F.Supp.2d 1027 (S.D.Ind. 2000). A former employee brought a § 1983 action against a county and its community corrections department alleging wrongful termination in retaliation for exercise of his First Amendment rights. The district court entered summary judgment for the defendants but the appeals court reversed and remanded. On remand the district court denied summary judgment for the defendants, finding that the retaliatory discharge of the community corrections officer violated the First Amendment. The court found that the statement of the officer at a work-sponsored social function held during normal working hours, that was attended by persons employed outside of the department, was a statement of public concern. The officer had commented on a department policy not to confiscate guns found while arresting offenders sentenced to home detention. The court noted that there was no animosity between the officer and his supervisor before the incident. (Bartholomew County Community Corrections Department, South Dakota)

U.S. District Court
TERMINATION
RACIAL DISCRIMINATION
RETALIATION

Lewis v. Delaware County, 109 F.Supp.2d 406 (E.D.Pa. 2000). A prison guard sued county officials alleging violation of federal and state law in connection with sanctions and ultimately dismissal following his accusations that a fellow guard engaged in brutality. The district court denied summary judgment for the defendants on the allegations of retaliatory action in violation of the guard's First Amendment rights, racial discrimination and state law. The guard alleged that he was dismissed on racial grounds for complaining about the alleged brutality of a white guard. The guard had reported two violent incidents to the FBI, triggering an extensive investigation into the county prison. The court found that a State Prison Board of Inspectors did not have sufficient supervisory authority over the operation of the county prison to have any liability. (Delaware County Prison, Pennsylvania)

U.S. Appeals Court
TERMINATION
RACIAL DISCRIMINATION

Perry v. McGinnis, 209 F.3d 597 (6th Cir. 2000). An African-American employee who had been employed as a hearing officer for a state corrections department brought an action alleging that he was terminated due to his race. The district court dismissed the case and the employee appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded, finding that the employee's decisions made in inmate disciplinary hearings constituted protected "expression" under the First Amendment and involved matters of public concern. The appeals court held that the employee's complaint of racially disparate treatment, made by way of an internal grievance, was a matter of public concern for First Amendment purposes. (Michigan Department of Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
DISCRIMINATION
RACIAL DISCRIMINATION

Ramirez v. Department of Corrections, Colo., 222 F.3d 1238 (10th Cir. 2000). Hispanic employees of a state corrections department brought § 1983 claims for discrimination. The district court denied the defendants' motion to dismiss. The appeals court affirmed and remanded, finding that the employees stated a claim that officials engaged in racial and national origin discrimination in violation of the employees' equal protection rights. The employees had alleged that state corrections officials treated them differently than similarly-situated non-Hispanic employees, made false accusations against them in an effort to have them disciplined, upheld unjustified reductions in performance evaluations, regularly denied supervisory positions, and denied them the ability to function as lead-workers. (Colorado Department of Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
TERMINATION
ADA- Americans with Disabilities Act

Renaud v. Wyoming Dept. of Family Services, 203 F.3d 723 (10th Cir. 2000). The terminated superintendent of a state juvenile corrections facility brought an action against the state for breach of contract and violations of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA). Following a jury trial the district court entered judgment for the state. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the superintendent could be terminated at will and that the district court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to instruct the jury that alcoholism was a disability in all cases for the purposes of ADA. (Wyoming Boys School)

- U.S. Appeals Court
RACIAL DISCRIMINATION
HARASSMENT
HOSTILE WORK
ENVIRONMENT
RETALIATION
TITLE VII
- Ross v. Douglas County, Nebraska, 234 F.3d 391 (8th Cir. 2000). A black former correctional officer brought an action against a county under Title VII for disparate treatment, hostile work environment and retaliation. The district court entered judgment on jury verdict in favor of the officer and the county appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that a black supervisor's constant use of racial epithets toward the plaintiff created a hostile work environment and that testimony that a warden's actions were for the purposes of retaliation was sufficient. The plaintiff had been permanently assigned to an extremely stressful position after he filed his employment discrimination charge. The court noted that even though the plaintiff alleged only a few specific incidences of racial harassment, this did not preclude the finding that the supervisor's harassment was sufficiently severe to support the plaintiff's claim of a hostile work environment. Because evidence showed that the plaintiff was forced to take a lower-paying job, without health benefits for his family, and suffered financial strain that included repossession of two automobiles, the appeals court found that the award of $100,000 for emotional distress and mental anguish was not excessive. (Douglas County Correctional Facility, Nebraska)
- U.S. District Court
HIRING/
QUALIFICATIONS
SEX
DISCRIMINATION
- Rucker v. City of Kettering, 84 F.Supp.2d 917 (S.D.Ohio 2000). A female applicant for a civilian jailer position asserted claims under § 1983 and a state law prohibiting gender discrimination in employment. The district court denied the applicant's motion for a preliminary injunction. The district court held that the city jail, which housed only male inmates, was required to follow state standards and regulations that required certain tasks be performed by officers who were of the same sex as inmates. (City of Kettering, Ohio)
- U.S. Appeals Court
FREE SPEECH
TERMINATION
- Sowards v. Loudon County, 203 F.3d 426 (6th Cir. 2000). A former jailer brought a § 1983 action against a county and sheriff alleging she was terminated for exercising her First Amendment rights of political and intimate association. The district court entered summary judgment in favor of the defendants and the jailer appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded, finding that the jailer engaged in a protected right of political association when she supported her husband's campaign for the office of sheriff, and that the jailer met her initial burden of establishing she was engaged in the protected conduct of intimate association. The appeals court found that the exception under which a public employee may be dismissed on the basis of political affiliation did not apply to the jailer and that the sheriff was not qualifiedly immune from the jailer's claims. (Loudon County Sheriff's Department, Tennessee)
- U.S. Appeals Court
DISCRIMINATION
PROMOTION
- Thomas v. Texas Dept. of Criminal Justice, 220 F.3d 389 (5th Cir. 2000). A Black female lieutenant brought an action against a state corrections department under Title VII for race and gender discrimination and retaliation. The district court entered judgment in favor of the lieutenant and the state appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part and reversed in part and remanded. The appeals court upheld the findings that failure to promote and retaliation were based on race and gender discrimination, but found that the inclusion of the charge of race discrimination in housing was an abuse of discretion by the district court. (Texas Department of Criminal Justice)
- U.S. Appeals Court
SEXUAL HARASSMENT
RETALIATION
- White v. New Hampshire Dept. of Corrections, 221 F.3d 254 (1st Cir. 2000). A female former correctional officer brought a Title VII action against a state corrections department alleging direct sexual harassment, hostile work environment and retaliation. Following a jury trial the federal district court entered judgment in favor of the department. The appeals court affirmed. The officer had alleged that sexual conversations and jokes were common in the workplace and that she was warned that she should not enter the supply room because she was female. (N. H. State Prison)
- 2001
- U.S. District Court
DISCRIMINATION
TITLE VII
DISCIPLINE
- Allen v. Ohio Dept. of Rehabilitation and Corr., 128 F.Supp.2d 483 (S.D.Ohio 2001). An African-American probationary correctional officer brought an employment discrimination action against a state department of corrections and its officials under Title VII, § 1983 and § 1981. The district court held that monetary claims against the officials in their official capacities under § 1983 were barred by the Eleventh Amendment, and the department's disciplinary actions against the officer were not sufficiently adverse to support claims under Title VII and § 1981. The court found that the officer was not denied due process as the result of a one-day suspension for violation of a work rule, where the deprivation was de minimis and was reduced through internal grievance procedures, and he was granted a hearing at which he was represented by a union officer. The department had created an action plan following complaints about the officer's behavior, extended the officer's probationary period by 90 days, and issued a one-day suspension. (Franklin Pre-Release Ctr., Ohio)
- U.S. Appeals Court
FREE SPEECH
RELIGION
DISCIPLINE
- Altman v. Minnesota Dept. of Corrections, 251 F.3d 1199 (8th Cir. 2001). Employees at a state correctional facility brought an action against the state department of corrections alleging that reprimands they received for reading their Bibles during a mandatory training program violated their constitutional rights. The district court dismissed some claims but granted relief on the employees' free exercise and freedom of conscience claims. The appeals court reversed and remanded, finding that the employees' conduct constituted speech on a matter of public interest.

The court found that the manner in which the department dealt with issues of gays and lesbians in the workplace, the subject of the 75 minute training session, was a matter of political and social concern to the general public. But the court found that the department did not impose a significant burden on the employees' exercise of religion by requiring them to attend the training session, where the employees were assured by the department that they were not being told what to believe. The court found that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to the department's motive in issuing written reprimands to the employees. (Minn. Corr'l Facil., Shakopee)

U.S. District Court
FREE SPEECH
RETALIATION

Bailor v. Taylor, 170 F.Supp.2d 466 (D.Del. 2001). A former internal affairs investigator for a state corrections department brought an action against corrections officials, alleging they had retaliated against him for exercising his First Amendment right to free speech and that he was constructively discharged by the officials' retaliatory conduct. The district court held that the investigator's speech regarding wrongdoing by corrections officers was entitled to First Amendment protection and that summary judgment for the officials was precluded by fact questions regarding the alleged retaliation and the circumstances of the investigator's termination. Officials had criticized the investigator's report following an inmate riot, telling him that it contained unsupported conclusions and was vague, and directing him to revise it. The investigator protested the order to revise the report but eventually did so because he feared for his job. The investigator eventually resigned from his position after allegedly being subjected to retaliatory actions. (Delaware Department of Corrections)

U.S. Supreme Court
DISABILITY
ADA- Americans with Disabilities Act

Board of Trustees of the University of Alabama v. Garrett, 531 U.S. 356 (2001). A security officer for an Alabama state youth detention facility, and a nurse for an Alabama state university hospital brought separate lawsuits seeking monetary damages against their state employers under Title I of the Americans With Disabilities Act (ADA). The cases were consolidated on appeal. The federal appeals court upheld the right of the employees to pursue such claims, finding that Congress had validly abrogated the Eleventh Amendment immunity of the states from suits for damages when it enacted ADA. The U.S. Supreme Court reversed, finding that Congress exceeded its constitutional authority when it attempted to allow private individuals to seek money damages against the states for violations of ADA. The Court ruled that Congress failed to identify a "history and pattern of irrational employment discrimination by the States against the disabled." The Court stated that it would be "entirely rational and therefore constitutional for a state employer to conserve scarce financial resources by hiring employees who are able to use existing facilities," rather than having to make reasonable accommodations for disabled employees who are not able to easily use such facilities. (Alabama)

U.S. District Court
ADA- Americans with Disabilities Act
DISCRIMINATION
FREE SPEECH
RETALIATION
EQUAL PROTECTION

Greco v. County of Nassau, 146 F.Supp.2d 232 (E.D.N.Y. 2001). A county corrections officer brought state and federal claims against county officials, alleging employment discrimination based on a perceived disability, retaliation, constitutional violations, and slander. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants. The court held that the officer failed to state a prima facie case of discrimination based on disability, because the employer clearly perceived the officer as being able to perform a broad range of tasks, as shown by the variety of assignments the officer had received. The court found that the officer's "abysmal" attendance record at work was a legitimate non-retaliatory reason for giving the officer a poor performance evaluation. The officer had testified before a county legislature regarding overtime pay. (Nassau County Sheriff's Dept., New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEARCHES
PRIVACY

Leverette v. Bell, 247 F.3d 160 (4th Cir. 2001). An employee of a state correctional institution brought a § 1983 action against an associate warden, alleging that a visual body cavity search of her person violated her Fourth Amendment right against unreasonable search and seizures. The district court denied summary judgment in favor of the associate warden and she appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded, finding that the associate warden was acting within the scope of her authority and that the search was reasonable under the Fourth Amendment. The court noted that the search was conducted pursuant to a particularized and individualized tip that the employee would be bringing contraband into the prison in a tampon on a specific occasion, that the inmate-informant who had provided that information had relayed accurate drug-related tips in the past, and the search itself was conducted by female officials, in a private setting. (Wateree River Correctional Institution, South Carolina)

U.S. Appeals Court
EQUAL PROTECTION
TERMINATION

Oest v. Illinois Dept. of Corrections, 240 F.3d 605 (7th Cir. 2001). A former correctional officer brought a suit against a state corrections department, alleging retaliation and discrimination against her on the basis of gender. The district court granted summary judgment for the department and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the former officer failed to establish that she was treated differently than similarly-situated male officers with regard to her disciplinary suspension and her eventual termination. The court also found that the former officer failed to prove a causal connection between her EEOC complaint and her termination, given that more than one year passed between the filing of her complaint and her discharge. (Hanna City Work Camp, Ill. Dept. of Corr.)

U.S. Appeals Court
PROTECTION FROM HARM

Nicholas v. Wallenstein, 266 F.3d 1083 (9th Cir. 2001). County jail employees who had participated in the restraint and removal of a prisoner who was suffering from a cocaine overdose brought a state court action under § 1983 based on the public identification of them as the persons who had participated in the cell extraction. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the employees did not show that the facility commander had acted with deliberate indifference to known or obvious dangers when he disclosed their identities to an angry group of the prisoner's family and friends while the prisoner was near death. The employees had struggled with the inmate and handcuffed him and used pepper spray to control him. When they put him on a restraint board he stopped breathing and had no pulse. He was revived and taken to a hospital where he later died. (King County Jail, Washington)

U.S. District Court
TITLE VII
HARASSMENT
HOSTILE WORK
ENVIRONMENT

Sharafeldin v. Maryland, Dept. of Public Safety, 131 F.Supp.2d 730 (D.Md. 2001). A former chaplain at a state prison, an African-American of Islamic faith and Sudanese origin, sued a state corrections department alleging hostile work environment and constructive discharge in violation of Title VII. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the corrections department, finding that numerous alleged incidents of harassment towards the chaplain involving his co-workers and his supervisors were not sufficient to establish constructive discharge under Title VII, even though the incidents caused the chaplain to suffer from Post Traumatic Stress Disorder. The court also found that a dispute and physical contact between the chaplain and his superiors did not violate Title VII where there was no evidence that the incident was motivated by the chaplain's race, religion or national origin. The court noted that not all verbal or physical harassment violates Title VII, and that discriminatory harassment by a co-worker is not actionable under Title VII. (Maryland Correctional Training Center, Hagerstown)

U.S. Appeals Court
RETALIATION
TRANSFERS
SEXUAL HARASSMENT
TITLE VII

Strouss v. Michigan Dept. of Corrections, 250 F.3d 336 (6th Cir. 2001). A nurse brought an action alleging that a state corrections department and state officials violated Title VII and her due process and equal protection rights by retaliating against her for complaining of sexual harassment. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants and the nurse appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court found that although the lateral transfer of the nurse to a state correctional facility where various inmates had allegedly made threats to her life was an "adverse employment action," the transfer was not causally connected to her opposition to a doctor's sexual comments or her complaints of a male supervisor's sexual harassment. The nurse had filed two EEOC complaints relating to her complaints. (State Prison of Southern Michigan)

U.S. Appeals Court
RETALIATION
TRANSFERS RACE
DISCRIMINATION
AGE DISCRIMINATION
TITLE VII

Stutler v. Illinois Dept. of Corrections, 263 F.3d 698 (7th Cir. 2001). A state corrections employee brought a § 1983 action against her supervisor and her employer, alleging retaliation, and race and sex discrimination. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the employer and supervisor, and the employee appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the employee's lateral transfer to another department was not an "adverse employment action" because there was no evidence that the transfer decreased the employee's benefits or responsibilities in any way. The court held that the transfer was not retaliatory because it was done to relieve tension between the employee and her supervisor, which had resulted from a breakdown of their friendship. The court also found that the supervisor's conduct-- sending an e-mail to her boss characterizing the employee's conduct as bizarre, telling the employee that she had to go, telling the employee that she would have to move to an unfinished reception area to work, asking the employee to return her key to the supervisor's office, and telling the employee that she could not forgive her for filing a lawsuit-- did not rise to the level of "adverse employment actions" for the purpose of a retaliation claim under Title VII. (Illinois Department of Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEARCHES

Virgili v. Gilbert, 272 F.3d 391 (6th Cir. 2001). An employee at a state correctional facility brought suit under § 1983 against fellow employees and a state patrol officer, who had performed a strip search of the employee, alleging that her rights under the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment had been violated. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants on the basis of qualified immunity and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that it was not clearly established at the time of the challenged search that that search was in violation of the employee's Fourth Amendment right, or implicated a liberty interest protected by the due process clause. The employee had been strip searched at the correctional facility at which she worked without "reasonable suspicion" of illegal activity. (Mansfield Correctional Institution, Ohio)

U.S. Appeals Court
FREE SPEECH
TERMINATION

Weeks v. Bayer, 246 F.3d 1231 (9th Cir. 2001). A former employee of a state corrections department sued the director and the department alleging that his termination violated his First Amendment free speech rights. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the director and the employee appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the employee's statement in response to an inquiry by a representative of another state agency did not involve a matter of public concern and thus was not protected by the First Amendment. The employee had told the representative of another state agency that the department's inmate substance abuse and rehabilitation programs were at risk of discontinuation due to delays by the director of the corrections department in insuring and allotting funds for the programs. (Nevada Dept. of Prisons)

U.S. Appeals Court
TITLE VII
SEXUAL HARASSMENT
RETALIATION

Weston v. Pennsylvania, 251 F.3d 420 (3rd Cir. 2001). A male culinary service officer brought an action against the Pennsylvania Department of Corrections and a female coworker, alleging hostile work environment, sexual harassment, and retaliation in violation of Title VII and a state human relations law. The district court dismissed the hostile work environment claim and granted summary judgment for the department on the retaliation claim. The appeals court affirmed in part, and reversed and remanded in part. The appeals court held that the allegations in the officer's complaint stated a claim for hostile work environment. The court permitted the officer to amend his complaint. The court found that two written reprimands that were placed in the officer's personnel file were not adverse employment actions under Title VII because the officer was not demoted in title, did not have his work schedule changed, was not reassigned, did not have his hours or work changed or altered in any way, and was not denied any pay raise or promotion as the result of the reprimands. (State Correctional Institution at Graterford, Pennsylvania)

U.S. District Court
HIRING/
QUALIFICATIONS
DISCRIMINATION

Winkelman v. Magne, 173 F.Supp.2d 821 (C.D.Ill. 2001). An applicant for employment with a state correctional facility filed a § 1983 action against employees responsible for interviewing candidates, alleging violation of his First Amendment rights. The district court granted summary judgment to the officials, finding that the applicant failed to tender any evidence of political affiliation discrimination. The court noted that politics, political affiliations, political beliefs, political activities, and political support were never mentioned or discussed at any time during the interview process. (Graham Correctional Facility, Illinois)

2002

U.S. Appeals Court
RETALIATION
FREE SPEECH

Allen v. Iranon, 283 F.3d 1070 (9th Cir. 2002). A prison physician brought a § 1983 action against corrections officials alleging retaliation for his public comments about inmate abuse. The district court entered judgment for the physician and the officials appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that evidence was sufficient to support the physician's retaliation claims. The physician had made public statements about inadequate inmate treatment to the news media and to the state legislature. He was subjected to two "lockouts," multiple Internal Affairs investigations, and he was passed over for a full-time permanent position in favor of a candidate who ranked lower after interviews and testing. (Halawa Correctional Facility, Hawaii)

U.S. District Court
WORKING CONDITIONS

Barstow v. Shea, 196 F.Supp.2d 141 (D.Conn. 2002). A nurse brought a suit against her supervisor at a locked nursing facility located in a correctional center. The nurse alleged that the supervisor prevented her from leaving work, despite her desire to seek medical treatment for an illness. The district court granted summary judgment, in part, in favor of the nurse. The court held that the supervisor was not entitled to qualified immunity for allegedly unreasonably seizing the nurse and for allegedly arbitrarily subjecting the nurse to differential treatment by requiring the nurse to have a coworker complete a medical incident report regarding her medical condition. The court found that the supervisor could be held liable for false imprisonment under state law, for directing a correctional officer not to unlock a door to permit the nurse to leave the facility due to a claimed illness. (Osborn Correctional Center, Connecticut)

U.S. Appeals Court
FREE SPEECH

Bass v. Richards, 308 F.3d 1081 (10th Cir. 2002). A reserve deputy brought a § 1983 action against a sheriff and others, alleging he was stripped of his reserve commission because he supported the sheriff's opponent in an election, in violation of his First Amendment speech and association rights. The district court denied the defendants' motion for summary judgment on qualified immunity and they appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, and dismissed the appeal in part. The appeals court held that it was clearly established that depriving the reserve deputy of his commission for exercising his speech and associational rights could have violated the First Amendment. The court held that the deputy's statements supporting the sheriff's opponent, although made in private, involved a matter of public concern. (Archuleta County, Colorado)

U.S. Appeals Court
DISCRIMINATION
FREE SPEECH
TERMINATION

Briscoe-King v. Terhune, 43 Fed.Appx. 45 (9th Cir. 2002) [unpublished]. A former state corrections employee brought a § 1983 action against her former supervisors, alleging she had been fired in retaliation for making protected statements. The district court denied summary judgment for the defendants and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court found that the employee's complaints about racial discrimination and reports of alleged misuse of state vehicles were matters of public concern, and that her interest in expressing herself outweighed the corrections department's interest in preventing workplace disruption. (California Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
DISCIPLINE
TERMINATION
SEXUAL HARASSMENT
TITLE VII

Church v. Maryland, 180 F.Supp.2d 708 (D.Md. 2002). A female former correctional officer brought an employment discrimination action against her former state employer and a male co-worker, alleging that she was subjected a hostile work environment, sexual harassment and retaliation. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court held that the employer exercised reasonable care to prevent and remedy alleged sexual harassment and took adequate, prompt remedial action to correct the alleged co-worker harassment. The court found that the officer's insubordination, failure to produce required documentation, and conduct that evidenced blatant disregard for the operational needs of the employer, were legitimate, non-retaliatory reasons for placing the officer on unpaid leave and eventually terminating her. (Maryland Department of Public Safety and Correctional Services)

U.S. District Court
DISCRIMINATION
HIRING/QUALIFI-CATIONS

Coffey v. Cox, 218 F.Supp.2d 997 (C.D.Ill. 2002). An applicant who was not chosen for a position with a state correctional facility brought a § 1983 action against state employees, alleging political affiliation discrimination. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants, finding that the decision not to offer the position to the applicant was based on legitimate, non-political reasons. The court noted that other candidates had scored higher on interview questions, and that none of the applicants had been questioned about politics, political support, political affiliation, or political activities at any time during the application or interview process. (Logan Correctional Facility, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
TERMINATION
PLRA-Prison Litigation Reform Act

Coley v. Grant County, 36 Fed.Appx. 242 (9th Cir. 2002). A corrections officer who suffered from a hearing impairment and who had been terminated sued a county, alleging wrongful termination under the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) and related statutes. The district court dismissed the case and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the county had valid non-pretextual reasons for terminating the officer, based on poor performance and non-hearing-related safety concerns. The court held that the county was not obligated to make any reasonable accommodations for the officer's hearing impairment because the officer did not request it, and his disability did not prevent him from asking for an accommodation. (Grant County Jail, Oregon)

U.S. District Court
INVESTIGATION
TERMINATION

Cooper v. Sedgwick County, Kansas, 206 F.Supp.2d 1126 (D.Kan. 2002). A former employee of a county sheriff's department sued a county, county sheriff, and several of the sheriff's subordinates alleging violations of her constitutional rights in connection with an investigation into unlawful smuggling of cigarettes into a county jail. The district court held that the employee stated a § 1983 malicious prosecution claim against the sheriff and two other alleged supervisory employees. One of the supervisory employees was a detective who allegedly coerced a false statement from an inmate in an affidavit of probable cause and knowingly omitted information. The court found that the employee stated a claim against the sheriff and another employee who allegedly participated in the investigation, directed it, and encouraged arresting the employee without probable cause. The court also found that the employee could state a § 1983 claim for damage to her liberty interest in her reputation, and that the employee stated a § 1983 claim of municipal liability against the county. The employee had been involved in a "peaceful protest" designed to call attention to jail employees' working conditions such as low wages and staff shortages. Less than a month after the protest the employee was investigated for unlawful smuggling of cigarettes into the facility and was eventually terminated. (Sedgwick County Jail, Kansas)

U.S. Appeals Court
TERMINATION
FREE SPEECH

Fiesel v. Cherry, 294 F.3d 664 (5th Cir. 2002). A former state corrections officer sued corrections officials, alleging they violated his free speech rights by terminating him in retaliation for an incident in which the former officer accompanied a co-employee to an internal affairs department interview and advised the co-employee. The district court entered summary judgment in favor of the officials and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the officer's speech was not a matter of public concern because it was made solely on behalf of a co-employee, and in the context of his encounter with investigators. (Goree Unit, Texas Dept. of Criminal Justice- Instit'l Division)

U.S. District Court
FREE SPEECH
TERMINATION
RETALIATION

Getz v. Board of County Com'rs, 194 F.Supp.2d 1154 (D.Kan. 2002). A former nurse at a county jail who had reported nursing practice violations brought an action against the county and county employees, alleging violation of her First Amendment free speech rights, Due Process rights, § 1983, and retaliatory termination for whistle-blowing in violation of the Kansas Whistleblower Act. The district court held that the nurse's statements to the president of the state nurses' association were matters of public concern, and that the county health department's interest in maintaining a harmonious workplace did not outweigh the nurse's rights to air her concerns regarding nursing practice violations. The district court denied, in part, summary judgment in favor of the defendants. (Shawnee County Jail, Kansas)

U.S. Appeals Court
TITLE VII
HOSTILE WORK
ENVIRONMENT
DISCRIMINATION
SEXUAL HARASSMENT

Gorski v. New Hampshire Dept. of Corrections, 290 F.3d 466 (1st Cir. 2002). A former state corrections department employee brought a Title VII action alleging that she was constructively discharged as a result of sexual harassment and a hostile work environment. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the department and dismissed the action. The appeals court vacated the dismissal of the hostile work environment claim and affirmed summary judgment in favor of the department on the sex discrimination claim. The appeals court held that the employee stated a hostile work environment claim under Title VII with her allegations that her supervisors discriminated against her on the basis of her gender and of her pregnancy by making derogatory comments about her pregnancy that gave rise to a sexually hostile work environment. The court noted that the employee cited seven separate examples of what she alleged were hostile and abusive comments. (New Hampshire Department of Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
FREE SPEECH

Heggen v. Lee, 284 F.3d 675 (6th Cir. 2002). Four county deputy sheriffs sued a sheriff alleging that he refused to reappoint them in retaliation for their support of his opponent in an election. The district court denied summary judgment for the sheriff and he appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the deputies did not fall into the policy-making exception and could not be dismissed because of their political affiliation. The court noted that this principle was clearly established at the time that the sheriff refused to reappoint the deputies. (Hopkins County, Kentucky)

U.S. Appeals Court
TITLE VII
CONTRACTORS

Hunt v. State of Missouri, Dept. of Corrections, 297 F.3d 735 (8th Cir. 2002). Female nurses who had been assigned by a temporary staffing agency to provide nursing services to state prisons, brought claims against the corrections department under Title VII. The district court entered judgment in favor of the nurses on the retaliation claims and awarded them attorney fees. The nurses appealed and the appeals court affirmed the district court decision. The appeals court held that the nurses were employees of the department, not independent contractors, and thus had standing to sue under Title VII, noting that the existence of a contract referring to a party as an independent contractor does not end the inquiry into whether the individual employee is protected by Title VII. According to the court, a person may have two or more employers for the same work, for the purposes of conferring standing to sue under Title VII. The court noted that the nurses did not work independently and were constantly under the supervision and scrutiny of corrections officials and employees, and although they were paid directly by the temporary staffing agencies, the nurses did no other work for the agency other than the prison work. The appeals court found that the nurses were constructively discharged, where their complaints about their treatment on the job were answered with threats to their well-being, threats of termination, efforts to obstruct their work, additional unnecessary and unreasonable job requirements, and general harassment. The court held that the award of $136,967 in attorney fees was warranted, even though the nurses did not prevail on their sexual harassment claims. (Jefferson City Correctional Center, Missouri)

U.S. District Court
TITLE VII
GENDER DISCRIMINATION
RETALIATION

Kulikowski v. Board of County Com'rs. of County, 231 F.Supp.2d 1053 (D.Colo. 2002). A white male former county employee brought an action against a county and supervisors alleging sex discrimination and retaliation in violation of Title VII, denial of equal protection, and retaliation for exercising his free speech rights. The district court held that genuine issues of material fact precluded summary judgment on the Title VII retaliation and gender discrimination claims, and that the employee established a prima facie case of reverse discrimination. The court found that the employee's poor work performance might have been a pretext for retaliation against the employee. The employee, who had worked for the county community corrections department for 18 years, had repeatedly questioned the management and make-up of a local domestic violence program, noting that the program's board was composed entirely of females. The employee had suggested that the program might be violating the county's funding regulations. (Boulder County Community Corrections, CO)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEXUAL HARASSMENT
TITLE VII
RETALIATION

Longstreet v. Illinois Dept. of Corrections, 276 F.3d 379 (7th Cir. 2002). A female correctional center employee brought a Title VII action against a state corrections department and the center's warden, alleging sexual harassment and retaliation. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants and the employee appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the department's response of reassigning a male employee after the plaintiff complained of a sexual harassment incident was not obviously unreasonable. According to the plaintiff, a male employee offered her money to perform sexual acts. The court did not find evidence of retaliation. (Joliet Corr'l Ctr., Ill.)

U.S. Appeals Court
TERMINATION
FREE SPEECH

Marcum v. McWhorter, 308 F.3d 635 (6th Cir. 2002). A former deputy sheriff sued a sheriff, alleging that his First and Fourteenth Amendment rights were violated when he was fired for carrying on an intimate relationship with, and cohabitating with a married woman. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the sheriff and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the deputy's adulterous affair was not constitutionally protected, noting that the right to engage in an intimate sexual relationship with the spouse of another could not be said to be deeply rooted in the nation's history and tradition. (Pulaski County, Kentucky)

U.S. District Court
SEX
DISCRIMINATION
TITLE VII
UNION
RETALIATION

Martin v. New York Dept. of Correctional Services, 224 F.Supp.3d 434 (N.D.N.Y. 2002). A male employee of a state corrections department, who was a homosexual, sued the department, employee union, and coworkers. The employee alleged sexual discrimination, retaliation, violation of equal protection and breach of duty of fair representation. The employee described an incident in which two coworkers handcuffed him to the arsenal window during a shift change so that most of the officers leaving the facility could see that he was handcuffed to the window. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court held that Title VII prohibits sexual harassment between men and women as well as same-sex sexual harassment, but for the purposes of Title VII "sex" means gender, and harassment on the basis of sexual orientation is not actionable. The court found that the employee failed to demonstrate that the harassment he endured was based on his non-conformity with gender norms instead of his orientation. The court held that the union fulfilled its duty of fair representation with respect to the grievances filed by the employee, and that the alleged conduct of shop stewards who refused to draft and file grievances could not be imputed to the union council. (Coxsackie Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
FREE SPEECH
TERMINATION
RETALIATION

Martinez v. Texas Dept. of Criminal Justice, 300 F.3d 567 (5th Cir. 2002). A former corrections officer brought a state court action against a corrections department, alleging that her termination violated the Texas Whistleblower Act and the First Amendment. After removal to federal court, the district court denied the defendants' motion for summary judgment. The appeals court reversed and remanded, finding that the defendants were entitled to qualified immunity. The appeals court held that although officer's speech in reporting an alleged major use-of-force incident implicated a matter of public concern, and that her speech motivated the decision to terminate her, the defendants showed that the officer would have been terminated regardless of her protected conduct. According to the court, the department had sufficient evidence to terminate the officer for improper sexual activity with an inmate. (Dolph Briscoe Unit, Texas Department of Criminal Justice)

U.S. Appeals Court SEXUAL HARASSMENT RETALIATION TITLE VII	Miller v. New Hampshire Dept. of Corrections, 296 F.3d 18 (1st Cir. 2002). A state corrections department employee brought an action against the department, alleging that his superiors retaliated against him for engaging in protected conduct, in violation of Title VII, after he supported one of his subordinates in her sexual harassment claim. The district court granted summary judgment for the department and the appeals court affirmed. The court held that the alleged retaliatory acts that occurred within Title VII's 300-day limitation period, including denial of the employee's application for another position, were either not discriminatory or were too trivial to amount to constructive discharge. (New Hampshire State Prison)
U.S. District Court DISCRIMINATION ASSOCIATION	Moreland v. Miami-Dade County, 255 F.Supp.2d 1304 (S.D.Fla. 2002). A former corrections officer sued the county in state court, asserting claims for alleged race discrimination in violation of state and federal laws, equal protection and due process violations, and state law claims for negligent race discrimination, negligent supervision of employees, and retaliation in violation of state law. The federal district court granted summary judgment in favor of the county, in part. The court held that the county offered legitimate, nondiscriminatory reason for the officer's demotion. The court found that the former county corrections officer failed to show that, based on her race, a county manager disciplined her more severely than non-African American employees who violated a rule proscribing employees from associating with inmates and former inmates. The correctional officer had been dating a former county jail inmate. (Miami-Dade County Corrections Department, MDCC Jail, Florida)
U.S. Appeals Court HIRING/ QUALIFICATIONS	Morris v. Crawford County, 299 F.3d 919 (8th Cir. 2002). A county detention center detainee brought § 1983 and state law battery claims against a sheriff, county, and deputies. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants, in part, and the remaining claims were voluntarily dismissed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that there was not a strong causal connection between a deputy sheriff's background and the specific constitutional violation alleged by the detainee. The detainee had been arrested and charged with driving while intoxicated and disorderly conduct. After arriving at a county detention center, he refused to take a breathalyzer test and began to yell and bang on his cell door. Four deputies responded, and according to the detainee, they repeatedly assaulted him as they dragged him to another cell. One deputy allegedly used excessive force on the detainee by utilizing a "knee drop" on him, which severed the detainee's intestine. The court noted that the only violent act in the deputy's record was an incident in which he slapped an inmate, although ex parte protective orders were obtained against the deputy by both his ex-wife and girlfriend. The appeals court held that the sheriff and the county were not liable under § 1983 on the theory of deliberate indifference in hiring the deputy. (Crawford County Detention Center, Arkansas)
U.S. District Court TITLE VII RACIAL DISCRIMINATION PROMOTION	Mustafa v. State of Nebraska Dept. of Correctional, 196 F.Supp.2d 945 (D.Neb. 2002). An employee brought Title VII and civil rights claims against a corrections department, corrections officials, and members of an interview board. The employee alleged that he was subjected to discrimination by the board's decision not to recommend him for a case manager position. The district court denied the defendants' motion for summary judgment, in part, finding that the employee established a prima facie case of employment discrimination under Title VII for failure to promote. The employee, an African-American, applied for one of eight open positions and was permitted to interview, but was not selected for a position even though several nonprotected persons received positions. (Nebraska Department of Correctional Services)
U.S. Appeals Court TITLE VII RETALIATION	Petersen v. Utah Dept. of Corrections, 301 F.3d 1182 (10th Cir. 2002). A former employee sued a state corrections department under Title VII, and corrections officials under § 1983, alleging she was subjected to retaliation for opposing discriminatory treatment of a Native American co-worker. The district court entered summary judgment in favor of the defendants and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the department's motives for adverse actions against the employee were not her opposition to alleged discriminatory treatment, since the employee had not communicated her beliefs to anyone at the time of the alleged adverse action. The court held that the Department's unsuccessful attempt to transfer the employee was not an adverse action upon which a Title VII claim could be based, nor was the employee's claim that she was "out of the information loop." The employee alleged that a Deputy Warden referred to a Native American employee as a "lazy Indian," asked the employee if the natives were restless, and let out "war whoops" when the employee did not respond. (Central Utah Correctional Facility)
U.S. Appeals Court PROTECTION FROM HARM SEXUAL HARASSMENT	Sperle v. Michigan Dept. of Corrections, 297 F.3d 483 (6th Cir. 2002). The husband of a woman who was murdered while working in a prison sued officials for failing to prevent her murder and for allowing a sexually hostile work environment to exist at the prison. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the prison officials did not act with deliberate indifference, that the husband failed to establish a fact issue in his wife's sexual harassment claim, and that the husband failed to prove that the prison, through any direct act, specifically intended to injure his wife. A prisoner murdered the plaintiff's wife when she was working at her job in the prison store. The court noted that even if prison officials could have made working conditions safer for the wife by providing personal protection devices to employees, adding extra security officers, or insuring greater supervision of the prisoner, they did not act in a manner that shocked the conscience of the court or that indicated any intent to injure her. (Huron Valley Men's Facility, Michigan)

U.S. District Court
FREE SPEECH
TERMINATION

Via v. Taylor, 224 F.Supp.2d 753 (D.Del. 2002). A former correctional officer brought an action against corrections officials alleging that she was wrongfully terminated because of her off-duty relationship with a paroled former inmate. The district court held that the corrections department code of conduct that prohibited off-duty personal contact with offenders was not substantially related to the state's interest in the orderly function of prisons and concerns about being discredited in the public eye. The court found no evidence that the officer's relationship with a former inmate had any impact on staff or inmates. The court noted that the code did not prohibit relationships between prison employees and persons outside the prison system who knew inmates who were under the employees' supervision, and that the officer's job performance was not negatively impacted by her association with the former inmate. The court held that the conduct code was void because of it was vague and overly broad, and violated the officer's off-duty rights to personal association and privacy. The code read, in part: "Trafficking with incarcerated offenders is prohibited. No staff person shall have any personal contact with an offender, incarcerated or non-incarcerated, beyond that contact necessary for the proper supervision and treatment of the offender... Any sexual contact with offenders is strictly prohibited." According to the court, the code was open for discriminatory enforcement, failed to clearly set forth the prohibited conduct, appeared to create a safe harbor for employees who reported relationships that allegedly infringed, and failed to notify officers of possible disciplinary measures to which they might be subjected if they violated the code. The court found that the officials were entitled to qualified immunity because these rights were not clearly established at the time the officer was discharged. (Sussex Corr. Inst., Delaware)

2003

U.S. Appeals Court
FREE SPEECH
ASSOCIATION
WORK RULES

Akers v. McGinnis, 352 F.3d 1030 (6th Cir. 2003). Current and former employees of a corrections department sued department administrators, challenging the constitutionality of a department rule that barred all employees from any nonwork-related contact with prisoners, parolees, probationers (offenders), their relatives and visitors. Some of the employees sought reinstatement after they had been discharged for violating the rule. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the actual and hypothetical associations with which the work rule allegedly interfered did not touch on matters of public concern. The court found that the rule did not violate the employees' freedom of expressive association rights, nor did it directly or substantially interfere with employees' intimate association rights. The court noted that the department had a legitimate interest in preventing fraternization between its employees and offenders and their families, and that the rule was a rational means for advancing that interest. (Michigan Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
HARASSMENT
FREE SPEECH
HOSTILE WORK
ENVIRONMENT

Baron v. Hickey, 242 F.Supp.2d 66 (D.Mass. 2003). A county corrections officer who was allegedly harassed by coworkers after reporting the misconduct of a fellow officer, brought an action against a sheriff and a county sheriff's department. The district court held that the alleged supervisory tolerance of harassment was a "matter of public concern" for the purposes of a First Amendment retaliation claim. The court found triable issues of fact regarding whether the officer's resignation was voluntary and if the department had a custom or policy of condoning a "code of silence." The officer had reported a coworker's misconduct for playing cards with an inmate. The officer's coworkers allegedly began to harass him on a daily basis, calling him names, taping defamatory posters to his locker, making threatening phone calls, smearing feces on his car, and slashing his tires. (Suffolk County House of Correction, Massachusetts)

U.S. Appeals Court
FREE SPEECH
TERMINATION

Catletti Ex Rel. Estate of Catletti v. Rampe, 334 F.3d 225 (2nd Cir. 2003). The widow of a former county employee brought a § 1983 action, alleging that the employee was fired in violation of the First Amendment for testifying truthfully in favor of former employees in an action against the county. The district court denied qualified immunity for the defendants and they appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the former employee's testimony was protected by the First Amendment, as a matter of public concern, and that the right of the employee to speak on issues of public concern without retaliation was clearly established at the time the employee was fired. The employee had provided testimony about problems with the jail's mental health services, in a trial that examined whether other county employees had been wrongfully terminated for their public criticism of the county jail's mental health services. (Orange County Jail, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
UNION
FREE SPEECH

Cobb v. Pozzi, 352 F.3d 79 (2nd Cir. 2003). County corrections officers brought a § 1983 action alleging that they were disciplined in retaliation for their association with their union, in violation of the First Amendment. Following a jury trial, the district court entered judgment for the officers and the defendants appealed. The appeals court reversed in part, vacated in part, and remanded. The appeals court held that the officers had demonstrated that the associational activity at issue touched on a matter of public concern for the purposes of a First Amendment claim, but failed to show that the activity (union membership) was a substantial or motivating factor in the officers' discipline. (Westchester County Department of Corrections, New York)

U.S. District Court
SEXUAL HARASSMENT
TITLE VII
HOSTILE WORK
ENVIRONMENT

Dennis v. Nevada, 282 F.Supp.2d 1177 (D.Nev. 2003). A state corrections officer sued a state under Title VII and § 1983, alleging she was sexually harassed by her supervisor. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the state. According to the court, the officer established a prima facie case of discrimination, but the state established an affirmative defense with its non-harassment policy, and its procedure to address harassment problems. The court noted that the officer established that a reasonable person in her position could find that her working environment was abusive and hostile, and that the hostile working environment reasonably interfered with her work performance in violation of Title VII. The officer alleged that while she was assigned to a control room with her supervisor, he made physical contact with her, such as touching her hands, ears, hair and face, and sat unnecessarily close to her. She alleged that the supervisor frequently attempted to convince her to begin a dating relationship with him, and made two attempts to kiss her while she was on the job. (Northern Nevada Correctional Center)

U.S. District Court
FREE SPEECH
TERMINATION
TITLE VII

Dennison v. Pennsylvania Dept. of Corrections, 268 F.Supp.2d 387 (M.D.Pa. 2003). A discharged employee sued a state corrections department and co-workers, asserting claims that included violation of Title VII, state human relations laws, wrongful discharge, and violation of a state whistleblower law. The district court granted summary judgment in part, and denied it in part. The court held that the employee's termination for distributing confidential inmate records to non-authorized persons did not violate his free speech rights. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by factual issues concerning his retaliation claim based on his verbal protestations of alleged discrimination, his § 1983 conspiracy claim, his Title VII claims based on reports of his employer's discrimination practices, and his whistleblower claims. The court held that speech concerning racial discrimination in the state's parole determinations was a matter of public concern. The employee had disseminated confidential prison records in an effort to address the alleged discrimination. The court found that the employee's interests did not outweigh the department's interest in keeping inmate psychological records confidential. (Pennsylvania Department of Corrections, State Correctional Institution- Mahanoy)

U.S. District Court
STAFFING LEVELS
WORKING CONDITIONS

Fraternal Order of Police v. Williams, 263 F.Supp.2d 45 (D.D.C. 2003). The union that represented correctional employees sued the District of Columbia to force a change in staffing patterns at a jail. The district court dismissed the action, finding that the District's alleged failure to provide correctional officers with a safe working environment did not violate their substantive due process rights under the Fifth Amendment. The union was concerned about overcrowding and a reduction in the jail work force. (Central Detention Facility, District of Columbia)

U.S. District Court
FREE SPEECH
DISABILITY

Kriegal v. State Of Rhode Island, Dept. Of Corrs., 266 F.Supp.2d 288 (D.R.I. 2003). A state employee who was a former probation counselor brought a state court action alleging First Amendment violations, and violation of state fair employment, handicap, and civil rights laws. The case was removed to federal court, where the district court granted summary judgment, in part, for the defendants. The court held that even if the employee demonstrated that the statements he made on the radio about the corrections department were of public interest, he failed to demonstrate that his discharge was motivated by his protected speech, as required for a retaliation claim. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the accommodation requested by the counselor who had vision problems, to refrain from coverage of courtrooms which required rapid eye movement, was reasonable and whether the state's denial was unreasonable. The counselor had started as a juvenile counselor, sustained an injury with an inmate and spent ten years on workers' compensation. (Rhode Island Department of Corrections, Adult Probation and Parole)

U.S. District Court
DISABILITY
HOSTILE WORK
ENVIRONMENT

McCall v. Board of Com'rs of County of Shawnee, KS, 291 F.Supp.2d 1216 (D.Kan. 2003). A female former county corrections officer brought an employment discrimination action in state court, alleging violations of Title VII, the Age Discrimination in Employment Act (ADEA), the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) and the Rehabilitation Act. The case was removed to federal district court, where the county defendants were granted summary judgment. The former officer had complained of various forms of harassment directed at her during her employment but made no allegations concerning harassment involving others. The court held that the former officer was not subjected to a sexually hostile work environment, where her allegations were not gender-based. The court held that the county board of commissioners' refusal to honor a doctor's order that she not work more than eight hours a day, and her retroactive termination, were not sufficiently pervasive or severe to alter the terms, conditions, or privileges of her employment. (Shawnee County Department of Corrections, Kansas)

U.S. District Court
TERMINATION
DUE PROCESS
PROBATION

McClain v. Northwest Comm. Corr. Ctr., 268 F.Supp.2d 941 (N.D.Ohio 2003). A probationary employee of a community corrections center brought a wrongful termination action. The district court held that the employee was entitled to minimal due process of notice and an opportunity to be heard, before termination of her employment. The court noted that the employee could be terminated without cause because she was an at-will employee who was still in her probationary period. The employee had attended a meeting which critiqued her work but she was not told prior to the meeting that her conduct was at issue, or that it could lead to her termination. She was later given an ultimatum to either quit or be fired but was not told why the ultimatum had been issued. (Northwest Community Corrections Center, Ohio)

U.S. District Court
SEARCHES
PRIVACY

Pierce v. Ohio Dept. of Rehabilitation and Corr., 284 F.Supp.2d 811 (N.D.Ohio 2003). Correctional officers brought a § 1983 action against a corrections department, challenging personnel strip search policies and alleging breach of a settlement agreement in a prior case. The district court dismissed the action. The court found that some of the officers had standing to bring the action, but that the officers' union lacked standing to pursue damages for its members' injuries, although it retained standing to seek declaratory relief. The court held that the imposition of a reasonable suspicion standard for the strip searches balanced the officers' Fourth Amendment interests with the government's interest in keeping contraband out of prisons. Under the reasonable suspicion standard, strip searches of prison employees must be articulable, particularized, and individualized, and officials must base strip searches on specific, objective facts and rational inferences based on those facts in light of their experience. The court ruled that the searches did not violate Equal Protection rights or the Due Process Clause. The court held that the searches violated the Fourth Amendment, where officers were chosen at random for searches, but that correctional officials were entitled to qualified immunity. The court noted that employees' legitimate expectations of privacy were diminished in a prison setting, and that employees were on notice that they were subject to searches. (Ohio Department of Rehabilitation and Corrections)

U.S. District Court
UNION
CONTRACT

Rhode Island Broth. Of Officers v. Rhode Island, 264 F.Supp.2d 87 (D.R.I. 2003). A state corrections officers' union sued a state and officials, challenging a statute that amended the method of compensating officers who amassed education credits, from a percentage of pay to a flat rate. The district court entered summary judgment in favor of the state. The court held that the change in the compensation formula did not violate the takings clause, and that the statute did not constitute a contract breach. The court noted that the state gave corrections employees sufficient notice of termination of the collective bargaining agreement, when the legislature considered and passed the statute that changed the method of compensation. (Rhode Island Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
TERMINATION
FREE SPEECH

Shepard v. Wapello County, Iowa, 250 F.Supp.2d 1112 (S.D.Iowa, 2003). A former county corrections officer sued a county and a sheriff, alleging wrongful termination as the result of his complaints of illegal conduct by a fellow officer, and of fiscal mismanagement in connection with the denial of overtime pay. The district court denied summary judgment for the defendants. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by fact issues as to whether the termination violated state public policy, violated a state whistleblower statute, and was retaliation for assertion of his First Amendment rights. (Wapello County, Iowa)

2004

U.S. District Court
FREE SPEECH
DISCIPLINE
RELIGION

Akridge v. Wilkinson, 351 F.Supp.2d 750 (S.D.Ohio 2004). A prison chaplain brought a civil rights action against prison officials for their alleged retaliation against him for exercising his free speech rights. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court held that the chaplain's statements regarding the immorality of homosexuality, which he had made to justify his decision to prohibit a homosexual inmate from serving as the director of a choir, did not address matters of public concern as required to support a First Amendment retaliation claim. The court found that prison officials, who imposed a fine of two days on the chaplain for his insubordination in refusing to comply with an order to appoint the inmate director of the choir, disciplined the chaplain for his insubordinate actions, not for his statements about homosexuality that were made in support of his actions. The chaplain asserted that permitting a homosexual inmate to have a leadership role in the prison choir would potentially encourage inmates to violate prison rules against sexual behavior. According to the court, the chaplain offered no precedent sufficient to convince prison officials that his religious beliefs and opinions would outweigh the state's interest in preventing discrimination against inmates. (Madison Correctional Institution, Ohio)

U.S. District Court
SEARCHES

Allegheny County Prison Emp. v. County of Allegh., 315 F.Supp.2d 728 (W.D.Pa. 2004). Employees at a county jail brought a suit challenging its employee search policy, which involved random pat-down searches by same sex employees of all areas of the searched employee's body, including the abdomen and groin, as well as the removal of outer clothing, shoes and belts. The employees moved for a preliminary injunction. The district court denied the motion, finding that the employees failed to demonstrate the likelihood of success on their Fourth Amendment or equal protection claims. The court noted that the county had a strong government interest in controlling the flow of contraband into prisons, and that employees had a diminished expectation of privacy because they worked in a correctional facility. The search policy was uniformly applied to all employees and visitors who had contact with inmates. (Allegheny County Prison, Pennsylvania)

U.S. Appeals Court
UNION
FREE SPEECH

Cobb v. Pozzi, 363 F.3d 89 (2nd Cir. 2004). County corrections officers brought an action under § 1983, alleging that the county, corrections commissioner, and corrections chief of operations disciplined them in retaliation for their association with a union. Following a jury trial, the district court entered judgment for the corrections officers and the defendants appealed. The appeals court reversed in part, vacated in part and remanded. The court held that the instruction that an arbitrator's findings were binding on the jury was improper and that the erroneous jury instruction was not harmless. The officers had been disciplined in connection with the county's policy that required officers to work mandatory "forced overtime." (Westchester County Department of Corrections, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
FREE SPEECH
RETALIATION

Cygan v. Wisconsin Dept. of Corrections, 388 F.3d 1092 (7th Cir. 2004). A former correctional officer at a maximum security prison filed a § 1983 action alleging they violated her constitutional rights by terminating her in retaliation for exercising her First Amendment rights. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants and the officer appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the officer raised a matter of public concern when she expressed disagreement with the decision to start a second-shift meal with fewer than ten officers, because it touched on issues of internal prison security, even though she could accurately be characterized as a disgruntled employee and her speech may have been partly motivated by her dissatisfaction with the prison. But the court found that the potential disruptiveness of the officer's speech during that meal outweighed whatever First Amendment value the speech might have had. The court noted that the officer had complained in a loud, profane and unprofessional manner and in the presence of staff and inmates, endangering both groups by exposing them to opportunistic acts of violence and undermining the authority of her supervising officer in the presence of other officers and inmates. (Green Bay Correctional Institution, Wisconsin)

TERMINATION

U.S. District Court
SEXUAL HARASSMENT
HOSTILE WORK ENVIRONMENT

Dawson v. County of Westchester, 351 F.Supp.2d 176 (S.D.N.Y. 2004). Female correctional officers brought an action against a county and personnel of a county department of corrections, alleging hostile work environment claims and state law claims. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants in part, and denied it in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the county defendants' response to the officers' allegations of a hostile work environment was reasonable and prompt. The court found that a sergeant was the female officers' supervisor for purposes of holding the county vicariously liable for the sergeant's actions which created a hostile work environment, even though the sergeant had no authority to hire, fire, transfer or take other tangible employment actions against the officers. The court noted that the sergeant was next in the chain of command, the officers reported to him, and he had the power to enable or materially augment the ability to create a hostile work environment. The court found that the officers provided sufficient evidence to demonstrate intentional harassment by male co-workers and a supervisor, based on sex, in violation of equal protection. The officers alleged that they were subjects of two inmate letters containing a drawing and sexually explicit language, that they showed the male sergeant who failed to report the letter to a higher authority and failed to conduct any credible investigations about its authorship and circulation. They also alleged that the male sergeant engaged in inappropriate conversations with supervisors and officers about the contents and targets of the defamatory letters. (Westchester County Department of Corrections, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
INVESTIGATION

Escalera v. Lunn, 354 F.3d 198 (2nd Cir. 2004). A county corrections officer who had been arrested for official misconduct brought a § 1983 claim, alleging false arrest and malicious prosecution in connection with an investigation that officials conducted on him. The district court denied summary judgment for the defendants and they appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded with instructions. The court held that a police detective, police sergeant, commissioner of corrections, and county were entitled to qualified immunity. The court found that "arguable probable cause" exists if either it was objectively reasonable for an officer to believe that probable cause existed, or if officers of reasonable competence could disagree on whether the probable cause test was met. (Westchester County Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
HIRING/QUALIFICATIONS

Estevez-Yalcin v. Children's Village, 331 F.Supp.2d 170 (S.D.N.Y. 2004). A parent brought an action alleging that her children had been sexually abused by a volunteer at a county juvenile treatment rehabilitation center. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court held that the county did not negligently hire the volunteer or negligently retain or supervise the volunteer. According to the court, the failure of the county to conduct a background check on the volunteer before hiring him did not amount to negligent hiring, absent evidence that a routine background check would have revealed that the volunteer had a propensity to harm children. (The Children's Village, Westchester County Health Care Corporation, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
BFOQ - Bona Fide Occupational Qualification
SEX DISCRIMINATION

Everson v. Michigan Dept. of Corrections, 391 F.3d 737 (6th Cir. 2004). Male and female corrections officers brought a class action against a state corrections agency, alleging gender discrimination in staffing positions within female prison housing units. The district court granted judgment in favor of the officers and the state appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded, finding that female gender was a bona fide occupational qualification (BFOQ). The court held that female gender was a BFOQ under Title VII for correctional officer and residential unit officer positions in housing units at a female prison, since the exclusion of males from such positions was reasonably necessary to the normal operation of facilities. According to the court, the BFOQ materially advanced the security of the prison, safety of inmates, and protection of privacy rights of inmates, and reasonable alternatives to the plan were not identified. (Michigan Department of Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
WORKING CONDITIONS
STAFFING LEVELS

Fraternal Order of Police v. Williams, 375 F.3d 1141 (D.C.Cir. 2004). A correctional officers union brought a § 1983 action against the District of Columbia and District officials after several hundred officers were laid off at the same time that the number of inmates housed in the District's jail was increased. The district court dismissed the action for lack of subject matter jurisdiction and the union appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the district court did have subject matter jurisdiction of the union's § 1983 claim, but that the officials' action did not amount to an executive abuse of power that shocked the conscience, as required to support a substantive due process claim. According to the court, the union failed to demonstrate that an assault by an inmate on a staff member was a foreseeable risk of its members' employment. (Central Detention Facility, District of Columbia)

U.S. District Court
TERMINATION

Higgins v. Jefferson County, Ky., 344 F.Supp.2d 1004 (W.D.Ky. 2004). A former county corrections officer sued a county, alleging wrongful termination. The district court dismissed the case with prejudice. The court held that the officer received adequate pre-termination due process when he met with a supervisor and union representative, excessive court charges were read in his presence and he was given a brief opportunity to speak on his behalf. The court noted that the excessive force was displayed on a videotape and there was a need for the government to remove the officer quickly, and that the officer had extensive post-termination process available to correct any wrongful termination. (Jefferson County Corrections Department, Kentucky)

U.S. District Court
DISCIPLINE
FREE SPEECH
ASSOCIATION

Piscottano v. Murphy, 317 F.Supp.2d 97 (D.Conn. 2004). State corrections officers filed a § 1983 action alleging that prison officials disciplined them in violation of their First and Fourteenth Amendment rights for associating with a motorcycle group, the Outlaws Motorcycle Club. The district court denied the officers' motion for injunctive relief, finding that their First Amendment right to freedom of association had not been violated, and that the directive under which the disciplinary actions were taken was not impermissibly overbroad. The court also held that the officers failed to establish serious questions as to the merits of their claim that the disciplinary actions violated their equal protection rights. According to the court, riding motorcycles, going to parties and bonding with friends did not involve matters of public concern, where the purpose of the officers' association with the gang was entirely social in nature, the gang had a national reputation for violence and crime, and the state had serious problems with gang violence in prisons. (Connecticut Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
TITLE VII
RETALIATION
HOSTILE WORK
ENVIRONMENT

Reckard v. County of Westchester, 351 F.Supp.2d 157 (S.D.N.Y. 2004). A county correctional officer filed complaints alleging race and gender discrimination under Title VII and improper retaliation. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants, finding that the County's failure to assign the female correctional officer to perform tasks she desired, such as booking and female search, was not an "adverse action" that could form the basis of a Title VII retaliation claim, and that the officer's subjective dissatisfaction with her assignments was insufficient. The court also held that a sergeant's order that the female correctional officer work overtime on one occasion, when she allegedly had medical restrictions that precluded her from working an extended shift, could not be reasonably construed as an "adverse employment action" for the purposes of her Title VII retaliation claim. The court noted that the collective bargaining agreement permitted the county to order the officer to work overtime shifts, a single overtime shift was not a materially adverse change in her working conditions, and she did not allege that the extra shift had any detrimental impact on her health. (Westchester County Department of Corrections, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
UNION

Rhode Island Broth., Correct. Offic. v. Rhode Isl., 357 F.3d 42 (1st Cir. 2004). A union representing state corrections officers sued state officials, challenging the amendment to an incentive pay statute that changed the method of compensating officers who amassed education credits, from a percentage of pay to a flat rate. The district court dismissed the case for failure to state a claim, and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court found that the obligation to maintain the status quo under a collective bargaining agreement, that mirrored the percentage pay terms of the original statute, did not serve as an alternative basis for an impairment of contract claim. (Rhode Island Brotherhood of Correctional Officers, Rhode Island Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
FREE SPEECH
UNION

Richards v. State of Connecticut Dept. of Corrs., 349 F.Supp.2d 278 (D.Conn. 2004). A state corrections officer brought a suit alleging violations of his free speech, due process and equal protection rights. The district court entered summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court held that the alleged failure to make a union steward available to the officer was not a substantive due process violation. The court found that the investigation into an alleged incident of workplace violence, even if inappropriate, was not an adverse employment action upon which the officer could base a free speech claim. The court held that a major's alleged conduct, including yelling expletives at the officer while the officer was sick in a bathroom, were unprofessional and unnecessary but did not shock the conscience and thus did not violate the officer's substantive due process rights. (Osborne Correctional Institute, Connecticut)

U.S. District Court
TERMINATION
FREE SPEECH POLITICAL AFFIL-IATION

Snyder v. Blagojevich, 332 F.Supp.2d 1132 (N.D.Ill. 2004). An assistant warden brought an action under § 1983 alleging that state officials violated his constitutional rights when they dismissed him from his job. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court held that the termination did not violate the assistant warden's First Amendment rights by determining that membership in the same political party as the Governor was essential to his job. The court found that political affiliation is an appropriate consideration where an employee acts as a governmental spokesperson, and affiliation can be considered in making employment decisions in which an employee is vested with substantial discretionary authority in the implementation of the policy goals of elected officials. The court noted that the position description for an assistant warden involved some discretionary responsibility for policy implementation and significant interaction with the public. (Taylorville Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
FREE SPEECH
RETALIATION
SCHEDULE

Spiegla v. Hull, 371 F.3d 928 (7th Cir. 2004). A state prison employee sued prison officials under § 1983 alleging that they changed her shift schedule and post assignment in retaliation for her exercise of her free speech rights. The district court entered summary judgment for the officials and the employee appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded, finding that the employee's speech concerning alleged official misconduct was made as a private citizen on a matter of public concern, and she demonstrated that her comments were the substantial or motivating factor in her transfer and shift change. The employee's comments addressed her direct observations of prison officials engaged in an activity that was consistent with contraband trafficking, in violation of state law, at a facility that had a history of problems with contraband. The court noted that her transfer came only four days after her comments, after seven years of uninterrupted assignment to a post on the prison gates, and that another prison official admitted he was angry with the employee for her comments. (Westville Correctional Facility, Indiana)

2005

U.S. Appeals Court
TERMINATION
FREE SPEECH
HOSTILE WORK
ENVIRONMENT

Baron v. Suffolk County Sheriff's Dept., 402 F.3d 225 (1st Cir. 2005). A county corrections officer who was allegedly harassed by his coworkers after reporting the misconduct of fellow officers, brought an action alleging violations of § 1983 and state law. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants in part, and denied it in part. A jury found in favor of the officer and awarded $500,000 in damages. The defendants appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the alleged supervisory tolerance of the harassment by coworkers was a matter of inherent public concern, and this was supported by a series of newspaper articles that chronicled mismanagement at the department. The court found that a jury could reasonably have found an unofficial custom in the sheriff's office of retaliation against officers who breached the code of silence. According to the court, the jury award of $500,000 damages had an evidentiary basis, where the officer had testified as to the stress and anguish brought on by the extreme harassment. The officer was shunned at roll call and referred to as a "rat," posters that mocked him were displayed throughout the facility, including one that accused him of being a child molester. The officer also received harassing phone calls at work and once left work to find that his car had been defaced with feces and his tires had been slashed. (Suffolk Co. House of Correction, Massachusetts)

U.S. Appeals Court
DISCIPLINE
EQUAL PROTECTION

Bizzarro v. Miranda, 394 F.3d 82 (2nd Cir. 2005). Corrections officers brought a suit against a county and corrections officials, alleging violation of their Fourteenth Amendment rights. The officers were subjected to disciplinary charges and one officer was removed from a privileged work assignment after he refused to assist in an internal investigation. The district court denied summary judgment for the defendants and they appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded, finding that the officers failed to establish an equal protection claim against corrections officials because there was no showing that the officials intentionally treated them differently from other similarly-situated officers. The court noted that the officers were disciplined for refusing to assist in the investigation and to deter other officers from similarly refusing to assist in investigations. (Westchester County Department of Corrections, New York)

U.S. District Court
RACIAL DISCRIMINATION
TERMINATION
TITLE VII

Burke-Fowler v. Orange County, Florida, 390 F.Supp.2d 1208 (M.D.Fla. 2005). A former correctional officer brought an action against a county alleging that her termination was racially discriminatory, in violation of Title VII and § 1981, and based on her marital status, in violation of state law. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the county. The court held that the officer failed to establish that her discharge for developing an intimate romantic relationship with, and later marrying, an inmate was the result of racial discrimination. The court noted that white officers who had close relationships with inmates were not as severely disciplined, but one officer did not know his partner's criminal history, and the other officer had already been dating the woman before she was arrested. The plaintiff in this case developed a relationship with an inmate while he was under her authority. (Orange County Corrections Department, Florida)

U.S. District Court
SEXUAL HARASSMENT
TITLE VII
HOSTILE WORK
ENVIRONMENT

Dunbar v. County of Saratoga, 358 F.Supp.2d 115 (N.D.N.Y. 2005). A female correctional officer at a county jail brought an action alleging sexual harassment in violation of Title VII and § 1983. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants, in part, and denied in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded on the officer's hostile environment sexual harassment claim. The officer alleged that co-workers made unwelcome sexual advances, directed graphic sexual comments and jokes at her, left sexual notes on her car, called her at home several times, and made obscene and offensive gestures toward her. The court held that the officer failed to establish that she was constructively discharged because of her gender in violation of Title VII, absent evidence that the defendants intentionally created an intolerable work atmosphere that forced the officer to quit voluntarily. The court found that the sheriff was entitled to qualified immunity under § 1983 from the officer's claims of sexual harassment, where the sheriff never sexually harassed the officer, never observed her alleged sexual harassment, never took any adverse employment action against her, and was never personally aware of allegations of sexual harassment. (Saratoga County Sheriff's Department, New York)

U.S. District Court
TERMINATION
RACIAL DISCRIMINATION
EQUAL PROTECTION
DUE PROCESS

Fairman v. Konteh, 361 F.Supp.2d 704 (N.D. Ohio 2005). A former state corrections officer brought a § 1983 action against a warden, a fellow officer and a disciplinary hearing officer, alleging he was discharged on the basis of race in violation of his constitutional rights. The district court granted the defendants' motion to dismiss in part, and denied in part. The court held that the former officer stated a claim under § 1983 for violations of his equal protection rights by alleging that certain decisions regarding the hearing officer that was chosen to serve at his pre-termination hearing were made because of his race. The officer was terminated. The former officer allegedly made a racist comment about the hearing officer that was subsequently appointed and the court held that he sufficiently pleaded a due process claim based on disqualifying bias. (Ohio Department of Rehabilitation and Correction, Toledo Correctional Institution)

U.S. District Court
SEARCHES

Fraternal Order of Police/Dept. v. Washington, 394 F.Supp.2d 7 (D.D.C. 2005). A police labor committee and correctional officers in leadership positions with the committee sued a corrections department, challenging the constitutionality of searches of their lockers and automobiles during a shakedown of the detention facility. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court held that the checkpoint seizure of correctional officers' cars at the entrance to a jail's parking lot were not unconstitutional, where the officers were requested to sign consent forms to have their vehicles searched or to park elsewhere. The court noted that the jail was a maximum-security facility and keeping contraband out of the jail was an imperative, and the purpose of the checkpoint was to afford an opportunity to inform officers of the activity, present consent forms, and search the vehicles of who consented. The court held that the searches of cars were not unconstitutional under the Fourth Amendment where the officers consented to the searches by signing consent forms that stated in clear and unambiguous language that the officers could deny the search at any time. According to the court, searches of correctional officers' lockers were not unreasonable under the Fourth Amendment, where the searches were conducted in the early morning hours by correctional officers of the same gender as the officers whose lockers were being searched, and the lockers were provided by the corrections department for the convenience of correctional officers. The court noted that the assigned officer and Director of the department had keys to each locker, and that locker assignments could be changed without notice by the Director. Prison regulations clearly stated that a condition of employment was that all personnel submit to a search of their person, or automobile, or place of assignment on government property, when such a search was required by department officials. (Central Detention Facility, District of Columbia)

U.S. Appeals Court
RETIREMENT BENEFITS

Germano v. Winnebago County, Ill., 403 F.3d 926 (7th Cir. 2005). A retired county sheriff's deputy brought a § 1983 class action against a county, alleging that the county's act of setting up a separate employee benefit plan for retired deputies which charged higher premiums than for active deputies, constituted a due process violation. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the county and the retired deputy appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the deputy had a protected liberty interest under a state statute but that the county's action was a random and unauthorized act, and was therefore not a due process violation. The court noted that a state statute expressly provided that continued group coverage be provided to retirees at the same premium rate as active deputies. (Winnebago County Sheriff's Department, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
PROMOTION
RACIAL DISCRIMINATION

Johnson v. Connecticut Dept. of Corrections, 392 F.Supp.2d 326 (D.Conn. 2005). An African-American Christian pastor formerly employed by a state corrections department brought an employment discrimination action in state court and under Title VII and § 1981 against his former employer. The action was removed to federal court, where the court granted summary judgment in favor of the department in part, and denied it in part. The court held that the employee did not show that his failure to be promoted to a supervisory position that was given to a white candidate occurred under circumstances giving an inference of race discrimination. (Conn. Dept. Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
POLITICAL AFFILIATION
TERMINATION

Kiddy-Brown v. Blagojevich, 408 F.3d 346 (7th Cir. 2005). The former warden of a state prison brought a § 1983 action against several state officials alleging that her rights under the First and Fourteenth Amendment had been violated. The district court denied the defendants' motion for judgment on the pleadings and they appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The court held that the former warden's allegations concerning patronage, if true, would demonstrate a violation of her First Amendment rights. The court found that it was clearly established at the time of the warden's dismissal that the First Amendment prohibits a state official from dismissing, on political grounds, an employee who was not charged with policymaking duties. The warden alleged that she was told that she was being terminated because of her affiliation with the Republican administration. (Illinois Department of Corrections, Decatur Correctional Center)

U.S. District Court
FREE SPEECH
TERMINATION
LEGAL SERVICES

Mangiafico v. Blumenthal, 358 F.Supp.2d 6 (D.Conn. 2005). A correctional officer brought a civil rights damages suit against a state attorney general and former and current commissioners of corrections, arising from the attorney general's decision not to defend the officer in a prisoner's civil action. The district court held that the attorney general was entitled to absolute immunity from a § 1983 claim that was based on his decision not to defend the officer. The court found that the officer stated a First Amendment retaliation claim against the commissioners. The officer alleged that they engaged in a coordinated effort to make him the scapegoat for an excessive force case and that he was transferred to another institution after he filed a lawsuit claiming he was denied representation. The transfer allegedly subjected the officer to diminished career and promotional opportunities and financial losses. (Northern Correctional Institution, Connecticut)

U.S. Appeals Court
HOSTILE WORK
ENVIRONMENT
TITLE VII

Moser v. Indiana Dept. of Corrections, 406 F.3d 895 (7th Cir. 2005). A female state corrections department employee sued the department, alleging sex discrimination, hostile work environment, and retaliation under Title VII. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants and the employee appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the employee failed to establish that she was unfairly disciplined on the basis of her gender, in violation of Title VII, because she failed to establish that she was performing her job according to the department's expectations. The employee did not deny the incidents that formed the basis for the disciplinary action, including the use of profanity, talking about alcohol, and contacting another co-worker's physician. The court found that a "handful" of sexual comments that a male co-worker made to the employee, which were in the context of jokes as opposed to serious or threatening comments, did not rise to the level of a hostile work environment under Title VII. According to the court, the employee failed to establish a causal connection between her sexual harassment complaints about a male co-worker and her reassignment to another position. (Summit Farm Work Release, Ind.)

U.S. District Court
SUPERVISION
QUALIFICATIONS

Perez v. Oakland County, 380 F.Supp.2d 830 (E.D.Mich. 2005). The father and personal representative of the estate of an inmate brought a suit under § 1983, alleging that the defendants violated the inmate's Eighth Amendment rights by failing to provide appropriate mental health treatment or monitoring when the inmate was being held in the county jail, leading to the inmate's suicide. The district court held that the county did not act with deliberate indifference in allowing the inmate caseworker, who allegedly lacked sufficient medical background or expertise, to make decisions affecting the health care needs of the inmate. The court noted that the challenged practice was widespread, with the "vast majority" of county jails allowing employees who were not psychiatrists, but who had been trained in suicide detection and prevention, to make determinations whether inmates were suicidal or potentially suicidal. The court held that the caseworker was entitled to qualified immunity because it was not established at the time of the inmate's suicide that the caseworker's actions of making determinations concerning the inmate's cell assignments, without first consulting the inmate's physician or psychiatrist, would violate the inmate's Eighth Amendment rights. According to the court, the jail psychiatrist did not disregard a known and serious medical need, where evidence demonstrated that even though the psychiatrist knew that the inmate was not taking his medication, he determined through his own direct evaluation that the inmate was suicidal. The court found that allegations that the sheriff failed to ensure that the county's deputies enforced and followed the law could not sustain a § 1983 claim absent evidence that the sheriff himself engaged in active unconstitutional behavior by directly participating, encouraging, authorizing, or acquiescing in the allegedly offending conduct of the sheriff's deputy. (Oakland County Jail, Michigan)

U.S. District Court
DUE PROCESS
POLITICAL AFFIL-IATION
TERMINATION

Ramos-Martinez v. Negron-Fernandez, 393 F.Supp.2d 118 (D.Puerto Rico 2005). A former employee of a juvenile institutions department brought an action alleging that his termination violated due process and his First Amendment rights. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the employer in part, and denied it in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the employer possessed knowledge of the employee's political affiliation and as to the reason for the discharge. The court found that the employee's discharge did not violate his due process rights even though the recommendation of a hearing examiner, that discharge was not justified, was not followed. The court noted that applicable administrative law allowed the agency administrator to make a final determination and the employee received timely notice of his right to appeal as required by law. (Juvenile Institutions Administration, Puerto Rico)

U.S. District Court
RETALIATION
WORKING CONDI-TIONS

Redding v. Florida, Dept. of Juvenile Justice, 401 F.Supp.2d 1255 (N.D.Fla. 2005). A female former juvenile detention facility supervisor sued a state juvenile justice department claiming she was subjected to an abusive environment in retaliation for a good faith claim of gender discrimination. After complaining of gender discrimination, the employee was moved to a less desirable shift, assigned undesirable duties, provided with insufficient staff, denied permission to wear an unobtrusive heart monitor for one month, and was generally treated disrespectfully. After a jury entered a verdict in her favor the department sought judgment in its favor as a matter of law. The district court denied the motion, finding that the conduct of the employee's supervisor was sufficient to support an abusive environment claim. (Leon County Detention Center, Florida)

U.S. Appeals Court
POLITICAL AFFIL-IATION
TERMINATION

Riley v. Blagojevich, 425 F.3d 357 (7th Cir. 2005). Assistant wardens of two state prisons, who were fired by a governor because they were not of his political party, brought separate § 1983 actions alleging that their terminations violated their right of free speech. The wardens lost their cases in the district court and they appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part and reversed in part. The court held that their positions fell within the Elrod-Branti policy-making exception to the general prohibition on termination of government employees because of their political affiliation. (Illinois)

U.S. District Court
TITLE VII
HOSTILE WORK
ENVIRONMENT
RACIAL DISCRIMINATION
RETALIATION

Sasser v. Alabama Dept. of Corrections, 373 F.Supp.2d 1276 (M.D.Ala. 2005). A Caucasian state corrections employee brought an action against his employer alleging race discrimination, hostile work environment, and retaliation under Title VII, and claims for due process, equal protection and free speech under § 1983. The district court awarded summary judgment in favor of the employer. The employee had been suspended and reassigned to another unit after he made a racial slur to an inmate and assigned inmates to day labor based on their race. The court held that the employee was not similarly situated to an African-American co-worker who stated openly that she did not like “white people” or to an African-American co-worker who had breached security and also called the employee a “redneck,” where there was no evidence that the co-workers had similar positions and responsibilities. The court found that the alleged retaliatory acts against the employee which included African-American co-workers referring to him as a racist, an African-American co-worker refusing to let the employee take his urine sample, and the issuance of a written warning, did not amount to adverse employment actions where the employee was not subjected to any changes in the terms and conditions of his employment. The court noted that the alleged retaliatory acts were also not frequent or severe enough to create a racially hostile work environment under Title VII. The court ruled that the employee’s § 1983 claims against the department alleging violations of his rights under the First and Fourteenth Amendments, and against a warden in his official capacity, were barred by the Eleventh Amendment. (Work Release Center, Alabama Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
DISABILITY
RETALIATION
TERMINATION

Shape v. Barnes County, N.D., 396 F.Supp.2d 1067 (D.N.D. 2005). A county employee who was demoted from a position of Chief Correctional Officer and then terminated shortly after he filed a grievance sued a county and sheriff alleging discrimination, retaliation, and free speech and due process violations. The district court held that the employee failed to prove that he was “disabled” by his attention deficit disorder for the purposes of a state human rights claim, absent evidence that his claimed disorder substantially limited his ability to perform either a class of jobs or a broad range of jobs. The court found that the employee established a prima facie case for retaliatory discharge under a state whistleblower statute and that genuine issues of material fact existed as to whether the county’s proffered non-retaliatory reasons for his discharge were pretextual. The court also found issues of material fact as to whether the employee’s grievance was a substantial factor in the termination decision, and whether the employee was provided with an impartial grievance committee. (Barnes County Jail, North Dakota)

U.S. District Court
FREE SPEECH
RETALIATION

Vantassel v. Brooks, 355 F.Supp.2d 788 (W.D.Pa. 2005). A former correctional employee brought a § 1983 action against corrections officials, alleging he was discharged in retaliation for exercising his free speech rights. The district court held that the employee’s criticisms of a superintendent’s expenditures on her state-owned residence involved matters of public concern for the purposes of the employee’s retaliation claims. The court noted that the employee complained of the superintendent’s excessive spending and misappropriation of funds to co-workers and to the superintendent herself. The court denied summary judgment for the defendants, finding genuine issues of material fact as to whether the employee would have been discharged if he had not criticized the superintendent’s spending on her residence. (State Correctional Institution, Cambridge Springs, Pennsylvania)

2006

U.S. District Court
TERMINATION
ADA- Americans with Disabilities Act

Almond v. Westchester County Dept. of Corrections, 425 F.Supp.2d 394 (S.D.N.Y. 2006). A probationary corrections officer who was terminated after she displayed hysterical behavior and underwent a psychiatric evaluation following training in disturbance control and use of a baton, brought an action against a county Department of Corrections (DOC) alleging wrongful discharge in violation of Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) and New York State Human Rights Law (NYSHRL). The employer moved for summary judgment and the district court granted the motion. The court held that the officer failed to establish a prima facie case of disability discrimination under ADA, on the theory that the employer perceived her to be either a drug addict or mentally ill, where she did not prove that the employer perceived her to be drug addict despite her statement that she had overmedicated herself, her admission to taking some sort of drug on the day of the subject incident, and her superior's order that a drug test be administered, and assuming that the employer perceived her to be mentally ill. The court concluded that she did not show that the employer believed she was impaired from working or from performing some other major life activity. The employer alleged that the plaintiff complained that the exercises were “too hard,” and asserted that she had been exhibiting nervous and erratic behavior throughout the day, crying and complaining that the training was too tough. The court declined to exercise supplemental jurisdiction over the officer's remaining claim under NYSHRL, instead dismissing it without prejudice. (Department of Corrections for Westchester County, New York)

U.S. District Court
FREE SPEECH
RETALIATION
PROPERTY INTEREST

Barry v. Luzerne County, 447 F.Supp.2d 438 (M.D.Pa. 2006). A county correctional officer brought an action against a county and officials, stemming from his suspension and demotion after publication of articles about a county prison escape. The officer had spoken with a newspaper about the escapes. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants in part, and denied it in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by fact issues as to whether the officer engaged in protected speech, whether the officials were entitled to qualified immunity, and whether the officer suffered an adverse action. The court found that the county was subject to municipal liability, where the prison board was the authorized policymaker of the county for purposes of making policy decisions regarding the county prison, and the board had the authority to bind the county to its decision regarding the officer's employment. The court held that the officer lacked a protected interest in his employment. (Luzerne Co. Corr'l Facil., Pennsylvania)

U.S. Appeals Court
TERMINATION
TITLE VII
FREE SPEECH
RACIAL DISCRIMINATION

Burke-Fowler v. Orange County, Fla., 447 F.3d 1319 (11th Cir. 2006). A former correctional officer brought an action against a county alleging that her termination was racially discriminatory, in violation of Title VII and § 1981, and was based on her marital status in violation of state law. The district court granted the county's motion for summary judgment and the officer appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the African-American officer failed to establish that her discharge for developing an intimate romantic relationship with, and later marrying, an inmate, in violation of a prison's anti-fraternization policy, was the result of racial discrimination and that the county did not discriminate against the officer simply because she was married, in violation of the Florida Civil Rights Act. The court noted that even though white officers who had close relationships with inmates were not as severely disciplined, one white officer developed the relationship with a former inmate without the knowledge of her partner's criminal history, another white officer had established his relationship with an inmate prior to her arrest, and two other white officers had relationships that were not romantic, while the African-American officer's relationship with an inmate commenced with her full awareness of his status as an inmate and she pursued the relationship shortly after he left her direct authority. (Orange County Corrections Department, Florida)

U.S. District Court
ASSOCIATION

Clark v. Alston, 442 F.Supp.2d 395 (E.D.Mich. 2006). An applicant for a probation officer position filed a § 1983 claim against a judge, alleging he violated her First Amendment right to freedom of intimate association when he withdrew her offer of employment after learning she was married to a former inmate. The district court granted summary judgment to the judge, finding that it was not an undue intrusion into the applicant's marital relationship for the judge to deny her employment with the court after learning she was married to a former inmate. According to the court, the marriage itself was not a substantial motivating factor in the judge's denial of employment, where the primary reason was the judge's concern that the applicant had not been completely truthful at her first interview, that she had some hesitancy to permit him to review an investigative file by himself, and that she might not have had a good working relationship with her supervisor. The court noted that while there was no evidence that her relationship with the inmate while she was employed at a prison was of a sexual nature, the fact that their marriage took place approximately one month after she terminated her employment strongly suggested that some type of "personal" relationship had to exist while she was employed there, and the judge's concern about such a relationship would be a legitimate business reason for denying employment. (74th District Court Probation Department, and Standish Correctional Facility, Michigan)

U.S. Appeals Court
TITLE VII
DEMOTION
RACIAL DISCRIMINATION

Davis v. Wisconsin Dept. of Corrections, 445 F.3d 971 (7th Cir. 2006). A state corrections employee brought an action against the agency and supervisors under Title VII and § 1983, alleging that he was demoted because of his race. The district court entered judgment upon jury verdict in favor of the employee, and defendants appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that evidence was sufficient to support the jury's verdict in favor of the employee. The court noted that although there was no direct evidence that the agency and supervisors were motivated by racial bias when they demoted the employee after he was found to have harassed a co-worker, an agency memo drafted and approved by the supervisors indicated that the employee's violation was a category B violation. Two white employees received far less severe penalties for category B violations, and testimony that the supervisors thought the employee's violation was more serious than category B came from the supervisors rather than from disinterested witnesses and was not supported by documentary evidence. (Jackson Correctional Institution, Wisconsin)

U.S. Appeals Court
TITLE VII
HOSTILE WORK
ENVIRONMENT
FAILURE TO PROTECT

Erickson v. Wisconsin Dept. of Corrections, 469 F.3d 600 (7th Cir. 2006). A female civilian employee of a state department of corrections brought an action against her employer under Title VII and § 1983, claiming hostile work environment after she was raped by a prisoner at an all-male minimum security prison that was housed in same building as her office. The district court denied the employer's motion for judgment as matter of law after a jury returned a verdict in favor of the employee. The employer appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that whether the employer was negligent in addressing the risk that the female employee might be harassed by a male prisoner was for the jury. The district court concluded that "the evidence was sufficient to support the jury's verdict that [WDC's] agents knew of a significant risk of serious harassment, were in a position to take remedial action and failed to act to prevent the sexual harassment from occurring.” The employee that she had previously found the prisoner in her office after hours staring at her in a way that made her very uncomfortable. (Wisconsin Correctional Center System, and Oregon Correctional Center)

U.S. District Court
FREE SPEECH
HARASSMENT

Farley v. Andrews, 430 F.Supp.2d 786 (N.D. Ill. 2006). County jail officers sued sheriffs and individual officers claiming they were harassed for exercising their First Amendment right to speak out against the abuse of inmates. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants in part, and denied in part, finding that: (1) the plaintiff officers’ speech was about a matter of public concern, protected by First Amendment; (2) there were fact issues whether the sued defendants were aware of the First Amendment activity; (3) there were fact issues whether the speech was a motivating factor in the sheriff office investigators’ delays in investigating mistreatment claims; (4) there were fact issues regarding the sheriff’s § 1983 liability; and (5) there was no civil conspiracy. The plaintiff officers alleged that fellow officers were beating prisoners. (Cook County Department of Corrections, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
TITLE VII
WORKING CONDITIONS
FREE SPEECH
HOSTILE WORK
ENVIRONMENT

Freitag v. Ayers, 468 F.3D 528 (9th Cir. 2006). A female former corrections officer brought an action against a state department of corrections and department officials, alleging hostile work environment claims based on the officials’ alleged failure to stop male prisoners’ sexual harassment of the female officer and retaliation in violation of Title VII and the First Amendment. The district court entered a jury verdict in favor of the officer and the defendants appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part and reversed in part. The court held that the department of corrections could be held liable under Title VII for failure to implement policies to protect its female corrections officers from sexual harassment by male prisoners, and that substantial evidence supported the determination that the officer was subjected to a hostile work environment. According to the court, testimony and exhibits established that the officer witnessed prisoners’ masturbating in an exhibitionist manner, oftentimes while they directed verbal taunts and crude remarks at her, and such incidents were severe. The court found that substantial evidence supported the determination that the department of corrections failed to take prompt, corrective, and reasonable action to address inmate sexual misconduct and that officials were aware of the officer’s complaints about the ongoing sexual harassment and her complaints about the department’s failure to adequately address the harassment, as required to establish a Title VII retaliation claim. The court found that the officials took an adverse action against officer as a result of her complaints, as required to establish a First Amendment retaliation claim, and that the officer’s communications with a state senator and the state office of the inspector general constituted protected speech. (Calif. Dept. of Corr. and Rehabilitation, Pelican Bay State Prison)

U.S. District Court
TERMINATION
DUE PROCESS
RETALIATION

Henderson v. New York, 423 F.Supp.2d 129 (S.D.N.Y. 2006). A terminated state corrections officer sued a lieutenant and commissioner, asserting race discrimination and other claims. The lieutenant and commissioner moved for summary judgment and the motions were granted. The district court held that: (1) the lieutenant’s alleged pre-termination actions, if proven, were not adverse employment actions; (2) the officer’s termination was not causally related to his deposition testimony, and thus did not constitute retaliation; (3) the commissioner did not retaliate against the officer; (4) the officer received procedural due process prior to his termination; (5) the officer’s termination did not constitute a substantive due process violation; and (6) the lieutenant’s alleged actions, if proven, did not violate the officer’s substantive due process rights. (Taconic Correctional Facility, Beacon Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
WORKING CONDITIONS

Kaucher v. County of Bucks, 455 F.3d 418 (3rd Cir. 2006). A corrections officer filed suit under § 1983 against a county and several county employees responsible for the operation of a correctional facility, alleging violation of his substantive due process rights, contending he contracted a Methicilin Resistant Staphylococcus Aureus (MRSA) infection as a result of the defendants’ conscience-shocking behavior in creating unsanitary and dangerous conditions at the facility. The district court granted the defendants’ motion for summary judgment, and the officer appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that: (1) the alleged inadequate remedial and preventative measures to stop the spread of MRSA within the correctional facility did not rise to a level of deliberate indifference that could be characterized as conscience shocking, and (2) the facility’s alleged failure to act affirmatively to improve conditions at the jail and alleged failure to act affirmatively to educate and warn inmates and corrections officers about MRSA infections and to train them in infection prevention were not the cause of the corrections officer’s infection. The court noted that the state corrections department found the jail to be substantially in compliance with state standards, giving the defendants reason to believe their measures were adequate, only two of 170 corrections officers tested positive for colonization of the infection, and the facility had in place policies and procedures to ensure sanitary conditions in the jail, including requirements that cells be regularly cleaned with an all-purpose detergent and that showers be disinfected with a bleach and water solution. The court also noted that the officer chose to remain employed at the jail, in a position that obliged him to work amidst MRSA infections and from the outset of his employment, he was aware of the safety risks associated with working in a prison, and he was on notice of the jail’s standard operating procedures, which described proper methods of handling inmates with communicable diseases. (Bucks County Correctional Facility, Pennsylvania)

U.S. District Court
FREE SPEECH
DISCIPLINE

Matrisciano v. Walker, 417 F.Supp.2d 1014 (C.D.Ill. 2006). A public employee who was formerly the deputy director of a state corrections department sued the department, claiming that his First Amendment rights were violated when he was reassigned and then locked out of his new position after he appeared before the parole board advocating parole for a gang member convicted of murder. The department moved for summary judgment and the district court granted the motion. The court held that the employee was a “policymaker” who could be punished for his appearance, without the need for balancing his interest in free speech against the government’s need for efficient operations. According to the court, the employee supervised assistant wardens who were found by the court of appeals to be policymakers, and was active in the review of proposed policies. The court noted that the factors to be considered in determining whether a public employee can be punished for exercise of his First Amendment free speech rights, include: (1) whether the employee’s statement would create problems in maintaining discipline by immediate supervisors or harmony among co-workers; (2) whether the employment relationship is one in which personal loyalty and confidence are necessary; (3) whether the speech impeded the employee’s ability to perform his daily responsibilities; (4) the time, place, and manner of speech; (5) the context in which the underlying dispute arose; (6) whether the matter was one on which debate was vital to informed decisionmaking; and (7) whether the speaker should be regarded as a member of the general public. (Illinois Department of Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
FLSA- Fair Labor
Standards Act

McGavock v. City of Water Valley, Miss., 452 F.3d 423 (5th Cir. 2006). Municipal firefighters filed a Fair Labor Standards Act (FLSA) overtime action against a city. The district court granted partial summary judgment to the defendants. The district court held that because of their non-exempt work as dispatchers, the plaintiffs were not employees engaged in fire protection activity and therefore were not subject to the exemption. The firefighters and the city appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The appeals court held that the firefighters were employees “engaged in fire protection activities” and were thereby exempt from coverage of the overtime provisions of FLSA even though they spent more than 20% of their time engaged in nonexempt activities. (City of Water Valley, Mississippi)

U.S. Appeals Court
HARASSMENT
HOSTILE WORK
ENVIRONMENT
RACIAL DISCRIMINATION

Patterson v. Balsamico, 440 F.3d 104 (2nd Cir. 2006). An African-American former employee of a county sheriff’s department brought an action against another corrections officer, alleging the existence of a racially discriminatory hostile work environment and the intentional infliction of emotional distress. After a jury trial, the district court awarded the former employee nominal damages on the hostile work environment claim, $100,000 on the emotional distress claim, and $20,000 in punitive damages. The court denied the corrections officer’s motion for a new trial and awarded the former employee attorney fees. The parties appealed. The court of appeals affirmed in part, and vacated and remanded in part. The appeals court held that the district court did not abuse its discretion when, pursuant to New York law, it declined to reduce compensatory damages of $100,000 awarded to the plaintiff on his claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, arising from an assault in which the officer and others sprayed the plaintiff with mace, covered him with shaving cream, and taunted him with racial slurs. The court noted that the plaintiff had testified as to his humiliation, embarrassment, and loss of self-confidence, as well as to his sleeplessness, headaches, stomach pains, and burning in his eyes from the use of mace. The appeals court found that the punitive damages award of $20,000 did not exceed the maximum permissible amount considering that this was a thoroughly reprehensible incident, particularly in light of its racial motivation, and that the punitive damages award represented a relatively small fraction of $100,000 compensatory damages awarded on the emotional distress claim. The court noted that the officer against whom the award was made should have appreciated the gravity of the racially motivated assault on a fellow officer and should have understood that such conduct could have adverse economic consequences. But the appeals court concluded that the $20,000 damage award was excessive in light of the personal finances of the defendant corrections officer, who earned an annual salary of approximately $37,632, was married and had two children. The court found that an award of no more than $10,000 would provide sufficient punishment and deter future conduct. The court remanded the case for a new trial on punitive damages, unless the plaintiff agreed to remit the portion of the punitive damages award that exceeded $10,000. The plaintiff alleged that he had been subjected to a racially discriminatory hostile work environment and that his employment had been terminated because of his race. He alleged that he heard fellow employees use racial slurs and make disparaging remarks about African-Americans on approximately 12 occasions during his first three months of employment. (Oneida County Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEXUAL HARASSMENT TITLE II
HOSTILE WORK
ENVIRONMENT
RETALIATION

Randolph v. Ohio Dept. of Youth Services, 453 F.3d 724 (6th Cir. 2006). A female former employee at a state juvenile facility brought an action against her state employer, alleging sex discrimination, hostile-work-environment, sexual harassment, and retaliation in violation of Title II. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the employer and the female former employee appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The court held: (1) the employee did not fail to exhaust her administrative remedies; (2) the employee’s testimony was sufficient to demonstrate that the alleged harassment was based on gender; (3) the employee engaged in a protected activity; (4) the employer knew that the female employee was engaged in a protected activity; (5) the employee suffered an “adverse employment action”; and (6) the employee demonstrated a causal connection. The former employee testified that she was subjected to daily threats, derogatory comments, verbal harassment, foul language, and several serious physical assaults to which members of the opposite sex were not exposed, and that the alleged conduct caused her to become suicidal and necessitated hospitalization and counseling. The employee reported to her supervisors that she was choked, that she was verbally harassed, and that she was subjected to sexual assault. It was undisputed that the employee complained to the supervisors several times about the verbal harassment and the physical assault. The female employee was placed on administrative leave shortly after she reported to the supervisor that she was sexually assaulted, she was terminated several months later, and after she reported the incidents, she was also subjected to rumors and investigations concerning her alleged inappropriate behavior. The employee was later reinstated with 70 percent back pay. (Circleville Youth Center, Ohio)

U.S. Appeals Court
DEMOTION
POLITICAL AFFIL-IATION
DUE PROCESS

Rodriguez-Marin v Rivera-Gonzalez, 438 F.3d 72 (1st Cir. 2006). Employees of Puerto Rico's corrections administration filed suit under § 1983 against the administration alleging political discrimination, claiming that they were demoted in violation of their First Amendment and due process rights. The district court entered a verdict for the employees, awarding compensatory and punitive damages, and the defendants appealed. The court of appeals affirmed, finding that evidence was sufficient to support the jury finding that the employees were demoted based on their political affiliation. The court noted that the employees were long-standing, competent employees and that both were demoted without being given any notice or opportunity to defend their demotions, and that important documents were missing from their personnel files. According to the court, punitive damages of $120,000 to $195,000 assessed against the chief legal advisor of the new political administration were not excessive because the demotions jeopardized the employees' livelihood. As a result of their demotions, one employee's salary was reduced by 60 percent and the other's was reduced by 43 percent. Both employees suffered harm to their professional careers, were unable to meet their financial obligations because of their reduced salaries, and suffered emotional distress for which they sought medical attention. The court noted that “discrimination based on political-party affiliation is rampant in government employment in Puerto Rico.” (Administration of Corrections, Puerto Rico)

U.S. District Court
PROMOTION
EQUAL PROTECTION
DISCRIMINATION

Rogers v. Haley, 421 F.Supp.2d 1361 (M.D.Ala. 2006). A Caucasian state corrections sergeant sued his superiors, claiming that he was denied promotions due to his race in violation of his equal protection rights. The defendants moved for summary judgment and the district court granted the motion in part and denied it in part. The court held that the equal protection rights of the sergeant were not violated when a Black officer was selected over him for promotion to lieutenant, despite the claim that the recruitment policies of the department encouraged blacks to apply for the position, decreasing the prospects of whites to receive the appointment. The court noted that the Black applicant interviewed very well, showed an outstanding grasp of the elements of the position, and had local experience. The court held that summary judgment was precluded as to the Equal Protection Clause claim alleging purposeful discrimination. The court found that a warden's affidavit, admitting that he would have recommended the White male correctional officer for promotion to lieutenant but for his belief that a “no-bypass rule” required him to promote any black or female employee from the promotional register, precluded summary judgment for the defendant. At the time of the events giving rise to this litigation, the department and all other state agencies were subject to a 1970 injunction which provided that: “Defendants shall not appoint or offer a position to a lower-ranking white applicant on a certificate in preference to a higher-ranking available Negro applicant, unless the defendants have first contacted and interviewed the higher-ranking Negro applicant and have determined that the Negro applicant cannot perform the functions of the position, is otherwise unfit for it, or is unavailable. In every instance where a determination is made that the Negro applicant is unfit or unavailable, documentary evidence shall be maintained by the defendants that will sustain that finding.” This provision is now called the “no-bypass rule.” (Alabama Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
TITLE VII
DISCRIMINATION
PROMOTION

Rogers v. Haley, 436 F.Supp.2d 1256 (M.D.Ala. 2006). A white male correctional officer sued the Alabama Department of Corrections (ADOC) and several ADOC supervisors and other employees in their official capacities, claiming he was denied promotion because of his race and gender, seeking relief under Title VII and the Fourteenth Amendment, as enforced through § 1983. The district court entered summary judgment for the defendants on the race discrimination claims in an earlier decision, and addressed the gender discrimination claim in this decision. The district court refused to credit a retired ADOC warden's testimony that he would have recommended the plaintiff for a lieutenant position but for an outstanding court order and an ADOC regulation he understood to restrict appointment of males over females on the same certification regardless of their qualifications, finding that the warden's sole reason for wanting to recommend the plaintiff was his belief that women should not be correctional officers in male prisons. The court held that the ADOC and individual defendants established, by clear and convincing evidence, that the female candidate who was selected was more qualified than the plaintiff, and their proffered reason was not a pretext for gender discrimination. (Ala. Dept. of Corr., Elmore Corr'l. Facility)

U.S. District Court TITLE VII DISCRIMINATION FREE SPEECH ADEA- Age Discrimination in Employment Act	Salas v. Wisconsin Dept. of Corrections, 429 F.Supp.2d 1056 (W.D.Wis. 2006). An Hispanic probation and parole agent who was terminated purportedly because of his failure to supervise an offender, and for his alleged falsification of documents relating to that offender, sued state corrections officials, alleging they discriminated and retaliated against him in violation of his rights under Title VII, § 1983 and the Age Discrimination in Employment Act (ADEA). The district court dismissed all ADEA, and Title VII discrimination and retaliation claims against the officials in their individual capacities. The defendants moved for summary judgment on the remaining claims. The district held that: (1) the employee failed to state § 1983 claim against the department of corrections; (2) the employee failed to produce evidence that three pre-disciplinary hearings he received were shams; (3) the employee failed to provide admissible evidence that he was treated differently from similarly-situated non-Hispanic coworkers or that the decision to terminate his employment was motivated by animosity toward him because of his national origin; and (4) the employee's speech was not a substantial and motivating factor in his termination. The court noted that the parole agent's protected speech, in the form of testimony before an Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC) on behalf of a coworker who had filed a race discrimination complaint, was not shown to be a substantial and motivating factor in the agent's termination as required for his First Amendment retaliation claim, where his superiors were unaware of the role he planned to play in the EEOC investigation. (Wisc. Dept. of Corrections)
U.S. Appeals Court RELIGION FREE SPEECH DISCRIMINATION	Shrum v. City of Coweta, Okla., 449 F.3d 1132 (10th Cir. 2006). A law enforcement officer/clergyman who resigned from a police department after the police chief allegedly rearranged his work schedule so it would conflict with his duties as a minister filed a § 1983 action against the city, police chief and city manager alleging violations of his constitutional rights to freedom of association, free exercise of religion, and substantive due process. The chief appealed a partial denial by the district court of his motion for summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The court held that the police chief was not entitled to qualified immunity on the officer's claim of interference with free exercise of his religion, finding that the mere refusal of the chief and police department to accommodate the officer's religious scheduling needs, without more, would not establish a constitutional violation. The officer alleged he was moved to the day shift because of the chief's knowledge of his religious commitment, claiming that the transfer decision was not neutral but rather was motivated by the officer's religious commitments. The officer apparently successfully juggled his two responsibilities for eight years, but his relationship with the management of the police department soured and his schedule was changed. Forced to choose between his police and his ministerial responsibilities, he resigned from the department and sued. (City of Coweta, Oklahoma)
U.S. Appeals Court TERMINATION RETALIATION FMLA- Family Medical Leave Act	Toeller v. Wisconsin Dept. of Corrections, 461 F.3d 871 (7th Cir. 2006). A terminated state corrections department employee sued the department, alleging interference with his rights and termination of his employment in retaliation for his attempt to assert his rights under the Family Medical Leave Act (FMLA). The district court denied the department's motion to dismiss and the department appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The court held that Congress did not effect valid abrogation of state sovereign immunity in enacting FMLA's "self-care" provision, at least for non-pregnancy self-care leaves. The court noted that, unlike the FMLA family-leave provision, the self-care provision was not adopted to combat longstanding sex discrimination, and thus the suit against a state agency under that provision could not rest on the enforcement clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. (Wisconsin Department of Corrections)
U.S. Appeals Court PROSECUTION	U.S. v. LaVallee, 439 F.3d 670 (10th Cir. 2006). Former prison officers who were convicted in district court of conspiracy and deprivation of inmates' constitutional rights, appealed their convictions. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the defendants were not denied their due process right to a fair trial when a former prison supervisory attorney allegedly assisted the prosecutor. The court found that the de minimus injuries suffered by inmates when they were attacked by the defendants were sufficient to support a conviction. According to the court, a two-level downward sentencing departure based on the defendants' susceptibility to abuse in prison was not abuse of the court's discretion. The court noted that the government began investigating allegations of the widespread abuse of prisoners and the falsification of records to cover up that abuse at the prison in 1997. As a result of the investigation, eight Bureau of Prisons ("BOP") correctional officers were indicted and two were charged. Three officers pleaded guilty and cooperated with the government by testifying at trial. (U.S. Penitentiary, Florence, Colorado)
U.S. District Court HARASSMENT RACIAL DISCRIMINATION RETALIATION	Vaden v. Lantz, 459 F.Supp.2d 149 (D.Conn. 2006). An African-American employed by a state Department of Corrections brought an action against a corrections department and several corrections officials, alleging that he was subjected to racial slurs, physical harassment, racially disparate evaluation and discipline, and retaliation. Employer filed a motion for a more definite statement. The district court denied the motion and held that: (1) allegations of direct involvement by all individual defendants sufficiently placed each defendant on notice as to the conduct leading to the plaintiff's equal protection and due process claims, and (2) allegations of direct involvement and separate allegations pointing to individual defendants as having known of the discriminatory and retaliatory acts of others sufficiently delineated to which defendant employee attributed alleged unconstitutional conduct, thus placing each defendant on notice as to the particular equal rights and due process claims against him or her. (Gates Correctional Institution, York Correctional Institution, Connecticut)

U.S. Appeals Court
RETALIATION

Witte v. Wisconsin Dept. of Corrections, 434 F.3d 1031 (7th Cir. 2006). A physician, as a public employee, brought a civil rights action against a state corrections department alleging retaliation for his exercise of his constitutional rights and violation of the state whistle-blower statute. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants and the physician appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the physician had not been deprived of his due process rights by the manner that the employer handled his numerous disciplinary proceedings. The physician had written several letters to correctional officials expressing concerns about the management of the correctional facility. (Racine Correctional Institution, Wisconsin)

2007

U.S. Appeals Court
WORKING CONDITIONS

Adair v. U.S., 497 F.3d 1244 (Fed. Cir. 2007). Current and former federal prison employees brought an action against the government for back pay, hazard pay, environmental hazard pay, and contributions to thrift savings accounts due to their exposure to second-hand cigarette smoke at their workplace. The U.S. Court of Federal Claims granted the government's motion to dismiss. The employees appealed. The appeals court affirmed on an alternative ground. The appeals court held that the employees' exposure to second-hand cigarette smoke was not an unusual physical hardship or unusual hazard, given that the exposure was an expected condition of employment usually involved in carrying out the duties of their positions, especially when those duties involved the caretaking or monitoring of inmates and second-hand smoke, as part of the ambient air, was commonly encountered indoors and outdoors where people worked or played. The court found that the employees' exposure to second-hand smoke was not an unusually severe working condition or an unusually severe hazard within the plain meaning of the statute mandating additional compensation for federal employees whose duties involved such severe conditions. The court held that at the time the statute was enacted, second-hand smoke was not considered unusually severe. (Federal Correctional Institution, Jesup, Georgia)

U.S. District Court
HOSTILE WORK
ENVIRONMENT
SEXUAL HARASSMENT
TITLE VII

Akines v. Shelby County Government, 512 F.Supp.2d 1138 (W.D. Tenn. 2007). Female correctional officers brought Title VII, § 1983 and a Tennessee Whistleblower Act suit alleging hostile work environment arising from a county's indifference to sexual harassment of the officers by county jail inmates. The district court granted summary judgment to the county on the claims of certain officers. The county renewed its motion with respect to the remaining officers and the court granted it. The court held that the county's taking of appropriate disciplinary steps in response to reports of inmate harassment precluded a finding that it had fostered a hostile work environment in violation of Title VII. According to the court, the county was not deliberately indifferent to the rights of the female officers or a moving force behind the harassment, as required for a violation of § 1983. The court noted that the presence of one incident in which the institution apparently did not respond to a female correctional officer's filing of a disciplinary complaint against one inmate for alleged sexual harassment was insufficient to establish a hostile work environment in violation of Title VII, where the institution responded by disciplining inmates in connection with other reported incidents. (Shelby County Correctional Center, Tennessee)

U.S. District Court
SEXUAL HARASSMENT
RETALIATION
TERMINATION
EQUAL PROTECTION

Briggs v. Waters, 484 F.Supp.2d 466 (E.D.Va. 2007). A former employee of a county sheriff's office sued a former county sheriff and others, claiming that she was subjected to quid pro quo sexual harassment and was fired in retaliation for spurning the sheriff's advances. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The appeals court denied the motions. The court held that the female employee showed that the conduct of the male sheriff was unwelcome, as required for a Title VII action and a § 1983 suit alleging equal protection violations based on sexual harassment, when she initially offered an excuse when asked to accompany him on business trip and did not respond to a follow-up e-mail, and by shrugging away when the sheriff hugged her. The court found that summary judgment was precluded by a material issue of fact as to whether the request by the sheriff that the employee accompany him on a trip was request for a date or, given the past conduct of the sheriff, was a request for sex. The court also found that summary judgment was precluded by material issues of fact as to whether the sheriff's termination of the employee, who had been convicted of obstructing justice in an unrelated matter and was appealing the decision, was a pretext for termination based on her rebuff of his sexual advances. The court held that the employee established a prima facie case of disparate discipline, in violation of Title VII and her equal protection rights, through showing that she was terminated following her conviction for obstructing justice, while two male officers convicted of drunken driving were not terminated. (City of Portsmouth Jail, Virginia)

U.S. District Court
TITLE VII
RETALIATION
RACIAL DISCRIMINATION
SEXUAL HARASSMENT

Cobb v. Marshall, 481 F.Supp.2d 1248 (M.D.Ala. 2007). An older black female correctional officer sued a sheriff under Title VII, Fourteenth Amendment equal protection as enforced by § 1983, and state law for hostile work environment sexual harassment, retaliation, and race discrimination. The sheriff moved to dismiss for failure to state a claim. The district court granted the motion in part and denied the motion in part. The court held that the Title VII claims would not be dismissed on the basis of failure to name the sheriff in the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC) charge, but that the officer could not bring Title VII claims against the sheriff in his individual capacity. The court found that the officer stated Title VII claims for retaliation and race discrimination, where she alleged that she filed an EEOC charge and provided favorable testimony in support of a coworker's claim "against the department," that as a result of those activities she was subjected to various forms of retaliation, including denial of her request for leave, all in violation of Title VII, and pleaded that she was disciplined more harshly than other similarly-situated Caucasian employees and was denied certain benefits which other similarly-situated Caucasian employees received. (Montgomery County Sheriff's Department, Alabama)

U.S. District Court TERMINATION FREE SPEECH RETALIATION	Curran v. Cousins, 482 F.Supp.2d 36 (D.Mass. 2007). A corrections officer sued a sheriff's department, claiming termination in retaliation for exercise of his First Amendment free speech rights. The parties moved and cross moved for judgment on the pleadings. The district court entered judgment in favor of the sheriff. The court held that the officer made a statement of public concern when he posted an Internet statement critical of the department, but the sheriff's interest in the efficient discharge of his public responsibility outweighed the employee's interest in urging fellow employees to oppose the sheriff, allowing the termination of the officer. The court noted that posting a statement on the Internet gave the statement a public character, and the statement did articulate a claim that the sheriff rewarded political allegiance rather than merit in the operation of department, which is a public issue. The statement was posted on an employees' union Internet website, and compared the department to Nazi Germany, and exhorted corrections personnel to disobey department orders, as German officers had defied Hitler at end of the Second World War. (Essex County, Massachusetts)
U.S. Appeals Court FREE SPEECH RETALIATION TERMINATION	Curran v. Cousins, 509 F.3d 36 (1st Cir. 2007). A corrections officer sued a sheriff's department, claiming termination in retaliation for exercise of his First Amendment free speech rights. The district court granted the department's motion for judgment on the pleadings and the officer appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the officer's speech, consisting of statements that the sheriff's political/union rivals were unfairly disciplined and harassed, was on matters of public concern, but the department had adequate justification for terminating the officer based on his statements on a union website. The officer made statements on the website comparing the sheriff to Hitler, those who followed sheriff's instructions to Hitler's generals, and officers to Jews who were marched into death chambers. (Essex County Sheriff's Department, Massachusetts)
U.S. District Court POLITICAL AFFILIATION	Gullick v. Ott, 517 F.Supp.2d 1063 (W.D.Wis. 2007). A plaintiff filed a § 1983 action alleging that a deputy sheriff detained him and issued a citation because of his support for a candidate opposed by the deputy in a sheriff's race, in violation of the First Amendment. The deputy moved for summary judgment. The district court denied the motion. The court held that the plaintiff did not have to demonstrate an absence of probable cause in order to establish a First Amendment retaliation claim. The court found that summary judgment was precluded by fact issues as to whether the deputy sheriff had probable cause to detain the plaintiff and issue him a citation, and whether the deputy's actions were motivated by the plaintiff's support for the candidate. The court found that the plaintiff suffered sufficient injury to support a retaliation claim and that the deputy was not entitled to qualified immunity because it was clearly established at the time of the incident that law enforcement officers could not retaliate against citizens for exercising their First Amendment rights. The court opened its decision by stating "The facts of this case sound like they came straight from a bad movie on cable TV..." (Columbia County, Wisconsin)
U.S. District Court HOSTILE WORK ENVIRONMENT RACIAL DISCRIMINATION TRAINING	Hawkins v. County of Oneida, N.Y., 497 F.Supp.2d 362 (N.D.N.Y. 2007). An African-American corrections officer sued a county, county sheriff's department, sheriff, undersheriff, and other officers, alleging racially discriminatory employment actions and a racially hostile work environment in violation of Title VII, state human rights law, Equal Protection Clause, and federal civil right statutes. The officer also alleged a conspiracy to violate his civil rights, neglect to prevent civil rights violations, breach of contract, intentional infliction of emotional distress, wrongful termination, negligence, and gross negligence. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part, and denied in part. The court held that the officer did not show that the stated reasons of the county and sheriff's department for not providing him with tower and weapons training (that probationary employees were not eligible for such training) and for not providing him with emergency response team training (that no academy for such training was held during officer's employment), were a pretext for race discrimination, and thus failed to establish that the alleged failure to train violated Title VII and state human rights law. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by material issues of fact existed as to: (1) whether the extension of the officer's probationary period following an incident in which the officer allegedly acted disrespectfully toward a deputy after being stopped for speeding; (2) whether the reason proffered for termination of the officer--that he allowed an inmate to perform his security tours--was a pretext for race discrimination; (3) whether the officer was subjected to discriminatory intimidation, ridicule, and insult that was so severe or pervasive as to alter the conditions of his employment and create an abusive working environment; (4) whether racial animus motivated the undersheriff in making decisions to extend the probationary period of the officer and to terminate his employment; (5) whether a sergeant who was present when a deputy allegedly made racist and racially charged remarks directed towards the officer and whether the lieutenant to whom the officer reported racist and racially charged remarks and treatment was personally involved in the discriminatory conduct; (6) whether there was a persistent or widespread custom of race discrimination within the sheriff's department and whether actions of the undersheriff in extending the probationary period of, and then terminating, the officer constituted official policy. (Oneida County Sheriff's Department, New York)
U.S. District Court HIRING/ QUALIFICATIONS RETENTION	Heckenlaible v. Virginia Peninsula Regional Jail Authority, 491 F.Supp.2d 544 (E.D.Va. 2007). An inmate brought an action against a correctional officer and regional jail authority, seeking to recover monetary relief for injuries suffered as a result of an allegedly nonconsensual sexual encounter between her and the officer. The jail authority moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part, and denied in part. The court found that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the correctional officer, whose duties required him to observe inmates in the shower, was acting within the scope of his employment when he allegedly sexually assaulted the inmate after he observed her showering and during a "cell search" thereafter. The court held that the inmate's deposition testimony that she was the victim of a sexual assault by the correctional officer was sufficient to preclude summary judgment in favor of the jail authority on her intentional infliction of emotional distress claim. The court found that absent evidence indicating that the correctional officer was known by anyone to have a propensity to commit sexual assault at the time he was hired, or evidence indicating that some testing would have revealed that the officer would pose a danger to inmates, the jail authority was not liable under Virginia law on the inmate's negligent hiring claim. The court also found that since the jail authority never received any complaints from inmates about the officer, and swiftly investigated the matter and took appropriate action upon learning that a sexual encounter had occurred, it was not liable for negligent retention. (Virginia Peninsula Regional Jail)

U.S. District Court
FREE SPEECH
TERMINATION

Jennings v. County of Washtenaw, 475 F.Supp.2d 692 (E.D.Mich. 2007). An employee sued a county and a supervisor under § 1983, alleging that she was discharged for exercising her free speech rights. The defendants moved for summary judgment and the district court granted the motion. The court held that the employee did not speak as citizen in reporting a co-worker's alleged safety violation of allowing juvenile center detainee to take shower on the midnight shift when only three employees were present, and, thus, the employee's speech was not protected by First Amendment, in that she was acting as public employee carrying out her professional responsibilities. The court also found that the employee did not speak on matter of public concern. (Washtenaw County Juvenile Detention Center, Wisconsin)

U.S. District Court
RACIAL DISCRIMINATION
OVERTIME
FLSA- Fair Labor Standards Act

Jeter v. Montgomery County, 480 F.Supp.2d 1293 (M.D.Ala. 2007). An African-American employee brought a state court action against a county, alleging denial of earned wages, retaliation, and race discrimination. The action was removed to federal court, where the employee moved for leave to amend her complaint, and the county moved for dismissal. The district court granted the motions in part and denied in part. The court held that amendment of her complaint to add a claim alleging violation of the Fair Labor Standards Act (FLSA) wage requirements would not be futile, where the amendment claimed that the county failed to pay her overtime for work she did in excess of 40 hours per week. The employee asserted that after she complained about her lack of overtime pay, her home detention verification program was canceled, her workload increased, and she was told by superiors that she was not "team player." The court also held that amendment of her complaint to add a claim alleging an equal protection violation due to race-based discrimination in pay would not be futile, where she was also claiming that she was treated differently, based on her race, from a similarly situated white employee. (Montgomery County Youth Facility, Alabama)

U.S. District Court
PROMOTION RELIGION

Milwaukee Deputy Sheriffs Ass'n v. Clarke, 513 F.Supp.2d 1014 (E.D.Wisc. 2007). A union and county sheriff's deputies brought a § 1983 action against a county sheriff, sheriff's captain and county alleging that the defendants violated the Establishment and Free Exercise Clauses of the Constitution. The plaintiffs were seeking an injunction barring the defendants from permitting any further presentations given by a religious group. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that inviting the religious organization to speak within the sheriff's department was an unconstitutional endorsement of religion. The court found that an organization of law enforcement officers, which assisted officers in dealing with stress through Bible study, encouragement and support, was a religious organization for the purposes of the sheriff's deputies' Establishment Clause action. The court noted that even though the organization did not bar non-Christians from joining, members of an evangelical church created the organization at meetings held at a church. The organization's literature contained numerous references to Christ and the name of the organization was "Fellowship of Christian Centurions." Speakers had instructed deputies that civil government was "God's idea" and that they were "ministers of God". A presenter had quoted books of the Bible and the organization made available copies of a book about Christian faith. The sheriff had invited the organization to make a presentation at a department leadership conference which previously had included only secular speakers. The department subsequently asked the organization to make similar presentations at department roll calls. The department required attendance of deputies and did not advise them that they could skip the organization's presentations. Before the leadership conference the sheriff had spoken of promotion criteria and distributed written material recommending that deputies surround themselves with people of faith. The court found that a sheriff's captain could be held liable under § 1983 for the department's Establishment Clause violation in endorsing the message of a religious organization composed of law enforcement officers because the captain took an affirmative role in setting up the organization's presentations and failed to take any action to alleviate the appearance of government endorsement of religion. However, the court held that evidence was insufficient to establish that the county sheriff had made Christianity a prerequisite for promotion in violation of Free Exercise Clause. The sheriff had distributed religious material prior to the leadership conference when he was speaking about promotion criteria. (Milwaukee County Sheriff's Department, Wisconsin)

U.S. District Court
FLSA- Fair Labor Standards Act OVERTIME
SUPERVISION

Mullins v. City of New York, 523 F.Supp.2d 339 (S.D.N.Y. 2007). Police sergeants brought an action against a city and its police department to recover overtime compensation to which they were allegedly entitled under the Fair Labor Standards Act (FLSA), but for which they had not been paid. The sergeants moved for partial summary judgment on the issue of the defendants' liability. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants in part and denied in part. The court held that the sergeants were exempt from FLSA as executives for the period governed by the "short test." According to the court, the primary duty of the police sergeants was management and therefore they were exempt from FLSA overtime pay requirements as executives for the period governed by the "short test." The court noted that although the sergeants spent most of their shifts working alongside their subordinates and performing many of the same law enforcement tasks, they were responsible for ensuring that their subordinates performed their assignments, and they were personally subject to discipline for failure to do so. The court denied summary judgment in part because of genuine issues of material fact as to whether the police sergeants had the authority to hire or fire other employees, or whether their suggestions and recommendations as to the hiring, firing, advancement, promotion or any other change of status of other employees were given particular weight. (New York City Police Department)

U.S. District Court
FLSA- Fair Labor Standards Act
OVERTIME

Murphy v. Town of Natick, 516 F.Supp.2d 153 (D.Mass. 2007). Police officers filed a complaint against a Massachusetts town, its police department, and the chief of police, on behalf of themselves and 54 other current and former patrol and superior officers employed by the town. The officers alleged willful violations of the Fair Labor Standards Act (FLSA), specifically, that the town failed to pay all the overtime they were due for hours worked in excess of 40 per week. The district court held that the town was required to include all wage augmentments in the calculation of the regular rate with the exception of an in-service training differential, and that the officers were to be paid FLSA overtime for performing town details. The court found that sergeants and lieutenants fell within the executive exemption to the FLSA overtime requirement, but that detectives did not. (Natick Police Department, Massachusetts)

U.S. Appeals Court
TITLE VII
PROMOTION
TERMINATION

Perez v. Illinois, 488 F.3d 773 (7th Cir. 2007). A Hispanic corrections employee sued a state under Title VII, alleging that he was terminated and, after reinstatement, denied promotion because of his national origin. The district court entered summary judgment in favor of the state. The employee appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the employee was not similarly situated to a suspended co-worker, and the state's proffered reason for not promoting the employee was not pretextual. The court held that the employee, who was terminated for violating rules prohibiting conduct unbecoming an employee and unprofessional conduct, was not similarly situated, for purposes of a prima facie Title VII case, to a co-worker who was suspended for five days for violating the same rules, where the employee was a captain but the co-worker was lieutenant, and the employee was punished for sexual harassment over a two-year period, while the co-worker was punished for a single incident of consensual kissing and embracing a subordinate employee while on duty. According to the court, the state's proffered reason for not promoting the employee to shift commander-- that he scored the lowest on an examination given to 12 applicants for the job-- was not a pretext for a national origin discrimination, inasmuch as the test scores had a factual basis, and, even if the correctional captain lied about his knowledge of an unrelated investigational interview and a test administrator was unfamiliar with the test scoring method, such facts did not alter the quality of the answers that the employee gave. (Illinois Department of Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
BFOQ- Bona Fide Occupational
Qualifications
SEX DISCRIMINATION
RETALIATION

Piercy v. Maketa, 480 F.3d 1192 (10th Cir. 2007). A female former employee with a county sheriff's office brought suit against the sheriff's office, sheriff, and board of county commissioners alleging sex discrimination and retaliation in violation of Title VII. The employee alleged that her supervisors began an investigation of her violation of personnel policies after she notified her superiors at the county sheriff's office that she planned to pursue formal discrimination charges. She was fired after the investigation was completed. The court found that her allegations were sufficient to establish the causation element of a prima facie claim of retaliation for filing a complaint with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC) under Title VII. Civil Rights Act of 1964. The district court granted the defendants' motions for summary judgment, and the former employee appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The appeals court held that the employee's failure to obey orders, departure from the truth, and violation of uniform requirements by wearing a tongue ring constituted a legitimate, nondiscriminatory reason for her discharge. According to the court, the reason offered by the sheriff was not a pretext for retaliation in violation of Title VII. The court noted that the decision to recommend dismissal of the employee was made only after completion of the internal affairs investigation and nothing suggested the under-sheriff acted in bad faith in ordering the termination of employee or that the sheriff acted in bad faith in sustaining the dismissal. The appeals court held that the sheriff's office policy of not allowing female deputies to take jobs at a maximum-security facility housing only male inmates was facially discriminatory under Title VII. According to the court, differences in duties between a mixed gender jail and a maximum security facility which housed only male inmates were sufficiently substantial that any transfer of the employee from the former to the latter would not have been purely lateral, so that denying a transfer to the female employee would be an adverse employment action supportive of a sex discrimination claim under Title VII. The court held that the sheriff's office shift-bidding policies, that required certain numbers of female and male officers to be available at jail, were a mere inconvenience and did not constitute an adverse employment action, as required for former employee's sex discrimination claim under Title VII. In her motion for summary judgment, the employee asserted that the policy preventing women from taking jobs at the Metro facility discriminated on its face and thus only a "bona fide occupational qualification" [BFOQ] under 42 U.S.C. § 2000e-2(e) could justify such facial discrimination. Officials suggested two reasons for the policy that restricted the employee from bidding for a shift at Metro: (1) at the time, there were not enough female officers available to staff the female ward at CJC; and (2) privacy and safety considerations required sufficient female staff at CJC. The appeals court found that while these reasons may be adequate to support EPSO's policy as a bona fide occupational qualification that permits discrimination under 42 U.S.C. § 2000e-2(e), the district court did not address this question. The appeals court remanded the case to the district court with instructions to make a decision on this question. (El Paso County Sheriff's Office, Colorado)

U.S. District Court
DUE PROCESS
SEX DISCRIMINATION CONTRACT
UNION

Pina v. Lantz, 495 F.Supp.2d 290 (D.Conn. 2007). Ten current and former correctional employees brought suit against a Commissioner of Correction and other administrators for alleged violations of their due process rights and Title VII when they were terminated from their temporary positions and not hired for newly created positions. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The employees formerly held temporary positions as Correctional Officer First Class or Correctional Sergeant and were denied appointment to the newly created position of Parole Officer I, on the basis that they either did not have sufficient experience for the position or they did not score sufficiently high on interviews. They were returned to their former jobs when their temporary positions were abolished. The court held that this did not violate substantive due process, as the executive action did not shock the conscience. The court found that the employees did not have a property interest protected by due process in positions at a higher class that were classified by the Department of Correction (DOC) as temporary or durational, rather than permanent. The court noted that job postings advertised positions as temporary, and state law and DOC policies provided that temporary assignments to a higher class were not permanent. The court held that the employees did not have a protected property interest in those positions pursuant to a collective bargaining agreement that recognized that durational employees were not guaranteed continued employment.

The court held that the DOC was not required to give the employees a pre-deprivation hearing to protect any property interest in their temporary positions at a higher rank, where the employees did not make any request for a hearing despite being notified of the pending abolition of their temporary positions. The court noted that providing correctional employees with advance notification of the termination of their temporary positions at higher rank and an opportunity for a pre-termination hearing, in conjunction with a process by which employees could file post-deprivation grievances, satisfied the procedural due process requirements attaching to any property interest they had in their positions.

The court found that summary judgment on a gender-based disparate treatment equal protection claim and Title VII claim was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether a correctional employee's gender and a member of the interview committee's alleged track record of discrimination against female employees played a role in denying her a position as a parole officer. (Connecticut Department of Correction)

U.S. Appeals Court ASSOCIATION
DISCIPLINE
FREE SPEECH
RETALIATION

Piscottano v. Murphy, 511 F.3d 247 (2nd Cir. 2007). Correctional employees brought a § 1983 action against state officials alleging that discipline imposed on them for associating with a motorcycle club violated their First Amendment and due process rights to freedom of expressive association and freedom of intimate association. The employees asserted a “void-for-vagueness” challenge to the regulation under which they were disciplined. The district court entered summary judgment for the state officials and the employees appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the conduct of three employees constituted expressive activity on a matter of public concern but the discipline of the three employees did not violate their freedom of expressive association. The court found that the regulation prohibiting correctional officers from engaging in behavior that could reflect negatively on the corrections department was not void for vagueness as applied to the three employees. The court noted that the motorcycle club was not an organization that spoke out on matters of public concern. According to the court, the state correctional employees' approval or endorsement of the club necessarily would constitute expressive conduct on a matter of public concern where the employee testified that what the club was “all about” riding motorcycles, having parties and having fun. According to the court, in a public employee's action alleging retaliation for exercising speech rights, evidence that harms or disruptions have in fact occurred are not necessary for the employer to justify an adverse employment action. The court found that the employer need only make a reasonable determination that the employee's speech creates the potential for such harms. (Connecticut Department of Correction)

U.S. Appeals Court
MILITARY SERVICE
TERMINATION

Pittman v. Department of Justice, 486 F.3d 1276 (Fed Cir. 2007). An employee sought review of a decision of the Merit Systems Protection Board (MSPB) denying his request for relief under the Uniformed Services Employment and Reemployment Rights Act (USERRA), alleging that the Federal Bureau of Prisons failed to reemploy him following his military service and improperly removed him from his position. The court affirmed in part, vacated in part, and remanded. The court found that the statute prohibiting discrimination on the basis of military service requires an employee making a claim under the statute to bear the initial burden of showing by a preponderance of evidence that the employee's military service was a substantial or motivating factor in the adverse employment action. If this requirement is met, the employer then has the opportunity to come forward with evidence to show, by a preponderance of evidence, that the employer would have taken the adverse action anyway, for a valid reason. Prior to his military activation, the employee's performance at the agency was more than satisfactory and had warranted a number of performance-based awards. While serving in Iraq he was stationed at the Whitehorse detention facility, and he was found guilty at a court-martial proceeding of one count of dereliction of duty under the Uniform Code of Military Justice and one count of assault. A two-page summary of these convictions identified the underlying conduct as the failure to safeguard the physical health, welfare, and treatment of Iraqi prisoners and the unlawful striking of unknown Iraqi prisoners. He was reduced in rank from sergeant to private and sentenced to sixty days of hard labor without confinement. He nevertheless continued to remain a member of the Marine Corps Reserve and was released from active duty status under honorable circumstances. After his return from Iraq, he returned to active duty at the agency and worked one shift. After that shift, he was confronted about the conduct underlying the court-martial convictions. At the agency's request, he signed an affidavit acknowledging the convictions but declaring them to be unsupported by evidence. He was issued a notice of proposed removal and he responded to the charges orally and in writing and alleged that the agency's proposed action violated USERRA. He also submitted a supporting affidavit from his commanding officer that described the mitigating circumstances surrounding his conduct in Iraq and a letter of recommendation from the sheriff of Rockland County, New York. (Metropolitan Detention Center in Brooklyn, New York)

U.S. District Court
SEX DISCRIMINATION
SEXUAL HARASSMENT
TITLE VII

Reed v. Cedar County, 474 F.Supp.2d 1045 (N.D.Iowa 2007). A female county employee, the jail administrator, filed a complaint against a county and its sheriff, in his individual and official capacities, alleging she was subjected to sex discrimination and sexual harassment in violation of Title VII and the Iowa Civil Rights Act (ICRA), and battery in violation of Iowa common law. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motions in part and denied in part. The court held that the jail administrator's placement on paid administrative leave was not a “tangible employment action” where the jail administrator had continued to receive her full salary, raises and benefits. The court found that the county's anti-sexual harassment policies, along with its reporting procedure and county-wide employee mandatory training program, were sufficient to show that the county exercised reasonable care to prevent sexual harassment. The jail administrator received a copy of county's sexual harassment policy when she commenced employment and a copy of an updated policy, she understood each policy and knew she could complain about harassment by bypassing the sheriff and reporting directly to either the Board of Supervisors or County Attorney, and was not only trained to use the policy but was herself the trainer at times for other employees. But the court found that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact, as to whether the county took prompt, corrective action once they learned about the sheriff's sexually harassing behavior. The court noted that, in accordance with the county's revised policy, the jail administrator brought the problem to the attention of her department head, the chief deputy, who failed to take action on at least five occasions over a two-year period. (Cedar County Sheriff, Iowa)

U.S. Appeals Court
FREE SPEECH
EQUAL PROTECTION
DISCRIMINATION
DUE PROCESS
TITLE VII

Salas v. Wisconsin Dept. of Corrections, 493 F.3d 913 (7th Cir. 2007). A Hispanic former employee sued a state corrections department, alleging that he was terminated for discriminatory and retaliatory motives in violation of Title VII and § 1983, and asserting due process, equal protection, and First Amendment claims. The district court granted the summary judgment in favor of the department and the employee appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the employee's termination was not caused by his protected speech of testifying at a co-worker's Title VII investigation. According to the court, the employee failed to identify similarly situated non-Hispanic employees that were treated more favorably for his § 1983 equal protection claim. The court found that the employee was not deprived of procedural due process. The court noted that although the employee did not identify the Hispanic nation from which he originated, his allegation that he was Hispanic sufficiently identified his national origin to demonstrate that he was member of protected class, in his suit alleging national origin discrimination in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. (Wisconsin Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
RACIAL DISCRIMINATION
RETALIATION
TITLE VII
WORK RULES

Simmons v. The G.E.O. Group, Inc., 528 F.Supp.2d 583 (E.D.N.C. 2007). An African-American employee at a private correctional detention facility sued his employer, claiming race discrimination under Title VII. The employer moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The court held that the employee, who was disciplined in connection with his guilty plea to driving while intoxicated (DWI) and failure to inform the facility of the charges until later confronted, was not similarly situated to a Caucasian coworker who had been charged with a misdemeanor offense of failing to obey a traffic officer. According to the court, the employee's complaint concerning the employer's smoking policy was not a protected activity under Title VII and could not form the basis for a retaliation claim. (G.E.O. Group, Inc., Rivers Correctional Institution, North Carolina)

U.S. District Court
HOSTILE WORK
ENVIRONMENT
SEX DISCRIMINATION

Singleton v. City of New York, 496 F.Supp.2d 390 (S.D.N.Y. 2007). A male employee brought an action against a city under Title VII and state law, alleging that the city subjected him to a hostile work environment because of his gender. After a jury returned a verdict awarding the employee $1,000,000 in damages, the city moved for judgment as a matter of law or, in the alternative, for a new trial or remittitur. The court reduced the jury award to $300,000, finding that the jury award was unreasonable, given that harassment by the employee's female supervisor, both on and off the job, created a workplace atmosphere in which the employee felt pervasive fear and led to the dissolution of his relationship with the mother of his child, and his consequent separation from both. (New York City Department of Corrections, Rikers Island)

U.S. Appeals Court
RETALIATION
FREE SPEECH

Spiegla v. Hull, 481 F.3d 961 (7th Cir. 2007). A state prison employee sued prison officials under § 1983, alleging that they changed her shift schedule and assignment in retaliation for exercise of her free speech rights. The initial grant of summary judgment in favor of the officials was reversed by the court of appeals. On remand, the district court entered judgment on a jury verdict award of $210,000 for the employee. The defendants appealed. The appeals court vacated and remanded, finding that the officer who reported a possible breach of prison security, did so as part of her official responsibilities to keep the prison secure, and thus did not engage in "citizen" speech that was protected from First Amendment retaliation. The court noted that public employees who are speaking pursuant to their official duties are speaking as employees, not citizens, and thus are not protected by the First Amendment from retaliation, regardless of the content of their speech. According to the court, the fact that the officer's statements highlighted potential misconduct by prison officers did not change the fact that she was speaking pursuant to her official responsibilities, not as citizen. (Westville Correctional Facility, Indiana)

U.S. Appeals Court
PROMOTION
PROPERTY INTEREST
DUE PROCESS
EQUAL PROTECTION

Teigen v. Renfrow, 511 F.3d 1072 (10th Cir. 2007). Employees of the Colorado Department of Corrections (DOC) brought a § 1983 action against DOC officials alleging that the officials engaged in a policy of blacklisting employees who maintained administrative appeals of state personnel actions, in violation of the Due Process and Equal Protection Clauses. The district court dismissed the action and the employees appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that although the employees had a protected property interest under Colorado law in their continued employment, they were not deprived of a protected property interest by the DOC officials' alleged policy of blacklisting. The court found that the right to be fairly considered for promotions was not a due process property right and that the policy of denying promotions to employees because they maintained administrative appeals did not violate the Equal Protection Clause. (Territorial Correctional Facility, Colorado Department of Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
BFOQ- Bona Fide Occupational
Qualifications
SEX DISCRIMINATION

Tipler v. Douglas County, Neb., 482 F.3d 1023 (8th Cir. 2007). A female correctional officer brought a gender discrimination action against a county jail employer, alleging violation of § 1983 and Title VII. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the employer and the correctional officer appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that reassignment of female officer to a different shift, pursuant to county jail's gender-based staffing policy, did not violate Title VII. The court also held that the reassignment did not violate the equal protection clause. The appeals court noted that where the employer is a prison [jail], a bona fide occupational qualification analysis (BFOQ) under Title VII is unnecessary if the policy requiring female-only supervision of female inmates is reasonable, and if such a policy imposes only a minimal restriction on the employee. According to the court, when the state [county] makes a classification based on gender, under the equal protection clause the state must show at least that the challenged classification serves important governmental objectives and that the discriminatory means employed are substantially related to the achievement of those objectives. The court held that the jail's reassignment of the female correctional officer to a different shift did not violate the equal protection clause because the reassignment was substantially related to important governmental objectives, including compliance with state law, and proper jail administration. (Douglas County Correctional Center, Nebraska)

U.S. Appeals Court HOLIDAYS
MILITARY SERVICE

Tully v. Department of Justice, 481 F.3d 1367 (Fed.Cir. 2007). A federal Bureau of Prisons (BOP) employee sought review of a decision of the Merit Systems Protection Board, which held that the BOP did not owe him payment for 27 holidays which occurred while he was on leave without pay to serve on active duty in the U.S. Army. The court of appeals held that the BOP was not required, under the Uniformed Services Employment and Reemployment Rights Act (USERRA) to pay the employee for the 27 holidays which occurred while he was on a two-and-one-half year leave of absence without pay to serve on active duty in the U.S. Army, even though during employee's leave the BOP provided holiday pay to employees who took paid leaves of absence to attend judicial proceedings as jurors or witnesses. According to the court, the typically brief duration of an absence for court duty and the employee's two-and-one-half year absence for active service were not comparable leaves of absence. (Federal Bureau of Prisons, D.C.)

U.S. District Court
PHYSICAL REQUIRE-MENTS
DISABILITY
ADA- Americans With Disabilities Act

Van v. Miami-Dade County, 509 F.Supp.2d 1295 (S.D.Fla. 2007). A county correctional officer suffering from diabetes sued a county, seeking damages for discrimination pursuant to the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) and the Florida Civil Rights Act (FCRA). The county moved for summary judgment, and the employee moved for partial summary judgment. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendant. The court held that the officer who was suffering from diabetes was neither disabled nor regarded as disabled, thus defeating his discrimination claims under the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) and the Florida Civil Rights Act (FCRA), even though he was regarded as unable to fill the position of correctional officer while he had a glucose level of 8.0% or higher. At a required physical examination, the examining physician concluded that the officer's diabetes was not under control and that he would not be allowed to perform the safety-sensitive duties of a correctional officer and would be placed on restricted duty. The physician told the officer that he would be released to full duty as soon as he was able to provide a He-Alc test result showing that his sugar level was 8.0% or less. According to the court, the position of "correctional officer" was a single, particular job, which could not constitute a substantial limitation of the major life activity of working, and the county did not view the employee's impairment of uncontrolled diabetes as a substantial limitation on his ability to work in a broad class of positions. According to the court, the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) did not require a county to create a long-term or permanent restricted duty position for an allegedly disabled corrections officer suffering from diabetes, and thus, the county was not required to alter its policy of six months' restricted duty followed by compulsory leave in order to reasonably accommodate the employee. (Miami-Dade County Dept. of Correction and Rehabilitation)

U.S. District Court
RETALIATION
FREE SPEECH

Wesolowski v. Bockelman, 506 F.Supp.2d 118 (N.D.N.Y. 2007). A sheriff's department employee and his wife sued a sheriff, county, and jail officials, claiming that he was retaliated against, in violation of the First Amendment, for filing a report describing an inmate's alleged beating by a corrections officer, and that his wife was not hired by the department as retaliation for the report. The defendants moved for summary judgment and the district court granted the motion. The court held that the filing of the report was within the employee's job responsibilities, and thus, the First Amendment did not protect him from discipline for such conduct. (Ulster County Jail, New York)

2008

U.S. District Court
SUPERVISION

Adams v. Bouchard, 591 F.Supp.2d 1191 (W.D.Okla. 2008). A jail inmate brought a § 1983 action against sheriff's deputies and a sheriff, alleging the deputies assaulted him, used excessive force, and that the sheriff failed to properly supervise the deputies. The defendants moved for summary judgment and qualified immunity. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the inmate properly exhausted administrative remedies prior to bringing the federal action. The court found that the inmate's efforts towards exhausting his § 1983 excessive force claim against sheriff's deputies were insufficient to satisfy the exhaustion requirement under the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA) as to his claim that the sheriff failed to supervise the deputies. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the force used by the sheriff's deputies against the inmate was necessary. According to the court, the sheriff's deputies were not entitled to qualified immunity from the inmate's Eighth Amendment excessive force claim because it was clearly established at the time of the alleged excessive force that prison officials could not maliciously and sadistically inflict injury for the very purpose of causing harm. (Oklahoma County Detention Center, Oklahoma)

U.S. District Court
DISCIPLINE
DISCRIMINATION
HOSTILE WORK
ENVIRONMENT
PROMOTION
RETALIATION
TERMINATION
TITLE VII

Admire v. Strain, 566 F.Supp.2d 492 (E.D.La. 2008). A former deputy sheriff brought an action against county officials under Title VII and § 1983, alleging discriminatory failure to promote, disparate treatment with respect to promotion, disparate treatment with respect to disciplinary action, discriminatory termination, retaliation for engaging in protected activities, and a discriminatory hostile work environment. The district court granted the officials' motion for summary judgment in part and denied in part. The court held that a county jail warden's alleged statement that "women don't belong in law enforcement" did not constitute direct evidence of gender discrimination sufficient to establish the female deputy sheriff's claims under Title VII for discriminatory failure to promote, even if the statement was proximate in time to the denial of a promotion, where the deputy was already in law enforcement when the warden made the statement. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the county jail warden's failure to promote the female deputy sheriff was motivated by gender discrimination. According to the court, the county's failure to promote the female deputy sheriff to corporal on the ground that candidates selected for promotion received higher scores on a test, or to promote her to sergeant on the ground that the successful candidate had more experience, was already a corporal, and had no disciplinary marks on his record were not a pretext for gender discrimination, in violation of Title VII, where there was no direct evidence of discrimination, and six of ten employees promoted to corporal were female, and two of four employees promoted to sergeant were female. The court found that the female deputy sheriff who was denied promotion to corporal on the ground that she had an adverse disciplinary action within six months of seeking promotion, was not similarly situated to a male sergeant who was appointed lieutenant within six months of an adverse disciplinary action, and thus the deputy failed to establish disparate treatment claim under Title VII, even though the county had no written policy against promoting deputies within six months of disciplinary actions, where the county applied different standards to promotions up to the rank of sergeant and appointments to lieutenant and above. (St. Tammany Parish Sheriff Office, Louisiana)

U.S. District Court
HOSTILE WORK
ENVIRONMENT
PROMOTION
TITLE VII

Anderson v. Nassau County Dept. of Corrections, 558 F.Supp.2d 283 (E.D.N.Y. 2008). A female county correctional employee, a sergeant, brought a Title VII action against a county department, lieutenant, undersheriff, and sheriff, alleging she was passed over for promotion to the rank of lieutenant in violation of § 1983, Title VII, and the New York State Human Rights Law (NYSHRL). The district court held that summary judgment for the defendants on the hostile work environment claims was precluded by a triable issue of fact as to whether the employee's treatment was severe and pervasive. The court also found triable issues of fact as to how many promotions were made after the employee became eligible for the rank of lieutenant, the reasons for failure to promote her, and the defendants' intent in selecting the persons who were promoted. (Nassau County Sheriff's Department, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
DUE PROCESS
RETALIATION
SEXUAL HARASSMENT
TERMINATION

Argyropoulos v. City of Alton, 539 F.3d 724 (7th Cir. 2008). A former city employee who had worked as a jailer brought a Title VII action against the city and former coworkers alleging sexual harassment and retaliation, and brought a § 1983 claim alleging that the city's failure to provide a pre-termination hearing denied her of due process. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants and the employee appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the city's admission that the employee's surreptitious recording of a meeting was a significant factor in her dismissal did not amount to direct evidence of retaliation. The court found that a seven week interval between the employee's sexual harassment complaint and her subsequent arrest and termination, without more, did not amount to direct evidence of retaliation. According to the court, the employee did not show that she was performing her duties satisfactorily. The court's opinion began with the assertion that the employee's "turbulent tenure as a jailor...lasted just ten months..." (Alton Police Department, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
FREE SPEECH
OVERTIME
RETALIATION
STAFFING LEVELS
UNION

Balas v. Taylor, 567 F.Supp.2d 654 (D.Del. 2008). The executrix of the estate of a state department of corrections (DOC) employee, who committed suicide, brought a § 1983 action against the DOC and the employee's supervisors, alleging that the employee's suicide was proximately caused by the defendants' retaliation in violation of the First and Fourteenth Amendments. The court held that resignation from a special emergency unit by the employee was "symbolic speech" protected by the First Amendment, supporting the First Amendment retaliation claim brought by the executrix of the employee's estate. The court noted that, at the time of the resignation, the DOC and a labor union were in the middle of contract negotiations, and the extent to which the prisons were understaffed and the imposition of mandatory and voluntary overtime were major issues in the dispute. According to the court, the resignation of the employee along with other members of the emergency unit was meant to communicate their lack of support for overtime to prison management, and the employee's resignation from the unit was not pursuant to his suit and yet elected amounted to a refusal to perform his duties. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the employee's resignation was a substantial or motivating factor in the alleged retaliatory actions taken against the employee, which included poor performance reviews, and whether the same alleged adverse actions would have taken place in the absence of the protected conduct. The court found that the employee's supervisor was not entitled to qualified immunity for his alleged conduct of giving the employee a mediocre performance evaluation with falsified criticism and taking other retaliatory action against the employee, because of the employee's protected activities of supporting his labor union, refusing to cross a picket line, and resigning from a special prison emergency unit. According to the court, the alleged conduct was retaliatory, and a reasonable official in the supervisor's position could not have believed that his actions were constitutionally permissible, as clearly established law prohibited retaliation for union membership and activity, and exercise of First Amendment rights. (Correction Emergency Response Team, Sussex Correctional Institute, Delaware)

U.S. Appeals Court
RETALIATION
SEXUAL HARASSMENT
TITLE VII

Barker v. Missouri Dept. of Corrections, 513 F.3d 831 (8th Cir. 2008). An employee sued the Missouri Department of Corrections (MDOC) under Title VII alleging that it retaliated against him for aiding a co-worker to report sexual harassment. The district court entered summary judgment for the MDOC and the employee appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that an alleged remark by the manager of a prison's special needs unit could not support an objectively reasonable belief that the remark constituted sexual harassment, and thus, the employee failed to establish a prima facie case of retaliation. The alleged remark to the male co-worker implied that women were better suited for work in the unit because they were more nurturing. (Potosi Correctional Center, Missouri)

U.S. District Court
DISCRIMINATION
POLITICAL AFFILIATION
UNION

Bergeron v. Cabral, 535 F.Supp.2d 204 (D.Mass. 2008). Corrections officers filed a § 1983 action alleging that a sheriff's revocation of their commissions as deputy sheriffs shortly after her election constituted retaliation and political discrimination in violation of their First Amendment rights. The sheriff moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the revocation was of sufficient consequence to constitute an "adverse employment action." The court held that summary judgment was precluded by fact issues as to whether the sheriff's decision to revoke the officers' commissions as deputy sheriffs was motivated by their dissemination of letters and a press release during a political campaign, which would indicate that the sheriff engaged in political discrimination. The court noted that the commission was discretionary, unremunerated and was not a requirement for service as a corrections officer. The commission had no bearing on the officers' work hours, vacation days, or job assignments, but its revocation resulted in the diminution of the officers' status, and deprived them of the opportunity to supplement their income by working private details. The court found that the sheriff's interest in maintaining order and discipline among her officers outweighed any legitimate interest of the corrections officers in promoting their union's bargaining position by publishing allegations of the sheriff's malfeasance during an election campaign, and therefore the sheriff's alleged retaliation against union officers did not violate the First Amendment. (Suffolk County Sheriff, Massachusetts)

U.S. Appeals Court
RETALIATION
SEXUAL HARASSMENT
TITLE VII

Brannum v. Missouri Dept. of Corrections, 518 F.3d 542 (8th Cir. 2008). A female Missouri Department of Corrections (MDOC) correctional officer filed a Title VII retaliation claim against the MDOC. The district court granted summary judgment for the MDOC and the employee appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the female officer did not engage in a “protected activity,” as required to establish a prima facie case of retaliation, when she assisted a new male officer in reporting a functional unit manager’s allegedly sexually harassing comment. According to the court, even if the female officer was actually attempting to object to what she perceived as disparate treatment of an officer on account of his gender, she could not have reasonably believed she was opposing the disparate treatment as he was not subject to any “adverse employment action.” The female employee alleged that the manager commented that “women are better by and large as they do a better job than men anyway and are more patient and nurturing.” (Potosi Correctional Center, Missouri)

U.S. District Court
FREE SPEECH
HARASSMENT
HOSTILE WORK
ENVIRONMENT
RACIAL DISCRIMINATION

Brown v. New York State Dept. of Correctional Services, 583 F.Supp.2d 404 (W.D.N.Y. 2008). A correctional officer brought an action against the New York State Department of Correctional Services (DOCS) and several other institutional and individual defendants, alleging race discrimination and harassment in violation of Title VII, § 1981, § 1983, and the New York State Human Rights Law (NYSHRL). The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants in part and denied in part. The court held that: (1) the officer satisfied the personal involvement requirement for stating a § 1981 hostile work environment claim against his co-workers; (2) the alleged harassment by his co-workers was not done under color of law for the purposes of a § 1983 claim; (3) the officer’s complaints to supervisors about alleged discrimination and harassment based on his race did not constitute speech protected under § 1983 and did not relate to matters of public concern; (4) the officer’s state law claims against individual state officials and employees were barred by the election-of-remedies provision in NYSHRL; (5) genuine issues of material fact existed as to whether the actions and statements of his co-workers created a hostile work environment under Title VII; (6) genuine issues of material fact existed as to whether the DOCS took appropriate steps to put an end to the alleged harassment; and (7) genuine issues of material fact existed as to whether his co-workers and supervisors acted with retaliatory animus. (Elmira Corr’l. Facility, N.Y.)

U.S. Appeals Court
OVERTIME
WORK RULES

Carlsen v. U.S., 521 F.3d 1371 (Fed Cir. 2008). Federal employees of the Bureau of Prisons brought an action against United States under the Federal Employees Pay Act (FEPA) alleging that they were entitled to be paid for overtime that they had worked. The United States Court of Federal Claims granted judgment for the United States and the employees appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the occasional or irregular overtime work allegedly performed by the Bureau of Prisons employees who worked in a secure environment was not subject to compensation under FEPA unless the overtime was directed or approved in writing by a person authorized to approve such overtime. The court noted that the employees worked in a setting in which they were required to follow all orders, written or oral. The court found that documents such as agency manuals, standards of conduct and training documents which emphasized that employees were required to follow orders of their superiors, when considered together with verbal directives that had the effect of requiring employees to work outside their scheduled shifts, did not constitute express written directives or orders to the employees to work overtime. According to the court, documents such as emails of employees’ performance standards and emails from a warden’s secretary and announcements of times and places of meetings that the employees were expected to attend did not constitute sufficient written orders to the employees to work overtime. The court ruled that the time that employees spent waiting in a key line did not constitute overtime work. However, the court found that “post orders” that defined employees’ duties for each shift by inherently requiring the presence of two employees, one of whom was off-duty, in order to exchange information and equipment at change of shifts, did constitute written orders to work overtime, but the tasks for which an employee was entitled to overtime credit, which amounted to less than ten minutes per day, were de minimis. (Federal Bureau of Prisons)

U.S. District Court
ADA- Americans with Disabilities Act
EQUAL PROTECTION
SEX DISCRIMINATION

Cole v. Taber, 587 F.Supp.2d 856 (W.D.Tenn. 2008). A female correctional officer brought a suit against a county and county officials and supervisors, alleging violations of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), Title VII, equal protection, and the First Amendment. The county moved for summary judgment and the district court granted the motion. The court held that the officer, who could not perform 90% of the essential functions of her job was not otherwise a qualified individual under ADA. The court held that the officer’s equal protection rights were not violated and that her speech did not concern matters of public concern for the purpose of her First Amendment retaliation claim. The officer admitted that she could not perform 90% of the essential functions of her job due to ruptured tendons and a degenerative joint disease that made it difficult for her to walk. According to the court, male county correctional officers who received temporary assignments to light duty work to accommodate illnesses that were not job-related were not similarly situated to the female correctional officer who was denied permanent assignment to light-duty jobs to accommodate her foot injuries, as required to establish a prima facie case of sex discrimination based on alleged differing treatment afforded to female and male officers regarding permanent accommodations. (Shelby County Div. of Corr., Tennessee)

U.S. Appeals Court
DISCIPLINE
RETALIATION
SEXUAL HARASSMENT
TITLE VII

Culton v. Missouri Dept. of Corrections, 515 F.3d 828 (8th Cir. 2008). A state employee filed a Title VII action alleging that an agency retaliated against him for confronting a supervisor about the supervisor’s unwanted sexual advances toward a subordinate employee. The district court entered summary judgment in the agency’s favor and employee appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the employee failed to establish the causation branch of his claim that his transfer to a lower status position was in retaliation for his confrontation with the supervisor. According to the court, the decision maker decided on the transfer before learning of the employee’s sexual harassment allegation, and the employee did not dispute the factual accuracy of anything reported by the supervisor. The court held that the agency’s decision to dock the employee’s pay for taking unauthorized sick leave was not a pretext for retaliation against the employee, despite the employee’s contention that the agency failed to follow its policy when docking his pay. The court noted that the employee did not offer any evidence showing that the agency treated him differently than similarly situated employees. (Missouri Department of Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
ADA- Americans with Disabilities Act
BFOQ-Bona Fide Occupational Qualifications
DUE PROCESS
QUALIFICATIONS

Dargis v. Sheahan, 526 F.3d 981 (7th Cir. 2008). A county corrections officer, who was placed on leave without pay after he returned to work following a stroke, brought an action against the county sheriff's department, county sheriff, and others, alleging violation of his due process rights, and violation of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA). The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the officer on the due process claims, granted summary judgment in favor of defendants on the ADA claims, and dismissed the state law claims. The officer appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the officer, who had suffered a stroke, failed to establish an ADA discrimination claim because he could no longer perform the essential functions of the position of corrections officer. The court noted that the officer's physician advised that he could no longer have contact with inmates, could have no physical contact, no physical activity other than sitting in a chair with brief episodes of standing and walking, no lifting, kneeling, stooping, or running, and must have a work environment with adequate heat and air conditioning. The sheriff's office had stated that correctional officers are primarily responsible for maintaining vigil, standing watch over inmates, counting inmates, breaking up fights among inmates, inspecting for contraband, escorting inmates outside their cells, searching inmates and visitors, and searching for escaped inmates. Although there are some positions requiring less inmate contact than others, the sheriff's office asserted that all officers, regardless of the position to which they were assigned, must be able to respond to emergencies such as riots or escapes, and must be able to rotate through various positions as needed. This requirement, often occurring due to unforeseeable events, meant that the Sheriff's Office was unable to guarantee that any assignment would shield an officer from all inmate contact. (Cook County Sheriff's Office of Corrections, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
FREE SPEECH
RETALIATION
UNION

Davignon v. Hodgson, 524 F.3d 91 (1st Cir. 2008). County corrections officers brought a § 1983 First Amendment retaliation action against a sheriff in his individual and official capacities, alleging that disciplinary actions taken by the sheriff had been motivated by the officers' union activities. The officers also asserted state-law civil rights and tort claims. The district court entered judgment on a jury verdict against the sheriff on the § 1983 claims against him in his official capacity, and against the sheriff on some state-law claims. The sheriff appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the officers' private speech to coworkers concerning a planned picket, whose stated purpose was to allow union members to publicly express criticism of management and to alert the public to the behavior of the sheriff was on a matter of public concern. According to the court, there was no evidence of actual or potential disruption from the officers' brief statements to coworkers concerning a planned picket by the union, and conversely there was ample evidence that the officers had been suspended because of their pro-union activity rather than for reasons of disruption of public safety. The court held that the attorney fee award to the officers' attorneys of approximately $172,000 was not excessive, even though the back-wages damages award was only approximately $18,000. According to the court, the award under a civil rights attorney fee statute did not necessarily have to be proportionate to the amount of damages. The court also held that the officers' lack of success on one of their claims did not preclude the fee award because the officers were successful on the claim that had propelled the litigation. (Bristol County Sheriff's Office, Massachusetts)

U.S. Appeals Court
DISCRIMINATION
TITLE VII
WORKING CONDITIONS
WORK RULES

Diaz-Romero v. Mukasey, 514 F.3d 115 (1st Cir. 2008). A former Public Health Service (PHS) officer brought an action against various government defendants claiming damages arising from alleged employment discrimination while working for the federal Bureau of Prisons (BOP). The officer sought both compensatory and punitive damages for the alleged Title VII, constitutional, and tort violations. The government moved to dismiss and the district court granted the motion. The officer appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the officer's injuries arising from alleged employment discrimination were incident to his service and thus his claims under the Federal Tort Claims Act (FTCA) were barred by the Feres doctrine. The court noted that the incidents that allegedly caused the officer's injuries, i.e., his supervisors' application of BOP regulations to him, occurred while he was actively serving in his PHS assigned post with the BOP, and his supervisors were acting in cooperation with the PHS in that the PHS placed the officer with the BOP. (Metropolitan Det. Center, Guaynabo, Puerto Rico)

U.S. District Court
ADA- Americans with Disabilities Act
DISCRIMINATION
RETALIATION
WORKING CONDITIONS

DuBerry v. District of Columbia, 582 F.Supp.2d 27 (D.D.C. 2008). A former employee brought an action against the D.C. Department of Corrections, alleging that the department discriminated against him on the basis of his disability in violation of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), Title VII, § 1983, § 1981, and the D.C. Human Rights Act. The district court granted summary judgment to the parties in part and denied in part. The court held that the employee sufficiently exhausted his ADA claims and that there was sufficient evidence to allow a reasonable jury to conclude that the department discriminated and retaliated against the employee. The court also found that evidence was sufficient to allow a reasonable jury to conclude that the department's proffered reasons for termination and refusal to rehire were pretextual. The court held that the department did not violate Title VII, § 1983 or § 1981. The former employee had been diagnosed with diabetes and his condition required him to eat meals at designated times and prevented him from skipping meals. He was transferred to the third shift and he requested an accommodation because he believed working that shift would be incompatible with the diabetes treatment regimen prescribed by his physician. The Department denied his accommodation request and transferred him to the third shift. He was eventually transferred to the first shift after using 208 hours of sick leave during his first three months on the third shift. When he was later denied a promotion, he filed an EEOC complaint. (District of Columbia Department of Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
ASSIGNMENT
SEX DISCRIMINATION
SCHEDULE

Duckworth v. St. Louis Metropolitan Police Dept., 491 F.3d 401 (8th Cir. 2008). Female police officers who filed a grievance over their assignment on a rotating basis to night watch, then were permanently placed on night watch, allegedly in retaliation for the grievance, alleged gender discrimination under § 1983, Title VII, and the Missouri Human Rights Act (MHRA). The district court denied qualified immunity to the officers' police superiors, and they appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The court stated that although there was direct evidence of gender discrimination in the officers' reassignments, and the proffered justifications for the reassignment were not exceedingly persuasive, reasonable police administrators could believe that assigning the female officers to night watch was lawful, and qualified immunity should have been granted by the district court. (St. Louis Metropolitan Police Department, Missouri)

U.S. District Court FLSA-Fair Labor Standards Act OVERTIME	Fraternal Order of Police Barkley Lod. v. Fletcher, 618 F.Supp.2d 712, (W.D.Ky. 2008). A police union, union local, and current and past corrections officers at the Kentucky State Penitentiary filed a complaint alleging violations of the Fair Labor Standards Act (FLSA), the Portal to Portal Act (PPA) and mandatory career retention programs provisions under state statutes. The action was brought against a former Kentucky Governor, the Department of Corrections Commissioner, and three wardens, all in their individual and official capacities. The district court granted the defendants' motion to dismiss in part and denied in part. The court held that state officials and public employees can be liable as "employers" under FLSA. The plaintiffs alleged that the defendants exempted and continued to deny overtime compensation to them in violation of FLSA. (Kentucky State Penitentiary)
U.S. District Court PRIVACY SEARCHES TERMINATION	Garcia Rodriguez v. Laboy, 598 F.Supp.2d 186 (D.Puerto Rico 2008). Employees of a correctional facility brought a § 1983 action alleging Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment violations against canine unit officers of the Puerto Rico Correction Department, individually and in their official capacities. The employees challenged the officers' alleged public strip searches involving narcotics dogs and body cavity searches. The court granted two officers' motion to dismiss. The employees challenged searches that required them to make a line where narcotics dogs would sniff them. If the dogs alerted to the presence of narcotics, the employees would be subject to a strip search. However, the employees had to sign release forms before the strip search, and were forced to do so without time to read the forms and under the threat of losing their jobs. Then, the employees were required to undress and subject themselves to a body cavity search. The searches took place in areas to which the public, other employees, and inmates had access to, where they were able to witness the process. The court noted that when conducting these types of searches, officers of the Canine Unit violated several of the internal regulations of the Unit. The regulations required the officers to take every person searched before a supervisor, write a memorandum about each search, and ensure that the area of inspection was not contaminated prior to that particular search. Also, the search had to be limited to a physical search. The court noted that the officers of the Canine Unit searched over thirty employees, but never found any controlled substances. (Correction Department of the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, Correctional Complexes of Guayama 500 and Las Cucharas)
U.S. Appeals Court ADA- Americans with Disabilities Act FMLA- Family and Medical Leave Act RA- Rehabilitation Act	Haybarger v. Lawrence County Adult Probation and Parole, 551 F.3d 193 (3rd Cir. 2008). A former state employee brought an action against his employer and others, alleging violations of the Rehabilitation Act (RA), the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), and the Family and Medical Leave Act (FMLA). The district court dismissed all but the employee's RA claims, and the defendants appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that receipt of federal funds by a subunit of a Pennsylvania judicial district waived Eleventh Amendment immunity under the Rehabilitation Act (RA) for claims against the employer. The court noted that an Eleventh Amendment immunity waiver under the Rehabilitation Act applies to all of the operations of a state department regardless of whether the particular activities are federally assisted. (Lawrence Co. Adult Prob. and Parole Dept., Pennsylvania)
U.S. Appeals Court BFOQ-Bona Fide Occupational Qualification OVERTIME RETALIATION SCHEDULE STAFFING LEVELS TITLE VII	Henry v. Milwaukee County, 539 F.3d 573 (7th Cir. 2008). Female corrections officers brought a Title VII action against a county, challenging a staffing policy that reduced the number of shifts available to them at a juvenile detention center, and alleging other incidents of discrimination as well as retaliation. Following a bench trial, the district court entered judgment for the county. The officers appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed and remanded in part. The court held that a sex-based classification, requiring that each unit in the juvenile detention center be staffed by at least one officer of the same sex as the detainees in the unit, was not reasonably necessary for the rehabilitation, security, or privacy functions of the facility, with respect to the third shift when only one officer was present on each unit. According to the court, the classification was therefore not a bona fide occupational qualification (BFOQ), so as to be exempt from Title VII. The court noted that no staff-on-inmate sexual assaults had occurred, the county had not investigated alternatives to same-sex staffing, juvenile privacy concerns were not limited to the third shift, and the effectiveness of role-modeling programs did not require the presence of a same-sex staff member at all times. The court found that the reduction in overtime hours available to female officers resulting from the policy was an adverse employment action within the meaning of Title VII, in that overtime pay had been a significant and expected component of the female officers' compensation, and the policy had the greatest effect on the third shift, which provided the majority of overtime work and a pay premium. The court held that the incidents alleged by the female officers, such as being told not to wear sweaters or to eat in front of the juveniles, unspecified "intimidation" and door slamming by the head of a shift, missing or marked up time-cards, occasional early morning phone calls, and not being assigned to work together on same the shift or in easier pods, if proven, did not rise to the level of an adverse action under the anti-retaliation provision of Title VII. (Milwaukee County Juvenile Detention Center, Wisconsin)
U.S. Appeals Court RETALIATION SEX DISCRIMINATION TITLE VII	Hervey v. County of Koochiching, 527 F.3d 711 (8th Cir. 2008). A female jail administrator brought an action under Title VII and the Minnesota Human Rights Act (MHRA), alleging that her employer and her supervisors discriminated against her on the basis of her gender and retaliated against her for participation in a protected activity. The plaintiff also alleged that her employer was liable for violations of the Minnesota Government Data Practices Act (MGDPA). The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants, and the plaintiff appealed. The appeals court affirmed and remanded with directions to modify the final judgment so as to dismiss the MGDPA claim without prejudice, so that it may be considered, if at all, by the courts of Minnesota. The court held that the female jail administrator failed to demonstrate that her supervisors took away many of her major responsibilities and twice suspended her without pay because of her gender, in violation of Title VII and the Minnesota Human Rights Act (MHRA). The court noted that although the supervisors allegedly changed the management structure of the sheriff's office without approval of county board, nothing about this change in management structure supported the inference that subsequent action taken by a new management team were based on gender. The court found that the administrator failed to establish that similarly situated male employees were not punished as severely for their misconduct as she was, and that this differential treatment constituted a submissible case of discrimination based on sex under Title VII or the Minnesota Human Rights Act (MHRA). The court noted that the administrator's alleged misconduct in recently lying to a supervisor about leaving a voicemail on his telephone when she was going to be absent from work was not similar to the acts of misconduct that she cited in support of her sex discrimination claim, one of which involved a supervisor allegedly lying on his application to become a licensed police officer some 25 years earlier, and the others of which involved alleged off-duty misconduct or misconduct that was not shown to have been reported to supervisors.

The court held that the administrator failed to show that her alleged harassment by her supervisors was based on sex, as required to establish her claim of hostile work environment under Title VII and the Minnesota Human Rights Act (MHRA). According to the court, although the administrator claimed that supervisors created a hostile work environment by, among other things, constantly criticizing her, requiring her to report to the under-sheriff, and yelling at her on several occasions, she did not produce any evidence that she was the target of harassment because of her sex and that the offensive behavior was not merely non-actionable, vulgar behavior.

The court held that the record did not support a reasonable inference that the administrator's supervisors retaliated against her, in violation of Title VII and the Minnesota Human Rights Act (MHRA), for filing a claim with the state human rights department. The court noted that the administrator's conduct in filing a claim was protected, but the administrator was accused of insubordination before she notified her employer of her protected activity. (Koochiching County Jail, Minnesota)

U.S. Appeals Court
DISCIPLINE
FREE SPEECH
RETALIATION

Houskins v. Sheahan, 549 F.3d 480 (7th Cir. 2008). A social worker employed by a county corrections department brought a § 1983 First Amendment action against a sheriff, alleging that she had been disciplined in retaliation for reporting an assault by a corrections officer. The district court entered judgment on a jury verdict for the social worker, denied the sheriff's renewed motion for judgment as a matter of law, and denied the officer's motion to throw out the jury verdict. The sheriff and officer appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part and reversed in part. The court held that the social worker's internal complaint to the department's internal affairs division, alleging that she had been assaulted by a corrections officer in a parking lot, was speech made pursuant to the social worker's official duties, not speech made as a citizen. According to the court, the report fulfilled the social worker's responsibility as a department employee to report incidents of misconduct immediately to her supervisor. The court found that a police report filed by the social worker, alleging that she had been assaulted by a corrections officer in a parking lot, was not speech addressing matters of public concern, as required to support the social worker's § 1983 First Amendment retaliation claim against the sheriff. According to the court, the police report amounted to a personal grievance against the officer, and statements in the report were tied to a personal dispute and were not intended to bring to light any wrongdoing by the sheriff. The court noted that its finding that the county employee's speech about an alleged assault by a fellow employee was not protected, and that she had suffered no First Amendment injury from the alleged retaliation that followed the speech, precluded recovery on the employee's § 1983 Monell claim against the county and the sheriff. The court held that the district court did not abuse its discretion by a denying motion to sever the accompanying state-law assault and battery claim against the fellow employee, and instead giving limiting instructions. The court also found that the district court did not abuse its discretion by denying a motion reduce the $50,000 punitive damages award in the civil assault and battery action, even though the jury may have been confused as to how to assess damages given the fact that the plaintiff had asked the jury for $5,000 in damages. The altercation occurred in a staff parking lot after a dispute about parking spaces. (Cook County Department of Corrections, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
PROMOTION
RACIAL DISCRIMINATION

Jo v. District of Columbia, 582 F.Supp.2d 51 (D.D.C. 2008). A lieutenant with the District of Columbia Department of Corrections commenced a § 1983 action against the District, three District employees, and others, alleging that he was denied a promotion to the rank of captain because of his South Korean descent. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion, finding that the District demonstrated a legitimate, nondiscriminatory reason for its decision not to promote the lieutenant and that the decision was not pretextual. The court also found that the lieutenant failed to demonstrate the existence of any policy. The court noted that the use of the lieutenant's picture on a recruitment poster that contained the phrase "Professional Dedicated to Duty" did not give rise to an inference of discrimination, on account of the lieutenant's South Korean descent. According to the court, there was no evidence that the persons selected for depiction in the poster were the most qualified lieutenants in the Department, and other individuals depicted in the poster were not even supervisory employees. (D.C. Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
PROMOTION RETALIATION
UNION

Justice v. Danberg, 571 F.Supp.2d 602 (D.Del. 2008). An employee of the Delaware Department of Corrections (DOC) brought an action pursuant to § 1983 against the DOC and its commissioner and director of human resources, alleging a denial of promotion in retaliation for his involvement in union activities, in violation of the First Amendment. The district court held that the employee was acting as a citizen when participating in union activities, the employee's participation in union negotiations was of considerable concern to the community, and the employee's interest in participating in union negotiations outweighed the DOC's interest in the efficiency of its public service operations. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by fact issues as to whether the employee's participation in union activities was the substantial motivating factor in the DOC's failure to promote him and as to whether the employee's union activity was a motivating factor in the loss of his application for promotion. (Delaware Department of Correction, Morris Community Correctional Center)

U.S. District Court
CONTRACT
DISCRIMINATION
RETALIATION
TERMINATION

Marcelus v. Corrections Corp. of America/Correctional Treatment Facility, 540 F.Supp.2d 231(D.D.C. 2008). A former employee of a private correctional facility brought an action against a former employer alleging discrimination, retaliation and breach of contract in connection with his termination. The former employee claimed that he was fired in retaliation for complaining about discrimination and filing incident reports against co-workers and supervisors. The former employer filed a motion to dismiss the claims for retaliation and breach of contract, which the district court granted. The court held that the former employee's retaliation claim was not like or reasonably related to the allegations in his Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC) charge, and thus the claim was barred for failure to exhaust administrative remedies. The court also declined to excuse the former employee's failure to exhaust a grievance procedure under the collective bargaining agreement (CBA), prior to bringing a breach-of-contract claim, even though the former employee was allegedly unaware that he had further recourse because he was never provided with an employee handbook or a copy of the CBA. (Correctional Corporation of America/Correctional Treatment Facility)

U.S. Appeals Court
HOSTILE WORK
ENVIRONMENT
RACIAL DISCRIMINATION
RETALIATION
TITLE VII

McCann v. Tillman, 526 F.3d 1370 (11th Cir. 2008). An employee, a correctional officer, brought suit against an employer alleging she was subject to race discrimination and retaliation under § 1981 and § 1983, with respect to matters of employment discipline, compensation, a lowering of service rating, failure to promote, and failure to reassign or transfer. The employee also alleged that she was subject to a hostile work environment. The district court granted the employer's motion for summary judgment on all claims. The officer appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the employee was not similarly situated to white employees who were allegedly treated more favorably, as required for a race discrimination claim under Title VII. Neither of the employee's comparators committed similar or more serious offenses as those committed by the employee, including violating a uniform directive, or abusing the indicia or privileges of their office. The court found that the employer's policy that employees who were suspended could not recover for their unpaid leave by working overtime upon their return to work was a legitimate, nondiscriminatory reason under Title VII for restricting the employee from working overtime. According to the court, the employer's reasons for giving the employee an unsatisfactory service rating were not a pretext for unlawful retaliation under Title VII. The employer cited the employee's chronic tardiness, her manner of requesting leave by calling in, and her suspension. The court also held that the alleged instances of racially derogatory language, extending over a period of more than two years, were too sporadic and isolated to establish that the employer's conduct was so objectively severe or pervasive as to constitute a hostile work environment under Title VII. (Mobile County Jail, Alabama)

U.S. District Court
AGE DISCRIMINATION
EQUAL PROTECTION
PHYSICAL REQUIREMENTS

Petzak v. Nevada ex rel. Department of Corrections, 579 F.Supp.2d 1330 (D.Nev. 2008). A 74-year-old correctional officer brought a § 1983 action against his supervisor, alleging that statutory stress electrocardiogram (EKG) testing for officers over the age of 40 violated equal protection. The district court granted summary judgment for the supervisor in part and denied in part. The court held that the differential treatment of correctional officers violated equal protection, but the supervisor was entitled to qualified immunity from damages. According to the court, the differential treatment of correctional officers over and under the age of forty, under Nevada's statutory electrocardiogram (EKG) testing requirements, was not rationally related to a legitimate government interest, and thus, violated equal protection. The court noted that while the state had an interest in requiring injured employees to submit to physicals and to be physically fit for duty, there was no evidence why officers had to undergo a stress EKG test only after reaching 40 years of age. (Nevada Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
ASSOCIATION
DUE PROCESS

Poirier v. Massachusetts Dept. of Correction, 532 F.Supp.2d 275 (D.Mass. 2008). A former prison guard sued the Massachusetts Department of Corrections (DOC) and its commissioner under § 1983, claiming that a regulation prohibiting her from associating with present or former inmates violated her First Amendment associational rights and her Fourteenth Amendment due process rights. The defendants moved to dismiss and the district court granted the motion. The court held that there was a legitimate reason for imposing the regulation, precluding a Constitutional challenge, and that the commissioner had qualified immunity. According to the court, the right of a female prison guard to have an intimate association with a former inmate was not a "fundamental" right which could not be interfered with for other than a compelling state interest, but was rather a right that could be impeded when there was a rational and legitimate reason for doing so. The court noted that one reason for the regulation was that guards could be used as a possible conduit for unsanctioned contact between former and present inmates. (Massachusetts Department of Correction)

U.S. District Court
FREE SPEECH
RETALIATION
TERMINATION

Redd v. Dougherty, 578 F.Supp.2d 1042 (N.D.Ill. 2008). A correctional officer who was discharged from the Cook County Department of Corrections (DOC) for "failing to cooperate in an ongoing criminal investigation" and for "providing the State's Attorney with false statements in said investigation," filed an action against a Chicago police detective, Assistant State's Attorney (ASA), the county's personnel director, the sheriff, unknown and unnamed county employees, the City of Chicago, and the County, raising claims under § 1983 for alleged deprivations of her constitutional rights and related claims. The court held that the officer who claimed she was discharged in retaliation for protected speech adequately alleged she was speaking in her capacity as a private citizen, where she alleged she witnessed an altercation outside a private residence, gave a statement to the police about what she saw, and was thereafter pressured by the police to change her statement. (Cook County Department of Corrections, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
ADA-Americans with Disabilities Act
BFOQ-Bona Fide
Occupational Requirement
RETALIATION
TERMINATION

Shepherd v. City of New York, 577 F.Supp.2d 669 (S.D.N.Y. 2008). A New York City Department of Correction (DOC) employee, a correction officer, brought a pro se action against the DOC and the City of New York, alleging they discriminated and retaliated against her in violation of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA). The district court granted summary judgment for the DOC and the city. The court held that the employee failed to establish a prima facie case of discrimination, as she did not meet the burden of proving she could perform the essential functions of her position as Captain with or without reasonable accommodation. The court found that the employee failed to state a claim for discriminatory termination. The court noted that the tasks of a Captain's position required an individual to be "focused, attentive, alert, and vigilant," all of which were attributes that were either impaired or lacking as the result of her depression and/or medication she was taking in order to treat that condition. The court also noted that her attendance record evinced her inability to report to work, and her inability to perform the essential functions required of a Captain also implicated safety concerns. (New York City Department of Corrections, New York)

U.S. District Court
ADA-Americans with Disabilities Act
BFOQ-Bona Fide Occupational Requirements
DISCRIMINATION
QUALIFICATIONS
RA- Rehabilitation Act

Taylor v. Hampton Roads Regional Jail Authority, 550 F.Supp.2d 614 (E.D.Va. 2008). An applicant who was rejected for a position as a corrections officer sued an employer, claiming it discriminated against her on the basis of her disability when it did not hire her, and seeking monetary and injunctive relief pursuant to the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) of 1990 and the Rehabilitation Act. The district court denied the employer's motion for summary judgment. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the one-handed applicant was disabled, whether she could perform each essential function of the position, whether the proposed accommodations were unreasonable, whether she would pose a direct threat to herself or her fellow employees, and whether her disability was a motivating factor in the decision not to hire. (Hampton Roads Regional Jail Authority, Virginia)

U.S. Appeals Court
FREE SPEECH
RETALIATION
TERMINATION

Trigillo v. Snyder, 547 F.3d 826 (7th Cir. 2008). A former employee brought a § 1983 action against a Department of Corrections (DOC), alleging that she was fired in retaliation for filing reports of misconduct. The DOC moved for summary judgment and the district court granted the motion. The employee appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the filing of reports was not protected speech, and the termination was not retaliatory. The court noted that the employee, who was responsible for advising DOC officials about legal and regulatory issues regarding procurement, did not speak as a citizen and thus her speech was not protected by the First Amendment when, pursuant to her official duties, she filed a report with the Illinois Attorney General and the director of Department of Central Management Services (CMS) which flagged potential misconduct within DOC. According to the court, the filing of such a report was a means to fulfill the employee's employment obligations. The court held that termination of the employee was not in retaliation for her alleged action in reporting to the FBI that a contract approved before she became employed by the DOC may have been issued because someone rigged the bidding process, absent competent evidence that the decision-maker who did not renew the employee's term of employment knew or thought that the employee was the person who had called the FBI. (Illinois Department of Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
PROSECUTION

U.S. v. Moore, 525 F.3d 1033 (11th Cir. 2008). Two male correctional officers at a federal correctional institution were charged with a variety of misconduct arising from their inappropriate sexual contact with female inmates and their distribution of contraband to inmates. Both defendants were found guilty of conspiracy to accept an illegal gratuity. One was also found guilty of witness tampering and the other of bribery. The district court sentenced the defendants to twelve months of incarceration, followed by a three-year term of supervised release, and ordered them to pay a fine. The defendants appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that there was sufficient evidence that the officers' conduct constituted an "official act" to support their conviction for conspiracy to accept an illegal gratuity. According to the appeals court, the district court did not commit a plain error by instructing the jury that sex was a "thing of value" under the bribery statute. The court also held that there was sufficient evidence to uphold the officer's witness tampering conviction. The court noted that the government offered evidence of five instances which satisfied the official act requirement, where officers switched unit assignments, one officer permitted an inmate to telephone another officer to request contraband, one officer telephoned another officer on an inmate's behalf, one officer permitted an inmate to leave her unit to meet with another officer, and one officer gave another officer the key to staff offices to meet with an inmate in the middle of the night. The district court had instructed the jury that "contraband" was defined as "anything whatsoever not approved by the warden", despite the defendant's claim that a broad federal regulatory definition of "contraband" should have been used. (Federal Correctional Institute in Tallahassee, Florida)

U.S. District Court CONTRACT
DISCIPLINE
TERMINATION

Washington v. District of Columbia, 538 F.Supp.2d 269 (D.D.C. 2008). Former employees brought a civil rights action against the District of Columbia Department of Corrections (DOC) and its director alleging violation of their due process rights, defamation, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The district court granted the DOC's motion to dismiss. The court held that the employees had to exhaust their grievance arbitration according to the terms of the collective bargaining agreement (CBA), or through review by the Office of Employee Appeals (OEA) according to the terms of the Comprehensive Merit Protection Act (CMPA), before bringing suit. The court found that the allegedly defamatory statements made by the director of the DOC regarding the culpability of former employees for a jail escape sufficiently related to a "personnel" issue to require administrative exhaustion under the employee grievance provisions of the CMPA. Two employees had been terminated in response to the escape of two prisoners. The court opened its opinion by stating "This case concerns a prison break, mass personnel terminations, mass personnel reinstatements and the various efforts undertaken by the defendant (the District of Columbia) and the plaintiffs (D.C. Jail security officers) to enlist this court in a tug-of-war over the right of the D.C. Department of Corrections ("DOC") to subject its employees to a second round of disciplinary review and firings after an administrative appeals board found the preliminary round deficient." Two days after two inmates escaped, the DOC Director issued written notification to twelve D.C. Jail employees, including the plaintiffs, placing them on paid administrative leave pending further investigation of the escape. At a press briefing the Director announced the summary firings of the plaintiffs for dereliction of duty. (District of Columbia Jail)

2009

U.S. Appeals Court
DUE PROCESS
PROPERTY INTEREST

Akande v. Grounds, 555 F.3d 586 (7th Cir. 2009). A former employee of a state corrections agency brought an action against the agency and agency officials, alleging that they deprived him of a property interest in his employment in violation of the due process clause. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants and the employee appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the employee of the Illinois Department of Corrections was not deprived of a due process property interest in his employment by a supervisor's decision to alter the employee's job duties. The court noted that the employee remained at the same position and received the same salary, and that the Illinois Personnel Code defined the employee's protected property right as the right not to be removed, discharged, demoted, or suspended for more than 30 days without cause, but none of those events occurred. (Illinois Department of Corrections, Robinson Correctional Center)

U.S. District Court
INVESTIGATION
TERMINATION

Boyd v. Nichols, 616 F.Supp.2d 1331 (M.D.Ga. 2009). A female, who had been housed in a jail for violation of her probation, brought an action against a former jailer, county, and former sheriff, under § 1983 and state law, relating to the sexual assault of the inmate by the jailer. The county and sheriff moved for summary judgment and the district court granted the motions. The court held that the sheriff was not “deliberately indifferent” to a substantial risk of serious harm to the inmate under the Eighth Amendment or the Georgia constitution in failing to protect the inmate from sexual assaults by a jailer, absent evidence that the sheriff had knowledge or indication that the jailer was a threat or danger to inmates, or that male guards, if left alone with female inmates, posed a risk to the inmates' health and safety. The court noted that the sheriff's actions in calling for an investigation and terminating the jailer's employment upon learning of the jailer's actions was not an “indifferent and objectively unreasonable response” to the inmate's claims, and thus, there was no violation of the inmate's rights. The court found that the sheriff's failure to train deputies and jailers in proper procedures for escorting and handling female inmates did not support supervisory liability on the § 1983 claim of the inmate, where the sheriff had no knowledge of any prior sexual assaults at the jail or any problems with jailers improperly escorting and handling female inmates, and the jailer who committed the assault had been trained previously on how to interact with inmates and knew it was improper to have intimate contact with inmates. During the time period in question, the county did not have a policy prohibiting a male jailer from escorting a female inmate within the Jail. The court held that the county and sheriff had sovereign immunity from the state law claims of the inmate, absent evidence that such immunity had been waived by an act of the General Assembly. (Berrien County Jail, Georgia)

U.S. District Court
HARASSMENT
SEXUAL HARASSMENT
SUPERVISION
TITLE VII

Brown v. Corr. Corp. of Am., 603 F.Supp.2d 73 (D.D.C. 2009). A former female correctional officer sued the District of Columbia, a private corrections contractor, and the director of the Department of Corrections (DOC) in his official capacity, asserting claims under Title VII and § 1983 alleging that her supervisor sexually harassed and raped her. The district court dismissed the case in part and denied dismissal in part. The court found that the Title VII claim and the § 1983 claim against the director were redundant of the claims against the District. The court held that the former female correctional officer's allegations were sufficient for a municipal liability claim under § 1983 against the District of Columbia, including allegations that the District adopted a custom of permitting sexual harassment to occur in correctional facilities by failing to take corrective action in response to her numerous sexual harassment complaints against the supervisor. The officer also alleged that the District allowed the supervisor to continue his incessant and relentless harassment and that ultimately the District's inaction led to her sexual assault by her harasser. The officer alleged that the District knew the sexual assault occurred at the correctional facility because sexual harassment was a standard operating procedure at the facility. The officer asserted that she suffered harm due to the District's willful blindness and failure to implement and effectuate appropriate policies to remedy and/or prevent sexual harassment and rape.

The court held that the issue of whether the District of Columbia and the private prison contractor were the correctional officer's joint employers, as required for the officer's Title VII claim against District, could not be resolved by a motion to dismiss. According to the court, there was a factual dispute as to whether the District possessed sufficient control over the contractor's employees to be considered a joint employer of officer. (District of Columbia, Corrections Corporation of America Correctional Treatment Facility)

U.S. Appeals Court
FREE SPEECH
RETALIATION

Cabral v. U.S. Dept. of Justice, 587 F.3d 13 (1st Cir. 2009). A nurse practitioner working as a contractor in a county house of correction brought an action against a county sheriff claiming that she was barred from entering the house of correction, in violation of her free speech rights, for informing the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) of alleged prisoner abuse. The county sheriff brought an Administrative Procedure Act (APA) proceeding against the United States Department of Justice, seeking discovery of relevant documents. The district court denied the requested discovery and the sheriff appealed. A jury found in favor of the contractor in the underlying free speech case and the district court denied the defendants' motions for a new trial. The appeals from the two judgments were consolidated. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the sheriff's request for information concerning a meeting between the nurse and the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) would directly and adversely impact the FBI investigations into prisoner abuse in the house of correction and violate the Privacy Act, so as to warrant denial of such requests. The court held that evidence was sufficient to support the jury's determination that the county sheriff barred the nurse practitioner from a county house of correction with a conscious indifference to her free speech rights, as was necessary to support an award of punitive damages in the nurse's § 1983 action. The court found that the award of $250,000 in punitive damages to the nurse was not excessive, where the sheriff's conduct was reprehensible and the award could have been greater. (Suffolk County House of Correction, Massachusetts)

U.S. District Court
EQUAL PROTECTION
HOSTILE WORK
ENVIRONMENT OVERTIME
TITLE VII

Cantu v. Michigan Dept. of Corrections, 653 F.Supp.2d 726 (E.D.Mich. 2009). An employee, a Michigan Department of Corrections (MDOC) officer who was of Caucasian and Hispanic descent, brought an action against MDOC, a correctional facility, a facility warden, and several other corrections officers, alleging violations of Title VII, Michigan law and § 1983, as well as claims of conspiracy and gross negligence. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to: (1) whether the alleged hostile work environment and disparate treatment of the MDOC employee of Caucasian and Hispanic descent were attributable to his race and national origin; (2) whether the Department promptly investigated complaints of the employee regarding his alleged harassment by African-American co-workers, and as to whether an appropriate action was taken in response to any investigation conducted; and (3) whether the employee experienced an adverse action when he was unable to receive anticipated overtime as the result of administrative leave, which was allegedly precipitated by the employer's actions. The court held that the prison warden was not entitled to qualified immunity from the § 1983 equal protection claim brought against the employee, where the employee's factual allegations in support of his equal protection claims against the warden regarding his treatment subsequent to his assault by an African-American co-worker, the employee's stress leave, and the warden's possible failure to respond to the employee's complaints of continued harassment stated violations of well-established rights at the time of those events. (Ryan Correctional Facility, Michigan)

U.S. Appeals Court TERMINATION UNION	Civil Service Employees Ass'n, Local 1000, AFSCME v. N.L.R.B., 569 F.3d 88 (2nd Cir. 2009). A union representing correctional officers at a county correctional facility petitioned for review of a National Labor Relations Board (NLRB) decision that upheld an employer's termination of non-union employees for having picketed a health clinic. The appeals court granted the petition and vacated the NLRB decision. The appeals court held that the peaceful picketing of the health clinic by county correctional facility employees, in their individual capacity, for the purpose of collective bargaining but without the requisite notice from a union under the NLRA, did not deprive the employees of their status as employees protected by the NLRA or constitute unprotected conduct, as would have exposed the employees to discharge. The employees sought to organize and represent the employees of a health clinic that was operated by Correctional Medical Services, Inc. (CMS). The union had requested that CMS recognize it as the collective-bargaining representative of all clinic employees except physicians, supervisors and one clerical worker, but CMS rejected the request. (Albany County Correctional Facility, New York)
U.S. Appeals Court ADEA-Age Discrimination In Employment Act POLITICAL AFFILIATION RETALIATION TERMINATION TRANSFER	Cox v. DeSoto County, Miss., 564 F.3d 745 (5th Cir. 2009). A county employee brought an action against her county employer, alleging that as result of her age, in violation of the Age Discrimination in Employment Act (ADEA), and in retaliation for her refusal to campaign actively for reelection of the county sheriff, in violation of the First Amendment, she was reassigned to the jail and later terminated. The district court granted summary judgment as to the termination claims, and entered judgment, upon jury verdict, in favor of the employer on the First Amendment claim, and in favor of employee on the age discrimination claim in connection with her reassignment. The employee appealed the grant of summary judgment. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The court held that the decision of the Mississippi Employment Security Commission (MESC), that the employee was not eligible for unemployment compensation benefits because she was discharged for work-related misconduct, did not collaterally prohibit the employee from claiming that she was terminated in retaliation for bringing an ADEA wrongful transfer claim, given the detailed administrative remedy provided by ADEA for such claims. (DeSoto County Sheriff, Mississippi)
U.S. District Court FREE SPEECH RETALIATION STAFFING LEVELS TERMINATION	Deweese v. Haste, 620 F.Supp.2d 625 (M.D.Pa. 2009). A former deputy warden brought an action against a county, a county prison warden, a county commissioner, and members of the county's prison salary board, alleging that his position was eliminated in retaliation for his exercise of his First Amendment rights. The defendants moved for summary judgment and the district court granted the motion. The court held that the speech activities of the deputy warden, who provided information to the county district attorney regarding the prison's food services contract and reported misappropriation of inmate funds to a county commissioner, were conducted pursuant to his employment with the prison, precluding his First Amendment retaliation claims. The court noted that the employee handbook required the deputy warden to report any corrupt or unethical behavior or violations of rules or law. According to the court, the county prison board's proffered legitimate, non-retaliatory reason for eliminating the deputy warden's position--that the county was seeking to cut employment-related expenses and the position had been deemed expendable--was insufficient to show that the budget cuts were not for cause. The court held that the county commissioner was entitled to legislative immunity on the former deputy warden's First Amendment retaliation claim where the commissioner's actions of recommending and voting for elimination of the deputy warden's position, as part of an effort to reduce the county's budget, was squarely within the sphere of his legislative work. (Dauphin County Prison, Pennsylvania)
U.S. District Court DUE PROCESS EQUAL PROTECTION TRAINING	Edwards v. Washington, 661 F.Supp.2d 13 (D.D.C. 2009). A trainee at the District of Columbia Department of Corrections brought a pro se action against the Department's director, alleging due process and equal protection claims arising from personal injuries she sustained during an employment qualification training exercise. The district court dismissed the action. The court held that the trainee waived her right to bring any claims in negligence against the Department by voluntarily signing a liability release form. The court noted that the prospective liability release form was unambiguous and clear in releasing the Department from liability. (District of Columbia Department of Corrections ("DCDC")).
U.S. Appeals Court FREE SPEECH HARASSMENT RETALIATION	Fairley v. Andrews, 578 F.3d 518 (7th Cir. 2009). Former guards at a county jail brought a § 1983 action against various jail officials and others, alleging conspiracy to cover up inmate abuse and violation of their First Amendment rights. Following a grant of summary judgment in favor of certain defendants, the district court entered summary judgment in favor of the remaining defendants. The guards appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The court held that the guards' reports about alleged inmate abuse at the jail perpetrated by other guards was not protected speech under the First Amendment, and thus, could not be the basis of a First Amendment retaliation claim. The court noted that a county jail policy required guards to report misconduct by their colleagues, and even if an unwritten policy prohibited such reports of misconduct, it did not offend the 1st Amendment. The court found that the coworkers who allegedly bullied and made threats against the guards in order to deter the guards from testifying in favor of an inmate violated the guards' free speech rights under the First Amendment, and the guards could recover under § 1983 for such a violation. (Cook County Jail, Illinois)
U.S. Appeals Court ADA- Americans with Disabilities Act PHYSICAL REQUIREMENTS TRAINING	Hennagir v. Utah Dept. of Corrections, 587 F.3d 1255 (10th Cir. 2009). An employee who was part of the medical staff for a state department of corrections (DOC), brought an action against her DOC employer, alleging disability discrimination and retaliation in violation of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), in connection with the DOC's refusal to allow the employee to continue in her position without completing the required physical safety training. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the employer. The employee appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that completion of the required physical safety training was an "essential job function" for the employee, and that allowing the employee to continue with her identical job duties, by eliminating the essential job function of completion of the required physical safety training, was not a "reasonable accommodation." The court held that completion of the required physical safety training was an "essential job function" for the employee within the meaning of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA). The court noted that the DOC required all personnel who had contact with inmates to complete the training, the employee had regular contact with inmates as part of her job, and although the employee claimed that she never had to use the safety training techniques during her eight years of employment at the prison, the potential consequences of an inmate attack against any staff were incredibly severe. (Utah Dept. of Corrections, Central Utah Corr'l Facility)

U.S. District Court
EQUAL PROTECTION
RELIGION
RETALIATION

McCullum v. California, 610 F.Supp.2d 1053 (N.D.Cal. 2009). A volunteer Wiccan chaplain for inmates incarcerated by the California Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation (CDCR) filed suit alleging disparate treatment from volunteers of other faiths and retaliation for his complaints about the CDCR's treatment of Wiccans. The district court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment. The court held that equal protection was not denied to the volunteer Wiccan chaplain who alleged he was not being permitted to see inmates at times and in locations when and where other chaplains were permitted, and that being denied access to chapel time for religious instruction and benefits extended to other administrative volunteer chaplains including access to telephone and computer, and being subjected to more rigorous security scrutiny. According to the court, there was no evidence that other voluntary clergy did not encounter the same difficulties or as to inmates that were denied access to his services. The court found that the CDCR did not retaliate against the volunteer Wiccan chaplain for protected speech complaining against the mistreatment of Wiccans by "denigrating" him while addressing a group of Protestant chaplains or by refusing to hire him as community partnership manager at a women's facility and a state prison. The court noted that the claimed denigration, even if true, did not result in the loss of a valuable government benefit, and that the decision not to hire him was based on the superior qualifications of those ultimately hired rather than on his religion. (California Corrections Institution)

U.S. Appeals Court
ASSOCIATION
DUE PROCESS
TERMINATION

Poirier v. Massachusetts Dept. of Correction, 558 F.3d 92 (1st Cir. 2009). A discharged prison guard sued the Massachusetts Department of Corrections (DOC) and its commissioner under § 1983, claiming that a regulation prohibiting her from associating with present or former inmates violated her First Amendment associational rights and her Fourteenth Amendment due process rights. The district court dismissed the case and the prison guard appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the First Amendment associational and Fourteenth Amendment due process rights of the prison guard were not violated when she was discharged for violating a DOC regulation prohibiting non-approved association with a former inmate. The court found that the DOC's legitimate interest in preserving prison security was reasonably advanced by prohibiting a guard-former prisoner relationship, and that the DOC's interest outweighed the degree of intrusion into the guard's private life imposed by the regulation. The court held that the Massachusetts Department of Corrections (DOC) was entitled to sovereign immunity, and that the Commissioner of the DOC had qualified immunity from liability in the § 1983 claim because it was not clearly established that enforcement of the regulation would be an unlawful act. (Massachusetts Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
FREE SPEECH
RETALIATION
TERMINATION

Shumpert v. Johnson, 621 F.Supp.2d 387 (N.D.Miss. 2009). A sheriff's department employee who had been terminated brought a suit against a county sheriff alleging that she was terminated for discussing an alleged jail assault with an attorney in violation of her First Amendment rights. The district court entered judgment on a jury verdict for the employee, awarding $34,000 to the employee. The defendant moved for judgment as a matter of law or, alternatively, a motion for a new trial. The district court denied the motion. The court held that the sheriff was aware that the employee had a discussion with an attorney about an assault and terminated the employee due to the conversation, as required for the employee's First Amendment retaliation claim. According to the court, there was a plausible inference that the sheriff had a motive to terminate the employee based on her conversation with the attorney, as required for the employee's First Amendment retaliation claim. The court found that the sheriff did not provide a legitimate explanation for terminating the employee, as required for the employee's First Amendment retaliation claim. (Lee County Jail, Mississippi)

U.S. Appeals Court
FMLA-Family Medical Leave Act
RETALIATION
TERMINATION

Simpson v. Office of Chief Judge of Circuit Court of Will County, 559 F.3d 706 (7th Cir. 2009). A former employee sued an employer alleging that the employer denied her request for a leave of absence and later terminated her employment in violation of the Family and Medical Leave Act (FMLA). The district court granted the employer's motion for summary judgment. The employee appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the employee's poor work performance constituted a legitimate, non-pretextual reason for her termination. The court found that there was no evidence that the employee was similarly situated to an employee who was treated more favorably and who did not take FMLA leave, for the purposes of her retaliation claim. (Will County, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
ADEA-Age Discrimination
In Employment Act
DISCRIMINATION
HARASSMENT
UNION

Slater v. Susquehanna County, 613 F.Supp.2d 653 (M.D.Pa. 2009). A former prison employee brought action against her employer, employee union, union representative, city, and others, alleging violations of § 1983, the federal civil conspiracy statute, the Age Discrimination in Employment Act (ADEA), Title VII, and state law. The union and its representative moved for dismissal or for summary judgment. The plaintiff alleged that she and other female correctional officers over the age of fifty have been harassed by supervisors and other officers, including a group of co-workers called the "Secret Sisters," who were aided and abetted by prison wardens and a union official. The court granted the union's motion for summary judgment, finding that the union and its representative were not acting under the color of state law, for purposes of a § 1983 claim. According to the court, the Age Discrimination in Employment Act (ADEA) does not provide for individual liability. The court found that the union representative could not be held liable for age and gender discrimination against a prison employee under the Pennsylvania Human Relations Act. The court held that the employee's allegations that she was harassed by supervisors and co-workers during the course of her employment, that the employee union collectively allowed the harassment to continue and indeed encouraged the treatment, and that the union believed the employee passed information regarding a prisoner's death to the deceased's attorney and, in response, began manufacturing reasons to discipline and ultimately terminate her, did not give rise to an intentional infliction of emotional distress claim under Pennsylvania law. (Susquehanna County Correctional Facility, Pennsylvania)

U.S. District Court
FREE SPEECH
RETALIATION
SEXUAL HARASSMENT
TITLE VII

Smith-Thompson v. District of Columbia, 657 F.Supp.2d 123 (D.D.C. 2009). A female correctional officer stationed at a District of Columbia jail brought an action in District of Columbia court alleging that officials permitted her to be sexually harassed by a fellow officer and retaliated against her in violation of Title VII. The officer alleged that the District was liable for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court held that the officer sufficiently pleaded a prima facie case of retaliation under Title VII, even though she failed to specify in her complaint the precise dates of her involvement in the protected activity of lodging a complaint with the Office of the Special Inspector, her assistance in the Special Inspector's investigation, and her contact with the Office of Human Rights (DCOHR). According to the court, the officer's allegations suggested that the District of Columbia Department of Corrections placed her on unpaid leave shortly after she engaged in the protected activity. (District of Columbia Jail)

U.S. Appeals Court
HOSTILE WORK
ENVIRONMENT
SEXUAL HARASSMENT

Sutherland v. Missouri Dept. of Corrections, 580 F.3d 748 (8TH Cir. 2009). A state corrections employee sued her employer for sexual harassment and retaliation in violation of Title VII. The district court granted the Department summary judgment and the employee appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the employee's harassment was not sufficiently severe or pervasive for a hostile work environment claim, and the employee was not subjected to materially adverse retaliatory actions. The court noted that the employee alleged only one incident of a co-worker's offensive touching, but other harassment did not involve the co-worker or physical contact. (Missouri Department of Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
DISCIPLINE
RACIAL DISCRIMINATION
SEX DISCRIMINATION
TERMINATION

Wimbley v. Cashion, 588 F.3d 959, (8th Cir. 2009). An African-American female correctional officer brought a § 1983 claim against a warden, alleging race and sex discrimination. The district court denied the warden's motion for summary judgment on the grounds of qualified immunity. The warden appealed and the appeals court affirmed. The court held that a White male correctional officer who was not terminated for discharging pepper spray at an inmate was similarly situated to the African-American female correctional officer who was terminated after she discharged pepper spray, supporting the female officer's prima facie § 1983 race and sex discrimination claims against the warden. The court noted that both officers were involved in similar pepper-spray conduct, but were disciplined differently. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the warden's proffered reason for terminating the female corrections officer, that she did so in violation of department of corrections policy to intimidate inmates, was a pretext for race and sex discrimination. (Arkansas Department of Correction, Delta Regional Unit)

2010

U.S. District Court
ASSIGNMENT
BFOQ- Bona Fide
Occupational Qualification
TITLE VII
TERMINATION
SEX DISCRIMINATION

Ambat v. City and County of San Francisco, 693 F.Supp.2d 1130 (N.D.Cal. 2010). Sheriff's deputies brought an action against a city and county, alleging various claims including retaliation, and that a gender based staffing policy violated Title VII and California's Fair Employment and Housing Act (FEHA). Cross-motions for summary judgment were filed. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants in part, and denied in part. The court held that the sheriff's department policy that only female deputies would be assigned to female-only housing units was implemented to protect the interests that amount to the essence of the Sheriff's business, including safety and privacy, as required to establish a bona fide occupational qualification as a defense to the deputies' claims of employment discrimination under Title VII and California's Fair Employment and Housing Act (FEHA). The court noted that the policy was implemented to prevent sexual misconduct and inappropriate relationships between male deputies and female inmates, to alleviate male deputies' fears of false accusations of misconduct resulting in a reluctance to supervise female inmates closely, which created opportunities for smuggling and use of contraband, and to prevent female inmates from being required to dress and undress in front of male deputies. The court found that the sheriff was entitled to deference in his policy judgment to implement the department policy that only female deputies would be assigned to female-only housing units and in determining whether the policy was reasonably necessary to achieve issues of safety and privacy and to ensure normal operation of the jails, as required to establish a bona fide occupational qualification as a defense to the deputies' claims of employment discrimination under Title VII and California's Fair Employment and Housing Act (FEHA). The court noted that, despite not conducting formal studies or seeking consultation, the policy was based upon the sheriff's experience and observations over thirty years as sheriff and conversations with senior officials and jail commanders over several months. The court noted that suggested non-discriminatory alternatives to the sheriff's department policy, including cameras and additional training, were not feasible alternatives that furthered the objectives of safety, security and privacy. Installation of cameras in the units was cost-prohibitive and did not address privacy concerns or the fact that misconduct took place outside of the units, additional training would not eliminate sexual abuse since deputies already knew it was forbidden, and there was no effective testing or screening method to identify deputies who might engage in sexual misconduct. The court found that the fact that the deputy made statements to the National Academy of Arbitrators, alleging that the sheriff was influenced by financial contributions and nepotism and that the sheriff's general counsel had engaged in sex tourism was a legitimate, non-retaliatory reason to terminate the deputy under Title VII and the California Fair Employment and Housing Act. (San Francisco Sheriff's Department, California)

U.S. Appeals Court
HOSTILE WORK
ENVIRONMENT
SEXUAL HARASSMENT
TITLE VII

Beckford v. Department of Corrections, 605 F.3d 951 (11th Cir. 2010). Female employees at a state correctional institution filed a state court action under Title VII alleging that the state Department of corrections failed to remedy a sexually hostile work environment created by male inmates. After removal to federal court, the district court entered judgment in the employees' favor, and the department appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the department of corrections was not entitled to a blanket exemption from liability under Title VII arising from its failure to remedy a sexually hostile work environment created by male inmates whenever female employees were present, even if its employees did not participate in or encourage the harassment. According to the court, the exhibitionist masturbation and gender-specific verbal harassment by male inmates in the state correctional institution in the presence of female employees was sex-based and highly offensive conduct that could be used to establish a Title VII claim against the department of corrections for failing to remedy a sexually hostile work environment. (Florida Department of Corrections, Martin Correctional Institution)

U.S. District Court
FMLA- Family Medical Leave Act
PROMOTION
RETALIATION

Bosse v. Baltimore County, 692 F.Supp.2d 574 (D.Md. 2010). A correctional officer in the Baltimore County Department of Corrections sued the county, the director of the department, and his supervisor, alleging interference and retaliation under the Family and Medical Leave Act (FMLA). The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact, as to the willfulness of the alleged violations. The court found that a jury reasonably could find that the defendants recklessly disregarded the fact that the bulk of the officer's leave time was FMLA leave and allowed his FMLA leave time to impact his performance negatively, and that they thereby interfered with the officer's FMLA rights by discouraging him from using FMLA leave in the future. The court also held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact, as to whether the county and individual defendants interfered with, restrained or denied the correctional officer's exercise of his FMLA rights and whether he suffered prejudice in the form of wages he allegedly would not have lost had his FMLA requests been granted. According to the court, summary judgment was also precluded by a genuine issue of material fact, as to whether the county did not promote the correctional officer because of the extent of his absences, the majority of which were for FMLA leave. The court noted that non-promotion was an adverse action, and the officer showed that the county's decisions not to promote him were in temporal proximity to at least some of his absences. Summary judgment was also precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the county's proffered legitimate reasons for not promoting the correctional officer were a pretext to retaliate against him for conduct protected under the FMLA. According to the court, the officer did not have to prove that he was better qualified than those promoted. He offered evidence that those promoted had better attendance than he and that his unscheduled leave, which included FMLA leave, garnered attention and negative remarks on his otherwise positive performance evaluations. (Baltimore County Department of Corrections, Maryland)

U.S. Appeals Court
BFOQ- Bona Fide
Occupational Qualification
DISCRIMINATION
TITLE VII
EQUAL OPPORTUNITY

Breiner v. Nevada Dept. of Corrections, 610 F.3d 1202 (9th Cir. 2010). Male correctional officers brought suit, challenging an employment policy of the Nevada Department of Corrections (NDOC) of hiring only female correctional lieutenants at a women's prison. The district court granted summary judgment for the Department and the officers appeals. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The court held that a male correctional officer who had previously applied for correctional lieutenant positions, but allegedly was deterred from applying for lieutenant positions at women's prisons by his knowledge that his application would be futile because of the prison's policy of hiring only women for that position, had standing to pursue a Title VII claim. According to the court, denial of single opportunity to a man for promotion to correctional lieutenant at the women's prison was not "de minimis," and could violate Title VII, despite the existence of promotional opportunities for men across the system as a whole. The court found that gender was not a bona fide occupational qualification (BFOQ) that would justify the facially discriminatory policy of hiring only female correctional lieutenants at the women's prison, where there was no factual basis for concluding that all male correctional lieutenants would tolerate sexual abuse by their subordinates, that all men in a correctional lieutenant role would themselves sexually abuse inmates, or that women, by virtue of their gender, could better understand the behavior of female inmates. (Nevada Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
ADEA- Age Discrimination
in Employment Act
AGE DISCRIMINATION
EQUAL PROTECTION

Cook v. Illinois Dept. of Corrections, 736 F.Supp.2d 1190 (S.D.Ill. 2010). A former employee brought an action against the Illinois Department of Corrections (IDOC), alleging age discrimination in violation of the Age Discrimination in Employment Act (ADEA) and Illinois Human Rights Act (IHRA). The employer filed a motion for summary judgment. The district court denied the motion. The district court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to: (1) whether the employee was discriminated against because of her age; (2) whether the employee was performing legitimate business expectations; (3) whether the employee suffered an adverse employment action; (4) whether coworkers were similarly situated; (5) whether the employee was not promoted due to her age; and (5) whether the employee was constructively discharged. (Illinois Department of Corrections, Centralia Correctional Center)

U.S. District Court
RACIAL DISCRIMINATION
RETALIATION
SEX DISCRIMINATION
TERMINATION
TITLE VII
TRANSFER

Cortes v. City of New York, 700 F.Supp.2d 474 (S.D.N.Y. 2010). A former city corrections officer brought an action against his former city employer, alleging retaliation and discrimination based on gender and race, in violation of Title VII, § 1981, the First and Fourteenth Amendments, and the New York State Human Rights Law (SHRL). The defendant moved for judgment on the pleadings. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the officer's participation as a witness in support of his coworker's Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC) complaint was "protected activity," for the purpose of his Title VII retaliation claim, and that the officer's transfer to an undesirable facility and his termination constituted "adverse employment actions." The court found that the officer established a causal connection necessary to support his Title VII retaliation claim, and that his allegations stated gender and race discrimination claims, and a hostile work environment claim. According to the court, the officer's assertions constituted speech on matter of public concern, for the purpose of his First Amendment retaliation claim. (New York City Department of Correction)

U.S. Appeals Court
DISCRIMINATION
RELIGION
TITLE VII

E.E.O.C. v. GEO Group, Inc., 616 F.3d 265 (3rd Cir. 2010). The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC) brought an action on behalf of a group of female Muslim employees against their employer, a private company that was contracted to run a prison, alleging that the employer violated Title VII's prohibitions on religious discrimination when it failed to accommodate the employees by providing them an exemption to the prison's dress policy which precluded them from wearing Muslim head coverings-- called khimars--at work. The district court granted the employer's motion for summary judgment and denied the EEOC's cross-motion for summary judgment. The EEOC appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the employer's refusal to allow employees to wear khimars at work did not violate Title VII. According to the court, the employer, a private company, was not required under Title VII to provide to female Muslim employees an exemption to the prison's dress policy, as such a religious accommodation would have caused a safety or security risk and resulted in undue hardship to the employer. The court noted that khimars, like hats, could have been used to smuggle contraband into and around the prison, khimars could have been used to conceal the identity of the wearer, creating problems of misidentification, khimars could have been used against prison employees in an attack, and accommodating the employees would have necessarily required additional time and resources of prison officials. (GEO Group, Inc., George W. Hill Correctional Facility, Delaware County, Pennsylvania)

U.S. District Court
FREE SPEECH
PROMOTION RETALIATION
UNION

Justice v. Machtinger, 733 F.Supp.2d 495 (D.Del. 2010). A correctional officer brought a § 1983 action against a human resources director alleging his First Amendment freedom of speech rights were violated by denial of a promotion in retaliation for union activities. The director moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The court held that the human resources director was entitled to qualified immunity. According to the court, there was no evidence that the human resources director was personally involved in the misplacement of the officer's application, or had a motive other than his position to retaliate against the officer. The officer alleged that the DOC's human resources director violated his First Amendment free speech rights by intentionally misplacing his application for promotion in retaliation for the officer's union activities. In a prior court decision, the court found that the officer's participation in union negotiations was of considerable concern to the community and that his interest in participating in union negotiations outweighed the DOC's interest in the efficiency of its public service operations. (Delaware Department of Correction)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEXUAL HARASSMENT
TITLE VII

King v. McMillan, 594 F.3d 301 (4th Cir. 2010). A female former deputy sued her employer sheriff in his official capacity, under Title VII, for sexual harassment and in his individual capacity, under state law, for battery. The sheriff left office and the incoming sheriff was substituted in the action. A jury returned verdicts for the deputy on both claims, and the district court entered judgment for the deputy, awarded compensatory and punitive damages, and granted the sheriff's post-trial motion to reduce the compensatory damages award. Both sheriffs appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that substitution was appropriate for the claim under Title VII. The court held that, under Virginia law, the punitive damages award of $100,000 imposed for the sheriff's battery of the female deputy by unwanted touching was not excessive. The court also found that the compensatory damages award of $50,000, reduced by the district court from $175,000, was not excessive. (City of Roanoke, Virginia)

U.S. District Court
HOSTILE WORK
ENVIRONMENT
RETALIATION
SEXUAL HARASSMENT
TITLE VII

Morales v. GEO Group, Inc., 824 F.Supp.2d 836 (S.D.Ind. 2010). A former employee brought a Title VII action against a private correctional facility manager, her former employer, alleging sexual harassment, retaliation, and constructive discharge. The employer moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the sexually charged comments made by the female employee's supervisors and co-workers over a nine-month period were sufficiently severe or pervasive to create a hostile work environment. The court also found that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the female employee engaged in a protected activity by complaining about sexual harassment and whether she suffered an adverse employment action by being required to attend a meeting with her alleged harassers, and whether a reasonable person would have felt compelled to resign under the circumstances presented to the female employee. She had been assigned to a new unit after complaining about sexual harassment but was never given any training or a password to log on to her computer. (Geo Group, Inc., and Indiana Department of Corrections, New Castle Correctional Facility)

U.S. District Court
DISCIPLINE
HIRING/QUALIFICATIONS
SUPERVISION

Sexton v. Kenton County Detention Center, 702 F.Supp.2d 784 (E.D.Ky. 2010). Two female detainees brought a § 1983 action against a county detention center and officials, alleging deliberate indifference with respect to hiring and supervision of a deputy who sexually assaulted them while they awaited arraignment. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The court held that the detainees failed to establish deliberate indifference with respect to the center's hiring of the deputy. The court noted that none of the deputy's prior misdemeanor offenses, including his driving infractions and domestic assault, demonstrated a propensity to commit rape. The court found that the detainees failed to demonstrate a causal link between the center's alleged policy of not terminating employees with excessive absenteeism and the deputy's conduct. The court noted that "...Absent evidence of prior complaints of sexual assault, the mere fact that a male guard supervises a female inmate does not lead to the conclusion that the inmate is at a great risk of being sexually assaulted by the guard."

According to the court, the detainees failed to establish that the county detention center was deliberately indifferent to their constitutional rights by not effectively monitoring surveillance equipment, and thus they could not recover in their § 1983 action against the center, where there was no evidence that the center had a policy or custom of ineffective surveillance. The detainees argued that only one person monitored the 89 cameras that were used throughout the Detention Center and that they were mainly monitored only for ingress and egress of secured doors. They asserted that the county should have had cameras in the video arraignment room for the inmates' protection. The court noted that state jail regulations do not require constant monitoring of video surveillance cameras or dictate where the cameras are to be placed inside a detention facility. (Kenton County Detention Center, Kentucky)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEARCHES
TERMINATION

True v. Nebraska, 612 F.3d 676 (8th Cir. 2010). A former correctional facility employee brought a § 1983 action against the Nebraska Department of Correctional Services (DCS) and correctional officials, alleging violations of his First, Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment rights. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants and the employee appealed. The appeals court reversed in part, affirmed in part, and remanded. The appeals court held that the former employee had standing to bring the § 1983 action against the Department and correctional officials, where the employee lost his job due to enforcement of a department policy of randomly searching employee vehicles, and the employee sought reinstatement, lost pay and an injunction prohibiting enforcement of the policy. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to the circumstances of inmate access to the correctional facility parking lot. The employee was terminated because he refused to permit a search of his vehicle. The court held that the Department's policy of random, suspicionless searches of only employees' vehicles, rather than including visitors' vehicles, was rationally related to a legitimate state interest of institutional security, contraband interdiction and administrative efficiency. The court noted that employees' vehicles were at the facility daily, making it easier to smuggle contraband. (Lincoln Correctional Center, Nebraska)

2011

U.S. Appeals Court
DISCIPLINE
DUE PROCESS
SUSPENSION

Association for Los Angeles Deputy Sheriffs v. County of Los Angeles, 648 F.3d 986 (9th Cir. 2011). Current or former deputy sheriffs who had been charged with felonies, suspended, reinstated after suspension, and then discharged, brought § 1983 claims based on Fourteenth Amendment due process violations against the county, its board of supervisors, civil service commissioners, and sheriff. The deputies were joined by their union. The defendants moved to dismiss for failure to state a claim. The district court granted the motion and the former deputies appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part and remanded. The appeals court held that: (1) due process required that the deputies receive post-suspension hearings in addition to the limited procedures they received before their suspensions; (2) all four deputies adequately stated Monell claims against the county; (3) civil service commissioners were entitled to qualified immunity from the claims of the deputies who did not receive post-suspension hearings, although those claims could go forward against the sheriff and county supervisors; and (4) all individual defendants were entitled to qualified immunity from the § 1983 claims of the two deputies who received post-suspension hearings, as their right to a more substantial hearing was not clearly established at the time of the violations. (Los Angeles County, California)

U.S. Appeals Court
DEMOTION
FREE SPEECH INVESTIGATION
PROMOTION RETALIATION
TRANSFERS

Bardzik v. County of Orange, 635 F.3d 1138 (9th Cir. 2011). A sheriff's lieutenant brought a § 1983 action against a county, sheriff, and others alleging that the defendants retaliated against him for his support of the sheriff's opponent in an election challenge, in violation of his First Amendment rights. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court denied the motion and the sheriff appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part and reversed in part. The appeals court held that the sheriff was entitled to qualified immunity for his allegedly retaliatory demotion of the lieutenant from a policymaking position, but the sheriff was not entitled to qualified immunity for his alleged retaliation against the lieutenant while the lieutenant was not in a policymaking position. The court noted that when the lieutenant was the Reserve Division Commander, the lieutenant had broad responsibility, influence on programs, frequent contact with elected officials, technical competence, and power to control others, and that the lieutenant impeded the sheriff's agenda. In his subsequent role with the court operations unit, the lieutenant was not a policymaker. The lieutenant alleged that the sheriff retaliated against him by transferring him from the prestigious position of Reserve Division Commander to an undesirable post at Court Operations, and that the sheriff continued punishing him even after he was transferred by denying him a pay raise and taking the unprecedented step of directing that the lieutenant's rating on his annual evaluation be reduced from "exceeds expectations" to "meets expectations." The lieutenant was also denied the opportunity to interview for Chief of Police positions in 2006 and 2007, even though all lieutenants were allowed to interview even if they were considered unqualified. The court noted that two internal investigations were initiated against the lieutenant, which were ultimately dismissed as unfounded. (Orange County Sheriff's Department, California)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEARCHES

Braun v. Maynard, 652 F.3d 557 (4th Cir. 2011). Prison employees brought a § 1983 action against prison officials, alleging that a search using a portable ion scanning machine violated their Fourth Amendment rights. The district court granted the officials' motion to dismiss and the employees appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that it was not clearly established that the use of an ion scanning machine to detect drugs and other chemicals could not create reasonable suspicion to justify a strip search, and therefore, prison officials were entitled to qualified immunity from the § 1983 action by prison employees alleging that a strip search following a positive scan violated the Fourth Amendment. The court found that it was not clearly established that the Fourth Amendment was violated by strip searches of prison employees conducted in a restroom with a same-sex prison officer following a positive test from an ion scanning machine that could detect drugs and other chemicals, and therefore, officers and officials were entitled to qualified immunity in the employee's § 1983 action. (Maryland Correctional Training Center)

U.S. District Court
FREE SPEECH
POLITICAL AFFILIATION
SUSPENSION

Corbin v. Gillen, 839 F.Supp.2d 376 (D.Mass. 2011). A correctional officer employed by a county sheriff's department brought a § 1983 action against the department's superintendent and assistant superintendent, alleging that the defendants violated his right to free speech by disciplining him for disparaging remarks he made to a county selectman. The officer's statements to the county selectman were made during a jail tour, during which the officer derided the current sheriff and criticized the sheriff's department. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court allowed the motion. The court held that the officer's statements were made in performance of his official duties, the officer's speech did not penetrate the realm of public concern, and the temporal proximity between the officer's displaying of a bumper sticker on his car and his suspension without pay was insufficient to establish a First Amendment political affiliation claim. (Plymouth County Sheriff's Department, Massachusetts)

U.S. Appeals Court
HOSTILE WORK
ENVIRONMENT
RACIAL DISCRIMINATION

Ellis v. CCA of Tennessee LLC, 650 F.3d 640 (7th Cir. 2011). African-American former employees, who were nurses working in the health care unit of a privately run jail, sued their employer, claiming they were subjected to racial discrimination and a hostile work environment in violation of Title VII, and that they were constructively terminated in violation of a state whistleblower law. The district court granted summary judgment for the employer, and the employees appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the former employees were not subjected to a hostile work environment under Title VII or § 1981, despite their claims of derogatory references to "monkeys," confederate flag garb, skin-color comments, and disparate discipline and treatment based on race. (Marion County Jail II, Indiana, operated by Corrections Corporation of America)

U.S. District Court
STAFFING LEVELS
UNION

Federal Bureau of Prisons v. Federal Labor Relations Authority, 654 F.3d 91 (D.C. Cir. 2011). The Federal Bureau of Prisons (BOP) brought a Petition for Review from a final order of the Federal Labor Relations Authority (FLRA), holding that the BOP had a duty to bargain over its implementation of a “mission critical” standard for staffing at federal correctional institutions. The district court granted the petition, vacated and remanded. The appeals court held that the BOP was not required to bargain with the union before deciding that certain positions designated as non-critical were to be performed by relief officers and only as needed. The court noted that the collective bargaining agreement gave the agency the exclusive, non-negotiable right to assign work, but provided that the agency could bargain with a representative of its employees over procedures it would use when it exercised that authority. (American Federation of Government Employees, Council of Prison Locals No. 33, District of Columbia)

U.S. Appeals Court
DUE PROCESS
FAILURE TO PROTECT STAFFING LEVELS
WORKING CONDITIONS

Fields v. Abbott, 652 F.3d 886 (8th Cir. 2011). A female jailer brought a § 1983 action against a county, sheriff, county commissioners, and several other defendants, alleging violations of her substantive due process rights. The district court denied the sheriff's and commissioners' motion for summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity and the defendants appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded, finding that the defendants' failure to act was not deliberate indifference as to the safety of the jailer. According to the court, the sheriff's and county commissioners' awareness of potentially dangerous conditions in the jail, including that the jail was understaffed and that the drunk tank had an interior-mounted door handle, and failure to take action regarding those conditions, which resulted in the jailer being attacked and taken hostage by two inmates, was not deliberate indifference as to the safety of the jailer, as would violate the jailer's Fourteenth Amendment substantive due process rights on a state created danger theory. The court found that the defendants' failure to act was at most gross negligence, rather than deliberate indifference, and the jailer was aware of the conditions as she had been injured previously due to the handle and staffing issue, such that she could take these issues into account in interacting with inmates. (Miller County Jail, Missouri)

U.S. Appeals Court
FREE SPEECH MARRIAGE
DEMOTION
TERMINATION
TRANSFER

Gaspers v. Ohio Dept. of Youth Services, 648 F.3d 400 (6th Cir. 2011). Married employees filed a § 1983 action asserting claims for retaliation and deprivation of the right to freedom of intimate association in violation of the First Amendment, against the Ohio Department of Youth Services and a juvenile facility. They alleged that the husband was terminated without just cause and the wife was transferred following publication of newspaper article about the employers' purported nepotism regarding husband-and-wife employees. The district court dismissed all claims against the employers and against the public officials in their official capacities, but denied qualified immunity in part to certain public officials. Those public officials appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the husband's claim that he was terminated by the state agency and the wife's claim that she was demoted and transferred on the basis of their protected marital relationship constituted an undue intrusion by the state in that relationship, and therefore the married employees of the same state agency satisfied the adverse-action prong of their First Amendment retaliation claims against the public officials based on freedom of association. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the husband would have been fired in the absence of his protected marital relationship, and whether the wife would have been demoted and transferred in the absence of her protected marital association. According to the court, married employees' rights of intimate association were clearly established by the Supreme Court long before the husband was terminated and the wife was demoted and transferred, and, therefore, it was objectively reasonable to require public officials seeking qualified immunity on the married employees' First Amendment retaliation claim to be aware of and to observe that constitutional right. (Ohio Department of Youth Services, Ohio River Valley Juvenile Correctional Facility)

U.S. District Court
FREE SPEECH
RETALIATION
TERMINATION

Halkett v. Correctional Medical Services, Inc., 763 F.Supp.2d 205 (D.Me. 2011). An employee, a prison counselor, brought an action in state court against an employer alleging violations of the Maine Whistleblower Protection Act (MWPA) and the Maine Human Rights Act (MHRA). Following removal to federal court, the employer moved for summary judgment. The district court denied the motion. The court held that the prison counselor had a reasonable belief that his employer, the prison's medical provider, had improperly handled inmate treatment notes in violation of Maine law, and there was sufficient proximity between his complaints to the provider about misfiled and missing mental health care notes and his termination, so as to establish a prima facie case of violation of the Maine Whistleblower Protection Act (MWPA). The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the prison medical provider's proffered reason for terminating the prison counselor--that he had violated policies regarding telephone contact by prisoners with those on the outside--was a pretext for what the counselor asserted was the actual reason for his termination, the counselor's many complaints to the provider about its lax and, in his view, unlawful procedures concerning inmate treatment records.(Correctional Medical Services, Inc., Downeast Correctional Facility, Maine)

U.S. Appeals Court
ASSOCIATION
FREE SPEECH
RETALIATION
WORKING CONDITIONS

Hernandez v. Cook County Sheriff's Office, 634 F.3d 906 (7th Cir. 2011). County corrections officers who were investigated in connection with a jailbreak brought an action against the county sheriff's office and its officials, alleging, among other things, that the defendants retaliated against them in violation of their rights to free political association and free speech under the First Amendment. The district court denied the defendants' motion for summary judgment and the defendants appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The court held that: (1) the defendants did not waive their qualified immunity argument as to the officers' First Amendment retaliation claims; (2) the officers' workplace safety complaints were not protected by the First Amendment; but (3) the appeals court would not decide the issue of whether the defendants were entitled to qualified immunity from First Amendment political retaliation claims because the district court had decided the matter was waived and had never reached a conclusion on that issue. The event that precipitated this case was a jailbreak at the Abnormal Behavior Observation (ABO) unit of the Cook County jail. An inmate had overpowered a jail officer after temporarily blinding him by throwing a cleaning solution in his face. The inmate then released seven other inmates from their cells. The inmates shut off the lights and set a diversionary fire, and the first inmate put on the officer's uniform. In the confusion, the disguised inmate convinced other jail officers to open certain internal doors, after which the inmates beat several officers. Using keys obtained from the subdued officers, six inmates managed to escape from the facility. They were soon recaptured and Sheriff's Office authorities immediately suspected that the inmates had help from within the Sheriff's Office. The plaintiffs in this case included six former officers of the Special Operations Response Team (SORT), and four other officers. The inmate who began the escape process identified three officers as having advance knowledge of the jailbreak and additional officers were then implicated. The inmate asserted that one of the officers had approached him multiple times with a proposition to stage a jailbreak to draw adverse attention to the leading Cook County Sheriff candidate, in advance of a pending election. The officers claimed that in the days following the jailbreak, investigators detained them under guard for up to 24 hours and denied them food, water and sleep. Several claimed that they were discouraged from contacting a union steward or an attorney. All of the plaintiffs were brought up on administrative charges. (Cook County Sheriff's Office, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
DISCRIMINATION
HOSTILE WORK
ENVIRONMENT
TITLE VII

Hunter v. County of Albany, 834 F.Supp.2d 86 (N.D.N.Y. 2011). A former county corrections officer who was a Native American brought an action against the county, asserting claims of unlawful discrimination and harassment in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and New York State Human Rights Law. The county moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The court held that the officer did not suffer an adverse employment action, as required to establish a prima facie Title VII discrimination claim, as a result of a lone instance of being ordered to perform an irregular task by his supervisor. The court held that a supervisor's reference to the Native American county corrections officer and his co-workers as "cunts," and an inmate escape video portraying the officer and co-workers as "Keystone Cops," did not give rise to an inference of discriminatory intent as required to establish a prima facie Title VII discrimination claim, where the incidents at issue did not single the officer out on the basis of race or nationality, but portrayed the officer and co-workers in same light. The court concluded that the alleged misconduct suffered by the officer was not sufficiently continuous and concerted or severe and pervasive as to alter the officer's employment conditions and to create an abusive working environment, as required to support a Title VII hostile work environment claim. (Albany County, N.Y.)

U.S. District Court
EQUAL PROTECTION
LIBERTY INTEREST
SEX DISCRIMINATION
SEXUAL HARASSMENT

Konah v. District of Columbia, 815 F.Supp.2d 61 (D.D.C. 2011). A Liberian female formerly employed by a private health care corporation that contracted with the District of Columbia to provide medical treatment to inmates in a particular penitentiary, whose employment was terminated after she reported alleged harassment and assault and battery by inmates, sued the District and a correctional officer, claiming they violated the Fourth and Fifth Amendments, Title VII, the District of Columbia Human Rights Act (DCHRA), and common laws. The defendants moved to dismiss for failure to state a claim. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the employee adequately pled a claim that a correctional officer's failure to promptly open a "sally port" to allow her to escape inmates in their undergarments who allegedly surrounded her, jeered at her, used sexually explicit language, and grabbed her on the buttocks was an "unreasonable seizure of her person" in violation of the Fourth Amendment. The court found that the employee adequately pled a claim of discrimination on the basis of gender in violation of equal protection against the correctional officer, noting that her allegations that the officer and the District of Columbia "failed to remedy sexually offensive conduct by inmates," which included "gender specific abusive language" and "sexual assaults." The court also held that the employee adequately pled a due process claim against the correctional officer who deliberately refused to open the "sally port" because the officer prevented her exit and deprived her of her liberty. The court found that the correctional officer was not entitled to dismissal, on the basis of qualified immunity, of § 1983 claims brought by the employee where it was clearly established that the Fourth Amendment prohibited the detention of individuals without any cause, that the correctional officer's discrimination on the basis of sex violated the Fifth Amendment, and that the government could not deprive an individual of her liberty by detaining her without due process. (Unity Health Care, Inc., and the District of Columbia, Central Detention Facility)

U.S. District Court
ADA- Americans with Disabilities Act
TRAINING
PROPERTY INTEREST

Robert v. Carter, 819 F.Supp.2d 832 (S.D.Ind. 2011). A former civil deputy process server brought an action against a sheriff, county, its council, and its board of commissioners, alleging that the defendants failed to grant him a medical exemption from stun gun training or to provide him with a reasonable accommodation, in violation of Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA). The deputy also alleged that the defendants terminated him in violation of his procedural and substantive due process rights. The defendants moved for summary judgment and the district court granted the motion. The court held that stun gun training was essential to the deputy's position and that an exemption from training was unwarranted. According to the court, the defendants had no obligation to consider the deputy's non-back-related ailments in determining a reasonable accommodation, and the deputy had no property interest in continued employment. (Hamilton County Sheriff's Department, Indiana)

U.S. District Court
TERMINATION
FREE SPEECH
RETALIATION
DUE PROCESS

Smith v. Michigan Dept. of Corrections, 765 F.Supp.2d 973 (E.D.Mich. 2011). A Michigan Department of Corrections (MDOC) employee, a prison guard who was fired from his job and subsequently reinstated, brought an action against the MDOC and MDOC officials. The guard alleged, among other things, that the defendants denied him certain pre-termination procedures in violation of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments, and that the defendants retaliated against him in violation of Title VII. The defendants moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that: (1) the employee stated a procedural due process claim; (2) the employee's filing of an internal complaint with the MDOC's Equal Employment Opportunity (EEO) office was protected conduct; (3) the employee stated a First Amendment retaliation claim; and (4) the defendants were not entitled to immunity from tortious interference and conspiracy claims under Michigan's Governmental Tort Liability Act. (Parnall Correctional Facility, Michigan)

U.S. District Court PHYSICAL REQUIREMENTS BFOQ- Bona Fide Occupational Qualification SEX DISCRIMINATION TITLE VII	U.S. v. Massachusetts, 781 F.Supp.2d 1 (D.Mass. 2011.) The United States of America brought an action against the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, seeking an order enjoining the Commonwealth from administering a physical abilities test in the selection of correctional officers due to its alleged disparate impact on women in violation of Title VII. Both parties moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motions in part and denied in part. The court held that the Commonwealth's use of the test unintentionally imposed a disparate impact on women, and an issue of material fact existed as to whether the test was job related and consistent with a business necessity. The court noted that in two out of three years in which the test was conducted, the disparity between male and female pass rates well exceeded two-to-three standard deviations, the range considered statistically significant in the context of disparate impact. (Massachusetts Department of Corrections)
U.S. District Court DISCIPLINE EQUAL PROTECTION PROMOTION QUALIFICATIONS SEX DISCRIMINATION TITLE VII BFOQ- Bona Fide Occupational Qualification	White v. Department of Correctional Services, 814 F.Supp.2d 374 (S.D.N.Y. 2011). A female correction officer brought an action against New York State, the New York State Department of Correctional Services (DOCS), and supervisory officers, alleging violations of Title VII and § 1983. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether reasonable alternatives existed to the prison's gender-based hiring policy under which the officer in charge (OIC) position was posted for male corrections officers only, in light of the fact that the urine testing and strip frisks of male prisoners comprised only a small part of the OIC's job duties and that female officers had worked the OIC position in the past. The court also found that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the notice of discipline against the female corrections officer, which threatened severe consequences such as dismissal from service and loss of accrued annual leave, as well as a counseling memoranda and negative comment in the officer's performance evaluation, were sufficient to dissuade a reasonable worker from making or supporting a charge of sex discrimination. According to the court, summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the proffered reason for a notice of discipline and counseling memoranda against the female corrections officer, that she had violated Department of Correctional Services (DOCS) policies by leaving her post and entering an area in which she was not allowed, were a pretext for retaliation for the officer's having filed sex discrimination complaints with a state agency and her union. The court found that genuine issues of material fact as to whether a supervisory officer and the prison's superintendent were personally involved in the male-only designation of the officer in charge (OIC) position precluded summary judgment on the female corrections officer's § 1983 claim alleging her right to equal protection was violated when these officials discriminated against her because of her gender by denying her the OIC position, on the grounds that the female officer had not established the officials' supervisory liability. (Lincoln Correctional Facility, New York)
U.S. District Court ADA-Americans with Disabilities Act DUE PROCESS FREE SPEECH RETALIATION	Zembiec v. County of Monroe, 766 F.Supp.2d 484 (W.D.N.Y. 2011). A deputy sheriff jailor brought an action under the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), § 1983, and § 1985 against a county, sheriff's department, sheriff and undersheriff, seeking damages for alleged violations of his rights. The defendants moved for judgment on the pleadings. The district court granted the motion. The district court held that the deputy's medical records were not published on jail computers in retaliation for his speech on matters of public concern, and that the publication was not sufficiently shocking to violate substantive due process. The court noted that there was no allegation that the officials were involved with the posting. The court found that procedural due process was not violated by the fact the deputy was forced to use up his sick leave because he was denied disability payments. According to the court, the deputy failed to state a valid civil rights conspiracy claim and failed to state a claim against the sheriff for inadequate training and supervision or against the county on the theory of municipal liability. The court noted that the deputy sheriff jailor's complaints about alleged corruption and misconduct within the county sheriff's department sufficiently alleged he engaged in speech about matters of public concern protected by First Amendment, for the purposes of his retaliation claim. (Monroe County Jail, New York)
2012
U.S. District Court DRUG TESTING	Allen v. Schiff, 908 F.Supp.2d 451 (S.D.N.Y. 2012). A former county corrections officer brought a civil rights action against a county sheriff and a county for constitutional violations allegedly arising out of the administration of a mandatory, random drug test. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motions in part and denied in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact regarding the reasonableness of the drug testing program, which required the county corrections officer--who had not refused or failed a prior drug test-- to provide a urine sample while being directly observed from the front. According to the court, the sheriff had final policymaking authority on the manner in which testing was administered to department employees, such that the county could be liable under § 1983 to the extent that this testing violated the Fourth Amendment. The sheriff had spearheaded the change in the mandatory, random drug testing policy for corrections officers employed by the county sheriff's department, and he directed the entity performing the tests to directly observe the collection of urine samples from corrections officers. (Sullivan County Sheriff's Department and Jail, New York)
U.S. District Court PROSECUTION DISCIPLINE	Amobi v. District of Columbia Government, 882 F.Supp.2d 78 (D.D.C. 2012). A corrections officer brought an action against other officers, a prison director, and the District of Columbia, alleging false arrest and malicious prosecution. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The court held that the officer could not assert false arrest and malicious prosecution claims against other corrections officers for reporting his restraint of a transgender inmate, which resulted in criminal charges against the officer, even though the assault charges were eventually dropped against the officer upon the inmate's admission that he had provoked the officer. The court noted that the reporting officers described what they observed and provided probable cause for the arrest and prosecution. (District of Columbia Jail)

U.S. Appeals Court
FREE SPEECH
RETALIATION
EQUAL OPPORTUNITY
TERMINATION

Brooks v. Arthur, 685 F.3d 367 (4th Cir. 2012). Terminated employees of the Virginia Department of Corrections brought a § 1983 action against two supervisors, in their individual capacities, alleging retaliation. The district court granted the supervisors' motion to dismiss and the employees appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court found that one correction officer's speech could not be fairly characterized as constituting speech on a matter of public concern, as required for protection under the First Amendment. According to the court, the officer's concern had not been expressed in terms of a breakdown in effective prison management, but rather had been focused on his personal displeasure with his supervisors, the complaint had been made in the context of the Equal Employment Opportunity (EEO) process, and the officer did not seek anything other than improvement of his own situation. The court held that another correction officer's termination after his involvement in another employee's Equal Employment Opportunity (EEO) complaint that was intended solely to address the other employee's personal grievances, and not any matters of public concern, did not give rise to a claim under the First Amendment free speech clause. (Virginia Department of Corrections, Rustburg Correctional Unit # 9)

U.S. District Court
UNION

Corrections U.S.A. v. McNany, 892 F.Supp.2d 626 (M.D.Pa. 2012). A national association of correctional officers brought a diversity action against a state association of correctional officers and the association's officers, alleging interference with an existing contract, interference with a business relationship, and interference with prospective relations. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The district court held that: (1) there was no evidence that the actions of the state association's executives interfered with the relationship between the national association and its members; (2) the state association president's letter to members regarding the decision to withdraw its organizational membership in the national association did not breach a privilege; (3) there was no evidence that the state association acted with the specific purpose of harming the national association or that the alleged interference and harm were ever carried out intentionally; and (4) no prospective contractual relations existed between the national association and individual correctional officers in Pennsylvania. The court noted that under Pennsylvania law, the president of the state association of correctional officers was acting in his official capacity by sending a letter to the association's members notifying them of the executive board's decision to withdraw its organizational membership in a national association of correctional officers, and thus, the president was not a third party to the contract between the state association and the national association for purposes of the action by the national association for interference with a contract. According to the court, the president's letter constituted the type of work the state association's president was intended to perform, fell substantially and clearly within the authorized time and space limit of the president's employment, and helped actuate, at least in part, the executive board's new policy. (Pennsylvania State Corrections Officers Association, Corrections U.S.A.)

U.S. Appeals Court
EQUAL PROTECTION
HOSTILE WORK
ENVIRONMENT
SEXUAL HARASSMENT

Crutcher-Sanchez v. County of Dakota, 687 F.3d 979 (8th Cir. 2012). A female former county correctional officer filed suit, pursuant to §§ 1983 and 1985, against her employer, a sheriff, a supervisor, and a co-worker who was later promoted to supervisor, claiming that the sheriff and supervisor created or fostered a sexually hostile work environment, and that the supervisor and co-worker conspired to deprive the employee of equal protection. The district court denied the defendants summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds and the defendants appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The court held that: (1) the supervisor was not entitled to qualified immunity from the hostile work environment sexual harassment claim; (2) the employee was not the victim of a civil rights conspiracy; and (3) the sheriff did not subject the employee to a sexually hostile work environment. The court found that the supervisor's harassing conduct started shortly after the employee began working at the jail and included the supervisor looking the employee "up and down" during work, driving to a parking lot of her second job while repeatedly calling her on the telephone, subjecting her to constant sexual attention, and asking her to not tell anyone about their sexual relationship. The court found that the supervisor's unwelcome sexual harassment directed toward the female officer was sufficiently severe or pervasive to alter the conditions of her employment and create a hostile work environment in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment, where the supervisor took advantage of employee when she was intoxicated and vulnerable, the employee felt harassed by the supervisor's leering, the employee was subject to sexual attention by the supervisor during nearly her entire employment with the county, and the employee was fired for ending her sexual relationship with the supervisor. The court held that the supervisor was not entitled to qualified immunity from the female correctional officer's § 1983 claim since it was clearly established at the time of the harassment that the supervisor's attempt to have sex with a subordinate violated the subordinate's civil rights. According to the court, the sheriff's offer of a box of chocolates to the female correctional officer, and asking her out several times, was not sufficiently severe or pervasive conduct to create a sexually hostile work environment, as required to support the officer's § 1983 claim for sexual harassment in violation of Fourteenth Amendment equal protection, since the sheriff's inappropriate acts were not so intimidating, offensive, or hostile as to poison the work environment. (Dakota County Jail, Nebraska)

U.S. District Court
ADA- Americans with Disabilities Act
HARASSMENT
HOSTILE WORK
ENVIRONMENT
SEXUAL HARASSMENT
SUPERVISION
TITLE VII

Davis v. Vermont, Dept. of Corrections, 868 F.Supp.2d 313 (D.Vt. 2012). A former employee of the Vermont Department of Corrections (DOC), who worked as a prison guard, brought an action against his former employer, alleging, among other things, that he was retaliated against in violation of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) and that he was sexually harassed on the basis of his sex in violation of Title VII and the Vermont Fair Employment Practices Act (VFPEA). The employer moved to dismiss for failure to state a claim. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that: (1) as a matter of first impression, the employer was immune from the employee's ADA retaliation claim; (2) the employee stated a Title VII hostile work environment claim based on harassing conduct that suggested the employee failed to conform to gender stereotypes; (3) the employee sufficiently stated that he was disabled under the Rehabilitation Act; (4) the employer failed to show that any perceived impairment of the employee was both transitory and minor, as a defense to the Rehabilitation Act claim; (5) the alleged incidents were sufficiently severe to alter the conditions of the employee's employment, as supported by the hostile work environment claims; (6) the alleged harassment by co-workers and inmates could be imputed to the employee's supervisors for purposes of holding the employer vicariously liable; and (7) there was a causal connection between the employee's protected activity and the adverse employment actions, as supported a prima facie case of retaliation. The court found that although images sent to the male DOC employee in e-mails by his supervisors and co-workers referring to genitalia may have been tinged with offensive sexual connotations, the images did not constitute discrimination because of sex, as would support the employee's Title VII sexual harassment claim, where no inference could be drawn that the conduct was due to general hostility to the presence of males in the workplace or that it was due to the disparate treatment of members of the opposite sex. According to the court, allegations in the employee's second amended complaint that a supervisor sent him an e-mail stating "way to milk it, buddy," referring to the time the employee took off due to a work-related testicular injury, and that a male inmate stated, "good luck making kids with that package," sufficiently stated a Title VII hostile work environment claim based on harassing conduct that suggested the employee failed to conform to gender stereotypes. The court held that the alleged incidents in which supervisors of the employee, a prison guard who sustained a work-related testicular injury, sent the employee two e-mails on consecutive days containing explicit references to his genital pain, the e-mails were circulated to other staff, and were hung in a mail room where employees, both male and female, could see them, the employee received a threatening note in his mailbox after he returned from hernia surgery that stated "how's your nuts/kill yourself/your done," and the employee was copied on an e-mail containing a cartoon drawing of someone with gun to his head with the caption "Kill Yourself," were sufficiently severe to alter the conditions of the employee's employment, as supported his hostile work environment claims based on disability discrimination under the Rehabilitation Act and the Vermont Fair Employment Practices Act (VFPEA). (Vermont Department of Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
 EQUAL PROTECTION
 HOSTILE WORK
 ENVIRONMENT
 PROMOTION
 SEXUAL HARASSMENT

Duncan v. County of Dakota, Neb., 687 F.3d 955 (8th Cir. 2012). A female former county employee brought a § 1983 action against a county, a supervisor, and others, alleging hostile-work-environment, sexual harassment, and constructive discharge in violation of the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The district court denied the supervisor's motion for summary judgment, and he appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded, finding that the supervisor's alleged conduct was not so objectively severe, extreme, or intimidating as to alter the term, condition, or privilege of the employee's employment. The supervisor allegedly engaged in sexual favoritism and traded preferential treatment for sexual favors. According to the court, the supervisor's alleged conduct had not been physically threatening or humiliating to the officer, the supervisor had not denied the officer any benefits or opportunities, and any promotion for which the officer had been available had not gone to any employee who had had a sexual relationship with the supervisor. (Dakota County Jail, Nebraska)

U.S. District Court
 ADA- Americans with Disabilities Act
 ADEA- Age Discrim. in Employment Act
 FMLA- Family Medical Leave Act
 RACIAL DISCRIM.
 TITLE VII
 TRANSFERS

Fields v. Department of Public Safety, 911 F.Supp.2d 373 (M.D.La. 2012). A Black female employee brought an action against a state and its department of public safety (DPS), alleging violations of Title VII, the Age Discrimination in Employment Act (ADEA), the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), and the Family and Medical Leave Act (FMLA). The state moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the employee's allegations that she was denied a request for transfer while a white employee was granted a transfer were sufficient to state a disparate treatment claim in violation of Title VII against the state department of public safety. The court noted that the Family and Medical Leave Act (FMLA) does not provide for recovery of punitive damages. (Elayn Hunt Correctional Center, Louisiana)

U.S. District Court
 DISCRIMINATION
 FREE SPEECH
 PROMOTION
 QUALIFICATIONS RELIGION
 RETALIATION
 TERMINATION
 TITLE VII

Finnie v. Lee County, Miss., 907 F.Supp.2d 750 (N.D.Miss. 2012). A female Pentecostal juvenile detention officer brought an action against a county and a sheriff, alleging that her termination violated her First Amendment rights of free speech and free exercise of religion and that it was religious and gender discrimination and retaliation under Title VII. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that: (1) the county's pants-only uniform policy did not violate the Free Exercise Clause; (2) the officer was not replaced by someone outside her protected class as a female; (3) the uniform policy was not sex discrimination or sex stereotyping; (4) requiring the county to offer the officer an exemption to the uniform policy would subject the county to undue hardship; and, (5) the officer did not show that the county's proffered reason for her termination was a pretext for discrimination. According to the court, requiring the county employer to offer the Pentecostal female juvenile detention officer an exemption to its "no skirts" policy as a religious accommodation would subject the county to undue hardship, and thus, policy was not religious discrimination under Title VII. The court noted that there were legitimate safety concerns presented from female officers wearing skirts, including impairment of an officer's ability to perform defense-tactic maneuvers because of the likelihood that an assailant could pin the material of the skirt to the floor with his knees, preventing the officer from moving her body to perform maneuvers, and the female officer, who lacked a GED certificate at the time she worked for the county, was not qualified for vacant positions which would allow her to wear skirt. But the court found that summary judgment was precluded by an issue of material fact as to whether the county's proffered reason for terminating the officer was a pretext for retaliation, where less than one month passed between the filing of a charge and the officer's termination. (Lee County Juvenile Detention Center, Mississippi)

U.S. Appeals Court PROBATION
 RACIAL DISCRIMINATION
 TERMINATION

Harris v. Warrick County Sheriff's Dept., 666 F.3d 444 (7th Cir. 2012). An African American former deputy sheriff sued a sheriff's department under a federal civil right statutes, alleging that he was terminated from his probationary employment due to his race. The district court granted summary judgment for the department and the former deputy appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that: (1) coworkers' use of racially tinged nicknames and workplace exposure to excerpts from a movie apparently perceived as treating racism as acceptable did not establish that the former deputy was terminated due to his race, and (2) the department's different treatment of white deputy sheriffs who had performance problems during their probationary employment did not establish that former deputy was terminated due to his race. (Warrick County Sheriff, Indiana)

U.S. District Court
EQUAL PROTECTION
FREE SPEECH
LIBERTY INTEREST
DISCIPLINE
SEX DISCRIMINATION

Kinney v. Anglin, 889 F.Supp.2d 1101 (C.D.Ill. 2012). A female employee, and instructor at a state correctional facility, brought an action against facility officials and supervisors, alleging a due process violation, an equal protection violation on the basis of gender, and retaliation in violation of the First Amendment. Following the grant, in part, of the defendants' motion to dismiss, the defendants moved for summary judgment. The district granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the instructor did not have a liberty interest in working at the facility and there was no evidence that the instructor suffered a tangible loss of other employment opportunities as the result of her public disclosure. According to the court, the instructor's complaint regarding misappropriation of funds to her supervisors was made pursuant to her official duties, while her complaint to a state agency regarding concerns of governmental waste by her supervisors was made as a citizen on a matter of public concern. The court found that the terminated female construction trade instructor demonstrated that she was similarly situated to a male contractual employee at the facility, as required to support a prima facie case of discrimination in her § 1983 action alleging violation of her equal protection rights based on gender. According to the court, although the male employee was given a stop order for fraternization, whereas the female instructor was given a stop order for allegedly encouraging false allegations of sexual harassment, such distinction was not material, as the conduct of both employees violated the facility's rules, and if true, would have been appropriate grounds for the entry of a stop order. (Danville Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
DEMOTION
FREE SPEECH
TRANSFER

Mosholder v. Barnhardt, 679 F.3d 443 (6th Cir. 2012). A corrections officer at a state correctional facility sued corrections officials, asserting a First Amendment retaliation claim regarding her transfer from a school officer position to a general corrections officer position. Following the defendants' removal of the action from state court, the district court granted summary judgment against the officer, and she appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The court held that a letter by the corrections officer to elected officials, which was critical of a rap music competition for youthful offenders at a school where she worked, primarily addressed a matter of public concern, for purposes of determining whether it was protected by the First Amendment, regardless of her personal motivation, including her own desire to see different policies enacted. The court noted that the letter lodged complaints about the administration of a public safety facility that, in her view, promoted behavior that could offend victims and their families, and also potentially put prisoners and staff immediately, and the general public eventually, at risk. (Thumb Correctional Facility, Michigan)

U.S. District Court
CONTRACT
DUE PROCESS
UNION

New York State Correctional Officers & Police Benev. Ass'n, Inc. v. New York, 911 F.Supp.2d 111 (N.D.N.Y. 2012). A state employees union representing correctional officers and police officers, and its president, on behalf of themselves and all others similarly situated, brought an action against the State of New York and various public officials, alleging that defendants unilaterally increased the percentage of contributions that plaintiffs were required to pay for health insurance benefits in retirement, and, thereby, violated the Contracts Clause and Due Process Clause, impaired the plaintiffs' contractual rights under the terms of their collective bargaining agreement (CBA), and violated state law. The defendants moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the request of state employees union and its president, for an order declaring unconstitutional the law increasing the percentage of contributions that plaintiffs were required to pay for health insurance benefits in retirement, was prospective, and therefore not barred by the Eleventh Amendment. According to the court, the union and its president sufficiently brought a state law contractual impairment claim against state officials, by alleging that the state officials' implementation of reduced contribution rates to plaintiffs' health insurance benefits in retirement was not authorized by state law. The court held that the union and its president sufficiently alleged in its § 1983 action that state officials' implementation of reduced contribution rates to plaintiffs' health insurance benefits in retirement was beyond the scope of the officials' authority as public officials, as required to defeat the state officials' motion to dismiss based on legislative immunity. The court also found that the union and its president pled sufficient facts suggesting that the state defendants' actions violated the parties' collective bargaining agreement (CBA), past state practices, and representations made by the state, and were not reasonable and necessary to meet a stated legitimate public purpose, as required to state a Contracts Clause claim against state defendants. (New York State Correctional Officers & Police Benevolent Association, Inc.)

U.S. District Court
CONTRACT
DUE PROCESS
UNION

Roberts v. New York, 911 F.Supp.2d 149 (N.D.N.Y. 2012). Retired state employees brought an action against the state of New York, state departments, and state officials, alleging that the defendants unilaterally increased the percentage of contributions that retired employees were required to pay for health insurance benefits in retirement and violated the Contracts Clause and Due Process Clause of the United States Constitution, impaired the retired employees' contractual rights under terms of their collective bargaining agreement (CBA), and violated state law. The retirees sought injunctive relief, declaratory judgments and monetary damages. The defendants moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The district court held that: (1) claims against the state of New York and state departments were barred by the Eleventh Amendment; (2) the allegations stated a claim against state officials for violation of the Contracts Clause; and (3) the allegations stated a Fourteenth Amendment due process claim against state officials. According to the court, the retired state employees' allegations that state officials did not issue a declaration or any other kind of finding stating that it was necessary to raise the contribution rates, that raising the contribution rate was not part of a state budget, that the only "rationale" or "purpose" asserted by the officials was that it was necessary to implement negotiated agreement between the State and the bargaining unit, that a substantial impairment on the retirees' rights defeated the significant public purpose, and that the unilateral implementation of the reduced contribution rates violated the collective bargaining agreement (CBA) and was an abuse of power, were sufficient to suggest that the officials' actions were not reasonable and necessary, as required to sustain their claim against state officials for violation of the Contract Clause. (Council 37, American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
FAILURE TO PROTECT PROSECUTION

U.S. v. Wilson, 686 F.3d 868 (8th Cir.2012). Following the denial, in part, of his motion to suppress evidence, the defendant, the chief administrator of a county jail, was convicted, by a jury in the United States District Court of four counts of deprivation of rights and two counts of making false statements, arising out of injuries caused to four inmates. He appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the district court did not err in applying the physical-restraint enhancement where the defendant violated his victims' constitutional rights while they were prisoners locked up in enclosed areas in a county jail, and the jury found that he purposefully moved two of them from cells where they were safe so that they would be assaulted in a cell holding violent inmates. The court noted that not only did the administrator, in moving the two prisoners, insinuate that the other inmates should assault them, but he rewarded the assaulting inmates with cigarettes after each of the incidents. The district court sentenced the administrator to 120 months' imprisonment on each of the § 242 counts, and 60 months' imprisonment on each of the § 1001 counts, with all terms to be served concurrently. (Washington Co. Jail, Mo.)

U.S. District Court
RACIAL DISCRIMINATION
RETALIATION

Washington v. California City Correction Center, 871 F.Supp.2d 1010 (E.D.Cal. 2012). A discharged African-American employee, who worked as corrections officer, brought an action against her former employer alleging, among other things, that she was discriminated against on basis of her race in violation of California Fair Employment and Housing Act (FEHA), and wrongfully terminated in violation of public policy. The employer moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court found genuine issues of material fact as to whether the discharged African-American corrections officer exhausted her administrative remedies with respect to her claim that her employer failed to prevent racial discrimination, and as to whether actionable discrimination occurred, precluding summary judgment as to the employee's failure to prevent discrimination cause of action under the California Fair Employment and Housing Act (FEHA). The court held that the African-American corrections officer's allegations in her administrative complaint that her employer subjected her to a wrongful investigation of inappropriate behavior because of her race, and that the employer retaliated against her by wrongfully investigating her behavior after she complained to the employer about her supervisor's racially motivated discrimination, were sufficient to encompass claims of retaliation under the California Fair Employment and Housing Act (FEHA), for administrative exhaustion purposes. (California City Correction Center, CCA of Tennessee)

U.S. Appeals Court
HOSTILE WORK
ENVIRONMENT
SEX DISCRIMINATION
SEXUAL HARASSMENT

Williams v. Herron, 687 F.3d 971 (8th Cir. 2012). A female correctional officer brought a § 1983 action against a county and a former chief deputy sheriff, who were her employers, alleging gender discrimination in violation of her Fourteenth Amendment rights. The district court entered an order denying the sheriff's motion for summary judgment and the sheriff appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the sheriff's sexual harassment was sufficiently severe and pervasive to alter the conditions of the officer's employment, and the officer had a clearly established right to be free from a hostile work environment. The court found that the female correctional officer's conduct in informing the chief deputy sheriff that she was uncomfortable continuing their sexual relationship was sufficient to demonstrate that the sheriff's continued actions in grabbing and hugging her were unwelcome, as required to prevail on her hostile-work-environment claim for sexual harassment under the Fourteenth Amendment. The court noted that the chief deputy sheriff had previously used sexual coercion to entice other female employees, and once an officer began viewing the sheriff's conduct as unwelcome, her employment status became jeopardized. (Dakota County Jail, Nebraska)

2013

U.S. District Court
FREE SPEECH
RETALIATION
TERMINATION

Caruso v. City of New York, 973 F.Supp.2d 430 (S.D.N.Y. 2013). A former Inspector General at the New York City Department of Investigation (DOI), who was responsible for the Department of Correction (DOC) brought an action pursuant to § 1983 and state law alleging that he was terminated by his former employer in retaliation for his truthful testimony before a grand jury investigating whether the then-Commissioner of the DOC had attempted to influence criminal and administrative investigations of a corporation, and had received undisclosed benefits from the corporation in the form of an apartment renovation. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by fact issue as to whether the defendants would have made the decision to terminate the plaintiff in the absence of his grand jury testimony. (New York City Department of Correction)

U.S. District Court
ASSOCIATION
FREE SPEECH MARRIAGE
WORK RULES

Corso v. Fischer, 983 F.Supp.2d 320 (S.D.N.Y. 2013). A correctional officer brought an action against the Commissioner of the New York Department of Corrections and Community Supervision's (DOCCS), alleging DOCCS's work rule prohibiting personal association of DOCCS employees with current and former inmates and their associates was overbroad, in violation of the First Amendment. The parties cross-moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the officer's motion. The court held that the work rule was facially overbroad in violation of the First Amendment, where DOCCS had enforced the rule against the officer and denied her the right to associate with her former husband and the father of her grandchild.

The court found that the rule was not narrowly tailored to further the State's compelling interest in maintaining safe and orderly administration of its prisons, as applied to constitutionally protected close familial relationships, and thus, did not withstand strict scrutiny on the First Amendment overbreadth claim. The court noted that the rule provided no temporal or geographical limitation with respect to the former inmate's incarceration, nor did its prohibition account for variations in the seriousness of that person's offense or his or her prison disciplinary history. The court found that the rule was substantially overbroad, in violation of the First Amendment, as applied to close familial relationships, where the rule would prevent a DOCCS employee from visiting, or even corresponding with an incarcerated spouse if the couple had no children or if their children did not maintain a relationship with the incarcerated parent, and the rule prohibited employees from ever reestablishing contact with a spouse, child, sibling, or parent when that person was released and became a "former inmate." (New York State Department of Corrections and Community Supervision)

U.S. District Court DEMOTION POLITICAL AFFILIATION PROMOTION RETALIATION SEX DISCRIMINATION TITLE VII TRANSFERS	Ezell v. Darr, 951 F.Supp.2d 1316 (M.D.Ga. 2013). Female county deputy sheriffs brought an action against a sheriff and a city consolidated government, alleging under § 1983 that the sheriff retaliated against them for their political support of a former sheriff's reelection bid, and that they were denied promotion and demoted because of their gender. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that under Georgia law, loyalty to an individual sheriff and the goals and policies he sought to implement through his office was an appropriate requirement for the effective performance of a deputy sheriff, and thus the sheriff did not violate the First Amendment by transferring deputies who did not support him in an election. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the sheriff's proffered legitimate, non-discriminatory reason for promoting a male deputy to the position of captain of jail administration, rather than the female deputies--namely, that the male deputy had relevant experience and that he was the only candidate who had been working in that area for years under a captain the sheriff was seeking to replace-- was a pretext for gender discrimination in violation of Title VII and § 1983. The court also found a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the male county sheriff's proffered legitimate, non-discriminatory reason for denying a female deputy comp time, namely, that the deputy had been exempt from accruing comp time for 20 years, was a pretext for gender discrimination. The court held that the newly-elected male sheriff's proffered legitimate, non-discriminatory reason for transferring the female deputy from the position of jail commander to a clerk of the Recorder's Court-- that the sheriff was dissatisfied with the way jail had been operating under the deputy and he felt that members of the deputy's staff were unprofessional-- was not a pretext for gender discrimination. (Muscogee County Sheriff, Muscogee County Jail, Georgia)
U.S. District Court ADA-Americans with Disabilities Act PHYSICAL REQUIREMENTS RACIAL DISCRIMINATION PSYCHOLOGICAL SCREENING RETALIATION	Franklin v. City of Slidell, 936 F.Supp.2d 691 (E.D.La. 2013). An African-American formerly employed by a city as a senior corrections officer in a police department filed a pro se race and disability discrimination and retaliation suit against a city, six city employees, and a doctor who performed a psychological evaluation on the employee and found that he was not fit for duty as a law enforcement officer. The former employee alleged they violated the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) and regulations. The district court granted the doctor's motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim. The city and the employees moved to dismiss for failure to state a claim. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The district court held that the officer adequately pleaded that he was disabled within the meaning of ADA, and that the officer's ADA claim stemming from being required to undergo medical and psychological fitness for duty examinations before returning to work from sick leave would not be dismissed for failure to exhaust administrative remedies, for the officer's failure to plead he was a "qualified individual with a disability," or on account of a business necessity exception. (Slidell Police Department, Louisiana)
U.S. Appeals Court DEMOTION FREE SPEECH RETALIATION	Haverda v. Hays County, 723 F.3d 586 (5th Cir. 2013). A corrections officer brought an action against a county, the sheriff's office, and the sheriff, alleging retaliation in violation of the First Amendment. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants. The officer appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The appeals court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of fact as to: (1) whether the corrections officer's protected speech motivated his demotion; (2) whether the corrections officer would have been demoted in the absence of his protected speech; and (3) whether the corrections officer's First Amendment speech rights were violated by his demotion. The court held that the officer's writing of a letter to the editor was speech made as a citizen, rather than in his role as a public employee, and therefore, the letter was protected by the First Amendment, for purposes of his retaliation claims. The court noted that the officer wrote the letter during an election campaign, the letter expressed support for the incumbent and criticized his political opponent, the officer did not receive compensation for the letter, the letter was public, and it was not part of the officer's duties to speak to the media or write letters to the editor. (Hays County Sheriff's Office and Jail, Texas)
U.S. Appeals Court DISCIPLINE PROSECUTION	Keith v. Koerner, 707 F.3d 1185 (10th Cir. 2013). A female former prison inmate who was impregnated as a result of her vocational-training instructor's unlawful sexual acts brought a § 1983 action against a former warden and other Kansas Department of Corrections employees. The defendants moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part, but denied qualified immunity for the former warden, who appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the former prison inmate adequately alleged that the former warden violated a clearly established constitutional right, precluding qualified immunity for the warden in the § 1983 action alleging that the warden was deliberately indifferent to sexual abuse by the vocational-training instructor. According to the court, the inmate alleged that the warden had knowledge of the abuse but failed to properly investigate or terminate staff when abuse allegations were substantiated, and that the prison's structural policy problems contributed to abuse by failing to address known problems with the vocational program or to use cameras to monitor inmates and staff. (Topeka Correctional Facility, Kansas) ronment allegedly created for the LPN when on one occasion inmates made lewd and sexually threatening comments toward her and one grabbed her buttocks while she was administering medication to them. The court found that the corporation took reasonable and appropriate corrective steps to prevent harassment and to ensure that the environment for its nurses at the detention facility would be a safe and non-hostile job situation in a jail requiring direct contact with inmates could be, and the LPN knew of escort policy and a sick call room policy and was apparently in violation of those policies when the incident in question took place. But the court found that the District of Columbia was not entitled to judgment on the pleadings with regard to the LPN's allegations that the District did not sufficiently train its employees in the Department of Corrections to ensure that nurses employed by the private health care corporation which was contracted to provide medical care for inmates at the detention facility were not subjected to constant gender-based lewd and nasty catcalls or acts by inmates. The court held that the LPN's allegations were sufficiently clear and detailed to make out a § 1983 cause of action based on Monell liability for a policy or custom, and importantly, the LPN had alleged sufficient facts to state a claim that District officials knew of the problem and that their failure to address it was deliberately indifferent. (Unity Health Care, Inc., Central Detention Facility, District of Columbia)
U.S. District Court CONTRACTORS HARASSMENT HOSTILE WORK ENVIRONMENT TERMINATION TITLE VII	Konah v. District of Columbia, 915 F.Supp.2d 7 (D.D.C. 2013). A Liberian female formerly employed as a Licensed Practical Nurse (LPN) by a private health care corporation that contracted with the District of Columbia to provide medical treatment to inmates in a penitentiary, whose employment was terminated after she reported alleged harassment and assault and battery by inmates while administering medication to them, sued the District and a correctional officer, claiming they violated the Fourth and Fifth Amendments, Title VII, the District of Columbia Human Rights Act (DCHRA), and common laws. The district court partially granted the defendants' motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim. The employer and correctional officer moved for summary judgment, and the District of Columbia moved for judgment on the pleadings. The district court granted the motions in part. The court held that under District of Columbia law, the correctional officer did not assault, batter, or intentionally inflict emotional distress on the nurse absent evidence he delayed opening the front gate to a corridor outside the unit, in response to the LPN's request so she could get away from inmates making lewd and sexually threatening comments, with the intention that she suffer assault, battery or emotional distress. According to the court, the reason for his delay was that there were inmates in the sally port who would have been able to escape confinement if he opened gate. The court found that the private health care corporation was not liable for a hostile work envi-

U.S. District Court
CONTRACTORS
DUE PROCESS
EQUAL PROTECTION
SEXUAL HARASSMENT

Konah v. District of Columbia, 971 F.Supp.2d 74 (D.D.C. 2013). A licensed practical nurse (LPN), formerly employed by a private health care corporation that contracted with the District of Columbia to provide medical care to inmates, brought a § 1983 action against the District, alleging that its failure to train correctional employees to adequately respond to inmates' sexual abuse of staff violated her right to equal protection under the Fifth Amendment's Due Process Clause. The District moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The court held that: (1) the alleged inadequate training of correctional officers was not the cause of the LPN's sexual harassment; (2) evidence did not show that the District was deliberately indifferent to the risk of sexual harassment; and (3) even if the District was on notice of the risk to nurses, its response did not show deliberate indifference. The court found that the precipitating cause of the sexual harassment of the nurse by inmates while distributing medications at the jail was the LPN's decision to violate longstanding jail policy and deviate from her standard practice of waiting for a correctional officer to escort her before entering the jail's housing unit. The court noted that the District collaborated with the LPN's employer to institute a policy directing nurses to distribute medications from sick-call rooms, and responded when the LPN was sexually harassed by inmates by ordering an immediate medical evaluation, a meeting with the warden, and offering criminal prosecution of the inmate. (D.C. Central Detention Facility, District of Columbia)

U.S. District Court
HOSTILE WORK
ENVIRONMENT
RETALIATION
SEX DISCRIMINATION
SEXUAL HARASSMENT
TITLE VII
ASSIGNMENT
EQUAL PROTECTION

Meadors v. Ulster County, 984 F.Supp.2d 83 (N.D.N.Y. 2013). Female county corrections officers brought an action under § 1983, Title VII, and the New York State Human Rights Law (NYSHRL) against a county, a sheriff, a jail superintendent, and a deputy jail superintendent, alleging sex discrimination, hostile work environment, sexual harassment, retaliation, and negligent infliction of emotional distress. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to: (1) whether the female corrections officers' work environment was hostile and abusive; (2) whether the county had a good faith complaint procedure; and (3) whether the county treated a female corrections officer differently than similarly-situated male officers with regard to discipline, for matters that occurred outside the workplace.

The court held that county officials did not retaliate against a female corrections officer, in violation of Title VII, for filing a discrimination charge with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC), even though her supervisor revoked her shift change, another supervisor assigned her to an undesirable unit, and she was not selected for a desirable intake position. The court also found that county jail officials' reassignment of a female corrections officer to a different position after she verbally complained about a co-worker's sexual harassment, even if it was a less desirable position, did not constitute a materially "adverse employment action" required to support her Title VII retaliation claim. According to the court, county jail officials' rescission of a female corrections officer's request for light duty assignments during her pregnancy, her reassignment to work in male housing units, and her receipt of a written discipline report for noting her reassignment, did not constitute materially "adverse employment actions" required to support her Title VII retaliation claim. (Ulster County Jail, New York)

U.S. District Court
AGE DISCRIMINATION
RACIAL DISCRIMINATION
TERMINATION
TITLE VII

Morris v. Carter Global Lee, Inc., 997 F.Supp.2d 27 (D.D.C. 2013). An African-American employee brought an action against his former employer, a contractor for the District of Columbia Department of Corrections, in the Superior Court of the District of Columbia, alleging wrongful termination and violation of his civil rights under the Fourteenth Amendment, Title VII, § 1981, and other various statutes. The employer removed the action to federal court and moved to dismiss. The federal district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the employee stated a claim against his former employer under § 1981, even though the employee's complaint contained no mention of his race or racial discrimination in the termination of his employment contract, where the defendant attached to his amended complaint his charge of discrimination filed with the District of Columbia Office of Human Rights, and made a presentation to the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC). The employee alleged, "I was terminated for alleged gross misconduct," and "I believe I have been discriminated against because of my race (Black American) and age (54), in violation of Title VII." (District of Columbia Jail, Carter Goble Lee [CGL] Contractors)

U.S. District Court
DISCRIMINATION
DUE PROCESS
EQUAL PROTECTION
RETALIATION
SEX DISCRIMINATION
TITLE VII

Rother v. NYS Dept. of Corrections and Community Supervision, 970 F.Supp.2d 78 (N.D.N.Y. 2013). A female corrections officer brought an action against a state department of corrections, correctional facility, supervisors and coworkers, alleging sex discrimination and retaliation under Title VII, denial of equal protection pursuant to § 1983, denial of due process under the Fourteenth Amendment, First Amendment retaliation, conspiracy under § 1985, and various state claims. The defendants moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The officer alleged that a coworker told the officer, in front of inmates, coworkers, and the officer's subordinates, that she had received an administrative-sergeant position by performing sexual favors and that she was a "bitch and a backstabber," "a stupid cunt," and a "whining bitch" who "sucked." She alleged that she was subjected to discriminatory coworker shunning and tire-slashing threats, assignment denials, performance criticisms, discipline, vigilant monitoring, and denial of overtime and leave pay denials. The appeals court held that, through the description of the emotional and psychological toll of her treatment, the officer subjectively perceived her work environment to be abusive.

The court found that the officer's complaint alleged the "materially adverse action" element of a Title VII retaliation claim against a correctional facility and the state department of corrections by alleging that she endured unmerited criticism and discipline, failure to remedy a coworker's mistreatment, repeated coworker shunning and threats of tire slashing, video-camera monitoring, denial of vacation pay, and delay in filling out workers' compensation paperwork. The court also held that the officer's complaint stated a § 1983 claim against the state department of corrections and the correctional facility for violation of the Equal Protection Clause, where her complaint alleged that no male employee was subjected to the treatment of which she complained, and that the officer was criticized and disciplined repeatedly for proper and innocuous conduct while a male coworker received no criticism or discipline for his patently improper and inappropriate verbal tirade, which included explicitly sexist language. According to the court, the state's commissioner of corrections, by virtue of his supervisory position, had both a direct connection to the alleged gender discrimination against the female corrections officer, and the authority to reinstate and transfer the officer, supporting her § 1983 equal protection claim against the commissioner in his official capacity seeking injunctive or declaratory relief. (Coxsackie Correctional Facility, N.Y. State Department of Corrections and Community Supervision)

U.S. Appeals Court
DISCRIMINATION
FREE SPEECH
RETALIATION

Singer v. Ferro, 711 F.3d 334 (2nd Cir. 2013). A corporal and corrections officers brought a § 1983 action against a sergeant, captain, sheriff, and various other officials, alleging retaliation in violation of their First Amendment speech and association rights. The district court granted summary judgment to the defendants. The plaintiffs appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that an advertisement parody was not protected by the First Amendment. According to the court, the allegedly corrupt practices of certain officials at a corrections facility in favoring certain individuals for promotions and the granting of days off, purportedly referred to by the corporal in creating a parody advertisement with facility officials placed in or on bottles of alcohol with a caption reading "Absolut Corruption" were not matters of public concern, and therefore, the parody was not protected by the First Amendment. The court noted that the parody was comprehensible only to others who worked at the facility, and the corporal only shared it with five other employees. (Ulster County Sheriff's Office and Jail, New York)

U.S. District Court
CONTRACTORS
DISCRIMINATION
EQUAL PROTECTION
HOSTILE WORK
ENVIRONMENT
RETALIATION
SEX DISCRIMINATION
SUPERVISION
TITLE VII

Stoner v. Arkansas Dep. of Correction, 983 F.Supp.2d 1074 (E.D.Ark. 2013). A nurse employed by a company which contracted with the Arkansas Department of Correction (ADC) to provide on-site medical services to ADC inmates brought an action against ADC, a warden, and the company under Title VII and the Arkansas Civil Rights Act for gender discrimination and retaliation. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motions in part and denied in part. The court held that the ADC was the prison nurse's employer for purposes of the nurse's Title VII gender discrimination and retaliation claims against ADC and a warden. According to the court, although the nurse was hired by a company which contracted with ADC to provide on-site medical services to inmates, ADC trained company employees on sexual harassment policies and reporting requirements, the warden held company employees accountable to the same standards as ADC employees, and the warden had the ability to ban the nurse from the prison complex, effectively terminating her employment.

The court held that the warden employed by ADC was subject to personal liability with respect to the female former prison nurse's claims for gender discrimination under § 1983 and the Arkansas Civil Rights Act (ACRA), where the nurse's right to be free from gender discrimination was secured by the Equal Protection Clause, and her right to be free from retaliation based on protected speech was secured by the First Amendment, and the warden, as a prison authority, was acting under the color of state law.

According to the court, the alleged harassment of the nurse by the prison warden was not part of the same employment practice as a correctional officer's prior alleged harassment of the nurse, and thus the warden's alleged harassment did not constitute a continuing violation for the purposes of the nurse's Title VII hostile work environment claim. The court noted that the alleged conduct was committed by different actors, and the harassment seemed to have been motivated by different animus, specifically, the officer's harassment was based on sex, while the warden's harassment was based on retaliation.

The court held that ADC took prompt and effective remedial action after learning of the male correctional officer's alleged sexual harassment of the female nurse, and thus ADC could not be held liable under Title VII for the alleged hostile work environment created by the officer's conduct, nor could the company be held liable as a third-party for such alleged conduct. (Correctional Medical Services, and Arkansas Department of Correction, McPherson Unit)

U.S. Appeals Court
UNION
WORKING CONDITIONS

U.S. Dept. of Justice Federal Bureau of Prisons Federal Correctional Complex Coleman, Fla. v. Federal Labor Relations Authority 737 F.3d 779 (D.C.Cir. 2013). The Federal Bureau of Prisons (BOP) petitioned for review, and the BOP and the Federal Labor Relations Authority (FLRA) cross-applied for enforcement of FLRA's order stating that the BOP was required to bargain with a labor union over proposals relating to the BOP's use of metal detectors at a high security prison. The BOP moved to dismiss on the grounds of mootness. The appeals court denied the motion, granted a motion to vacate in part, and granted a motion to enforce, and remanded. The court held that the decision to use the federal prison's compound metal detectors to screen only those inmates suspected of carrying contraband did not render moot the FLRA decision stating that the BOP was required to bargain with the employee union over proposals relating to safety issues arising out of the prison's use of metal detectors, absent a showing that there was no reasonable expectation that the union's safety concerns would not recur. The court found that the FLRA's determination that the BOP was required, under the Federal Service Labor-Management Relations Act (FSLMRA), to bargain with the labor union over a proposal that prison management have inmates turn in all watches that did not clear the compound metal detector, treat such watches as contraband, and assure that watches sold in the prison store would not set off the metal detectors, in order to avoid bottlenecks of inmates at the entrance to the compound/detector area, was eminently reasonable and supported by the record.

According to the court, the proposal was sufficiently tailored to target employees likely to be harmed by the installation of outdoor metal detectors, was intended to reduce nuisance alarms triggered by prohibited watches, thereby moving inmates through the compound-detector bottlenecks more quickly, and would not excessively interfere with the BOP's management rights. The court found that the FLRA determination that the labor union's proposal requiring construction of a block and mortar officer's station near one of the prison's two metal detectors was non-negotiable as a whole under FSLMRA. (Federal Bureau of Prisons Federal Correctional Complex Coleman, Florida)

U.S. Appeals Court
DISCIPLINE
FREE SPEECH
RETALIATION SUSPENSION
WORK RULES

Volkman v. Ryker, 736 F.3d 1084 (7th Cir. 2013). An employee at a correctional center brought a § 1983 action against various officials alleging retaliation in violation of the First Amendment arising from the issuance of a written reprimand and suspension following his comments to a state attorney regarding the criminal prosecution of a co-worker. The district court entered summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The employee appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the employee failed to show that a reasonable official would have known that to restrict or punish his speech regarding a co-worker's punishment was unconstitutional at the time of his discipline, as required for the employee to defeat a supervisors' claims of qualified immunity from the employee's § 1983 claim of retaliation in violation of his First Amendment speech rights. According to the court, the Illinois Department of Corrections' interests in suppressing the speech of a supervisor at a correctional facility regarding a co-worker's discipline outweighed the supervisor's interests in making the speech, and, thus, the supervisor's First Amendment speech rights were not violated when he was disciplined for such speech. The court noted that supervisors were tasked with enforcing rules and regulations, and when the supervisor criticized a disciplinary decision it undermined respect for the chain-of-command, and there was value in maintaining order and respect in the paramilitary context of a correctional center. (Lawrence Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
CONTRACTORS
SEARCHES

Vollette v. Watson, 937 F.Supp.2d 706 (E.D.Va. 2013). Former food service and medical care contractors who worked at a city jail brought an action against a sheriff, who oversaw the jail, and sheriff's deputies, alleging under § 1983 that their being required to undergo strip searches at the jail violated their Fourth Amendment rights, and that they were retaliated against, in violation of the First Amendment. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to what triggered the strip searches of contractors who worked at city jail, the nature of such searches, and the factual predicate for revocation of the contractors' security clearances. According to the court, at the time the contractors were strip searched, it was clearly established, for qualified immunity purposes in the contractors' § 1983 Fourth Amendment unlawful search action against the sheriff and sheriff's deputies, that prison employees did not forfeit all privacy rights when they accepted employment, and thus, that prison authorities were required to have reasonable and individualized suspicion that employees were hiding contraband on their person before performing a "visual body cavity search." The court also found that summary judgment as to the contractors' claims for false imprisonment and battery was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to what triggered the strip searches. (Aramark and Correct Care Solutions, Contractors, Portsmouth City Jail, Virginia)

U.S. District Court
CONTRACTORS
FREE SPEECH
RETALIATION
SEARCHES

Vollette v. Watson, 978 F.Supp.2d 572 (E.D.Va. 2013). Employees of private contractors providing services to inmates housed at a jail brought a § 1983 action against a sheriff and deputy sheriffs, alleging that they were subjected to unlawful strip and visual body cavity searches at the jail. The next business day after the suit was filed, the sheriff issued a blanket order revoking the security clearances of the contractor's employees who were still working at the jail. The district court denied the employees' motion for a preliminary injunction ordering the sheriff to reinstate their security clearances at the jail pending the outcome of the litigation. The district court also partially granted and partially denied the defendants' summary judgment motion. A jury decided the constitutionality of the strip searches. This left the First Amendment retaliation claim by six of the nine plaintiffs. The district court entered summary judgment for the plaintiffs on the retaliation claim. The court held that: (1) the contractor's employees suffered irreparable injury from the sheriff's revocation of their security clearances for which there was no adequate remedy at law; (2) the balance of hardships plainly weighed in favor of a permanent injunction; (3) the public interest would be enhanced by the entry of a permanent injunction; and (4) the plaintiffs demonstrated violation of their First Amendment rights, and the sheriff had to reinstate their security clearances and update any relevant internal jail records to reflect the same. The court noted that the sheriff's candid statements that he felt betrayed by the federal lawsuits filed by the employees who were subjected to strip searches for contraband, and that the suits "pushed [him] over the edge" were an admission that the adverse employment action of revoking the employees' security clearances was taken against them in response to their exercise of their First Amendment constitutional rights to free speech and to petition the government for redress of grievances. (Portsmouth City Jail, Virginia)

U.S. Appeals Court
SUPERVISION
TRAINING

Wilson v. Montano, 715 F.3d 847 (10th Cir. 2013). An arrestee brought a § 1983 action against a county sheriff, several deputies, and the warden of the county's detention center, alleging that he was unlawfully detained, and that his right to a prompt probable cause determination was violated. The district court denied the defendants' motion to dismiss. The defendants appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded in part. The detainee had been held for 11 days without a hearing and without charges being filed. The appeals court held that the defendants were not entitled to qualified immunity from the claim that they violated the arrestee's right to a prompt post-arrest probable cause determination, where the Fourth Amendment right to a prompt probable cause determination was clearly established at the time. The court held that the arrestee sufficiently alleged that the arresting sheriff's deputy was personally involved in the deprivation of his Fourth Amendment right to a prompt probable cause hearing, as required to support his § 1983 claim against the deputy. The arrestee alleged that he was arrested without a warrant, and that the deputy wrote out a criminal complaint but failed to file it in any court with jurisdiction to hear a misdemeanor charge until after he was released from the county's detention facility, despite having a clear duty under New Mexico law to ensure that the arrestee received a prompt probable cause determination. According to the court, under New Mexico law, the warden of the county's detention facility and the county sheriff were responsible for policies or customs that operated and were enforced by their subordinates, and for any failure to adequately train their subordinates. The court noted that statutes charged both the warden and the sheriff with responsibility to supervise subordinates in diligently filing a criminal complaint or information and ensuring that arrestees received a prompt probable cause hearing.

The court found that the arrestee sufficiently alleged that the warden promulgated policies that caused the arrestee's prolonged detention without a probable cause hearing, and that the warden acted with the requisite mental state, as required to support his § 1983 claim against the warden, regardless of whether the arrestee ever had direct contact with the warden. The arrestee alleged that the warden did not require filing of written criminal complaints, resulting in the detainees' being held without receiving a probable cause hearing, and that the warden acted with deliberate indifference to routine constitutional violations at the facility.

The court held that the arrestee sufficiently alleged that the county sheriff established a policy or custom that led to the arrestee's prolonged detention without a probable cause hearing, and that the sheriff acted with the requisite mental state, as required to support his § 1983 claim against the sheriff, by alleging that: (1) the sheriff allowed deputies to arrest people and wait before filing charges, thus resulting in the arrest and detention of citizens with charges never being filed; (2) the sheriff was deliberately indifferent to ongoing constitutional violations occurring under his supervision and due to his failure to adequately train his employees; (3) routine warrantless arrest and incarceration of citizens without charges being filed amounted to a policy or custom; and (4) such policy was the significant moving force behind the arrestee's illegal detention. (Valencia County Sheriff's Office, Valencia County Detention Center, New Mexico)

U.S. District Court
DISCRIMINATION
DISABILITY
CONTRACT NEGOTIA-TION
PHYSICAL REQUIRE-MENTS
TERMINATION

Yeager v. Corrections Corp. of America, 944 F.Supp.2d 913 (E.D.Cal. 2013). A former correctional employee brought an action against his private corrections employer, alleging failure to engage in a good faith interactive process, disability discrimination in violation of the California Fair Employment and Housing Act (FEHA), and FEHA retaliation. The employer moved for summary judgment and summary adjudication. The district court granted the motions in part and denied in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded in the employee's failure to engage in a good faith interactive process claim, by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether, under California law, there were reasonable accommodations available to the employee who sought them, due to a knee injury. The court also held that summary judgment was precluded on the employee's disability claim, due to genuine issues of material fact as to whether the employer's proffered reason for terminating the employee, that the employee did not pass a background check, was a pretext for disability discrimination. (Corrections Corporation of America, California City Correctional Center, California)

2014

U.S. Appeals Court
SEX DISCRIMINATION
BFOQ- Bona Fide Occupational Qualification
SUPERVISION

Ambat v. City and County of San Francisco, 757 F.3d 1017 (9th Cir. 2014). Current and former sheriff's deputies brought an action against a city and county, alleging various claims including retaliation and that a policy prohibiting male deputies from supervising female inmates in housing units of jails operated by the county violated Title VII and California's Fair Employment and Housing Act (FEHA). The district court granted the defendants' motion on gender discrimination claims and denied the plaintiffs' motion for reconsideration. The plaintiffs appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and vacated in part, and dismissed the appeal in part. The court held that the county was not entitled to summary judgment based on a bona fide occupational qualification (BFOQ) defense, in light of fact issues as to whether a reasoned decision-making process, based on available information and experience, led to the sheriff's adoption of the policy such that the policy would be entitled to deference. The court also found fact issues as to whether the policy of excluding male deputies because of their sex was a legitimate proxy for reasonably necessary job qualifications. The court noted that the primary justification for the policy was to protect the safety of female inmates by reducing the possibility of sexual harassment and abuse by male deputies, a secondary justification was that employing male deputies in female housing pods posed a threat to jail security because of a threat of manipulation, a tertiary justification was protecting the privacy interests of female inmates, and the final justification was promoting female inmates' rehabilitation. (San Francisco Sheriff's Department, California)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEX DISCRIMINATION
AGE DISCRIMINATION
RETALIATION
FMLA- Family Medical Leave Act

Doucette v. Morrison County, Minn., 763 F.3d 978 (8th Cir. 2014). A female former county employee who had served as an Assistant Jail Administrator brought an action in a state court against the county, alleging that her discharge constituted discrimination based on her sex and age, in violation of the Minnesota Human Rights Act (MHRA), that it was reprisal for filing a discrimination complaint, and that she was retaliated against for taking leave under the Family and Medical Leave Act (FMLA). Following removal to the federal courts, the district court granted in part and denied in part the county's motion for summary judgment. The employee appealed the grant of summary judgment on her MHRA claims. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that: (1) the county proffered a legitimate, nondiscriminatory reason for the employee's termination, namely, that the employee repeatedly made billing errors after being reminded of the importance of accuracy and receiving accommodations for her workload; (2) male employees were not similarly situated, for purposes of establishing pretext; (3) an alleged statement by the employee's supervisor was not direct evidence of sex-plus-age discrimination; and (4) evidence of a uniform break policy did not support the employee's sex-plus-age discrimination claim. (Morrison County, Minnesota)

U.S. Appeals Court
DISCRIMINATION
HARASSMENT
HOSTILE WORK
ENVIRONMENT
SUPERVISION

Ellis v. Houston, 742 F.3d 307 (8th Cir. 2014). African American corrections officers brought an action under § 1981 and § 1983 against prison administrators and supervisors, alleging race based harassment and retaliation, and disparate treatment. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The plaintiffs appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The court held that: (1) the officers had a subjective belief that the discrimination and harassment they experienced was severe and pervasive; (2) the officers established a broad pattern of harassment, and thus specific individual acts had to be viewed as illustrative; (3) the acts, comments, and inaction by a supervisor were purposeful and objectively actionable; (4) the officers suffered materially adverse consequences after they filed an official complaint, as required for a retaliation claim; (5) supervisors who permitted and participated in racially derisive remarks, and then assigned inferior work assignments, were not entitled to qualified immunity. The court noted that the officers experienced anxiety, dread, and panic attacks, they felt like they were being treated more like inmates than fellow officers, they initially enjoyed going to work but subsequently found their job to be depressing and anxiety-producing due to discrimination and harassment, they felt personally at risk because they no longer trusted that their fellow officers would come to their aid in a dangerous situation, and one officer's hair started to fall out from the stress he suffered. The officers had alleged that they experienced racist remarks on a near daily basis, that supervisors had been present and laughing without objection to statements made by others, and each officer became aware of offensive remarks even if each individual did not hear it first-hand. Supervisors allegedly acted to intensify the pattern of harassment of African American corrections officers after they filed an official complaint of a racially hostile environment, subsequently assigning them inferior or less desirable jobs, "papering" their files with reports on trivial or invented misconduct, and singling them out for additional work details and consistently forcing them to take unpopular details. The court held that these were materially adverse employment actions sufficient to support the officer's prima facie case of retaliation under § 1981.

The court found that a reasonable prison supervisor would have understood that permitting and participating in racially derisive remarks, and then assigning inferior work assignments for reporting such conduct, would have violated the rights of the African American corrections officers, and thus the supervisors who did permit and participate in racially derisive remarks, and then assigned inferior work assignments, were not entitled to qualified immunity to the officers' hostile work environment and retaliation claims under § 1981 and § 1983. (Nebraska State Penitentiary)

U.S. District Court
DISCRIMINATION
RETALIATION
SEX DISCRIMINATION

Gethers v. Harrison, 27 F.Supp.3d 644 (E.D.N.C. 2014). A female employee of a county detention center brought Title VII gender discrimination and retaliation claims against her employer after she was terminated for allegedly being untruthful regarding a situation in which she was present while a male detainee on suicide watch used the shower. The county moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion, finding that the employee failed to demonstrate that she was meeting job expectations or that she was engaged in a protected activity. The employee had been demoted for violating a detention center policy by being present while a male detainee on suicide watch showered naked despite the presence of two male officers, and for extracting the detainee from his cell by herself, creating a risk of danger. The court noted that the male detention officers who assisted male detainees on a suicide watch to shower were not similarly situated to the female detention officer who was also present, under the detention center's policy prohibiting officers of the opposite sex from being present while a detainee showered; the court noted that the proper comparison would be a male officer remaining in a shower area while a female prisoner showered, and there was no indication that such male officer would not also be punished. (Wake County Sheriff's Office, Detention Center, North Carolina)

U.S. District Court
FMLA- Family Medical Leave Act
LIGHT DUTY INJURY
WORKERS COMPEN-SATION

Gillman v. Okaloosa County Florida, 58 F.Supp.3d 1305 (N.D. Fla. 2014). A former county employee who had worked as a correctional officer and who had injured her hand and taken leave, brought an action against the county, alleging interference and retaliation under the Family and Medical Leave Act (FMLA). The employee had sustained an on-the-job injury when her right hand became lodged in a hydraulic door. She was transported to a hospital where she was treated for a crush injury to her right thumb. As a result of her injury, she was unable to perform many of the basic functions of her job, including tasks that required hand and finger manipulation. The county moved for summary judgment and the district court granted the motion. The court held that: (1) the county had no obligation under FMLA to place the employee in a light-duty position so that she could take FMLA leave intermittently, where the employee was not medically capable of performing her regular job duties; (2) the county's proffered reason for terminating the employee was not a pretext for FMLA retaliation; (3) the county's proffered reasons for refusing to place the employee in a light-duty position were not a pretext for FMLA retaliation; and (4) there was no causal connection between the employee's termination and her workers' compensation claim. The court noted that the county had no policy allowing for light duty, and the no designated light duty job existed for the employee's position, and that no light duty job was available when the employee requested it. (Okaloosa County Jail, Florida)

U.S. Appeals Court
FREE SPEECH
TERMINATION

Hurst v. Lee County, Miss., 764 F.3d 480 (5th Cir. 2014). A former corrections officer with a county sheriff's department brought an action against the county, alleging that termination of the officer's employment, based on the officer's violation of a department's media policy through unauthorized release of information to a newspaper reporter regarding the arrest of a state university's football player, violated his First Amendment right to free speech. The district court granted judgment as a matter of law to the county. The officer appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court found that statements that the corrections officer made to a newspaper reporter were ordinarily within the scope of the officer's duties, and thus, the officer's speech was not protected by the First Amendment. (Lee County Jail, Mississippi)

U.S. District Court WORKERS COMPENSATION
HARASSMENT

Nesvold v. Roland, 37 F.Supp.3d 1022 (W.D.Wis. 2014). The jail administrator for a county sheriff's office brought an action against his supervisor, the county sheriff, alleging assault within the assault exception to the exclusive remedy provision of Wisconsin's Worker's Compensation Act. The sheriff moved to dismiss. The district court denied the motion. The court held that the administrator's claims that the sheriff yelled at him, threatened to harm him physically, rushed at him, pointed a finger in his face, intended to restrain him physically, and that the administrator suffered nausea and emotional distress as a result, were sufficient to allege a physical assault, as required to state a claim under the assault exception to the exclusive remedy provision of Wisconsin's Worker's Compensation Act. (Burnett County, Wisconsin)

- U.S. District Court
HARASSMENT
FREE SPEECH
HOSTILE WORK EN-VIRONMENT
RETALIATION
- Aspinall v. Thomas*, 118 F.Supp.3d 664 (M.D. Pa. 2015). A former county correctional officer brought a § 1983 action against correctional officers, a deputy warden, and a warden, alleging that the officers' harassment constituted retaliation in violation of the free speech clause of the First Amendment. The officers, deputy warden, and warden moved to dismiss. The district court denied the motion. The court held that: (1) the officer's speech, regarding the alleged mistreatment and hostile work environment he suffered as the result of other officers' harassment, implicated a matter of public concern, as required to support the officer's First Amendment retaliation claim; (2) the officer's interest in commenting on a matter of public concern outweighed the government's interest in promoting workplace efficiency and avoiding workplace disruption, and thus the officer's speech was constitutionally protected as required to support a First Amendment retaliation claim; (3) the officer's factual allegations sufficiently established a causal relationship between protected speech and subsequent harassment by other officers, as required to state a First Amendment retaliation claim; and (4) the officer alleged sufficient facts to support a § 1983 claim against the deputy warden and the warden under the theory of supervisory liability for their alleged knowledge and acquiescence of other officers' alleged First Amendment retaliation, where the officer informed them of other officers' harassment and alleged retaliatory conduct, and they did not take any action. The court found that the defendants failed to demonstrate that the officer's First Amendment free speech rights were not clearly established at the time, as required for the officers, deputy warden, and warden to be entitled to qualified immunity. The court noted that the officer alleged an escalation in harassment after he lodged complaints about the harassment, and alleged that another officer subjected him to a barrage of insults and offensive statements after learning of the complaints. (Wayne County Correctional Facility, Pennsylvania)
- U.S. Appeals Court
FLSA- Fair Labor Standards Act BENEFITS
OVERTIME
- Babcock v. Butler County*, 806 F.3d 153 (3d Cir. 2015). A corrections officer brought a class action against a county, alleging that the county failed to properly compensate her and others similarly situated for overtime during mealtimes in violation of the Fair Labor Standards Act (FLSA). The district court dismissed the action. The corrections officer appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the officer received a predominant benefit of a 15 minute unpaid mealtime and was thus not entitled to receive compensation for it under the FLSA. The court noted that the predominant benefit test, which asks whether a law enforcement employee is primarily engaged in work-related duties during meal periods, is the appropriate standard for determining whether law enforcement employees' meal breaks are compensable time under FLSA. The court noted that during the 15 minute period, officers were not entitled to leave the prison without permission from the warden or deputy warden and were required to remain in uniform, in close proximity to emergency response equipment, and were on call to respond to emergencies. The officers' collective bargaining agreement (CBA), though silent on the compensability of the 15 minute period, provided officers with the benefit of a partially-compensated mealtime and mandatory overtime pay if the mealtime was interrupted by work. (Butler County Prison, Pennsylvania)
- U.S. District Court
CONTRACTOR
- Barouch v. United States Department of Justice*, 87 F.Supp.3d 10 (D.C.D.C. 2015). A prisoner who was convicted of bribing a public official and conspiracy to commit bribery moved for acquittal. The district court denied the motion, finding that evidence was sufficient to establish that the prisoner induced a prison official to assist in smuggling contraband. According to the court, the prisoner found a lucrative business opportunity in the institution's ban on tobacco and cell phones. He paid a prison nurse to smuggle this contraband into the prison and to look the other way when it came to reporting his illegal possessions to other prison authorities. The prisoner and nurse were eventually caught and prosecuted. Following a two-day jury trial, the prisoner was convicted. (Federal Bureau of Prisons, United States Penitentiary–Lee County, Virginia)
- U.S. Appeals Court
ADA- Americans with Disabilities Act
RACE DISCRIMI-NATION
GENDER DISCRIMI-NATION
TITLE VII
- Carothers v. County of Cook*, 808 F.3d 1140 (7th Cir. 2015). A former government employee, an African-American woman, brought an action against a county and the Office of Transitional Administrator, an agency that oversees the operation of a county juvenile detention center (JDC), alleging disability discrimination in violation of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), as well as race discrimination, sex discrimination, and retaliation in violation of Title VII. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The former employee appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that: (1) the employee was not disabled within the meaning of ADA; (2) evidence supported the determination that the employee's anxiety disorder did not prevent her from working with all children; (3) under the direct evidence theory, circumstantial evidence did not point to race discrimination; (4) the employee did not satisfy the legitimate expectations of her employer; (5) a Caucasian male comparator was not similarly situated, as required to establish race discrimination; and (6) the employee was not similarly situated to two male comparators, as required to establish sex discrimination. The court noted that in the two months preceding the employee's discharge, she refused to follow instructions regarding submitting required paperwork for her disability application, she did not schedule an appointment to return to work, the employee ignored reasonable requests to submit or re-submit missing documentation, and at time of her discharge she had exceeded the allowed number of unexcused absences by more than ten days. (Cook County Juvenile Detention Center, Illinois)
- U.S. District Court
TITLE VII
RETALIATION
SEARCHES
DISCRIMINATION
- Davis v. NYS Dept. of Corrections Attica Correctional Facility*, 110 F.Supp.3d 458 (W.D.N.Y. 2015). An African-American correctional employee, who was employed as a substance abuse counselor, brought an action against her former employer, alleging unlawful retaliation in violation of Title VII and state law. The district court granted the employer's motion for summary judgment. The court held that the employee did not engage in a protected activity, as required to establish retaliation under Title VII, when she complained that she believed she had been assigned a disproportionate number of minority and/or behaviorally difficult inmates. According to the court, the employee could not have reasonably believed that assignment of inmates constituted unlawful discrimination, given that the inmates were assigned based on release date, and the waiting list from which inmates were assigned did not identify race. According to the court, the alleged search of the employee's office following her complaints of being assigned a disproportionate number of minority and/or behaviorally difficult inmates, was not a materially adverse employment action. The court noted that searches at facility were routine due because the facility was a maximum security prison, areas were searched randomly, and all individuals were subject to visual inspection of bags. (Attica Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
UNION
CONTRACT

Doe v. Cook County, Illinois, 798 F.3d 558 (7th Cir. 2015). Detainees at a county juvenile detention center brought a class action against the center and the county, alleging that some employees at the center violated their constitutional rights by abusing their charges. The facility administrator, who was appointed to run the detention center as part of a settlement between the parties, proposed to terminate the employment of 225 direct-care employees and require them to apply to fill the new positions. The union for the employees intervened to oppose the administrator's plan, arguing that the proposal violated Illinois employment law by overriding the collective bargaining and arbitration statutes. The district court authorized the administrator to implement the plan. The union appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The appeals court held that the district court's approval of the administrator's plan was not a simple enforcement of the order appointing the administrator, and thus the district court was required pursuant to the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA) to make findings that the relief requested by the administrator was narrowly drawn, extended no further than necessary to correct the violation of a federal right, and was the least intrusive means. (Cook County Juvenile Temporary Detention Center, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
RETIREMENT

Duberry v. District of Columbia, 106 F.Supp.3d 245 (D.D.C. 2015). Retired correctional officers brought an action for injunctive and declaratory relief to compel the District of Columbia Department of Corrections (DOC), their former employing agency, to classify them as "retired law enforcement officers" under the federal the Law Enforcement Officers Safety Act (LEOSA) so that the officers could obtain current firearm certification required for them to carry concealed firearms across state lines. The District of Columbia moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion, finding that the LEOSA did not confer a right enforceable under § 1983 for officers that would compel the DOC to classify them as "retired law enforcement officers." (District of Columbia Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
ADA- Americans with Disabilities Act
FMLA- Family Medical Leave Act
LIGHT DUTY
DISCRIMINATION

Gibson v. Milwaukee County, 95 F.Supp.3d 1061 (E.D. Wis. 2015). Two county corrections officers, one who experienced severe migraine headaches, and one who had an autoimmune disorder, brought an action against a county alleging failure to accommodate them in violation of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), as well as interference and retaliation in violation of the Family Medical Leave Act (FMLA). The county moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the employee who could not work more than eight hours per day due to severe migraine headaches was not qualified for a temporary position of lieutenant in the county sheriff's department, and thus the county employer's rescinding of the employee's temporary appointment to a lieutenant position did not violate ADA. The court noted that an essential function of the position required employees to be able to work more than eight hours per day to handle emergent situations or to cover for sick employees.

The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine disputes of material fact as to whether the county employer discouraged employees from taking FMLA leave, and whether the decision to rescind the county employee's temporary promotion was due to his taking of FMLA leave.

The court found that the employer's refusal to move the correctional facility employee with temporary work restrictions, caused by her autoimmune condition, to light-duty assignments that did not require interaction with inmates, was a failure to accommodate, in violation of the ADA, notwithstanding that the employee's condition was not caused by her employment. According to the court, the county was prohibited under ADA from granting or denying an accommodation based on whether the employee's disability was associated with an on-the-job injury. (Milwaukee County Sheriff's Department, County Jail, Wisconsin)

U.S. District Court
TITLE VII
SEX DISCRIMINATION
MILITARY SERVICE
TERMINATION
PROBATION

Gipson v. Cochran, 90 F.Supp.3d 1285 (S.D.Ala. 2015). A former employee of a county sheriff's department, a female, who was also a member of the United States Air Force Reserve, brought an action against the sheriff alleging sex discrimination in violation of Title VII, and alleging violation of the Uniformed Services Employment and Reemployment Rights Act (USERRA). The sheriff allegedly extended the employee's probationary period to account for absences due to military training, and subsequently terminated her employment. The sheriff moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held the extension of the employee's probationary period, and the termination of her employment, did not violate USERRA. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a fact issues as to whether the decision to terminate was based on sex. (Mobile County Sheriff's Department, Alabama)

U.S. District Court
BENEFITS
CONTRACTORS

Gorman v. Rensselaer County, 98 F.Supp.3d 498 (N.D.N.Y. 2015). An employee in a county sheriff's department brought a § 1983 action against the county, sheriff, master sergeant, and the company which provided psychological evaluations for public safety agencies. The district court dismissed the action finding that under New York law, the employee did not a state claim for negligent misrepresentation against the company, whose psychologist performed an independent medical examination of the employee in connection with his applications for benefits while on medical leave. The court also held that the company was not a state actor for the purposes of the employee's § 1983 action. The court noted that although the company was contracted by the sheriff to perform an independent medical exam of the employee, the mere fact that a private actor was paid by state funds, or was hired by a state actor, was insufficient to establish a state action, and the employee's allegations that the company conspired or acted in concert with the county were wholly conclusory. (Rensselaer County Sheriff's Office, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
MARRIAGE

Riker v. Lemmon, 798 F.3d 546 (7th Cir. 2015). A female former prison worker brought an action against prison officials, alleging that the officials denied her request to marry an inmate in violation of her fundamental rights. The district court granted the officials' motion for summary judgment and the worker appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded, finding that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the prison’s decision to deny the worker’s request to marry an inmate was reasonably related to its legitimate penological interests. The worker had been an employee of Aramark Correctional Services, Inc. that operated and managed food services in the prison. She became involved with an inmate worker who was under her supervision. She quit her job after being discovered in a romantic relationship with the inmate. She was denied visiting privileges after she left her job. The former worker alleged that prohibiting her marriage to the inmate was an exaggerated response to the prison’s security objectives and that the prohibition was unnecessary for the maintenance of a safe and orderly institution. She emphasized that she only sought “a single visit to the institution, of a short duration, for the limited purpose of marrying her fiancé.” (Wabash Valley Correctional Facility, Indiana)

U.S. District Court
TITLE VII
SEXUAL HARASSMENT
WORKING CONDITIONS

Sanchez v. California, 90 F.Supp.3d 1036 (E.D.Cal. 2015). A female employee of the California Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation brought an action against her employer alleging violations of Title VII and the California Employment and Housing Act (FEHA), and against a coworker under § 1983, for alleged sexual harassment by the coworker. The parties consented to the jurisdiction of a magistrate judge and the defendants moved for summary judgment. The magistrate granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a fact issues as to whether the employer permitted conditions at work that allowed the employee to be harassed, and whether the employee established that the alleged adverse action was causally related to the complaints. (California Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation, California State Prison–Corcoran)

U.S. Appeals Court
EQUAL EMPLOYMENT

Story v. Foote, 782 F.3d 968 (8th Cir. 2015). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against four corrections officers for violation of his Fourth Amendment rights arising from a visual body-cavity search that allegedly took place in view of a female officer and other inmates, during which the officer allegedly called the inmate a derogatory name. The district court dismissed the case and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the visual body-cavity inspection search after the inmate returned to the correctional facility from outside the institution did not violate a clearly established right, as would preclude the qualified immunity defense, and the manner in which the search was conducted did not violate a clearly established right. According to the court, such a search was not unreasonable considering the serious security dangers inherent at a correctional institution and the institution’s strong interest in preventing and deterring the smuggling of contraband into the prison.

The court noted that the manner in which the search was conducted did not violate the inmate’s rights. The inmate alleged that a female officer observed the search on a video screen in a master control room, that the search was conducted in the presence of other inmates, and that the officer called him a “monkey” during the search. According to the court, there was a rational connection between the sex-neutral visual surveillance of inmates and the goal of prison security. The court found that the staffing adjustments that would have been necessary to prevent the female officer from viewing the search would have interfered with the female officer’s equal employment opportunities and burdened the prison. The court noted that the inmate did not allege that a more private, equally secure, and cost-effective means of conducting the search was available away from other inmates, and a single use of a term with potential racial overtones was not unconstitutional race discrimination. (Williams Correctional Facility, Arkansas)

□

U.S. Appeals Court
SEX DISCRIMINATION
BFOQ- Bona Fide
Occupational Qualification
TITLE VII

Teamsters Local Union No. 117 v. Washington Dept. of Corrections, 789 F.3d 979 (9th Cir. 2015). A union representing prison guards filed a Title VII complaint challenging the Washington Department of Corrections (WDOC) practice of designating certain positions as female-only in response to alleged sexual misconduct by male correctional officers and female inmates. The district court granted summary judgment to the WDOC and the union appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that WDOC’s policy rationales were reasonably necessary to the essence of prison administration, and gender was an objective, verifiable qualification for posts designated as female-only, which appropriately considered reasonable alternatives. Male correctional officers asserted they had suffered types of harm from the WDOC policy, most importantly lost overtime. The court noted that a facially discriminatory employment practice, such as a sex-based hiring practice, may pass legal muster if sex is a bona fide occupational qualification (BFOQ). According to the court, a Title VII bona fide occupational qualification (BFOQ) defense is written narrowly and has been read narrowly by the Supreme Court and applies to special situations where employment discrimination is based upon objective, verifiable requirements that concern job-related skills and aptitudes.

The appeals court decision began by stating: “For years, Washington faced problems common to a number of states in their women’s prisons: sexual abuse and misconduct by prison guards, breaches of inmate privacy, and security gaps. A primary driver, according to prison authorities, was the lack of female correctional officers to oversee female offenders and administer sensitive tasks, such as observing inmates showering and dressing and performing the pat (or “pat-down”) and strip searches that are stitched into the fabric of day-to-day prison life. After long wrestling with this gender gap, the state undertook a comprehensive assessment and ultimately designated a limited number of female-only correctional positions—specifically, 110 positions to patrol housing units, prison grounds, and work sites.”

The court was apparently surprised by one of the union’s experts. “Amazingly, one of the Union’s experts offered the following view: Female inmates cannot be shielded from the world in which we live. If they are to reintegrate into society, they have to be taught how to deal with abusive staff, male or female. They have to be taught what constitutes a healthy interaction and what does not. They cannot learn those skills if they are sheltered from contact with males in a position of authority. Sexual abuse is present in all areas of our society: in schools, (at all levels), business, government, military and families. Just as females have to be taught how to deal with those abuses in the larger society, female inmates must be taught as part of the rehabilitation process how to deal with all abusive staff: males and females, custody staff and civilian staff.” The court continued: “To state something so obvious we never imagined it would need to be written: we reject any suggestion that female prisoners would benefit from being subjected to abusive prison guards as ‘part of the rehabilitation process’ so that they may better ‘reintegrate into society.’” (Washington Department of Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
GENDER DISCRIMI-NATION POLITICAL AFFILIA-TION
PROMOTION

U.S. v. Rose, 802 F.3d 114 (1st Cir. 2015). A female deputy sheriff brought an action against a sheriff and a city-county consolidated government, alleging under § 1983 that the sheriff retaliated against her for her political support of the former sheriff's reelection bid, and that she was denied promotion and demoted based on gender. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants, in part, and denied the defendants' motion for summary judgment, in part. The deputy appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that political loyalty was an appropriate requirement for the effective job performance of a deputy sheriff, and the sheriff's proffered nondiscriminatory reason for transferring the female deputy and replacing her with a male deputy was not a pretext for gender discrimination. The sheriff asserted that he transferred the female sheriff's deputy from her position as supervisor of the jail and serving in the sheriff's command staff, and replacing her with male a deputy, because he was unsatisfied with ineffective lines of communication and other problems within the jail and wanted new management as part of his jail reorganization plan. (Columbus Consolidated Government, Muscogee County Jail, Georgia)

U.S. District Court
ADA- Americans with Disabilities Act
RETALIATION
CONTRACTORS

Velez-Ramirez v. Puerto Rico, 98 F.Supp.3d 388 (D.P.R. 2015). An independent contractor brought an action against the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, the Puerto Rico Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation (DOCR), the company that managed the provision of healthcare services for DOCR, and the company's secretary, alleging that failure to renew her professional services contract violated the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), the Rehabilitation Act, and Puerto Rico law. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The court held that the plaintiff was not qualified to work as a training and professional development coordinator, and the DOCR's failure to renew the plaintiff's contract was not a pretext for retaliating against her for seeking a reasonable accommodation for her diabetic retinopathy. (Bayamón Correctional Complex, Correctional Health Services Corporation, Puerto Rico)

2016

U.S. Appeals Court
TITLE VII
HARASSMENT
SEXUAL HARASSMENT
EQUAL OPPORTUNITY
HOSTILE WORK EN-VIRONMENT

Arizona ex rel. Horne v. Geo Group, Inc., 816 F.3d 1189 (9th Cir. 2016). The Arizona Civil Rights Division brought a state-court action, and the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC) brought a federal action, on behalf of a class of female employees who were working for a private company that operated correctional facilities. The plaintiffs alleged that the employer violated Title VII and Arizona Civil Rights Act (ACRA) protections against discrimination, harassment, and retaliation. One employee alleged that a male sergeant grabbed her crotch and pinched her vagina while she was at work. She filed an incident report with her employer but contended that the employer did not remedy the harassment. Five additional female correctional officers who witnessed or complained of sexual harassment were identified by state Civil Right Division. Even more female employees who were subjected to sexual harassment were identified when the Division interviewed current and former employees. The actions were consolidated in federal court and the district court granted the employer's motion for partial summary judgment. The Civil Rights Division and EEOC appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by fact issues on the claim of hostile work environment asserted on behalf of a particular employee. (GEO Group Inc., operating the Arizona State Prison, Florence West Facility, and the Central Arizona Correctional Facility ("CACF"))