N.Y. State Com'n of Correction v. Ruffo, 530 N.Y.S.2d 469 (Sup. 1988). The New York State Commission of Correction went to court seeking an order compelling a county and its sheriff to build an outdoor recreation area for inmates of the county jail and totransport inmates to the county's other jail facility for daily recreation while the new outdoor recreation area is being built. New York regulations, the Commission argued, provide that inmates be allowed to use recreation areas for a minimum of one hour a day and further requires that county jails provide an outdoor play area of a minimum of 1500 square feet to enable prisoners to engage in basketball, jogging, handball, weightlifting, calisthenics and other active recreation. The court found that the Commission had no authority to compel the county to construct a new facility. Further, the sheriff was not authorized by law to build a new jail or to raise taxes to fund a major renovation of the old one. The court did, however, grant the Commission an order directing the sheriff to transport prisoners to the county's other jail each day and allow each inmate one hour of outdoor recreation, not including travel time. Carapellucci v. Town of Winchester, 707 F.Supp. 611 (D. Mass. 1989). The administratix of a deceased pretrial arrestee's estate brought a civil rights action and state law claim against police officers and the town for violation of the eighth amendment right to medical treatment. On the motion for summary judgment, the federal district court found that in light of the similarity between the symptoms of drug ingestion and alcohol intoxication, the police officers and the town were not grossly negligent in failing to arrange for the medical treatment of the arrestee. Both the expert and the lay testimony were insufficient to raise a genuine issue of material fact. The court also found that the booking procedures recommended by the American Correctional Association were insufficient to determine what standard was applicable to the town jail. It was determined that the officers had qualified immunity, and under Massachusetts law, the police officers and the policy chief had immunity. The police officers' failure to supervise a pretrial arrestee was not an adequate basis for a finding of gross negligence or worse after the arrestee died in his cell from a prearrest drug ingestion, sufficient to impose liability on them, where the officers were unaware of a serious medical need. The symptoms of the arrestee were barely distinguishable from alcohol intoxication. The police officers' failure to give a blood test or a medical examination to a drunk driving arrestee was not grossly negligent or sufficient to impose liability following the arrestee's death. The evidence that was found was inadequate to show that the town was grossly negligent for failing to have a policy or facilities to allow for the treatment of the drunk driving arrestee who died in custody as a result of the previous ingestion of alcohol, glutethimide and large quantities of codeine; the lack of evidence that any agency used the expert's recommended procedures, or that any government unit had adopted the expert's suggested guidelines rendered the opinion insufficient. The difference of seven minutes from the recommended schedule for checking on an intoxicated pretrial arrestee would not support the finding of negligence, nonetheless gross negligence, after the arrestee died in his cell as the result of a prearrest drug ingestion. The jail's failure to have booking forms inquiring whether the arrestee had consumed medication or drugs was not evidence of gross negligence of a minimally accepted standard booking practice for holding jail facilities, notwithstanding the recommendation for the use of such forms by the American Correctional Association. Inmates of Occoquan v. Barry, 717 F.Supp. 854 (D.D.C. 1989). Inmates confined at a state prison brought a civil rights action seeking declaratory and injunctive relief. The judgment for the inmates, 650 F.Supp. 619, was vacated and remanded, 844 F.2d 828. Upon remand, the district court found that the prison conditions violated the inmates' eighth amendment rights, even though the District of Columbia had implemented a number of new procedures. The housekeeping manual was not followed, fire inspection was lacking, new evacuation plans had not been posted and proper training had not occurred. Sick call had been increased to five days from three days but had not cured other chronic problems. New procedures for medical problems, and new procedures for medical records transfers and follow-up had either not been implemented or had failed to work. The court also found that the housing of "protective custody" inmates in a block with punitive segregation inmates violated the protective custody inmates' eighth amendment rights, and inmates with mental health problems could not be housed with punitive segregation inmates. Officials at the medium security federal prison were prohibited from exceeding the current population at the facility pending renovation, and they were required to submit a written report on their proposals for correcting the constitutional violations in areas of sanitation, bathroom facilities, fire safety, health care, and staffing. The court of appeals also found error with the court's "continuous resort to the standards articulated by professional agencies in evaluating the constitutionality of the conditions at Occoquan." Benavides v. County of Wilson, 955 F.2d 968 (5th Cir. 1992). A former jail inmate and his spouse sued the county and the sheriff, seeking compensation for injuries sustained while the inmate was in the county jail. The U.S. District Court entered judgment for the sheriff and the county, and appeal was taken. The court of appeals, affirming the decision, found that the county jail inmate who was injured in a fall in his cell and was subsequently allowed to lie paralyzed for 18 hours without medical assistance being summoned, did not establish that the county and the sheriff had adopted a policy of improperly training jail personnel. The county and the sheriff had established compliance with state requirements for jailer personnel and the inmate had not shown, beyond conclusory statements of an alleged expert, that the standards were inadequate. McCoy v. Chesapeake Correctional Center, 788 F.Supp. 890 (E.D. Va. 1992). A pro se plaintiff brought a Section 1983 action against a city jail, alleging that he received inadequate medical treatment in violation of the Eighth Amendment. On the jail's motion for summary judgment, the district court found that the degree of state involvement in the administration of local jails in Virginia mandates that local jails be considered "arms of state" for Eleventh Amendment purposes and, thus, not "persons" under Section 1983; part of the cost of judgments against employees of local jails is born by the state, local jails receive substantial state funding, members of sheriff's office who administer jails are state officers, and state regulations sharply curtail local autonomy to run jails. Harris v. City of Philadelphia, 47 F.3d 1311 and 1333 and 1342 (3rd Cir. 1995). In a jail conditions case, appeals were taken from orders of the United States District Court assessing stipulated penalties against a city, directing production of a facilities audit required under a consent decree, declaring the city in contempt and dismissing a motion to modify the decree. The appeals court found that the imposition of penalties stipulated in the decree to be imposed for a delay in submitting planning documents "without any further direction from the Court," did not require notice and a hearing that would be required for a civil contempt sanction. In addition, the court was not required to find that there was no good cause for the city's delays for imposition of the penalties. Any additional cost if a facilities audit was submitted before the physical standards were approved did not make submission of the audit "impossible." (Philadelphia Prison System, Pennsylvania)

Masonoff v. DuBois, 899 F.Supp. 782 (D.Mass. 1995). Prison inmates filed a class action suit against prison officials alleging that conditions of confinement violated their rights under the Eighth Amendment. The district court granted summary judgment, in part, for the inmates. The court denied summary judgment for the prison officials with regard to fire safety issues raised by the inmates. Inmates alleged fire hazards caused by the lack of a functioning sprinkler system and the lack of automatic locks on cell doors, which are required by a state building code. Prison officials responded that the facility had implemented a rigorous fire safety program which mitigated any dangers imposed by these deficiencies. The court noted that while it may look to state codes in its effort to determine society's standard of decency, such standards do not necessarily reflect constitutional minima. Jones v. City and County of San Francisco, 976 F.Supp. 896 (N.D.Cal. 1997). Pretrial detainees brought a class action against the City and County of San Francisco and various city officials challenging the constitutionality of their conditions of confinement at a jail. The district court granted various summary judgment motions filed by the plaintiffs and the defendants, enjoining future overcrowding based on past unconstitutional overcrowding. The court found due process violations based on the defendants' inadequate response to fire safety risks at the jail, excessive risks of harm from earthquakes, physical defects in the jail's water, plumbing and sewage systems, excessive noise levels, and poor lighting.

Despite some efforts to reduce noise in the jail, the detainees established a constitutional violation in noise levels which ranged between 73 and 96 decibels, exceeding acceptable levels, and caused increased risk of psychological harm and safety concerns due to officers' inability to hear calls for help. The extent to which noise continued to exceed maximum standards suggested that previous noise reduction efforts were merely cosmetic and that far more could be done. The court found due process violations from poor lighting where correctional standards mandated lighting of at least 20 foot-candles in living areas, and some health standards required 30 foot-candles, but readings in the jail ranged from 0.28 to 5 foot-candles. An inmate brought an action against state prison officials alleging violation of his due process rights when they confiscated his prescription medication, and that they were deliberately indifferent to his serious medical needs. The district court entered judgment in favor of the defendants and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the inmate did not have a protected property interest in his medication under Wisconsin law. Although a Wisconsin statute required prison health service standards to be based on the American Medical Association (AMA) standards, the court found that the AMA standards only outlined requisite procedures and did not give the inmate a protected property interest in his prescription medication. The court also held that the inmate was not entitled to the appointment of an expert witness on his deliberate indifference claim, and that the district court had discretion to apportion all expert witness costs to one side. The court noted that the district court failed to recognize that it had the discretion to apportion all expert witness costs to one side, and cautioned against a narrow reading of Rule 706(b) that would hinder the court from appointing an expert witness whenever one of the parties is indigent. The district court granted summary judgment to the defendants, finding that the facility's policy of keeping pretrial detainees in the same housing unit as convicted inmates did not constitute deliberate indifference to a substantial risk of harm. The court also held that the lack of guidelines or training procedures regarding segregation of convicted inmates was insufficient to support claims for failure to supervise or failure to train. According to the court, a state statutory provision that indicated that sentenced prisoners should be housed separately from detainees was merely a recommended guideline rather than a mandatory requirement. Morales Feliciano v. Rossello Gonzalez, 13 F.Supp.2d 151 (D.Puerto Rico 1998). In an ongoing action against a corrections system seeking improvement of medical and mental health care provided to inmates, an expert witness prepared a report documenting the state of compliance with prior orders that had been entered. The district court held that the correctional system continued to violate inmates' Fifth, Eighth, and Fourteenth Amendment rights by failing to provide adequate medical care. The court found that the officials' actions or lack thereof contributed to the deaths of inmates and to the infliction of pain and suffering. The court ruled that there were systematic deficiencies in staffing, facilities, procedures and administration, and that officials acted in a manner that was deliberately indifferent to the basic human and health needs of inmates. The court concluded that the system had failed to provide adequate facilities and equipment necessary for the provision of adequate health care of inmates pursuant to acceptable professional standards. But the court noted that despite the findings of the expert, the National Commission on Correctional Health Care had accredited the medical care programs in four prisons and awarded provisional accreditation to four more in 1992. But an expert found noncompliance with at least one essential standard at every accredited facility, and the Department of Health provided the court monitor's staff with credible evidence that employees had falsified documents in support of accreditation. The district court found that prison officers were liable for First Amendment retaliation and that they were not entitled to qualified immunity. The court ruled that the prisoner was entitled to pre-judgment compounded interest for lost wages and for monetary awards for educational costs incurred because of the loss of financial aid. The court held that the officers filed false accusations against the prisoner after he met with prison officials to discuss the prison's violation of a state law that limited the number of hours that inmates were required to work. The prisoner was allegedly disciplined for instigating a work stoppage but the court found no evidence that a work stoppage occurred. The prisoner was restricted from his job in the prison kitchen and was transferred to another prison, depriving him of wages and forcing him to delay and alter his educational plans and to incur additional educational costs. The court ruled that the prisoner was not entitled to punitive damages because there was no evidence that the officers were motivated by evil motive or intent or that they acted with reckless or callous indifference to the prisoner's federally-protected rights. Grayson v. Peed, 195 F.3d 692 (4th Cir. 1999). The administrator for the estate of a deceased detainee sued officers and county officials under § 1983 asserting constitutional violations, negligence, gross negligence, negligent training and negligent supervision. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants on all § 1983 claims and declined to assume supplemental jurisdiction over state law claims. The appeals court affirmed. The detainee had been arrested and transported to the county detention center and the following day was declared brain dead. During his booking the detainee was acting irrationally, his speech was slurred, and he kept repeating in an intoxicated manner "I can't believe this is all over a traffic ticket." He was then taken to a cell and strip searched, but at the conclusion of the search attempted to crawl out of the cell and a struggle ensued. Officers used pepper spray to subdue him. Early the next morning the detainee began acting belligerent again. He resisted being moved to another cell and a five-man cell extraction team pinned him face down. During the struggle he was sprayed with pepper spray and he was punched several times. Once restrained, he was carried face down to another cell and was placed in four-point restraints. A few minutes later he appeared to be unconscious and was checked by medics and was found to be "okay." Another officer then noticed that the detainee was not breathing, CPR was initiated and he was taken to a local hospital where he was found to be brain dead. The appeals court held that officers at the county detention center were not deliberately indifferent to the medical needs of the deceased detainee, either when the detainee was booked or during his custody. A trained medic was on hand in the booking area and discerned no sign of a medical problem. According to the court, the failure to clean pepper spray off of the detainee in a timely manner was, in the first instance, due to the detainee's violent response to the officer's offer to wash the spray off, and in the second instance was due to the need to rush the detainee to a hospital for emergency care. The appeals court held that the officers did not use excessive force against the detainee, but rather that they applied the force necessary in a good faith effort to restore discipline. The court also found that there were no actionable deficiencies in the sheriff's policies, customs or training. According to the court, "...the appellant's own expert penologist conceded that [sheriff] Peed's policies met the standards of both the Virginia Board of Corrections and the American Correctional Association." The court also concluded, "...claims that [sheriff] Peed provided inadequate training for his employees must also fail. As of the time of this incident, the ADC had been accredited for more than ten years by both the American Correctional Association and the National Commission on Correctional Health Care, two organizations whose training requirements often surpass minimal constitutional standards." Newby v. District of Columbia, 59 F.Supp.2d (D.D.C. 1999). A female inmate brought a § 1983 action alleging that she had been forced to participate in sex shows. The district court held that the District of Columbia violated the inmate's rights by failing to actively supervise improper sexual activities involving the entire prison population. The court noted that the District had a duty not only to train its officers in matters related to sexual contact between prison officers and inmates, but also to actively devise and implement a system of supervision of its first level of correctional officers in accordance with law. The district court held that the inmate stated a claim of a serious injury and that an official's failure to procure adequate medical treatment after becoming aware of the injury would constitute deliberate indifference. The court also found that supervisors would not be liable for any claims arising from negligent supervision or training of a guard. The correctional official allegedly told the inmate that he could not be taken to a hospital and instructed another inmate to manually relocate the shoulder. (Schuylkill Co. Prison, Penn.)

A state inmate who had been raped by a correctional officer and became pregnant as a result, sued prison officials under § 1983 and the Violence Against Women Act (VAWA). The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court held that the inmate failed to establish that the officials had been deliberately indifferent to her health and safety, even though they had previously investigated the correctional officer for taking female inmates outside their cells after lockdown. The court found that the inmate failed to establish a failure to train violation because the prison's training programs were found to be sufficient under national standards promulgated by the American Correctional Association. The offending officer had received an adequate number of training hours and the prison had received an award of excellence for its training programs. The officer's training had included training in cultural awareness, which included training in sexual harassment and inmate treatment, and he was trained regarding the prison's code of conduct, which prohibited sexual contact between inmates and guards. The court noted that personnel training standards for correctional institutions that were promulgated by national groups do not necessarily equate with the training standards required by the Eighth Amendment. According to the court, while the recommendations of such groups may be instructive in certain cases they simply do not establish constitutional minima, but rather establish goals recommended by the organization. After removing the action the city moved for summary judgment, which the district court granted. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the city was not deliberately indifferent to the welfare of pretrial detainees. According to the court, even though the city continued to place detainees in cells containing horizontal metal bars despite past suicides by detainees using the bars, there was no evidence that anyone had knowledge that this detainee was suicidal. The court noted that the facility used a thorough screening process and took precautions to protect detainees from the risk of suicide, facility personnel received suicide awareness training, cells were checked every fifteen minutes--which "far exceeds" the hourly checks required in state municipal jail standards, dangerous items were removed the detainees' possession, and cell construction was authorized by state standards. The district court granted summary judgment for the jail officials and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that evidence was insufficient that jail officials were deliberately indifferent, even though intake officers had little training and relied on a checklist that was deficient in several areas. The court noted that the officers were making a judgment that was not likely to be assisted by special training and that the jail was in compliance with the state's minimum standards for suicide prevention. The appeals court also held that the evidence offered by an expert witness was "useless" and should have been excluded. The court found that the new jails' environment, sanitation and fire safety complied with the Eighth Amendment, providing adequate levels of personal security for inmates and staff. The court held that food service was adequate and acceptable and that there was adequate physical space available for recreation. The court noted that two of the four jails had achieved accreditation by the American Correctional Association and the other two had applied, and would also probably receive accreditation. The court called the jail administration at the time of the 1987 suit "a brutal and corrupt regime" The court praised the government's correctional experts who assisted the county, and the plaintiffs' counsel "for the enormous service she has performed for the class of plaintiffs and the community." The district court found that a number of conditions violated the Eighth Amendment and issued an injunction designed to alleviate the conditions. The defendants appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part and vacated in part. The court held that the prison's accreditation by a national correctional association (American Correctional Association) was not proof that the conditions of confinement did not violate the Eighth Amendment. The court noted that compliance with association standards could be a relevant consideration, but was not evidence of constitutionality. The court held that evidence supported findings that the probability of heat-related illness was extreme at the death row unit in which the class members were housed, and that corrections officials had displayed deliberate indifference. A prisoner brought an action against a county and a jail official, alleging deliberate indifference to his safety, negligent supervision, and negligent infliction of emotional distress. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court held that a lack of monitoring devices in jail cells did not pose an objectively substantial risk of harm to the inmate, particularly in light of the fact the state Model Jail Standards did not require cameras. The court found that the inmate presented no evidence that the officer posts were located so far that officers could not hear calls for help. The court held that the county was not liable under § 1983, even if jail officers did not actually follow the county policy of making hourly walk-throughs to monitor cells, where there was no evidence that the county had officially sanctioned or ordered the officers to disregard the county policy. The prisoner had been temporarily transferred from a state prison to the county jail in order to be involved in a family court matter. Harvey v. County of Ward, 352 F.Supp.2d 1003 (D.N.D. 2005). The surviving spouse of a jail inmate who died after a suicide attempt brought an action under § 1983 and state law, alleging deliberate indifference to the inmate's known risk of suicide. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The district court held that the plaintiff failed to establish that the sheriff and jail administrator knew of the inmate's potential risk of suicide. According to the court, evidence of conversations between the spouse and jail employees about the inmate's suicide risk, an officer's note that the inmate's wife thought that they should keep an eye on the inmate, and another officer's report that the inmate may have been trying to save up some of his medications to take at another time, was insufficient to establish that the sheriff and jail administrator knew of the inmate's potential risk of suicide. The court found that the county was not deliberately indifferent to the training of its employees on inmate suicide prevention. The court held that the jail's suicide prevention policy appeared reasonable and comprised an effort to prevent suicides, even if the policy had not been updated in recent years, and the jail was not accredited by the American Correctional Association (ACA). The court noted that the policy set forth a detailed list of factors to identify potentially suicidal inmates, set forth a procedure for identification and screening of inmates, and required ongoing training in the implementation of suicide prevention and intervention for all staff. Nicholas v. Goord, 430 F.3d 652 (2nd Cir. 2005). Convicted felons brought a § 1983 action against state officials and others, arguing that a state DNA-database statute violated their Fourth Amendment rights. The district court dismissed the action and the felons appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the extraction and analysis of convicted felons' blood for DNA-indexing purposes constituted a search that implicated the Fourth Amendment, but that this search was justified under the "special needs" exception. Shape v. Barnes County, N.D., 396 F.Supp.2d 1067 (D.N.D. 2005). A county employee who was demoted from a position of Chief Correctional Officer and then terminated shortly after he filed a grievance sued a county and sheriff alleging discrimination, retaliation, and free speech and due process violations. The district court held that the employee failed to prove that he was "disabled" by his attention deficit disorder for the purposes of a state human rights claim, absent evidence that his claimed disorder substantially limited his ability to perform either a class of jobs or a broad range of jobs. The court found that the employee established a prima facie case for retaliatory discharge under a state whistleblower statute and that genuine issues of material fact existed as to whether the county's proffered non-retaliatory reasons for his discharge were pretextual. The court also found issues of material fact as to whether the employee's grievance was a substantial factor in the termination decision, and whether the employee was provided with an impartial grievance committee. Tardiff v. Knox County, 397 F.Supp.2d 115 (D.Me. 2005). A class action suit was brought against a county, its sheriff, and jail officers claiming that the Fourth Amendment rights of some detainees were violated when they were subjected to strip searches without reasonable suspicion that they were harboring contraband on or within their bodies. The district court held that the county violated the Fourth Amendment by adopting a policy that allowed for strip searches of all detainees alleged to have committed felony offenses, although the sheriff was granted qualified immunity because the law on this matter was not clearly established at the time the policy was implemented. The policy provided for the strip-searching of all detainees alleged to have committed non-violent, non-weapon, non-drug felonies. The court found that the county and the sheriff were liable for a policy that called for the strip searches of detainees alleged to have committed misdemeanors, without reasonable suspicion. According to the court, the sheriff was responsible, in his individual capacity, for Fourth Amendment violations arising from strip searches of all detainees alleged to have committed misdemeanors without a showing of reasonable suspicion that they were harboring contraband on or within their bodies. The court found that the sheriff was aware of the custom of these universal strip searches and did not take effective action to halt the practice. The court noted that specific standards that described which strip searches may be undertaken in jails and prisons had been issued by the state attorney general. The state corrections department had conducted a review of the jail's policy and procedure manual and informed the sheriff that the policy pertaining to body searches needed to be revised to comply with the attorney general's rules for searches. Blankenship v. Virginia, 432 F.Supp.2d 607 (E.D.Va. 2006). The mother of a ward of a juvenile correction center who was permanently disabled after being beaten by two fellow inmates, brought a § 1983 civil rights action against the center's former superintendent, former assistant superintendent, and former counselor for failing to protect the ward. The defendants filed a motion for summary judgment. The district court held that: (1) the superintendent and assistant superintendent could not be held liable under § 1983 based on constructive knowledge of the threat against ward; (2) the fact that the juvenile correction center had been decertified by the Virginia Board of Juvenile Justice, standing alone, did not necessarily confer on the superintendents the knowledge as to the ongoing and substantial risk of harm to residents, as was required to hold them liable under § 1983; (3) evidence indicating a deficiency in the center's record management capabilities did not suggest a willful disregard for the safety of the wards; and (4) a counselor responded reasonably to ensure the ward's safety when the ward was moved to the more secure isolation pod. Flanyak v. Hopta, 410 F.Supp.2d 394 (M.D.Penn. 2006). A state prison inmate filed a § 1983 Eighth Amendment action against the supervisor of the unit overseeing prison jobs and against the prison's health care administrator, alleging that he had been subjected to unsafe conditions while working as a welder. The inmate also alleged that the administrator had been deliberately indifferent to his medical needs arising from those conditions. The defendants moved for summary judgment and the district court granted the motion. According to the court, the supervisor of the state prison unit overseeing prison jobs was not shown to have known of and disregarded a risk to the inmate who had chronic obstructive pulmonary disease, from dust and smoke accompanying his work as a welder, precluding recovery in the inmate's § 1983 Eighth Amendment action against the supervisor alleging unsafe working conditions. The inmate did not complain directly to the supervisor about his working conditions or file a grievance relating to those conditions and declined to wear a dust mask he was given. The court noted that the prison's accreditation required compliance with safe-working-area standards. (State Correctional Institution at Mahanoy, Pennsylvania)

Fox v. Lappin, 409 F.Supp.2d 79 (D.Mass. 2006). A federal prisoner brought suit against the Director of the Federal Bureau of Prisons and a warden, seeking declaratory judgment that his classification as a sex offender based on a 1981 state sexual assault conviction was improper. The prisoner also challenged the Bureau's failure to consider him for community center placement based on his failure to participate in a sex offender program. The district court held that a federal prisoner cannot be designated as a sex offender based on a state sex offense for purposes of the federal statute requiring that notice be given to state and local authorities of an inmate's release if the inmate has been designated as a sex offender, and that designated sex offender register in the state in which he will reside, because the Attorney General's authority under the statute is limited to designating federal offenses as sex offenses. The court found that as a matter of inmate classification, a prisoner's classification as a sex offender on basis of state sexual assault conviction was not an abuse of discretion. The court held that the BOP policy that categorically excludes inmates with sex offender safety factors from placement in community corrections centers is a permissible interpretation of the rule and that the BOP did not abuse its discretion in denying an inmate designated as a sex offender placement in a community corrections center based on his failure to participate in a mandatory sex offender program. The court noted that the federal statute governing pre-release custody of a federal prisoner does not create a liberty interest in the prisoner's transfer to the less restrictive environment of community center placement, as the statute does not mandate community center placement nor any placement in a less restrictive environment, it merely insures placement under pre-release conditions except where no such placement is practicable. Giarratano v. Johnson, 456 F.Supp.2d 747 (W.D.Va. 2006). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against the director of a state corrections department, challenging the constitutionality of a statutory exclusion of prisoners from making requests for public records under the Virginia Freedom of Information Act (VFOIA). The district court dismissed the action. The court held that the statutory exclusion of prisoners from making requests for public records under the Virginia Freedom of Information Act (VFOIA) was rationally related to a legitimate state interest, and thus, it did not violate the inmate's right to equal protection. The court noted that the Virginia General Assembly, in passing the exclusion, could have believed that inmates were intrinsically prone to abusing VFOIA request provisions and that such frivolous requests would unduly burden state resources, or that inmates had less need to access public records because their confinement greatly limited the amount of contact they had with state government. (Red Onion State Prison, Virginia)

Grayson v. Ross, 454 F.3d 802 (8th Cir. 2006). The personal representative of the estate of a pretrial detainee who died following self-mutilation while incarcerated in a jail, brought a civil rights action against the county sheriff, the arresting police officer, and jailers in their individual and official capacities alleging violation of the pretrial detainee's right to medical treatment and to due process. The district court granted judgment for the defendants and the estate appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part. The court held that: (1) the detainee did not have an objectively serious medical need on intake from the perspective of the arresting police officer, as a layperson; (2) the arresting police officer did not subjectively know that the detainee required medical attention; (3) a reasonable police officer would not have known on intake that the pretrial detainee had an objectively serious medical need; (4) the detainee did not have an objectively serious medical need on intake from the perspective of the jailer, as a layperson; (5) the jailer did not subjectively know that the detainee required medical attention; (6) a reasonable jailer would not have known on intake that the pretrial detainee had an objectively serious medical need; (7) the county did not have an official practice of booking inmates who were hallucinating without providing medical care; and (8) the district court did not abuse its discretion by excluding the Arkansas State Jail Standards from evidence in the trial, as the jail standards did not represent minimum constitutional standards. Kaucher v. County of Bucks, 455 F.3d 418 (3rd Cir. 2006). A corrections officer filed suit under § 1983 against a county and several county employees responsible for the operation of a correctional facility, alleging violation of his substantive due process rights, contending he contracted a Methicilin Resistant Stapylococcus Aureus (MRSA) infection as a result of the defendants' conscience-shocking behavior in creating unsanitary and dangerous conditions at the facility. The district court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment, and the officer appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that: (1) the alleged inadequate remedial and preventative measures to stop the spread of MRSA within the correctional facility did not rise to a level of deliberate indifference that could be characterized as conscience shocking, and (2) the facility's alleged failure to act affirmatively to improve conditions at the jail and alleged failure to act affirmatively to educate and warn inmates and corrections officers about MRSA infections and to train them in infection prevention were not the cause of the corrections officer's infection. The court noted that the state corrections department found the jail to be substantially in compliance with state standards, giving the defendants reason to believe their measures were adequate, only two of 170 corrections officers tested positive for colonization of the infection, and the facility had in place policies and procedures to ensure sanitary conditions in the jail, including requirements that cells be regularly cleaned with an all-purpose detergent and that showers be disinfected with a bleach and water solution. Michael v. Ghee, 411 F.Supp.2d 813 (N.D.Ohio 2006). Ohio "old law" inmates serving indeterminate sentences brought a § 1983 action, alleging that the state's parole system was unconstitutional. The state moved to dismiss and for summary judgment. The district court granted summary judgment for the state. The court held that the inmates had no valid procedural due process claim and that the state had rational reasons, satisfying equal protection, for requiring "old law" inmates to continue to serve their indeterminate sentences, subject to parole board determinations, after the law was changed to provide for exact sentences and the elimination of parole. According to the court, the parole guidelines promulgated in 1998 had a rational basis and the parole guidelines were not laws, subject to the ex post facto clause. The court noted that state law makes parole discretionary, and therefore inmates do not have a due process liberty interest in parole under state law. Since the inmates did not have a liberty interest in parole itself, they could not have a liberty interest in parole consideration or other aspects of parole procedures, and thus had no procedural due process claim. The court found that the state had several rational reasons, satisfying equal protection, for requiring so-called "old law" inmates to continue to serve their indeterminate sentences. The reasons included the desire to avoid retroactive legislation and alteration of sentences, to give "old law" inmates an incentive to obey prison regulations, and to acknowledge the seriousness of the convicted offenses. Rentz v. Spokane County, 438 F.Supp.2d 1252 (E.D.Wash. 2006). The personal representatives of the estate of a pretrial detainee, who was murdered by two fellow pretrial detainees in a county jail, sought recovery of damages from county defendants under Washington's wrongful death and survival statutes. Parents and siblings, as beneficiaries of the estate, also sought recovery of damages. The court granted partial summary judgment for the defendants. The court held that neither the parents nor the siblings could recover under Washington's wrongful death and survival statutes, but that the parents could seek recovery from the county defendants under § 1988 for violations of the detainee's constitutional rights. The court also held that the parents were entitled to assert Fourteenth Amendment substantive due process causes of action against the county defendants to vindicate their constitutional rights for loss of companionship with their adult son, but the siblings were not. The court allowed the plaintiffs to amend their complaint to include the jail officers and a jail nurse because they were allegedly involved with the placement of the detainee in the same jail dormitory as the individuals who murdered him. Sickles v. Campbell County, Kentucky, 439 F.Supp.2d 751 (E.D.Ky. 2006). Inmates, former inmates, and relatives and friends of inmates brought a § 1983 action against counties, alleging that the methods used by the counties to collect fees imposed on prisoners for the cost of booking and incarceration violated the Due Process Clause. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court held that the Kentucky statute authorizing county jailers to adopt prisoner fee and expense reimbursement policies did not require that prisoners be sentenced before fees could be imposed, and that due process did not require a pre-deprivation hearing before prison fees were assessed. According to the court, the First Amendment rights of non-prisoners who contributed funds to prisoners' accounts were not violated. The court noted that the statute authorized jails to begin to impose fees, and to deduct them from prisoners' canteen accounts, as soon as prisoners' were booked into the jail. STATE REGULATIONS

Edwards v. Pa. Bd. of Prob. & Parole, 523 F.Supp.2d 462 (E.D.Pa. 2007). A prisoner filed a § 1983 suit, seeking injunctive and declaratory relief against a Board of Probation and Parole, claiming violations of the Ex Post Facto Clause and Eighth Amendment, and asserting that his parole was denied in retaliation for exercising his constitutional rights. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the board. The court noted that the Ex Post Facto Clause applies to a statute or policy change that alters the definition of criminal conduct or increases the penalty by which a crime is punishable. Under Pennsylvania law, although parole is an alteration of the terms of confinement, a parolee continues to serve his unexpired sentence until its conclusion. According to the court, under Pennsylvania law, a "parole" is not an act of clemency but a penological measure for the disciplinary treatment of prisoners who seem capable of rehabilitation outside of prison walls; parole does not set aside or affect the sentence, and the convict remains in the legal custody of the state and under the control of its agents, subject at any time for breach of condition to be returned to the penal institution. The court held that denial of the prisoner's re-parole by Board of Probation and Parole, after his conviction as a parole violator, was not re-imposition of the prisoner's unexpired life sentence, in violation of the Ex Post Facto Clause, but rather, under Pennsylvania law, the prisoner's sentence was not set aside by his parole. According to the court, the prisoner remained in the legal custody of the warden until expiration of his sentence, and the prisoner had no protected liberty interest beyond that of any other prisoner eligible to be considered for parole while serving out the remainder of a maximum sentence. The court held that changes to the Pennsylvania Parole Act did not create a significant risk of increasing the prisoner's punishment in violation of the Ex Post Facto Clause, based on the Board of Probation and Parole's denial of the prisoner's re-parole due to factors of prior parole failures and lack of remorse, since the relative weight of such factors in the parole calculus of amendments to the Parole Act did not change, and the prisoner produced no evidence that the change in the Parole Act had any effect on the Board's decision. Hendon v. Ramsey, 528 F.Supp.2d 1058 (S.D.Cal. 2007). A state inmate filed a § 1983 action alleging that prison medical officials involuntarily administered anti-psychotic medications without following proper procedures and in deliberate indifference to his medical needs. The officials moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the involuntary administration of anti-psychotic medications to the inmate did not demonstrate deliberate indifference to the inmate's serious medical needs, as required to establish an Eighth Amendment violation, where the officials administered the drugs in an attempt to treat the inmate's mental health crisis. But the court held that the post-deprivation remedies available to the California inmate after the officials forcibly administered anti-psychotic drugs were insufficient to protect the inmate's due process liberty interest in being free from involuntary medication. According to the court, although state law established procedural safeguards before inmates could be involuntarily medicated, the prison officials allegedly disregarded their duty to comply with those established pre-deprivation procedures. The court found that the inmate's right to be free from arbitrary administration of anti-psychotic medication was clearly established by existing case law in 2002, the time of this incident, and therefore state prison officials were not entitled to qualified immunity from liability. Jackson v. Russo, 495 F.Supp.2d 225 (D.Mass. 2007). A prisoner brought a suit against prison officials claiming that compensation and good time credits awarded to him for participation in a barber program violated his due process and equal protection rights. The prisoner moved for summary judgment, and the defendants moved to dismiss for failure to state a claim. The district court granted the motions in part and denied in part as moot. The court held that the prisoner had no constitutionally created right to conduct business while incarcerated or to receive payment by the prison for services he provided to other inmates as part of a barber vocational program. According to the court, Massachusetts statutes that authorize the corrections commissioner to provide for education, training and employment programs and to establish a system of inmate compensation did not create a protected property interest for inmates in any job or in compensation for a job, for the purposes of a due process claim. The court noted that authorization was dependent on several contingencies, including appropriation of funds, and conferred complete discretion upon the commissioner over programs. The court held that the corrections commissioner's refusal to award additional good time credits to the inmate who enrolled in the barber school, beyond awards granted in 2.5 day increments for participation in various programs, did not create an atypical prison hardship, so as to give rise to an interest protected by due process. The court noted that the prisoner was not unfairly denied the opportunity to participate in other prison activities that might have earned him more credits. According to the court, the prisoner had no constitutional, statutory, or regulatory right to good time credits. The court found that a rational basis existed for differences in levels of compensation received by state prison barbers and kitchen workers in prison vocational programs, based on difficulties in recruiting prisoners, hours, and the demanding nature of the culinary arts program, such that the lesser compensation received by the prisoner enrolled in the barber training program and providing services to other inmates did not violate equal protection. Pennsylvania Prison Soc. v. Cortes, 508 F.3d 156 (3rd Cir. 2007). State prisoners, several non-profit advocacy and prisoner rights groups, and several state voters and qualified taxpayers brought an action challenging amendments to the Pennsylvania constitution changing the composition of Board of Pardons and voting requirements for obtaining a pardon or commutation of sentence. The district court granted in part and denied in part the parties' cross-motions for summary judgment. The parties appealed. The appeals court dismissed and remanded. The court held that the parties did not have standing. According to the court, evidence tended to show that the absolute number of Board of Pardon recommendations for commutations had decreased after amendments to the Pennsylvania constitution changed the composition of the Board and voting requirements for obtaining a pardon or commutation of sentence, but this failed to meet the causation element for standing to challenge the constitutionality of amendments, where the decrease had begun two years prior to the amendments. Pruett v. Harris County Bail Bond Bd., 499 F.3d 403 (5th Cir. 2007). Bail bondsmen brought a civil rights action challenging a Texas statute restricting solicitation of potential customers, claiming it was a denial of their First Amendment rights. The district court granted partial summary judgment in favor of the bondsmen and awarded $50,000 in attorney fees. The defendants appealed and the bondsmen cross-appealed the award of fees, requesting more. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, vacated in part, and remanded. The court held that: (1) the court could consider evidence generated after enactment of the statute; (2) the provision of the statute that restricted solicitation by bail bondsmen of persons subject to an unexecuted arrest warrant by preventing solicitation unless the bondsman had a prior relationship with the party violated the First Amendment; (3) the provision of the statute that prohibited bail bondsmen from calling potential customers for 24 hours after an offender's arrest violated the First Amendment; (4) the provision of the statute that prohibited bail bondsmen from contacting potential customers between 9:00 p.m. and 9:00 a.m. did not violate the First Amendment; (5) the provision of the statute that prohibited bail bondsmen from contacting potential customers between 9:00 p.m. and 9:00 a.m. was not unconstitutionally vague; and (6) the defendants failed to show special circumstances warranting reduction or preclusion of the attorney fee award. Wilson v. Wilkinson, 608 F.Supp.2d 891 (S.D.Ohio 2007). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against state officials, challenging the constitutionality of a state statute requiring the collection of DNA specimens from convicted felons. The parties cross-moved for summary judgment. The district court held that the collection of a DNA specimen was not an unreasonable search and seizure, and that a DNA sample did not implicate the prisoner's Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination. The court noted that law enforcement's interest in obtaining DNA for a database to solve past and future crimes outweighed the prisoner's diminished privacy rights. According to the court, the prisoner did not have a fundamental privacy interest protected by substantive due process in the information contained in a DNA sample and the profile obtained pursuant to the state statute. The court noted that the prisoner, as a convicted felon, did not enjoy the same privacy rights as did ordinary citizens. Two county inmates who were ordered released after being found not guilty of the charges against them brought an action individually and on behalf of a class against a county sheriff and county, challenging the constitutionality of a policy under which male inmates, in the custody of the Cook County Department of Corrections (CCDC), were subjected to strip searches upon returning to CCDC after being ordered released. The district court held that male inmates in the custody of CCDC who were potentially discharged were similarly situated to female potential discharges, as supported the male inmates' claim that the county's policy of strip searching all male discharges and not all female discharges violated the Equal Protection Clause. The court held that the CCDC exhibited discriminatory intent in strip searching all male inmates who were potentially discharged and not all female discharges, as supported the male inmates' claim that the county's strip search policy violated the Equal Protection Clause. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether delays of eight and eight-and-a-half hours in releasing inmates from CCDC after they received court-ordered discharges were reasonable. The court noted that an Illinois Administrative Code (IAC) provision stating that "detainees permitted to leave the confines of the jail temporarily, for any reason, shall be thoroughly searched prior to leaving and before re-entering the jail" did not mandate strip searches, just that inmates be "thoroughly searched." A federal prisoner filed a § 2241 petition for a writ of habeas corpus, challenging the Parole Commission's decision to impose successive terms of special parole after the prisoner's original special term of parole was revoked. The district court granted the petition, finding that the Parole Commission could not reimpose a successive term of special parole. The court noted that special parole is different from regular parole in three aspects: (1) it follows the term of imprisonment, while regular parole entails release before the end of the prison term; (2) it is imposed, and its length is selected by the sentencing judge, rather than by the Parole Commission; and (3) if the conditions of special parole are violated, the parolee is returned to prison to serve the entire parole term, and he does not receive credit for the time spent in non-custodial supervision. Hervey v. County of Koochiching, 527 F.3d 711 (8th Cir. 2008). A female jail administrator brought an action under Title VII and the Minnesota Human Rights Act (MHRA), alleging that her employer and her supervisors discriminated against her on the basis of her gender and retaliated against her for participation in a protected activity. The plaintiff also alleged that her employer was liable for violations of the Minnesota Government Data Practices Act (MGDPA). The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants, and the plaintiff appealed. The appeals court affirmed and remanded with directions to modify the final judgment so as to dismiss the MGDPA claim without prejudice, so that it may be considered, if at all, by the courts of Minnesota. The court held that the female jail administrator failed to demonstrate that her supervisors took away many of her major responsibilities and twice suspended her without pay because of her gender, in violation of Title VII and the Minnesota Human Rights Act (MHRA). The court noted that although the supervisors allegedly changed the management structure of the sheriff's office without approval of county board, nothing about this change in management structure supported the inference that subsequent action taken by a new management team were based on gender. The court found that the administrator failed to establish that similarly situated male employees were not punished as severely for their misconduct as she was, and that this differential treatment constituted a submissible case of discrimination based on sex under Title VII or the Minnesota Human Rights Act (MHRA). The court noted that the administrator's alleged misconduct in recently lying to a supervisor about leaving a voicemail on his telephone when she was going to be absent from work was not similar to the acts of misconduct that she cited in support of her sex discrimination claim, one of which involved a supervisor allegedly lying on his application to become a licensed police officer some 25 years earlier, and the others of which involved alleged off-duty misconduct or misconduct that was not shown to have been reported to supervisors. The court held that the administrator failed to show that her alleged harassment by her supervisors was based on sex, as required to establish her claim of hostile work environment under Title VII and the Minnesota Human Rights Act (MHRA). According to the court, although the administrator claimed that supervisors created a hostile work environment by, among other things, constantly criticizing her, requiring her to report to the under-sheriff, and yelling at her on several occasions, she did not produce any evidence that she was the target of harassment because of her sex and that the offensive behavior was not merely non-actionable, vulgar behavior. The court held that the record did not support a reasonable inference that the administrator's supervisors retaliated against her, in violation of Title VII and the Minnesota Human Rights Act (MHRA), for filing a claim with the state human rights department. The court noted that the administrator's conduct in filing a claim was protected, but the administrator was accused of insubordination before she notified her employer of her protected activity. Jenkins v. Currier, 514 F.3d 1030 (10th Cir. 2008). A state prisoner brought a pro se § 1983 action against state officials alleging that the officials violated his constitutional rights and state law when they took him into custody without a warrant or a probable cause hearing, and transferred him to a correctional facility in order for him to serve his previously imposed sentence. The district court dismissed the prisoner's claims with prejudice. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court noted that under Oklahoma law, a convicted defendant who is at liberty without having served his sentence may be arrested as on escape and ordered into custody on the unexecuted judgment. According to the court, state officials did not violate the Fourth Amendment when they seized the state prisoner without a warrant, after having been released from federal custody erroneously, so that he could serve the remainder of his unfinished state sentence. The court noted that the officials had reason to believe that the prisoner had not completed serving his state sentences and there were no special circumstances that would have made his otherwise permissible arrest unreasonable. The court also found that the prisoner had no due process right to a hearing when he was taken back into custody. (Oklahoma)

Convicted felons who had served their sentences brought an action against state and local officials seeking to invalidate portions of a Tennessee Code that conditioned the restoration of their voting rights upon their payment of certain financial obligations, including restitution and child support. The district court granted judgment on the pleadings to the defendants. The court held that the statutory provision: (1) did not create a suspect classification; (2) did not violate equal protection; (3) did not violate the Twenty-Fourth Amendment; and (4) did not violate the Ex Post Facto Clause. According to the court, the state had an interest in protecting the ballot box from felons who continued to break the law by not abiding by enforceable court orders, the state had a strong public policy interest in encouraging the payment of child support and thereby promoting the welfare of children, and the state had a legitimate interest in encouraging convicted felons to complete their entire sentences, including the payment of restitution. The court also noted that there was no evidence that the state of Tennessee's re-enfranchisement scheme for convicted felons had traditionally been regarded as punitive, rather than civil, so as to violate the federal or Tennessee Ex Post Facto Clause. Jones v. Oakland County, 585 F.Supp.2d 914 (E.D.Mich. 2008). The personal representative of an arrestee's estate brought an action against a county and two employees of the jail where the arrestee died of heart failure. The arrestee had been brought to the jail on a bench warrant for failing to appear at a court proceeding. Two days after her admission she was found unresponsive in her cell and could not be revived. It was subsequently determined that she died of heart failure (ischemic cardiomyopathy). The defendants moved for summary judgment and the district court granted the motion. The court held that neither a jail interviewer, whose only contact with the arrestee was a classification interview lasting between five and fifteen minutes, nor a jail nurse, who first came into contact with the arrestee when she was summoned to assist in CPR and other efforts to revive the arrestee after she was found unresponsive in her jail cell, were deliberately indifferent to the arrestee's serious medical needs. According to the court, neither employee perceived a substantial risk to the arrestee's health and well-being and yet disregarded that risk, and any purported negligence in the interviewer's assessment of the arrestee's medical needs did not rise to the level of deliberate indifference. The court held that the conduct of the interviewer, whose only contact with the arrestee was a classification interview lasting between five and fifteen minutes, did not amount to "gross negligence" within the meaning of Michigan's governmental immunity statute, and therefore she was not liable for failing to secure immediate medical treatment for a condition that shortly would result in the arrestee's death. Osterback v. McDonough, 549 F.Supp.2d 1337 (M.D.Fla. 2008). Inmates sued corrections officials, alleging that conditions of close management (CM) status amounted to cruel and unusual punishment. Following the grant of the inmates' motion to certify the class, and issuance of an order entering the officials' revised offer of judgment (ROJ), the officials moved to terminate the ROJ pursuant to the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA). The district court granted the motion. The court held that corrections officers were deliberately indifferent in violation of the 8th Amendment when inmates on close management (CM) status who truly were suicidal or otherwise suffered from severe psychological distress declared psychological emergencies. According to the court, the officers failed to summon mental health staff, and inmates thereafter attempted to commit suicide or otherwise harmed themselves, or, in one case, actually committed suicide. The court held that accreditation reports for correctional institutions were inadmissible hearsay in the inmates' action. The court held that termination of the revised offer of judgment (ROJ), which was previously adopted by the district court as a final order and judgment, was appropriate under the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA) in that isolated instances of prison staff's failure to appropriately respond to a bona fide psychological emergency of inmates in close management status did not create a current and ongoing violation of the class members' Eighth Amendment rights. Petzak v. Nevada ex rel. Department of Corrections, 579 F.Supp.2d 1330 (D.Nev. 2008). A 74-year-old correctional officer brought a § 1983 action against his supervisor, alleging that statutory stress electrocardiogram (EKG) testing for officers over the age of 40 violated equal protection. The district court granted summary judgment for the supervisor in part and denied in part. The court held that the differential treatment of correctional officers violated equal protection, but the supervisor was entitled to qualified immunity from damages. According to the court, the differential treatment of correctional officers over and under the age of forty, under Nevada's statutory electrocardiogram (EKG) testing requirements, was not rationally related to a legitimate government interest, and thus, violated equal protection. Presley v. City of Blackshear, 650 F.Supp.2d 1307 (S.D.Ga. 2008). A mother brought an action against a city police officer and a county paramedic, arising out of her son's death while detained in a county jail after his arrest. The district court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment. The court held that the arresting officer was not deliberately indifferent to the serious medical needs of the detainee who died of an apparent drug overdose after being arrested on drug charges and placed into custody at a county jail, absent evidence that the arresting officer actually saw the detainee swallow any drugs that allegedly led to his death. The court held that the county paramedic who responded to the jail was not deliberately indifferent despite any alleged negligence in the paramedic's original diagnosis. The court noted that the paramedic promptly responded to both calls from county jail concerning the detainee, and, each time, examined the detainee to determine whether further medical treatment was needed. According to the court, the paramedic's alleged bad judgment and negligence in caring for the pretrial detainee who died of an apparent drug overdose, was insufficient to show a lack of good faith for the purposes of statutory immunity from negligence or malpractice liability under Georgia law. Snodgrass v. Robinson, 512 F.3d 999 (8th Cir. 2008). A state prisoner brought a suit against the Iowa Board of Parole, the Board's members and the governor of Iowa alleging that her constitutional rights were violated by applying laws and regulations governing commutation requests, even though the laws were passed after her conviction. The district court granted a motion to dismiss and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the retroactive application of an amendment to the Iowa commutation provisions did not violate the Ex Post Facto Clause and that the state prisoner had no liberty interest in commutations. The court noted that the retroactive application of the amendment to Iowa Code did not raise a significant risk that the state prisoner would be denied a commutation she otherwise would have received from the governor given the unpredictability of the wholly discretionary grant of a governor's commutation. The court noted that the new provisions limited a Class A felon serving a life sentence to commutation applications no more frequently than once every ten years rather than previous standards which provided for regular review. Fross v. County of Allegheny, 612 F.Supp.2d 651 (W.D.Pa. 2009). A group of convicted sex offenders brought a civil rights action against a county, alleging that a county ordinance that restricted the residency of sex offenders violated their constitutional rights, the Fair Housing Act (FHA), and state law. The district court granted summary judgment for the plaintiffs, finding that the ordinance was preempted by state law. The ordinance barred offenders from residing within 2,500 feet of any child care facility, community center, public park or recreation facility, or school. According to the court, the ordinance was contradictory to and inconsistent with various provisions of state law, and interfered with the state's express objectives of rehabilitating and reintegrating offenders, diverting appropriate offenders from prison, and establishing a uniform, statewide system the for supervision of offenders. Roubideaux v. North Dakota Dept. of Corrections and Rehabilitation, 570 F.3d 966 (8th Cir. 2009). North Dakota prison inmates, representing a certified class of female inmates, brought a sex discrimination suit under § 1983 and Title IX, alleging that a state prison system provided them with unequal programs and facilities as compared to male inmates. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants and the inmates appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that North Dakota's gender-explicit statutes, allowing the Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation to place female inmates in county jails and allowing the Department to place female inmates in "grade one correctional facilities" for more than one year, was substantially related to the important governmental objective of providing adequate segregated housing for female inmates, and thus the statutes were facially valid under heightened equal protection review. According to the court, even if the decision to house them at the women's center was based on economic concerns, where the female prison population as a whole was much smaller than the male population, sufficient space to house the female prisoners was becoming an issue as the entire prison population increased. Female inmates were in need of a separate facility to better meet their needs, and statutes expressly required the Department to contract with county facilities that had adequate space and the ability to provide appropriate level of services and programs for female inmates. The court held that the female inmates, by expressing an assertion before the district court that they were not challenging the programming decisions made by Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation upon transfer to county jails for housing, abandoned an "as-applied" challenge to the gender-explicit statutes facilitating such transfers. The court held that North Dakota's "prison industries" program offered at a women's correction and rehabilitation center, under contract between several counties and the state, was not an "educational program" subject to Title IX protections, even though the program provided on-the-job training. The court noted that the program was primarily an inmate work or employment program, providing female inmates with paying jobs and enabling them to make purchases, pay restitution, or support their families, and the contract between the counties and state distinctly separated inmate employment and educational programs.

According to the court, vocational training offered at the center was not discriminatorily inferior to those offered to male inmates at state facilities, as required for a claim under Title IX. Although locational differences existed, like male inmates, female inmates had access to a welding class and classes in basic parenting, social skills, speech, and healthy lifestyles. Simmons v. Galvin, 575 F.3d 24 (1st Cir. 2009). Incarcerated felons brought an action challenging the validity of an amendment to the Massachusetts constitution disqualifying currently incarcerated inmates from voting in all Massachusetts elections. The district court denied the Commonwealth's motion for the entry of judgment on the pleadings on the inmates' Voting Rights Act (VRA) claim but granted the Commonwealth's motion for summary judgment on the inmates' Ex Post Facto Clause claim. Both the Commonwealth and inmates appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part and remanded. The appeals court held that the vote denial claim challenging the amendment that would disenfranchise incarcerated felons was not cognizable under the Voting Rights Act (VRA). According to the court, the Act was not meant to proscribe the authority of states to disenfranchise imprisoned felons. The court found that the amendment did not violate the Ex Post Facto Clause where the amendment did not impose any affirmative disability or restraint, physical or otherwise, and felon disenfranchisement had historically not been regarded as punitive in the United States. The court noted that there was a rational non-punitive purpose for the disenfranchisement. (Massachusetts)

El-Tabech v. Clarke, 616 F.3d 834 (8th Cir. 2010). A Muslim inmate, who was awarded attorney fees in a civil rights action in which he prevailed on his request for kosher meals, moved for an order directing prison officials to pay the fee award and to increase the post-judgment interest rate payable on that award. The district court granted the motion and the state appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The court held that the award of post-judgment interest at a punitive rate of 14% on the attorney fees awarded to the inmate's counsel in the civil rights suit was an abuse of discretion, where most of the delay in the state's payment of the fee award was due to the inmate's refusal to file a claim under state statutes governing payment of federal court judgments. According to the court, there were no extraordinary circumstances warranting departure from the statutory post-judgment interest rate. (Tecumseh State Correctional Institution, Nebraska)

Convicted felons filed a suit challenging the State of Washington's felon disenfranchisement law, alleging that it violated the Voting Rights Act (VRA) by denying the right to vote on account of race. The district court granted Washington summary judgment, and the felons appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. On remand, the district court again granted Washington summary judgment. The felons appealed again. The appeals court found that a VRA challenge to the felon disenfranchisement law requires intentional discrimination in the criminal justice system, and Washington's disenfranchisement law did not violate the VRA. Fields v. Smith, 712 F.Supp.2d 830 (E.D.Wis. 2010). Wisconsin Department of Corrections (DOC) inmates, who were diagnosed with Gender Identity Disorder (GID), brought a § 1983 action against DOC officials, alleging, among other things, that the officials violated the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments by enforcing a statutory provision preventing DOC medical personnel from providing hormone therapy or sexual reassignment surgery to inmates with GID, and from evaluating inmates with GID for possible hormone therapy. The inmates sought a permanent injunction barring enforcement of the statute against them and other inmates. The court held that: (1) GID or transsexualism was a "serious medical need" for the purposes of the Eighth Amendment; (2) as matter of first impression, enforcement of the statute against the inmates violated the Eighth Amendment; (3) as matter of first impression, the statute was facially unconstitutional under the Eighth Amendment; (4) the possibility that certain inmates seeking treatment for gender issues might have had conditions not requiring hormone therapy did not repel a facial challenge to the statute; and (5) as matter of first impression, the statute violated the Equal Protection Clause both as applied to the inmates and on its face. The district court granted the motion, issuing a "…permanent injunction that restrains the defendants from enforcing or attempting to enforce the provisions of Wis. Stat. § 302.386(5m), by direct, indirect or other means, against any prisoner to whom the statute would otherwise apply and specifically against the plaintiffs." Gonzalez-Fuentes v. Molina, 607 F.3d 864 (1st Cir. 2010). A class of prisoners convicted of murder, who had been released pursuant to an electronic supervision program (ESP), filed a complaint under § 1983, seeking a preliminary injunction against their re-incarceration pursuant to a regulation which became effective after their releases. The district court granted a preliminary injunction and the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico appealed. Another class of prisoners who had been re-incarcerated filed a separate petition for a writ of habeas corpus and the district court granted the petition. The district court consolidated the two cases, and denied the Commonwealth's motion to dismiss. The commonwealth appealed. The appeals court reversed in part, vacated in part, and remanded. The court held that re-incarceration of the prisoners convicted of murder under a new regulation eliminating the ESP program for prisoners convicted of murder, did not violate the ex post facto clause, where the prisoners had committed their crimes of conviction at times predating the creation of the ESP, so that Puerto Rico's decision to disqualify prisoners from participating in the ESP had no effect on the punishment assigned by law.

The court also held the re-incarceration of the prisoners convicted of murder did not violate substantive due process. The court found that although the impact of re-incarceration on the prisoners was substantial, Puerto Rico had a justifiable interest in faithfully applying the new statute which barred prisoners convicted of murder from the ESP program. According to the court, there was no showing that Puerto Rico acted with deliberate indifference or that re-imprisonment was conscience-shocking.

But the court found that the prisoners convicted of murder, who had been released for several years pursuant to the ESP, had a protected due process liberty interest in their continued participation in the ESP program, despite the fact that their releases were premised on lower court determination, which was later overturned, that the statute eliminating such prisoners from the program violated the ex post facto clause. The prisoners were serving out the remainder of their sentences in their homes, where they lived either with close relatives, significant others, or spouses and children, and although they were subject to monitoring with an electronic tracking anklet, and routine drug and alcohol testing, they were authorized to work at a job or attend school.

The court also found that the re-incarceration of the prisoners deprived them of procedural due process, where the prisoners were not given any pre-hearing notice as to the reason their ESP status was revoked, and the prisoners had to wait two weeks after their arrest before receiving any opportunity to contest it.

The court concluded that the prisoners whose procedural due process rights were violated by their re-incarceration or their imminent future re-incarceration after determination that they had been unlawfully admitted into the ESP were not entitled to either habeas relief, for those already re-imprisoned, or preliminary injunctive relief for those yet to be re-imprisoned, where the subsequent Puerto Rico statute provided a valid, independent, constitutional basis for the prisoners' re-incarceration. Johnson v. Bredesen, 624 F.3d 742 (6th Cir. 2010). Several convicted felons brought action against Tennessee's governor and secretary of state, state coordinator of elections, and several county elections administrators, alleging that, by conditioning restoration of felons' voting rights on payment of court-ordered victim restitution and child support obligations, Tennessee's voter re-enfranchisement statute violated the Equal Protection Clause, the Twenty-Fourth Amendment, and the Ex Post Facto and Privileges and Immunities Clauses of the federal and state constitutions. The district court granted the defendants' motion for judgment on the pleadings and the felons appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that Tennessee had rational basis for the challenged provisions of the state's re-enfranchisement statute, the challenged provisions of the state's re-enfranchisement statute did not violate the Twenty-Fourth Amendment or Privileges and Immunities Clause, and the challenged provisions were not punitive in nature, and thus did not violate the state's Ex Post Facto Clause. The court noted that the felons, having lost their voting rights upon being convicted of felonies, lacked any fundamental interest in their right to vote, and wealth-based classifications did not constitute discrimination against any suspect class. According to the court, Tennessee's interests in encouraging payment of child support and compliance with court orders, and in requiring felons to complete their entire sentences, including paying victim restitution, supplied a rational basis sufficient for the challenged provisions to pass equal protection muster. PA Prison Soc. v. Cortes, 622 F.3d 215 (3rd Cir. 2010). State prisoners, several non-profit advocacy and prisoner rights groups, and several state voters and qualified taxpayers brought an action challenging an amendment to the Pennsylvania constitution changing the composition of the Board of Pardons and the voting requirements for obtaining a pardon or commutation of sentence. The district court granted in part, and denied in part, the parties' cross-motions for summary judgment, and they appealed. The appeals court remanded. On remand, the district court ruled that one of the groups had standing to challenge the constitutionality of the amendment and reinstated its prior summary judgment ruling, and appeal was again taken. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The appeals court held that the prisoner advocacy group had organization standing to challenge the constitutionality of the amendment, but the amendment did not violate the ex post facto clause. The court noted that allegations that the changes in the law have produced some ambiguous sort of disadvantage, or affected a prisoner's opportunity to take advantage of provisions for early release, are not sufficient grounds for bringing an ex post facto claim. According to the court, there is no constitutional or inherent right of a convicted person to be conditionally released before the expiration of a valid sentence. (Pennsylvania Board of Pardons)

Serra v. Lappin, 600 F.3d 1191 (9th Cir. 2010). Current and former federal prisoners brought an action against various prison officials, alleging that the low wages they were paid for work performed in prison violated their rights under the Fifth Amendment and international law. The district court granted the defendants' motion to dismiss, and the prisoners appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that current and former federal prisoners did not have a legal entitlement to payment for work performed while incarcerated for federal crimes, and thus prison officials did not violate the prisoners' Fifth Amendment due process rights by allegedly paying them inadequate wages for work performed in prison, absent an allegation that wages paid were less than applicable regulations required.

The court found that the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR) conferred no judicially enforceable rights, and thus did not provide current and former federal prisoners a legal claim or remedy against prison officials in their action alleging that low wages inmates were paid for work performed in prison violated their rights under international law. The court noted that ICCPR was ratified on the express understanding that it was not self-executing. Similarly, the court held that the United Nations' document entitled Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners conferred no judicially enforceable rights, and thus did not provide current and former federal prisoners a legal claim or remedy against prison officials in their action. The court noted that the document was not binding on the United States, did not purport to serve as a source of private rights, and even if it were a self-executing treaty, did not specify what wages would qualify as equitable remuneration of prisoners' work.

According to the court, the current and former federal prisoners failed to establish that any statute conferred jurisdiction over their claim that customary international law entitled them to higher wages for work performed in prison, and thus the district court did not have jurisdiction over prisoners' “law of nations” claim. The court held that the current and former federal prisoners had no constitutional right to be paid for work performed while in prison, as would be required to state a claim against prison officials in their individual capacities for money damages based on alleged inadequacy of the prisoners' earnings. Sexton v. Kenton County Detention Center, 702 F.Supp.2d 784 (E.D.Ky. 2010). Two female detainees brought a § 1983 action against a county detention center and officials, alleging deliberate indifference with respect to hiring and supervision of a deputy who sexually assaulted them while they awaited arraignment. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The court held that the detainees failed to establish deliberate indifference with respect to the center's hiring of the deputy. The court noted that none of the deputy's prior misdemeanor offenses, including his driving infractions and domestic assault, demonstrated a propensity to commit rape. The court found that the detainees failed to demonstrate a causal link between the center's alleged policy of not terminating employees with excessive absenteeism and the deputy's conduct. The court noted that "...Absent evidence of prior complaints of sexual assault, the mere fact that a male guard supervises a female inmate does not lead to the conclusion that the inmate is at a great risk of being sexually assaulted by the guard."

According to the court, the detainees failed to establish that the county detention center was deliberately indifferent to their constitutional rights by not effectively monitoring surveillance equipment, and thus they could not recover in their § 1983 action against the center, where there was no evidence that the center had a policy or custom of ineffective surveillance. The detainees argued that only one person monitored the 89 cameras that were used throughout the Detention Center and that they were mainly monitored only for ingress and egress of secured doors. They asserted that the county should have had cameras in the video arraignment room for the inmates' protection. The court noted that state jail regulations do not require constant monitoring of video surveillance cameras or dictate where the cameras are to be placed inside a detention facility. Ward v. Ryan, 623 F.3d 807 (9th Cir. 2010). A state inmate who was serving a 197-year sentence brought a § 1983 action against the director of the Arizona Department of Corrections, alleging the Department's withholding of a portion of his prison wages for “gate money,” to be paid to him upon his release from incarceration, violated his Fifth and Fourteenth Amendment rights since it was unlikely he would be released from prison prior to his death. The appeals court reversed the dismissal of the claim. The district court subsequently denied the inmate injunctive relief and granted summary judgment in favor of the director. The inmate appealed. The appeals court held that the inmate did not have a current possessory property interest in wages withheld in a dedicated discharge account, as required to establish a violation of the Takings Clause. The court noted that Arizona statutes creating a protected property interest in prison inmate wages did not give inmates full and unfettered right to their property. Cryer v. Massachusetts Dept. of Correction, 763 F.Supp.2d 237 (D.Mass.2011). A Native American inmate brought a civil rights action against the Massachusetts Department of Correction and officials, challenging denial of access to ceremonial tobacco to be used for religious purposes. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact, regarding whether the correctional anti-smoking policy which banned tobacco in all forms including ceremonial tobacco, created a substantial burden on the Native American inmate's religious practice, in violation of the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA). The court found that the conduct of state correctional officials in denying the Native American inmate's access to ceremonial tobacco did not violate a clearly established federal right of which a reasonable officer would have known, entitling the officials to qualified immunity on the inmate's § 1983 claim under the Free Exercise Clause of the First Amendment. The court noted that the policy of state correctional officials in denying the Native American inmate's access to ceremonial tobacco did not contravene a Massachusetts statute governing smoking in public workplaces, since the provision stated that smoking "may be permitted" in specifically enumerated places and circumstances, including religious ceremonies where smoking was part of a ritual. The inmates sought a permanent injunction barring enforcement of the statute against them and other inmates. The district court granted judgment on behalf of the plaintiffs and the defendants appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that: (1) enforcement of the statute constituted deliberate indifference to the inmates' serious medical needs; (2) the statute facially violated the Eighth Amendment; (3) deference to prison administrators in implementing the ban was not warranted; and (4) the district court did not abuse its discretion in enjoining the entirety of the Wisconsin Inmate Sex Change Prevention Act. Gilman v. Schwarzenegger, 638 F.3d 1101(9th Cir. 2011). California state prisoners serving life imprisonment sentences with the possibility of parole filed a class action under § 1983, alleging that a provision of California's Victims' Bill of Rights Act of 2008, which reduced the availability and frequency of parole hearings for prisoners initially found not suitable for parole, violated the Ex Post Facto Clause and prisoners' substantive due process rights. The prisoners moved for a preliminary injunction to bar enforcement of the Act, and the state moved to dismiss. The district court granted preliminary injunctive relief in part, and the State appealed. The appeals court reversed. The appeals court held that, even assuming that the Act threatened to create the risk of prolonged incarceration for those convicted prior to its enactment, the prisoners' ability to apply for expedited hearings remedied any possible Ex Post Facto violation and warranted denial of the inmates' request for a preliminary injunction. Smith v. Atkins, 777 F.Supp.2d 955 (E.D.N.C. 2011). The mother of a schizophrenic inmate who committed suicide at a jail and the mother of the inmate's children brought a § 1983 action in state court against a county deputy sheriff, jail officials, a medical contractor, and a nurse employed by the contractor, alleging that the defendants violated the inmate's Eighth Amendment rights in failing to provide adequate medical care. The defendants removed the action to federal court and moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motions. The court held that the deputy sheriff who happened to be at the jail delivering a prisoner when the inmate, who had been diagnosed with schizophrenia, committed suicide, did not know that the inmate was at a substantial risk of committing suicide or intentionally disregarded such risk. The court found that the deputy was not liable under § 1983 where the deputy did not know the inmate or anything about him, or have any responsibilities associated with the inmate's custody. The court held that jail officials' mere failure to comply with a state standard and a jail policy requiring a four-time per hour check on any prisoner who had ever been on a suicide watch did not violate the Eighth Amendment rights of the inmate. The district court dismissed the cases for failure to state a claim and the inmates appealed. The appeals court affirmed and remanded with instructions. According to the appeals court, even if a statutory cap on the mark-up of the price of prison commissary goods created a protected property interest, the prisoners did not state a procedural due process claim based on the Department of Corrections' alleged cap violation where they did not allege that post-deprivation remedies were inadequate to satisfy constitutional due process requirements. U.S. v. Broncheau, 645 F.3d 676 (4th Cir. 2011). Former federal prisoners, who had been certified, pursuant to the Adam Walsh Child Protection and Safety Act, as sexually dangerous persons and were being detained pending hearings on the government's petitions for their commitment, moved to dismiss those petitions. The district court granted the motions and denied the government's motion for a stay. The government appealed. The appeals court vacated and remanded. The appeals court held that the district court improperly ordered the government to release from the Bureau of Prisons (BOP) custody prisoners who had upcoming terms of supervised release, and whom the government had certified as sexually dangerous under the civil commitment provisions of the Adam Walsh Child Protection and Safety Act, and that the district court further improperly required the government to first seek a commitment order under a competency statute before seeking civil commitment under the Adam Walsh Act. The court noted that although the prisoners' sentences included terms of supervised release, they fell within the class of persons in the custody of the BOP subject to certification as being sexually dangerous, and the competency statute did not provide for a commitment on the basis of the prisoners' sexual dangerousness. U.S. v. Franco, 632 F.3d 880 (5th Cir. 2011). An inmate in a privately owned and operated county jail, who had paid a corrections officer to bring contraband into a county correctional facility, was convicted after a district court jury trial of aiding and abetting in the bribery of a public official. The defendant appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that it was constitutional to apply the federal bribery statute to the defendant, even though he used his own money, and not federal funds, to pay the corrections officer. The officer had been paid a total of $425 over a period of time to bring peanut butter, tuna fish, and other small food items, a cell phone, enchiladas and a box containing marijuana. Blalock v. Eaker, 845 F.Supp.2d 678 (W.D.N.C. 2012). A pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against prison officials, alleging they lost his legal mail. The district court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment. The court held that when prison staff ignored the detainee's subpoenas it did not violate his right of access to the courts. The court noted that the detainee was represented by counsel, the subpoenas were invalid as the detainee was a criminal defendant who had no right under North Carolina common law to pretrial discovery, North Carolina statutes did not authorize the use of subpoenas "duces tecum" as a criminal discovery tool, and North Carolina law did not allow criminal defendants to depose witnesses. Burnette v. Fahey, 687 F.3d 171 (4th Cir. 2012). State prisoners filed an action against members of the Virginia Parole Board in their official capacities, contending that the Board had adopted policies and procedures with respect to parole-eligible inmates imprisoned for violent offenses that violated the Due Process and Ex Post Facto Clauses. The district court dismissed the action and denied a motion to amend. The plaintiffs appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that Virginia had created a limited due process liberty interest in being considered for parole at a specified time, and in being furnished with a written explanation for denial of parole, through passage of its parole statute. But the court held that the prisoners' complaint supported an inference, at most, that the parole board was exercising its discretion, but that in doing so the board was taking a stricter view towards violent offenders than it had in past, which did not implicate the Ex Post Facto Clause. According to the court, the mere fact that the parole board had implemented procedural changes during the same multi-year period that the rate of release decreased did not produce a plausible inference of a causal connection to an alleged Ex Post Facto Clause violation due to a significant risk of extended punishment. Doe v. Caldwell, 913 F.Supp.2d 262 (E.D.La. 2012). Offenders convicted of violating Louisiana's Crime Against Nature by Solicitation statute filed a class action against state officials, challenging the enforcement of Louisiana's sex offender registry law. State officials moved to dismiss, and the offenders moved for class certification and for summary judgment. The district court denied the defendants' motion to dismiss. The court held that allegations that a provision of the sex offender registry law requiring individuals convicted of violating Louisiana's Crime Against Nature by Solicitation statute to register as sex offenders, but not requiring individuals convicted under the Louisiana Prostitution statute to register as sex offenders, was without any rational basis, and stated a § 1983 equal protection claim. Individuals convicted of violating Louisiana's Crime Against Nature by Solicitation (CANS) statute brought a § 1983 action against Louisiana's Governor, Attorney General, and other state and municipal officials, challenging the statute's requirement that they register as sex offenders under Louisiana's sex offender registry law. The individuals moved for summary judgment and the district court granted the motion. The court held that the individuals were treated differently than those convicted of engaging in the same conduct under the solicitation provision of Louisiana's prostitution statute, which did not require registration as sex offender, and thus the provision of the sex offender registry law requiring individuals convicted of CANS to register as sex offenders deprived the individuals of equal protection of laws in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. Doe v. Jindal, 853 F.Supp.2d 596 (M.D.La. 2012). Registered sex offenders brought an action seeking a declaration that the Louisiana statute precluding registered sex offenders from using or accessing social networking websites, chat rooms, and peer-to-peer networks was unconstitutional, and seeking injunctive relief. The district court entered judgment in favor of the plaintiffs, finding that the statute was facially overbroad and the statute was void for vagueness. The court found that a department of corrections regulation did not cure deficiencies in the statute where the regulation only applied to sex offenders who were under supervision by state probation officers, which was a limited segment of the class of persons otherwise subject to the statute. The court concluded: "Although the Act is intended to promote the legitimate and compelling state interest of protecting minors from internet predators, the near total ban on internet access imposed by the Act unreasonably restricts many ordinary activities that have become important to everyday life in today's world. The sweeping restrictions on the use of the internet for purposes completely unrelated to the activities sought to be banned by the Act impose severe and unwarranted restraints on constitutionally protected speech. More focused restrictions that are narrowly tailored to address the specific conduct sought to be proscribed should be pursued." (Louisiana)

Doe v. Nebraska, 898 F.Supp.2d 1086 (D.Neb. 2012). Sex offenders who were required to register under the Nebraska Sex Offender Registration Act and the offenders' family members brought an action against a state alleging that portions of the Act violated the First Amendment, the Due Process Clause, the Ex Post Facto Clause, and the Fourth Amendment. The district court held that: (1) the statute criminalizing registrants' use of social networking web sites, instant messaging, and chat room services accessible by minors was not narrowly tailored; (2) the statute criminalizing registrants' use of web sites was overbroad; (3) the statute requiring registrants' disclosure of domain names and blog sites used was not narrowly tailored; (4) the statute criminalizing registrants' use of web sites was vague under the Due Process Clause; and, (5) the statutes violated the Ex Post Facto Clause. The court noted that a statute is "narrowly tailored" to regulate content-neutral speech under the First Amendment, if it targets and eliminates no more than the exact source of the evil it seeks to remedy. The district court opened its opinion with the following: "Earlier I paraphrased Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes and observed that if the people of Nebraska wanted to go to hell, it was my job to help them get there. By that, I meant that it is not my prerogative to second-guess Nebraska's policy judgments so long as those judgments are within constitutional parameters. Accordingly, I upheld many portions of Nebraska's new sex offender registration laws even though it was my firm personal view that those laws were both wrongheaded and counterproductive. However, I had serious constitutional concerns about three sections of Nebraska's new law…. I have decided that the remaining portions of Nebraska's sex offender registry laws are unconstitutional." Doe v. Raemisch, 895 F.Supp.2d 897 (E.D.Wis. 2012). Two offenders, one from Connecticut and one from Florida, who were subject to Wisconsin's sex offender registration and notification statutes, sued the Wisconsin Department of Corrections (DOC), its Secretary, and the Director of the DOC's Sex Offender Program, alleging that application and enforcement of registration requirements violated their constitutional and statutory rights. The parties cross-moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motions in part and denied in part. The court held that: (1) the registration requirement was not punitive; but, (2) a provision authorizing the imposition of a $100 annual fee violated the Ex Post Facto Clause; (3) the statutes did not violate the offenders' constitutional equal protection rights; (4) the statutes did not violate the offenders' equal protection or substantive due process rights by denying them an individualized, risk-determination-based judicial system; (5) the registration law did not constitute an unconstitutional legislative impairment of the offenders' plea agreements; (6) the offenders had no First Amendment cause of action regarding requirements to provide e-mail addresses and websites they maintained; and (7) the defendant officials were entitled to qualified immunity. The court noted that, except for an annual fee requirement, Wisconsin's sex offender registration law was reasonable in light of its non-punitive objective, and thus did not violate the Ex Post Facto Clause, and the fact that the registration law might deter sex offenders from violating the law did not establish that the registration requirement itself was punitive, and the fact that offenders had to travel to specified law enforcement facilities to have their photographs taken and to be fingerprinted was not sufficiently severe to transform an otherwise non-punitive measure into a punitive one. Ferencz v. Medlock, 905 F.Supp.2d 656 (W.D.Pa. 2012). A mother, as administrator for her son's estate, brought deliberate indifference claims under a wrongful death statute against prison employees, and the prison's medical services provider, following the death of her son when he was a pretrial detainee in a county prison. The employees and provider moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The district court held that under Pennsylvania law, the mother lacked standing to bring wrongful death and survival actions in her individual capacity against several prison employees for her son's death while he was in prison, where the wrongful death and survival statutes only permitted recovery by a personal representative, such as a mother in her action as administratrix of her son's estate, or as a person entitled to recover damages as a trustee ad litem. The court found that the mother's claims that a prison's medical services provider had a policy, practice, or custom that resulted in her son's death were sufficient to overcome the provider's motion to dismiss the mother's § 1983 action for the death of her son while he was in prison.

Upon admission to the facility, the detainee had been evaluated and scored a 12 on a scale, which was to have triggered classification as suicidal (a score of 8 or more). The Classification Committee subsequently did not classify the detainee as suicidal as they were required to do under the jail classification policy, and no member of the Committee communicated to medical contractor staff or correctional officers responsible for monitoring the detainee that he was suicidal and going through drug withdrawal. At the time, the jail was equipped with an operational and working video surveillance system and there was a video camera in the detainee's cell. The video surveillance of the cell was broadcast on four different television monitors throughout the jail, all of which were working and manned by officers. Additionally, the work station thhhattt was located around the corner from the cell, approximately 20 feet away, was equipped with one of the four television monitors. The monitor was situated on the wall above the desk at the work station, such that it would be directly in front of the officer manning the station if he was sitting facing his desk.

The detainee attempted suicide by trying to hang himself with his bed sheet from the top of the cell bars, which took several minutes and was unsuccessful. After the attempt, however, the detainee left the bed sheet hanging from the top of his cell bars and started to pace in his cell in visible mental distress. This suicide attempt, as well as the hanging bedsheet were viewable from the nearby work station video surveillance monitor as well as the other three monitors throughout the jail. A few minutes later the detainee attempted to commit suicide a second time by hanging himself with his bed sheet from the top of his cell bars. This suicide attempt took several minutes, was unsuccessful, and was viewable from the work station video surveillance monitor as well as the other three monitors throughout the jail. A few minutes later, the detainee attempted to commit suicide a third time by hanging himself with his bed sheet. This time, he hung himself from his bed sheet for over twenty minutes, without being noticed by any of the four officers who were manning the four video surveillance monitors. In fact, one officer admitted he was asleep at his work station at the time. By the time another officer noticed the hanging, nearly 30 minutes had passed. The detainee was cut down and transported to a local hospital where he was subsequently pronounced dead due to asphyxiation by hanging. Fields v. Henry County, Tenn., 701 F.3d 180 (6th Cir. 2012). An arrestee filed a civil rights action alleging that a county had violated his Eighth Amendment right to be free from excessive bail and his Fourteenth Amendment right to procedural due process. The district court granted summary judgment for the county and the arrestee appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that setting the arrestee's bail at the same amount as other defendants facing domestic-assault charges through the county's use of a bond schedule without particularized examination of his situation did not violate the arrestee's Eighth Amendment right to be free from excessive bail. The court noted that the mere use of a bond schedule does not itself pose a constitutional problem under the Eighth Amendment's prohibition of excessive bail, since a schedule is aimed at assuring the presence of a defendant, and the bond schedule represents an assessment of what bail amount would ensure the appearance of the average defendant facing such a charge. The court found that a liberty interest protected by due process had not been implicated by the county's policy of automatically detaining domestic-assault defendants for 12 hours without bail. The court noted that a Tennessee statute providing that a person could not "be committed to prison" until he had a hearing before a magistrate did not create a liberty interest, and release on personal recognizance under Tennessee law lacked explicitly mandatory language needed to create a liberty interest. The superintendent moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion. Moussazadeh v. Texas Dept. of Criminal Justice, 703 F.3d 781 (5th Cir. 2012). A Jewish state prisoner brought an action against the Texas Department of Criminal Justice, alleging that the defendant denied his grievances and requests for kosher meals in violation of the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA) and the Texas Religious Freedom Restoration Act. The district court entered summary judgment for the defendant and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The court held that the state Jewish prisoner exhausted his administrative remedies with respect to his claim that a prison's failure to provide him with kosher meals violated RLUIPA, where the prisoner went through the state's entire grievance process before filing suit. The court found that sufficient evidence established that the prisoner's religious beliefs were sincere, as required to support a claim against state's department of criminal justice for violation of RLUIPA, where the prisoner stated that he was born and raised Jewish and had always kept a kosher household, the prisoner offered evidence that he requested kosher meals from the chaplain, kitchen staff, and the department, and while at another prison, he ate kosher meals provided to him from the dining hall. The court noted that the prisoner was harassed for his adherence to his religious beliefs and for his demands for kosher food, and that the department transferred the prisoner for a time so he could receive kosher food. The court held that the prisoner was denied a generally available benefit because of his religious beliefs, and thus, the state's department of criminal justice imposed a substantial burden on the prisoner's religious exercise under RLUIPA, where every prisoner in the department's custody received a nutritionally sufficient diet, every observant Jewish prisoner at the designated prison received a kosher diet free of charge, and the Jewish prisoner at issue was forced to pay for his kosher meals. The court found that there was no evidence of a compelling government interest in forcing the Jewish prisoner to pay for all of his kosher meals. The court also found that summary judgment was precluded by a general dispute of material fact as to whether the state's department of criminal justice employed the least restrictive means of minimizing costs and maintaining security by forcing the Jewish prisoner to pay for all of his kosher meals. Poole v. Isaacs, 703 F.3d 1024 (7th Cir. 2012). A state inmate brought a § 1983 action against prison officials, alleging that a required $2.00 copayment for dental care furnished at a correctional center violated his Eighth Amendment rights. The district court allowed the action to proceed against the center's healthcare administrator after screening the complaint, but then granted summary judgment for the administrator. The inmate appealed. The appeals court held that the imposition of a modest fee for medical services provided to inmates with adequate resources to pay the fee, standing alone, does not violate the United States Constitution. According to the court, the issue of whether the inmate should have been given the benefit of an exemption from the required copayment was state-law question that could not be pursued under § 1983. Shah v. Danberg, 855 F.Supp.2d 215 (D.Del. 2012). A state inmate who pled guilty but mentally ill to a charge of first degree murder filed a § 1983 action against a state judge and prison officials alleging that his placement in a correctional center, rather than in a psychiatric center, violated his constitutional rights. The court held that the state judge was entitled to absolute judicial immunity from liability in inmate's § 1983 action despite the inmate's contention that the judge's incorrect application of a state statute resulted in violation of his constitutional rights, where there were no allegations that the judge acted outside the scope of her judicial capacity, or in the absence of jurisdiction. The could ruled that the state inmate failed to establish the likelihood of success on the merits of his claim and thus was not entitled to a preliminary injunction ordering his transfer, despite the inmate's contention that he was mentally unstable and had repeatedly caused himself physical injury during his suicide attempts, where medical records the inmate submitted were ten years old, and a state supreme court recognized that prison officials had discretion to house inmates at facilities they chose. The court ordered the appointment of counsel, noting that the inmate was unable to afford legal representation, he had a history of mental health problems, and the matter presented complex legal issues. Wilkins v. District of Columbia, 879 F.Supp.2d 35 (D.D.C. 2012). A pretrial detainee in a District of Columbia jail who was stabbed by another inmate brought an action against the District. The district court entered judgment as a matter of law in favor of the District and the detainee moved for reconsideration. The district court granted the motion and ordered a new trial. The court held that the issue of whether the failure of District of Columbia jail personnel to follow national standards of care for inmate access to storage closets and monitoring of inmate movements was the proximate cause of the detainee's stabbing by a fellow inmate was for the jury, in the detainee's negligence action, under District of Columbia law. Another inmate who was being held at the D.C. Jail on charges of first-degree murder attacked the detainee. The inmate had received a pass to go to the jail's law library, unaccompanied. Apparently he did not arrive at the library but no one from the library called the inmate's housing unit to report that he had not arrived. An expert retained by the detainee asserted that failure to monitor inmate movements violated national standards for the operation of jails. En route to the jail mental health unit, the detainee saw the inmate enter a mop closet. The inmate, along with another inmate, approached the detainee and stabbed him nine times with a knife. During court proceedings there was testimony that the inmates had hidden contraband in the mop closets. The closets are supposed to be locked at all times, other than when the jail is being cleaned each afternoon. But there was evidence from which the jury could infer that all inmates except those who did not have jobs cleaning in the jail had access to them. According to the detainee's expert witness, keeping mop closets locked at times when the general inmate population is permitted to be in the vicinity of the closets is in accordance with national standards of care for the operation of detention facilities. According to the district court, "In sum, the circumstantial evidence of Mr. Foreman's [inmate who attacked the detainee] freedom of movement is enough to have allowed a jury to conclude that the District's negligence was a proximate cause of Mr. Wilkins's injury…". Ayotte v. Barnhart, 973 F.Supp.2d 70 (D.Me. 2013). A state inmate filed a § 1983 action alleging that prison officials failed to protect him from a padlock assault by a fellow prisoner, and retaliated against him for filing complaints about prison conditions. The officials moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the decision by state prison officials to provide inmates with padlocks to secure their personal belongings did not demonstrate deliberate indifference to a substantial risk of serious harm, as required to establish an Eighth Amendment violation, despite the history of padlocks being used as weapons by some prisoners. The court noted that a state statute required officials to provide inmates with a reasonably secure area for their personal belongings, and there were generally only one or two padlock assaults per year. The court found that verbal abuse, threats, and two strip-searches of the inmate by a prison guard were not de minimis, and thus were sufficiently adverse to support the inmate's First Amendment retaliation claim against the guard. Because inmates; rights against retaliatory action by prison officials for filing complaints about their treatment were clearly established, the court ruled that the prison guards were not entitled to qualified immunity from liability in the inmate's § 1983 First Amendment retaliation action. Following dismissal of his suit, the prisoner moved for reconsideration and for an award of costs. The court held that the prisoner was not entitled to judicial relief given that the BOP had compiled the responsive documents and was awaiting only payment of the $33 copying charge. The court found that the prisoner had substantially prevailed and was thus eligible to recover his litigation costs, and that the prisoner was only entitled to recover his $350 filing fee. Ezell v. Darr, 951 F.Supp.2d 1316 (M.D.Ga. 2013). Female county deputy sheriffs brought an action against a sheriff and a city consolidated government, alleging under § 1983 that the sheriff retaliated against them for their political support of a former sheriff's reelection bid, and that they were denied promotion and demoted because of their gender. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that under Georgia law, loyalty to an individual sheriff and the goals and policies he sought to implement through his office was an appropriate requirement for the effective performance of a deputy sheriff, and thus the sheriff did not violate the First Amendment by transferring deputies who did not support him in an election. The court held that the newly-elected male sheriff's proffered legitimate, non-discriminatory reason for transferring the female deputy from the position of jail commander to a clerk of the Recorder's Court-- that the sheriff was dissatisfied with the way jail had been operating under the deputy and he felt that members of the deputy's staff were unprofessional-- was not a pretext for gender discrimination. Aliens subject to detention pursuant to federal immigration statutes brought a class action against Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) and others, challenging prolonged detention without individualized bond hearings and determinations to justify their continued detention. The district court entered a preliminary injunction requiring the holding of bond hearings before an immigration judge (IJ). The government appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that: (1) the statute authorizing the Attorney General to take into custody any alien who is inadmissible or deportable by reason of having committed certain offenses for as long as removal proceedings are "pending" cannot be read to authorize mandatory detention of criminal aliens with no limit on the duration of imprisonment; (2) aliens subject to prolonged detention were entitled to bond hearings before IJs; (3) irreparable harm was likely to result from the government's reading of the immigration detention statutes as not requiring a bond hearing for aliens subject to prolonged detention; and, (4) the public interest would benefit from a preliminary injunction. The court ruled that the class was comprised of all non-citizens within the Central District of California who: (1) are or were detained for longer than six months pursuant to one of the general immigration detention statutes pending completion of removal proceedings, including judicial review, (2) are not and have not been detained pursuant to a national security detention statute, and (3) have not been afforded a hearing to determine whether their detention is justified. Smith v. Sangamon County Sheriff's Dept., 715 F.3d 188 (7th Cir. 2013). A pretrial detainee filed suit under § 1983 against a sheriff's department to recover for injuries sustained when he was severely beaten by another inmate housed in a maximum-security cellblock. The district court entered summary judgment for the sheriff's department, and the detainee appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the detainee failed to establish that the security classification policy used by the sheriff's department to assign inmates to cellblocks within the jail was deliberately indifferent to inmate safety in violation of his due-process rights. The court noted that: (1) the detainee presented no evidence that the classification policy created a serious risk of physical harm to inmates, much less that the sheriff's department knew of it and did nothing; (2) the attack by the detainee's cellmate was not enough to establish that the policy itself systematically exposed inmates like the detainee to a serious risk of harm; and (3) it was unclear that a policy strictly segregating those accused of nonviolent crimes from those accused of violent crimes would do a better job of ensuring inmate safety than the multiple-factor classification system used by the sheriff's department. The detainee claimed that the Department's approach to classifying inmates for cellblock placement ignored serious risks to inmate safety because the security classification policy fails to separate "violent" from "nonviolent" inmates and thus fails to protect peaceful inmates from attacks by inmates with assaultive tendencies. The appeals court described the classification practices: "A classification officer interviews each new detainee and reviews a range of information, including the inmate's age, gender, gang affiliation, medical concerns, current charge, criminal history, behavioral and disciplinary history within the jail, and any holds due to parole violations. Pursuant to standards recommended by the American Correctional Association, the classification policy assigns point values within these categories, with higher point values corresponding to lower security risks." The inmate was in a county work program under the sheriff's supervision, for which services he earned $10 per day to be credited "toward any and all charges of F.T.A/cash bonds owed to the county." He was seriously injured in a forklift accident while helping law enforcement officials conduct a "drug bust" pursuant to that program. The inmate's treatment cost more than $640,000. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of provider. The county appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the inmate did not qualify for reimbursement of medical expenses under MWCA. The appeals court noted that the county inmate was not an employee working under contract of hire, and therefore, did not qualify for reimbursement of medical expenses from the provider of workers' compensation insurance under the Mississippi Workers' Compensation Act (MWCA) after he was injured in a county work program. According to the court, there was no express, written contract between the inmate and the county, the inmate did not sign a document transmitted by the sheriff to a county justice court stating that the inmate was placed on a work detail, the document was transmitted after he began working for the county, and inmates were required to work under Mississippi law. Alvarado v. Westchester County, 22 F.Supp.3d 208 (S.D.N.Y. 2014). Jail inmates, who were addicted to heroin before being taken into custody, brought a pro se § 1983 action against a county, the provider of on-site medical services at a jail, and county officials, alleging refusal to accept a grievance deprived them of First Amendment right to petition the government for redress, deliberate indifference to serious medical needs in violation of the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments, and deliberate indifference to risk of inadequate medical care at the jail. The defendants moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that: (1) the inmates had no First Amendment right to have grievances processed or investigated in any particular manner; (2) the mere receipt of the inmates' grievance by an assistant warden and the county executive was insufficient to establish their personal involvement; (3) the inmate's allegations established a deputy commissioner's personal involvement; (4) the allegations supported the inmates' § 1983 claim that the provider was deliberately indifferent; and (5) the allegations satisfied Monell's policy or custom requirement to support a § 1983 claim against county. The court noted that the inmates alleged that the county had knowledge of and acquiesced into a pattern of deliberate indifference to the risk that the provider of on-site medical services at jail was providing inadequate medical care where: the inmate sent a letter to county officials stating the provider was not issuing methadone to inmates who were using heroin; the inmates were experiencing withdrawal symptoms; the letter came less than three years after Department of Justice issued a report identifying areas of medical care provided at jail which fell below constitutionally required standards. Amos v. Higgins, 996 F.Supp.2d 810 (W.D.Mo. 2014). Fiancees of prisoners brought an action against a county recorder of deeds, in her official capacity, asserting that a state law's requirement that a marriage license applicant must sign the application in the presence of a recorder was unconstitutional, as applied in instances when one or both applicants could not appear in person, or when an applicant was incarcerated. The fiancees moved for a preliminary injunction prohibiting the recorder from requiring prisoners to execute or sign their marriage license applications in her presence. The district court granted the motion. The court held that the Missouri statute requiring both applicants to execute and sign a marriage license in presence of the issuing recorder was unconstitutional as applied, and an issuance of a permanent injunction was warranted. The court noted that the "in presence" statutory requirement significantly interfered with the fiancees' exercise of their fundamental right to marry, and it was not closely tailored to solely effectuate a sufficiently important state interest, given that the identity of incarcerated marriage license applicants could be verified through other means without requiring them to sign a marriage license application in the recorder's physical presence. Hernandez v. County of Monterey, 70 F.Supp.3d 963 (N.D.Cal. 2014). Current and recently released inmates from a county jail brought an action against the county, the sheriff's office, and the private company that administered all jail health care facilities and services, alleging, on behalf of a class of inmates, that substandard conditions at the jail violated the federal and state constitutions, the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), the Rehabilitation Act, and a California statute prohibiting discrimination in state-funded programs. The inmates sought declaratory and injunctive relief. The defendants filed motions to dismiss. The district court denied the motions. The court held that both current and recently released inmates had standing to pursue their claims against the county and others for allegedly substandard conditions at the jail, even though the recently released inmates were no longer subject to the conditions they challenged. The court noted that the short average length of stay of inmates in the proposed class, which was largely made up of pretrial detainees, was approximately 34 days, and that short period, coupled with the plodding speed of legal action and the fact that other persons similarly situated would continue to be subject to the challenged conduct, qualified the plaintiffs for the "inherently transitory" exception to the mootness doctrine.

The court found that the inmates sufficiently alleged that the private company that administered all jail health care facilities and services operated a place of public accommodation, as required to state a claim for violation of ADA Title III. The court noted that: "The complaint alleges a litany of substandard conditions at the jail, including: violence due to understaffing, overcrowding, inadequate training, policies, procedures, facilities, and prisoner classification; inadequate medical and mental health care screening, attention, distribution, and resources; and lack of policies and practices for identifying, tracking, responding, communicating, and providing accessibility for accommodations for prisoners with disabilities." Morris v. Livingston, 739 F.3d 740 (5th Cir. 2014). A state inmate, proceeding pro se, brought a § 1983 action against a governor, challenging the constitutionality of a statute requiring inmates to pay a $100 annual health care services fee when they receive medical treatment. The district court dismissed the action. The inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that: (1) the governor was entitled to Eleventh Amendment sovereign immunity where the state department of criminal justice was the agency responsible for administration and enforcement of the statute; (2) allegations were insufficient to plead deliberate indifference where the inmate did not allege he was denied medical care or that he was forced to choose between medical care or basic necessities; (3) the inmate received sufficient notice that he would be deprived of funds; and (4) it was not unreasonable for the prison to take funds from the state inmate's trust fund account to pay for medical care. The court noted that the prison posted notices about the statute, the notices informed inmates of the fee and what it covered, and a regulation was promulgated that provided additional notice. Mueller v. Raemisch, 740 F.3d 1128 (7th Cir. 2014). Two convicted sex offenders brought an action challenging Wisconsin's statutory scheme of sex offender registration, notification, and monitoring, alleging violation of the prohibition against states enacting ex post facto laws. The district court ruled that the act's $100 annual registration fee was unconstitutional, but upheld other provisions of the act. The parties appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, modified in part, and reversed in part. The appeals court held that: (1) the sex offenders had standing to challenge the registration requirement, even though they did not intend to ever return to the state; (2) the sex offenders did not have standing to challenge provisions of a monitoring requirement relating to working with and photographing minors because the offenders no longer resided in the state; (3) the sex offenders did not have standing to challenge Wisconsin's prohibition against a sex offender changing his name, where neither offender had expressed the intent to change his name; (4) the sex offenders had standing to challenge monitoring of the act's requirements of continual updating of information supplied to the sex offender registry; (5) the monitoring act's requirements that sex offenders continually update information supplied to the sex offender registry were not punitive and therefore did not trigger the constitutional prohibition of ex post factor laws; (6) the $100 annual registration fee was not punitive; and (7) allowing the sex offenders to litigate pseudonymously was not warranted where the sex offenders' convictions were matters of public record and both sex offenders were currently registered in Wisconsin, making their names and other information freely available. The court noted that the annual fee was intended to compensate the state for the expenses of maintaining the sex offender registry, and since the offenders were responsible for the expense, there was nothing "punitive" about making them pay for it. Wilson v. Montano, 715 F.3d 847 (10th Cir. 2013). An arrestee brought a § 1983 action against a county sheriff, several deputies, and the warden of the county's detention center, alleging that he was unlawfully detained, and that his right to a prompt probable cause determination was violated. The district court denied the defendants' motion to dismiss. The defendants appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded in part. The detainee had been held for 11 days without a hearing and without charges being filed. The appeals court held that the defendants were not entitled to qualified immunity from the claim that they violated the arrestee's right to a prompt post-arrest probable cause determination, where the Fourth Amendment right to a prompt probable cause determination was clearly established at the time. The court held that the arrestee sufficiently alleged that the arresting sheriff's deputy was personally involved in the deprivation of his Fourth Amendment right to a prompt probable cause hearing, as required to support his § 1983 claim against the deputy. The arrestee alleged that he was arrested without a warrant, and that the deputy wrote out a criminal complaint but failed to file it in any court with jurisdiction to hear a misdemeanor charge until after he was released from the county's detention facility, despite having a clear duty under New Mexico law to ensure that the arrestee received a prompt probable cause determination. The court held that the arrestee sufficiently alleged that the county sheriff established a policy or custom that led to the arrestee's prolonged detention without a probable cause hearing, and that the sheriff acted with the requisite mental state, as required to support his § 1983 claim against the sheriff, by alleging that: (1) the sheriff allowed deputies to arrest people and wait before filing charges, thus resulting in the arrest and detention of citizens with charges never being filed; (2) the sheriff was deliberately indifferent to ongoing constitutional violations occurring under his supervision and due to his failure to adequately train his employees; (3) routine warrantless arrest and incarceration of citizens without charges being filed amounted to a policy or custom; and (4) such policy was the significant moving force behind the arrestee's illegal detention. Brown v. Moore, 93 F.Supp.3d 1032 (W.D. Ark. 2015). An inmate, proceeding pro se and in forma pauperis, brought a § 1983 action against a sheriff and jail officials, alleging that his constitutional rights were violated. The defendants filed a motion for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by an issue of fact as to whether the inmate's being housed with a prisoner who had a staph infection constituted deliberate indifference. The court found that the inmate's assertion that his diet was not approved on a yearly basis by a dietician in compliance with Arkansas Jail Standards did not equate to a constitutional violation under the Eighth Amendment. Doe v. Cook County, Illinois, 798 F.3d 558 (7th Cir. 2015). Detainees at a county juvenile detention center brought a class action against the center and the county, alleging that some employees at the center violated their constitutional rights by abusing their charges. The facility administrator, who was appointed to run the detention center as part of a settlement between the parties, proposed to terminate the employment of 225 direct-care employees and require them to apply to fill the new positions. The union for the employees intervened to oppose the administrator's plan, arguing that the proposal violated Illinois employment law by overriding the collective bargaining and arbitration statutes. The district court authorized the administrator to implement the plan. The union appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The appeals court held that the district court's approval of the administrator's plan was not a simple enforcement of the order appointing the administrator, and thus the district court was required pursuant to the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA) to make findings that the relief requested by the administrator was narrowly drawn, extended no further than necessary to correct the violation of a federal right, and was the least intrusive means. Hernandez v. County of Monterey, 110 F.Supp.3d 929 (N.D. Cal. 2015). The plaintiffs, current and recently released jail inmates seeking relief on behalf of a class, brought an action against the county, the sheriff's office, and the private company that administered jail health care facilities and services, alleging that substandard conditions constituted deliberate indifference in violation of the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments and failure to accommodate in violation of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA). The plaintiffs moved for a preliminary injunction. The district court granted the motion. The court held that the plaintiffs were likely to succeed on the merits in their action, alleging that county jail conditions constituted deliberate indifference in violation of Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments and failure to accommodate in violation of ADA. According to the court, there was significant evidence that the jail's policies and practices with regard to tuberculosis (TB) screening, suicide and self-harm prevention, alcohol and drug withdrawal, and continuing medical prescriptions, were noncompliant with contemporary standards and guidelines, placing inmates at risk and constituting deliberate indifference to their serious medical needs. The court noted that there was significant evidence that inmates with disabilities were excluded from access to exercise, religious services, and other meetings that were conducted in inaccessible locations, or from sign language interpreters, in violation of ADA. The court found that the plaintiffs were likely to suffer irreparable harm, absent preliminary injunctive relief, where the jail continued to fail to provide proper tuberculosis (TB) identification, isolation, diagnosis and treatment, to eliminate potential suicide hazards for unstable mentally ill patients, to continue community medications, and to properly treat inmates withdrawing from drugs and alcohol, and inmates with disabilities would continue to suffer access exclusion and lack of sign language interpreters. Hubbs v. Suffolk County Sheriff's Dept., 788 F.3d 54 (2nd Cir. 2015). A county jail detainee brought a § 1983 action against a county sheriff's department, and sheriff's deputies, alleging that he was severely beaten by the deputies while in a holding cell at a courthouse. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants based on the detainee's failure to exhaust administrative remedies. The detainee appealed. The appeals court vacated and remanded, finding that the affidavit of a county jail grievance coordinator, along with a handbook detailing a grievance procedure, did not establish that the detainee had an available administrative remedy, and neither the handbook nor the affidavit demonstrated that the county or sheriff's department, or any official, handled grievances arising from occurrences in the courthouse holding cells or whether remedies for such grievances were actually available. According to the court, the deputies forfeited any arguments that statutory remedies were available to the county jail detainee where the deputies failed to identify in the district court or on appeal any statutes or regulations showing that administrative remedies were available for events that took place in the courthouse holding facility. Jamal v. Kane, 105 F.Supp.3d 448 (M.D. Pa 2015). Inmates who engaged in written and oral advocacy, prisoner advocacy groups, and entities that relied on prisoners' speech brought an action seeking a declaratory judgment that the Pennsylvania Revictimization Relief Act, which authorized civil actions seeking injunctive and other relief when an offender engaged in any conduct which perpetuated the continuing effect of the crime on the victim, violated the First and Fifth Amendment. The plaintiffs also sought preliminary and permanent injunctive relief. The actions were consolidated. After a bench trial the district court granted the requested relief. The court held that: (1) the Act was content based; (2) the Act impermissibly infringed on free speech; (3) the Act was unconstitutionally vague; (4) the Act was unconstitutionally overbroad; and (5) a permanent injunction enjoining enforcement of the Act was warranted. The court noted that the Act did not define the term "offender," and the public thus could not know whose conduct the Act regulated. According to the court, the Act's prohibition on "conduct that causes a temporary or permanent state of mental anguish" offered no guidance to state courts in determining whether a victim was entitled to relief, and did not specify whether reactions to such conduct would be measured by an objective or subjective standard, or what level of anguish would constitute a violation. Simmons v. Corizon Health, Inc., 122 F.Supp.3d 255 (M.D.N.C. 2015).The guardians and conservators of a county jail inmate, who suffered a catastrophic hypoxic brain injury after going into cardiac arrest caused by excessive internal bleeding from a perforated ulcer, brought an action against the jail medical provider, the county, the sheriff, and the local government excess liability fund, asserting claims for deliberate indifference, negligence, and loss of consortium. The provider moved to dismiss for failure to state a claim, and the remaining defendants moved to dismiss for failure to state a claim and for lack of personal jurisdiction. The district court granted the motions in part and denied in part. The court held that the medical provider's alleged violation of its contract with the county, which required it to comply with standards set by the National Commission on Correctional Health Care, with respect to its treatment of the county jail inmate could not serve as a basis for the inmate's negligence claim under North Carolina law. According to the court, the fact that the county allegedly contracted out to the private medical provider did not preclude its obligation to provide inmates with medical care and the county could be held liable under § 1983 for the provider's allegedly constitutionally inadequate medical care of the inmate. The court noted that the provider was allegedly delegated some final policymaking authority and the county allegedly failed to review the provider's policies, such that some of the provider's policies became those of the county. Stojcevski v. County of Macomb, 143 F.Supp.3d 675 (E.D. Mich. 2015). A former county jail inmate, individually and as the administrator of the estate of his brother, who died after being incarcerated at the same jail, brought an action against a county, county officials and employees, the jail's private medical provider, and the provider's employees, alleging deliberate indifference to medical needs and municipal liability under § 1983 and gross negligence under state law. The defendants moved to dismiss. The court held that the employees' delegation of medical care of the inmate to an outside contractor did not entitle them to qualified immunity on Eighth Amendment deliberate indifference claims arising from the inmate's death. According to the court, regardless of the county's reliance on the contractor, if the employees were aware of a risk to the inmate's health, drew the inference that a substantial risk of harm to the inmate existed, and consciously disregarded that risk, they too would be liable for the inmate's injuries under § 1983. The court found that allegations by the administrator of the estate were sufficient to state a Monell claim against the county and the jail's private medical provider for municipal liability under § 1983. The court noted that although many of the policies and procedures set forth by the administrator in support of his claim, such as failure to adhere to national standards, did not state a constitutional violation, the examples of where such standards were not followed were factual allegations supporting his assertion that inmates at the jail were not afforded adequate medical treatment. Hamilton v. Love, 328 F.Supp. 1182 (E.D. Ark. 1971). The only legitimate purpose served by pretrial detention is assuring defendants' presence at trial. Minimally, a detainee ought to have the reasonable expectation that he would survive his period of detainment with his life; that he would not be assaulted, abused, or molested during his detainment; and that his physical and mental health would be reasonably protected during this period. Detainees may not be subjected to any punishment, "cruel and unusual" or not. Conditions of incarceration for detainees must, cumulatively, add up to the least restrictive means of assuring appearance at trial. One female staff member must be on duty twenty-four hours a day. There should be one staff member patrolling on each cell floor in the immediate area of every detainee on a twenty-four hour basis. (Palaski County Jail, Arkansas)

Logue v. United States, 412 U.S. 521 (1973). Logue was a federal prisoner being held in a Texas county jail while awaiting trial. The county jail contracted with the federal government to house federal prisoners. While in custody, Logue committed suicide, and his parents brought suit under the Federal Tort Claims Act (FTCA) which allows individuals to sue the U.S. Government for negligent acts of an employee of the government. The district court found the sheriff's employees failed to provide adequate surveillance, and held the government liable. The Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit reversed the decision on the grounds that a "contractor exclusion" clause relieved the government of liability for the sheriff's employees' acts, and that these employees were not acting on behalf of a federal agency in an official capacity as the act intended. Logue's parents then sought certiorari from the U.S. Supreme Court. (Vacated and Remanded.)

HELD: The county jail was a contractor, not a federal agency within the meaning of the FTCA. a) The U.S. Marshal had no control or authority over the Sheriff's employees; b) The arrangement for keeping federal prisoners in the county jail clearly contemplated that the day-to-day operation of the jail be left with contractor (sheriff).

HELD: The contention that the sheriff's employees were "acting on behalf of a federal agency in an official capacity" and were thus employees of the government is not consistent with the legislative intent of the FTCA.

NOTE: The court remanded for further proceedings the question of negligence on the part of the U.S. marshal in failing to order constant surveillance. (Nueces County Jail, Corpus Christi, Texas)

Delaware County Prison v. Com. Unemp. Comp. Bd., 455 A.2d 790 (Penn. App. 1983). Guard quits job because of hazardous working conditions; he is awarded unemployment benefits. The Unemployment Compensation Board ordered the Delaware County Prison to pay a former guard unemployment benefits on the basis that she had quit her job because of hazardous working conditions caused by inadequate staffing. The court agreed that the evidence supported the board's finding that voluntary termination was a result of necessitous and compelling reasons. The board determined that the guard had been left alone several times to oversee a large number of inmates, some not in cells. This duty normally required two or three correctional officers. Although forced overtime seemed to have been prison policy, the plaintiff was required to work considerably more hours than her fellow workers. Because she attempted to perform her duties despite the conditions before she quit, and was willing to stay if the conditions had been corrected as promised, the guard was awarded benefits pursuant to Section 402(b) of the Unemployment Compensation Law. After establishing the existence of constitutional violations, resulting in the lack of protection for prisoners housed at the Harris County Central Jail in Houston, the court ordered the sheriff to implement a new staffing plan requiring a minimum of two staff per quadrant and visual inspections at least every hour. The county had been previously ordered to correct the deficiencies at the jail, and the court did not accept their defense that there were no funds for additional staff. The plaintiffs cited high levels of violence and sexual assaults at the jail as a result of the condition and design of the facility: inadequate supervision, unreliable communication systems and lack of staff. Brewer v. Perrin, 349 N.W.2d 198 (Mich. App. 1984). Detention staff may be liable for juvenile's suicide because they failed to monitor actions and to make regular checks. An appeals court in Michigan has ordered a case to proceed to trial in which the plaintiffs charge the detention facility staff with responsibility for the suicide of their fifteen year old son. The boy was arrested after assaulting his twin brother; he was combative and belligerent during arrest and transport. Upon admission to a detention cell he continued to yell and scream. A staff member turned off an audio monitor because he decided the noise was interfering with department activities. After ninety minutes the boy hanged himself. He was only checked one time by facility staff during that period. The appeals court also instructed the jury to determine if liability might also result from violation of the state statutes regarding juvenile detention. (Southgate City Jail, Michigan)

FEMALE OFFICERS ASSIGNMENT

Grummett v. Rushen, 587 F.Supp. 913 (N.D. Ca. 1984). Federal court upholds female officers viewing of male prisoners in housing areas. Inmates at the San Quentin State Prison (California) brought suit in federal district court against the prison, claiming that the policy of assigning female correctional officers to prisoner areas which allowed them to view male inmates in states of partial or total nudity while dressing, showering, being strip searched or using toilet facilities, violated their constitutional rights for privacy.

Prison officials argued that reasonable efforts had been made to provide privacy, but that security considerations and the equal opportunity rights of female correctional officers supported current practices. While female officers are assigned to work in male housing units, they are prohibited from working in positions which would require close and direct view of unclad inmates.

The Federal Court agreed with prison officials, ruling in their favor. The Court noted that there were many situations and types of assignments involving female correctional officers which would be constitutionally impermissible. After examining the situation at the prison, the conduct of the female officers, and the volatile environment of the facility, the court found that current practices were reasonable. Kemp v. Waldron, 479 N.Y.S.2d 440 (Sup. Ct. 1984). State court finds that Sheriff and subordinate could be liable for negligent supervision- prisoner sues as a result of assault by another prisoner. A New York court determined that the Sheriff had a statutory duty to protect prisoners from harm while in his custody, and that he has discretion with regard to prisoner segregation.

The court referred determination of whether discretion was abused to a jury, along with a determination of the adequacy of supervision.

The county defendants were dismissed from the suit when the court found that they were not responsible for the sheriff's actions. However, the sheriff could be held liable along with the subordinate officer who failed to provide supervision. (Schenectady County Jail, New York)

Alberti v. Klevenhagen, 606 F.Supp. 478 (S.D. Tex. 1985). Court finds county in contempt; orders more staff to be hired and trained. In 1984, the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of Texas ordered Houston jail officials to hire and train additional staff according to a detailed plan which was devised by the court. The original order responded to eighth amendment deficiencies (unsafe living conditions). In 1985 the court found that officials had not hired all additional personnel, and had made it clear that they do not intend to hire staff while an appeal of the original decision is pending. The court ordered a conditional fine and payments to the court to pay for monitoring. (Harris County Jail, Texas)

O'Quinn v. Manuel, 767 F.2d 174 (5th Cir. 1985). Local government can be liable for jail conditions. A jail prisoner filed suit against Louisiana parish officials alleging that while he was detained he was beaten by prisoners and suffered severe injuries. The plaintiff argued that the assault and resulting injuries were the result of a failure to adequately supervise and protect prisoners. The appeals court found that parish officials could be held liable for the assault if they knew of jail deficiencies and failed to fund or otherwise support corrective actions. The case was remanded to the district court. (Caleasieu Parish Jail, Louisiana)

Alberti v. Klevenhagen, 790 F.2d 1220 (5th Cir. 1986). Appeals court upholds remedial measures of district court, finding levels of violence and sexual assault violated inmates' eighth amendment rights and ordering increased staffing. In a case initiated in 1972, the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit agreed with the sweeping corrective measures ordered by a federal district court. The original class action suit was brought under 42 U.S.C. Section 1983, alleging that the facilities and operations of the Harris County detention system violated inmate constitutional and statutory rights. In February, 1975, a consent judgment was entered in the district court, calling for upgrading of existing facilities, construction of a new central jail, and committing the county to provide sufficient and adequately trained guards and other staff to assure the security of inmates.

In December, 1975, the county's compliance with the consent judgment was challenged. Following hearings, a broad remedial order was issued. The court ordered adequate training and pay increases for jail personnel and ordered that staffing be increased to provide one jailer for every twenty inmates. In 1978 the court reluctantly approved plans for a new central jail. The plaintiffs had argued against the planned use of multiple occupancy cells, and the court expressly conditioned occupancy of the new facility on the provision of adequate staff. In 1982 and 1983 the district court held hearings to determine if adequate staffing was provided for the newly-opened detention facility. The court ordered the county to prepare a plan which complied with Texas Commission on Jail Standards (TCJS) requirements of one officer to forty-five inmates, eventually approving such a plan. When the county failed to meet a June, 1983, deadline for full staffing, the plaintiffs filed a motion for contempt.

The county was granted TCJS approval in October for an alternative poststaffing plan, which provided less staff than the previous "one to forty-five" plan. After extensive hearings in 1984, and the presentation of evidence and testimony on violence in the facilities, the court ordered the implementation of a staffing plan which was similar to one proposed by the plaintiffs' experts, calling for approximately the same number of staff as the original "one to forty-five" plan, but incorporating a different assignment scheme.

On appeal, the county argued that the evidence presented in the 1984 hearings was not sufficient to support the district court finding of constitutional violations, and that the new staffing plan ordered by the court exceeded what should be required to remedy any such violations. The appeals court affirmed all aspects of the district court corrective orders, stating that "....it is more regrettable that after thirteen years conditions in the jails are still in contravention of constitutional standards. Despite the efforts of the parties and the court, inmates continue to be beaten, raped, abused, and assaulted. The district court has acted properly in fashioning new relief for an old malady." Dizak v. State, 508 N.Y.S.2d 290 (A.D. 3 Dept. 1986). An inmate brought action against the state alleging that it was guilty of negligence in permitting a second inmate to have access to a pick axe used to attack the inmate. The court of claims entered judgment in favor of the state, and the inmate appealed. The Supreme Court held that the inmate attacked by a second inmate failed to establish that the state knew or should have known of the inmate's tendency toward violent behavior, or that the supervision provided was not sufficient. The inmate failed to demonstrate that supervision by a guard who continuously patrolled the work area checking on each member was insufficient, despite evidence that the attacking inmate had been the subject of eleven or twelve misbehavior reports, all but two of which concerned minor nonviolent violations. The correction officer who had made an earlier misbehavior report on the inmate who attacked the second inmate did not have training or education to qualify him as an expert to render his opinion that the inmate could cause a major incident on the floor at any time, and that the inmate had almost caused two incidents, so that portion of the report containing such a statement was clearly inadmissible. Duran v. Anaya, 642 F.Supp. 510 (D.N.M. 1986). State prisoners sought a preliminary injunction to halt layoffs of staff and filling of staff vacancies. The district court held that New Mexico prison inmates were entitled to a preliminary injunction prohibiting implementation of proposed staff reductions with respect to medical care, mental health care, and security where there was no evidence that staffing reductions of the magnitude contemplated would permit the maintenance of minimal constitutional standards in those areas. However, the court would not prohibit staff reductions other than those relating to medical care, mental health care and security where there was no evidence that any such proposed reductions would adversely affect the minimal constitutional rights of prisoners. A prisoner has a right to be reasonably protected from constant threats of violence and sexual assaults from other inmates, and failure to provide an adequate level of security staffing, which may significantly reduce the risk of such violence and assaults, constitutes deliberate indifference to legitimate safety needs of prisoners. The state has a constitutional obligation to make available to prisoners a level of medical care that is reasonably designed to meet routine and emergency health care needs of prisoners, including medical treatment for inmates' physical ills, dental care and psychological or psychiatric care. Gross deficiencies in staffing establishes deliberate indifference to prisoners' health needs. A lack of financing is not a defense to a failure to satisfy minimum constitutional standards in prisons. (Department of Corrections, New Mexico)

Inmates of Occoquan v. Barry, 650 F.Supp. 619 (D.D.C. 1986). A class of inmates confined at state medium security facilities brought a federal civil rights action seeking declaratory and injunctive relief for deprivation under color of state law of fifth and eighth amendment rights. The district court held that overcrowding and systemically deficient conditions constituted cruel and unusual punishment justifying equitable relief. The plaintiffs contend that an excessive inmate population, deficiencies in environmental health and safety, food services, and mental health care, alone or in combination, violate their rights guaranteed by the United States Constitution. There was no disagreement among the expert penologists that inmates should be engaged in some productive enterprise, properly supervised. Nonetheless, enforced idleness presents a major problem at Occoquan. The correctional officers do not supervise properly the sleeping areas of the dormitories. Correctional officers do not make patrols on a frequent and regular basis, nor are officers stationed in the rear of each dormitory so as to facilitate supervision of the living area when inmates are present. Thomas v. Booker, 784 F.2d 299 (8th Cir. 1986). Damages awarded to prisoner against city jail employees as a result of prisoner-on-prisoner beating. The plaintiff was placed in the St. Louis City Jail as a detainee in May, 1980. After being assaulted by another prisoner, he was returned to the same cell which he had occupied earlier, where he was later involved in a fight with another prisoner. He suffered a broken hand and injuries which eventually produced blindness in one eye. The plaintiff sued the chief of security, the supervisor of correctional officers, and a correctional officer. The appeals court affirmed a $3,000 award actual damages and $10,000 punitive damages against the chief of security, and $1,000 actual damages against the correctional officer. The court also reinstated a jury verdict of $10,000 against the correctional officer which had been set aside by the trial court. The supervisor was not found liable, because he had instructed the plaintiff to discuss his fears with the chief of security when he was told of them. The correctional officer was on duty when the assault occurred and was supposed to have made rounds every fifteen or twenty minutes. Apparently, rounds were not made as appropriate, and the fight was not discovered. (St. Louis City Jail, Missouri)

Carlson v. Conklin, 813 F.2d 769 (6th Cir. 1987). The Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals ruled that placing a man convicted of armed robbery in a community corrections center ("half-way house") was no basis to find the Director of the Department of Corrections liable for the man's subsequently abducting a woman and sexually assaulting her. The court found that the crime was "too remote" from the actions of the Director to attach liability. The court's decision to dismiss the Section 1983 suit reversed the district court's ruling. The district court had allowed the claim to continue based on the following allegations: (1) the defendant authorized departmental policies in placing known dangerous prisoners in half-way houses; (2) that it was foreseeable that assaults would occur in the surrounding communities; and (3)that the defendant owed the victim a duty of care to prevent injury. The appeals court ruled that there is no duty to protect the general public from criminals, unless promises of protection are made to individual members. According to the appeals ruling, no duty was owed to the woman as a member of the public absent a special relationship. (Department of Corrections, Michigan)

A federal prisoner failed to prove that prison overcrowding or an insufficient number of guards proximately caused the injuries the prisoner sustained as a result of an altercation with fellow inmates. To support the prisoner's expert's conclusion that one more guard would have prevented the assault would have required the placement of a guard at the shower/bathroom at all times. This situation would make the government an insurer of a prisoner's safety, a standard that was not required. (United States Penitentiary, Lewisburg, Pennsylvania)

Colburn v. Upper Darby Township, 838 F. 2d 663 (3rd Cir. 1988), cert. denied, 109 S.Ct. 1338. The estate of a detainee who committed suicide while incarcerated brought action against township and police officials. The district court dismissed the case and the plaintiffs appealed. The appeals court held that: (1) the allegation that custodial personnel knew or should have known that the detainee was a suicide risk was sufficient to state a Section 1983 claim against official; and (2) the allegation that the township had a custom of inadequately monitoring jail for potential suicides was sufficient to state a cause of action. Further, the court found that the fact that the deceased inmate was the third person to commit suicide while in custody of the same jail was reason to state a Section 1983 claim. The court noted that a detainee is entitled under a due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to, at minimum, no less protection for personal security than that afforded to convicted prisoners under the Fourteenth Amendment and, no less a level of medical care than that required for convicted prisoners by the Eighth Amendment. Though custodial officials cannot be placed in a position of guaranteeing that inmates will not commit suicide, such officials know or should know of a particular vulnerability. Prior suicides could be viewed as providing a governing body with knowledge of its alleged custom. The appeals court ruled, however, that the police commissioner and mayor could not be held personally liable in a Section 1983 action arising out of suicide of a detainee absent allegations that either was personally involved in any activity related to detainee's death. The death of a psychiatrically disturbed prisoner whose body was dismembered a few months after his transfer to a district jail was caused by the "deliberate indifference" of prison officials to his health or safety problems, according to a federal appeals court. The court ruled found that information about the prisoner's psychiatric history was, or should have been, in his prison files, and that prison officials who approved of the transfer should have known of the inmate's psychological problem and that there was evidence that the inmate should never have been in the general prison population. According to the court, it was unlikely that the inmate would have been killed if any of the officials had acted to segregate him from mentally sound prisoners at the jail. According to the appeals court, when prison officials intentionally place prisoners in dangerous circumstances, when they intentionally ignore prisoners' serious medical needs, or when they are deliberately indifferent either to a prisoner's health or safety, they violate the constitution. McGhee v. Foltz, 852 F.2d 876 (6th Cir. 1988). An inmate who was stabbed by a fellow prisoner brought a civil rights suit against the warden of the medium security prison alleging a violation of his constitutional right to be free of cruel and unusual punishment under the eighth amendment. Following a bench trial, the U.S. District Court found in the inmate's favor, and the warden appealed. The court of appeals, reversing and remanding with directions, found that evidence did not support the determination that the warden failed to respond to the pervasive risk of harm in prison by providing adequate staffing, so as to constitute deliberate or wanton indifference to the plaintiff's constitutional rights. Evidence in the damage suit against the warden did not support a determination that there was pervasive risk of harm in the prison at the time of the stabbing, even though there had been a recent increase in the number of assaults within the entire prison. A great majority of the assaults did not result in serious injury. There was no evidence that the rate of serious assaults exceeded that of similar prisons, and no evidence that the plaintiff was a member of any identifiable group that had been targeted for an attack. Even assuming there was possible departure from a proper level of staffing in the inmate's cell block at the time of the incident, the warden had no notice or knowledge of any danger to the inmate or of any particular problems in his cell block, and there was no evidence of a pervasive risk of harm to prisoners at the time of the incident. Thomas v. Benton County, Ark., 702 F.Supp. 737 (W.D. Ark. 1988). The parents of an arrestee who committed suicide in a county jail brought a civil rights action against the county. On June 22, 1983, the plaintiffs' decedent, their son, was incarcerated in the Benton County, Arkansas, jail. Late on the evening of that day he tore strips from his bedding and fashioned a "rope". He hung himself from a light fixture in his cell, also occupied at the time by two other inmates. These two individuals declined to come to his aid, because, as expressed by them at the trial, they did not want to become involved and perhaps be charged with a "murder rap." Instead of doing the obviously humanitarian thing of coming to his aid, they claimed that they began to bang on the cell bars and yell at the jailers that Thomas had hung himself. Although there was a dispute in the evidence about how long it took the jailers to respond, it is clear that several minutes elapsed before a jailor came to the scene. Upon arriving at the scene, the jailor saw Thomas hanging from the fixture but did not enter the cell to aid him because of a jail rule that prohibited jailers from entering occupied cells on felony row unless at least two jailers were present. The night of this occurrence, only two jailers, a male and female, were on duty. The female jailer also served in the capacity of despatcher, and another rule prohibited her from leaving the radio. The plaintiffs, his parents and personal representatives, claim that the existence of harmful conditions and practices and the lack of appropriate procedures in the operation of the Benton County Jail denied the decedent his constitutional right of due process. They sought damages from the defendant, Benton County, Arkansas, for pain and suffering, mental anguish, and the loss of their son's companionship. After a verdict was entered against the parents, the parents moved for a new trial. The district court, denying the motion, found that the jury finding that the county did not violate the civil rights of the arrestee and did not treat him with deliberate indifference was not against clear weight of evidence. Vega v. Parsley, 700 F.Supp. 879 (W.D. Tex. 1988). Parents of a juvenile who committed suicide while in a juvenile detention facility brought a civil rights action against the county, the sheriff, and the director of the facility. On the defendants' motion for summary judgment, the district court found that there was no eighth amendment violation with respect to conditions in the facility, including the presence of a shower curtain rod on which the juvenile hung himself. No constitutional violation was shown on the theory that the juvenile was denied treatment. No claim was stated on the theory of failure to staff, train and supervise the facility. No due process violation was established on the theory of summary judgment which caused the juvenile's death; and the defendants were entitled to qualified immunity.

The plaintiffs failed to state a claim of violation of the eighth and fourteenth amendments in the alleged failure of the county, as a matter of official policy, to staff, train and supervise the facility, where the plaintiffs failed to allege or establish what specific areas of training were inadequate or to establish any other specific incident where the prisoner or child committed or attempted to commit suicide, or that any policy or custom of the detention facility caused or contributed to any suicide. Even assuming that the action by the deputy in leaving the juvenile unattended in a cell for 15 or 20 minutes, during which time the juvenile committed suicide, was negligence or gross negligence, the conduct could not be imputed to the county for purposes of liability under the civil rights statute. Not allowing the parents to visit their juvenile son during the period of two or three hours on the morning following his placement in the juvenile detention facility, during which time he committed suicide, did not rise to a constitutional deprivation. Carapellucci v. Town of Winchester, 707 F.Supp. 611 (D. Mass. 1989). The administratrix of a deceased pretrial arrestee's estate brought a civil rights action and state law claim against police officers and the town for violation of the eighth amendment right to medical treatment. On the motion for summary judgment, the federal district court found that in light of the similarity between the symptoms of drug ingestion and alcohol intoxication, the police officers and the town were not grossly negligent in failing to arrange for the medical treatment of the arrestee. Both the expert and the lay testimony were insufficient to raise a genuine issue of material fact. The court also found that the booking procedures recommended by the American Correctional Association were insufficient to determine what standard was applicable to the town jail. It was determined that the officers had qualified immunity, and under Massachusetts law, the police officers and the policy chief had immunity. The police officers' failure to supervise a pretrial arrestee was not an adequate basis for a finding of gross negligence or worse after the arrestee died in his cell from a prearrest drug ingestion, sufficient to impose liability on them, where the officers were unaware of a serious medical need. The symptoms of the arrestee were barely distinguishable from alcohol intoxication. The police officers' failure to give a blood test or a medical examination to a drunk driving arrestee was not grossly negligent or sufficient to impose liability following the arrestee's death. The evidence that was found was inadequate to show that the town was grossly negligent for failing to have a policy or facilities to allow for the treatment of the drunk driving arrestee who died in custody as a result of the previous ingestion of alcohol, glutethimide and large quantities of codeine; the lack of evidence that any agency used the expert's recommended procedures, or that any government unit had adopted the expert's suggested guidelines rendered the opinion insufficient. The difference of seven minutes from the recommended schedule for checking on an intoxicated pretrial arrestee would not support the finding of negligence, nonetheless gross negligence, after the arrestee died in his cell as the result of a prearrest drug ingestion. The jail's failure to have booking forms inquiring whether the arrestee had consumed medication or drugs was not evidence of gross negligence of a minimally accepted standard booking practice for holding jail facilities, notwithstanding the recommendation for the use of such forms by the American Correctional Association. Danese v. Asman, 875 F.2d 1239 (6th Cir. 1989), cert. denied, 110 S.Ct. 1473. A pretrial detainee hung himself in his cell, using his shirt as a rope. He had been arrested for driving while intoxicated. His estate and his relatives filed a Section 1983 civil rights suit against individual officers and supervisory personnel, as well as the municipality. The federal district court found that the due process clause requires that certain steps be taken to protect a pretrial detainee who is suspected to be suicidally inclined, for the purposes of a Section 1983 action. In this case, the court ruled that the right to personal security under the fourteenth amendment is not extinguished by lawful confinement, and includes a prisoner's right to safe conditions. The lower court also concluded that a pretrial detainee's interest in safe conditions in a city jail, for purposes of a Section 1983 claim, applied not only to physical conditions of the jail itself, but also to allegedly unsafe conditions produced by the defendant officers' lack of action to protect the detainee. The court found that the detainee was deprived of his liberty interest by the officers' failure to protect him from self-injury despite their awareness of his threats of self-injury and his mental and physical condition. Further, the lower court also found that supervisory personnel could be held liable if the plaintiffs could prove their allegations that they failed to provide any training or establish any procedures for intake screening and suicide prevention. On appeal, however, the court found that they enjoyed qualified immunity. The court did rule, however, that the "punishment" analysis under the fourteenth amendment was inapplicable to the claim that the city fire department deprived a pretrial detainee of his constitutional rights by its failure to render lifesaving techniques after the detainee hanged himself in the city jail. The court reasoned that the fire department was not connected with the incarceration of persons allegedly in violation of the law. (Roseville City Jail, Michigan)

Davis v. City of Ellensburg, 869 F.2d 1230 (9th Cir. 1989). A civil rights action was brought against the city and police officers for injuries suffered by an arrestee who died. The U.S. District Court granted a summary judgment for the city, and the plaintiffs appealed. The appeals court found that the city was not liable on the theory

it had a policy of inadequate training of officers, inadequate medical treatment of prisoners, or a deliberate indifference to the use of excessive force. The city's failure to have written policy regarding the proper use of force in a misdemeanor arrest did not amount to delegation of policymaking authority to rank and file police officers so as to render the city liable in a civil rights action for injuries suffered by an arrestee by transforming the individual police officers into municipal policymakers whose decisions in individual cases might give rise to a municipal liability. The court also found that the city was not liable on the theory it had a policy or custom of inadequately supervising its police officers. According to the court, the plaintiff cannot prove the existence of a municipal policy or custom for purposes of a civil rights action under Section 1983 based solely on the occurrence of a single incident of unconstitutional action by a nonpolicymaking employee. The city was not liable for injuries suffered by the arrestee who died on the theory the city had a policy or custom of inadequately supervising its police officers; the chief sent an officer with an alleged alcohol problem and an officer with an alleged mental disorder to the police psychologist for an evaluation. The chief allowed the officers to remain on active duty only after receiving written reports that both were competent to perform their duties, and the chief received informal reports that the officer with an alleged alcohol problem was no longer drinking, so the evidence did not establish that the chief acted with deliberate indifference in failing to remove the officers from active duty. Fisher v. Koehler, 718 F.Supp. 1111 (S.D.N.Y. 1989), aff'd., 902 F.2d 2 (2nd Cir. 1990). Prison inmates brought a class action against prison officials and others, challenging conditions of confinement as violative of their rights under the federal constitution. Following a finding, 692 F.Supp. 1519 (S.D.N.Y. 1988), that violence at the prison reached a level which violated the eighth amendment, the defendants were given the opportunity to submit a reasonable plan for the court's consideration. The district court found that the proposed plan to reduce violence by staff and inmates against inmates to comply with the eighth amendment would be adopted, with some modifications. The prison officials were entitled to an opportunity to establish that periodic, rather than permanent, presence of an officer would prove sufficient to prevent violence in dormitories consisting of inmates with little or no history of assaultive behavior. The appeals court found that conditions at the prison violated the eighth amendment, and the district court's remedy was properly formulated. A new inmate who was sexually assaulted by another inmate filed a federal civil rights action and pendent state law claims against two correctional officers and three supervisory officials of the State Department of Corrections. The district court found that the corrections officers who entrusted the plaintiff to the other inmate were not liable under Section 1983 absent evidence that either officer was aware that the other inmate presented a specific risk of violent homosexual attack to new prisoners. The supervisory officials were not liable under a civil rights provision absent any evidence that they approved of or acquiesced in the prison policy violation. For the purposes of a federal civil rights claim, the risk that homosexual rape will occur cannot be presumed as a matter of law every time an individual is left unattended with a prisoner. The Commissioner of the State Department of Corrections was not liable absent any evidence that the Commissioner played any role in planning or development of the facility at which the assault occurred. Popham v. City of Talladega, 908 F.2d 1561 (11th Cir. 1990). The administratrix of the estate of a deceased jail inmate brought a civil rights action against the city and jail officials. During the celebration of his wedding, Ronald Popham was arrested for public intoxication. In addition to being intoxicated, he was emotional, depressed, and angry at the time of his arrest. Popham's belt, shoes, socks, and pocket contents were removed by jail personnel who placed him in a holding cell and at 9:30 p.m., ordered the cell monitored. Monitoring was accomplished by closed circuit television located on another floor of the jail where the camera was operated by a radio dispatcher. Popham was last checked on physically when the shift ended at 11:00 p.m., after which there were no guards or jailers on duty. Sometime later, in a small space within the cell unviewed by the camera, Ronald Popham hanged himself from the bars by his blue jeans. He was discovered at 5:15 a.m. Christmas morning. Mrs. Popham claimed several constitutional violations, in effect, that her husband had a right to be protected from committing suicide while incarcerated, that he was not properly monitored after being placed in a cell by himself, and that his jailers were not properly trained to identify prisoners who might show a tendency to suicide. The U.S. District Court denied relief and the administratrix appealed. The appeals court affirmed the decision and found that evidence did not show a deliberate indifference by jailers to the inmate where they were unaware of any suicidal tendencies. Because jail suicides are analogous to the failure to provide medical care, deliberate indifference is the barometer by which suicide cases involving convicted prisoners as well as pretrial detainees are tested. The deliberate indifference standard applicable to civil rights actions arising out of jail suicides requires a strong likelihood, rather than a mere possibility, that the self-infliction of harm will occur, and deliberate indifference will not be found to exist in the face of only negligence. The failure to train jail personnel to screen detainees for suicidal tendencies did not provide a basis for imposing civil rights liability following the inmate's suicide. Standard procedures followed by the jail inmate's custodians prior to the inmate's suicide, which included the removal of shoelaces, belts, socks, and pocket contents, as well as closed circuit cell monitoring, demonstrated a lack of deliberate indifference to his safety, even though the closed circuit camera could not pick up every corner of his cell. Timm v. Gunter, 917 F.2d 1093 (8th Cir. 1990), cert. denied, 111 S.Ct. 2807. Prisoners at an all-male Nebraska state penitentiary brought a class action alleging that allowing female guards to perform pat searches and see them nude or partially nude violated their right to privacy, and the female guards asserted equal employment claims. The U.S. District Court granted the prisoners partial relief, and the male prisoners and female guards appealed. The court of appeals found that allowing female guards to pat search male prisoners on the same basis as male guards was a reasonable regulation as applied at the Nebraska State Penitentiary, and so did not violate any privacy rights which the prisoners retained. In addition, the surveillance of male prisoners by female guards performed on the same basis as surveillance of prisoners by male guards did not violate any privacy interests which prisoners might retain. The sex-neutral visual surveillance of prisoners and the goal of the prison security was rationally connected, the prisoners had alternative means available to retain their privacy, and prison administrators were in the best position to balance competing interests present in the context of visual surveillance techniques. It was also found that the differences in privacy protections afforded male and female prisoners in the Nebraska penal system did not violate the Fourth Amendment equal protection, although female prisoners were afforded more privacy protections at an all-female institution than male prisoners were afforded at the all-male institution. The male and female prisoners were found to be not similarly situated due to differences in security concerns at the two institutions that reflected differences in the number and age of prisoners, the kinds of crimes committed by them, the length of sentences, and the frequency of incidents involving violence, escape, or contraband. The prison rules prohibited female guards from conducting strip searches except in emergency situations, privacy screens precluded full view of inmates while they showered, and brief observations which may have revealed inmates in various stages of undress during periodic tier checks were a necessary part of the correctional officer's duties and essential to maintain security of the institution. Bragado v. City of Zion/Police Dept., 839 F.Supp. 551 (N.D.Ill. 1993). A suit was brought under the Section 1983 civil rights statute, the Illinois Survival Act, and the Illinois Wrongful Death Act seeking damages for the city's failure to personally inspect and prevent the suicide of a jail prisoner. After the jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, posttrial motions were made in which the plaintiff sought funeral expenses and the defendant sought judgment notwithstanding the verdict. The district court found that evidence supported a finding that jail officials acted with deliberate indifference to the prisoner's rights. Inadequate personal inspections of the prisoner were done despite the knowledge of the prisoner's suicidal tendencies. Audio and video monitoring were also insufficient. In addition, the on-duty officer knew of the prisoner's threat of suicide, as well as her intoxication and injuries to her wrists. The court also found that the jury's verdict awarding damages for the city's wrongful failure to prevent the prisoner's suicide, in the amount of $5,000 under the Illinois Survival Act and approximately $232,000 under the Illinois Wrongful Death Act as well as nominal damages for Section 1983 civil rights violation, was supported by evidence and was reasonable. Canell v. Armenikis, 840 F.Supp. 783 (D.Or. 1993). Penitentiary inmates brought a Section 1983 action against prison officials, challenging female guards' viewing of unclothed male inmates. The defendants moved to dismiss for failure to state a claim. The district court found that the Constitution does not prohibit a female guard from viewing an unclothed male inmate under circumstances in which identical viewing would be proper if the viewer were a male guard. According to the court, the gender of the guard is irrelevant as long as there would be justification for the guard to view the unclothed male inmate and the guard behaves appropriately. Russell v. Knox County, 826 F.Supp. 20 (D.Me. 1993). A Section 1983 action was brought against a county, the sheriff and county corrections department officials' for an inmate's death by suicide. On the defendants' motion for judgment as a matter of law at the close of the plaintiff's case, the district court found that the county was not liable for the inmate's death, based on an alleged county policy of allowing all involuntary detainees to retain their shoelaces. In addition, the actions of a line corrections officer at the county jail, in allegedly delaying his inspection of the inmate's cell as part of a suicide watch for four minutes while he went to the bathroom, did not manifest any "deliberate indifference" to the inmate's constitutional rights, such as might support a Section 1983 action against the officer when the inmate hanged himself in his cell. The officer had never been told anything by the inmate suggesting that he intended to commit suicide, and the officer was surprised that the inmate committed suicide. (Knox County Jail, Maine)

Canedy v. Boardman, 16 F.3d 183 (7th Cir. 1994). An inmate sued a prison for Section 1983 violations resulting from invasion of privacy where female prison guards were routinely allowed to conduct strip searches and observe his naked body. During a shakedown search of his housing unit, two female prison guards searched him. The U.S. District Court dismissed the suit, and the inmate appealed. The appeals court found that the inmate was entitled to reasonable accommodations to prevent unnecessary observations of his naked body by female guards. The court noted that while all forced observations or inspections of a naked body implicate privacy concerns, it is generally considered a greater invasion to have one's naked body viewed by a member of the opposite sex. Hare v. City of Corinth, MS, 22 F.3d 612 (5th Cir. 1994). The estate of a pretrial detainee who committed suicide brought a civil rights action against jail officials. The U.S. District Court denied the officials' motion for summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds, and the officials appealed. The appeals court noted that, at the time the pretrial detainee committed suicide in 1989, jail officials were under a clearly established constitutional duty to respond to the detainee's serious medical needs, including suicidal tendencies and attempts to commit suicide, with at least more than deliberate indifference. The pretrial detainee committed suicide in her cell by hanging herself with a blanket she had torn into strips. The court found genuine issues of material fact as to whether jail officials knew or should have known of the detainee's vulnerability to suicide. She was placed in an isolated cell which was not visually monitored and which could not be reached by a trustee or the dispatcher on duty. The court precluded summary judgment in favor of the officials on qualified immunity grounds. (Corinth City Jail, Mississippi)

State prison inmates filed an action alleging that overcrowding and understaffing exposed inmates to an unconstitutionally unacceptable risk of physical violence. On the inmates' motion for a preliminary injunction, the U.S. District Court issued a mandatory preliminary injunction ordering prison officials to reduce the total inmate population by 30 percent of operating capacity in two months, in addition to ordering officials to take other remedial actions. The defendants appealed. The appeals court found that, in issuing the mandatory preliminary injunction, the district court exceeded the limited remedial authority vested in federal courts to direct the way in which state prison officials meet the dictates of the Eighth Amendment. The court's assumption of extensive managerial control over the prison was premised upon conclusory findings regarding the inmates' allegations that overcrowding and understaffing exposed the inmates to an unacceptable risk of physical violence. (North Carolina's Morrison Youth Institution)

Coppage v. Mann, 906 F.Supp. 1025 (E.D.Va. 1995). A former Virginia prison inmate brought a § 1983 action alleging Eighth Amendment violations against a prison superintendent, physician, nurse and private consulting physician. The plaintiff also asserted state-law claims for medical malpractice, intentional infliction of emotional distress and assault and battery. The plaintiff claimed that his cancerous condition was misdiagnosed and that he was subjected to inhumane living conditions during his course of treatment. The district court granted summary judgment, in part, for the defendants, dismissing all federal claims. The district court retained jurisdiction over state-law claims. The court ruled that the inmate did not have claims for intentional infliction of emotional distress or assault and battery, that the inmate failed to establish deliberate indifference to his serious medical needs, and that the defendants were entitled to qualified immunity. The court also found that the acknowledged fact that the inmate sometimes had to lie in his own waste, was not immediately provided with a wheelchair, and was handcuffed to his bed as a last resort to treat his bedsores, did not make out an Eighth Amendment claim. However, the court found that a fact issue existed as to whether the prison physician's conduct amounted to gross negligence so as to deprive him of sovereign immunity. Although the prison was short-staffed with nurses, this did not establish an Eighth Amendment violation absent any evidence that nurses were not hired with the knowledge that, as a result, the inmate would be placed at substantial risk of living in inhumane conditions. Hale v. Tallapoosa County, 50 F.3d 1579 (11th Cir. 1995). A pretrial detainee filed a Section 1983 action against a county, its sheriff and a jailer arising from an alleged beating of the detainee by other inmates in a group cell. The U.S. District Court entered summary judgment in favor of the defendants and the detainee appealed. The appeals court, affirming in part, reversing in part and remanding, found that evidence that the jailer failed to check on the group cell during the hour between the last check and the beating was not sufficient to show deliberate indifference and causation necessary to hold the jailer individually liable for the detainee's injuries. However, genuine issues of material fact existed, precluding summary judgment for the sheriff and the county, on whether conditions of the cell subjected the detainee to a substantial risk of serious harm, whether the sheriff was deliberately indifferent to the risk, and whether the beating of the detainee was caused by the excessive risk of violence in the group cell resulting from an atmosphere of deliberate indifference. The evidence showed that the jail was overcrowded during the time in question. In addition, the sheriff testified that he knew of inmate violence during periods of overcrowding and that incidents had required hospitalization of inmates. Although the sheriff worked toward the construction of a new jail, the existing jail had no policy for classifying and segregating inmates, the jailer had received no professional training, and the jailer was stationed out of eyesight and earshot of the cell. On a motion of the defendants for summary judgment, the district court found that no policy or custom amounting to deliberate indifference was shown to have caused the inmate's suicide for purposes of liability of jail officials in their official capacities under Section 1983. The county detention center had in effect a policy and procedure manual which provided for the care and treatment of suicidal inmates, providing for administrative segregation and observation on 20 minute intervals. Smith v. Norris, 877 F.Supp. 1296 (E.D. Ark. 1995). An inmate sought declaratory and injunctive relief based on alleged unconstitutional conditions of confinement. The district court found that the inmate was entitled to injunctive relief based on the failure of prison officials to comply with a previous court order regarding security checks of an open barracks unit in the prison. The record clearly demonstrated that prison officials and the state agreed in a prior case that a serious problem existed and they agreed on how to solve the problem and funds were actually appropriated to alleviate the problem. The prison officials did not carry through on their agreement with the Department of Justice, instead making a unilateral decision to ignore the problem and use the funding elsewhere. The prison officials were not entitled to qualified immunity from liability. The inmate's constitutional right to reasonable protection from inmate-on-inmate violence was clearly established at the time of his assault, and a previous court opinion had set forth conditions of confinement for the open barracks unit. It required a correctional officer in the hallway to constantly monitor two opposing open barracks containing up to 100 inmates each and hourly security patrols. Prison officials failed to carry out the required security patrols and knew that they were violating clearly established constitutional rights. (Cummins Unit, Arkansas Department of Correction)

Byrd v. Abate, 945 F.Supp. 581 (S.D.N.Y. 1996). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against a correction officer, commissioner of correction and city mayor after he was injured during an incident at a city correctional facility. The district court denied summary judgment for the defendants, finding that the inmate had satisfied the objective element of his Eighth Amendment claim by demonstrating that he was blinded in his left eye when a fellow inmate stabbed him with an unknown instrument. The court found that a genuine issue of material fact remained concerning whether the correction officer acted with deliberate indifference to the inmate's safety when he left his assigned post to relieve another officer. The court held that the inmate's claim may rest on the assertion that the inmate faced an excessive risk of attack shared by other inmates in his situation, and that he need not show that he faced an excessive risk of attack for reasons unique to him. The court noted evidence presented established that the officer responsible for watching the inmate's area left his assigned post and relieved another officer without supervisory permission or proper relief, and that the inmate and others incarcerated in the area were receiving services from the facility's mental health center. Clark v. McMillin, 932 F.Supp. 789 (S.D.Miss. 1996). A wrongful death suit alleging state law and federal civil rights claims was brought against a sheriff, a county, and an unnamed defendant seeking damages for the death of a pretrial detainee who was assaulted and killed by his cellmate. The district court remanded the state law claims and dismissed the federal claims. The court found that the sheriff's policy of checking cells containing pretrial detainees on suicide watch every 15 minutes was not deliberate indifference, even though 15 minutes was more than enough time for one inmate to kill another. The court found that although the sheriff did have constructive knowledge of the perpetrator's violent propensities from county records, the sheriff did not have actual knowledge of a substantial risk of serious harm to the victim. The plaintiffs had alleged that the county had no policy to safeguard inmates from attacks from other inmates, that the sheriff failed to place the perpetrator in a unit for violent felons, that the county failed to properly screen inmates for violent propensities, and that the county failed or refused to provide adequate medical care to the victim after the assault. A district court granted injunctive relief in response to an inmate's claims of unconstitutionally dangerous prison conditions, and in response to another inmate's allegations that officials had failed to protect him from an attack by another prisoner. The court applied collateral estoppel in favor of a third inmate's estate. Prison officials' appeals were consolidated. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The appeals court held that it was within the district court's discretion to grant injunctive relief for insufficient supervision of an open barracks at a prison after the court concluded that the threat of harm to inmates from other prisoners violated the Eighth Amendment. Although one guard remained in the barracks hallway, the guard was prohibited from entering the barracks if an altercation was in progress. Two inmates were violently stabbed while asleep in their beds and evidence indicated that violence, robbery, rape, gambling and the use of weapons by inmates were prevalent in the open barracks. The court also determined that the solutions adopted by the district court to respond to overcrowding and supervision problems in a previous unrelated case could be used to measure the officials' conduct and knowledge when determining if the officials were entitled to qualified immunity. An inmate detained in a county jail as the result of an alleged parole violation sued the county because he was beaten by other inmates while detained. The court denied summary judgment for the county, finding it was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to the existence of subjective knowledge of risk on the part of the jail and the sheriff. The parolee and most other persons housed at the jail were allowed to leave the jail during the day to work and returned in the evenings. According to jail policy, only one jailer was provided for the facility, and he was required to be present at the jail twenty-four hours a day, seven days a week. The jailer was only allowed to leave the jail when deputy sheriffs were present at the facility. Policy required the jailer to check on prisoners every hour during the day, but nighttime checks were not made. The jailer could monitor inmates electronically in two ways: an intercom and an emergency switch available to inmates. The administrator of the estate of an arrestee who suffered a fatal drug overdose after a plastic bag containing methamphetamine which he had ingested burst, brought an action against jail employees asserting § 1983 and state law claims. The district court found that jail employees whose contact ended when the arrestee was booked and jailed were not deliberately indifferent to the serious medical needs of the arrestee. But the court found that employees with later contact were not entitled to qualified immunity and that a fact issue existed as to whether the failure of these employees to obtain medical care violated the Eighth Amendment. The court held that the plaintiff failed to establish a failure to train or to supervise on the part of the countynoting that it is necessary to establish that a particular training program is inadequate rather than alleging that a particular officer may be unsatisfactorily trained, because the shortcomings of an officer may have resulted from other factors than a faulty training program. The court held that the plaintiff failed to establish that the arrestee's death was the result of either exertion of improper control by supervisors or the failure of supervisors to control employees, as required to recover against a municipality based on a claim of inadequate supervision. Jones v. City and County of San Francisco, 976 F.Supp. 896 (N.D.Cal. 1997). Pretrial detainees brought a class action against the City and County of San Francisco and various city officials challenging the constitutionality of their conditions of confinement at a jail. The district court granted various summary judgment motions filed by the plaintiffs and the defendants, enjoining future overcrowding based on past unconstitutional overcrowding. The court found due process violations based on the defendants' inadequate response to fire safety risks at the jail, excessive risks of harm from earthquakes, physical defects in the jail's water, plumbing and sewage systems, excessive noise levels, and poor lighting.

The detainees were exposed to excessive risks of harm from earthquakes in violation of their due process rights, where the jail lay a quarter mile from the San Andreas fault and faced a 50% chance of experiencing a high magnitude earthquake over the next 50 years. The jail appeared structurally unable to withstand substantial seismic activity andhad a malfunctioning bar locking system and inadequate staffing that further augmented risk by potentially leaving inmates trapped in their cells during and after an earthquake. The court rejected the government's contention that more than 30 public buildings in the area had the same seismic rating as the jail. The court noted that the public's alleged tolerance of risk associated with entering a poorly-constructed library or museum for an hour did not equate to tolerance for spending 100 days continuously trapped in such a facility.

The court found deliberate indifference to the risk of earthquakes despite the defendants' contention that it would cost more than $33 million to upgrade the jail and efforts to gain voter approval for funding for a new facility had failed. The court noted that the city could have attempted other funding methods and did have some funds allocated for seismic repairs but diverted that money to other projects. Scott v. Moore, 114 F.3d 51 (5th Cir. 1997). A pretrial detainee who alleged she was sexually assaulted by a correctional officer brought a § 1983 action against a city and its police chief. The district court entered summary judgment for the defendants, but the appeals court remanded the case on the claim of inadequate staffing. On remand, the district court again entered summary judgment for the defendants and the detainee appealed. The appeals court vacated and remanded. On rehearing en banc, the court of appeals affirmed, holding that the detainee met the burden of establishing a constitutional violation but that the city's failure to adopt a policy of adding jail staff did not constitute deliberate indifference. According to the majority, there was no showing that the city had actual knowledge that its staffing policy created a substantial risk of harm to female detainees. As a condition of employment, jailers underwent background investigations, medical examinations and polygraph tests, none of which revealed any concerns about the jailer who allegedly sexually assaulted the detainee. The majority noted that the jailer had been a commissioned police officer for four years prior to his employment with the jail, without incident, and that he had been trained in the official policies of jail management by experienced jailers. The detainee had been arrested for public intoxication, assault and resisting arrest, and was taken to a city jail, processed by a female jailer who was on duty at the time, and placed in a holding cell pending arraignment. A male jailer subsequently replaced the female officer, entered the detainee's cell, and sexually assaulted her repeatedly during the course of his eight-hour shift. The jailer resigned and pleaded guilty to criminal charges. The majority of the appeals court rejected the detainee's argument that constitutionally adequate staffing would have included, at a minimum, a female jail officer, or at least two male officers, whenever a female pretrial detainee is in custody. The majority noted that the jail is located on the first floor of the police department, in the patrol division area, and a patrol duty sergeant periodically checks on jail personnel. However, four appeals judges dissented, suggesting that the city's policy of inadequate staffing enabled the harm to be committed and actually facilitated the sexual assault. The majority asserted that the assault was episodic--by definition incidental or occasional, rather than regular and systematic. The minority argued that the long established custom of inadequate staffing was far from episodic, and that the city only offered financial justifications for its staffing policy. In the dissenting opinion, the judges stated they were unwilling to "classify the issues in this case as 'minutia.'" (City of Killeen Police Dept., Texas)

Barney v. Pulsipher, 143 F.3d 1299 (10th Cir. 1998). Two female former inmates who were sexually assaulted by a jailer each brought a § 1983 action against jailer, county, sheriff and county commissioners based on their assault and other conditions of confinement. The actions were consolidated and all defendants except the jailer were granted summary judgment by the district court. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the county was not liable on the grounds of failure to train or inadequate hiring. The court held that the inmates did not show that the training received by the jailer was deficient and that even if it was, the sexual assault of the inmates was not plainly the obvious consequence of a deficient training program. The court noted that the sheriff should not have been expected to conclude that the jailer was highly likely to inflict sexual assault on female inmates if he was hired as a correctional officer.

The court found that the sheriff and commissioners did not violate the inmates' rights by permitting the jailer to be the sole guard on duty in the county jail. The court noted that permitting a single officer to be on duty when a second jailer was sick or on vacation did not impose liability on the county, where there were no previous incidents of sexual harassment or assault of female inmates that would have given notice to the county that its one-jailer policy would result in injuries. The court also noted that the sheriff acknowledged problems with crowding and inadequate monitoring, and its inability to house female inmates for extended periods of time. The county contracted out female inmates to neighboring jails that had better facilities and limited confinement of female inmates to 24-36 hours whenever possible.

According to the appeals court the inmates failed to establish an equal protection claim. The court also found that the sheriff and commissioners did not act with deliberate indifference to the female inmates' health and safety with regard to conditions of confinement. The inmates' allegations regarding a filthy cell, inadequate lighting and ventilation, lack of enclosure around a shower, unappetizing food, and lack of access to recreational facilities, did not rise to the level of a constitutional violation given that the inmates were confined for only 48 hours. Essex County Jail Annex Inmates v. Treffinger, 18 F.Supp.2d 445 (D.N.J. 1998). Inmates filed a motion to hold county corrections defendants in civil contempt for noncompliance with a consent decree addressing unconstitutional conditions of confinement. The district court held that monetary sanctions for civil contempt were not appropriate in light of the county's efforts to attain full compliance by investing over $200 million in new facilities and improving existing ones. The court concluded that contempt sanctions would be counterproductive and would impede the county's efforts to build a new jail. The court held that it could not consider whether a classification plan satisfied the consent decree until an independent analysis was conducted. The court noted that the Special Master reported that staffing was inadequate, and as a result inmates and staff are exposed to danger and other problems. The court adopted the Master's recommendation that an independent, professional staffing analysis be conducted to address staff training, coverage and operations. The Master also reported that there was an insufficient supply of personal hygiene items, and the court ordered the defendants to comply with the consent order's terms by issuing adequate amounts of personal hygiene items, including toilet paper, soap, shampoo, toothpaste, toothbrush, comb, mirror, individual razors and shaving cream or powder. The district court granted summary judgment to the defendants, finding that the facility's policy of keeping pretrial detainees in the same housing unit as convicted inmates did not constitute deliberate indifference to a substantial risk of harm. The court also held that the lack of guidelines or training procedures regarding segregation of convicted inmates was insufficient to support claims for failure to supervise or failure to train. Liebe v. Norton, 157 F.3d 574 (8th Cir. 1998). A detainee's wife and the administrator of his estate sued a county, sheriff and jailer for damages under § 1983, after the detainee committed suicide while incarcerated in a county jail. The district court dismissed the case and the appeals court affirmed, finding that the jailer who classified the detainee as a suicide risk, took preventive measures by placing the detainee in a temporary holding cell and removing his shoes and belt, and periodically checked on the detainee, did not act with deliberate indifference to the detainee's health or safety. The court found the jailer was entitled to qualified immunity because the steps taken by the jailer were affirmative, deliberate steps to prevent suicide. The court held that the county could not he held liable on a § 1983 claim of failure to supervise, based on the on-the-job training received by the jailer, the county's failure to test the jailer on his knowledge of a manual outlining suicide prevention policies, and the county's decision to leave the jailer in charge. The appeals court found that this did not rise to the level of deliberate indifference. The court also found that the county was not liable for failing to train jailers on the risks of inmate suicides, when the county had in place policies intended to prevent suicides and no suicides had occurred at the jail before the detainee's. The court found that failing to lead the jailer, step by step, through policies in the manual did not amount to failure to train. The detainee had been arrested and taken to the jail and was intoxicated at the time of his admission. The admitting jail officer classified the detainee as a "suicide risk" because he admitted to previously attempting suicide and was on both clonazepam and valium. The officer checked on the detainee at intervals ranging from 7 minutes to 21 minutes, but did not turn on the audio system in the holding cell. The detainee used his long-sleeved shirt to hang himself on a metal-framed electrical conduit in the cell. The jailer was the only staff member on duty at the time. Before being assigned to work by himself he was given on-the-job training for 2½ weeks. The jailer was scheduled to attend a jailer training course but it was not offered for another month. The appeals court held that the warden could not be held liable based on the allegation that he knew or should have known that the chances of inmate-on-inmate violence were greatly enhanced by the disappearance of a razor blade. The court also held that the alleged absence of guards in towers and a catwalk overlooking the prisoner's unit at the time of the attack did not give rise to liability on the warden's part, as the warden was not responsible for such aspects of the day-to-day operations at the prison. According to the court, a warden is not responsible for the failure of his subordinates to carry out prison policies unless the subordinates are acting, or failing to act, on the warden's instructions. The appeals court vacated and remanded, finding that summary judgment was precluded by a factual dispute about the scope of the jail shift supervisor's responsibility and whether he abdicated his responsibility. The inmate was threatened by a cellmate when he left his cell to meet with a detective. After the meeting the inmate was moved to a different cell, apparently in response to the threat. The inmate was threatened again the next day when he was escorted past his former cell, and was allegedly threatened by other inmates while dining. The inmate requested protective custody. Although he was not moved, he was placed on "cell feed" status which eliminated his contact with other inmates in the common dining area. Several days later the inmate was involved with a visit which required him to use a common visiting area. While in the visiting area he was assaulted by his former cellmate who was also involved with a visit. The inmate suffered a broken nose, torn shoulder ligaments and a head laceration which required stitches. (Somerset County Jail, Maine)

Cain v. Rock, 67 F.Supp.2d 544 (D.Md. 1999). A female prisoner brought a § 1983 action against county officials. The district court held that the county's policy of allowing cross-gender supervision did not violate the prisoner's rights. The court also found that a random sexual assault by a correctional officer, where there was no history of assaults on prisoners by employees and the county had moved quickly to investigate the officer's actions, was not "punishment" for Eighth Amendment purposes. The prisoner claimed that the officer had performed oral sex on her in her cell. (Anne Arundel County Detention Center, Maryland)

Lopez v. LeMaster, 172 F.3d 756 (10th Cir. 1999). A pretrial detainee who was beaten by other inmates while confined in a jail brought a § 1983 action against the county sheriff individually and in his official capacity. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the sheriff and the detainee appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part and remanded. The detainee was arrested and placed in a general population cell in the county jail where he was threatened by another inmate. A jail officer took the detainee to an office where he prepared a written statement about the threat. But the officer returned the detainee to the general population cell where he was attacked and beaten by several inmates. The officer returned later and the detainee asked to be taken to the hospital. The officer took the detainee to an office, called an unknown person to ask for instructions, and then told the detainee "you are still conscious, we don't have to take you." The detainee was given aspirin, placed in a different cell and was released the next day. He went to the hospital after his release and was diagnosed with a severe contusion to the skull with post-concussion syndrome and a severe strain to the cervical, thoracic and lumbosacral spine. The appeals court held that the detainee failed to establish a claim for failure to provide adequate training and supervision of jail personnel because he failed to identify specific deficiencies that were closely related to his injuries. The court noted that evidence which showed that the jailers were generally poorly trained was insufficient to support the training and supervision claims. But the appeals court found that material issues of fact precluded summary judgment on the claim that the county maintained an unconstitutional policy of understaffing the jail and failing to monitor inmates, with deliberate indifference to inmate health or safety. The court noted that a suit against the sheriff in his official capacity is the equivalent of a suit against the county. The appeals court found that fact issues precluded summary judgment for the sheriff in his individual and official capacities on the detainee's failure to protect claims. The appeals court also held that summary judgment was precluded on the detainee's claim alleging that the sheriff was deliberately indifferent to his serious medical needs. Sanders v. Howze, 177 F.3d 1245 (11th Cir. 1999). The administrix of a detainee's estate sued jailers alleging violation of the detainee's Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment rights arising from the detainee's suicide in jail. The district court denied summary judgment for the jailers and they appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded with directions. The appeals court held that the jailers were entitled to qualified immunity, absent any preexisting Eleventh Circuit caselaw clearly establishing that the suicide prevention measures taken by the jailers were so inadequate as to constitute deliberate indifference. Several weeks after he was arrested and placed in the jail, the detainee removed a razor blade from a disposable razor and cut his left wrist. Following jail policies, staff transported the detainee to a local hospital's emergency room for treatment and evaluation. He was then transferred to a state hospital where he remained for several months. He returned to the jail and was placed in the general population where two days later he used a pencil to reopen his wrist wound. He was treated at the local hospital and returned to the jail the same day, where he was placed in an isolation cell near the jailers' office to prevent his access to items that might be used to injure himself. The next day he reopened the wound, was treated at the hospital, and returned to the isolation cell. He was transferred to a state hospital for several weeks and was placed in an isolation upon his return. The state hospital gave no special instructions concerning his care. The county petitioned the court for a psychiatric evaluation of the detainee but before the evaluation could be conducted the detainee was found dead, hanging from a light fixture in his cell by a bedsheet. Two jailers were on duty the night the detainee died but they did not detect his death for four to six hours after it occurred, despite a jail policy requiring lights in isolation cells to remain on at all times and for inmates in isolation are to be visually monitored every 30 minutes. Smith v. Blue, 67 F.Supp.2d 686 (S.D.Tex. 1999). The parents of a juvenile who committed suicide while in custody at a juvenile detention center operated by a county sued the county and facility supervisors under § 1983. The district court declined to dismiss the case, finding that the parents stated a § 1983 claim against the county for violating the juvenile's Fourteenth Amendment right to medical protection against his own suicidal intentions, and that the parents stated a wrongful death claim. The court found that the facility supervisors' practice of pre-entering cell inspection records and then avoiding making actual visual checks on juveniles was so pervasive that is constituted a policy or custom and was the result of inadequate training. The court found that a wrongful death claim was stated by the allegation that the juvenile's death was caused by a bedsheet left unsupervised in his cell. At the time of his detention the juvenile had been diagnosed as suffering from attention deficit disorder and this was confirmed in evaluations done after his admission. During his four-month stay the juvenile allegedly threatened suicide and physically harmed himself on several occasions. When his behavior worsened to the point that he refused to come out of his cell and began hiding under his bed, he was placed in solitary confinement as punishment for refusing to follow directions. While in solitary confinement he was allowed to keep several personal items, including a towel, T-shirts, athletic shoes with laces, and a bed sheet. One evening he was found dead, hanged from a loose sprinkler head with a bedsheet. Written cell inspection reports indicated that staff had visually checked on the juvenile every 15 minutes until the discovery of his body, but a subsequent investigation revealed that the records had been altered after the body was discovered. The original records stated that the juvenile had been checked every fifteen minutes before his death and for four hours after his death. Staff admitted that it was routine practice to complete inspection reports beforehand and to fail to make the required visual checks. Investigators determined that the juvenile had been dead for an hour before his body was discovered, confirming that the 15-minute checks had not been conducted. Weaver v. Tipton County, Tenn., 41 F.Supp.2d 779 (W.D.Tenn. 1999). The administrix of the estate of a detainee who had died of alcohol withdrawal while in a county jail brought a § 1983 action against county officials alleging deliberate indifference to the deceased detainee's medical needs. The district court granted summary judgment, in part, in favor of the defendants. The district court held that the protections of the Eighth Amendment do not attach to pretrial detainees and that the Captain of the jail was not deliberately indifferent to the needs of the detainee by failing to act when he was left in a single-occupancy cell with no medical care. The court also held that jail supervisors were not liable for failure to supervise their subordinates. The court noted that the jail Captain had no contact with the detainee during his incarceration and knew nothing about the incarceration until after the detainee's death, and that the supervisors did not implicitly authorize, approve or acquiesce in their subordinates' failure to provide medical treatment to the detainee. According to the court, the jailers' failure to provide medical care to the detainee over the course of six days was not a pattern of unconstitutional conduct. The court cited hundreds of other instances in which other inmates received medical attention. But the court denied summary judgment for the sheriff and the county, finding that it was precluded by issues of fact as to whether their failure to ensure that adequate staffing, medical training, and supervision policies were in place and were enforced. The court found that the correctional defendants were not entitled to qualified immunity when sued in their personal capacities for violation the male prisoner's privacy rights, because female officers could and did regularly view his genitals and other private areas of his body while he showered. The court held that there were fact issues as to whether the defendants reasonably believed that they were not violating one of the prisoner's clearly established rights. But the court found that the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA) barred the prisoner's claims of emotional distress and sexual dysfunction, allegedly caused by the corrections officials' actions, because such psychosomatic injuries did not qualify as a "physical injury" under the provisions of PLRA. Williams v. Kelso, 201 F.3d 1060 (8th Cir. 2000). The executor of the estate of a jail inmate who committed suicide while in custody sued jail employees under § 1983. The district court dismissed state law claims against health care providers but denied summary judgment for the defendants on certain claims. The appeals court affirmed the grant of summary judgment and reversed the denial of summary judgment on the remaining claims. The appeals court found that even though a psychologist had instructed jailers to check the inmate's vital signs every four to six hours, their failure to follow this instruction over a period of about seven hours was a matter of negligence, at most, and did not show deliberate indifference. The appeals court also held that there was no requirement under the Eighth Amendment that the jailers provide immediate medical attention to a disoriented, confused, belligerent detainee who had been arrested on an alcohol related misdemeanor charge. The court held that jail supervisors were entitled to qualified immunity on the claim of deliberate indifference in failing to initially segregate the inmate from other inmates upon booking. According to the court, the jail officials gave the inmate his medication, placed him in the misdemeanor section of the jail, regularly observed him, had him examined by a psychologist and psychiatrist, and were in the process of transferring him to a treatment center when his suicide occurred, and the inmate had given no overt indication that he was a suicide risk. The court noted that the plaintiff's expert witness even offered the opinion that persons who exhibited the symptoms that the inmate presented do not generally harm themselves. The district court granted partial summary judgment in favor of the officers, finding that the allegations did not support a claim for inadequate training of an officer and that past "use of force" incident reports did not support the claim for inadequate supervision of the officer. According to the court, the assertion that a particular officer may be unsatisfactorily trained does not alone "suffice to fasten § 1983 liability" on a municipality for failure to train. The court noted that none of the reports showed that the deputy acted improperly. The officer had brought the arrestee to a county jail and during the booking process an altercation between the arrestee and the officer resulted in a right hip fracture and dislocation for the arrestee. Sanville v. McCaughtry, 266 F.3d 724 (7th Cir. 2001). The mother of a mentally ill inmate who committed suicide while incarcerated in a state prison brought an action against prison physicians, wardens and officers. The district court dismissed the case and the appeals court affirmed in part, and reversed and remanded in part. The appeals court held that the allegations stated a claim that the officers were aware of a substantial risk of harm that the inmate would commit suicide and failed to take reasonable steps to prevent the inmate's suicide. According to the appeals court, the officers were not entitled to qualified immunity on the § 1983 individual liability claims. The mother alleged that the inmate had recently lost nearly one-third of his body weight, had written letters to her contemplating his death, had written a last will and testament, had told officers that he planned to commit suicide, and had covered his cell openings with toilet paper so that it was difficult to see inside. The mother also alleged that the inmate was last seen alive by officers at 10:00 a.m. and that in the following five hours before his suicide was discovered his cell window was covered with toilet paper, there was no apparent attempt to determine if the inmate was stable. The district court denied the defendants' motion to dismiss. The court held that the inmate's allegations supported Fourteenth Amendment claims and a claim of deliberate indifference under § 1983. The court found that the inmate sufficiently alleged sufficient injury. The inmate alleged that the food service company's preparation was so unsanitary as to pose both an immediate risk to the inmate's health, and that the food served hindered his recovery from his ulcer, cirrhosis of the liver, and Hepatitis B and C. The inmate alleged that unsanitary conditions included serving meals on trays that contained spoiled food from previous meals, and inadequate supervision of employees that resulted in improper handling, preparation and sterilization of equipment. Estate of Hampton v. Androscoggin County, 245 F.Supp.2d 150 (D.Me. 2002). The estate of a county jail inmate filed a state court action against a county and county officials. The case was removed to federal court, where the defendants moved for summary judgment. The federal district court granted summary judgment for the defendants, finding that the county was not liable under § 1983 and that the sheriff was immune from liability under a state court claims act. According to the court, even if the inmate's death was attributable to a jail officer's refusal to summon emergency medical personnel upon the inmate's request, and there was evidence of another incident in which officers denied another inmate his medication, there was no evidence that either incident involved so many jail staff as to reflect a widespread practice. The inmate had been brought to the jail in the afternoon, and he told an admitting officer that he did not suffer from any disability, did not require any form of assistance, and was not taking any medication at the time. He was assigned to a maximum security cell block where he was checked by staff every fifteen minutes. The following day he did not indicate to jail staff that he was in need of medical attention when they checked on him every fifteen minutes. During a cell check an officer found him lying on his back and he was unresponsive. A physician's assistant who was working in the jail at the time responded to a "code blue" and found jail staff administering mouth-to-mouth ventilation to the inmate. Paramedics arrived at the jail and continued efforts at resuscitation and he was transferred to a local hospital, where he was pronounced dead approximately an hour after he had initially been found unconscious in his cell. Foster v. Fulton County, Georgia, 223 F.Supp.2d 1292 (N.D.Ga. 2002). Inmates at a county jail, who had tested positive for human immunodeficiency virus (HIV), brought an action complaining of their conditions of confinement and inadequate medical care. The parties entered into a settlement agreement. Two years later the district court responded to a report that described ten areas in which the county had failed to comply with the terms of the settlement. The court held that continued overcrowding at the jail deprived the HIV-positive inmates of their constitutional right to minimal civilized measures of life's necessities. The court ordered the county to institute additional measures to reduce crowding, including: providing counsel within 72 hours of arrest to all persons accused of minor offenses who could not make bail; expanding the authority of Pretrial Services to include supervision of persons arrested for misdemeanor offenses; eliminating any unreasonable factors used to exclude persons charged with felonies from pretrial release; ensuring persons charged with misdemeanors were offered a reasonable bond; and imposing additional restrictions on the length of time a person could remain in jail without accusation or indictment, or accused or indicted but untried. The court found the county had violated the settlement agreement by failing to refer HIV-positive inmates to outside specialists in a timely manner when the jail's own staff lacked the resources to provide timely care. The court noted that even though the county had eliminated its financial review procedures, other bureaucratic problems remained and resulted in delays of three weeks to six months. The court held that the county failed to employ sufficient numbers of trained correctional staff to meet the health needs of HIV-positive inmates. The court ordered the county to immediately develop and implement a plan to increase security staffing at the jail to the level necessary to provide timely access to medical care for the current population of inmates. Hill v. McKinley, 311 F.3d 899 (8th Cir. 2002). A prisoner brought § 1983 action alleging jail officers and a sheriff violated her Fourth Amendment right to privacy, and her privacy rights under state law. The prisoner had been marched down a hallway naked, escorted by staff members of the opposite sex, and was then strapped face down to a restrainer board in a spread-eagle position. The district court denied the defendants' request for judgment as a matter of law, refused to reduce damages, and granted attorney fees to the prisoner. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded with directions. The appeals court held that the use of male officers in an otherwise justified transfer of an unruly and naked female prisoner did not violate the Fourth Amendment. The court held that the prisoner's Fourth Amendment rights were violated when she was allowed to remain completely exposed to male officers on a restrainer board for a substantial period of time after the threat to security and safety had passed. But the court found that the officers were entitled to qualified immunity because their actions did not violate clearly established law, noting that prisoners were entitled to very narrow zones of privacy. The court found that evidence supported the verdict for the prisoner on her state law privacy claim and the $2,500 compensatory damage award for invasion of privacy. (Story County Jail, Iowa)

Oliver v. Scott, 276 F.3d 736 (5th Cir. 2002). A male prisoner brought a civil rights suit against a prison warden, correctional officers, and private contractors who operated a state jail facility, alleging constitutional violations arising from cross-gender surveillance and strip searches, and the absence of partitions in male shower areas. The district court dismissed a portion of the complaint for failure to state a claim and entered summary judgment in favor of the defendants for the remaining issues. The prisoner appealed and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that any minimal right to bodily privacy possessed by the male prisoner did not preclude cross-gender surveillance and that such surveillance, in the absence of partitions in the male shower area, did not violate the prisoner's equal protection rights. The court noted that fundamental implied rights—marriage, family procreation, and the right of bodily integrity—do not include a right of prisoners to avoid surveillance by members of the opposite sex. According to the court, the existence of privacy partitions in female inmates' showers and the absence of male guard surveillance of female inmates did not violate the equal protection rights of the male prisoner because male prisoners were not similarly situated to female prisoners due to their conviction for more violent crimes, larger numbers, and higher incidence of violent gang activity and sexual predation. The court found that the prisoner's complaint did not identify a specific unconstitutional policy that correctional officers allegedly violated by engaging in cross-gender strip searches and monitoring of prisoners. Rapier v. Kankakee County, Ill., 203 F.Supp.2d 978 (C.D.Ill. 2002). The wife of a detainee who committed suicide while in jail filed a § 1983 suit individually, and as the special administrator of the detainee's estate. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants, finding that the county was not liable for alleged deliberate indifference toward the prevention of suicide by detainees. The court found that the county's policy of placing potentially suicidal detainees in a special needs cell, along with its policy to require checks of these inmates every 15 minutes, was an effective way to prevent suicides. The court also found that the county's failure to adequately deal with the problem of understaffing at the jail was not the cause of the detainee's suicide, because an officer saw or spoke to the detainee 15 to 20 minutes prior to the time he was found hanging in his cell. The sheriff has stated that seven staff members were working at the jail at the time of the suicide, the jail's census was lower than usual at the time, and that he did not think that having additional staff would have made a tremendous difference. Riley v. Olk-Long, 282 F.3d 592 (8th Cir. 2002). A female inmate brought a § 1983 action against prison officials arising from a sexual assault by a prison guard. A jury found in the inmate's favor and the officials moved for judgment as a matter of law or for a new trial. The district court denied the motions and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the issue of whether a warden and a director of security were deliberately indifferent to the substantial risk of harm that the guard presented to female inmates was a matter for the jury. The guard had asked the inmate whether she was having a sexual relationship with her roommate at the facility and if so, if he could watch. The guard later attempted to reach under the inmate's nightshirt but she backed away. The guard continued to harass the inmate and at one point grabbed her from behind and rubbed up against her while grabbing her breasts. The inmate did not report these incidents to prison officials because she doubted she would be believed and feared the resulting discipline. Later, the guard entered the inmate's cell and forcibly had intercourse with her. Fearing she would become pregnant she began performing oral sex on him. Another inmate witnessed the sexual encounter and reported it to prison officials. The officials investigated and subsequently allowed the guard to resign. He was later charged with, and pleaded guilty to, sexual misconduct with an inmate. The district court jury found in favor of the inmate, awarding her compensatory damages of $15,000 and a total of $30,000 in punitive damages. (Iowa Corr'l Inst. for Women)

A prisoner brought state tort and federal Eighth Amendment claims against county officials arising out of a serious spinal chord injury he allegedly suffered in a fall, and for which he did not receive requested medical attention. The defendants moved for summary judgment and the district court granted the motions in part, and denied in part. The district court found no Eighth Amendment violation from the failure of jail staff to provide clean bedding and clothing to the inmate who suffered from incontinence, on four or five occasions. The court concluded that the inmate's complaint that officials failed to supervise jail staff to ensure compliance with procedures was "far too generic" to support an Eighth Amendment claim, and that he failed to show systemic and gross deficiencies in training jail personnel. The inmate was a trustee in the jail and alleged that he fell while working in the kitchen and sustained injuries. An officer noticed the inmate limping about a week after the alleged fall and immediately took the inmate to the jail medical room for evaluation. The inmate also alleged that the jail failed to follow certain national standards, but according to the court, failed to show that the jail had any duty to follow those national standards. The officials asserted that the minimum legal standards for the operation of county jails are established in state law, rather than by national standards. (Lyon County Jail, Kansas)

Cagle v. Sutherland, 334 F.3d 980 (11th Cir. 2003). The personal representative of the estate of a pretrial detainee who hung himself in his cell brought a § 1983 action, alleging that officials failed to prevent his suicide. The district court denied summary judgment in favor of the defendants and they appealed. The appeals court vacated and remanded. The appeals court held that the county's violation of a consent decree that arose out of a voluntary settlement of a prior jail conditions lawsuit, did not establish a violation of the pretrial detainee's constitutional rights actionable under § 1983. The consent decree required the county to provide a second nighttime jailer to staff the jail during the hours that the detainee committed suicide, but the court noted that the prior lawsuit was not concerned with the risk of prisoner suicides. According to the court, the county's failure to fund the second jailer did not rise to the level of deliberate indifference to the strong likelihood that a suicide would result. The court also found no deliberate indifference on the part of the jailer who waited for one hour and forty-six minutes after his last cell check, even though the detainee had expressly threatened suicide. The court noted that the jailer was aware that the detainee's belt, shoelaces and the contents of his pockets had been confiscated, the cell had been stripped of implements that might assist suicide, and the jailer regularly observed the detainee through a closed circuit monitor that viewed the majority of the cell. The detainee

The mother of a pretrial detainee who attempted suicide brought a § 1983 action against a police officer, alleging deliberate indifference to the detainee's risk of attempting suicide. The district court denied summary judgment for the officer and the officer appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that summary judgment was precluded by an issue of fact as to whether the officer was aware that the detainee was on the verge of trying to commit suicide and whether the officer was deliberately indifferent to the detainee's safety. The court noted that the detainee's right to be free from deliberate indifference to the risk that he would attempt suicide was clearly established. The detainee was transferred to a county facility after a brief period of detention in a city jail. When he was admitted to the county facility he was not placed on suicide watch, but he did ask to speak to a mental health advisor. He was assigned to a holding cell that contained a telephone with a strong metal cord. When the police officer called the county facility to complain about calls from the inmate, county employees found the detainee unconscious, hanging from the wire telephone cord. Gaines v. Choctaw County Com'n., 242 F.Supp.2d 1153 (S.D.Ala. 2003). Administrators of a deceased inmate's estate asserted state and federal law claims against a sheriff and county, alleging that the inmate's death resulted from the denial of medical treatment while the inmate was a pretrial detainee in a county jail. The district court held that the county could not be held liable for any alleged lack of training or supervision of the sheriff, or sheriff's employees. The court found that allegations failed to support a claim against the county based on its statutory duty to maintain a jail, but that the allegations supported a claim against the county for an alleged breach of duty to fund medical care, where the alleged failure to provide adequate funding to meet the medical needs of inmates supported a claim for deliberate indifference under § 1983. The court held that the alleged conduct of the county in failing to equip the jail with audiovisual equipment to monitor inmates failed to support a claim against the county, absent an allegation that the failure caused, or in any way contributed to, the inmate's death. PRISONER CHECKS

Gray v. Tunica County, Mississippi, 279 F.Supp.2d 789 (N.D.Miss. 2003). The estate of a jail inmate and his relatives brought a suit against a county and a jailer, alleging federal civil rights claims and state law claims. The inmate had committed suicide in a jail holding cell. The district court granted summary judgment, in part, for the defendants. The court held that the county had no civil rights liability for jail conditions or policies related to the suicide of the pretrial detainee who was placed in a new "lunacy" cell under a suicide watch. The detainee apparently managed to strangle himself with a ripped-off piece of his jail jumpsuit. The court found that the holding cell was new and safe and that the method of suicide was unforeseeable. The court noted that it was doubtful that the detainee could have been helped, even if a jailer had entered the cell immediately upon noticing that the detainee had removed his jumpsuit and was lying nude in a peculiar position. According to the court, the jail policies involving intermittent checks were reasonably related to the legitimate purpose of protecting inmates from harm. The jailer had decided to finish feeding other inmates before he returned to check on the welfare of the detainee in the holding cell. The detainee had been checked about an hour after being placed in the new holding cell, and the jailer returned 30 minutes later to discover the detainee unconscious in the cell. Robinson v. U.S. Bureau of Prisons, 244 F.Supp.2d 57 (N.D.N.Y. 2003). The mother of a federal prisoner who died after he was stabbed by another inmate, brought § 1983 and Federal Tort Claims Act actions against prison officials. The district court held that prison officials were not deliberately indifferent to the serious medical needs of the inmate, and that the officials were not negligent under state law. The mother had alleged inadequate supervision and staffing practices, citing an instance in which one corrections officer supervised 219 inmates who had violent proclivities during a facility-wide move. The court noted that the mother did not offer any expert testimony or other evidence to establish that the officials were aware of an excessive risk to the inmate's safety, or to establish a breach of the officials' duty of care. Everson v. Michigan Dept. of Corrections, 391 F.3d 737 (6th Cir. 2004). Male and female corrections officers brought a class action against a state corrections agency, alleging gender discrimination in staffing positions within female prison housing units. The district court granted judgment in favor of the officers and the state appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded, finding that female gender was a bona fide occupational qualification (BFOQ). The court held that female gender was a BFOQ under Title VII for correctional officer and residential unit officer positions in housing units at a female prison, since the exclusion of males from such positions was reasonably necessary to the normal operation of facilities. According to the court, the BFOQ materially advanced the security of the prison, safety of inmates, and protection of privacy rights of inmates, and reasonable alternatives to the plan were not identified. The daughter and the administratrix of an estate brought a civil rights action against a county, sheriff and other persons after her father died while in jail. The district court denied the defendants' motion to dismiss, in part. The court held that the plaintiff stated a claim against the county for an alleged breach of duty to provide adequate funding for medical treatment of, and medicines for, the inmate. The father had died while he was serving a 90 day sentenced for domestic violence, and allegedly was not screened for a determination of proper medical care. (Coosa Co. Jail, Alabama)

Stiltner v. Crouse, 327 F.Supp.2d 667 (W.D.Va. 2004). The father of a pretrial detainee who committed suicide in jail brought a § 1983 action against jailers. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the jailers. The court held that the jailers were not deliberately indifferent to the substantial risk of harm to the detainee, and that they were not negligent in their handling of the detainee. The 39-year-old detainee had been arrested for suspicion of operating a vehicle under the influence of drugs and was waiting for her bond to be posted at a county jail. She was placed in a holding cell. Several hours later jailers discovered that she was unconscious. After attempts to resuscitate her were unsuccessful she was transported to a local hospital where she was pronounced dead. An autopsy showed that her death was caused by either self-hanging or strangulation by another person. According to the court, the detainee did not request medical aid from the jail nurse who saw her initially, and there was no indication to jailers that she might be a danger to herself. Thompson v. Spears, 336 F.Supp.2d 1224 (S.D.Fla. 2004). A prisoner brought an action against a county and a jail official, alleging deliberate indifference to his safety, negligent supervision, and negligent infliction of emotional distress. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court held that a lack of monitoring devices in jail cells did not pose an objectively substantial risk of harm to the inmate, particularly in light of the fact the state Model Jail Standards did not require cameras. The court found that the inmate presented no evidence that the officer posts were located so far that officers could not hear calls for help. The court held that the county was not liable under § 1983, even if jail officers did not actually follow the county policy of making hourly walk-throughs to monitor cells, where there was no evidence that the county had officially sanctioned or ordered the officers to disregard the county policy. The prisoner had been temporarily transferred from a state prison to the county jail in order to be involved in a family court matter. The inmate, who was from Jacksonville, Florida, alleged that he was severely beaten by other inmates for over two hours, after the Miami Dolphins beat the Jacksonville Jaguars in a football game. Turney v. Waterbury, 375 F.3d 756 (8th Cir. 2004). A mother brought a civil rights action to recover damages related to the in-custody suicide of her son. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants and the mother appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, and reversed in part and remanded. The appeals court held that the sheriff was not entitled to qualified immunity, where the sheriff knew of, but did not investigate, the arrestee's earlier suicide attempt at a jail from which he was transferred, did not permit a jailer to complete the arrestee's intake form, placed the arrestee in a cell alone with a bed sheet and exposed ceiling bars, and ordered the jailer not to enter the arrestee's cell without backup and yet left the jailer as the only staff member on duty at the jail. Before the arrestee was transferred to the jail in which he committed suicide, he had told jail staff that "he was going to hang it up" and shortly thereafter he was found in his cell with a bed sheet tied around his neck. During his processing into the next jail he told staff he did not want to return to prison, and that he would die and take someone with him if he received more than a 15 year sentence. The court found that training provided to county officials was not inadequate, where the county provided manuals that informed police officers how to recognize and respond to suicide risks. A personal representative brought a civil rights action against a county and county sheriff alleging that an arrestee's Fourteenth Amendment rights were violated. The district court denied the sheriff's motion for summary judgment and the sheriff appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the arrestee had a clearly established Fourteenth Amendment right to be protected from the known risks of suicide, and two prior suicides in the county jail should have put the sheriff on notice that his suicide prevention training needed revision. The court held that the representative stated a supervisory liability claim under the due process clause, noting that a supervisor may be held liable under § 1983 if a failure to properly supervise and train an employee causes a deprivation of constitutional rights. The doctors moved to dismiss the action and the district court denied the motion. The court held that the representative stated a cause of action by alleging that the doctors were the persons who were ultimately responsible for the prisoner's treatment and that they had the legal authority and duty to supervise their nursing and physician's assistant staff. The representative alleged that the doctors, despite their duty, entirely failed to supervise staff's treatment of the prisoner, and were therefore deliberately indifferent to his care. The district court denied the officials' motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity, and the officials appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The court held that the detainee failed to establish that officials disregarded any known risks to the detainee's health or safety while he was incarcerated. According to the court, the detainee's allegations regarding inadequate records, overcrowding, poor supervision, and understaffing showed at most that the officials were negligent, and did not rise to the level of deliberate indifference. The mother of a pretrial detainee who had committed suicide in a holding cell brought an action against a city and officers, alleging deliberate indifference to the detainee's serious medical needs. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants. The court held the officers were not deliberately indifferent, where the detainee did not have a particular vulnerability to suicide and had not threatened or attempted suicide. The court noted that the detainee's intoxication was not, by itself, an indication of a suicidal tendency. The court found the city was not deliberately indifferent, where it had no history of numerous suicides by detainees, the city had policies for removing harmful items from detainees, and the city placed a video monitor in a cell following a previous suicide. The legal guardian for an incapacitated person, who attempted to commit suicide while he was a pretrial detainee in a county jail, and the state human services department sued a county and various officials under § 1983 alleging Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment violations and a state law claim for negligence.

The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court held that the officials did not act with deliberate indifference in failing to recognize and respond to the risk that the detainee was suicidal, even assuming there was a 72-minute gap between the last time the detainee was checked and when he was found. According to the court, the officials did not know that the detainee presented a substantial risk of suicide, based on a physician's reports describing the detainee's depression as only "mild" or "situational." There was nothing in the reports to suggest that anti-anxiety medication would have helped prevent the detainee's depression and attempted suicide. The court held that the county was not shown to have any official policy or custom of overcrowding or understaffing that played a role in the detainee's attempted suicide. The court held that the officials acted with discretion with respect to their placement and treatment of the detainee, and in accordance with a physician's orders, and they promptly took the detainee to the hospital when they discovered he had harmed himself, and were therefore entitled to official immunity as to the negligence claims. Estate of Adbollahi v. County of Sacramento, 405 F.Supp.2d 1194 (E.D.Cal. 2005). Representatives of the estates of two county jail detainees, and one inmate, who committed suicide while in their cells brought a § 1983 action. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants in part, and denied in part. The court held that the county was not liable for failing to train jail personnel in suicide prevention where the county had a policy of periodic observation of cell occupants. The court noted that an officer, lacking knowledge that a detainee was suicidal, made no observations, and falsely entered on duty logs that he had done so. The court found that summary judgment was precluded by material issues of fact as to whether a jail commander ratified or encouraged the practice of "pencil-whipping," which involved making false entries on records showing observations of cell occupants that were not actually made. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by material issues of fact as to whether the county knowingly established a policy of providing an inadequate number of cell inspections and of falsifying logs showing completion of cell inspections, creating a substantial risk of harm to suicide-prone cell occupants. The court ruled that the sheriff and jail commander had immunity under state law from liability claims that there were holes in the bunks that could be used for death by hanging, where use of the bunk holes for suicide was not foreseeable. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by material issues of fact as to whether a county jail nurse ratified, condoned, and encouraged the deliberately indifferent behavior of a social worker who conducted an allegedly perfunctory interview of an inmate who later committed suicide. The court found that summary judgment was precluded by material issues of fact as to whether a psychiatric services clinician satisfied applicable standards of care, under state law. Estate of Bradich v. City of Chicago, 413 F.3d 688 (7th Cir. 2005). The estate of an arrestee who hung himself while in a county jail brought an action alleging failure to protect the arrestee from the risk of suicide, and failing to react properly when the arrestee was discovered hanging. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants and the plaintiff appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, vacated in part, and remanded. The court held that jail staff did not display deliberate indifference to a substantial risk of suicide by putting the intoxicated arrestee in a regular cell and allowing him to keep his civilian clothes, rather than placing him on a suicide watch or sending him to a hospital until he sobered up. The arrestee had been arrested numerous times had never attempted to injure himself, and he did not have a mental health history that implied any disposition toward suicide. The court found that the city could not be liable for jail staffs' failure to comply with a rule requiring close monitoring of intoxicated prisoners, where the city's policy requiring staff to check intoxicated prisoners every 15 minutes was adequate and there was no allegation that the city systematically failed to enforce its policies. The court noted that the record did not imply that the suicide rate in the city's jail was abnormally high. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether three members of the jail staff acted with deliberate indifference by failing to seek outside assistance for ten minutes after finding the arrestee hanging in his jail cell. The court asked "Why did it take all three officers to provide unhelpful assistance? Two might have done what they could, while the third phoned for help (which would take only a minute) and then rejoined the others. Why did the two officers who lacked CPR training think that they should shout at a hanging prisoner rather than call for help? Why did the officer with CPR training not use his skills?" Fisher v. Lovejoy, 414 F.3d 659 (7th Cir. 2005). A pretrial detainee brought a pro se § 1983 Fourteenth Amendment action against a corrections officer, alleging that the officer failed to protect the detainee from assault by other inmates of the facility. The district court entered summary judgment for the officer and the detainee appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the fact that the officer witnessed the stabbing of the detainee by another inmate did not render the officer deliberately indifferent to a second assault on the detainee that was perpetrated minutes later by several inmates. The court noted that the officer entered the room where the stabbing had occurred and attempted to restore order, found and confiscated a knife near the spot where he had observed the stabbing, which permitted the inference that the first assailant was unarmed. The officer did not identify the inmates who mounted the second attack as participants in the first attack. The court held that the officer reasonably responded when he witnessed the stabbing of the detainee, precluding liability. At the time of the assaults, the officer had been assigned to "cross-watch" two separate housing units, one of which housed 48 inmates. He was required to walk back and forth between the two units' dayrooms. When the first assault began the victim ran toward the locked dayroom door and saw the officer outside. He pushed an intercom button near the door and summoned help. The officer immediately called for assistance but was not able to enter the dayroom until it was unlocked by a central control post. The personal representative of the estate of a pretrial detainee who had committed suicide while in a police cell at a hospital brought a § 1983 action alleging inadequate medical treatment and failure to adequately monitor the detainee. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants and the personal representative appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the city could not be held liable for deliberate indifference given the absence of an obvious and clear suicide risk. The court concluded that an officer enjoyed qualified immunity because the detainee's pre-suicide behavior did not give rise to a duty to monitor for suicide. The detainee had registered only physical complaints and had engaged in no self-injurious behavior at the hospital. The officer was not aware of, and could not be charged with knowledge of the detainee's behavior prior to reaching the hospital, according to the court. The court found that the city could not be held liable for failure to adequately train its officers regarding suicides, where officers complied with city policies regarding medical care, including screening by an intake nurse at the hospital, and no previous inmate suicides had occurred in the hospital cells. Although the detainee had been destructive before he was transferred to the hospital--ripping a phone from his cell wall and breaking a sink and toilet-- the court noted that none of his destructive acts had been self-directed. The detainees alleged that during monthly lockdown searches of the jail, they were confined for 48 to 50 hours at a time to their cells, where they were not under observation or within hailing distance of correctional officers. The detainees alleged that serious injuries resulted from their inability to get the officers' attention during a crisis. The inmate had been beaten and stabbed in a prison chapel by inmates who belonged to another Muslim group. The inmate alleged that the officials knew that: numerous Muslim inmates had been subject to attack by a ruling Muslim group in the prison chapel; the chaplain knew that the ruling Muslim group was trying to steal prayer oil from other Muslim inmates; the chaplain informed the ruling group that he had secretly delivered the oil to another inmate; and the chaplain told the ruling group that the inmate did not follow the teachings of Muhammad. Mann ex rel. Terrazas v. Lopez, 404 F.Supp.2d 932 (W.D.Tex. 2005). Representatives of the estates of two detainees who had committed suicide while confined brought an action against a sheriff and jail officers, alleging failure to supervise and failure to train. The district court found that the sheriff was entitled to qualified immunity for failing to prevent the detainees' suicides, where there was no evidence that the sheriff was personally aware of any suicidal thoughts the detainees might have had and did not personally direct any actions involving the detainees during their incarceration. The court ordered further proceedings to determine if the sheriff's failure to modify his policies regarding potentially suicidal detainees was an intentional choice, or merely unintentionally negligent oversight. One inmate was known to have mental health problems and was housed in a mental health unit that provided a 1 to 18 officer to inmate ratio, compared to the 1 to 48 ratio required by state standards. Perez v. Oakland County, 380 F.Supp.2d 830 (E.D.Mich. 2005). The father and personal representative of the estate of an inmate brought a suit under § 1983, alleging that the defendants violated the inmate's Eighth Amendment rights by failing to provide appropriate mental health treatment or monitoring when the inmate was being held in the county jail, leading to the inmate's suicide. The district court held that the county did not act with deliberate indifference in allowing the inmate caseworker, who allegedly lacked sufficient medical background or expertise, to make decisions affecting the health care needs of the inmate. The court noted that the challenged practice was widespread, with the "vast majority" of county jails allowing employees who were not psychiatrists, but who had been trained in suicide detection and prevention, to make determinations whether inmates were suicidal or potentially suicidal. The court found that the father failed the establish that deputies actually perceived that the inmate faced a substantial risk of serious harm if they conducted their rounds 16 minutes further apart than mandated under jail policy. The court held that the father failed to establish that a deputy actually perceived a risk of placing the inmate in a single cell. The inmate had been placed in a single cell and no special watch status had been ordered by the inmate caseworker, who was responsible for cell assignments. The court held that the caseworker was entitled to qualified immunity because it was not established at the time of the inmate's suicide that the caseworker's actions of making determinations concerning the inmate's cell assignments, without first consulting the inmate's physician or psychiatrist, would violate the inmate's Eighth Amendment rights. According to the court, the jail psychiatrist did not disregard a known and serious medical need, where evidence demonstrated that even though the psychiatrist knew that the inmate was not taking his medication, he determined through his own direct evaluation that the inmate was suicidal. The court found that allegations that the sheriff failed to ensure that the county's deputies enforced and followed the law could not sustain a § 1983 claim absent evidence that the sheriff himself engaged in active unconstitutional behavior by directly participating, encouraging, authorizing, or acquiescing in the allegedly offending conduct of the sheriff's deputy. Relatives of an inmate who died while incarcerated in a Puerto Rico state prison brought a § 1983 claim alleging failure to provide the inmate with adequate protection from attacks by other inmates. The district court denied the defendant prison officials' motion to dismiss. The court held that the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA) exhaustion requirement did not apply to the § 1983 action brought by relatives of the inmate, since the inmate was no longer confined for the purposes of PLRA. The court held that the relatives stated a § 1983 claim based on deliberate indifference to the inmate's security and medical needs. The inmate was forcibly intoxicated with morphine by fellow prisoners that eventually caused his death by overdose. According to the court, prison officials' failure to classify prisoners to avoid harm, and inadequate supervision, allowed practices that resulted in danger to the lives and body integrity of prisoners. The officials allegedly had sufficient information from which an inference of substantial risk of serious harm to prisoners could be drawn, and there was a shortage of medical staff and equipment. A county jail detainee brought a § 1983 action against a county correctional officer, alleging that the officer failed to protect him from an assault by another inmate by failing to adequately respond and investigate the situation when the detainee pushed the emergency call button in his cell. The detainee had unsuccessfully attempted to alert the officer who checked the cell during his rounds, but his cellmate was holding a razor to his neck at the time. After the officer left the area, the detainee pushed the emergency call button in his cell, hoping for help. The detainee had to choose his words carefully and said he was "not getting along" with his cellmate. The officer did not investigate the situation nor ask the other officers to do so. The detainee was raped by his cellmate, bitten on his back several times, and cut on his neck. The district court denied the officer's motion for summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity and the officer appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the detainee need not show that the officer had a specific awareness that an assault would occur, but that it was sufficient to show that the officer failed to act despite his knowledge of a substantial risk of harm. The court held that the detainee had a clearly established Fourteenth Amendment right to be free from the officer's deliberate indifference to an assault by another inmate. The district court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment and the guardian appealed. The appeals court affirmed. On rehearing, the appeals court held that county jailers' actions did not constitute deliberate indifference, and the jailers' decision not to assign a special need classification to the pretrial detainee was a discretionary decision protected by official immunity. According to the court, the jailers' actions of conducting well-being checks of the pretrial detainee only every 30 minutes, failing to remove bedding and clothing, and failing to fill the detainee's anti-anxiety prescription in a timely manner did not constitute deliberate indifference. The court found that the jailers' view of the risk was shaped by the diagnosis and recommendations of a psychiatrist, who indicated that the detainee was not suicidal but simply manipulative. The court noted that the jailers' decision not to assign a special need classification to the pretrial detainee, that would have required more frequent observation, was a discretionary decision rather than a ministerial duty, protected by official immunity. The detainee was discovered hanging by a bed sheet from a ceiling vent in his cell. He was not breathing and the jailers immediately set to work resuscitating him and then transported him to a nearby hospital. The district court denied summary judgment for the defendants and they appealed. The appeals court held that jailers who placed the detainee in a cell under video surveillance were entitled to qualified immunity, but the jailer who observed the detainee in the cell by video surveillance was not entitled to qualified immunity. According to the court, the jailers who placed the detainee in a cell under video surveillance were entitled to qualified immunity even though they did not remove the detainee's clothing and shoelaces, because the detainee did not have the right to have his jailers take precautions against his suicide beyond placing him in a cell under video surveillance. The court found that the jailer who observed the detainee in his cell by video surveillance was not entitled to qualified immunity because the jailer observed the detainee remove his shoelaces, tie them to a bar, place a noose around his neck, and test the weight of his rope. The jail policy and procedures manual in effect at the time addressed the proper treatment of potentially suicidal inmates and required custodial officers to remove all potential tools such as sheets, blankets, and shoelaces, to conduct inmate checks at random intervals at least twice per hour, and to make reports of any unusual occurrences. The jail used surveillance cameras to monitor inmate activity. The court reviewed the videotape taken from the surveillance camera that recorded the detainee's activity and it showed the detainee removing the laces from his shoes, tying them together and climbing from his bed to the bars of his cell. Smith v. Brevard County, 461 F.Supp.2d 1243 (M.D.Fla. 2006). The personal representative of the estate of pretrial detainee who hung himself in his cell, brought a § 1983 action on behalf of the survivors of the estate, against a county sheriff, officers, and a non-profit corporation which was under contract to provide mental health services to the prisoners at detention center. The sheriff, officers and corporation moved to dismiss and the district court granted the motion in part, and denied in part. The court held that allegations by the estate that, prior to the detainee's hanging himself in his cell, his family members and friends called and went to the detention center in person to inform the non-profit corporation that the detainee was suicidal, were sufficient to satisfy the deliberate indifference test in the suit. After receiving knowledge of the detainee's suicidal tendency, the corporation failed to provide adequate mental health care to the detainee. According to the court, knowledge that the detainee was actually threatening to commit suicide was certainly enough to show knowledge of a substantial risk of suicide, rather than just a mere possibility. The court held that the estate stated a cause of action under § 1983 against the county sheriff, in his official capacity, for violating the detainee's Fourteenth Amendment rights. According to the court, violation of the detainee's constitutional rights was the result of the sheriff's failure to provide adequate staffing and safe housing for suicidal inmates, and in light of the sheriff's knowledge that inmate suicide was a problem, his failure to address any policies that were causing suicides constituted deliberate indifference to the constitutional rights of inmates. Taylor v. Wausau Underwriters Ins. Co., 423 F.Supp.2d 882 (E.D.Wis. 2006). The estate of a pretrial detainee who had committed suicide in jail brought § 1983 claims against a county corrections officer, alleging deliberate indifference to serious medical needs, a claim against the county alleging that the county maintained an unconstitutional informal policy of allowing inmates on suicide watch to turn out their lights, and a state law wrongful death claim against the officer and county. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the officer and county. The court held that the county was not liable for a due process violation under § 1983 for deliberate indifference to the detainee's serious medical needs absent evidence that the officer's delay in turning on the detainee's light after the detainee had turned it off, during which time the detainee hanged himself, was a standard practice or an aberration. According to the court, even if the jail's unofficial policy of allowing inmates on suicide watch access to light switches was the cause of the detainee's suicide, in that it compromised corrections officers' ability to supervise the detainee, the county was not deliberately indifferent to the detainee's serious medical needs in violation of his due process rights. The court found that the jail's classification of the detainee as a suicide risk did not indicate he was actually a suicide risk, the fact that the detainee was a former corrections officer charged with heinous crimes did not indicate a substantial suicide risk, and, even if suicide risk was indicated by facts that the detainee stole a razor, that there were scratches on his wrists, and that he removed elastic from his underwear, the county placed him on suicide watch and thus was not indifferent. The court noted that the absence of mental illness in an inmate who commits suicide is not fatal to a claim for deliberate indifference to serious medical needs. The detainee was a former correctional officer charged with attempted murder, kidnapping, and sexual assault of a minor. He was admitted to jail where he was placed on a suicide watch in a cell with constant camera surveillance. (Fond du Lac County Jail, Wisconsin)

Triestman v. Federal Bureau of Prisons, 470 F.3d 471 (2nd Cir. 2006). A pro se federal prisoner, who was injured when he was attacked by his roommate in a locked cell, brought an action against the federal Bureau of Prisons (BOP) and the United States under the Federal Tort Claims Act (FTCA). The district court partially dismissed the complaint and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court vacated and remanded. The court held that the suit was not barred by the discretionary function exception to the FTCA, as the complaint's allegations could be read to refer to negligence of the officer on duty by failing to patrol or respond diligently. The court noted that the BOP had in place a program statement which provided that "[s]ignaling devices will be available for inmate use in all locked housing units that do not have continuous staff coverage," and that "[i]nmates will not be left unattended in locked areas unless a signaling device is available to them for emergencies." According to the court, the language of this program statement makes it clear that prison officials must provide "continuous staff coverage" to, and may not leave "unattended," any inmate in a locked housing unit who does not have access to an emergency "signaling device." The prisoner, a first-time, non-violent inmate, had originally been "designated a low security inmate and initially housed [in a] low security facility." But due to overcrowding, he was transferred to a "medium/high security prison" and was assigned to share a cell with an inmate who, the prisoner argued, "was known to the [BOP] to be a violent criminal and sexual predator." He was assaulted by his cellmate, dislocating his shoulder and having his hand burned with lit cigarettes. Despite his shouts for help, no officer responded, and during that time the prisoner was at the mercy of his cellmate, and in excruciating pain and fear. Wilson v. Maricopa County, 463 F.Supp.2d 987 (D.Ariz. 2006). In a civil rights suit arising from a fatal assault on a county jail inmate by other inmates, the county defendants filed motions for summary judgment on all claims. The plaintiffs filed a motion for reconsideration of the court's order that had dismissed the county sheriff's office. The summary judgment motions were granted in part and denied in part; the motion for reconsideration was denied. The court held that summary judgment on Eighth Amendment liability for the fatal assault on the inmate was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to: (1) whether the county, through its final policy maker the sheriff, implemented policies, customs, and practices with the requisite subjective intent of deliberate indifference; (2) whether the county, through the sheriff, failed to act in the face of obvious omissions and likely constitutional violations; and (3)

whether that failure to act caused a constitutional violation. The court held that the estate sufficiently alleged a § 1983 claim against the sheriff in his individual capacity by alleging that the sheriff was directly liable under § 1983 for being deliberately indifferent in failing to supervise and train jail officers in appropriate, lawful, and constitutional policies and procedures for providing a safe environment for inmates. The court also found that the estate sufficiently alleged a claim that the sheriff was deliberately indifferent in fostering, encouraging, and knowingly accepting formal and informal jail policies condoning brutality among the inmates and indifference to proper supervision. According to the court, a jail supervisor could be found to have been deliberately indifferent to the safety of the inmate if he knew that not having an officer on the ground in the jail yard posed a risk of violence among the inmates and nonetheless allowed an officer to cover both the yard and another post, which required the officer to leave the yard unattended for a significant period of time. Wilson v. Maricopa County, 484 F.Supp.2d 1015 (D.Ariz. 2006). Survivors of an inmate who had died after being assaulted by other inmates while they were held in a jail known as "Tent City," brought a § 1983 action against a sheriff, alleging Eight Amendment violations. Following denial of the survivors' motion for summary judgment and denial of the sheriff's motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity, and following appeal by the sheriff, the sheriff moved to stay the litigation and the survivors moved to certify the appeal as frivolous. The district court granted the survivors' motion, finding that the sheriff's appeal was frivolous. The court held that, for purposes of qualified immunity, the law was clearly established in July 2003 that the sheriff's alleged conduct of housing inmates in tents without adequate staffing, while being deliberately indifferent to the danger of inmate-on-inmate assaults, would violate the Eighth Amendment. The survivors presented evidence that the sheriff had for many years been aware that the conditions at Tent City were likely to create a substantial risk of serious harm to inmates. The conditions include a lack of security inherent in the use of tents, inadequate staffing, officers abandoning their posts and making off-yard shift changes, intentionally harsh inmate living conditions, and a lack of officer training. The survivors' asserted that these problems were known to the sheriff through a variety of sources, including consultant reports, concerns expressed by a county risk manager, and a prior state court case in which the county and sheriff were held liable under § 1983 for an inmate assault at Tent City. The state court case affirmed a jury verdict against the sheriff and held that the lack of supervision and security measures at Tent City supported the jury's finding of deliberate indifference. Branton v. City of Moss Point, 503 F.Supp.2d 809 (S.D.Miss. 2007). The son of a pre-trial detainee who had committed suicide while in custody, filed suit against the city and jail officers asserting claims pursuant to the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments for failure to train, failure to adopt a policy for safe custodial care of suicidal detainees, and failure to adopt a policy of furnishing medical care to suicidal detainees. The detainee was detained on suspicion of drunk driving and was resistant during the booking process. During the booking process the detainee answered a series of questions. When he was asked, "Have you ever attempted suicide or are you thinking about it now?" he responded, "No." He was taken to a cell that was designated for intoxicated or combative prisoners, given a sheet and a blanket, and was locked in the cell at 3:30 a.m. While conducting a jail check at approximately 5:30 a.m., an officer discovered the detainee kneeling in a corner of the cell with the sheet around his neck. He was unable to be revived. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motions in part and denied in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether jail officers had actual knowledge of a substantial risk of suicide by the detainee, and that fact issues precluded summary judgment in the claim against the city and officers in their official capacities. On appeal (261 Fed.Appx. 659), the appeals court reversed and remanded. (City of Moss Point, Mississippi)

Chambers v. NH Prison, 562 F.Supp.2d 197 (D.N.H. 2007). A state prisoner brought a civil rights suit alleging that prison officials had denied him necessary dental care in violation of his Eighth Amendment rights. The district court granted the prisoner's motion for a preliminary injunction. The court found that the prisoner demonstrated the likelihood of success on merits where his allegations were sufficient to state a claim for supervisory liability against some defendants. The prisoner alleged that officials were deliberately indifferent to his serious medical needs in refusing to provide care for a cavity for approximately one year due to a staffing shortage. According to the court, the prisoner's allegations that prison supervisors and a prison dentist knew of the prisoner's pain as the result of an unfilled cavity, but nevertheless failed to take steps to ensure that care was provided to him within a reasonable time period, provided the minimal facts necessary to state a claim for supervisory liability under § 1983 for deliberate indifference to serious medical needs under the Eighth Amendment. Forgan v. Howard County, Tex., 494 F.3d 518 (5th Cir. 2007). The family of a county jail inmate who committed suicide brought an action against the county, county sheriff's department, and various jail officers, alleging deliberate indifference under § 1983 and claims under the Texas Tort Claims Act (TTCA). The inmate was arrested for driving while intoxicated and possession of marijuana. During the booking process, the inmate indicated that he was medicated for a number of mental ailments, including depression, but that he was not thinking about killing himself at the time. Based on this and other information, a jail officer classified the inmate as a "risk" for suicide, meaning that he would be checked every fifteen minutes. The inmate was issued a pair of trousers and a shirt to wear, and he was placed in a holding cell. After approximately one hour, the inmate was found hanging from his jail-issued trousers. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of defendants and the family appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that providing a county jail inmate with non-defective trousers, which the inmate later used to commit suicide, did not equate to "use of property" by the county, within the meaning of the TTCA, and that the county was not liable under § 1983. According to the court, the county was not liable in the § 1983 deliberate indifference claim absent a showing that the county lacked an adequate suicide prevention policy for jail inmates, or that the county failed to adequately train its jail officials in suicide prevention. The court noted that proof of a single incident generally will not support a finding of inadequate training as a matter of custom or policy, for the purpose of establishing § 1983 municipal liability. Jurado Sanchez v. Pereira, 525 F.Supp.2d 248 (D.Puerto Rico 2007). A prisoner's next of kin brought a civil rights action under § 1983 against prison officials, seeking to recover damages for the prisoner's death while he was incarcerated, and alleging constitutional rights violations, as well as state law claims of negligence. The officials moved for summary judgment on the cause of action under § 1983. The district court denied the motion, finding that summary judgment was precluded by the existence of genuine issues of material fact on the failure to protect claim and as to whether the officials had qualified immunity. According to the court, genuine issues of material fact existed as to whether there were enough guards at the prison when the prisoner was killed by another inmate, and whether officials were mandated to perform weekly or monthly searches of cells, which could have prevented the accumulation of weapons used in the incident in which the prisoner was killed. Bayamon 308, an intake center, was considered minimum security with some limitations. The inmate capacity at Bayamon 308 is 144. Although the capacity was not exceeded, some cells, despite being originally built for one inmate, housed two inmates. According to the court, Bayamon 308 does not comply with the 55 square footage minimum requirements for each cell in a continuing federal consent order. Therefore, the individual cell gates are left continuously open, like an open dormitory. At the time of the incident officials did not take gang affiliation into consideration when segregating prisoners. The prisoner did not identify himself as a gang member, nor inform officials that he feared for his life. The facility was under court order to follow a staffing plan that stated the minimum amount of staff, the optimum amount, the fixed positions and the movable positions, pursuant to a lawsuit. Fixed positions, such as control units, cannot be changed under any circumstances, but the movable positions may be modified depending on necessity due to the type of inmate at the facility. The plaintiffs alleged that the defendants did not comply with the staffing plan, while the defendants insisted that they did comply. (Bayamon 308 Facility, Puerto Rico)

Justus v. County of Buchanan, 517 F.Supp.2d 810 (W.D.Va. 2007). The administrator of a pretrial detainee's estate filed a § 1983 action against a sheriff and county jail employees arising out of the detainee's jail suicide. The detainee had a history of schizophrenia, bipolar disorder, anxiety, paranoia, and delusions and had been hospitalized for these conditions several times in the three years prior to his suicide. His treatment records show that he was hospitalized because family members reported suicidal ideation and bizarre, violent, and sexually inappropriate behavior. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The court held that the sheriff's deputies' failure to provide the pretrial detainee with prompt medical care after they discovered him hanging in his cell did not amount to deliberate indifference to the detainee's serious bodily injuries, in violation of the detainee's due process rights. The court noted that, even though the detainee was still alive when they took him down approximately 13 minutes after discovering him, there was no showing of an affirmative causal link between their inaction and the detainee's death from hypoxic brain injury.

The court found that the sheriff was not deliberately indifferent to the pretrial detainee's suicidal nature, and thus was not subject to liability under § 1983 for failing to take steps to prevent his suicide, even though a notation on an incident report two months before the detainee's suicide indicated that another prisoner reported that the detainee “was threatening suicide”. The court found no proof that the report did not simply inadvertently escape the sheriff's knowledge. The court held that a reasonable sheriff would not have understood from existing law that the absence of an operating video surveillance system in the county jail would violate a suicidal pretrial detainee's constitutional rights, and thus the sheriff was entitled to qualified immunity from liability under § 1983, even though the jail policy and procedure manual required immediate repair of any defective security equipment, and the sheriff was aware that the equipment had not been operating for some time. According to the court, under Virginia law, the deputies' failure to provide the pretrial detainee with prompt medical care after they discovered him hanging in his cell did not amount to gross negligence as required to overcome their immunity from tort liability. Piercy v. Maketa, 480 F.3d 1192 (10th Cir. 2007). A female former employee with a county sheriff's office brought suit against the sheriff's office, sheriff, and board of county commissioners alleging sex discrimination and retaliation in violation of Title VII. The employee alleged that her supervisors began an investigation of her violation of personnel policies after she notified her superiors at the county sheriff's office that she planned to pursue formal discrimination charges. She was fired after the investigation was completed. The court found that her allegations were sufficient to establish the causation element of a prima facie claim of retaliation for filing a complaint with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC) under Title VII. Civil Rights Act of 1964. The district court granted the defendants' motions for summary judgment, and the former employee appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The appeals court held that the employee's failure to obey orders, departure from the truth, and violation of uniform requirements by wearing a tongue ring constituted a legitimate, nondiscriminatory reason for her discharge. According to the court, the reason offered by the sheriff was not a pretext for retaliation in violation of Title VII. The court noted that the decision to recommend dismissal of the employee was made only after completion of the internal affairs investigation and nothing suggested the under-sheriff acted in bad faith in ordering the termination of employee or that the sheriff acted in bad faith in sustaining the dismissal. The appeals court held that the sheriff's office policy of not allowing female deputies to take jobs at a maximum-security facility housing only male inmates was facially discriminatory under Title VII. According to the court, differences in duties between a mixed gender jail and a maximum security facility which housed only male inmates were sufficiently substantial that any transfer of the employee from the former to the latter would not have been purely lateral, so that denying a transfer to the female employee would be an adverse employment action supportive of a sex discrimination claim under Title VII. The court held that the sheriff's office shift-bidding policies, that required certain numbers of female and male officers to be available at jail, were a mere inconvenience and did not constitute an adverse employment action, as required for former employee's sex discrimination claim under Title VII. In her motion for summary judgment, the employee asserted that the policy preventing women from taking jobs at the Metro facility discriminated on its face and thus only a "bona fide occupational qualification" [BFOQ] under 42 U.S.C. § 2000e-2(e) could justify such facial discrimination. Officials suggested two reasons for the policy that restricted the employee from bidding for a shift at Metro: (1) at the time, there were not enough female officers available to staff the female ward at CJC; and (2) privacy and safety considerations required sufficient female staff at CJC. The appeals court found that while these reasons may be adequate to support EPSO's policy as a bona fide occupational qualification that permits discrimination under 42 U.S.C. § 2000e-2(e), the district court did not address this question. The appeals court remanded the case to the district court with instructions to make a decision on this question. (El Paso County Sheriff's Office, Colorado)

Rigano v. County of Sullivan, 486 F.Supp.2d 244 (S.D.N.Y. 2007). An inmate brought § 1983 and negligence claims against a county, county sheriff, jail administrator, corrections officers and fellow inmates, alleging that he was harassed and beaten by the inmate defendants while serving his sentence at the county jail, in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants. The court held that the county jail's procedure for determining where and in what manner new inmates were to be housed did not amount to deliberate indifference to the inmate's safety, as would violate the Eighth Amendment, despite the fact that the inmate was allegedly harassed and physically assaulted by other inmates in the cell block where he was placed. The court noted that, pursuant to the jail's placement procedure, corrections officers asked each inmate a series of questions to assist in placing them, including questions about any enemies the inmate had in the current prison population, the inmate failed to indicate when asked any reason why he should not be placed in the general prison population, and the officers had no reason to know that the inmate would be harassed and assaulted by other inmates. The court found that physical checks of the jail inmate by corrections officers were adequate and did not amount to "deliberate indifference" to the inmate's safety, as would violate Eighth Amendment, despite the fact that the inmate was allegedly harassed and physically assaulted by other inmates in the cell block where he was placed. The officers made visual inspections from outside the cell tier every fifteen minutes and conducted head counts. The inmate never informed the officers of the harassment, and once the officers knew the inmate was being assaulted, they immediately removed him from the tier and provided him with medical attention. The court noted that the Eighth Amendment does not guarantee an assault-free prison environment; it promises only reasonable good faith protection. (Sullivan County Jail, New York)

A special administrator filed a § 1983 suit against a county, sheriff, county board, correctional officers, supervisors, and a correctional medical technician, on behalf of a pretrial detainee who died at a county jail from meningitis and pneumonia. The administrator alleged violations of the detainee's constitutional rights and state law claims for wrongful death, survival action, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The defendants moved for summary judgment and to strike documents. The district court granted the motions in part and denied in part. The court did not strike all of the plaintiff's summary judgment submissions, for allegedly failing to disclose witnesses or individuals with relevant information who submitted affidavits, given that the plaintiff had disclosed witnesses prior to discovery deadline. Summary judgment was also precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the county was deliberately indifferent to: (1) its widespread practice of understaffing correctional officers at the county jail; (2) its widespread practice of failing to repair broken video monitoring systems for inmate surveillance at the jail; and, (3) its widespread policy or practice of falsifying daily logs to cover up missed security checks on inmates. Tipler v. Douglas County, Neb., 482 F.3d 1023 (8th Cir. 2007). A female correctional officer brought a gender discrimination action against a county jail employer, alleging violation of § 1983 and Title VII. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the employer and the correctional officer appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that reassignment of female officer to a different shift, pursuant to county jail's gender-based staffing policy, did not violate Title VII. The court also held that the reassignment did not violate the equal protection clause. The appeals court noted that where the employer is a prison [jail], a bona fide occupational qualification analysis (BFOQ) under Title VII is unnecessary if the policy requiring female-only supervision of female inmates is reasonable, and if such a policy imposes only a minimal restriction on the employee. According to the court, when the state [county] makes a classification based on gender, under the equal protection clause the state must show at least that the challenged classification serves important governmental objectives and that the discriminatory means employed are substantially related to the achievement of those objectives. The court held that the jail's reassignment of the female correctional officer to a different shift did not violate the equal protection clause because the reassignment was substantially related to important governmental objectives, including compliance with state law, and proper jail administration. Brumfield v. Hollins, 551 F.3d 322 (5th Cir. 2008). The daughter of a detainee who hung himself while confined in a "drunk tank" of a county jail brought a § 1983 action against the county, and a sheriff and deputies in their individual and official capacities. The district court awarded summary judgment to each defendant sued in his individual capacity on the basis of qualified immunity, but denied summary judgment to individual defendants in their official capacities and to the county. After a trial, the district court directed a verdict in favor of all officers and the county. The daughter appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the sheriff was protected by qualified immunity and that the district court did not abuse its discretion by excluding expert testimony indicating that the detainee was alive when paramedics arrived at the jail. The court found that the county was not liable under § 1983. According to the court, the sheriff was entitled to qualified immunity from the claim that he failed to adopt any written policy pertaining to inmate supervision or medical care, where verbal policies existed concerning inmate supervision and medical care. The court found that the sheriff's efforts in training and supervising deputies were not deliberately indifferent, as required for the sheriff to be liable under § 1983 for the suicide of a drunk driving detainee. The court noted that the deputies did receive training, and that there was no evidence of a pattern of similar violations or evidence that it should have been apparent that a constitutional violation was the highly predictable consequence of an alleged failure to train. The court found that while the deputies' conclusion that the detainee who had hung himself was already dead, and their resulting failure to make any attempt to save his life, were arguably negligent, this conduct alone did not amount to deliberate indifference, nor was any county custom or policy the moving force behind the deputies' conduct, as required for the county to be liable under § 1983 for denial of reasonable medical care. The district court dismissed the complaint and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The appeals court held that the district court had the authority under the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA) to dismiss without prejudice the prisoner's § 1983 complaint against prison officials requesting damages for emotional injury, where the complaint disclosed that the prisoner was requesting damages for emotional injury without a prior showing of a physical injury. The court found that the prisoner's allegations that his family had informed a prison supervisor of ongoing misconduct by the supervisor's subordinates, and that the supervisor failed to stop the misconduct, supported the prisoner's § 1983 claim of retaliation against the supervisor. According to the court, the allegations allowed a reasonable inference that the supervisor knew that the subordinates would continue to engage in the unconstitutional misconduct but failed to stop them from doing so. Boyd v. Nichols, 616 F.Supp.2d 1331 (M.D.Ga. 2009). A female, who had been housed in a jail for violation of her probation, brought an action against a former jailer, county, and former sheriff, under § 1983 and state law, relating to the sexual assault of the inmate by the jailer. The county and sheriff moved for summary judgment and the district court granted the motions. The court held that the sheriff was not "deliberately indifferent" to a substantial risk of serious harm to the inmate under the Eighth Amendment or the Georgia constitution in failing to protect the inmate from sexual assaults by a jailer, absent evidence that the sheriff had knowledge or indication that the jailer was a threat or danger to inmates, or that male guards, if left alone with female inmates, posed a risk to the inmates' health and safety. The court noted that the sheriff's actions in calling for an investigation and terminating the jailer's employment upon learning of the jailer's actions was not an "indifferent and objectively unreasonable response" to the inmate's claims, and thus, there was no violation of the inmate's rights. The court held that the jail's staffing did not pose a "substantial risk of serious harm" to the inmate who was sexually assaulted by a jailer, as required to show violation of the Eighth Amendment and Georgia constitution, absent evidence that the jail was inadequately staffed. According to the court, the county did not have a policy or custom of underfunding and understaffing the jail, as would constitute deliberate indifference to a substantial risk of serious harm to the inmate, and thus the county could not be liable under § 1983 to the inmate who was sexually assaulted by a jailer. The court found that the sheriff's failure to train deputies and jailers in proper procedures for escorting and handling female inmates did not support supervisory liability on the § 1983 claim of the inmate, where the sheriff had no knowledge of any prior sexual assaults at the jail or any problems with jailers improperly escorting and handling female inmates, and the jailer who committed the assault had been trained previously on how to interact with inmates and knew it was improper to have intimate contact with inmates. During the time period in question, the county did not have a policy prohibiting a male jailer from escorting a female inmate within the Jail. The court held that the county and sheriff had sovereign immunity from the state law claims of the inmate, absent evidence that such immunity had been waived by an act of the General Assembly. Flynn v. Doyle, 672 F.Supp.2d 858 (E.D.Wis. 2009). Female inmates filed a class action alleging that medical, dental, and mental health care provided to prisoners at a state facility violated the Eighth Amendment, Equal Protection Clause, Title II of Americans with Disabilities Act, and Rehabilitation Act. The officials moved for partial summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether there were systemic and gross deficiencies in staffing, facilities, and procedures at the state correctional facility that resulted in provision of inadequate medical care for female inmates. The court also found that summary judgment was precluded on the inmates' claim that the state violated Title II of ADA by failing to provide access to programs to inmates with mobility, visual, and hearing disabilities. The court found a genuine issue of material fact as to the effectiveness of accommodations offered to disabled inmates at a state correctional facility. Hardy v. District of Columbia, 601 F.Supp.2d 182 (D.D.C. 2009). Pretrial detainees, allegedly assaulted by fellow inmates, brought a suit against the former Director of the District of Columbia Department of Corrections and a former jail warden in both their official and individual capacities, and against the District of Columbia. The detainees sought damages under § 1983 for alleged Fifth and Eighth Amendment violations. The district court dismissed the case in part. The court held that the detainees' § 1983 official capacity claims against the former Director and former jail warden were redundant to the claims against the District of Columbia, warranting dismissal. The court noted that claims brought against government employees in their official capacity are treated as claims against the employing government and serve no independent purpose when the government is also sued. The detainees alleged that before the scalding attacks that injured them, one of the very assailants had committed a similar scalding attack using water heated in an unguarded microwave, and that the locations where their assaults occurred were inadequately staffed with corrections officers and resulted in the assaults taking place without any officers in the vicinity. The court held that these allegations were sufficient to plead conditions of detention that posed a substantial risk of serious harm, as required to state a failure-to-protect claim against the Director of the District of Columbia Department of Corrections and the jail warden. The detainees alleged that on the day of one of their scalding assaults by a fellow inmate, officials were present at a council hearing at which testimony described significant and multiple instances of violence in unguarded locations occurring in the jail, that the previous scalding assaults had occurred by the same inmate in question, and that despite such knowledge, the officials refused to take measures to protect inmates. The court found that the detainees' allegation that the Director and jail warden were deliberately indifferent to negligent supervision of correctional officers and lack of staff training, was sufficient to state a § 1983 failure to train claim violative of their due process rights. The detainees alleged that the warden and Director were at the top of the “chain of command” at the jail, that they had been aware of violence issues for many years, and that they had been instructed to take action against violence on numerous occasions. The district court denied qualified immunity for the Director and jail warden, noting that the detainees' due process rights against deliberate indifference were clearly established at the time of violent scalding attacks by fellow inmates. Mosher v. Nelson, 589 F.3d 488 (1st Cir. 2009). The administrator of the estate of a pretrial detainee who was killed at a state mental health hospital by another patient brought an action against the superintendent of the hospital, the commissioner of the state department of corrections (DOC), and other state officials, alleging civil rights violations and state-law claims. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The administrator appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the superintendent of the state mental health hospital and the commissioner of the state department of corrections were entitled to qualified immunity from § 1983 liability on the deliberate indifference claim. According to the court, although the patient was able to strangle the detainee while the detainee was visiting the patient in his room, the hospital had a long-standing policy that allowed patients to visit in each others' rooms during the short period during the end of the morning patient count and lunch. The court noted that there was no history of violence or individualized threats made by any patient, and reasonable officials could have believed that allowing the visiting policy to continue and maintaining the current staffing levels at the hospital would not cause a substantial risk of harm. Rodriguez-Borton v. Pereira-Castillo, 593 F.Supp.2d 399 (D.Puerto Rico 2009). Relatives of a deceased pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against prison officials, requesting damages for constitutional violations culminating in the detainee's death. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants in part and denied in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by fact issues as to the lack of adequate inmate supervision and malfunctioning cell locks and cell lights. The court also found an issue of material fact as to whether the Administrator of the Puerto Rico Administration of Corrections (AOC) failed to act with regard to security risks, including malfunctioning door locks, in the annex within which the pretrial detainee was found hanged. The court also found a genuine issue of material fact as to the prison annex superintendent's failure to remedy supervision problems in housing units where he knew inmates were able to and did move freely in and out of their cells due to malfunctioning door locks. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to a correctional officer's failure to patrol the living area of the annex within which the pretrial detainee was found hanged while he knew inmates were able to freely move around. The court denied qualified immunity to the defendants because it was clearly established at the time of the alleged inaction, and a reasonable prison official working in the system would have known that a lack of supervision, combined with the knowledge that cell locks did not function, would create an obvious and undeniable security risk. Current and former inmates at a county jail brought a § 1983 action against the county, corrections officers, and prison officials, alleging that they were abused by officials during their incarceration in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to: (1) whether corrections officers and prison officials knew or should have known that an officer would apply excessive force to the inmate by shocking him when he was restrained and whether they could have prevented the officer's excessive use of force; (2) whether the inmates exhausted administrative remedies by filing grievances regarding use of a restraint chair, lack of mattresses, inability to shower, cell conditions, and issues with mail; (3) whether the use of mechanical restraints against the inmates constituted wanton infliction of pain in violation of the Eighth Amendment; (4) whether an inmate complied with officials when extracted from a cell, rendering the use of oleoresin capsicum spray excessive and unjustified; (5) whether cell conditions posed a substantial risk of harm to inmates and whether corrections officers and prison officials were deliberately indifferent to that risk; and (6) whether the warden of the county jail was aware of and condoned the use of excessive force against inmates at jail. CROSS GENDER SUPERVISION

Ambat v. City and County of San Francisco, 693 F.Supp.2d 1130 (N.D.Cal. 2010). Sheriff's deputies brought an action against a city and county, alleging various claims including retaliation, and that a gender based staffing policy violated Title VII and California's Fair Employment and Housing Act (FEHA). Cross-motions for summary judgment were filed. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants in part, and denied in part. The court held that the sheriff's department policy that only female deputies would be assigned to female-only housing units was implemented to protect the interests that amount to the essence of the Sheriff's business, including safety and privacy, as required to establish a bona fide occupational qualification as a defense to the deputies' claims of employment discrimination under Title VII and California's Fair Employment and Housing Act (FEHA). The court noted that the policy was implemented to prevent sexual misconduct and inappropriate relationships between male deputies and female inmates, to alleviate male deputies' fears of false accusations of misconduct resulting in a reluctance to supervise female inmates closely, which created opportunities for smuggling and use of contraband, and to prevent female inmates from being required to dress and undress in front of male deputies.

The court found that the sheriff was entitled to deference in his policy judgment to implement the department policy that only female deputies would be assigned to female-only housing units and in determining whether the policy was reasonably necessary to achieve issues of safety and privacy and to ensure normal operation of the jails, as required to establish a bona fide occupational qualification as a defense to the deputies' claims of employment discrimination under Title VII and California's Fair Employment and Housing Act (FEHA). The court noted that, despite not conducting formal studies or seeking consultation, the policy was based upon the sheriff's experience and observations over thirty years as sheriff and conversations with senior officials and jail commanders over several months. The court noted that suggested non-discriminatory alternatives to the sheriff's department policy, including cameras and additional training, were not feasible alternatives that furthered the objectives of safety, security and privacy. Installation of cameras in the units was cost-prohibitive and did not address privacy concerns or the fact that misconduct took place outside of the units, additional training would not eliminate sexual abuse since deputies already knew it was forbidden, and there was no effective testing or screening method to identify deputies who might engage in sexual misconduct.

The court found that the fact that the deputy made statements to the National Academy of Arbitrators, alleging that the sheriff was influenced by financial contributions and nepotism and that the sheriff's general counsel had engaged in sex tourism was a legitimate, non-retaliatory reason to terminate the deputy under Title VII and the California Fair Employment and Housing Act. Brown v. North Carolina Dept. of Corrections, 612 F.3d 720 (4th Cir. 2010). An inmate brought a § 1983 suit against correctional officers and the North Carolina Department of Corrections, claiming that they violated his Eighth Amendment rights by being deliberately indifferent to the serious harm he suffered at the hands of a fellow inmate. The district court dismissed the action and the inmate appealed. The appeals court vacated and remanded. The court held that the prisoner, who suffered significant physical injuries as the result of another inmate's attack, sufficiently alleged a § 1983 claim of deliberate indifference to his Eighth Amendment rights against an officer who allegedly observed the altercation and failed to respond, and another officer who allegedly was aware of the other inmate's grudge but still sent the prisoner into a housing block to pick up supplies. The court found that the inmate stated a § 1983 claim against a corrections officer of deliberate indifference by alleging that an officer was in “the Block” when the assault occurred, and a reasonable person could infer from that statement that the officer was aware of the attack, and that his failure to intervene represented deliberate indifference to a serious risk of harm. Clouthier v. County of Contra Costa, 591 F.3d 1232 (9th Cir. 2010). The estate of a pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against a county, mental health specialist, and two sheriff's deputies alleging they violated the detainee’s due process rights by failing to prevent his suicide while he was confined. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants and the estate appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The court held that the estate had to show that the detainee was confined under conditions posing a substantial risk of serious harm and that correction officers were deliberately indifferent to that risk. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the mental health specialist at the jail, who was on notice of the pretrial detainee's suicidal condition, was deliberately indifferent to a substantial risk of harm to the detainee when she removed the detainee from an observation log and told deputies that the detainee could be given regular clothes and bedding. According to the court, it was clearly established at the time of detention that a reasonable mental health professional would not have removed key suicide prevention measures put in place by a prior mental health staff member, and therefore the specialist was not entitled to qualified immunity.

The court found that the estate failed to establish that a sheriff's deputy at the jail knew that moving the detainee to the general population in the jail posed a substantial risk of serious harm to the detainee, where the deputy only knew that the detainee had missed meals and free time, and that the detainee had been taken off an observation log. The court noted that the deputy spoke to the detainee all weekend and noted he had a positive outlook on wanting to get out of the room, and earlier that day the mental health specialist found that the detainee was not actively suicidal at the time.

The court held that the estate failed to establish that another sheriff's deputy knew that the detainee was suicidal and deliberately ignored that risk, where the deputy knew only that the detainee was suicidal and needed to be on 15-minute checks and the mental health specialist told the deputy to give the detainee his regular clothes and bedding. The court noted that nothing indicated that the deputy saw the detainee's knotted sheet.

According to the court, the county did not have a longstanding custom or practice of moving pretrial detainees from an observation cell into the general population without consultation with mental health staff, or a longstanding practice of miscommunication between mental health staff and custodial staff. The court found no pattern of repeated wrongful conduct by county staff, and nothing that indicated another suicide resulted from the improper transfer of a detainee. The court found that the affidavit of the estate's expert, who opined that custodial staff and mental health staff did not work together as a team, was speculative and conclusory, and thus was insufficient to avoid summary judgment. The court noted that the factual basis for the expert's declaration was limited to a sequence of events and statements of participants surrounding the detainee's transfer to the general population in the jail, and the report did not address the key question of whether the alleged disconnect was so obvious as to have been deliberate indifference. Cummings v. Harrison, 695 F.Supp.2d 1263 (N.D.Fla. 2010). A Black Muslim state prisoner brought a civil rights action against a prison warden and correctional officers, alleging, among other things, that the defendants used excessive force against him in violation of the Eighth Amendment and retaliated against him, in violation of First Amendment, for submitting grievances. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court denied the motion. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether correctional officers' repeated verbal threats, including death threats, combined with physical assaults, against the Black Muslim prisoner caused the prisoner extreme psychological harm, and as to whether the officers maliciously and sadistically used force against the prisoner because he was black or because he practiced the Muslim faith. The court also found that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the prison warden had the ability to remove the Black Muslim prisoner from the supervision of the correctional officer who was allegedly verbally and physically abusing him, but refused to do so, and denied the prisoner's request for protective custody. Forde v. Baird, 720 F.Supp.2d 170 (D.Conn. 2010). A federal inmate petitioned for a writ of habeas corpus, alleging that she was being denied freedom of religious expression, in violation of the First Amendment and the Religious Freedom Restoration Act (RFRA). The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants, in part, and denied in part. The court held that the Muslim inmate's right to free exercise of religion was substantially burdened, as required to support her claim under RFRA, by a prison policy allowing for non-emergency pat searches of female inmates by male guards, despite prison officials' claim that the inmate's belief was not accurate. The court found that the choice offered the inmate, of violating her understanding of the precepts of Islam, or refusing a search and risking punishment, constituted a substantial burden.

The court found that the prison's interest in maintaining safety and security of the female prison through the use of cross-gender pat searches was not compelling, as required to justify a substantial burden on the inmate's right of free exercise of religion under RFRA, where the prison's arguments regarding how and why the cross-gender pat searches promoted safety and security at the prison were actually related to the staffing of the facility, not to its safety and security. According to the court, the prison's interest in avoiding staffing and employment issues at the female prison through the use of cross-gender pat searches was not compelling, as required to justify a substantial burden on the inmate's right of free exercise of religion under RFRA. The court noted that even if the prison's interests in maintaining safety and security and avoiding staffing and employment issues were compelling, cross-gender pat searches were not the least restrictive means of addressing these interests, as required to justify the substantial burden on an inmate's right of free exercise of religion under RFRA, absent evidence that the prison considered and rejected less restrictive practices to cross-gender pat searches. Hawkins v. Brooks, 694 F.Supp.2d 434 (W.D.Pa. 2010.) A state prisoner brought a pro se § 1983 action against various prison officials and corrections officers, alleging retaliation, harassment, due process violations, defamation of character, and mental anguish. The defendants moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the prisoner's conduct of pressing charges against a corrections officer who the prisoner claimed raped and impregnated her and complaining about other officers' alleged harassment amounted to a "constitutionally protected activity," as required for the prisoner to state a § 1983 retaliation claim. The court found that corrections officers' alleged conduct of withholding the prisoner's incoming and outgoing mail in retaliation for the prisoner's pressing rape charges against an officer at another prison amounted to an "adverse action," as required to establish a prima facie pro se § 1983 retaliation claim against the officers. But the court found that a prison official's alleged conduct of reassigning the prisoner to a different unit in the same prison did not rise to the level of an "adverse action," as required to establish a prima facie pro se § 1983 retaliation claim.

The court found that the prisoner had no liberty interest in her place of confinement, transfer, or classification, and thus, prison officials' alleged refusal to have the prisoner transferred to an out-of-state institution did not violate her due process rights.

The court found that the prisoner's assertions that she made supervisory prison officials aware of the harassment and retaliation she allegedly suffered at the hands of correctional officers as a result of her pressing rape charges against a correctional officer at another facility, and that none of the supervisory officials offered assistance or took any corrective action, were sufficient to state a claim for supervisory liability, in her § 1983 retaliation action. A female inmate brought an action against a regional jail authority and correctional officers who held the ranks of colonel, lieutenant, captain, sergeant, and corporal, alleging under § 1983 that the defendants violated the Eighth Amendment, and asserting state-law claims for assault and battery, gross negligence, and negligent retention. The district court denied the defendants' motion to dismiss. The court held that the inmate's allegations in her complaint: (1) of over ten instances of sexual assaults by a correctional officer, under circumstances where his superiors were in a position to have knowledge of what was happening at various times; (2) that each named superior witnessed or participated in several of those actions; (3) that all superiors had direct knowledge of the officer's personal remarks to the inmate; (4) and that the officer's obsession with the inmate was a matter of commentary among all correctional staff, were sufficient to state a § 1983 Eighth Amendment claim for supervisory liability against the superiors. The inmate also alleged that each superior witnessed several incidents where the officer followed the inmate into a storage room and assaulted her. The inmate also alleged that a corporal, who was in charge of inmate workers, witnessed the correctional officer, in violation of jail regulations, approach her several times while working in the kitchen, and that the corporal told the inmate not to be rude to the officer or she would be fired from her job after the inmate asked the corporal to prevent the officer from moving behind the counter. Pourmoghani-Esfahani v. Gee, 625 F.3d 1313 (11th Cir. 2010). A female pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against a deputy sheriff, alleging excessive force and deliberate indifference to her serious medical needs. The district court denied the deputy's motion for summary judgment and the deputy appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The court held that the deputy sheriff was not qualifiedly immune from the pretrial detainee's § 1983 excessive force claim, since the deputy's alleged actions, including slamming the detainee's head to the floor seven to eight times while she was restrained, if proven, were obviously beyond what the Constitution would allow under the circumstances. The court held the deputy sheriff's alleged actions or inactions following her altercation with the pretrial detainee, if proven, did not constitute deliberate indifference to the detainee's serious medical needs, where: the detainee alleged that the deputy dispatched her to her cell directly after the altercation; the nurse saw her within approximately two minutes of her arrival in the cell; the nurse informed the deputy that the detainee had a possible nose injury but that her nose was not broken; the nurse and an officer then attended to the detainee within approximately five minutes of the detainee's cellmate's first signals for help; and, the detainee then received continuous medical care until she was taken to hospital. The court noted that no preexisting law clearly established that an approximately two-to-five-minute delay of medical care, either while the detainee moved from a waiting room to her cell following an altercation or while her cellmate waited for the guard to respond to her signaling, was a constitutional violation.

The appeals court accepted the depiction of events from recordings from closed-circuit video cameras placed throughout jail, rather than crediting the detainee's account of the altercation, where the video obviously contradicted the detainee's version of the facts. But the court noted that video failed to convey spoken words or tone and sometimes failed to provide unobstructed views of the events, and the court credited the detainee's version where no obviously contradictory video evidence was available. A female inmate brought a § 1983 suit against corrections officials regarding injuries suffered by the inmate at the hands of a corrections officer alleged to have sexually assaulted the inmate. The superintendent and deputy superintendent for security moved to dismiss claims that they were deliberately indifferent to the inmate's personal safety. The district court denied the motion. The court held that the inmate's allegations against the superintendent and deputy superintendent for security, claiming that they were deliberately indifferent to her rights and were responsible for creating or maintaining policies or practices that failed to prevent her from being repeatedly raped and assaulted by a corrections officer, stated a claim for Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment violations. The court noted that the complaint alleged that the officials were responsible for determining where inmates were to be housed and the assignment of guards, and in conjunction with another official, investigation and response to complaints of staff misconduct. The court found that the superintendent and deputy superintendent for security were not entitled to qualified immunity, given the extent of the alleged sexual abuse, the numerous warning signs alleged, and the number of questionable, if not unintelligible, decisions made with respect to the inmate during the course of an investigation. Sexton v. Kenton County Detention Center, 702 F.Supp.2d 784 (E.D.Ky. 2010). Two female detainees brought a § 1983 action against a county detention center and officials, alleging deliberate indifference with respect to hiring and supervision of a deputy who sexually assaulted them while they awaited arraignment. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The court held that the detainees failed to establish deliberate indifference with respect to the center's hiring of the deputy. The court noted that none of the deputy's prior misdemeanor offenses, including his driving infractions and domestic assault, demonstrated a propensity to commit rape. The court found that the detainees failed to demonstrate a causal link between the center's alleged policy of not terminating employees with excessive absenteeism and the deputy's conduct. The court noted that "...Absent evidence of prior complaints of sexual assault, the mere fact that a male guard supervises a female inmate does not lead to the conclusion that the inmate is at a great risk of being sexually assaulted by the guard." According to the court, the detainees failed to establish that the county detention center was deliberately indifferent to their constitutional rights by not effectively monitoring surveillance equipment, and thus they could not recover in their § 1983 action against the center, where there was no evidence that the center had a policy or custom of ineffective surveillance. The detainees argued that only one person monitored the 89 cameras that were used throughout the Detention Center and that they were mainly monitored only for ingress and egress of secured doors. They asserted that the county should have had cameras in the video arraignment room for the inmates' protection. The court noted that state jail regulations do not require constant monitoring of video surveillance cameras or dictate where the cameras are to be placed inside a detention facility. Silvera v. Connecticut Dept. of Corrections, 726 F.Supp.2d 183 (D.Conn. 2010). The representative of a pretrial detainee's estate filed a § 1983 action alleging that state prison officials' decision to house the detainee with a convicted inmate and their failure to provide adequate mental health care caused the detainee's suicide death. The officials moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that allegations that prison medical staff ignored abundant evidence demonstrating that the pretrial detainee was an acute suicide risk were sufficient to state a claim of deliberate indifference to his serious medical needs, in violation of the Due Process Clause. The court noted that evidence included a judge's instructions to keep him on suicide watch, the detainee's prior medical records, contemporaneous complaints and behavior, and examinations by medical staff, all of whom concluded that the detainee suffered from severe mental health issues. Nonetheless, officials placed him in a cell by himself, rather than in specialized housing, with access to materials with which he could hang himself, failed to check on him regularly, and ignored signs that his mental condition had deteriorated. The court found that a state prison supervisor was not liable under § 1983 for the pretrial detainee's suicide death, even if the supervisor had some training with regards to caring for mentally ill detainees, and his subordinates failed to properly oversee the detainee's activities. The court noted that the detainee was placed in the general prison population based on a mental health professional's recommendation, the supervisor was not aware that the detainee posed an excessive risk of suicide, and subordinates were given proper orders to keep the detainee under constant surveillance and interact with him at frequent, irregular intervals. The court described the change in the detainee's conditions of confinement prior to his suicide. "Inmates housed in the Charlie Unit—apparently unlike those in the specialized housing unit where Mr. Lyle was held from May 11 until May 15—have the ability to turn the cell's lights on and off at will. Additionally, the Charlie Unit has bunk-style beds, which are outfitted with standard-issue sheets and pillow case—both of which would play a role in Mr. Lyle's suicide. Once transferred to the Charlie Unit, Mr. Lyle was given standard DOC clothing, whereas previously he had been given only a 'suicide gown.' "

According to the court, the pretrial detainee's right to due process was not violated merely because he was forced to share a cell with a convicted prisoner, absent an allegation that the detainee suffered an injury from being housed with a convicted inmate, or that placement with the convicted inmate was intended to punish the detainee. The district court denied the defendants' motion to dismiss in part. The court held that the allegation that the inmate was indefinitely placed in solitary confinement, isolated from other inmates and correctional facility staff, and subjected to continuous lighting and camera surveillance, was sufficient to allege a liberty interest in conditions of his confinement. The court found that the allegation that the inmate was subjected to solitary confinement for more than two decades was sufficient to state claim under the Eighth Amendment against the Bureau. A female detainee's estate brought an action against a county, sheriff, on-call physician, police officers, and parole agent, under § 1983 and state law, arising out of the detainee's death while in the county's custody. The district court denied the parole agent's motion for summary judgment on a gross negligence claim. The agent filed interlocutory appeal. The appeals court reversed. The court held that the parole agent's failure to intercede on behalf of the detainee in county custody, upon arriving at the jail to serve the detainee a notice of parole violation charges and determining that the detainee was unable to be transported or served, was not the "proximate cause" of the detainee's death, so as to entitle the agent to governmental immunity from gross negligence liability under Michigan law. The court noted that the detainee was in the custody of county jail officials in the hours leading up to her death, the parole agent worked for the state Department of Corrections, not the county, the detainee had been experiencing delirium tremens (DT) symptoms for close to 48 hours prior to arrival at the jail, a physician had been notified of the detainee's condition and told jail officials to monitor the detainee, the agent was present at the jail for a matter of minutes only, and county jail officials failed to check the detainee until 40 minutes after the agent left the jail. Teague v. St. Charles County, 708 F.Supp.2d 935 (E.D.Mo. 2010). The mother of a detainee who committed suicide in a cell in county detention center brought an action against the county and corrections officials, asserting claims for wrongful death under § 1983 and under the Missouri Wrongful Death Statute. The county and the commanding officer moved to dismiss for failure to state a claim. The district court granted in the motion, in part. The court held that the mother failed to allege that the detention center's commanding officer personally participated. The court found that the mother's allegations that her son was demonstrating that he was under the influence of narcotics at the time of his detention, that her son had expressed suicidal tendencies, and that jail employees heard or were told of choking sounds coming from her son's cell but took no action, were sufficient to state a Fourteenth Amendment deliberate indifference claim under § 1983.

The court held that the mother's allegation that the county unconstitutionally failed to train and supervise its employees with respect to custody of persons with symptoms of narcotics withdrawal and suicidal tendencies was sufficient to state a failure to train claim against the county, under § 1983, arising out of the death of her son who committed suicide while housed as a pretrial detainee. The detainee had used a bed sheet to hang himself and the mother alleged that the county failed to check him every 20 minutes, as required by jail policy. Wells v. Bureau County, 723 F.Supp.2d 1061 (C.D.Ill. 2010). The estate of a 17-year-old pretrial detainee who committed suicide while in custody at a county jail brought an action against the county, county sheriff, and corrections officers, alleging claims pursuant to § 1983, the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), and the Rehabilitation Act. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the fact that the pretrial detainee, who committed suicide while in custody at a county jail, did not need a mental health professional when he was booked at the jail after being arrested on charges of illegal consumption of alcohol by a minor and possession of drug paraphernalia, was not dispositive of whether the detainee presented a serious need when he was booked at the jail approximately two weeks later after being arrested on charges of contributing to the delinquency of a minor.

The court held that information received by booking officers after pretrial detainee's suicide, including information that the detainee had been kicked out of his father's house, that the detainee was living in a tent, that the detainee and his girlfriend had a suicide pact, and that the detainee had commented to other inmates that if he was going to prison he would "shoot himself," was irrelevant to establishing what was in the officers' minds at time they were alleged to have been deliberately indifferent to the risk that the detainee would commit suicide. According to the court, the corrections officers lacked actual knowledge of a significant likelihood that the detainee would imminently seek to take his own life, or even of facts that would promote the inference of a subjective awareness of such a substantial risk, and thus the officers did not act with deliberate indifference to that risk in violation of due process, despite any alleged negligence in assessing and observing the detainee prior to his suicide. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the county sheriff's policy that correctional officers not personally observe prisoners during the overnight shift was constitutionally inadequate. From 10 PM to 6:30 AM, detainees are locked in their cells. During the overnight period from 11 PM on June 8, 2007, to 5 AM on June 9, 2007, Officer Keefer did eleven cell checks on Cellblock 2. While standing in the guard walkway, officers are able to look into two of the four cells and observe detainees in those cells, but officers are unable to see the detainees in the other two cells in the cellblock. During her checks, Officer Keefer personally observed the detainees in two of the cells in Cellblock 2 because she could see them from the guard walkway, but did not observe Wells in his cell because she was unable to see into his cell from the guard walkway. At 6:45 AM, when another officer let the detainees in Cellblock 2 out of their cells for breakfast, he discovered Wells hanging in his cell. (Bureau County Jail, Illinois)

Wereb v. Maui County, 727 F.Supp.2d 898 (D.Hawai'i 2010). Parents of a pretrial detainee, a diabetic who died in custody, brought an action against a county and county police department employees, alleging under § 1983 that the defendants were deliberately indifferent to the detainee's medical needs, and asserting a claim for wrongful death under state law. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The detainee died in a 2-cell police lockup. The court held that county police officers and public safety aids who did not interact with or observe the pretrial detainee not moving in his cell were not subjectively aware of the serious medical need of the detainee, and thus those officers and aids were not deliberately indifferent to that need, in violation of the detainee's due process rights. The court held that summary judgment as to the § 1983 Fourteenth Amendment deliberate indifference claim was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether county police officers who interacted with the pretrial detainee and/or a county public safety aid who did not see the detainee move around in his cell while she monitored him over video had subjective knowledge of the serious medical need of detainee, precluding summary judgment.

The court found that neither county police officers who interacted with the pretrial detainee, nor a county public safety aid who did not see the detainee move around in his cell while she monitored him over video, were entitled to qualified immunity from the § 1983 Fourteenth Amendment deliberate indifference claim brought by the detainee's parents, where at the time of the detainee's death, it was clearly established that officers could not intentionally deny or delay access to medical care. The court held that summary judgment was precluded on the § 1983 municipal liability claim by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the county adequately trained its employees to monitor the medical needs of the pretrial detainees, and, if so, as to whether the county's inadequate training of its employees was deliberately different, and as to whether inadequate training "actually caused" the death of the pretrial detainee. Bridgewater v. Taylor, 832 F.Supp.2d 337 (S.D.N.Y. 2011). A New York state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against prison officials and correctional officers, alleging excessive force, failure to protect, and failure to supervise and properly train in violation of the Eighth Amendment. After the prisoner's motion for summary judgment against an officer was preliminarily denied, the prisoner moved for reconsideration and the former prison superintendent and another officer moved to dismiss. The district court denied the motion for reconsideration and granted the motion to dismiss. The court held that the prisoner did not properly serve the complaint on the officer or superintendent and that the prisoner failed to state a failure to protect claim against the officer. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the correctional officer acted with malice or wantonness toward the prisoner necessary to constitute an Eighth Amendment violation, or whether he was applying force in a good–faith effort to maintain discipline. The court also found that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the correctional officer's use of physical force against the prisoner was more than de minimus. Estate of Gaither ex rel. Gaither v. District of Columbia, 833 F.Supp.2d 110 (D.D.C. 2011). The personal representative of a detainee's estate brought a § 1983 action against the District of Columbia, department of corrections officials, and corrections officers, seeking damages in connection with the detainee's fatal stabbing while he was incarcerated pending sentencing for felony distribution of cocaine. The corrections officers moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion, finding that the officers were entitled to qualified immunity. According to the court, at the time of the detainee's death it was not clearly established that corrections officers were acting with deliberate indifference by exposing inmates, including the detainee, to a substantial threat of inmate-on-inmate attack by understaffing a unit, and thus corrections officers were entitled to qualified immunity. Hawkins v. County of Lincoln, 785 F.Supp.2d 781 (D.Neb. 2011.) The personal representative of a hospital patient brought a § 1983 action against the hospital, a county, a city, and related defendants for claims arising when the patient was brought to the hospital at the time of his arrest, was released by the hospital to a county jail, and subsequently hanged himself at the jail. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether prison officials were objectively aware that the prisoner posed a risk of harm to himself that included a risk of suicide. According to the court, although the prisoner had serious medical needs in connection with his risk of suicide, no prison correctional officers, jailers, and/or law enforcement officers were deliberately indifferent to the prisoner's needs, even though it might have been negligent for individual defendants to take the prisoner off a suicide watch without having him evaluated by a physician or other professional. According to the court, the defendants' conduct was not more blameworthy than mere negligence. The court also held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the county acted with deliberate indifference by failing to have a specific policy for determining when an inmate could be removed from a suicide watch and placed in a situation that could increase the likelihood of a successful suicide attempt. Pauls v. Green, 816 F.Supp.2d 961 (D.Idaho 2011). A female pretrial detainee brought an action against a county, county officials, and a jail guard, alleging that she was coerced into having inappropriate sexual contact with the guard. The defendants moved to dismiss and for summary judgment, and the plaintiff moved to compel discovery and for sanctions. The district court granted the motions, in part. The court held that the detainee was not required to file grievances after being transferred to a state prison before filing her § 1983 action, in order to satisfy the administrative exhaustion requirement under the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA). The court noted that the county jail grievance procedures were not available to detainees after they transferred, and the county did not offer any assistance to the detainee after learning of the alleged assaults. The court found that neither the county nor the county sheriff was deliberately indifferent in failing to train or supervise county jail guards to not sexually assault jail detainees, and thus, the female detainee could not demonstrate that the county or sheriff was liable under § 1983. According to the court, the guards did not need specific training to know that they should refrain from sexually assaulting detainees, and there was no showing that the general training program for guards was deficient or that there was a pattern of prior abuses at county jail. The court held that the summary judgment affidavit of the pretrial detainee's expert, containing the opinion that county officials exhibited deliberate indifference to the rights and safety of jail detainees in training or supervising jail staff, and that sexual improprieties on the part of staff were easily accomplished and rarely punished, was insufficient to avoid summary judgment, where the affidavit was conclusory, and without factual predicate. The court found that the detainee was entitled to the sanction of an adverse jury instruction against the county for the destruction of recordings of interviews conducted by police during the investigation of the county jail guard's contact with the detainee. Smith v. Atkins, 777 F.Supp.2d 955 (E.D.N.C. 2011). The mother of a schizophrenic inmate who committed suicide at a jail and the mother of the inmate's children brought a § 1983 action in state court against a county deputy sheriff, jail officials, a medical contractor, and a nurse employed by the contractor, alleging that the defendants violated the inmate's Eighth Amendment rights in failing to provide adequate medical care. The defendants removed the action to federal court and moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motions. The court held that the deputy sheriff who happened to be at the jail delivering a prisoner when the inmate, who had been diagnosed with schizophrenia, committed suicide, did not know that the inmate was at a substantial risk of committing suicide or intentionally disregarded such risk. The court found that the deputy was not liable under § 1983 where the deputy did not know the inmate or anything about him, or have any responsibilities associated with the inmate's custody. The court held that jail officials' mere failure to comply with a state standard and a jail policy requiring a four-time per hour check on any prisoner who had ever been on a suicide watch did not violate the Eighth Amendment rights of the inmate. The court found that the mother of the inmate failed to show a direct causal link between a specific deficiency in training and an alleged Eighth Amendment violation, as required to sustain the mother's § 1983 Eighth Amendment claim against jail officials based on their alleged failure to train jail employees. Tookes v. U.S., 811 F.Supp.2d 322 (D.D.C. 2011). An arrestee brought an action under the Federal Tort Claims Act (FTCA) against the United States, alleging assault and battery, false imprisonment, and negligent training and supervision. The United States filed a motion for partial summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part, and denied in part. The court held that the training and supervision of Deputy United States Marshals was a discretionary function, and therefore, the discretionary function exception to FTCA precluded subject matter jurisdiction of the arrestee's negligent training and supervision claims, following an alleged attack by marshals. The court noted that there were no statutes, regulations, or policies that specifically prescribed how to train or oversee marshals, and decisions involved social, economic, and political policy in that decisions had to balance budgetary constraints, public perception, economic conditions, individual backgrounds, office diversity, experience, public safety, and employee privacy rights, as well as other considerations. According to the court, there was no evidence that the arrestee should have known she could be diagnosed as suffering from post-traumatic stress disorder following an alleged false imprisonment by United States marshals, and therefore, the arrestee was not limited from seeking greater damages for her emotional injuries than the amount claimed in her administrative form, in her FTCA claim. The court found that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the United States marshals falsely imprisoned the arrestee by bringing her back into a courthouse. Ard v. Rushing, 911 F.Supp.2d 425 (S.D.Miss. 2012). A female inmate brought an action against a sheriff and a deputy asserting claims under § 1983 and § 1985 for violation of the Fourth, Fifth and Eighth Amendments, and also alleging a state law claim for negligence, relating to an incident in which she was sexually assaulted by the deputy while she was incarcerated. The sheriff moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The court held that the sheriff was not deliberately indifferent to a substantial risk of harm to the female jail inmate as would have violated the Eighth Amendment, where the sheriff had established safeguards to ensure the safety of female prisoners, including a female-only, camera-monitored area in which female inmates were housed, a policy that male jailers could not enter the female-only area without a female jailer, and a policy that a female jailer was to cover each shift. The court noted that past allegations that the deputy had engaged in unwanted sexual contact with female inmates had been investigated and found not to be substantiated. The court found that the inmate failed to show that the sheriff had knowledge of the deputy's disregard of the sheriff's policy to ensure the safety of female prisoners, which included a requirement that male jailers could not enter the female-only area without a female jailer, or to show that the sheriff was deliberately indifferent to the need for more or different training, as required to establish an Eighth Amendment failure to train/supervise claim. Edmond v. Clements, 896 F.Supp.2d 960 (D.Colo. 2012). A parolee brought a civil rights action alleging that his constitutional rights were violated when he failed to receive a $100 cash payment upon his release from a state prison to parole, and by state corrections officials' failure to perform a proper sex offender evaluation, which resulted in the parolee being improperly ordered to participate in sex offense treatment that included a requirement that he have no contact with his children. The defendants moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion. The district court held that: (1) the private sex offender treatment program that contracted with the state and its employees did not qualify as "state actors," and thus, could not be liable in the parolee's § 1983 claim; (2) the claim against the executive director of the state department of corrections in his official capacity for recovery of a cash payment was barred by the Eleventh Amendment; (3) the executive director was not personally liable for the cash payable to the parolee upon release; (4) the officials were not liable under § 1983 for their alleged negligent supervision, failure to instruct or warn, or failure to implement proper training procedures for parole officers; (5) the parolee's equal protection rights were not violated; and (6) the allegations stated a due process claim against corrections officials. According to the court, allegations by the parolee that Colorado department of corrections officials failed to perform a proper sex offender evaluation prior to releasing him on parole, as required by Colorado law, which allegedly resulted in a parole condition that he have no contact with his children, stated a due process claim against the corrections officials. Estate of Miller, ex rel. Bertram v. Tobiasz, 680 F.3d 984 (7th Cir. 2012). The minor siblings of an inmate who committed suicide brought a § 1983 action against correctional facility staff members, alleging deliberate indifference to the inmate's serious medical condition involving a long history of suicide attempts, self-harm, and mental illness. The district court granted qualified immunity to the management-level defendants and others, but denied qualified immunity to an intake nurse, psychology associate, and prison guards. The defendants who were denied qualified immunity appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the inmate's siblings adequately alleged that the intake nurse and a psychology associate were subjectively aware that the inmate was a suicide risk, as required to state a claim alleging deliberate indifference to the inmate's serious medical condition. The court found that the inmate's siblings adequately alleged that prison guards were subjectively aware that the inmate was a suicide risk. According to the court, the siblings adequately alleged that the intake nurse and psychology associate failed to take reasonable steps to prevent the harm from the inmate's suicidal tendencies, and that prison guards failed to take reasonable steps to prevent the harm from the inmate's suicidal tendencies. The court held that the intake nurse, psychology associate, and prison guards were not entitled to qualified immunity. The court noted that the guards allegedly knew or should have known of the inmate's mental illness and suicide attempts because he was adjudicated mentally ill, he had court-ordered medications he refused to take the night he died, and he had a well-documented history of suicidal behavior. The inmate was housed in a unit where inmates in need of greater supervision were placed. The guards allegedly failed to call for medical attention despite finding the inmate with no pulse and not breathing on the floor of his cell with a white cloth wrapped around his neck, and waited to assemble an entry team and then applied restraints to the inmate before removing the ligature from around his neck. Facey v. Dickhaut, 892 F.Supp.2d 347 (D.Mass. 2012). A prisoner at a state correctional institution filed a pro se § 1983 action against the prison and officials alleging his Eighth Amendment right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment was violated when officials knowingly placed him in danger by assigning him to a housing unit where he was violently attacked by members of a rival gang. The defendants moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the complaint stated a claim against the deputy superintendent and an assistant for violation of the Eighth Amendment, by alleging that officials were aware of the feud between two rival prison gangs, that the prisoner was a known member of one of the gangs, that despite this knowledge officials had assigned the prisoner to a section of the prison where a rival gang was housed, and as a result he was violently attacked and sustained permanent injuries. The court found that the official who had instituted the gang housing policy could not be held personally liable, since he did not implement the policy, nor was he deliberately indifferent in supervising or training those who did. According to the court, state prison officials who had placed the prisoner known to be a gang member in danger by assigning him to a housing unit where he was violently attacked by members of a rival gang, were not entitled to qualified immunity in the prisoner's § 1983 suit. The court noted that clearly established law provided that the Eighth Amendment was violated if officials disregarded a known, substantial risk to an inmate's health or safety, and the officials had disregarded this risk, as well as violated a prison policy, by placing rival gang members in same housing unit. (Souza Baranowski Correctional Center, Massachusetts)

Ferencz v. Medlock, 905 F.Supp.2d 656 (W.D.Pa. 2012). A mother, as administrator for her son's estate, brought deliberate indifference claims under a wrongful death statute against prison employees, and the prison's medical services provider, following the death of her son when he was a pretrial detainee in a county prison. The employees and provider moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The district court held that under Pennsylvania law, the mother lacked standing to bring wrongful death and survival actions in her individual capacity against several prison employees for her son's death while he was in prison, where the wrongful death and survival statutes only permitted recovery by a personal representative, such as a mother in her action as administratrix of her son's estate, or as a person entitled to recover damages as a trustee ad litem. The court found that the mother's claims that a prison's medical services provider had a policy, practice, or custom that resulted in her son's death were sufficient to overcome the provider's motion to dismiss the mother's § 1983 action for the death of her son while he was in prison.

Upon admission to the facility, the detainee had been evaluated and scored a 12 on a scale, which was to have triggered classification as suicidal (a score of 8 or more). The Classification Committee subsequently did not classify the detainee as suicidal as they were required to do under the jail classification policy, and no member of the Committee communicated to medical contractor staff or correctional officers responsible for monitoring the detainee that he was suicidal and going through drug withdrawal. At the time, the jail was equipped with an operational and working video surveillance system and there was a video camera in the detainee's cell. The video surveillance of the cell was broadcast on four different television monitors throughout the jail, all of which were working and manned by officers. Additionally, the work station thhhattt was located around the corner from the cell, approximately 20 feet away, was equipped with one of the four television monitors. The monitor was situated on the wall above the desk at the work station, such that it would be directly in front of the officer manning the station if he was sitting facing his desk.

The detainee attempted suicide by trying to hang himself with his bed sheet from the top of the cell bars, which took several minutes and was unsuccessful. After the attempt, however, the detainee left the bed sheet hanging from the top of his cell bars and started to pace in his cell in visible mental distress. This suicide attempt, as well as the hanging bedsheet were viewable from the nearby work station video surveillance monitor as well as the other three monitors throughout the jail. A few minutes later the detainee attempted to commit suicide a second time by hanging himself with his bed sheet from the top of his cell bars. This suicide attempt took several minutes, was unsuccessful, and was viewable from the work station video surveillance monitor as well as the other three monitors throughout the jail. A few minutes later, the detainee attempted to commit suicide a third time by hanging himself with his bed sheet. This time, he hung himself from his bed sheet for over twenty minutes, without being noticed by any of the four officers who were manning the four video surveillance monitors. In fact, one officer admitted he was asleep at his work station at the time. By the time another officer noticed the hanging, nearly 30 minutes had passed. The detainee was cut down and transported to a local hospital where he was subsequently pronounced dead due to asphyxiation by hanging. Harris v. Hammon, 914 F.Supp.2d 1026 (D.Minn. 2012). A prisoner brought a § 1983 action against a county and various officials with the state department of corrections (DOC), alleging violations of the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments, as well as state law claims for false imprisonment, intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), and negligent infliction of emotional distress (NIED). The defendants moved for summary judgment and for judgment on the pleadings. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that there was no evidence of a continuing, widespread pattern of misconduct on account of county employees in not releasing prisoners pursuant to court orders, as required for the prisoner's § 1983 failure-to-train claims against the county for alleged violations of the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments. The prisoner had been held for more than five days after a judge ordered his release pending his appeal.

According to the court, the former prisoner's allegations were sufficient to plead that department of corrections (DOC) employees were deliberately indifferent to the prisoner's liberty rights under the Fourteenth Amendment, as required to state a § 1983 claim for violations of his due process rights based on his continued detention after a court ordered his release. The prisoner alleged that he had a court order for his release but he was returned to prison, that a judge faxed and mailed the release order to the prison after being contacted by the prisoner's attorney the next day, that the judge's clerk also telephoned employees to inform them that the prisoner was to be released, that one employee did not respond to calls from the prisoner's attorney, that another employee told the attorney he would have to hand deliver a certified copy of order by the end of her shift in three minutes so that the prisoner could be released before the weekend, and that employees told the attorney several days later that they might not be able to release the prisoner because the order could be invalid. The court also held that the prisoner's allegations were sufficient to plead that his continued detention, after his release was ordered by a judge, violated a clearly established right, as required to overcome qualified immunity for department of corrections (DOC) employees. Ponzini v. Monroe County, 897 F.Supp.2d 282 (M.D.Pa. 2012). Survivors of a pretrial detainee sued prison officials, medical care providers and a corrections officer under § 1983 and state tort law, claiming that they were deliberately indifferent to the serious medical needs of the detainee, who committed suicide. The detainee allegedly did not receive his medication during his confinement. The survivors noted that one of the medications, Paxil, has "a short half-life and leaves a user's system very quickly," and that its withdrawal symptoms include "worsening of underlying anxiety or depression, headache, tremor or 'shakes', gastrointestinal distress and fatigue-, all of which were allegedly present in detainee during his incarceration." The detainee had also been taking Trazadone. The survivors alleged that during the period in which the detainee was incarcerated at the facility, officers were aware that the detainee should have been monitored closely and placed on a suicide watch. The survivors asserted that, although the detainee was not on a suicide watch, the inmate housed in an adjacent cell was on such a watch. An officer was expected to pass the neighboring cell, and by virtue of its location, the detainee's cell, every fifteen minutes. The survivors alleged that the officer falsified documents demonstrating that he properly made his rounds every fifteen minutes, and that officer failure to properly maintain a suicide watch on the detainee's neighbor facilitated the detainee's own suicide. The detainee killed himself by swallowing shreds of his own t-shirt. The court held that the survivors stated a § 1983 claim under the Fourteenth Amendment against prison officials for deliberate indifference to the serious medical needs of the detainee, who committed suicide allegedly as a result of a lack of daily medication necessary to treat depression and other psychological issues. According to the court, the complaint raised the possibility that prison officials knew that the detainee suffered from a severe medical condition and did not attempt to provide appropriate, necessary care in a timely manner. The court held that the survivors also stated a § 1983 claim under the Fourteenth Amendment against the corporate medical provider for deliberate indifference. Rice ex rel. Rice v. Correctional Medical Services, 675 F.3d 650 (7th Cir. 2012). Following a pretrial detainee's death while incarcerated, his parents, representing his estate filed suit pursuant to § 1983, alleging among other things that jail officials and medical personnel had deprived the pretrial detainee of due process by exhibiting deliberate indifference to his declining mental and physical condition. The district court entered summary judgment against the estate. The estate filed a second suit reasserting the state wrongful death claims that the judge in the first suit had dismissed without prejudice after disposing of the federal claims. The district court dismissed that case on the basis of collateral estoppel, and the estate appealed both judgments. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The appeals court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether jail officials were deliberately indifferent to the pretrial detainee's conditions of confinement, and whether his conditions of confinement were sufficiently serious to support his Fourteenth Amendment due process claim. The court noted that whether the detainee himself created the unsanitary conditions was a fact relevant to the claim, but given detainee's mental condition, it did not foreclose the claim. The court found that neither jail guards or supervisors were deliberately indifferent to the risk that the mentally ill pretrial detainee might engage in a behavior such as compulsive water drinking that would cause him to die within a matter of hours and did not consciously disregarded that risk, and therefore they were not liable for his death under § 1983. According to the court, while a fact-finder might conclude that the guards exhibited a generalized recklessness with respect to the safety of the inmates housed in the administrative segregation unit by failing to conduct hourly checks of the unit, there was no evidence that the guards or supervisors were subjectively aware of the possibility that the detainee might injure himself to the point of death before anyone could intervene. A former prisoner brought an action against the District of Columbia, alleging he was over-detained and asserting claims for negligent training and supervision. The district moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to when the prisoner was to be released. The district court began its opinion as follows: "Our saga begins with the tale of plaintiff's numerous arrests. Plaintiff was arrested on four different charges in 2007: two felony charges for violating the Bail Reform Act, one felony charge for Possession with Intent to Distribute a Controlled Substance and one misdemeanor charge for carrying an open can of alcohol without a permit." During the prisoner's time in jail he was sentenced for all of the remaining charges. The prisoner claimed he was over-detained by approximately two months, and that this was the direct result of the D.C. Jail's negligent training and supervision of its employees with regard to calculating jail credits. (District of Columbia Jail)

Shelton v. Arkansas Dept. of Human Services, 677 F.3d 837 (8th Cir. 2012). The administratrix of the estate of a mental health patient brought an action against various public officials and health professionals, alleging shortcomings in the way the medical professionals responded after the patient hanged herself while a patient at the facility. The district court dismissed the action. The administratrix appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the state actors' discovery of an unconscious voluntary mental health patient hanged in her room did not trigger duties related to involuntary commitment nor did it give rise to a constitutional-level duty of care. According to the court, after the state actors discovered the patient, she was no different than any unconscious patient in an emergency room, operating room, or ambulance controlled by the state actors, and, in such circumstances, the state actors owed patients state-law duties of care based upon standards for simple or professional negligence. The court found that the physician's decision to remove the mental health patient from a suicide watch was a medical-treatment decision, and therefore a claim based on that decision could not be brought pursuant to either the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) or the Rehabilitation Act, absent any allegation that the removal from suicide watch was influenced by anything other than the physician's judgment. A state death-row inmate brought a § 1983 action for declaratory, injunctive, and monetary relief against prison officials and medical personnel, alleging, among other things, deliberate indifference to his medical needs in violation of his rights under the Eighth Amendment. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants. The inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part and remanded. The court held that: (1) factual issues precluded summary judgment for the defendants on the issue of whether denial of a recommended treatment violated the inmate's Eighth Amendment rights; (2) factual issues precluded summary judgment for the defendants on the ground that the decision to treat the inmate pharmacologically, rather than surgically, was a mere difference of opinion over the course of treatment that did not establish deliberate indifference; (3) factual issues precluded summary judgment for the warden and the assistant warden on the claim for deliberate indifference to the inmate's serious medical needs; (4) factual issues precluded summary judgment for the head of the prison's utilization review panel on the claim for deliberate indifference to the inmate's serious medical needs; (5) the Eleventh Amendment applied to bar the claim against the state and the state corrections department for monetary damages based on the alleged custom or policy of refusing to provide certain types of medical care to inmates; and (6) factual issues precluded summary judgment for the defendants on the inmate's Eighth Amendment claim for injunctive relief. Solivan v. Dart, 897 F.Supp.2d 694 (N.D.Ill. 2012). A pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against a county, corrections officers, and a sheriff, alleging deliberate indifference to undue punishment. The defendants moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the detainee's § 1983 complaint stated a claim against a correctional officer for deliberate indifference to a serious need in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment, where the complaint alleged facts that indicated that the officer left inmates visually and audibly unsupervised for hours, knowing that a substantial risk of harm was present. The complaint further alleged that there were no light bulbs in the detainee's cell, no intercoms or emergency call buttons in cells, and no overhead cameras on his tier of the jail. According to the court, the complaint stated that the harm the detainee suffered at the hands of other inmates was significant, including severe injuries to his right eye and bleeding from his ear, and the complaint alleged that the detainee was the only person of Hispanic origin housed in the maximum security tier, while a significant majority of other inmates were African American, and that these circumstances put the detainee in an identifiable group of prisoners who were singled out for attack. Stanfill v. Talton, 851 F.Supp.2d 1346 (M.D.Ga. 2012). The father of a pretrial detainee who died while in custody at a county jail brought a § 1983 action individually, and as administrator of the detainee's estate, against a county sheriff and others, alleging that the defendants violated the detainee's rights under the Eighth and Fourteenth amendments. The county defendants moved for summary judgment, and the father cross-moved for partial summary judgment and for sanctions. The district court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment. The court held that the father failed to establish that the county defendants had a duty to preserve any video of the detainee in his cells, as would support sanctions against the defendants in the father's civil rights action. The court noted that the defendants did not anticipate litigation resulting from the detainee's death, the father did not file suit until almost two years after the detainee's death, and there was no indication that the father requested that the defendants impose a litigation hold or provided the defendants any form of notice that litigation was imminent or even contemplated until the lawsuit was actually filed.

The court also held that the officers' continued restraint of the detainee in the restraint chair was not excessive, as would violate the Fourteenth Amendment where the officers were aware of detainee's history of self-mutilation, the detainee posed a serious risk of harm to himself, and the particular circumstances confronting the officers justified the continued use of restraints until the officers were reasonably assured that the situation had abated. According to the court, even if the history of the detainee as a "cutter" constituted a serious medical need, there was no evidence that the county correctional officers were deliberately indifferent to that need, in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment, where the only risk of harm the officers were subjectively aware of was the detainee's potential to injure himself. Despite the detainee's refusal to speak with medical staff upon arrival at jail, he was immediately classified as a suicide risk due to his self-destructive history and was placed on a suicide watch, and for two days, the detainee remained on suicide watch in jail custody, whereby he was observed at least every 15 minutes, without incident. The court held that the father failed to show, by way of medical evidence, that an alleged six-minute delay of a correctional officer in performing resuscitation efforts once the detainee was found unresponsive, was the cause of the detainee's death, as would support the father's Fourteenth Amendment deliberate indifference claim against the county defendants.

The court ruled that "All parties can agree that Stanfill's death was unfortunate, and that in hindsight, perhaps more could have been done. Hindsight, however, is not an appropriate lens through which to view the Defendants' actions. The Plaintiff has failed to meet his burden of proving that the Defendants violated Stanfill's constitutional rights. The Defendants are therefore entitled to qualified immunity." Strutton v. Meade, 668 F.3d 549 (8th Cir. 2012). A civilly-committed sex offender brought a civil rights action challenging the adequacy of his treatment at the Missouri Sexual Offender Treatment Center. The district court entered judgment in favor of the defendants, and the plaintiff appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court found that the offender had standing to bring the due process challenge to the adequacy of Missouri's four-phase treatment program for such offenders, where he demonstrated that his alleged injury of not advancing in treatment was not due solely to his own recalcitrance and could have been due to the lack of adequate treatment resources. But according to the court, the treatment received by offender did not shock the conscience, in violation of substantive due process. The court noted that although budget shortfalls and staffing shortages resulted in treatment modifications that were below standards set in place by the center's directors, temporary modifications in the treatment regimen of eliminating psychoeducational classes and increasing the size of process groups was neither arbitrary nor egregious, and the center sought to maintain essential treatment services in light of the challenges it faced.

The court found that the treatment center's use of the "restriction table" and the later use of a restriction area in treating the civilly-committed sex offender did not shock the conscience, and thus did not violate offender's Fourteenth Amendment due process rights. A resident assigned to the Restriction Table, which was located near a nurses' station, was not permitted to speak to another person unless that person was also seated at the table, and was only allowed to leave the table for meals, classes, process groups, and for an hour of exercise. Residents would remain at the table from early morning until late evening. Despite its name, residents assigned to the Restriction Table were not physically restrained and were allowed to stand, stretch, get a drink of water, or use the restroom as needed. Use of the table was discontinued and it was replaced with a "Restriction Area." According to the court, residents assigned to a restriction table or restriction area retained a comparatively free range of movement and activities, including the ability to get up and stretch, to leave to attend group sessions and meetings, to converse with other residents, to work on homework or legal issues, and to play cards. Wood v. Beauclair, 692 F.3d 1041 (9th Cir. 2012). A male state prisoner filed a civil rights action alleging sexual abuse by a female prison guard in violation of the First, Fourth, and Eighth Amendments. The district court granted summary judgment to the defendants and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The court held that: (1) the prisoner established non-consent; (2) sexual abuse of the prisoner by a prison guard constituted malicious and sadistic use of force; (3) the sexual assault on the prisoner by the prison guard was deeply offensive to human dignity and was completely void of penological justification; (4) supervisory prison officials were not on notice that the prison guard presented a substantial risk to the prisoner through sexual abuse; and (5) prison officials did not retaliate against the prisoner for filing a grievance. According to the court, the prisoner established non-consent for purposes of surviving summary judgment, where the prisoner and guard were in a consensual relationship that involved hugging and kissing, then they were involved in a disagreement and the prisoner told the guard to "back off" and that they had to "stop" seeing each other for a while, and then the initial sexual encounter that gave rise to the action occurred. Arnzen v. Palmer, 713 F.3d 369 (8th Cir 2013). Patients at a state Civil Commitment Unit for Sex Offenders (CCUSO) brought a § 1983 complaint against CCUSO administrators, challenging placement of video cameras in CCUSO restrooms, and moved for a preliminary injunction to stop their use. The district court denied the motion as to cameras in "dormitory style restrooms" but granted an injunction ordering that cameras in "traditional style bathrooms" be pointed at a ceiling or covered with lens cap. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that CCUSO conducted a "search" by capturing images of patients while occupying single-user bathrooms, and that CCUSO did not conduct a reasonable search by capturing patients' images, thereby constituting a Fourth Amendment violation. The appeals court found that the district court did not abuse its discretion in issuing preliminary injunctive relief. The court noted that the patients had a reasonable expectation of privacy in a single-person bathroom when there was no immediate indication it was being used for purposes other than those ordinarily associated with bathroom facilities, and that involuntarily civilly committed persons retain the Fourth Amendment right to be free from unreasonable searches that is analogous to the right retained by pretrial detainees. According to the court, the facility did not conduct a reasonable search of its involuntarily committed patients by capturing images of patients while they occupied single-user bathrooms in a secure facility, thereby constituting a violation of Fourth Amendment, where the cameras did not provide administrators with immediate alerts concerning patient safety or prevent assaults or dangerous acts, and less intrusive methods were available for administrators to use to prevent illicit activities by patients. Christie ex rel. estate of Christie v. Scott, 923 F.Supp.2d 1308 (M.D.Fla. 2013). An estate brought a § 1983 action against a private prison health services provider and corrections officers following the death of a detainee after he was pepper-sprayed over 12 times in 36 hours. The provider moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to: (1) whether failure of the nurses to inspect the detainee after each time he was pepper-sprayed constituted deliberate indifference; (2) whether the sheriff knew that corrections officers were using pepper spray nearly indiscriminately; (3) whether corrections officers were deliberately indifferent to the detainee's physical and medical needs; and (4) whether corrections officers' repeated pepper-spraying of the detainee while he was restrained naked in a chair was malicious and sadistic to the point of shocking the conscience. The estate alleged that the nurses' failed to evaluate the detainee after each time he was pepper-sprayed, failed to follow their employer's policy by not monitoring the detainee every 15 minutes for the periods he was restrained, and failed to offer the detainee fluids or a bedpan while he was restrained. The nurses allegedly checked the inmate only two times during the five hours he was restrained. The court found that the health services provider did not have a policy of understaffing that constituted deliberate indifference to the detainee's health, as required to support a § 1983 claim against the private provider. Earl v. Racine County Jail, 718 F.3d 689 (7th Cir. 2013). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against a county jail and various jail officers, asserting claims for denial of due process and deliberate indifference to his serious medical condition. The district court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment, and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the inmate's five days on suicide watch were neither long enough nor harsh enough to deprive him of a due-process-protected liberty interest, where: (1) the only changes to the inmate's meals were that trays upon which food was served were disposable foam rather than plastic; (2) eating utensils were quickly removed after each meal; (3) the inmate was not denied bedding but was given a mattress and a blanket; (4) the inmate was denied writing materials for only the first 48 hours; and (5) rather than being prohibited human contact, deputies were assigned to closely and personally monitor the inmate to ensure his safety. The court found that jail officers were not deliberately indifferent to the inmate's allergic reaction to suicide garments in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The court noted that after the inmate told an officer about his allergic reaction to a suicide gown, the officer called a nurse who immediately examined the inmate and gave him cream and medication, and the officers appropriately deferred to the nurse's medical decision that the inmate did not need different garments because there was no sign of rash or bumps on the inmate. Estate of Prasad ex rel. Prasad v. County of Sutter, 958 F.Supp.2d 1101 (E.D.Cal. 2013). The estate of a deceased pretrial detainee brought an action against jail employees and officials, as well as medical staff, alleging violations of the Fourteenth Amendment. The defendants moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that: (1) although the detainee died at a hospital, liability for the jail employees and officials was not precluded, where the jail employees and officials could have contributed to detainee's death despite the transfer to the hospital; (2) allegations were sufficient plead deliberate indifference to serious medical needs by the deputies and medical staff; (3) allegations were sufficient to state a claim for supervisory liability; (4) allegations were sufficient to state a claim for supervisory liability against the corrections officers in charge; (5) allegations were sufficient to state a claim against the county; (6) allegations were sufficient to state a claim for wrongful death under California law; and (7) the health care provider was a state actor. According to the court, allegations that the county maintained customs or practices whereby no medical staff whatsoever were at the jail for one-sixth of every day, that the staff lacked authority to respond to emergency and critical inmate needs, and that the jail records system withheld information from affiliated health care providers, were sufficient to state a § 1983 claim against the county, alleging violations of the Fourteenth Amendment after the pretrial detainee died.

The court held that allegations that deficiencies in medical care at the jail, including lack of 24-hour emergency care, were longstanding, repeatedly documented, and expressly noted by officials in the past., and that the doctor who was employed by the health care provider that contracted with the prison was aware of the deficiencies, and that the doctor discharged the pretrial detainee to the jail were sufficient to plead deliberate indifference to serious medical needs, as required to state a § 1983 action against the doctor for violations of the Fourteenth Amendment after the detainee died. Goodman v. Kimbrough, 718 F.3d 1325 (11th Cir. 2013). The wife of a pretrial detainee who suffered from dementia and who was severely beaten by his cellmate filed a § 1983 action against jail officials in their individual capacities for alleged violation of the Due Process Clause by deliberate indifference to a substantial risk of harm to the detainee. The wife also asserted a supervisory liability claim against the sheriff in his official capacity and a state law claim for loss of support and consortium. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants. The wife appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that there was no evidence that jail officials were subjectively aware of a risk of serious harm to which the pretrial detainee was exposed from his severe beating by a cellmate, and that the officials deliberately disregarded that risk, as required to support the detainee's § 1983 claim of deliberate indifference in violation of the Due Process Clause. According to the court, the officers' failure to conduct cell checks and head counts and their deactivation of emergency call buttons constituted negligence but did not justify constitutional liability under § 1983. According to the court, jail officials' policy violations by failing to enter every cell in conducting head counts and in deactivating emergency call buttons did not constitute a custom so settled and permanent as to have the force of law. Grimes v. District of Columbia, 923 F.Supp.2d 196 (D.D.C. 2013). A juvenile detainee's mother filed a § 1983 action against the District of Columbia for violation of the Eighth Amendment and negligent hiring, training, and supervision, after the detainee was attacked and killed by other detainees. After the district court ruled in the District's favor, the appeals court vacated and remanded. On remand, the District moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The court held that officials at the juvenile detention facility were not deliberately indifferent to a known safety risk, and thus their failure to protect the detainee from an attack by another detainee did not violate the Eighth Amendment. According to the court, there was no evidence of a history of assaults on youth at the facility, such that any facility employee knew or should have known that a fight between the detainee and another youth was going to take place, or that the youth who fought with the detainee had a history of assaultive behavior while at the facility. The court also found no evidence that a municipal custom, policy, or practice caused any such violation. The court also held that the mother's failure to designate an expert witness barred her claim. Hahn v. Walsh, 915 F.Supp.2d 925 (C.D.Ill. 2013). The estate of a diabetic pretrial detainee brought an action against a city, police officers, a county, the county sheriff, and a jail medical provider, alleging under § 1983 that the defendants were deliberately indifferent to the detainee's serious medical needs. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motions in part and denied in part. The court held that a city police officer at the scene of the arrest who had no involvement with the diabetic detainee could not be held liable under § 1983 for being deliberately indifferent to the serious medical needs of detainee, who died from diabetic ketoacidosis after she was taken to a county jail. The court also found that city police officers who transported the detainee to the county jail, rather than a hospital, were not deliberately indifferent to the serious medical needs of the detainee, where the officers were entitled to defer to the judgment of the paramedics on the scene. According to the court, there was no evidence that the county sheriff knew of a serious risk to the health of the diabetic pretrial detainee and consciously disregarded that risk, that any prior deaths at the jail involved medical care provided to an inmate, much less that medical care involved an inmate with diabetes, or that the sheriff's decisions about certification of the jail's medical contractor had any adverse effect on the detainee, as would subject the sheriff to liability under § 1983, in his individual capacity, for his alleged deliberate indifference to the detainee's serious medical needs.

The court found that the county's actions in shutting off water to the mentally ill, diabetic pretrial detainee's cell when the inmate was stuffing clothing into the cell's toilet did not violate the detainee's Fourteenth Amendment rights. According to the court, the estate's claim against the county that the detainee, who died of diabetic ketoacidosis after allegedly refusing diabetic treatment and food while incarcerated, was not properly treated for her mental illness and diabetes was not actionable under the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) or the Rehabilitation Act. Junior v. Anderson, 724 F.3d 812 (7th Cir. 2013). A pretrial detainee brought a suit under § 1983 against a guard who allegedly failed to protect him from an attack by other inmates. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the guard, and the detainee appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The appeals court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the guard acted with a conscious disregard of a significant risk of violence to the detainee, when she noted that two cells in the corridor where she was posted were not securely locked, but only noted that this was a "security risk" in her log. The guard then let several of the inmates who were supposed to remain locked up out of their cells, let them congregate in a darkened corridor, and then left her post, so that no guard was present to observe more than 20 maximum-security prisoners milling about. The court found that the detainee was entitled to appointed counsel in his § 1983 suit against a prison guard. According to the court, although the case was not analytically complex, its sound resolution depended on evidence to which detainee in his distant lockup had no access, and the detainee needed to, but could not, depose the guard in order to explore the reason for her having left her post and other issues. Keith v. Koerner, 707 F.3d 1185 (10th Cir. 2013). A female former prison inmate who was impregnated as a result of her vocational-training instructor's unlawful sexual acts brought a § 1983 action against a former warden and other Kansas Department of Corrections employees. The defendants moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part, but denied qualified immunity for the former warden, who appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the former prison inmate adequately alleged that the former warden violated a clearly established constitutional right, precluding qualified immunity for the warden in the § 1983 action alleging that the warden was deliberately indifferent to sexual abuse by the vocational-training instructor. According to the court, the inmate alleged that the warden had knowledge of the abuse but failed to properly investigate or terminate staff when abuse allegations were substantiated, and that the prison's structural policy problems contributed to abuse by failing to address known problems with the vocational program or to use cameras to monitor inmates and staff. Kelly v. Wengler, 979 F.Supp.2d 1104 (D.Idaho 2013). Prisoners brought a civil contempt action against a private prison contractor, alleging the contractor violated a settlement agreement that required it to comply with the staffing pattern specified in its contract with the Idaho Department of Correction. The district court found that the contractor was in civil contempt for violating the settlement agreement, that the contractor's non-compliance with staffing requirements were significant, and the contractor did not promptly take all reasonable steps to comply with settlement agreement. The court held that a two-year extension of the consent decree was a proper sanction for the contractor's civil contempt in willfully violating the settlement agreement, where the contractor's failure to comply with a key provision of the settlement agreement had lasted nearly as long as the duration of the agreement. According to the court, the use of an independent monitor to ensure the private prison contractor's compliance with the settlement agreement was an appropriate resolution, where such duty was most fairly handled by a monitor with a direct obligation to the district court and to the terms of the settlement agreement. The court noted that "…it is clear that there was a persistent failure to fill required mandatory positions, along with a pattern of CCA staff falsifying rosters to make it appear that all posts were filled." Lemire v. California Dept. of Corrections and Rehabilitation, 726 F.3d 1062 (9th Cir. 2013). The estate, parents, and daughter of a mentally ill inmate who died in custody brought a § 1983 action against the California Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation (CDCR), CDCR officials, and prison staff. The plaintiffs sought to recover damages for alleged violations of the Eighth Amendment, based on the inmate's right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment, and the Fourteenth Amendment, based on the family's substantive due process right of familial association. The district court granted summary judgment to the plaintiffs. The appeals court affirmed in part, vacated in part, and remanded. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether: (1) withdrawal of all floor staff from a prison building which housed mentally ill inmates, for up to three and a half hours, created an objectively substantial risk of harm to the unsupervised inmates in the building; (2) the captain who called staff meetings, and a warden, who purportedly authorized the meetings, were aware of risks posed by withdrawing all floor officers from the building for over three hours; (3) any risk of harm could have been prevented with adequate supervision; and (4) the actions of the warden and the captain shocked the conscience.

The court also found genuine issues of material fact existed as to whether (1) floor officers who were the first prison personnel to arrive in the cell of the mentally ill inmate who apparently committed suicide were deliberately indifferent to the inmate's serious medical needs when they failed to provide cardiopulmonary resuscitation (CPR), despite being trained to administer it; (2) the officers' failure to provide medical care caused the inmate's death; and (3) the officers' actions shocked the conscience, precluding summary judgment as to the § 1983 Eighth Amendment medical claim brought by the inmate's family against officers and family's substantive due process claim against the officers. Royer v. Federal Bureau of Prisons, 933 F.Supp.2d 170 (D.D.C. 2013). A federal prisoner brought an action against Bureau of Prisoners (BOP), alleging classification as a "terrorist inmate" resulted in violations of the Privacy Act and the First and Fifth Amendments. The BOP moved for summary judgment and to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that BOP rules prohibiting contact visits and limiting noncontact visits and telephone time for federal inmates labeled as "terrorist inmates", more than other inmates, had a rational connection to a legitimate government interest, for the purpose of the inmate's action alleging the rules violated his First Amendment rights of speech and association. According to the court, the prison had an interest in monitoring the inmate's communications and the prison isolated inmates who could pose a threat to others or to the orderly operation of the institution. The court noted that the rules did not preclude the inmate from using alternative means to communicate with his family, where the inmate could send letters, the telephone was available to him, and he could send messages through others allowed to visit.

The court found that the inmate's assertions that the prison already had multiple cameras and hypersensitive microphones, and that officers strip searched inmates before and after contact visits, did not establish ready alternatives to a prohibition on contact visits for the inmate and limits on phone usage and noncontact visits due to being labeled as a "terrorist inmate." The court noted that increasing the number of inmates subject to strip searches increased the cost of visitation, and microphones and cameras did not obviate all security concerns that arose from contact visits, such as covert notes or hand signals.

The court held that the inmate's allegations that he was segregated from the prison's general population for over six years, that he was subject to restrictions on recreational, religious, and educational opportunities available to other inmates, that contact with his family was limited to one 15 minute phone call per week during business hours when his children were in school, and that he was limited to two 2-hour noncontact visits per month, were sufficient to plead harsh and atypical conditions, as required for his Fifth Amendment procedural due process claim. According to the court, the inmate's allegations that he was taken from his cell without warning, that he was only provided an administrative detention order that stated he was being moved due to his classification, that he was eventually told he was classified as a "terrorist inmate," that such classification imposed greater restrictions upon his confinement, and that he was never provided with a hearing, notice of criteria for release from conditions, or notice of a projected date for release from conditions were sufficient to plead denial of due process, as required for his claim alleging violations of the Fifth Amendment procedural due process. Wilson v. Montano, 715 F.3d 847 (10th Cir. 2013). An arrestee brought a § 1983 action against a county sheriff, several deputies, and the warden of the county's detention center, alleging that he was unlawfully detained, and that his right to a prompt probable cause determination was violated. The district court denied the defendants' motion to dismiss. The defendants appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded in part. The detainee had been held for 11 days without a hearing and without charges being filed. The appeals court held that the defendants were not entitled to qualified immunity from the claim that they violated the arrestee's right to a prompt post-arrest probable cause determination, where the Fourth Amendment right to a prompt probable cause determination was clearly established at the time. The court held that the arrestee sufficiently alleged that the arresting sheriff's deputy was personally involved in the deprivation of his Fourth Amendment right to a prompt probable cause hearing, as required to support his § 1983 claim against the deputy. The arrestee alleged that he was arrested without a warrant, and that the deputy wrote out a criminal complaint but failed to file it in any court with jurisdiction to hear a misdemeanor charge until after he was released from the county's detention facility, despite having a clear duty under New Mexico law to ensure that the arrestee received a prompt probable cause determination. The court held that the arrestee sufficiently alleged that the county sheriff established a policy or custom that led to the arrestee's prolonged detention without a probable cause hearing, and that the sheriff acted with the requisite mental state, as required to support his § 1983 claim against the sheriff, by alleging that: (1) the sheriff allowed deputies to arrest people and wait before filing charges, thus resulting in the arrest and detention of citizens with charges never being filed; (2) the sheriff was deliberately indifferent to ongoing constitutional violations occurring under his supervision and due to his failure to adequately train his employees; (3) routine warrantless arrest and incarceration of citizens without charges being filed amounted to a policy or custom; and (4) such policy was the significant moving force behind the arrestee's illegal detention. Current and former sheriff's deputies brought an action against a city and county, alleging various claims including retaliation and that a policy prohibiting male deputies from supervising female inmates in housing units of jails operated by the county violated Title VII and California's Fair Employment and Housing Act (FEHA). The district court granted the defendants' motion on gender discrimination claims and denied the plaintiffs' motion for reconsideration. The plaintiffs appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and vacated in part, and dismissed the appeal in part. The court held that the county was not entitled to summary judgment based on a bona fide occupational qualification (BFOQ) defense, in light of fact issues as to whether a reasoned decision-making process, based on available information and experience, led to the sheriff's adoption of the policy such that the policy would be entitled to deference. The court also found fact issues as to whether the policy of excluding male deputies because of their sex was a legitimate proxy for reasonably necessary job qualifications. The court noted that the primary justification for the policy was to protect the safety of female inmates by reducing the possibility of sexual harassment and abuse by male deputies, a secondary justification was that employing male deputies in female housing pods posed a threat to jail security because of a threat of manipulation, a tertiary justification was protecting the privacy interests of female inmates, and the final justification was promoting female inmates' rehabilitation. Castillo v. Bobelu, 1 F.Supp.3d 1190 (W.D.Okla. 2014). Five female inmates brought a § 1983 action against state officials and employees, alleging they were subjected to sexual abuse while working outside a community corrections center in which they were housed, in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The inmates were participating in the Prisoner Public Works Program ("PPWP") that allowed offenders to work off-site at different state offices. They were working during the day doing grounds maintenance at the Oklahoma Governor's Mansion, where they were supervised by a groundskeeper and his immediate supervisor. When inmates work at places such as the Governor's Mansion, the DOC does not have a guard stay with the women at the work site. Instead, they are supervised by state workers employed at the work site, who function like guards. These individuals go through an eight hour training program. The inmate claimed that they were sexually harassed and sexually assaulted by the groundskeeper and by a cook employed at the Governor's Mansion. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to (1) whether prison guards were deliberately indifferent. The court held that: (1) the prison district supervisor did not have knowledge of a substantial risk of harm to the inmates because the supervisor did not know that the inmates were working only with males while off-site; (2) the supervisor was not deliberately indifferent; (3) the prison supervising case manager was not deliberately indifferent; and (4) there was no evidence that the employee had supervisory authority over the inmate. The court noted that the inmate did not return to the work assignment where she was allegedly abused by state employees or have contact with the alleged abusers, as required for the continuing violation doctrine to apply to her § 1983 action that alleged violations of the Eighth Amendment. According to the court, despite the supervisor being aware of misconduct by a groundskeeper under his supervision, the supervisor was aware that the groundskeeper violated certain policies, but did not have knowledge of the sexual assaults, and he investigated the groundskeeper's conduct and counseled the groundskeeper. The court also found that the prison supervising case manager, who oversaw the off-site public works program, was not deliberately indifferent to the excessive risk of sexual assaults of female inmates working at the governor's mansion as part of the program, where the inmates did not complain to the manager and the manager was never informed of misconduct. Danser v. Stansberry, 772 F.3d 340 (4th Cir. 2014). A federal inmate who was attacked in a recreation cage brought a Bivens action alleging that officials were deliberately indifferent to his safety. The district court denied the officials' motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity. The officials appealed. The appeals court vacated and remanded with instructions. The court held that a corrections officer did not disregard an excessive risk to the safety of the inmate in violation of the Eighth Amendment when he placed the inmate, a convicted sex offender, in a recreation cage with a fellow inmate, a violent gang member, and left the recreation area unsupervised, during which time the gang member attacked the inmate. According to the court, the officer was not aware that the inmate was a sex offender or that he was required to check prison databases in which that information was contained, there were no orders issued requiring that the inmate and gang member be separated from each other, and the officer's dereliction of duty in leaving the recreation area did not constitute anything other than negligence. Finn v. Warren County, Kentucky, 768 F.3d 441 (6th Cir. 2014). The administrator of an inmate's estate and the guardian of the inmate's minor children brought a § 1983 action against a county, a jail's health care provider, and various jail employees, alleging violation of the inmate's Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment rights to receive adequate medical care while incarcerated. The district court granted summary judgment to some parties, and a jury returned verdicts for the remaining defendants on the remaining claims. The plaintiffs appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded in part and affirmed in part. The court held that a supervisory jailer was not entitled to qualified immunity for his ministerial acts of training deputy jailers to follow a written emergency medical services (EMS) policy and to enforce that policy as written. When the inmate's condition worsened, cellmates threw objects at a speaker in the top of the cell to activate the intercom to get the guards' attention. The cellmates reported to the guards ten to fifteen times that something was wrong with the inmate and that he needed to be taken to the hospital. According to the inmates, the guards ignored their pleas for help and turned off the television in their housing unit. A senior supervisor's incident report alleged that he checked on the inmate several times, while the jail's observation log showed that he checked on the inmate only twice: at 5:27 a.m. and at 6:28 a.m. Later the inmate died in the cell, and although he was found dead in his cell, a deputy entered on the observation log "appears to be okay." Gethers v. Harrison, 27 F.Supp.3d 644 (E.D.N.C. 2014). A female employee of a county detention center brought Title VII gender discrimination and retaliation claims against her employer after she was terminated for allegedly being untruthful regarding a situation in which she was present while a male detainee on suicide watch used the shower. The county moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion, finding that the employee failed to demonstrate that she was meeting job expectations or that she was engaged in a protected activity. The employee had been demoted for violating a detention center policy by being present while a male detainee on suicide watch showered naked despite the presence of two male officers, and for extracting the detainee from his cell by herself, creating a risk of danger. The court noted that the male detention officers who assisted male detainees on a suicide watch to shower were not similarly situated to the female detention officer who was also present, under the detention center's policy prohibiting officers of the opposite sex from being present while a detainee showered; the court noted that the proper comparison would be a male officer remaining in a shower area while a female prisoner showered, and there was no indication that such male officer would not also be punished. Goodvine v. Ankarlo, 9 F.Supp.3d 899 (W.D.Wis. 2014). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against Wisconsin Department of Corrections (WDOC) officials and psychologists, as well as an admissions officer at a mental health facility operated by the Wisconsin Department of Health Services (DHS), alleging that the defendants failed to prevent him from engaging in acts of self-harm, in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The court held that: (1) the psychologists were not deliberately indifferent to the inmate's need for protection against self-harm; (2) officers who interacted with the inmate during meal-tray pickup were not deliberately indifferent to his need for protection against self-harm; (3) a psychologist was not deliberately indifferent in failing to alert security staff after the inmate advised him that he was having "cutting urges;" and, (4) an admissions coordinator was not deliberately indifferent to the inmate's need for adequate mental health care. The court also held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the sergeant who failed to contact the prison's psychological services unit (PSU) after the inmate told the officer that he was "feeling unsafe" and needed to go to an observation area for additional monitoring "immediately" was aware that the inmate presented a serious risk of self-harm, but failed to take reasonable measures to protect him. Fact issues precluding summary judgment were also found by the court as to whether correctional officers who escorted mentally ill inmates to appointments with psychological services unit (PSU) and medical staff were deliberately indifferent to the mentally-ill inmate's need for protection against self-harm when they failed to summon PSU staff or a supervisory official after the inmate, who had a history of cutting himself with sharp objects, expressed thoughts of self-harm. Grenning v. Miller-Stout, 739 F.3d 1235 (9th Cir. 2014). A state prisoner brought an action against prison officials, claiming that exposing him to constant lighting for 13 days violated the Eighth Amendment's bar against cruel and unusual punishment. The district court granted summary judgment for the officials and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The court found that summary judgment was precluded by factual issues as to: (1) the brightness of the continuous lighting in the prisoner's special management unit cell; (2) the effect on the prisoner of the continuous lighting; and (3) whether prison officials were deliberately indifferent. The inmate was housed in the Special Management Unit (SMU), an administrative segregation unit with single-cells that are continuously illuminated for twenty-four hours a day. Each cell in the SMU has three, four-foot-long fluorescent lighting tubes in a mounted light fixture. A cell occupant can use a switch inside the cell to turn off two of the tubes, but the center tube is always on. The tube is covered by a blue light-diffusing sleeve. Institution policy requires welfare checks in the SMU to be conducted every thirty minutes, which is more frequent than checks for the general prison population. Officials asserted that continuous illumination allows officers to "assess the baseline behavior of offenders to ensure they are not at risk of harming themselves or making an attempt to harm staff, cause property damage or incite problem behavior from other offenders." The officials stated that turning the cell lights on and off every thirty minutes would be disruptive to the cell occupants. The prisoner alleged that the light was so bright he could not sleep, even with "four layers of towel wrapped around his eyes." He alleged that the lighting gave him "recurring migraine headaches" and that he could not distinguish between night and day in the cell. (Airway Heights Corrections Center, Washington)

The district court granted summary judgment to the prison officials and denied the prisoner's motion to proceed in forma pauperis. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that: (1) past incidents of inmate-on-inmate violence involving weapons did not constitute a substantial risk of serious harm; (2) the prison's policies for monitoring a back hallway in which the prisoner was attacked did not create a substantial risk of serious harm; (3) lack of oversight of the prison's hobby craft shop did not create a substantial risk of serious harm; and (4) prison officials were not deliberately indifferent with respect to oversight of the hobby shop. Hernandez v. County of Monterey, 70 F.Supp.3d 963 (N.D.Cal. 2014). Current and recently released inmates from a county jail brought an action against the county, the sheriff's office, and the private company that administered all jail health care facilities and services, alleging, on behalf of a class of inmates, that substandard conditions at the jail violated the federal and state constitutions, the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), the Rehabilitation Act, and a California statute prohibiting discrimination in state-funded programs. The inmates sought declaratory and injunctive relief. The defendants filed motions to dismiss. The district court denied the motions. The court held that both current and recently released inmates had standing to pursue their claims against the county and others for allegedly substandard conditions at the jail, even though the recently released inmates were no longer subject to the conditions they challenged. The court noted that the short average length of stay of inmates in the proposed class, which was largely made up of pretrial detainees, was approximately 34 days, and that short period, coupled with the plodding speed of legal action and the fact that other persons similarly situated would continue to be subject to the challenged conduct, qualified the plaintiffs for the "inherently transitory" exception to the mootness doctrine. The court found that the inmates sufficiently alleged that the private company that administered all jail health care facilities and services operated a place of public accommodation, as required to state a claim for violation of ADA Title III. The court noted that: "The complaint alleges a litany of substandard conditions at the jail, including: violence due to understaffing, overcrowding, inadequate training, policies, procedures, facilities, and prisoner classification; inadequate medical and mental health care screening, attention, distribution, and resources; and lack of policies and practices for identifying, tracking, responding, communicating, and providing accessibility for accommodations for prisoners with disabilities." The government moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion and the inmate appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the prison intake psychologist failed to comply with mandatory regulations by not examining all of the inmate's medical records before releasing the inmate into the general prison population, and whether prison guards violated post orders by failing to attentively monitor their assigned areas of the prison yard. The trustee for a state inmate's heirs and next of kin filed a § 1983 action alleging that officials at a county adult detention center deliberately disregarded the inmate's medical needs. The district court entered summary judgment in the defendants' favor, and the trustee appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that a deputy at the county adult detention center did not deliberately disregard the inmate's serious medical needs, in violation of the Eighth Amendment, even though another inmate had told jail guards to check on him, and the deputy failed to prevent the inmate's death from a methadone overdose. The court noted that there was no evidence that the deputy was aware of the other inmate's statement, and the deputy checked on the inmate every half hour, observed the inmate asleep in his cell instead of engaged in the morning routine at the center, and did not observe anything unusual. The detainee alleged that the defendants used excessive force in response to him covering the lens of the video camera in his jail cell. In the first incident, the detained alleged that his arms were twisted, he was pinned against the wall, and he was choked. In the second incident, the detainee alleged that a taser was used to gain his compliance in transferring him to a separate cell. Following a jury trial, the district court entered judgment for the defendants and denied the detainee's motions for new trial. The detainee appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded, finding that the court's errors in failing to conceal the detainee's shackles from jury, and in requiring the detainee to wear prison clothing while the defendants were allowed to wear uniforms were not harmless. According to the court there was no indication that concealment of the restraints would have been infeasible, and visible shackling of the detainee had a prejudicial effect on the jury. The court noted that there would have been no reason for the jury to know that the plaintiff was a prisoner, and being told that the plaintiff was a prisoner and the defendants were guards made a different impression than seeing the plaintiff in a prison uniform and the defendants in guard uniforms. A federal prisoner brought an action against the United States under the Federal Tort Claims Act (FTCA), alleging the Bureau of Prisons (BOP) breached its duty of care, resulting in his assault and injury by another prisoner. The district court held that: (1) the prisoner's administrative claim satisfied FTCA's notice requirements; (2) the BOP breached its duty of care to the prisoner by placing him in a recreation cage with a prisoner with whom he was in "keep-away" status; and (3) the prisoner was entitled to damages under FTCA in the amount of $105,000. Nagle v. Gusman, 61 F.Supp.3d 609 (E.D.La. 2014). Siblings of a mentally ill pretrial detainee who committed suicide brought an action against numerous employees of a parish sheriff's office, alleging a due process violation under § 1983, and asserting claims for wrongful death and negligence under state law. The siblings moved for partial summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The court held that: (1) a deputy had a duty to take reasonable measures to protect the detainee from self-inflicted harm; (2) the deputy breached his duty by failing to observe the detainee for long periods of time; (3) the deputy's abandonment of his post was the cause of the detainee's suicide; (4) the sheriff was vicariously liable; and (5) the deputy's repeated decision to abandon his post violated the detainee's due process right to adequate protection from his known suicidal impulses. According to the court, the detainee was suffering from psychosis and was suicidal while in custody, the detainee was placed on a suicide watch, suicide watch policies and training materials of the sheriff's office explicitly required officers to continuously monitor detainees on a suicide watch and to document that they had done so, and it was during one of the deputy's extended absences that the detainee succeeded in killing himself. The officer left his post at least three times during his suicide watch shift, to help another employee distribute meals to other inmates, to take a restroom break, and to visit the nurses' station. During these absences, the detainee went unobserved for an hour and a half, fifteen minutes, and two hours respectively. No other staff took the officer's place observing the detainee during the times when the officer abandoned his post. During the officer's final absence, an inmate notified an on-duty officer that the detainee was lying on the floor of his cell, unresponsive. Poore v. Glanz, 46 F.Supp.3d 1191 (N.D.Okla. 2014). A juvenile female held as an inmate in the medical unit of a county jail brought an action against the county and the county sheriff in his individual capacity under § 1983 alleging deliberate indifference to her health in violation of the Eighth Amendment prohibition of cruel and unusual punishment, based on an alleged failure to prevent a detention officer's repeated sexual assaults. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court denied the motion. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine disputes of material fact as to whether the county sheriff was aware of the risk of sexual assault by detention officers as to female inmates housed in the medical unit of the county jail, and whether he failed to take steps to alleviate that risk. The court also found a genuine dispute of material fact as to whether the county jail had a policy and practice of housing juvenile female inmates in a wing of the medical unit which was not under direct supervision and was frequently single-staffed, such that it placed those inmates at a substantial risk of sexual assault by jail staff. Rogge v. City of Richmond, Tex., 995 F.Supp.2d 657 (S.D.Tex. 2014). The parents of an arrestee who committed suicide while in police custody brought a § 1983 and state law action in state court against the city and two police officers. The defendants removed the action to federal court and moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The court held that the arresting police officer was unaware of the arrestee's risk of self harm. The arrestee committed suicide in a police station holding cell, and thus, by not checking on the arrestee for several hours, the officer did not act with deliberate indifference to the arrestee's obvious need for protection from self harm, so as to violate his due process rights. The court noted that the arrestee was calm and that he cooperated with the officer during their interaction, and although he said he was terminated from his job, admitted drinking, and said he was on medication for anxiety, he did not express an interest in hurting himself or appear distraught. The message that the officer received from the arrestee's father did not raise suspicion of a risk of suicide, and the officer believed that all dangerous personal items had been taken from the arrestee and that the dispatch officer would monitor him via a video feed. The court found that the police dispatch officer who was monitoring the video feed from the police station holding cell was unaware of the arrestee's risk of self harm, and thus, the officer did not act with deliberate indifference to the arrestee's obvious need for protection from self harm, so as to violate his due process rights. The arrestee slept on bench in the cell for most of the two and a half hours he was in the cell before hanging himself, and the officer did not observe on the video monitor any behavior on the arrestee's part that suggested he was a suicide risk. The officer observed that the arrestee did not have items of personal property considered to be suicide implements, and although the arrestee's father came to the station and told the officer that he and his wife were worried, he did not indicate the arrestee might be suicidal. An inmate at a county jail brought a § 1983 action against a first correction officer, a second correction officer, and a county, asserting excessive force in violation of the Eighth Amendment, malicious prosecution, and denying or interfering with the inmate's religious rights. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court denied the motion. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine dispute of material fact as to whether the force a correction officer at the county jail used in grabbing and squeezing the inmate's testicles was applied maliciously or sadistically to cause harm, in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The court also found fact issues as to whether the correction officer's conduct, including throwing the inmate to the floor, was objectively malicious and sadistic. According to the court, fact issues existed as to whether the county had a custom and practice of using excessive force or failed to adequately train or supervise correction officers in the use of force, precluding summary judgment on the inmate's § 1983 claim against the county. Taylor v. Swift, 21 F.Supp.3d 237 (E.D.N.Y. 2014). A pro se prisoner brought a § 1983 action against city jail officials, alleging that officials failed to protect him from an assault from other inmates, and that officials used excessive force in uncuffing the prisoner after escorting him from showers to his cell. The officials moved to dismiss based on failure to exhaust administrative remedies, and the motion was converted to a motion for summary judgment. The district court denied the motion. The court held that it was objectively reasonable for the prisoner, to conclude that no administrative mechanism existed through which to obtain remedies for the alleged attack, and thus the prisoner was not required under the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA) to exhaust administrative remedies before bringing his claim. The court noted that the jail's grievance policy stated that "allegation of assault…by either staff or inmates" was non-grievable, the policy stated that an inmate complaint "is grievable unless it constitutes assault, harassment or criminal misconduct," the prisoner alleged that officials committed criminal misconduct in acting with deliberate indifference toward him, and although the prisoner did not complain of the assault by officials, the prisoner would not have been required to name a defendant in filing a grievance. According to the court, even if city jail officials would have accepted the prisoner's failure-to-protect grievance, the prisoner's mistake in failing to exhaust administrative procedures was subjectively reasonable. The prisoner claimed indifferent supervision of jail officers, when members of the Crips gang served him and other non-gang members "tiny food portions while serving gang members large food portions." The prisoner complained to officials and this resulted in the Crips gang members being admonished and chided. The day after this chiding, the prisoner alleged that he and two other non-Crips-affiliated inmates "were victims of gang assault where [plaintiff] & [another inmate] got cut & stabbed." According to the inmate, while the attack was occurring, a corrections officer allowed the Crips to act with impunity and waited 20 to 30 minutes to press an alarm, and another officer failed to open a door that would lead the prisoner to safety, and failed to use mace to break up the alleged gang assault. The court held that the prisoner's claims that the prison's business office miscalculated and deducted incorrect sums of money from his prison account when making partial filing fee payments, that there was poor television reception, and that he was not allowed to purchase canteen items from the commissary, were not actionable under § 1983, where all of the claims were administrative matters that should be handled by the prison. The court found that the prisoner's claims that he was being electronically monitored through a "microwave hearing effect eavesdropping device" and electronic control devices were fantastical and/or delusional and therefore were insufficient to withstand screening for frivolity in filings by an in forma pauperis prisoner, in the prisoner's § 1983 action. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The district court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to: (1) whether a deputy was aware of a substantial risk to the detainee's serious medical needs and disregarded that risk by failing to monitor the detainee more closely; (2) whether another deputy knew of and disregarded an excessive risk to the detainee's health when she failed to ascertain the circumstances of the detainee's prolonged unconsciousness, and when she falsely radioed another deputy falsely suggesting that the detainee had consciously refused breakfast; (3) whether a nurse recognized a serious risk to the detainee's health from ingesting street morphine pills and then failed to take reasonable precautionary steps to protect the detainee from that risk; (4) whether the sheriff's duties with respect to the county jail were causally connected to the alleged violations of the detainee's due process rights; (5) whether the county's policy and practice of indirect monitoring at the county jail was a moving force behind the alleged violation of the detainee's due process rights; and (6) whether the county's failure to implement policies at the county jail about how to monitor detainees with medical needs was the moving force behind the alleged violation of the due process rights of the detainee. Several juveniles, as representatives of other juveniles similarly situated, brought a § 1983 action asserting that the sheriff of a Florida county and the health care provider retained by the sheriff violated the juveniles' rights under the Fourteenth Amendment during the juveniles' detention at the county jail. The district court held that the plaintiffs failed to prove that either the sheriff or the health care provider was deliberately indifferent to any substantial risk of serious harm during the juveniles' detention, or that their policies or customs effected any other constitutional violation. According to the court, at most, the juveniles showed only that two persons, each of whom was qualified to testify as an expert, disfavored some of the sheriff's past or present managerial policies and practices and advocated the adoption of others they felt were superior for one reason or another. The court found that the juvenile detainees' challenges to particular conditions of confinement at the jail were mooted by changes, which included elimination of a "holding cage," elimination of the holding area for even temporary suicide watches, installation of cameras in each sleeping cell with monitors posted above each dorm, updating of the physical facility, relocation of the classrooms, a 48-hour review for juveniles in isolation, and installation of a radio frequency identification (RFID) system. Letterman v. Does, 789 F.3d 856 (8th Cir. 2015). Parents of a deceased prisoner, who died from injuries suffered while in jail, brought a § 1983 action against a prison sergeant, lieutenant, and case manager, alleging that the employees were indifferent to the prisoner's medical needs. The prisoner had been arrested for possession of marijuana and was given a 120 "shock sentence" in confinement. He became suicidal and was transferred to a padded cell at the request of mental health personnel. He was to have been personally observed every 15 minutes by staff and procedure required the prisoner to give a verbal response each time. After a shift chance, the oncoming officer decided to monitor the prisoner via closed circuit television rather than making the required in-person rounds. During the shift, the prisoner injured himself in the cell and eventually died from his injuries. The district court denied the employees' motion for summary judgment, based on assertions of qualified immunity. The employees appealed. The appeals court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether a prison sergeant, who was in charge of the unit where prisoner was kept, and a lieutenant, were deliberately indifferent to the risk of harm to the prisoner who died from injuries allegedly sustained in a padded cell. Shaidnagle v. Adams County, Miss., 88 F.Supp.3d 705 (S.D.Miss. 2015). After a detainee committed suicide while being held in a county jail, his mother, individually, on behalf of the detainee's wrongful death beneficiaries, and as administratrix of the detainee's estate, brought an action against the county, sheriff, jail staff, and others, asserting claims for deprivation of civil rights, equitable relief, and declaratory judgment. The defendants brought a § 1988 cross-claim for attorney fees and costs against the plaintiff, and subsequently moved for summary judgment. The court held that neither the sheriff nor another alleged policymaker could be held liable on a theory of supervisory liability for failure to train or supervise, where the mother did not show that the training jail staff received was inadequate, and the policy in place to determine whether the detainee was a suicide risk was not the "moving force" behind a constitutional violation. The court held that the correct legal standard was not whether jail officers "knew or should have known," but whether they had gained actual knowledge of the substantial risk of suicide and responded with deliberate indifference. The court held that neither party was entitled to attorney fees as the "prevailing party." (Adams County Jail, Mississippi)

Shepard v. Hansford County, 110 F.Supp.3d 696 (N.D. Tex. 2015). A husband brought an action against a county and a county jail employee under § 1983 alleging deliberate indifference to detainee health in violation of the right to provision of adequate medical treatment under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, following his wife's suicide while in the county jail. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that: (1) the jail employee was entitled to qualified immunity; (2) summary judgment was precluded by a fact issue as to whether the jail employee violated the detainee's rights, (3) the county had an adequate suicide risk prevention training policy, where employees were required to attend training to learn about suicide risk detection and prevention methods, and were required to read the county's policy on conducting face-to-face suicide checks with detainees; (4) the county adequately trained employees on cell entry; but (5) a fact issue existed as to whether the county had an unwritten policy of understaffing the jail, precluding summary judgment. The court noted that it was not clearly established at the time of the suicide that an employee was required to abandon other duties to ensure that suicide watch checks were completed, and it was not clearly established that the employee was prohibited from providing a detainee with a towel in a cell with "tie-off points," since the employee was not aware of any other suicides in that cell. U.S. v. Sanchez-Gomez, 798 F.3d 1204 (9th Cir. 2015). Defendants filed challenges to a federal district court policy, adopted upon the recommendation of the United States Marshals, to place defendants in full shackle restraints for all non-jury proceedings, with the exception of guilty pleas and sentencing hearings, unless a judge specifically requests the restraints be removed in a particular case. The district court denied the challenges. The defendants appealed. The appeals court vacated and remanded. The appeals court found that the defendants' challenges to the shackling policy were not rendered moot by the fact that they were no longer detained. The court held that there was no adequate justification of the necessity for the district court's generalized shackling policy. According to the court, although the Marshals recommended the policy after some security incidents, coupled with understaffing, created strains in the ability of the Marshals to provide adequate security for a newly opened, state-of-the-art courthouse, the government did not point to the causes or magnitude of the asserted increased security risk, nor did it try to demonstrate that other less restrictive measures, such as increased staffing, would not suffice. Woodson v. City of Richmond, Virginia, 88 F.Supp.3d 551 (E.D.Va. 2015). A city jail inmate brought an action against city, sheriff, and deputies, alleging deliberate indifference to the inmate's medical needs during a severe heat wave. The sheriff moved for summary judgment. The district court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as: (1) whether the sheriff instituted a policy of confining inmates with medical issues to their cells during mealtime, denying the inmates access to air conditioning in the dining hall; (2) whether the sheriff's decisions to keep inmates confined would qualify as a policy; (3) whether the sheriff was subjectively aware that conditions at the jail posed a substantial risk of harm to inmates; (4) whether the sheriff was subjectively aware that his response to the risks posed to inmates by excessive heat was inadequate; (5) whether the sheriff's policy caused the inmate's injuries; (6) whether the sheriff's alleged failure to investigate two instances of heat-related deaths at the jail, was not persistent and widespread; and (7) whether the sheriff had at least a constructive knowledge of his deputies' alleged failure to perform required 30-minute security checks at a flagrant and widespread level. Belleau v. Wall, 811 F.3d 929 (7th Cir. 2016). A citizen, who had previously been convicted of second degree sexual assault of a child but was no longer under any form of court-ordered supervision, brought an action against Wisconsin state officials, alleging that a Wisconsin statute, requiring certain persons who had been convicted of serious child sex offenses to wear global positioning system (GPS) tracking devices for the rest of their lives, violated his rights under the Ex Post Facto Clause and the Fourth Amendment. The district court entered summary judgment in the citizen's favor. The appeals court reversed the decision. The court held that the statute did not violate the Fourth Amendment, where the loss of privacy from the requirement to wear the device-- that the Department of Corrections used device to map the wearer's whereabouts so that police would be alerted to the need to conduct an investigation if the wearer was present at a place where a sex crime was committed-- was very slight compared to the societal gain of deterring future offenses by making persons who were likely to commit offenses aware that they were being monitored. According to the court, the statute did not impose punishment, and thus did not violate the Ex Post Facto Clause. (Wisconsin Department of Corrections)

The following pages present summaries of court decisions which address this topic area. These summaries provide readers with highlights of each case, but are not intended to be a substitute for the review of the full case. The cases do not represent all court decisions which address this topic area, but rather offer a sampling of relevant holdings.

The decisions summarized below were current as of the date indicated on the title page of this edition of the Catalog. Prior to publication, the citation for each case was verified, and the case was researched in Shepard's Citations to determine if it had been altered upon appeal (reversed or modified). The Catalog is updated annually. An annual supplement provides replacement pages for cases in the prior edition which have changed, and adds new cases. Readers are encouraged to consult the Topic Index to identify related topics of interest. The text in the section entitled "How to Use The Catalog" at the beginning of the Catalog provides an overview which may also be helpful to some readers.

The case summaries which follow are organized by year, with the earliest case presented first. Within each year, cases are organized alphabetically by the name of the plaintiff. Owens v. Haas, 601 F.2d 1242 (2nd Cir. 1979), cert. denied, 444 U.S. 980 (1979). The county may be held liable for failing to properly train jail staff if that failure amounts to "gross negligence" or "deliberate indifference" to the inevitable consequences of a lack of training. In addition, there need not be a "pattern" of abuse for the county to be liable, but liability under Section 1983 can arise from a single incident if that incident is serious enough to indicate some level of "official acquiescence" (in this case, the incident was the beating of a prisoner who refused to leave his cell, by the defendant Officer Haas and other officers). If the plaintiff can show an official "custom or policy" stemming from or resulting in a conspiracy, and if the conspiracy implicates the county itself, then the county may be liable as a "person" under Title 42, Section 1985 (the conspiracy section of the Civil Rights Act).

Brandon v. Allen, 516 F.Supp. 1355 (1981). A Civil Rights Act suit was brought against a police officer and the Director of the Police Department seeking damages because of assault and battery committed on the plaintiffs by the officer. Default judgment was taken against the officer. The district court held that since the city police director should have known of officer's dangerous propensities the director was liable in his official capacity. For one to be held liable under Civil Rights Act of 1871 he must act under color of law and in doing so he must play an affirmative part in deprivation of the constitutional rights of another. Although the police officer was technically off duty at the time of the alleged assault and battery, he acted under "color of law" within the meaning of Civil Rights Act of 1871 because off-duty officers were authorized to be armed and were required to act if they observed commission of a crime. Since the city police director should have known of officer's dangerous propensities the director was liable in his official capacity for violation of plaintiffs' civil rights when they were attacked by the officer, in that the director failed to take proper action to become informed of the officer's dangerous propensities. The officer's reputation for maladaptive behavior was widespread among fellow officers and although at least one officer personally informed police precinct supervisors of the fellow officer's morbid tendencies, no investigation and action were undertaken. Police officers are vested by the law with great responsibility and must be held to high standards of official conduct. Officials of the police department must become informed of the presence in the department of officers who pose a threat of danger to the safety of the community. When knowledge of a particular officer's dangerous propensities is widespread among the ranks of police officers, the department officials ought to be held liable for the officer's infringement of another's civil rights. 42 U.S.C.A. Section 1983.

U.S. Supreme Court
TRAINING

Rhodes v. Chapman, 101 S.Ct. 2392 (1981). Level of staff training tied to Court's decision on double-celling. In a remarkable 8 to 1 decision, the Supreme Court upheld double celling at the Southern Ohio Correctional Facility at Lucasville. The maximum security facility was built in the early 1970's with gymnasiums, workshops, school rooms, day room, two chapels, a hospital ward, a commissary, a barber shop and a library. Outdoors, there is a recreation field, visitation area and library. The physical plant itself is a top flight first-class facility. Each cell is sixty-three square feet in area and contains a bed or bunk bed measuring thirty-six by eighty inches, a cabinet nightstand, a wall-mounted sink with hot and cold water, a flushable toilet and a built-in radio. One wall of each cell is barred. Day rooms are open from 6:30 a.m. until 9:30 p.m., and inmates may pass between these rooms and their cells for a ten minute period each hour. At the time of the trial, the facility housed 2,300 inmates, two-thirds of whom were serving life or long-term sentences. Some 1,400 men were double celled. Despite the favorable nature of the plant's design, the district court found that double celling constituted cruel and unusual punishment. The Supreme Court reversed, noting: "No static test can exist by which courts determine whether conditions of confinement are cruel and unusual, for the Eighth Amendment must draw its meaning from the evolving standards of decency that mark the progress of a maturing society." Applying those principles to this institution, the court found that the evidence did not support a conclusion that the eighth amendment was violated. The majority said:

> "The double celling made necessary by the unanticipated increase in prison population did not lead to deprivations of essential food, medical care or sanitation. Nor did it increase violence among inmates or create other conditions intolerable for prison confinement. Although job and educational opportunities diminished marginally as a result of double celling, limited work hours and delay before receiving education do not inflict pain, much less unnecessary and wanton pain. Deprivations of this kind simply are not punishment."

The Court continued, "We would have to wrench the eighth amendment from its language and history to hold that delay of these desirable aids to rehabilitation violates the Constitution." Three justices, Brennen, Blackmun and Stevens, authored a concurring opinion. It attempted to list some of the things which would determine whether a facility has such poor conditions as to violate the eighth amendment. Those conditions are:

-Physical plant conditions: lighting, heat, plumbing, ventilation, living space, noise levels, and recreation space.
-Sanitation: control of vermin and insects, food preparation, medical facilities, lavatories and showers, clean places for eating, sleeping and working.
-Safety: protection from violent, deranged or diseased inmates, fire protection and emergency evacuation.
-Staffing: trained and adequate guards and other staff, and avoidance of placing inmates in positions of authority over other inmates.

This majority of justices cautioned that sixty-three square feet of cell space is not enough for two men. Such conditions, they noted, are a clear signal to legislative officials that additional facilities must be constructed or inmate populations reduced by other means. The justices did state, however, that cramped facilities are not unconstitutional per se.

NOTE: This decision dealt with long-term convicted inmates, not short-term persons in county and city jails. In some circumstances, pretrial detainees who are still presumed innocent until convicted have greater rights, such as access to lawyers and courts. On the other hand, because of the short periods of confinement, a jail facility does not need as elaborate areas for recreation, libraries, exercise and other services, as required for the longer term population of prisons. Overbay v. Lilliman, 572 F.Supp. 174 (W.D. Mo. 1983). Sheriff and County could be liable for failure to train and supervise deputy. A prisoner was allowed to amend his complaint in federal district court, adding the county sheriff as a defendant. The original complaint alleged that a deputy sheriff had violated his civil rights and assaulted him. Later, the plaintiff asked to add the county sheriff as a defendant, alleging that the sheriff knew of the past violent behavior of the deputy and failed to train and supervise the deputy properly. The district court granted the plaintiff's motion, citing several circuit court decisions which allow sheriffs to be held liable because they are responsible for setting policy. Tuttle v. City of Oklahoma City, 728 F.2d 456 (10th Cir. 1984), reh'g denied, 106 S.Ct. 16 (1983). Reversed by City of Oklahoma City v. Tuttle, 105 S.Ct. 2427 (1985). Proof of single instance of unconstitutional activity not sufficient to impose liability under Monell rule unless....

The widow of a man shot by a police officer brought a civil rights suit against the officer and his employer city. The federal district court held against the city but absolved the officer. On appeal (728 F.2d 456) the Court of Appeals for the Tenth Circuit affirmed the lower court decision.

On appeal to the United States Supreme Court, the majority reversed the lower courts' decisions, holding that it was a reversible error to allow the jury to infer a thoroughly nebulous "policy" of "inadequate training" on the city's part from the single shooting incident in question and at the same time sanction the inference that the policy was the cause of the incident, thereby giving rise to liability under the Civil Rights Act of 1861.

To impose a civil rights liability on the city under Monell v. New York City Department of Social Services, 436 U.S. 658, for a single incident, the plaintiff must prove that the incident was caused by an existing unconstitutional municipal policy which can be attributed to a municipal policymaker. The existence of the unconstitutional policy and its origin must be separately proved and where the policy relied on is not itself unconstitutional, considerably more proof than the single incident is necessary in every case to establish both the requisite fault on the part of the municipality and the causal connection between the "policy" and the constitutional deprivation.

The court also held that there must be an affirmative link between the training and adequacies alleged in the particular constitutional violation at issue. The court found that the fact that a municipal "policy" might lead to police misconduct is hardly sufficient to satisfy the Monell requirement for municipal liability under 42 U.S.C. Section 1983. City of Shepherdsville, Kentucky v. Rymer, 105 S.Ct. 3518 (6th Cir. 1985) (Memorandum Decision). Supreme court remands case for further consideration in light of Oklahoma city ruling. Ruling on Rymer v. Davis, 754 F.2d 198 (1984). City police were found by the federal district court to have used excessive force during the arrest of the plaintiff. The court of appeals upheld the finding of the lower court, including award of $32,000 compensatory damages against the police officer, $50,000 punitive damages against the city and $25,000 compensatory damages against the city.

The appeals court ruled that the city's failure to train police officers regarding arrest procedures was a proper basis for liability in a civil rights action arising from injuries sustained by the arrestee, and that official acquiescence in police misconduct may be inferred from lack of training even in the face of only one incident of brutal misconduct.

The Supreme Court vacated the appeals court decision, remanding it for further consideration in light of its decision in City of Oklahoma City v. Tuttle, 105 S.Ct. 2427 (1985). In that decision, the court ruled that proof of a single instance of unconstitutional activity is not sufficient to impose civil rights liability on a city under the Monell rule unless proof of the incident includes proof that it was caused by an existing unconstitutional municipal policy, which can be attributed to a municipal policymaker. Marchese v. Lucas, 758 F.2d 181 (6th Cir. 1985), cert. denied, 107 S.Ct. 1369. Court upholds $125,000 award for failure to train and discipline officers; sheriff and county held liable. The plaintiff alleged that he was beaten upon entering the detention area following his arrest, and that a deputy later opened his cell door, allowing another beating to be administered. A federal jury believed his story, awarding $125,000 to the plaintiff. Under the Michigan constitution, the sheriff is the law enforcement arm of the county and makes policy in police matters for the county. The court held that the government entity is responsible when the execution of a government's policy (in this case, brutality), inflicts an injury.

The plaintiff alleged that the county and the sheriff failed to train and discipline the officers and failed to order an investigation of the incident after it came to the attention of county officials. The sheriff claimed that he knew nothing of the incident until years later, just before the trial. The court ruled that even though the sheriff did not know of the incident, he should have known and found him jointly liable with the county.

The county shared liability with the sheriff because of its close relationship with the sheriff, who was an elected official and made policy for the county. The county board of supervisors appropriated funds and established the budget for the sheriff's department. (Wayne County Jail, Michigan)

U.S. Appeals Court
TRAINING

Alberti v. Klevenhagen, 790 F.2d 1220 (5th Cir. 1986). Appeals court upholds remedial measures of district court, finding levels of violence and sexual assault violated inmates' eighth amendment rights and ordering increased staffing. In a case initiated in 1972, the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit agreed with the sweeping corrective measures ordered by a federal district court. The original class action suit was brought under 42 U.S.C. Section 1983, alleging that the facilities and operations of the Harris County detention system violated inmate constitutional and statutory rights. In February, 1975, a consent judgment was entered in the district court, calling for upgrading of existing facilities, construction of a new central jail, and committing the county to provide sufficient and adequately trained guards and other staff to assure the security of inmates.

In December, 1975, the county's compliance with the consent judgment was challenged. Following hearings, a broad remedial order was issued. The court ordered adequate training and pay increases for jail personnel and ordered that staffing be increased to provide one jailer for every twenty inmates. In 1978 the court reluctantly approved plans for a new central jail. The plaintiffs had argued against the planned use of multiple occupancy cells, and the court expressly conditioned occupancy of the new facility on the provision of adequate staff. In 1982 and 1983 the district court held hearings to determine if adequate staffing was provided for the newly-opened detention facility. The court ordered the county to prepare a plan which complied with Texas Commission on Jail Standards (TCJS) requirements of one officer to forty-five inmates, eventually approving such a plan. When the county failed to meet a June, 1983, deadline for full staffing, the plaintiffs filed a motion for contempt.

The county was granted TCJS approval in October for an alternative poststaffing plan, which provided less staff than the previous "one to forty-five" plan. After extensive hearings in 1984, and the presentation of evidence and testimony on violence in the facilities, the court ordered the implementation of a staffing plan which was similar to one proposed by the plaintiffs' experts, calling for approximately the same number of staff as the original "one to forty-five" plan, but incorporating a different assignment scheme.

On appeal, the county argued that the evidence presented in the 1984 hearings was not sufficient to support the district court finding of constitutional violations, and that the new staffing plan ordered by the court exceeded what should be required to remedy any such violations.

The appeals court affirmed all aspects of the district court corrective orders, stating that "....it is more regrettable that after thirteen years conditions in the jails are still in contravention of constitutional standards. Despite the efforts of the parties and the court, inmates continue to be beaten, raped, abused, and assaulted. The district court has acted properly in fashioning new relief for an old malady." Dizak v. State, 508 N.Y.S.2d 290 (A.D. 3 Dept. 1986). An inmate brought action against the state alleging that it was guilty of negligence in permitting a second inmate to have access to a pick axe used to attack the inmate. The court of claims entered judgment in favor of the state, and the inmate appealed. The Supreme Court held that the inmate attacked by a second inmate failed to establish that the state knew or should have known of the inmate's tendency toward violent behavior, or that the supervision provided was not sufficient.

The inmate failed to demonstrate that supervision by a guard who continuously patrolled the work area checking on each member was insufficient, despite evidence that the attacking inmate had been the subject of eleven or twelve misbehavior reports, all but two of which concerned minor nonviolent violations.

The correction officer who had made an earlier misbehavior report on the inmate who attacked the second inmate did not have training or education to qualify him as an expert to render his opinion that the inmate could cause a major incident on the floor at any time, and that the inmate had almost caused two incidents, so that portion of the report containing such a statement was clearly inadmissible. Malley v. Briggs, 106 S.Ct. 1092 (1986). A police officer is not entitled to absolute immunity from a civil rights claim based on an allegedly false arrest even when he makes the arrest pursuant to a warrant which he has sought out. As a matter of public policy, qualified immunity provides ample protection to all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law. If a reasonably well trained officer in the position of the officer in question would have known that his affidavit failed to establish probable cause for the arrest or that he should not have applied for the warrant, then his application for the warrant was not objectively reasonable because it created the unnecessary danger of an unlawful arrest. State Correctional Inst. v. Nelson, 503 A.2d 116 (Pa. Cmwlth. 1986). Prison officials were not at fault for a female trainee's lack of notice that she had only two chances to pass a handgun test. Her voluntary absence from class on the day the instructor orally informed trainees of the qualifications was the reason she did not receive the information, ruled the Commonwealth Court of Pennsylvania. The applicant underwent probationary training for one month, completing all training requirements except the handgun qualifying test, which she failed to pass. The test was introduced just prior to her employment. About a month after failing the first test, she took another test, which she again failed. She was the only member of her class who failed the two tests. The court upheld her dismissal, finding no discrimination in that oral notice was given at class, and that she missed hearing about the qualifications due to her absence. Walker v. Rowe, 791 F.2d 507 (7th Cir. 1986), U.S. cert. denied in 107 S.Ct. 597. Appeals court rules that due process clause does not assure safe working conditions for public employees and reverses lower court awards. On July 22, 1978, inmates of the Pontiac Correctional Center, a maximum security prison, were being returned to their cells after exercise in the courtyard. The prisoners killed three guards, injured others, and set fire to part of the prison. Three of the injured guards and the estates of the three deceased guards filed suit against the director of the Illinois Department of Corrections, and the assistant warden of Operations at Pontiac, alleging that they deprived them of their constitutional right to a safe working environment.

A federal district court jury returned verdicts against the defendants totalling $706,845, and the district court added $145,792 in attorney's fees and costs. These recoveries were in addition to workers' compensation awards ($250,000 death benefits and burial expenses for each of the three deceased guards) and other benefits afforded by state law.

The United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit ruled: "Because we conclude that the constitution is not a code of occupational safety, we reverse the judgment." The court explained that "due process" does not mean "due care"- the constitution is designed to protect people from the state, not to ensure that the state provide safety or comfort. A special relationship must exist before the state can be held liable for harm to a person. If the state had forced the men to be officers at the correctional center, it would be required not to be indifferent to their working conditions. But the guards enlisted voluntarily and were free to quit at any time.

According to the court, "...the state must protect those it throws into the snake pits, but the state need not guarantee that volunteer snake charmers will not be bitten."

The plaintiffs had argued that the corrections officials had control of several conditions which contributed to the attacks, including: failure to maintain metal detectors in operating condition; failure to conduct enough shakedowns of inmate cells to find weapons; failure to "lock down" the prison although the officials knew or should have known that it was tense; failure to immediately issue shotguns to the tactical squad and order it to quell the disturbance. Although the court noted that the defendants had some level of control over these issues, their actions did not amount to constitutional violations. Additional allegations which the court concluded were not directly within the control of the defendants included: design of the prison which created "dead spots" from guard towers; high staff turnover, vacancies and lack of sufficient staff; overcrowded conditions in the facility; the existence of prisoner gangs; the new phone system which had defects and was hard to use; the door and cage in the North Cell House were old and flimsy; and guards did not receive enough training in controlling the riots, and training which was provided was poor. Brassfield v. County of Cook, 701 F.Supp. 679 (N.D. Ill. 1988). A prisoner filed a civil rights action against the county, former county department of corrections' executive director, the executive director's immediate subordinate, unnamed supervisor of guards at the county jail, and a guard, alleging the failure to provide the prisoner with prompt and effective medical care after he suffered a severe beating at the hands of fellow inmates. In a sua sponte opinion, the district court found that the responsibility for the county jail was vested in the sheriff, not the county, and the potential respondeat superior liability on the county for the jail officials' actions did not extend to civil rights actions. The court also found a complaint alleging that the sheriff, executive director, executive director's immediate subordinate, and the guard supervisor failed to train and supervise jail personnel was insufficient to sustain a civil rights action against them. Francis v. Pike County, Ohio, 708 F.Supp. 170 (S.D. Ohio 1988). The administrator and personal representative of a deceased arrestee brought a Section 1983 action against the city, county, and their law enforcement officers for the failure to remove a belt of the deceased arrestee who then committed suicide while in a cell. The defendants moved for a summary judgment. The district court found that the police officers did not use excessive force in arresting the arrestee. It was also found that neither the city nor its police officers were liable for the arrestee's suicide while in the county jail following the arrest assisted by the city officer. Since the arrestee was not in their custody or control at the time of the suicide, the county deputies' failure to remove the drunk driving arrestee's belt before placing him in a holding cell, without knowledge or reason to know that the arrestee would commit suicide, did not impose a civil rights liability on them after the arrestee committed suicide. The lack of allegations or evidence that the county was grossly negligent in training its law enforcement officers precluded its liability. (Pike County Jail, Ohio)

Freedman v. City of Allentown, Pa., 853 F.2d 1111 (3rd Cir. 1988). The parent of an inmate who committed suicide while detained in jail brought an Section 1983 action against the city, chief of police, individual police officers, and a state probation officer. The U.S. District Court dismissed the complaint and appeal was taken. The appeals court, affirming the lower court decision, found that the failure of jail officials to recognize scars on the inmate's wrists, inside of his elbows and neck as suicide hesitation cuts amounted only to negligence and would not support a Section 1983 claim. The civil rights claimant failed to establish that the city deliberately elected not to fund or carry out the training of police officers in the handling of mentally disturbed persons. The state probation officer's action in failing to caution detaining officers about the jail inmate's prior suicide attempt and suicidal tendencies was at most negligent and did not rise to a level of reckless indifference of the inmate's rights as to support the Section 1983 action. The parent of the prisoner failed to establish that the city and supervisory officials did not have a procedure, system, or equipment whereby prison officials could maintain visual surveillance or otherwise monitor prisoners with known suicidal tendencies for the purpose of maintaining a Section 1983 action, especially in light of the fact that the complainant referred to the existence of a booking cell in the detective bureau where prisoners could be watched closely. Vega v. Parsley, 700 F.Supp. 879 (W.D. Tex. 1988). Parents of a juvenile who committed suicide while in a juvenile detention facility brought a civil rights action against the county, the sheriff, and the director of the facility. On the defendants' motion for summary judgment, the district court found that there was no eighth amendment violation with respect to conditions in the facility, including the presence of a shower curtain rod on which the juvenile hung himself. No constitutional violation was shown on the theory that the juvenile was denied treatment. No claim was stated on the theory of failure to staff, train and supervise the facility.

The plaintiffs failed to state a claim of violation of the eighth and fourteenth amendments in the alleged failure of the county, as a matter of official policy, to staff, train and supervise the facility, where the plaintiffs failed to allege or establish what specific areas of training were inadequate or to establish any other specific incident where the prisoner or child committed or attempted to commit suicide, or that any policy or custom of the detention facility caused or contributed to any suicide. Brock v. Warren County, Tenn., 713 F.Supp. 238 (E.D. Tenn. 1989). An action was taken under a federal civil rights statute and the Tennessee wrongful death statute by the children of a prisoner who died from heat prostration. The district court found that the conditions in the cell where the prisoner was housed, including virtually nonexistent ventilation and extremely high temperature and humidity, were cruel and inhumane. The court also found that the failure of the county commissioners and the sheriff to provide even minimal medical training to jail guards or to provide the prisoner who died from heat prostration with adequate medical care, which might have been simply moving the prisoner, a nondangerous 62-year-old man, to a cooler cell, constituted deliberate indifference to the prisoner's medical needs and were proximate causes of the inmate's death. The court awarded the prisoner's children $100,000 in compensatory damages against the county and the sheriff. (Warren County Jail, Tennessee)

Danese v. Asman, 875 F.2d 1239 (6th Cir. 1989), cert. denied, 110 S.Ct. 1473. A pretrial detainee's family and estate brought a civil rights action against police officers, police supervisors, and the city after the detainee committed suicide. The U.S. District Court found that the defendants were not entitled to qualified immunity. Interlocutory appeal was taken. The Appeals Court reversed the lower court's decision and found that the police officers and supervisors enjoyed qualified immunity from liability. The law which existed at the time of the police officers' action did not clearly establish the right to have the officers diagnose the pretrial detainee's condition as prone to suicide and to take extraordinary measures to restrain the pretrial detainee; therefore, the police officers had qualified immunity from liability. The police officers were not subject to a clearly established constitutional duty to diagnose the pretrial detainee's condition as prone to suicide; and given that, the supervisors could not be held liable. Davis v. City of Ellensburg, 869 F.2d 1230 (9th Cir. 1989). A civil rights action was brought against the city and police officers for injuries suffered by an arrestee who died. The U.S. District Court granted a summary judgment for the city, and the plaintiffs appealed. The appeals court found that the city was not liable on the theory it had a policy of inadequate training of officers, inadequate medical treatment of prisoners, or a deliberate indifference to the use of excessive force. The city's failure to have written policy regarding the proper use of force in a misdemeanor arrest did not amount to delegation of policymaking authority to rank and file police officers so as to render the city liable in a civil rights action for injuries suffered by an arrestee by transforming the individual police officers into municipal policymakers whose decisions in individual cases might give rise to a municipal liability. The court also found that the city was not liable on the theory it had a policy or custom of inadequately supervising its police officers. According to the court, the plaintiff cannot prove the existence of a municipal policy or custom for purposes of a civil rights action under Section 1983 based solely on the occurrence of a single incident of unconstitutional action by a nonpolicymaking employee.

The city was not liable for injuries suffered by the arrestee who died on the theory the city had a policy or custom of inadequately supervising its police officers; the chief sent an officer with an alleged alcohol problem and an officer with an alleged mental disorder to the police psychologist for an evaluation. The chief allowed the officers to remain on active duty only after receiving written reports that both were competent to perform their duties, and the chief received informal reports that the officer with an alleged alcohol problem was no longer drinking, so the evidence did not establish that the chief acted with deliberate indifference in failing to remove the officers from active duty. Dorman v. District of Columbia, 888 F.2d 159 (D.C. Cir. 1989). The representatives of a detainee's estate brought a Section 1983 action against a municipality to recover for the suicide of the detainee in a cell. The U.S. District Court denied the municipality's motion for judgment notwithstanding a verdict and the municipality appealed. The court of appeals, reversing and remanding the lower court's decision, found that the municipality was not liable. According to the court, the training of police officers on suicide prevention did not rise to the level of a conscious choice by the municipality or the policy of deliberate indifference to the eighth amendment rights of the detainee who committed suicide in his cell and, therefore, did not permit the imposition of a Section 1983 liability upon the municipality, even though the police officers did not receive a specific course on suicide prevention. The officers were trained to recognize abnormal behavior, could not accept arrestees who showed signs of mental illness or abnormal behavior, and utilized "WALES" computer system with information about previous arrests and suicide attempts. The detainee's suicide was the first in the cell block in the memories of the sergeant and the inspector who had been assigned there for eight years. The alleged deficiencies in the training of police officers on suicide prevention did not cause the suicide of the young male detainee in his cell. The mere fact that the detainee was somewhat docile at the time of the arrest and closed his eyes at the police station during lulls in the processing was insufficient to give the officers notice that he might be suicidal. The court found that the case presented was insufficient to be submitted to a jury and the verdict for the plaintiff was therefore reversed. Erwin v. County of Manitowoc, 872 F.2d 1292 (7th Cir. 1989). The plaintiffs sued the defendants under 42 U.S.C.A. Section 1983 for civil rights violations and for damages resulting from a police search of a private residence. The individuals whose residence had been searched brought a civil rights action against deputies who conducted the search and against the county. The jury awarded the plaintiffs compensatory and punitive damages amounting to $85,000, and the defendants moved for a new trial or judgment notwithstanding the verdict. The U.S. District Court granted judgment n.o.v. vacating most of the damage award, and appeal and cross appeal were taken. The appeals court, remanding the decision, found that although it was clear that the jury concluded liability properly attached to some defendants, confusing jury form and conflicting answers did not sufficiently disclose the jury's intent, and thus, a new trial was warranted. The U.S. Appeals Court has found that a county cannot be held liable for a failure to train unless this failure represents a deliberate or conscious choice by the county. The court noted that if it was obvious from the duties assigned to specific officers that enhanced training was so necessary that any inadequacy of training would likely result in the violation of constitutional rights, then a county's failure to provide such training would amount to deliberate indifference. But a particular officer's unsatisfactory training cannot alone suffice to attach liability to the county, said the court. "An officer's faults may result from factors other than the deficient training program," according to the court. Nor can an injured party prevail merely by proving that an accident or injury could have been avoided had an officer received enhanced training. Even adequately trained officers sometimes err, and such error says little about their training program or the legal basis for liability, the court noted. (Manitowoc County Sheriff's Department)

Feigley v. Fulcomer, 720 F.Supp. 475 (M.D. Pa. 1989). An inmate brought action against prison officials, alleging officials were violating his eighth amendment rights by not protecting him adequately from contracting Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome (AIDS). On the prison officials' motion for summary judgment, the district court found that the officials' practice of not testing inmates routinely for AIDS-causing virus at the time they were received or subsequently, and not testing other inmates for the virus upon request, did not violate the plaintiff inmate's eighth amendment rights. The court also found that the material issue of fact precluded a summary judgment as to whether the officials' refusal to test the inmate for the virus upon request involved unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain which is a violation of the eighth amendment. It allowed the inmate to continue with this claim that it constitutes such a punishment to fail to relieve the anxiety which might accompany an inmate's uncertainty as to whether he or she has a fatal disease. It was further found by the court that the absence of evidence that prison officials had knowledge and acquiesced in behavior by any of their subordinates who allegedly failed to prevent, or tacitly condoned and allowed, such conduct, precluded recovery by the inmate on the claim that officials failed adequately to prevent the spread of the virus in violation of his eighth amendment right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment. An inmate's father brought a Section 1983 action against a prison guard, administrator, and supervisors to recover for the shooting death of an escaping inmate. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion and found that using deadly force against a convicted, escaping inmate was not an unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain, did not violate the eighth amendment, and was within the guard's qualified immunity from Section 1983 liability. The guard tried to physically prevent the escape, and was prevented from doing so by the inmate's spear. He warned the inmate to desist, fired a warning shot, and fired the revolver after the inmate had jumped to the street outside the prison and started to run. The inmate's father failed to establish in the Section 1983 action that the training of guards and the use of firearms caused the death of the escaping inmate, that the policy on the use of deadly force deprived the inmate of constitutional rights, or that the administrator and supervisors were grossly negligent or deliberately indifferent. Burns v. City of Galveston, Tex., 905 F.2d 100 (5th Cir. 1990). The mother of a detainee who committed suicide while in jail sued the city under Section 1983. The U.S. District Court entered a judgment for the city and the mother appealed. The Court of Appeals found that the alleged noncompliance by police department officials with a city policy requiring that detainees in jail be checked visually at hourly intervals did not form a basis for a Section 1983 action following the suicide of a detainee where the suicide occurred within one hour of confinement and would not have been prevented by compliance with the requirement. It was also found by the Court that the city was not required to provide psychological screening which might have detected suicidal tendencies of the detainee. The civil rights of the detainee were not violated by the city's failure to train officers in psychological screening procedures and to utilize a sample medical psychological screening questionnaire found in the detainee treatment manual. The detainee did not have an absolute right to psychological screening. (Galveston City Jail, Texas)

Estate of Cartwright v. City of Concord, Cal., 856 F.2d 1437 (9th Cir. 1988). A mother of a pretrial detainee who committed suicide by hanging himself in a city jail brought a Section 1983 action against the city and city employees for alleged violation of constitutional rights. The United States District Court entered judgment for the defendants following a bench trial, and the mother appealed. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that the city jail employees did not violate the constitutional rights of the pretrial detainee in failing to prevent him from committing suicide. Although the jailers overheard him speaking of suicide, none of the detainee's other statements gave them reason to believe that he needed preventive care. The jailers took reasonable steps to safeguard him by taking away all his possessions except "soft clothing," and placed him in a cell with another detainee. He was also checked periodically. In addition, the city jailers did not violate the constitutional rights of the detainee or his surviving mother by allegedly failing to give him cardiopulmonary resuscitation during the five to seven minute interval between the time he was found hanging from his jail cell and the time the ambulance crew arrived. The actions of the jailers in cutting the detainee down, checking his vital signs and giving him aid, were not negligent or made in deliberate indifference to his distress. Finally, the city could not be held separately liable on the basis of its policies, customs and practices. The city's training program complied with relevant state laws and standards and there was no practice or pattern showing the city investigated jail deaths inadequately or destroyed evidence in a manner inconsistent with established policies. Popham v. City of Talladega, 908 F.2d 1561 (11th Cir. 1990). The administratrix of the estate of a deceased jail inmate brought a civil rights action against the city and jail officials. During the celebration of his wedding, Ronald Popham was arrested for public intoxication. In addition to being intoxicated, he was emotional, depressed, and angry at the time of his arrest. Popham's belt, shoes, socks, and pocket contents were removed by jail personnel who placed him in a holding cell and at 9:30 p.m., ordered the cell monitored. Monitoring was accomplished by closed circuit television located on another floor of the jail where the camera was operated by a radio dispatcher. Popham was last checked on physically when the shift ended at 11:00 p.m., after which there were no guards or jailers on duty. Sometime later, in a small space within the cell unviewed by the camera, Ronald Popham hanged himself from the bars by his blue jeans. He was discovered at 5:15 a.m. Christmas morning.

Mrs. Popham claimed several constitutional violations, in effect, that her husband had a right to be protected from committing suicide while incarcerated, that he was not properly monitored after being placed in a cell by himself, and that his jailers were not properly trained to identify prisoners who might show a tendency to suicide.

The U.S. District Court denied relief and the administratrix appealed. The appeals court affirmed the decision and found that evidence did not show a deliberate indifference by jailers to the inmate where they were unaware of any suicidal tendencies. Because jail suicides are analogous to the failure to provide medical care; deliberate indifference is the barometer by which suicide cases involving convicted prisoners as well as pretrial detainees are tested. The deliberate indifference standard applicable to civil rights actions arising out of jail suicides requires a strong likelihood, rather than a mere possibility, that the self-infliction of harm will occur, and deliberate indifference will not be found to exist in the face of only negligence. The failure to train jail personnel to screen detainees for suicidal tendencies did not provide a basis for imposing civil rights liability following the inmate's suicide. Standard procedures followed by the jail inmate's custodians prior to the inmate's suicide, which included the removal of shoelaces, belts, socks, and pocket contents, as well as closed circuit cell monitoring, demonstrated a lack of deliberate indifference to his safety, even though the closed circuit camera could not pick up every corner of his cell. Simmons v. City of Philadelphia, 728 F.Supp. 352 (E.D. Pa. 1990). A civil rights and negligence action was brought against the city and attending officer by the estate of an intoxicated detainee who committed suicide. On the defendants' motions for posttrial relief, following the jury verdict in favor of the estate, the district court denied the relief, finding that the evidence was sufficient to support a finding that the city violated the detainee's civil rights; the jury verdict was not inconsistent. The city waived its governmental immunity. It was also found that a postsuicide photograph of the detainee was admissible. The finding that the city was deliberately indifferent to serious medical needs of an intoxicated detainee, and thus liable under Section 1983 when the detainee committed suicide, was sufficiently supported by evidence that the detainee was at a high risk to commit suicide, that his suicide was foreseeable and preventable, that the attending officer had no training in suicide prevention, and that the police department had been informed of alternative arrangements it could have made which would have reduced the risk of the detainee's suicide. Walker v. Norris, 917 F.2d 1449 (6th Cir. 1990). The administratrix of an inmate's estate brought action against prison guards and the guards' supervisors after the guards allegedly failed to prevent the inmate's stabbing death. The U.S. District Court entered judgment in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendants appealed. The court of appeals found that the prison guards violated the inmate's Eighth Amendment rights and could be held liable in the civil rights action when they failed to prevent the inmate's stabbing by another inmate, where the guards had an opportunity to prevent the stabbing, but failed to do so, and instead looked on while the inmate was attacked. The failure of the prison guards' supervisors to instruct the guards with regard to operation of the unit doors and use of mace did not render the prison's training program "deliberately indifferent" to the rights of the inmates, precluding the supervisors from being held liable under a failure to train theory when the inmate was stabbed by another inmate after the guards failed to allow the inmate to escape through a unit door or restrain the other inmate. The claimant, however, failed to state a cause of action against the city for violation of a state civil rights law; the allegation of the city's failure to train officers did not involve "threats, intimidation or coercion" required to state a violation of state law. Elliott v. Cheshire County, N.H., 940 F.2d 7 (1st Cir. 1991). The father of a detainee who committed suicide while in a county jail brought a civil rights action against the county, individual correctional officers, and the arresting officer. The U.S. District Court entered summary judgment in favor of all defendants and the father appealed. The court of appeals found that fact issues existed on the question of whether jail personnel knew or reasonably should have known of the detainee's suicidal tendencies. The detainee made suicide threats to fellow inmates, and whether inmates reported such threats to jail personnel in such a manner as to be taken seriously, and whether jail personnel responded reasonably or with deliberate indifference, precluded summary judgment for them. The arresting officer was not deliberately indifferent to the detainee's medical needs; although the officer was informed of the detainee's mental illness, he was not informed that the detainee had previously threatened suicide, and there was no reason to suspect from the detainee's demeanor or actions that such danger existed. The county could not be held liable absent an indication of inadequately training its officers or maintaining an unsafe jail. (Cheshire County House of Corrections, New Hampshire)

The personal representatives and survivors of a pretrial detainee who committed suicide brought a Section 1983 action against the county and jail officials who moved for summary judgment. The U.S. District Court found that the county could not be held liable for the suicide based on the claim of deliberate indifference to the right of detainees to medical attention. There was no contention that the county's policy of giving jailers discretion in determining medical conditions and needs of detainees was one of deliberate indifference. The jailers' failure to provide the detainee with emergency medical attention did not show that the jailers were inadequately trained pursuant to policies or customs of the county, and the detainee's request for medical attention was not specific or urgent. The court also found that the jail officials were entitled to qualified immunity from liability; there was nothing which indicated that the conduct of the jailers was deliberately indifferent to the medical needs of the detainee nor was there anything on the record to indicate a strong likelihood that the detainee would commit suicide. The court of appeals reversed, finding that the pretrial detainee, who was denied access to a physician and to his medication for sebaceous cysts on his scalp and who went for eight months without treatment of his skin condition, failed to establish that the county had inadequate procedures, failed to adequately train its personnel, or had other policy or custom causing the detainee to be denied medical care. An administratrix of a pretrial detainee's estate brought a civil rights action against a city and city police officers based on the detainee's suicide death. On the officer's motion for summary judgment, the U.S. District Court found that even if the police officer was aware of the detainee's suicidal tendencies, the officer's failure to communicate those tendencies to other officers did not constitute deliberate indifference to the detainee's needs in violation of due process; any failure by the officer to communicate suicidal tendencies to other officers constituted negligence only. The police officers' failure to assure that the detainee's pantyhose were removed after becoming aware that she was wearing pantyhose did not constitute deliberate indifference to the detainee's psychological needs because no evidence indicated that the officers had knowledge of the detainee's suicidal tendencies. After it was determined that police officers were not deliberately indifferent to the pretrial detainee's needs when they failed to prevent her suicide, the city could not be held separately liable for failing to train its police officers. Rivas v. Freeman, 940 F.2d 1491 (11th Cir. 1991). A detainee brought a civil rights action against a sheriff, deputies, and other officials, for an arrest and incarceration resulting from his misidentification as probationer. The U.S. District Court awarded the detainee $100,000 in compensatory damages, holding all officials liable jointly and severally. All officials settled the case except the sheriff and deputies, who appealed. The court of appeals found that qualified immunity was not available to the sheriff and deputies being sued in their official capacities for violating the detainee's constitutional rights. In addition, the detainee's civil rights action against the sheriff and deputies in their official capacities, was not barred by the Eleventh Amendment as the sheriff and deputies were county officials and funds used to satisfy assessments of liability against them would not be paid from Florida's treasury. It was further found that the sheriff's failure to train his officers adequately regarding reliable techniques for identifying arrestees, along with his failure to account for incarcerated suspects, subjected the sheriff to liability for violation of the civil rights of the detainee, who was misidentified as probationer and was unnecessarily detained for six days for an alleged probation violation, where there was evidence that the sheriff knew of prior instances of mistaken identity, but failed to establish appropriate policies and continued to allow his deputies to detain persons even when discrepancies existed. However, the deputies' arrest and detention of the detainee, despite having information demonstrating that the detainee's identity was different from that of the probationer thought to be violating probation, did not amount to gross negligence or deliberate indifference to the detainee's constitutional rights, as was necessary for the deputies to be liable under Section 1983. The deputies' actions flowed from lack of policies, procedures, and training, and amounted at most to simple negligence. (Florida)

On the defendants' motions for post trial relief, following a jury verdict in favor of the plaintiff, the United States District court denied relief and the city and turnkey appealed. The court of appeals found that evidence made a question for the jury whether the city violated the detainee's rights by means of custom or policy tainted by deliberate indifference to serious medical needs of intoxicated detainees and as to whether the city violated the detainee's rights through deliberately indifferent failure to train officers responsible for intoxicated detainees in suicide detection and prevention, and was sufficient to support a conclusion that indifference to the needs of detainees and failure to train was the cause of violation of the detainee's Fourteenth Amendment rights. In addition, it was found that the Pennsylvania political subdivision Tort Claims Act did not nullify a city ordinance waiving immunity from liability arising from the negligence of city police officers. Barber v. City of Salem, Ohio, 953 F.2d 232 (6th Cir. 1992). An administrator of a pretrial detainee's estate brought a Section 1983 action against police officers and a city based on the detainee's suicide. The United States District Court granted summary judgment in favor of the police officers and the city, and the administrator appealed. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that there was no clearly established right to suicide prevention screening or facilities in 1982 when the pretrial detainee hanged himself; therefore, the law enforcement officers were entitled to qualified immunity from liability in the action. The city could not be held liable for any failure to better train personnel to detect and deter jail suicides. Although the pretrial detainee expressed concern over his job, his engagement, and his ability to obtain custody of his young son due to his arrest, such a reaction to arrest for driving under the influence of alcohol could not be considered abnormal and would not have alerted jail authorities to a strong likelihood that the detainee would commit suicide in such a manner that failure of the city to take precautions amounted to deliberate indifference to the detainee's serious medical needs. Benavides v. County of Wilson, 955 F.2d 968 (5th Cir. 1992). A former jail inmate and his spouse sued the county and the sheriff, seeking compensation for injuries sustained while the inmate was in the county jail. The U.S. District Court entered judgment for the sheriff and the county, and appeal was taken. The court of appeals, affirming the decision, found that the county jail inmate who was injured in a fall in his cell and was subsequently allowed to lie paralyzed for 18 hours without medical assistance being summoned, did not establish that the county and the sheriff had adopted a policy of improperly training jail personnel. The county and the sheriff had established compliance with state requirements for jailer personnel and the inmate had not shown, beyond conclusory statements of an alleged expert, that the standards were inadequate. It was also found that the inmate did not establish a triable case that the sheriff and county had established a deliberately indifferent policy of screening employees, even though two of his jailers had been treated for suicidal depression and alcoholism; the sheriff had been furnished with letters from their doctors indicating their fitness to return to work, and they had satisfactory work records. The spouse of the inmate did not have action under Texas law for intentional infliction of emotional harm; it was necessary to establish direct emotional shock from seeing the husband in a paralyzed state, without prior warning, and the wife had been told what happened by authorities prior to first seeing her husband. Manarite v. City of Springfield, 957 F.2d 953 (1st Cir. 1992). The estate and minor daughter of a detainee who committed suicide while in protective custody sued the police chief and the city under Section 1983 for their alleged failure to prevent the suicide. The U.S. District Court granted summary judgment for the defendants, and the plaintiffs appealed. The court of appeals found that the police chief's failure to insist that officers who implemented the suicide prevention policies remove shoelaces from persons in protective custody was not "deliberate indifference" that would permit holding the chief liable for suicide of a person in protective detention. Although four detainees tried to hang themselves with shoelaces in the preceding nine months, the chief's conduct might have been negligent, but not deliberately indifferent. In addition, the city's failure to provide training and education for police officers in suicide detection and prevention was not "deliberate indifference" in violation of Section 1983, as the city's training and policies regarding suicide prevention were in accord with requirements of state law at the time of the detainee's suicide, and there was no basis for finding that his suicide was closely related to the city's failure to train officers in suicide prevention. Herman v. Clearfield County, PA, 836 F.Supp. 1178 (W.D. Pa. 1993) affirmed 30 F.3d 1486. The estate of a pretrial detainee who committed suicide while detained brought a Section 1983 civil rights claim alleging that jail officials failed to identify and treat the decedent's obvious suicidal intent and that the county consciously followed a policy or custom of failing to train jail employees. The county and its officials moved for summary judgment. The district court found that the jail officials were adequately trained in suicide prevention. Claims of inadequate training are not enough to establish liability. The plaintiff must identify specific training that the municipality did not give, explain how lack of that training actually caused the ultimate injury, and show that alleged failure to train was part of official municipal policy of deliberate indifference. The plaintiff must present evidence that the alleged indifference was a conscious choice that resulted either from a decision officially adopted and promulgated or from a permanent and well settled practice. The county's alleged failure to train jail personnel to recognize and respond to the suicidal tendencies of pretrial detainees did not support the Section 1983 civil rights claim by the detainee's estate. The jail did not have a history of numerous suicides and suicide attempts. In addition, the county employed a suicide prevention program for screening detainees. The officials did receive training regarding detention of suicidal detainees and appropriate responses. (Clearfield County Prison, Pennsylvania)

Hood v. Itawamba County, Miss., 819 F.Supp. 556 (N.D. Miss. 1993). In an action arising out of a suicide by a detainee, the county moved for summary judgment on Section 1983 claims. The district court found that, assuming that the detainee had shown suicidal tendencies, the county was not liable under Section 1983 for the detainee's suicide on the theory of inadequate training, where the sheriff's office did have a policy regarding custodial confinement of detainees who exhibited a possible inclination to self-injury. The negligence of a county law officer in not adhering to a county policy for custodial care of the detainee did not support county liability under Section 1983. It was the deviation from policy and standard practice that contributed to the detainee's suicide, not the policy or practice itself. (Itawamba County Jail, Mississippi)

Knight v. Gill, 999 F.2d 1020 (6th Cir. 1993). An inmate who was assaulted by a cellmate brought a civil rights action against prison officials. The U.S. District Court denied the officials' motion for summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds, and they appealed. The appeals court found that the prison official did not act with deliberate indifference to the inmate's safety when he denied the inmate's request for transfer to another cell, and was entitled to qualified immunity. The inmate had refused protective supervision pending a hearing to decide whether to assign him to a different cell, and the official did not have knowledge that the cellmate was a threat to the inmate's safety. Also, prison officials did not act with deliberate indifference to the safety of the inmate in allegedly failing to properly train and supervise the activity of prison personnel, entitling the officials to qualified immunity. It was noted that the prison had the second lowest assault rate in the state prison system. (Luther Luckett Correctional Complex, Oldham County, Kentucky)

An arrestee's estate sued a city, the chief of police, and three police officers under Section 1983 and the Alabama wrongful death statute, after the arrestee committed suicide while in jail at the police station. The U.S. District Court denied the individual defendants' motions for summary judgment based on qualified immunity in their individual capacities and they appealed. The appeals court, reversing and remanding, found that the police chief's actions and inactions with respect to policies and training in handling of suicidal inmates did not constitute deliberate indifference, thus entitling the chief to qualified immunity. It was noted that a previous suicide in the jail occurred seven years before the arrestee's, and steps had been taken after that to prevent future suicides. (Foley Police Station, Alabama)

The district court found that the supervisory prison officials were personally involved with the violations of the inmate's constitutional rights at the disciplinary hearing and could be held liable under Section 1983. They failed to remedy violations on administrative appeal and failed to train the hearing officer. (Eastern Correctional Facility, New York)

A wife, as the administratrix of the estate of her husband, brought a civil rights action under Section 1983 against a police officer and a county sheriff. The U.S. District Court dismissed the claims and entered judgment in favor of the defendants. On appeal, the court of appeals, affirming the decision found that the police officer had probable cause to arrest the individual for public intoxication, even though the individual was, in fact, a diabetic in a state of insulin shock. The individual had trouble balancing himself and appeared incoherent, smelled of alcohol and had bloodshot eyes, was unable to state his name or date of birth, and did not indicate that he was a diabetic. In addition, the municipality was not liable under Section 1983 based on a "failure to train" theory for alleged violation of the individual's civil rights which occurred when the police officer arrested and jailed the individual. There was no evidence that the municipality engaged in a pattern of mistakenly detaining people with symptoms of diabetic shock or a pattern of failing to medically treat those same individuals when their true affliction was discovered. Caldwell v. District of Columbia, 901 F.Supp. 7 (D.D.C. 1995). A prisoner who was attacked by fellow inmates filed a § 1983 action against the District of Columbia and corrections officials. The district court dismissed the case, finding that the prisoner failed to state a § 1983 claim that officers violated his rights by failing to protect him for other inmates. The court also held that the prisoner failed to state a § 1983 claim against the District of Columbia absent evidence that an emergency policy was inadequate or that officers were inadequately trained. The court found that a fifty minute delay between the time the prisoner was attacked and the time medical attention was delivered did not amount to deliberate indifference because correctional officers' conduct, although possibly negligent, was not wanton. The officers took steps to ensure that the prisoner received proper medical attention. The court held that the alleged negligence of corrections officers in the opening and closing of cell doors did not rise to the level of deliberate indifference required to merit constitutional relief. Coleman v. Wilson, 912 F.Supp. 1282 (E.D.Cal. 1995). Inmates challenged the adequacy of mental health care provided at institutions operated by the California Department of Corrections, alleging that the inadequacies were cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The district court reviewed the findings and recommendations of the chief magistrate judge after objections were filed by the defendants. The court found that evidence supported the magistrate's findings and recommendations regarding many aspects of the Department's mental health services, and ordered that a special master be appointed to monitor the Department's compliance with court-ordered injunctive relief. The court found that there were six components of a minimally-adequate prison mental health care delivery system under the Eighth Amendment: (1) a systematic program for screening and evaluating inmates to identify those in need of mental health care; (2) a treatment program that involves more than segregation and close supervision of mentally ill inmates; (3) employment of a sufficient number of trained mental health professionals; (4) maintenance of accurate, complete and confidential mental health treatment records; (5) the administration of psychotropic medication only with appropriate supervision and periodic evaluation; and (6) a basic program to identify, treat and supervise inmates at risk for suicide. The court found that evidence supported findings of deficiencies in all of these areas.

The Department's mental illness screening procedures were based on self-reporting, use of records of prior hospitalization and/or past or current use of psychotropic medications, exhibition of bizarre behavior, and requests for care. The court found these procedures were used haphazardly and depended for efficacy on incomplete or nonexistent medical records, or observations of custodial staff who were inadequately trained to recognize the signs and symptoms of mental illness.

The court found that evidence established that the Department was significantly and chronically understaffed in the area of mental health employees. The court found that custody staff played inappropriate roles in decisions concerning involuntary medication at some institutions. Evidence supported the finding that custodial staff were inadequately trained in signs and symptoms of mental illness, supporting allegations that disciplinary and behavior control measures were inappropriately used against mentally ill inmates. The three-hour course received by all new correctional officers, and additional in-service training at the institution level, were not sufficient to prevent some officers from using punitive measures to control inmates' behavior without regard to the cause of the behavior. Hale v. Tallapoosa County, 50 F.3d 1579 (11th Cir. 1995). A pretrial detainee filed a Section 1983 action against a county, its sheriff and a jailer arising from an alleged beating of the detainee by other inmates in a group cell. The U.S. District Court entered summary judgment in favor of the defendants and the detainee appealed. The appeals court, affirming in part, reversing in part and remanding, found that evidence that the jailer failed to check on the group cell during the hour between the last check and the beating was not sufficient to show deliberate indifference and causation necessary to hold the jailer individually liable for the detainee's injuries. Although the sheriff worked toward the construction of a new jail, the existing jail had no policy for classifying and segregating inmates, the jailer had received no professional training, and the jailer was stationed out of eyesight and earshot of the cell. Madrid v. Gomez, 889 F.Supp. 1146 (N.D.Cal. 1995). Inmates brought a class action suit challenging conditions of confinement at a new high-security prison complex in California. The district court found for the plaintiffs in the majority of issues presented, ordered injunctive relief and appointed a special master to direct a remedial plan tailored to correct specific constitutional violations. In the beginning of its lengthy opinion, the court noted that this "...is not a case about inadequate or deteriorating physical conditions...rather, plaintiffs contend that behind the newly-minted walls and shiny equipment lies a prison that is coldly indifferent to the limited, but basic and elemental, rights that incarcerated persons--including the 'worst of the worst'--retain under...our Constitution." The court held that the fact that a prison may be new does not excuse its obligation to operate it in a constitutionally acceptable manner.

The court held that prison inmates established prison officials' deliberate indifference to the use of excessive force by showing that they knew that unnecessary and grossly excessive force was being employed against inmates on a frequent basis and that these practices posed a substantial risk of harm to inmates. According to the court, officials consciously disregarded the risk of harm, choosing instead to tolerate and even encourage abuses of force by deliberately ignoring them when they occurred, tacitly accepting a code of silence, and failing to implement adequate systems to control and regulate the use of force. The court found that officials had an affirmative management strategy to permit the use of excessive force for the purpose of punishment and deterrence.

The court found the delivery of physical and mental health services to be constitutionally inadequate and that evidence demonstrated that officials knew that they were subjecting the inmate population to a substantial risk of serious harm, thus violating the Eighth Amendment. The court held that staffing levels were insufficient, training and supervision of medical staff was almost nonexistent and screening for communicable diseases was poorly implemented. Inmates often experienced significant delays in receiving treatment, there were no protocols or training programs for dealing with emergencies or trauma, there was no effective procedure for managing chronic illness, medical recordkeeping was deficient, and there were no programs of substance to ensure that quality care was provided.

According to the court, although conditions of confinement in the security housing unit did not violate the Eighth Amendment for all inmates, they did violate constitutional standards when imposed on certain inmates, including those who were at a particularly high risk for suffering very serious or severe injury to their mental health. The court found that conditions involved extreme social isolation and reduced environmental stimulation. The court held that prison officials had an actual subjective knowledge that conditions of isolation presented a substantial excessive risk of harm for mentally ill and other vulnerable inmates, and that the officials acted wantonly in violation of the 8h Amendment. McGuinness v. Dubois, 891 F.Supp. 25 (D.Mass. 1995). An inmate filed a § 1983 action against corrections officials challenging his confinement in a disciplinary unit. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants in part, and denied it in part. The court found that a regulation authorizing placement in the Departmental Disciplinary Unit (DDU) for up to ten years did not violate a statute limiting confinement in the isolation unit to 15 days. The court found that denial of the inmate's request for a prison officer to testify in his disciplinary hearing violated his right to procedural due process; however, corrections officials were entitled to qualified immunity for failure to train and supervise because mere negligence is insufficient to impose § 1983 liability on supervisors. The court also ruled that the inmate was denied a state created liberty interest in educational programs without due process because his rights were violated in the disciplinary hearing that resulted in his placement in DDU, where inmates in DDU were prohibited from participating in any educational programs or activities. Mullins v. Stratton, 878 F.Supp. 1016 (E.D. Ky. 1995). Action was brought against jailers under a civil rights statute and state law for failing to take action to prevent an inmate's suicide. On a motion of the defendants for summary judgment, the district court found that no policy or custom amounting to deliberate indifference was shown to have caused the inmate's suicide for purposes of liability of jail officials in their official capacities under Section 1983. The county detention center had in effect a policy and procedure manual which provided for the care and treatment of suicidal inmates, providing for administrative segregation and observation on 20 minute intervals. In addition, the county jailer testified that he had received 40 hours of inmate care training and all correction officers were required to receive 16 hours of training annually. Pyka v. Village of Orland Park, 906 F.Supp. 1196 (N.D.Ill. 1995). The estate of an arrestee who committed suicide while in detention brought a civil rights action against a village and police officers. An eighteen-year-old youth in police custody committed suicide by hanging himself from the bars of his cell with his t-shirt. The court found that the defendants were entitled to qualified immunity on claims against them in their official capacity, but the officer who put the arrestee in a chokehold was not entitled to immunity on the claim of excessive force, nor was immunity available for an officer who failed to intervene in the first officer's takedown of the arrestee. The court also found that the officers were not entitled to immunity on the claim that they struck the arrestee in violation of his right to be free from pretrial detention that constituted punishment; a videotape showed no sign of aggression or violence by the arrestee before the officer grabbed him and placed him in a chokehold. The court found that the officers were entitled to immunity on the claim of failure to provide medical care and that the village had no policy of deliberate indifference as to measures to prevent suicide. The municipality was not liable for the suicide of the arrestee based on its alleged failure to train police officers regarding suicide awareness absent any evidence that the municipality had a large suicide problem which it was ignoring or that statutes or regulations required officers either to perform CPR upon the arrestee after he was discovered hanging in his cell or to take suicide awareness classes. The court ruled that the arrestee's sister lacked standing and could not recover under § 1983 for loss of society and companionship. The court left the proximate cause issue to be determined by a jury. The court ruled that the officers were entitled to qualified immunity on the claim that they failed to process the arrestee for bail or allow bail to be posted in a timely fashion, because the right to bail was not a clearly established right at the time of the incident. (Overland Park Police Department, Illinois)

Vine v. County of Ingham, 884 F.Supp. 1153 (W.D.Mich. 1995). The personal representative for the estate of a detainee who died while in police custody sued a county, a city and various city and county staff and officials. The decedant was arrested for two outstanding city arrest warrants after a deputy was called to a home on a disorderly person complaint. The decedant told the deputy he had ingested methyl alcohol, refused to cooperate with the deputy's attempts to determine his physical condition and apparently refused to accept ambulance transportation to the hospital. The deputy transported the decedant to the city where a police officer assumed custody and transported the decedant to the city lock-up without a medical examination. At booking the decedant appeared to be intoxicated but no special precautions were taken; he was placed in handcuffs in a maximum security plexiglass-lined observation cell because he was belligerent and was believed to have previously attempted suicide. The decedant fell asleep (or passed out) on the floor and remained motionless for several hours; he was visually checked periodically by officers who observed no change in his condition. Nearly six hours after being placed in the cell officers observed mucous or vomit coming from the decendant's nose or mouth and when they rolled him over to remove the handcuffs his head jerked and struck the wall or floor causing a laceration above his eyebrow; he did not awaken. No medical attention was obtained for another two hours when he was transported to the hospital in a comatose condition, where he died shortly after arrival. The district court held that the sheriff and county were not liable under § 1983 for inadequate training nor were they liable for gross negligence based on allegedly inadequate training. The court also held that the sheriff and county were immune from liability for gross negligence, and that the city, police department and police chief were not deliberately indifferent to the need for better training. The court noted that such claims would apply only if the conduct represents usual or recurring situations with which the officers must deal. Deputies had completed training approved by the state law enforcement training council and had received substantial in-service training. According to the court, the fact that they were arguably negligent when they took the decedant into custody without first ascertaining his medical condition was not enough, in itself, to create a question of fact regarding the adequacy of their training. The lack of a county policy regarding treatment of persons who had ingested methyl alcohol was not significant absent evidence that methyl alcohol ingestion was a recurring problem of which staff were aware. The court ruled that the action of one detention officer indicated only negligence, which was not sufficient to sustain liability under § 1983. The court ruled, however, that genuine issues of material fact precluded summary judgment for some, but not all, of the city police officers who failed to take any action in response to their observation that a blow to the head failed to rouse the intoxicated detainee. Young v. City of Augusta, Ga. Through DeVaney, 59 F.3d 1160 (11th Cir. 1995). A former prisoner brought an action against a city and others, alleging violation of his civil rights in connection with his mental health needs. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants; the appeals court affirmed in part and reversed in part. The appeals court held that fact issues existed as to whether the prisoner suffered constitutional deprivations caused by the custom of inadequate selection or training of jail employees, of which the city should have been aware. The court found that a factual dispute existed as to whether city jail employees had engaged in an undue delay in furnishing medication, and whether the medication was dispensed by jail employees as prescribed. The court noted that jail medication charts were rife with gaps and contained indecipherable information. The prisoner claimed that city jail employees were inadequately selected or trained to recognize the need to remove a mentally ill inmate to a hospital or to dispense medication as prescribed, and that this deficiency reflected deliberate indifference by city policymakers. The court noted that other inmates had complained of lack of adequate treatment for serious medical problems stemming from mental illness, and that the alleged mistreatment and omissions suffered by the inmate occurred over a period of several months while three different jailers were charged with the inmate's care. Evidence of the details of the city's training program was absent from the record and the city did not submit any evidence concerning its selection of jail employees. (Augusta City Jail, Georgia)

The district court granted summary judgment to the sheriff, finding that the prisoner's erroneous detention did not violate the due process clause where state remedies were available. The prisoner had asserted that he was entitled to "day for day" good time credits under the terms of his sentence and that the sheriff failed to release him in a timely manner. The prisoner had alleged that the county prison policy of inadequately training its employees to interpret court orders resulted in their failure to award him good time credit. Ryder v. Freeman, 918 F.Supp. 157 (W.D.N.C. 1996). An employee of a correctional facility operated by the North Carolina Department of Corrections filed suit against correctional officials, alleging that a component of the state's required training program violated her constitutional rights. The employee asserted that a training program which required employees to be sprayed by chemical mace denied her the right to be free from bodily harm. The district court dismissed the case, finding that the training requirement had a rational basis and did not shock the conscience so as to require the strict scrutiny of a substantive due process claim. State officials argued that they required officers to be sprayed with mace so that they would be deterred from using mace unless absolutely necessary, and to teach them how to react with more sensitivity to an inmate who had been sprayed with mace. Under the corrections department policy, the officer would have been terminated from employment if she refused to participate in the required training. (North Carolina Department of Corrections)

She alleged that a county police officer used excessive force in arresting her, and that the county itself was liable for her injuries based on its sheriff's hiring and training decisions. She prevailed on her claims against the county following a jury trial, and the Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit affirmed the judgment against the county on the basis of the hiring claim alone. The United States Supreme Court held that the Court of Appeals' decision "cannot be squared with our recognition that, in enacting Sec. 1983, Congress did not intend to impose liability on a municipality unless deliberate action attributable to the municipality itself is the 'moving force' behind the plaintiff's deprivation of federal rights." Carrigan v. State of Del., 957 F.Supp. 1376 (D.Del. 1997). A female inmate brought a civil rights action against prison officials and a guard as the result of an alleged rape by the guard. The district court found that the inmate did not establish deliberate indifference by prison officials where the officials had a policy forbidding sexual contact between correctional officers and inmates, the alleged rapist had received a total of 64 hours of training, and the inmate offered no expert opinion to rebut an expert report that the training was adequate. The court found that prison officials were entitled to qualified immunity. The court noted that the inmate's transfer to protective custody following her alleged rape by a guard did not show deliberate indifference but, rather, showed the prison officials' attentiveness to her condition as they were aware that her claims put her at risk of attack by other inmates. The court found that the inmate failed to establish an Eighth Amendment violation through evidence of other incidents because nearly all of those incidents occurred after the alleged rape, and those which occurred prior took place at a different institution or were unsubstantiated by the inmate involved. However, the court found that the inmate had stated a claim based on gross or wanton negligence, or bad faith, against the guard. (Delaware Department of Correction)

Hutto v. Davis, 972 F.Supp. 1372 (W.D.Okl. 1997). The administrator of the estate of an arrestee who suffered a fatal drug overdose after a plastic bag containing methamphetamine which he had ingested burst, brought an action against jail employees asserting § 1983 and state law claims. The district court found that jail employees whose contact ended when the arrestee was booked and jailed were not deliberately indifferent to the serious medical needs of the arrestee. But the court found that employees with later contact were not entitled to qualified immunity and that a fact issue existed as to whether the failure of these employees to obtain medical care violated the Eighth Amendment. The court held that the plaintiff failed to establish a failure to train or to supervise on the part of the county. The court found that it is necessary to establish that a particular training program is inadequate rather than alleging that a particular officer may be unsatisfactorily trained, because the shortcomings of an officer may have resulted from other factors than a faulty training program. The court held that the plaintiff failed to establish that the arrestee's death was the result of either exertion of improper control by supervisors or the failure of supervisors to control employees, as required to recover against a municipality based on a claim of inadequate supervision. Mathis v. Fairman, 120 F.3d 88 (7th Cir. 1997). A detainee's mother brought a civil rights action against jail personnel following the detainee's suicide while in custody. The district court entered summary judgment for the personnel and the mother appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that personnel did not exhibit deliberate indifference to the threat of suicide. The court noted that jail staff were concerned enough about the detainee's strange behavior to have a paramedic speak with him, to have him evaluated psychologically, and in deference to his fear that someone was trying to kill him, to place him in a single cell. After a mental health specialist concluded that the detainee did not pose a threat to himself, he was returned to the general jail population. The mother had alleged that the jail failed to adequately staff the facility, and to adequately train its employees. A newly-hired officer was responsible for supervising the 25 inmates on the non-aggressive protective custody tier on which the detainee was housed. The officer, on his first day on the job, initially noticed the detainee's strange behavior and alleges that he reported it to his supervisor. The officer was hired less than a week earlier, and had just completed a four or five-day orientation. The appeals court noted that while cadets like the officer may not have been trained in suicide prevention, the jail maintained a psychiatric unit for that purpose. A female arrestee brought a § 1983 action against police officials alleging that a female officer's strip search of her, under orders from a lieutenant, violated her federal and state rights. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants and the arrestee appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded, finding that issues of fact as to the basis for the search precluded summary judgment on the issues of reasonableness and qualified immunity. The appeals court affirmed the district court's finding that § 1983 liability was not established based on the city's alleged failure to properly train the police force as to its uniform policy on strip searches. According to the court, police officers were supplied with policy guidelines, and there was no evidence of any other incidents which would have put the city on notice that its approach was inadequate. Adewale v. Whalen, 21 F.Supp.2d 1006 (D.Minn. 1998). An arrestee sued a police officer and the city that employed him under federal civil rights laws and state tort claims. The district court found that the officer was entitled to qualified immunity from liability for his decision to jail the arrestee, but found that genuine issues of material fact precluded summary judgment on the grounds of official immunity on allegations of assault, battery and false imprisonment. The court held that the officer's decision to detain the arrestee for a misdemeanor did not violate her federal rights and was objectively reasonable, given the arrestee's admission that she had been drinking and intended to drive. The court held that the arrestee failed to show that the city improperly trained its officers to arrest noncooperative persons for obstruction of legal process, based only on the decision of a deputy director of police that it was proper to arrest someone for refusing to open a security door for the police. The arrestee suffered a broken arm which she alleged was the result of excessive force used by the officer during a pat-down search. (City of Richfield Police Department, Minnesota)

Barney v. Pulsipher, 143 F.3d 1299 (10th Cir. 1998). Two female former inmates who were sexually assaulted by a jailer each brought a § 1983 action against jailer, county, sheriff and county commissioners based on their assault and other conditions of confinement. The actions were consolidated and all defendants except the jailer were granted summary judgment by the district court. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the county was not liable on the grounds of failure to train or inadequate hiring. The court held that the inmates did not show that the training received by the jailer was deficient and that even if it was, the sexual assault of the inmates was not plainly the obvious consequence of a deficient training program. The court noted that the sheriff should not have been expected to conclude that the jailer was highly likely to inflict sexual assault on female inmates if he was hired as a correctional officer. Essex County Jail Annex Inmates v. Treffinger, 18 F.Supp.2d 445 (D.N.J. 1998). Inmates filed a motion to hold county corrections defendants in civil contempt for noncompliance with a consent decree addressing unconstitutional conditions of confinement. The district court held that monetary sanctions for civil contempt were not appropriate in light of the county's efforts to attain full compliance by investing over $200 million in new facilities and improving existing ones. The court concluded that contempt sanctions would be counterproductive and would impede the county's efforts to build a new jail. The court held that it could not consider whether a classification plan satisfied the consent decree until an independent analysis was conducted. The court noted that the Special Master reported that staffing was inadequate, and as a result inmates and staff are exposed to danger and other problems. The court adopted the Master's recommendation that an independent, professional staffing analysis be conducted to address staff training, coverage and operations. The Master also reported that there was an insufficient supply of personal hygiene items, and the court ordered the defendants to comply with the consent order's terms by issuing adequate amounts of personal hygiene items, including toilet paper, soap, shampoo, toothpaste, toothbrush, comb, mirror, individual razors and shaving cream or powder. Farabee v. Rider, 995 F.Supp. 1398 (M.D.Fla. 1998). An arrestee sued a county sheriff and deputies alleging negligence and malicious prosecution. The district court found that the sheriff owed a duty to protect the arrestee from the risk of use of excessive force created by his alleged failure to train and supervise deputies. The court held that the sheriff was not entitled to qualified immunity. The arrestee was pushed to the ground and handcuffed while a deputy put his knee in her back. She was transported to the county jail where she was incarcerated for at least 12 hours and she was suffering from back and arm injuries inflicted by the deputy while confined. Faulcon v. City of Philadelphia, 18 F.Supp.2d 537 (E.D.Pa. 1998). A pretrial detainee who had been stabbed by another inmate sued city officials and correction officers alleging failure to protect, failure to supervise and failure to train under the Eighth Amendment. The district court granted summary judgment to the defendants, finding that the facility's policy of keeping pretrial detainees in the same housing unit as convicted inmates did not constitute deliberate indifference to a substantial risk of harm. The court also held that the lack of guidelines or training procedures regarding segregation of convicted inmates was insufficient to support claims for failure to supervise or failure to train. According to the court, a state statutory provision that indicated that sentenced prisoners should be housed separately from detainees was merely a recommended guideline rather than a mandatory requirement. Fournier v. Reardon, 160 F.3d 754 (1st Cir. 1998). A corrections officer brought a § 1983 action alleging that county officials violated his rights in connection with his being placed under "house arrest" by being handcuffed during a training course. The district court denied the defendants' motion to dismiss, but the appeals court reversed, finding that the officer was not "seized" within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment, and the officer's due process rights were not violated. A drill instructor allegedly handcuffed the officer's hands behind his back and informed him that he was being placed under "house arrest" for entering the instructor's office without asking permission. The officer could have objected, but did not. The court found that any possible negative consequences for his continuing employment that might have resulted from an objection were not relevant to whether a violation of his right to be free from seizure occurred. The court held that the corrections officer did not have a constitutional right under the due process clause to safe conditions during his basic training course. The court also found that the possibility that the drill instructor would not have placed a non-recruit under "house arrest" was not a basis for an equal protection claim by the corrections officer. Liebe v. Norton, 157 F.3d 574 (8th Cir. 1998). A detainee's wife and the administrator of his estate sued a county, sheriff and jailer for damages under § 1983, after the detainee committed suicide while incarcerated in a county jail. The district court dismissed the case and the appeals court affirmed, finding that the jailer who classified the detainee as a suicide risk, took preventive measures by placing the detainee in a temporary holding cell and removing his shoes and belt, and periodically checked on the detainee, did not act with deliberate indifference to the detainee's health or safety. The court found the jailer was entitled to qualified immunity because the steps taken by the jailer were affirmative, deliberate steps to prevent suicide. The court held that the county could not he held liable on a § 1983 claim of failure to supervise, based on the on-the-job training received by the jailer, the county's failure to test the jailer on his knowledge of a manual outlining suicide prevention policies, and the county's decision to leave the jailer in charge. The appeals court found that this did not rise to the level of deliberate indifference. The court also found that the county was not liable for failing to train jailers on the risks of inmate suicides, when the county had in place policies intended to prevent suicides and no suicides had occurred at the jail before the detainee's. The court found that failing to lead the jailer, step by step, through policies in the manual did not amount to failure to train. The detainee had been arrested and taken to the jail and was intoxicated at the time of his admission. The admitting jail officer classified the detainee as a "suicide risk" because he admitted to previously attempting suicide and was on both clonazepam and valium. The officer checked on the detainee at intervals ranging from 7 minutes to 21 minutes, but did not turn on the audio system in the holding cell. The detainee used his long-sleeved shirt to hang himself on a metal-framed electrical conduit in the cell. The jailer was the only staff member on duty at the time. Before being assigned to work by himself he was given on-the-job training for 2½ weeks. The jailer was scheduled to attend a jailer training course but it was not offered for another month. At the time of the suicide the jailer had worked full-time for approximately two months. (Fall River County Jail, South Dakota)

Moore v. Hosier, 43 F.Supp.2d 978 (N.D.Ind. 1998). A former pretrial detainee sued a county sheriff's department and individual law enforcement officers alleging civil rights violations arising out of his treatment while he was being held in county confinement. The district court held that the restraint of the detainee by officers for the purposes of decontaminating him after a pepper spray cannister malfunctioned did not amount to assault and battery under state law. The detainee alleged that officers strapped him to a chair with his arms tied behind his back and beat him about his face and body, and placed his face and mouth in front of a shower. The court held that even if these allegations were true, they did not amount to an invasion of privacy under Indiana law. The court denied summary judgment for officers who did not participate in the beating of the detainee but witnessed it and had the opportunity to stop it. The court held that the sheriff's department did not negligently train its employees in the use of force, where the department had developed and maintained detailed procedures for training incoming officers in handling inmates, and the department policy specifically stated that officers were expected to use force only in a lawful and justifiable manner. The detainee admitted that he was intoxicated when officers arrived at the scene and that he fled on foot when they arrived. The detainee was involved with altercations with officers at a detention center, and was strapped into a restraining chair and was sprayed with pepper spray. Owens v. City of Philadelphia, 6 F.Supp.2d 373 (E.D.Pa. 1998). The administratrix of a pretrial detainee's estate and his surviving children brought a § 1983 action against prison guards and officials and the City of Philadelphia to recover for the detainee's suicide. The district court found that fact questions precluded summary judgment in favor of the guards on questions of qualified immunity, deliberate indifference and the adequacy of the City's training program. According to the court, the detainee's statement to a guard that he felt "schizy" and that he was "going to hurt myself" raised questions of fact on issues of knowledge and deliberate indifference. According to the court, it was not necessary to show that a guard believed that harm would actually befall the detainee; rather, the detainee's children only needed to show that the official acted or failed to act despite his knowledge of a substantial risk of serious harm. The guard called a psychiatrist knowing she intended to issue a pass for the detainee to go to the psychiatric unit but failed to note in the prison log the detainee's statement about hurting himself in order to inform the incoming officers and his superiors. There was nothing in the record that indicates that the pass was ever issued. The court also found that the officials' alleged conduct as policy-makers with respect to inadequate training to prevent suicide by pretrial detainees was actionable under § 1983 in a suit against them as individuals. The court held that whether the jail guards acted with objective reasonableness after they learned that the pretrial detainee was hanging in his cell involved questions of fact, precluding summary judgment. Sanders v. Howze, 50 F.Supp.2d 1364 (M.D.Ga. 1998). The estate of a prisoner who committed suicide while in a county jail brought a § 1983 action against jail officials. The district court denied summary judgment for the officials finding it was barred by fact issues as to whether the officials were deliberately indifferent to the prisoner's known suicidal propensity and whether the county had adequate policies for dealing with potential suicides. The court also found a material issue of fact as to whether county jail officials were properly trained in dealing with potential suicides. After being confined in the jail for six weeks the prisoner removed a razor blade from a disposable razor and cut his wrists. He was transferred to a state hospital for a psychological evaluation but returned to the jail two months later. He was placed in an isolation cell near the jailer's office, where he hung himself a week later from a light fixture with a bed sheet. A few days earlier a judge had ordered a psychiatric evaluation which was in the process of being arranged by the sheriff. (Dougherty County Jail, Georgia)

Vinson v. Clarke County, Ala., 10 F.Supp.2d 1282 (S.D.Ala. 1998). A § 1983 action was brought by the administrator of the estate of an intoxicated arrestee who had committed suicide while being held in a county jail. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants, finding that the sheriff and jailer acted within the scope of their discretionary authority and did not violate clearly established law. The court held that the county was not deliberately indifferent to the risks of suicide. According to the court, it was not clearly established in October 1994 that a county sheriff's failure to train jail personnel in the care of intoxicated inmates amounted to deliberate indifference. The court found that the risk of suicide among a class of intoxicated detainees at the county jail was not so obvious that the county's failure to remedy conditions of confinement which gave detainees the opportunity to commit suicide could be seen as showing deliberate indifference. The detainee committed suicide within 30 minutes of his admission by hanging himself from the bars of his jail cell. An autopsy revealed that the detainee's blood contained .205 percent alcohol, which was well over the maximum of .1 allowed under state DUI law. (Clarke County Jail, Alabama)

Brewer v. City of Daphne, 111 F.Supp.2d 1299 (S.D.Ala. 1999). The mother of a jail inmate who committed suicide brought a civil rights action against a city and city officials, alleging they failed to provide adequate psychological care to the inmate prior to his suicide and failed to protect him from self-inflicted harm. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court held that there was no official policy, custom, or lack of training which gave rise to § 1983 liability against the city for failing to prevent the inmate's suicide. The inmate had been confined for more than a month of his 18-month sentence when he returned to the jail from a work release job and was found to be under the influence of alcohol. The inmate was found dead in his cell later having died from asphyxiation caused by hanging. The court found that evidence did not establish that the inmate had a serious psychological need prior to his death and that there was no proof that officials knew that the inmate faced a substantial risk of harm given his intoxicated state on the day of his death. Ellis v. Washington County and Johnson City, Tenn., 198 F.3d 225 (6th Cir. 1999). A mother and a minor child of a deceased pretrial detainee brought a wrongful death action under § 1983 against a city, county, and jailers after the detainee committee suicide in a county jail. The district court entered summary judgment for all defendants except for one jailer and the plaintiffs and jailer appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the county's alleged failure to train jailers on suicide prevention was not the proximate cause of the detainee's injury absent any circumstances from which a reasonable jailer would have foreseen the suicide. The appeals court also found that one of the jailers was entitled to qualified immunity even though he made a mistake in assessing the detainee's suicidal tendencies because he was not deliberately indifferent toward the detainee and exhibited a genuine concern for the detainee's welfare while confined. But the appeals court refused to grant summary judgment for one jailer because of his alleged delay in informing an emergency medical team of his alleged observation of the detainee tying a noose in his cell. The detainee committed suicide by handing himself in a county jail three hours after his transfer from a city jail. The cell in which the detainee hung himself had a monitor camera at one end but was not designed as a suicide prevention cell. The detainee had been held overnight at a city jail after he was arrested because he was believed to be drunk or under the influence of drugs. After his arraignment the following morning he was taken to the county jail where, during the three hours preceding his suicide, "nothing occurred that would put reasonable jailors on notice of a possible suicide attempt" according to the appeals court. The detainee was asked about possible suicidal tendencies when he was admitted to the jail and responded that he "loved life." A few minutes later a jailer who had gone to high school with the detainee came on duty and was concerned about his mental health. The jailer found the detainee talking on the phone to his mother and seemingly crying. After the call the jailer asked the detainee if he was feeling suicidal and the detainee responded "Hell no, I've got a baby on the way that I've got to take care of." But most persuasive to the court was the statement iof the mother n a letter two months after the death of her son that her son was "not suicidal at 11:30 when I talked to him [on the phone]...knew he was getting out [of jail.]" The detainee's mother was an experienced, practicing, licensed clinical psychologist who held a Ph.D., and the court considered her statement to be an expert opinion. The appeals court held that it was "unreasonable to attribute fault to the County or its jailors for failing to predict suicide." (Johnson City Jail and Washington County Jail, Texas)

Gonzalez v. Angelilli, 40 F.Supp.2d 615 (E.D.Pa. 1999). A civil rights action was brought against state parole and prison authorities by the relatives of a police officer killed by a former prison inmate and the owner of a trailer to which the former inmate moved upon release. The district court dismissed the case finding that as a general rule, the state has no affirmative obligation to protect its citizens from the violent acts of private individuals. The court held that the plaintiffs failed to state a § 1983 claim under a state-created danger theory where they failed to allege that it was foreseeable that the paroled offender would direct his violence at police officers in general, or that police would destroy trailer park property while looking for evidence. The court also found that the plaintiffs failed to state a § 1983 claim based on a failure to train theory where they did not identify what policies or procedures were defective, how they were defective or whether a training program was involved. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants on all § 1983 claims and declined to assume supplemental jurisdiction over state law claims. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the officers did not use excessive force against the detainee, but rather that they applied the force necessary in a good faith effort to restore discipline. The court also found that there were no actionable deficiencies in the sheriff's policies, customs or training. According to the court, "...the appellant's own expert penologist conceded that [sheriff] Peed's policies met the standards of both the Virginia Board of Corrections and the American Correctional Association." The court also concluded, "...claims that [sheriff] Peed provided inadequate training for his employees must also fail. As of the time of this incident, the ADC had been accredited for more than ten years by both the American Correctional Association and the National Commission on Correctional Health Care, two organizations whose training requirements often surpass minimal constitutional standards." (Fairfax County Adult Detention Center, Virginia)

The court found that the arrestee's allegations that the police officer arrested him and detained him in a county jail without informing him of the nature and cause of the accusations against him were sufficient to state a Sixth Amendment claim. The court also found that allegations that the police chief and town failed to provide police officers with adequate training on the lawful use of force, and that the unlawful use of force would be condoned by their superiors, were sufficient to state a Fourth Amendment claim. The arrestee had been preaching the gospel and greeting people as they came into a store, with the permission of the owner. A police officer instructed the arrestee to leave the store and then allegedly followed the arrestee to the back of the store when he attempted to protest to the owner. Lopez v. LeMaster, 172 F.3d 756 (10th Cir. 1999). A pretrial detainee who was beaten by other inmates while confined in a jail brought a § 1983 action against the county sheriff individually and in his official capacity. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the sheriff and the detainee appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part and remanded. The detainee was arrested and placed in a general population cell in the county jail where he was threatened by another inmate. A jail officer took the detainee to an office where he prepared a written statement about the threat. But the officer returned the detainee to the general population cell where he was attacked and beaten by several inmates. The officer returned later and the detainee asked to be taken to the hospital. The officer took the detainee to an office, called an unknown person to ask for instructions, and then told the detainee "you are still conscious, we don't have to take you." The detainee was given aspirin, placed in a different cell and was released the next day. He went to the hospital after his release and was diagnosed with a severe contusion to the skull with post-concussion syndrome and a severe strain to the cervical, thoracic and lumbosacral spine. The appeals court held that the detainee failed to establish a claim for failure to provide adequate training and supervision of jail personnel because he failed to identify specific deficiencies that were closely related to his injuries. The court noted that evidence which showed that the jailers were generally poorly trained was insufficient to support the training and supervision claims. But the appeals court found that material issues of fact precluded summary judgment on the claim that the county maintained an unconstitutional policy of understaffing the jail and failing to monitor inmates, with deliberate indifference to inmate health or safety. The court noted that a suit against the sheriff in his official capacity is the equivalent of a suit against the county. The appeals court found that fact issues precluded summary judgment for the sheriff in his individual and official capacities on the detainee's failure to protect claims. The appeals court also held that summary judgment was precluded on the detainee's claim alleging that the sheriff was deliberately indifferent to his serious medical needs. The district court held that the inmate stated a claim of a serious injury and that an official's failure to procure adequate medical treatment after becoming aware of the injury would constitute deliberate indifference. The court also found that supervisors would not be liable for any claims arising from negligent supervision or training of a guard. The correctional official allegedly told the inmate that he could not be taken to a hospital and instructed another inmate to manually relocate the shoulder. The court found that the allegation that the warden ignored the inmate's written requests for medical treatment for more than two weeks for non-medical reasons, knew of the injuries and the prison staff's failure to provide standard emergency care and treatment, stated a claim of deliberate indifference. Smith v. Blue, 67 F.Supp.2d 686 (S.D.Tex. 1999). The parents of a juvenile who committed suicide while in custody at a juvenile detention center operated by a county sued the county and facility supervisors under § 1983. The district court declined to dismiss the case, finding that the parents stated a § 1983 claim against the county for violating the juvenile's Fourteenth Amendment right to medical protection against his own suicidal intentions, and that the parents stated a wrongful death claim. The court found that the facility supervisors' practice of pre-entering cell inspection records and then avoiding making actual visual checks on juveniles was so pervasive that is constituted a policy or custom and was the result of inadequate training. The court found that a wrongful death claim was stated by the allegation that the juvenile's death was caused by a bedsheet left unsupervised in his cell. At the time of his detention the juvenile had been diagnosed as suffering from attention deficit disorder and this was confirmed in evaluations done after his admission. During his four-month stay the juvenile allegedly threatened suicide and physically harmed himself on several occasions. When his behavior worsened to the point that he refused to come out of his cell and began hiding under his bed, he was placed in solitary confinement as punishment for refusing to follow directions. While in solitary confinement he was allowed to keep several personal items, including a towel, T-shirts, athletic shoes with laces, and a bed sheet. One evening he was found dead, hanged from a loose sprinkler head with a bedsheet. Written cell inspection reports indicated that staff had visually checked on the juvenile every 15 minutes until the discovery of his body, but a subsequent investigation revealed that the records had been altered after the body was discovered. The original records stated that the juvenile had been checked every fifteen minutes before his death and for four hours after his death. Staff admitted that it was routine practice to complete inspection reports beforehand and to fail to make the required visual checks. Investigators determined that the juvenile had been dead for an hour before his body was discovered, confirming that the 15-minute checks had not been conducted. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants, finding that the jail officials' failure to prevent the suicide did not violate sections 1985 and 1986 and that the city could not be held liable under § 1983. The court found that whether the jail officials handled the inmate under a mental health policy or under their suicide risk policy, they were no less diligent and were adequately trained in both policies. The court found that the city and the jail officials were not deliberately indifferent to the detainee's medical needs. The court held that the officials were not liable for failing to train jail officers and staff. The detainee died of asphyxiation and a spoon was found in his mouth. The administrix of the estate of a detainee who had died of alcohol withdrawal while in a county jail brought a § 1983 action against county officials alleging deliberate indifference to the deceased detainee's medical needs. The district court granted summary judgment, in part, in favor of the defendants. The district court held that the protections of the Eighth Amendment do not attach to pretrial detainees and that the Captain of the jail was not deliberately indifferent to the needs of the detainee by failing to act when he was left in a single-occupancy cell with no medical care. The court also held that jail supervisors were not liable for failure to supervise their subordinates. The court noted that the jail Captain had no contact with the detainee during his incarceration and knew nothing about the incarceration until after the detainee's death, and that the supervisors did not implicitly authorize, approve or acquiesce in their subordinates' failure to provide medical treatment to the detainee. According to the court, the jailers' failure to provide medical care to the detainee over the course of six days was not a pattern of unconstitutional conduct. The court cited hundreds of other instances in which other inmates received medical attention. But the court denied summary judgment for the sheriff and the county, finding that it was precluded by issues of fact as to whether their failure to ensure that adequate staffing, medical training, and supervision policies were in place and were enforced. Daniels v. Delaware, 120 F.Supp.2d 411 (D.Del. 2000). A state inmate who had been raped by a correctional officer and became pregnant as a result, sued prison officials under § 1983 and the Violence Against Women Act (VAWA). The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court held that the inmate failed to establish that the officials had been deliberately indifferent to her health and safety, even though they had previously investigated the correctional officer for taking female inmates outside their cells after lockdown. The court noted that there was no evidence that the previous incident involved sexual misconduct and the officials had disciplined the officer and changed lock down procedures following the investigation. The court found that the inmate failed to establish a failure to train violation because the prison's training programs were found to be sufficient under national standards promulgated by the American Correctional Association. The offending officer had received an adequate number of training hours and the prison had received an award of excellence for its training programs. The officer's training had included training in cultural awareness, which included training in sexual harassment and inmate treatment, and he was trained regarding the prison's code of conduct, which prohibited sexual contact between inmates and guards. The court noted that personnel training standards for correctional institutions that were promulgated by national groups do not necessarily equate with the training standards required by the Eighth Amendment. According to the court, while the recommendations of such groups may be instructive in certain cases they simply do not establish constitutional minima, but rather establish goals recommended by the organization. Daskalea v. District of Columbia, 227 F.3d 433 (D.C.Cir. 2000). A former District of Columbia jail inmate who had been forced to perform a striptease in front of other prisons and male and female guards, sued the District and corrections officials for § 1983 violations. The district court entered a jury verdict awarding $350,000 in compensatory and $5 million in punitive damages, and denied the defendants' motion for judgment as a matter of law. The appeals court affirmed in part and reversed in part. The appeals court held that the $350,000 award for mental and emotional distress resulting from the § 1983 violation was reasonable, but that the former inmate was not entitled to punitive damages from the District for negligent supervision, because District law bars the imposition of such awards against the District. The mental and emotional distress award was supported, according to the court, by the fact that the inmate was denied library assistance because she refused to have sex with the librarian, she was attacked with the assistance of correctional officers, she was confined in isolation without underwear or a mattress, she felt constant stress, anxiety and dread of imminent sexual attack, she had to sleep during the day for fear of what guards might do to her at night, she suffered from insomnia and eating disorders, and spent months emotionally and psychologically debilitated, withdrawn and depressed. The appeals court agreed with the jury finding that the District's failure to train or supervise jail employees amounted to deliberate indifference toward the female inmate's constitutional rights, so that the District was liable under § 1983. The court noted that seven months prior to this incident the district court had found the District liable under § 1983 for being deliberately indifferent to repeated sexual abuse and harassment of female prisoners by correctional officers and for failing to train staff to prevent such misconduct. According to the court, the fact that the District jail officers sought to conceal the incident did not insulate the District from § 1983 liability based on its deliberate indifference. Broulette v. Starns, 161 F.Supp.2d 1021 (D.Ariz. 2001). A state inmate brought a § 1983 action alleging that prison officials wrongfully withheld copies of an adult magazine to which he subscribed. The district court held that the magazines were not obscene, the prison officials were not entitled to qualified immunity from liability, and that punitive damages were not warranted. The court found the magazines, Hustler, were not obscene, even though the court noted that taken as a whole, the magazines clearly appealed to prurient interest and depicted or described sexual activity in a patently offensive way. But the magazines could not be withheld from the inmate as obscene because they appeared to "deliberately include content" that required anyone applying the constitutional standard to conclude that it had some serious, literary, artistic, political or scientific value. The court denied qualified immunity to the prison officials because it concluded that no state prison official who objectively applied the obscenity standard could have believed that the adult magazines did not comply with the standard. But the court held that an official's refusal to deliver copies of the magazines to the inmate was not in reckless or callous disregard of the inmate's First Amendment rights, but rather that the official suffered from a lack of training and understanding of the fact that pornography and obscenity were not the same thing. The court declined to subject the official to punitive damages. (Arizona Department of Corrections)

Craw v. Gray, 159 F.Supp.2d 679 (N.D.Ohio 2001). An arrestee sued law enforcement officers under § 1983 asserting claims for use of excessive force. The district court granted partial summary judgment in favor of the officers, finding that the allegations did not support a claim for inadequate training of an officer and that past "use of force" incident reports did not support the claim for inadequate supervision of the officer. According to the court, the assertion that a particular officer may be unsatisfactorily trained does not alone "suffice to fasten § 1983 liability" on a municipality for failure to train. The court noted that none of the reports showed that the deputy acted improperly. The officer had brought the arrestee to a county jail and during the booking process an altercation between the arrestee and the officer resulted in a right hip fracture and dislocation for the arrestee. Gailor v. Armstrong, 187 F.Supp.2d 729 (W.D.Ky. 2001). The estate of a deceased pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against a county and correctional officers for the beating death of the detainee by officers. The district granted summary judgment in favor of the county, finding that there was insufficient evidence to hold the county liable, but denied summary judgment for the officers. The court held that fact issues remained as to whether the officers' use of force was excessive. The court ruled that the officers and their supervisor were not entitled to qualified immunity. The court held that the county was not liable under § 1983 because evidence that the officers failed to follow the county's use of force policy, officials allegedly falsified reports, and evidence that some officers received only limited use of force training, did not demonstrate custom or usage necessary to support a § 1983 claim. The court denied summary judgment for a supervisor who allegedly failed to intervene when she saw excessive force being used against the detainee. Lewis v. Board of Sedgwick County Com'rs., 140 F.Supp.2d 1125 (D.Kan. 2001). A detainee brought a federal civil rights suit against a county alleging that jail officers used excessive force against him. A jury returned a verdict of $500,000 in favor of the inmate and the county asked for a new trial or for judgment as a matter of law. The district court granted judgment as a matter of law, finding that evidence was insufficient to show that the county had been deliberately indifferent to the use of excessive force against detainees at the county detention facility. According to the court, the size of the damage award suggested that the jury was excessively or improperly motivated by its desire to punish the county. The court held that the county was not deliberately indifferent to the rights of the detainee because it provided training designed to prevent the use of excessive force at both a training academy and on-the-job, and had established a use-of-force policy of which its detention officers were aware. The court found that it was not a "glaring omission" to fail to instruct detention officers during training that they were prohibited from standing on a detainee's back in an effort to restrain a person. The court held that it was not deliberate indifference by the county to state in county training manuals that it was permissible to use pressure point tactics when inmates were being placed in a restraint chair, where the manuals cautioned that the tactics were to be used with the minimal amount of force necessary to gain compliance.(Sedgwick County Adult Detention Facility, Kansas)

Tlamka v. Serrell, 244 F.3d 628 (8th Cir. 2001). The son of an inmate who died after he suffered a heart attack in state prison brought a § 1983 action against corrections officers. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants and the son appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, and reversed and remanded in part. The appeals court held that summary judgment was precluded for the officers. The court remanded to case to settle fact issues as to whether the officers' ten-minute delay in providing emergency treatment to the inmate, who was having a heart attack, was an intentional delay. The court found that the warden and corrections director were not liable under § 1983 for failing to adequately train officers, noting that all new corrections officers were trained in cardiopulmonary resuscitation (CPR) and their training was updated as necessary. Watkins v. City of Battle Creek, 273 F.3d 682 (6th Cir. 2001). The personal representative of the estate of a prisoner who died in jail custody, after denying that he had ingested cocaine and refusing medical treatment, brought a federal civil rights suit against a city, county and various officials and employees. The district court entered summary judgment for the defendants and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the arresting officers and jail personnel were not deliberately indifferent to the detainee's rights in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment, and that the detainee was not punished in violation of the Fifth Amendment. The court found that the city and county could not be held liable for failure to train, in the absence of a constitutional violation by individual defendants. According to the court, jail personnel were not deliberately indifferent to the medical needs of the detainee even though he exhibited some behavioral symptoms at the time of intake, where the personnel asked the detainee whether he had swallowed drugs, stated that they would get him medical help if he had and that he would not face additional charges, and generally kept him under observation even though one officer failed to do so. Young v. City of Mount Ranier, 238 F.3d 567 (4th Cir. 2001). The parents of a boy who died in custody brought state law negligence, wrongful death claims, and constitutional claims under § 1983. Following removal from state court, the federal district court dismissed the complaint and the parents appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part and dismissed in part. The appeals court held that the conduct of officers who took the boy into custody for emergency psychiatric evaluation fell within the "middle range of culpability," between gross negligence and intentional misconduct, noting that the boy was owed the same duties owed to a more typical pretrial detainee. The appeals court held that the conduct of the officers fell short of deliberate indifference, as needed to establish § 1983 liability. The boy had resisted when officers tried to take him into custody. The officers used pepper spray to subdue him and then handcuffed him and placed him face down in the back seat of their police car. He was transported to a local hospital where he was found to have no pulse and efforts to resuscitate him failed. (Mount Ranier Police Dept., Maryland)

Bobbitt v. Detroit Edison Co., 216 F.Supp.2d 669 (E.D.Mich. 2002). An arrestee filed a § 1983 action in state court alleging that city police officers violated her constitutional rights in connection with her arrest for disorderly conduct. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court held that the arrestee failed to establish liability with her allegations that a city jail was not clean, did not provide sufficient seating, and did not provide ready access to a telephone. According to the court, the arrestee's assertions that the city maintained inadequate policies for training and hiring its police officers, and that an arresting officer had been involved in one other incident of alleged misconduct, were insufficient to subject the city to liability under § 1983 for failing to provide adequate training. The arrestee alleged she was forced to stand for approximately five hours in a police holding cell, that the cell contained only a 4-inch concrete slab on which to sit, and that the slab was too low. Bozeman v. Orum, 199 F.Supp.2d 1216 (M.D.Ala. 2002). The representative of the estate of a pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against a sheriff and officials at a county detention facility, alleging that the detainee's death was the result constitutional violations. The district court held that detention officers' use of force to restrain the detainee did not violate his Fourteenth Amendment right against the use of excessive force, even though the officers threatened to "kick" the detainee's "ass." The officers apparently punched or slapped the detainee, and the detainee died as the result of the officers' actions, but the court found that some level of force was necessary to restore order where the detainee was apparently undergoing a mental breakdown in his cell. According to the court, the facility provided adequate training in the proper use of deadly force, including warnings on the dangers of positional asphyxia, and was therefore not liable under § 1983 for failing to supervise staff. Foster v. Fulton County, Georgia, 223 F.Supp.2d 1292 (N.D.Ga. 2002). Inmates at a county jail, who had tested positive for human immunodeficiency virus (HIV), brought an action complaining of their conditions of confinement and inadequate medical care. The parties entered into a settlement agreement. Two years later the district court responded to a report that described ten areas in which the county had failed to comply with the terms of the settlement. The court held that continued overcrowding at the jail deprived the HIV-positive inmates of their constitutional right to minimal civilized measures of life's necessities. The court ordered the county to institute additional measures to reduce crowding, including: providing counsel within 72 hours of arrest to all persons accused of minor offenses who could not make bail; expanding the authority of Pretrial Services to include supervision of persons arrested for misdemeanor offenses; eliminating any unreasonable factors used to exclude persons charged with felonies from pretrial release; ensuring persons charged with misdemeanors were offered a reasonable bond; and imposing additional restrictions on the length of time a person could remain in jail without accusation or indictment, or accused or indicted but untried. The court found the county had violated the settlement agreement by failing to refer HIV-positive inmates to outside specialists in a timely manner when the jail's own staff lacked the resources to provide timely care. The court noted that even though the county had eliminated its financial review procedures, other bureaucratic problems remained and resulted in delays of three weeks to six months. The court held that the county failed to employ sufficient numbers of trained correctional staff to meet the health needs of HIV-positive inmates. The court ordered the county to immediately develop and implement a plan to increase security staffing at the jail to the level necessary to provide timely access to medical care for the current population of inmates. The estate of a cooperating witness in a murder investigation brought civil rights, civil rights conspiracy, and state law claims against a police officer and city. The witness had been murdered after police released a prisoner's letter that identified the witness. The district court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment. The court found that there was no clearly established right at the time of the murder, that required police or jail officers to embargo or detain threatening prison mail or to protect cooperating confidential informants from retaliatory violence. The court noted that the officer who released the prisoner's letter repeatedly warned the informant and took steps to help the informant leave the state and to protect him. The court found that the city's failure to provide more training to police officers in prisoner-rights law or the regulation of jail correspondence, was inadequate to support civil rights liability for the city under a failure-to-train theory. The inmate sought nominal, compensatory and punitive damages. The district court held that prison officials could not be held liable for failure to train or adequately supervise a classification officer who denied the former inmate's informal grievance. But the court found that fact issues precluded summary judgment on the claim that the classification officer violated the former inmate's right to timely release from prison. The court also found that other prison officials were not entitled to qualified immunity. (Florida Department of Corrections)

Smith v. Board of County Com'rs. of County of Lyon, 216 F.Supp.2d 1209 (D.Kan. 2002). A prisoner brought state tort and federal Eighth Amendment claims against county officials arising out of a serious spinal chord injury he allegedly suffered in a fall, and for which he did not receive requested medical attention. The defendants moved for summary judgment and the district court granted the motions in part, and denied in part. The district court found no Eighth Amendment violation from the failure of jail staff to provide clean bedding and clothing to the inmate who suffered from incontinence, on four or five occasions. The court concluded that the inmate's complaint that officials failed to supervise jail staff to ensure compliance with procedures was "far too generic" to support an Eighth Amendment claim, and that he failed to show systemic and gross deficiencies in training jail personnel. The inmate was a trustee in the jail and alleged that he fell while working in the kitchen and sustained injuries. An officer noticed the inmate limping about a week after the alleged fall and immediately took the inmate to the jail medical room for evaluation. The inmate also alleged that the jail failed to follow certain national standards, but according to the court, failed to show that the jail had any duty to follow those national standards. The officials asserted that the minimum legal standards for the operation of county jails are established in state law, rather than by national standards. (Lyon County Jail, Kansas)

The district court denied summary judgment to the defendants and they appealed. The appeals court reversed, finding that the prison officer did not show callous indifference to the prisoner and was therefore entitled to qualified immunity, and that the prison warden and supervisor did not violate the Eighth Amendment by filing to-train the officer. The court noted that the officer had no warning that the prisoner was at risk because he did not know about an argument between the prisoner and another inmate, and he observed the two watching television together later in the evening. According to the court, the officer received proper training by having completed a six-week training course at the state's corrections training academy and receiving subsequent on-the-job training. A detainee brought a § 1983 action alleging that he was subjected to an unconstitutional strip search, and that he had been subjected to sexual harassment while confined. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court held that the strip search violated the detainee's Fourth Amendment rights, but that officials were not liable for the unwarranted strip search conducted by an officer. The court also held that a single complaint of sexual misconduct against an officer did not put the police department on notice of the need for increased supervision of the officer. The detainee was a passenger in a car in which marijuana was found, but the driver's wife had told the arresting officer that the marijuana belonged to the driver. There was no reasonable suspicion that the detainee was concealing a weapon, but he was subjected to a strip search anyway. The detainee had been taken to the police station where he was never booked, but was subjected to a strip search that was conducted in a bathroom. The detainee was then taken to the officer's home where the officer discussed oral sex. The detainee fled from the officer's home. The court noted that the officer's violation of the detainee's rights was deliberate, and that no amount of training would have prevented the violation. The court also noted that the police chief had attempted to investigate an earlier complaint of sexual misconduct lodged against the officer. (City of Clanton, Alabama)

The court held that summary judgment was precluded by fact issues as to whether the city had a policy or custom of jail mismanagement, and whether any policy or custom caused the inmate's death. The court also found that there were fact issues as to whether the sheriff violated the Eighth Amendment regarding jail overcrowding. The sheriff was not found liable for failure to train her staff, where she had an illness-recognition and response program in place which consisted of initial and follow-up training, combined with surprise inspections. The court noted that the guards' failure to respond to the obvious illness of the inmate could be attributed to their failure to apply their training, for which the sheriff was not responsible. Ginest v. Board of County Com'rs. of Carbon County, 333 F.Supp.2d 1190 (D.Wyo. 2004). County jail inmates brought a class action against a county and sheriff, alleging deliberate indifference to the inmates' medical needs, and seeking declaratory and injunctive relief. Following the entry of a consent decree governing medical care, the inmates sought a contempt order, alleging specific violations of the decree's terms. The defendants moved to terminate the consent decree. The district court held that the county was potentially liable, and the sheriff was potentially liable for failure to train. The court found that the constitutional rights of the inmates were violated by inadequate medical care and inadequate medical records at the jail, including lack of training in suicide prevention. According to the court, jail medical records that are inadequate, inaccurate and unprofessionally maintained are actionable under the Eighth Amendment. The court found that many physician progress notes and other medical records were missing, there was no written definition of a medical emergency requiring immediate care, there were numerous delays in responding to inmate requests for medical care, there was no suicide prevention training nor written policies, and potentially suicidal inmates were often isolated physically and provided with little or no counseling. The court held that summary judgment for a detention officer was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the officer acted with deliberate indifference when she did not ensure that the detainee was taken to an emergency room following a display of abnormal behavior after he suffered a serious head or brain injury following a blow. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants and the mother appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, and reversed in part and remanded. The appeals court held that the sheriff was not entitled to qualified immunity, where the sheriff knew of, but did not investigate, the arrestee's earlier suicide attempt at a jail from which he was transferred, did not permit a jailer to complete the arrestee's intake form, placed the arrestee in a cell alone with a bed sheet and exposed ceiling bars, and ordered the jailer not to enter the arrestee's cell without backup and yet left the jailer as the only staff member on duty at the jail. Before the arrestee was transferred to the jail in which he committed suicide, he had told jail staff that "he was going to hang it up" and shortly thereafter he was found in his cell with a bed sheet tied around his neck. During his processing into the next jail he told staff he did not want to return to prison, and that he would die and take someone with him if he received more than a 15 year sentence. The district court denied the sheriff's motion for summary judgment and the sheriff appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the arrestee had a clearly established Fourteenth Amendment right to be protected from the known risks of suicide, and two prior suicides in the county jail should have put the sheriff on notice that his suicide prevention training needed revision. The court held that the representative stated a supervisory liability claim under the due process clause, noting that a supervisor may be held liable under § 1983 if a failure to properly supervise and train an employee causes a deprivation of constitutional rights. The administratrix of the estate of a pretrial detainee who had committed suicide in a county jail brought a § 1983 action against a private contractor hired by the county to provide medical and mental health services at the jail, and against the contractor's agents. The district court entered judgment on a jury verdict against the contractor and the contractor's social worker, awarding $250,000 in compensatory damages and $1.5 million in punitive damages, and denied motions for summary judgment as a matter of law. The contractor appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the contractor's employee's lack of training and carelessness were relevant toward establishing deliberate indifference, even though the employee herself was not found liable. The court held that the fact that no previous suicides had occurred in the jail did not preclude the contractor's liability. According to the appeals court, the district court did not abuse its discretion by letting the punitive damages award stand. The estate proffered evidence that the contractor failed to adequately train its employees and condoned employees' failure to complete mental health intake forms and the social worker's practice of challenging suicide watch referrals. According to the court, employees knew that the detainee was suicidal but failed several time to place him on suicide watch, in violation of its own written procedures. The court found that evidence of an alcohol-impaired nurse, intake backlogs, and claims of delayed or denied medical care to other inmates was relevant to the contractor's state of mind and was therefore admissible. The district court held that fact issues remained as to whether a prison supervisor adequately trained correctional officers with respect to the use of four-point restraints, and failed to respond to reports and complaints of use of force against the inmate. The court denied qualified immunity, finding that a reasonable prison official ought to have understood in 1998 that it was a constitutional violation to restrain a mentally ill prisoner for twenty-two hours, with no penal justification, no food or water, and no access to a bathroom. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants in part, and denied it in part. The court held that fact issues existed as to whether the borough had a policy or custom of detaining juveniles for underage drinking. The court also found fact issues as to whether officers' conduct was reckless or callous with respect to the force used in the arrest. The child alleged that he was tackled into cement steps, punched in the face, kicked in the face and that his arm was pulled so hard that it broke his shoulder. Estate of Adbollahi v. County of Sacramento, 405 F.Supp.2d 1194 (E.D.Cal. 2005). Representatives of the estates of two county jail detainees, and one inmate, who committed suicide while in their cells brought a § 1983 action. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants in part, and denied in part. The court held that the county was not liable for failing to train jail personnel in suicide prevention where the county had a policy of periodic observation of cell occupants. The court noted that an officer, lacking knowledge that a detainee was suicidal, made no observations, and falsely entered on duty logs that he had done so. The court found that summary judgment was precluded by material issues of fact as to whether a jail commander ratified or encouraged the practice of "pencil-whipping," which involved making false entries on records showing observations of cell occupants that were not actually made. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by material issues of fact as to whether the county knowingly established a policy of providing an inadequate number of cell inspections and of falsifying logs showing completion of cell inspections, creating a substantial risk of harm to suicide-prone cell occupants. The court ruled that the sheriff and jail commander had immunity under state law from liability claims that there were holes in the bunks that could be used for death by hanging, where use of the bunk holes for suicide was not foreseeable. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by material issues of fact as to whether a county jail nurse ratified, condoned, and encouraged the deliberately indifferent behavior of a social worker who conducted an allegedly perfunctory interview of an inmate who later committed suicide. The court found that summary judgment was precluded by material issues of fact as to whether a psychiatric services clinician satisfied applicable standards of care, under state law. The personal representative of the estate of a pretrial detainee who had committed suicide while in a police cell at a hospital brought a § 1983 action alleging inadequate medical treatment and failure to adequately monitor the detainee. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants and the personal representative appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the city could not be held liable for deliberate indifference given the absence of an obvious and clear suicide risk. The court concluded that an officer enjoyed qualified immunity because the detainee's pre-suicide behavior did not give rise to a duty to monitor for suicide. The detainee had registered only physical complaints and had engaged in no self-injurious behavior at the hospital. The officer was not aware of, and could not be charged with knowledge of the detainee's behavior prior to reaching the hospital, according to the court. The court found that the city could not be held liable for failure to adequately train its officers regarding suicides, where officers complied with city policies regarding medical care, including screening by an intake nurse at the hospital, and no previous inmate suicides had occurred in the hospital cells. Although the detainee had been destructive before he was transferred to the hospital--ripping a phone from his cell wall and breaking a sink and toilet-- the court noted that none of his destructive acts had been self-directed. Harvey v. County of Ward, 352 F.Supp.2d 1003 (D.N.D. 2005). The surviving spouse of a jail inmate who died after a suicide attempt brought an action under § 1983 and state law, alleging deliberate indifference to the inmate's known risk of suicide. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The district court held that the plaintiff failed to establish that the sheriff and jail administrator knew of the inmate's potential risk of suicide. According to the court, evidence of conversations between the spouse and jail employees about the inmate's suicide risk, an officer's note that the inmate's wife thought that they should keep an eye on the inmate, and another officer's report that the inmate may have been trying to save up some of his medications to take at another time, was insufficient to establish that the sheriff and jail administrator knew of the inmate's potential risk of suicide. The court found that the county was not deliberately indifferent to the training of its employees on inmate suicide prevention. The court held that the jail's suicide prevention policy appeared reasonable and comprised an effort to prevent suicides, even if the policy had not been updated in recent years, and the jail was not accredited by the American Correctional Association (ACA). The court noted that the policy set forth a detailed list of factors to identify potentially suicidal inmates, set forth a procedure for identification and screening of inmates, and required ongoing training in the implementation of suicide prevention and intervention for all staff. Jeanty v. County of Orange, 379 F.Supp.2d 533 (S.D.N.Y. 2005). A county jail inmate whose arm was broken in an altercation with corrections officers sued the officers and the county, alleging excessive use of force. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants in part, and denied it in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by fact issues as to whether excessive force was applied when the officers allegedly beat the prisoner in his cell to the point of breaking his arm, and wantonly ignored his cries of pain and pleas that they desist. The court also found that summary judgment was precluded by issues of fact as to whether the officers were entitled to qualified immunity. According to the court, the conviction of the inmate for assaulting an officer, arising out of the same incident, did not preclude the inmate's claim. The court held that the Eighth Amendment, not the Fourteenth Amendment, applied to this action because the inmate had been convicted of arson and was awaiting sentencing. Mann ex rel. Terrazas v. Lopez, 404 F.Supp.2d 932 (W.D.Tex. 2005). Representatives of the estates of two detainees who had committed suicide while confined brought an action against a sheriff and jail officers, alleging failure to supervise and failure to train. The district court found that the sheriff was entitled to qualified immunity for failing to prevent the detainees' suicides, where there was no evidence that the sheriff was personally aware of any suicidal thoughts the detainees might have had and did not personally direct any actions involving the detainees during their incarceration. The court ordered further proceedings to determine if the sheriff's failure to modify his policies regarding potentially suicidal detainees was an intentional choice, or merely unintentionally negligent oversight. One inmate was known to have mental health problems and was housed in a mental health unit that provided a 1 to 18 officer to inmate ratio, compared to the 1 to 48 ratio required by state standards. The inmate hanged himself using a torn-up bed sheet. The other inmate was being held in a new detox cell and was founding hanging four minute after she had been visually observed by an officer. She also used a bed sheet to hang herself. (Bexar County Adult Detention Center, Texas)

Miller v. Calhoun County, 408 F.3d 803 (6th Cir. 2005). The sister of a detainee, who died of a brain tumor while in pretrial custody in a county facility, brought a wrongful death action under § 1983 alleging deliberate indifference to the detainee's medical needs and gross negligence. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants and the sister appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that county did not have a custom or policy of deliberate indifference so as to support a § 1983 claim, given that there was no evidence of a clear and consistent pattern of mistreatment of detainees, and that the shift commander followed the county's policy and contacted the on-call doctor. The court found that the shift commander did not act with deliberate indifference, noting that he questioned the detainee about his fall in the cell, promptly consulted the on-call physician, and placed the detainee under observation. The court noted that the sheriff had appointed a training coordinator for the facility, sought accreditation for the facility, requested bids for medical services, changed medical providers, formulated a policy for medical care at the facility, and initiated an investigation into the detainee's death. The 44-year-old detainee had told facility staff at the time of admission that he had sustained a head injury a month earlier. (Calhoun County Correctional Facility, Michigan)

Niemyjski v. City of Albuquerque, 379 F.Supp.2d 1221 (D.N.M. 2005). An arrestee brought a state court action against a city, alleging that police officers committed a civil rights violation in connection with his arrest and detention. The action was removed to federal court, where the district court granted summary judgment for the city and remanded state law claims. The court held that the arrestee failed to show that a municipal custom or policy contributed to the alleged violations. The court noted that the city's policy manual stated that staff were required to received training in the legitimate use of force and restraints, and that no correctional officer was permitted to work with inmates until and unless such training was successfully completed. The arrestee had been placed in a holding cell. When he was denied the opportunity to make a telephone call he protested by refusing to have his photograph taken. Because of his resistance, jail officers used force to position him to take his photograph. The arrestee and the officers later traded racial insults. He was taken up stairs rather than an elevator, and he fell down and alleged that officers punched and kicked him resulting in an injury to his ribs. He was released less than 24 hours after his arrest on a warrant. (Bernalillo County Det. Center, New Mexico)

Woloszyn v. County of Lawrence, 396 F.3d 314 (3rd Cir. 2005). The administratrix of a pretrial detainee who committed suicide in jail brought a § 1983 action and wrongful death claims against and county and corrections officers. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants and the administratrix appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the administratrix failed to establish that the corrections officers were aware of the detainee's vulnerability to suicide. The court noted that even though a captain said he would put the detainee on five-minute checks, he also said that he would follow a nurse's advice. The nurse found the detainee to be polite, cooperative and alert, and cleared the detainee for one-hour checks for signs of alcohol withdrawal. The detainee told a booking officer he was not suicidal and appeared to be in good spirits. The court also held that the fact that a breathing mask was not in its designated location did not constitute deliberate indifference. Upon finding the detainee hanging by a sheet, officers immediately initiated CPR without waiting for the protective mask to arrive, they continued CPR until a protective breathing mask arrived, and the administratrix did not claim that immediate use of the protective mask would have prevented the detainee's death. The court found that the administratrix's expert failed to identify what specific type of training would have alerted officers to the fact that the detainee was suicidal. Ziemba v. Armstrong, 430 F.3d 623 (2nd Cir. 2005). A state prison inmate brought a civil rights action alleging that prison officials failed to provide constitutionally-adequate health care, failed to protect him from the use of excessive force, and used excessive force. The district court granted summary judgment for the officials, in part, and they appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part and remanded. The court held that evidence was sufficient to establish that a state corrections commissioner exhibited deliberate indifference to the inmate's constitutional rights or was grossly negligent in training subordinates, and that evidence was sufficient to impose supervisory liability on a prison warden. The inmate was allegedly placed in four-point restraints for 22 hours, beaten, and denied medical care. The court found that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether a prison nurse and medic were deliberately indifference to the inmate's serious medical needs. Buchanan v. Maine, 417 F.Supp.2d 24 (D.Me. 2006). The personal representative of a mentally ill suspect who had been fatally shot by a deputy sheriff brought an action against a state, county, and various officials and officers, alleging civil rights violations. The county and officers moved for summary judgment, which the district court granted. The court held that the deputy sheriffs' warrantless entry of a mentally ill suspect's home was reasonable under the Fourth Amendment, pursuant to the emergency doctrine. According to the court, the deputies had reasonable belief that the suspect posed an immediate threat to his own safety, and developing circumstances at the scene, the late time of day, winter conditions, and the remote location of the suspect's residence made it more reasonable for deputies to enter the home immediately instead of obtaining a warrant. The court found that the personal representative failed to establish that a reasonable officer would have understood his conduct in entering the suspect's home without a warrant contravened clearly established law, and thus the deputies were entitled to qualified immunity as to the Fourth Amendment claim. The court concluded that the deputies would have had reasonable grounds to believe that the protective custody criteria under state law were met. According to the court, a deputy sheriff's shooting of a mentally ill suspect after he had stabbed another deputy did not constitute excessive force, and thus was reasonable under the Fourth Amendment. The other deputy was attacked after attempting to take the suspect into protective custody, and the deputy who shot the suspect had reasonable belief that the other deputy was threatened with death or serious physical injury. The court held that the personal representative failed to demonstrate that the county had a custom or policy relating to mentally ill persons that resulted in deprivation of Fourth Amendment rights, as required to establish the county's municipal liability under § 1983. According to the court, there was no evidence that the county's alleged failure to train officers constituted a well-settled and widespread custom or practice, and that there was no need for increased training in proper methods for making warrantless arrests or for engaging mentally ill and potentially combative persons when the deputy was hired. Long v. County of Los Angeles, 442 F.3d 1178 (9th Cir. 2006). The widow of an inmate in a county jail brought a § 1983 action in state court against the county and others, alleging failure to adequately train jail medical staff, leading to the denial of adequate medical care which resulted in the inmate's death. Following removal to federal court, the district court granted the county's motion for summary judgment and the widow appealed. The court of appeals reversed and remanded, finding that a genuine issue of material fact existed regarding whether the county's policy of relying on medical professionals, without offering training on how to implement procedures for documenting, monitoring, and assessing inmates in the medical unit of the jail, amounted to deliberate indifference to the inmates' serious medical needs. The court also found that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact regarding whether the county's failure to implement specific policies regarding the treatment of inmates in the medical unit of the jail amounted to a failure to train the jail's medical staff on how to treat inmates, and whether the policies were the moving force behind the inmate's death. The 71-year-old inmate was serving a 120-day jail sentence, and he suffered from congestive heart failure and other ailments. Over a period of eighteen days his medical condition deteriorated, and although nurses saw him several times during that period, there is no record of a doctor's examination until the morning of the 18th day, hours before he died of cardiac arrest. Plemmons v. Roberts, 439 F.3d 818 (8th Cir. 2006). A county jail inmate who had been arrested for failing to pay child support brought a § 1983 action against a county, county sheriff, and corrections officers, alleging deliberate indifference to his serious medical needs. The district court denied the defendants' motion for summary judgment and they appealed. The court of appeals held that genuine issues of material fact as to whether the county jail inmate suffered from a serious heart condition, whether jail officials were notified of the inmate's history of heart problems, whether officials failed to recognize that the inmate was suffering from the symptoms of a heart attack that would be obvious to a lay person, whether the officials acted promptly to obtain necessary medical help, and whether the officials were properly trained to deal with such a medical emergency, precluded summary judgment in favor of the defendants. According to the court, the corrections officers' alleged delay in providing medical care to the inmate who was having a heart attack constituted conduct that violated clearly established law, and therefore the officers were not entitled to qualified immunity in the inmate's § 1983 Eighth Amendment deliberate indifference claim. The inmate alleged that two officers inexcusably delayed in summoning an ambulance even though he had told them that he had a history of heart trouble. The court noted that the medical intake form completed by one of the officers did not contain any mention of heart problems. (Pulaski County Jail, Missouri)

Stephens v. Correctional Services Corp., 428 F.Supp.2d 580 (E.D.Tex. 2006). A pretrial detainee brought an action against a private jail corporation, alleging civil rights violations and common law negligence stemming from an attack while he was incarcerated. The corporation moved for dismissal. The district court held that the corporation was not entitled to state sovereign immunity and that the corporation was potentially liable under § 1983. The court found that the detainee properly stated a negligence claim, and also a viable claim for failure to train and/or supervise. The court noted that although the establishment and maintenance of jails were "governmental functions" under state law, jail services provided by a private entity were not. The detainee alleged that the corporation had a duty to protect his well-being and to ensure his reasonable safety while incarcerated, and that the corporation breached such duty by not properly segregating him from violent inmates who threatened his life. He alleged that he informed officials of the death threats and they took no action, and that he was severely beaten by three prisoners and suffered life-threatening injuries. Two separate actions were brought against a county and individual officers arising out of a police shooting and the subsequent detention of witnesses to the shooting. The district court granted the officers' motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity. The appeals court held that the 90-minute detention of witnesses to a police shooting was not reasonable for investigative purposes under the Fourth Amendment, but that the constitutional rights of the witnesses to a police shooting to not be detained for 90 minutes following the shooting was not clearly established at the time. According to the court, the witnesses to the shooting failed to establish the county's policy or custom to train its officers concerning the constitutional limitations on detention of witnesses in connection with the police shooting investigations. Wilson v. Maricopa County, 463 F.Supp.2d 987 (D.Ariz. 2006). In a civil rights suit arising from a fatal assault on a county jail inmate by other inmates, the county defendants filed motions for summary judgment on all claims. The plaintiffs filed a motion for reconsideration of the court's order that had dismissed the county sheriff's office. The summary judgment motions were granted in part and denied in part; the motion for reconsideration was denied. The court held that summary judgment on Eighth Amendment liability for the fatal assault on the inmate was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to: (1) whether the county, through its final policy maker the sheriff, implemented policies, customs, and practices with the requisite subjective intent of deliberate indifference; (2) whether the county, through the sheriff, failed to act in the face of obvious omissions and likely constitutional violations; and (3) whether that failure to act caused a constitutional violation. The court held that the estate sufficiently alleged a § 1983 claim against the sheriff in his individual capacity by alleging that the sheriff was directly liable under § 1983 for being deliberately indifferent in failing to supervise and train jail officers in appropriate, lawful, and constitutional policies and procedures for providing a safe environment for inmates. The court also found that the estate sufficiently alleged a claim that the sheriff was deliberately indifferent in fostering, encouraging, and knowingly accepting formal and informal jail policies condoning brutality among the inmates and indifference to proper supervision. According to the court, a jail supervisor could be found to have been deliberately indifferent to the safety of the inmate if he knew that not having an officer on the ground in the jail yard posed a risk of violence among the inmates and nonetheless allowed an officer to cover both the yard and another post, which required the officer to leave the yard unattended for a significant period of time. Banks v. York, 515 F.Supp.2d 89 (D.D.C. 2007). A detainee in a jail operated by the District of Columbia Department of Corrections (DOC), and in a correctional treatment facility operated by the District's private contractor, brought a § 1983 action against District employees and contractor's employees alleging negligent supervision under District of Columbia law, over-detention, deliberate indifference to serious medical needs, harsh living conditions in jail, and extradition to Virginia without a hearing. The district court granted the defendants' motion to dismiss in part and denied in part. The court held that the detainee sufficiently alleged that the Director of District of Columbia Department of Corrections (DOC) was directly involved in violations of the detainee's constitutional rights, as required to state a claim under § 1983 against a government official in his individual capacity. The detainee alleged that the Director refused to transfer the detainee from the jail to a correctional treatment facility and failed to train DOC employees under his supervision in such a way as to prevent the detainee's over-detention (detention beyond proper release date). The court found that the Director of District of Columbia Department of Corrections (DOC) could not be liable in his individual capacity, under the theory of respondeat superior, to the jail detainee for allegedly unconstitutional actions or omissions of his subordinates. The appeals court found that the detainee's allegation that policies or practices of the District of Columbia Department of Corrections (DOC) pertaining to training, supervision and discipline of employees responsible for the detainees' release from DOC custody resulted in his untimely release from jail, in violation of his constitutional rights, stated a claim for municipal liability under § 1983. The court found that the detainee's allegations that the Director of the Department of Corrections (DOC), despite his actual and constructive knowledge that DOC employees were engaged in conduct that posed a pervasive and unreasonable risk of constitutional injury through over-detention, failed to train, monitor, and discipline DOC employees with regard to the timely release of inmates from DOC custody, and that the Director's deliberate failure to do so caused detainee's over-detention, were sufficient when construed liberally to state a claim under § 1983 for violation of due process and violation of protection against cruel and unusual punishment. The court noted that the detainee had a clearly established constitutional protection against over-detention and thus, the Director was not entitled to qualified immunity. Branton v. City of Moss Point, 503 F.Supp.2d 809 (S.D.Miss. 2007). The son of a pre-trial detainee who had committed suicide while in custody, filed suit against the city and jail officers asserting claims pursuant to the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments for failure to train, failure to adopt a policy for safe custodial care of suicidal detainees, and failure to adopt a policy of furnishing medical care to suicidal detainees. The detainee was detained on suspicion of drunk driving and was resistant during the booking process. During the booking process the detainee answered a series of questions. When he was asked, "Have you ever attempted suicide or are you thinking about it now?" he responded, "No." He was taken to a cell that was designated for intoxicated or combative prisoners, given a sheet and a blanket, and was locked in the cell at 3:30 a.m. While conducting a jail check at approximately 5:30 a.m., an officer discovered the detainee kneeling in a corner of the cell with the sheet around his neck. He was unable to be revived. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motions in part and denied in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether jail officers had actual knowledge of a substantial risk of suicide by the detainee, and that fact issues precluded summary judgment in the claim against the city and officers in their official capacities. On appeal (261 Fed.Appx. 659), the appeals court reversed and remanded. (City of Moss Point, Mississippi)

Jenkins v. DeKalb County, Ga., 528 F.Supp.2d 1329 (N.D.Ga. 2007). Survivors of a county jail detainee who had died as the result of an apparent beating by a fellow inmate brought a § 1983, Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment action against a county sheriff in his individual capacity, and against corrections officers. The defendants moved for summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds. The district court granted the motion. The 71 year old pretrial detainee suffered from multiple mental illnesses including schizophrenia and dementia, which reportedly manifested themselves in theform of delusions, paranoia, bizarre thoughts and behavior, physical violence, and verbal outbursts that included racial epithets. The court held that county corrections officers' putting the inmate into a cell different from the one to which he had been assigned, allegedly leading to the beating death of a pretrial detainee who shared the same cell, did not violate the detainee's right against cruel and unusual punishment. The court noted that even though the action violated a jail policy, the policy was created primarily to keep track of inmates' placement, not to maintain inmate safety, and there was no evidence of widespread inmate-on-inmate violence due to the misplacement of inmates. The court found that the plaintiffs failed to show that the sheriff's alleged poor training and supervision of corrections officers led to the officers' allegedly inadequate reaction to the incident between the jail inmates, which ended with the beating death of one inmate. The court also found that the sheriff's failure to comply with a court order to transfer the pretrial detainee to a mental health facility did not show supervisory liability because the purpose of the transfer order was likely to get the detainee treatment for mental illness, not to protect him. The court held that the county corrections officers were acting within the scope of their duties when they mistakenly placed a fellow inmate in the same cell with a pretrial detainee, and thus the officers were eligible for qualified immunity in the detainee's survivors' § 1983 Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment action. The court noted that the fact that the mistake violated jail policies or procedures did not mean that the officers were not exercising discretionary authority. (DeKalb County Jail, Georgia)

Thomas v. Sheahan, 499 F.Supp.2d 1062 (N.D.Ill. 2007). A special administrator filed a § 1983 suit against a county, sheriff, county board, correctional officers, supervisors, and a correctional medical technician, on behalf of a pretrial detainee who died at a county jail from meningitis and pneumonia. The administrator alleged violations of the detainee's constitutional rights and state law claims for wrongful death, survival action, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The defendants moved for summary judgment and to strike documents. The district court granted the motions in part and denied in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the detainee's illness was an objectively serious medical need, and whether correctional officials and a correctional medical technician were aware of the detainee's serious medical symptoms. The court also found that summary judgment was precluded on the issue of causation due to a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the county was deliberately indifferent to its widespread practice of failing to train its employees on how to handle inmate medical requests at the county jail. Thomas v. Sheahan, 514 F.Supp.2d 1083 (N.D.Ill. 2007). The court held that the administrator's failure to produce documentary evidence of lost wages or child support payments did not preclude her from introducing evidence at trial. The court found that the physician was not qualified to testify as to the manifestations of meningitis absent evidence that the physician was an expert on meningitis or infectious diseases. According to the court, a jail operations expert's proposed testimony that the county did not meet minimum standards of the conduct for training of correctional staff was inadmissible. The court also found that evidence of jail conditions was relevant and thus admissible, where the administrator of the detainee's estate argued that county officials should have known the detainee was sick because he was throwing up in his cell and in a day room. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court held that the county was not liable based on a county policy, the county was not liable for failure to train or supervise county jail personnel, and a physician did not act with deliberate indifference to the inmate's serious medical needs. Anglin v. City of Aspen, Colo., 552 F.Supp.2d 1205 (D.Colo. 2008). A pretrial detainee brought a civil rights action, alleging that a county sheriff, county jailers, and others violated her rights to due process and free speech, as well as her right to be free from unreasonable seizure, by forcibly injecting her with antipsychotic medication while in custody at a county jail. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants in part. The court held that a county sheriff's deputy personally participated in the decision to sedate the detainee and therefore the deputy could be liable in his individual capacity under § 1983. The court found that the training of county jail personnel by the county sheriff and other officials with respect to forcible sedation of pretrial detainees in the county jail, was not deliberately indifferent to the due process rights of the detainees, and therefore the sheriff and county officials were not liable under § 1983 for failure to properly train. Anglin v. City of Aspen, 562 F.Supp.2d 1304 (D.Colo. 2008). A jail inmate brought a civil rights action under § 1983 against a city, former and current police officers, and a police chief, alleging that the defendants violated her rights to due process and free speech, as well as her right to be free from unreasonable seizure, by forcibly injecting her with antipsychotic medication while she was in custody at a county jail. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants. The court held that officers did not deprive the inmate of due process by restraining her while paramedics forcibly sedated her and that the officers' act of restraining the inmate while she was sedated did not amount to excessive use of force. The court found that the police chief was not liable for failure to train and/or supervise officers, where the training reflected the sound conclusion that medical professionals, rather than law enforcement personnel, were the individuals most qualified to determine whether sedation was appropriate. According to the court, absent a policy of sedating detainees, the city was not municipally liable under § 1983. The court held that the officers' act of restraining the inmate while paramedics forcibly administered antipsychotic medication to her was not substantially motivated as a response to her exercise of allegedly constitutionally protected conduct, as would support the inmate's First Amendment free speech retaliation claim against the officers, where the physician, not the officers, had legal authorization to decide whether an emergency existed that justified the inmate's forced sedation, and the officers did not participate in making the decision to forcibly sedate the inmate. Brumfield v. Hollins, 551 F.3d 322 (5th Cir. 2008). The daughter of a detainee who hung himself while confined in a "drunk tank" of a county jail brought a § 1983 action against the county, and a sheriff and deputies in their individual and official capacities. The district court awarded summary judgment to each defendant sued in his individual capacity on the basis of qualified immunity, but denied summary judgment to individual defendants in their official capacities and to the county. After a trial, the district court directed a verdict in favor of all officers and the county. The daughter appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the sheriff was protected by qualified immunity and that the district court did not abuse its discretion by excluding expert testimony indicating that the detainee was alive when paramedics arrived at the jail. The court found that the county was not liable under § 1983. According to the court, the sheriff was entitled to qualified immunity from the claim that he failed to adopt any written policy pertaining to inmate supervision or medical care, where verbal policies existed concerning inmate supervision and medical care. The court found that the sheriff's efforts in training and supervising deputies were not deliberately indifferent, as required for the sheriff to be liable under § 1983 for the suicide of a drunk driving detainee. The court noted that the deputies did receive training, and that there was no evidence of a pattern of similar violations or evidence that it should have been apparent that a constitutional violation was the highly predictable consequence of an alleged failure to train. The court found that while the deputies' conclusion that the detainee who had hung himself was already dead, and their resulting failure to make any attempt to save his life, were arguably negligent, this conduct alone did not amount to deliberate indifference, nor was any county custom or policy the moving force behind the deputies' conduct, as required for the county to be liable under § 1983 for denial of reasonable medical care. Buckley v. Barbour County, Ala., 624 F.Supp.2d 1335 (M.D.Ala. 2008). An inmate brought § 1983, Eighth Amendment and due process claims, as well as state law claims, against a county and a work-crew supervisor, alleging that his back was injured as the result of a failure to train him in equipment safety before he cleared trees as part of a prison work crew. The county and supervisor filed separate motions to dismiss. The district court granted the motions in part and denied in part. The court held that the inmate's allegations that the county failed to train him and another inmate in equipment operations safety, that they were ordered while part of a community work squad to use chainsaws to cut a large oak tree to clear it from a roadway, and that the tree rolled onto the inmate, breaking his back, were sufficient to plead a causal connection between the county's practice or custom of failing to train and the inmate's injury. The court noted that the inmate was not required to allege a specific practice or custom of failing to train inmates to avoid falling trees. The court held that the inmate's allegations were also sufficient to show the county's awareness of facts from which an inference of a substantial risk of harm could be drawn, as required to plead a deliberate indifference § 1983 Eighth Amendment claim. According to the court, the inmate's allegations that a prison work-crew supervisor was aware that the inmate was not trained in equipment safety and felt unqualified to use a chainsaw, yet still ordered the inmate to use a chainsaw to cut a fallen tree hanging over a ditch, were sufficient to plead a § 1983 Eighth Amendment claim against the supervisor. The court also denied qualified immunity from the inmate's allegations. According to the court, under Alabama law, the inmate's allegations that the work-crew supervisor ordered him and another inmate to cut a tree hanging over a ditch with chainsaws, with the knowledge they were not trained in equipment safety, and that the tree rolled onto the inmate breaking his back, were sufficient to plead willful negligence by the supervisor. Dean v. City of Fresno, 546 F.Supp.2d 798 (E.D.Cal. 2008). The widow and children of a detainee who died from complications of cocaine ingestion while incarcerated in a county jail, brought an action in state court against a city and two police officers. After removal to federal court, the defendants moved for summary judgment on all claims. The district court granted the motion in part and remanded. The court found that the officers violated the detainee's Fourteenth Amendment right to medical care when they did not obtain medical aid for the detainee after he vomited in the patrol car and rock cocaine was found in the vomit. According to the court, a rational jury could conclude that the officers knew that the detainee had swallowed rock cocaine and had a serious medical condition, and that the officers did not render care themselves, did not call for paramedics, did not take the detainee to the hospital, and did not report the discovery of the rock cocaine in the vomit to the jail nurse. The court found that the officers were entitled to qualified immunity where the detainee, who did not exhibit signs of being high as his detention progressed and who was previously communicative of his symptoms, gave an inaccurate reason to explain his condition and never requested medical treatment. The court held that the plaintiffs failed to show that the city failed to adequately train the officers. According to the court, the undisputed evidence showed that Fresno police officers receive police academy training, field training programs, on the job training, advanced officer courses, and various classes and seminars. The court noted that Fresno police officers are particularly trained: (1) to conduct evaluations to determine if a person is under the influence of a controlled substance, including rock cocaine (for those officers involved in narcotics investigations); (2) to request aid for persons in need of medical care; (3) to recognize an arrestee's need for medical care and provide such care; (4) to be aware of efforts that suspects may make to hide controlled substances, including putting such substances in their mouths; (5) to render medical aid, contact emergency medical services or transport the suspect to the hospital if they have a reasonable belief that a suspect has swallowed a controlled substance, such as rock cocaine; (6) to know that ingestion of cocaine can cause death; (7) to know that arrested persons may have evidence in their mouth; (8) to know that persons arrested on drug charges may attempt to conceal the illegal drugs on their person; and (9) to be suspicious of those arrested and what the arrestees say. Iko v. Shreve, 535 F.3d 225 (4th Cir. 2008). The estate and family of a deceased inmate brought a § 1983 survival and wrongful death action against correctional officers, alleging violations of the inmate's Eighth Amendment rights. The district court granted, in part, the officers' motion for summary judgment. The officers appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part and reversed in part. The court held that an officer violated the deceased inmate's Eighth Amendment right to be free from excessive force, arising from the inmate's death after his extraction from his cell involving the use of pepper spray, and thus the officer was not entitled to qualified immunity on § 1983 claims. The court found there was no question that some dispersal of pepper spray was warranted in carrying out the extraction. But the officer's final burst of pepper spray was deployed after the inmate had laid down on the floor, and the officer and members of the extraction team never changed the inmate's clothing or removed the spit mask covering his nose and mouth and never secured medical treatment for the inmate. Although the inmate proffered his hands through the door pursuant to the officer's order, albeit in front of rather than behind him, the officer deployed several additional bursts of pepper spray even after the inmate attempted to comply with the order, and the inmate never reacted violently. The court held that correction officers were deliberately indifferent to the medical needs of the deceased inmate in violation of the inmate's Eighth Amendment right to adequate medical care, and thus were not entitled to qualified immunity on § 1983 claim brought by the inmate's estate and family. According to the court, the officers' training required decontamination after the use of pepper spray, the state's medical examiner credited pepper spray as contributing to the inmate's death, a lay person would have inferred from the inmate's collapse that he was in need of medical attention, the officers witnessed the inmate's collapse, caught him, and directed him into a wheelchair, and yet the inmate received no medical treatment. The officers argued that the inmate did not appear fazed by the pepper spray and that the inmate's opportunity to breathe fresh air while he was wheeled from the medical room was an adequate alternative to receiving actual medical care. Jones v. Taylor, 534 F.Supp.2d 475 (D.Del. 2008). A state prisoner brought a civil rights action alleging that a corrections officer used excessive force against him, another officer did not protect him, and a former commissioner and a former warden did not properly train and supervise officers in dealing with prisoners. The district court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment. The court held that the supervisors were not the driving force behind the alleged use of excessive force by the corrections officer and were not deliberately indifferent to the plight of the state prisoner. The court denied the prisoner's claim for improper training, noting that the officer received training prior to his employment and that he attened annual refresher courses. The court noted that the officer had never been disciplined. The court held that the officer did not use excessive force against the prisoner, where the officer, alone in a small space with the prisoner who was not handcuffed, perceived a threat from the prisoner, and used minimal force, which included an A-frame chokehold. The court noted that the prisoner was handcuffed once he was under control, received only minimal injury and never sought follow-up medical treatment after his initial visit with a nurse. The use of force was investigated and approved by the officer's supervisor, and the prisoner was found guilty of disorderly and threatening behavior with regard to the incident. Parker v. Bladen County, 583 F.Supp.2d 736 (E.D.N.C. 2008). The administratrix of a detainee's estate brought a § 1983 action in state court against county defendants, alleging that they used excessive force when they used tasers on her. The defendants removed the action to federal court. The county and sheriff's department moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion. According to the court, under North Carolina law, the sheriff, not the county encompassing his jurisdiction, has final policymaking authority over hiring, supervising, and discharging personnel in the sheriff's office. The court found that the sheriff's deputies' alleged use of excessive force in attempting to control the detainee by use of tasers, and the sheriff's department's alleged failure to train and supervise its employees as to the use of tasers, could not be attributed to the county, so as to subject it to § 1983 liability for the detainee's death. The court held that the county sheriff's department lacked the legal capacity, under North Carolina law, to be sued under § 1983 liability for the detainee's death. Phillips v. Roane County, Tenn., 534 F.3d 531 (6th Cir. 2008). A representative of the estate of a pretrial detainee who died in a county jail of untreated diabetes brought an action against correctional officers, a jail doctor, and paramedics, alleging deliberate indifference to the detainee's serious medical condition under § 1983 and asserting state law medical malpractice claims. The district court denied the defendants' motion for summary judgment and the defendants appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded.

The court held that the alleged conduct of the correctional officers in observing and being aware of the detainee's serious medical condition, which included signs of nausea, vomiting blood, swelling, lethargy, and chest pains, and in allegedly disregarding jail protocols, which required the officers to transport the detainee to a hospital emergency room for evaluation upon complaints of chest pain, amounted to deliberate indifference to the detainee's serious medical condition, in violation of the detainee's due process rights.

The court found that the paramedic's conduct in allegedly disregarding a jail protocol which required the paramedic to transport detainees to a hospital emergency room when they complained of chest pains, by failing to transport the detainee upon responding to an incident in which the detainee allegedly lost consciousness, had no pulse, and complained of chest pain and nausea after she regained consciousness, amounted to deliberate indifference to the detainee's serious medical condition, in violation of her due process rights. The court found that county officials were not liable under § 1983 for their alleged failure to properly train jail officers as to the proper protocols for obtaining medical treatment for the detainee, absent a showing that any individual official encouraged, authorized, or knowingly acquiesced to the officers' alleged deliberate indifference. Because the detainee had a clearly established right under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to receive medical treatment to address serious medical needs, the court found that jail officials were not entitled to qualified immunity for their alleged conduct in failing to provide the diabetic detainee with medical treatment. Walker v. Sheahan, 526 F.3d 973 (7th Cir. 2008). A pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against county correctional officers, a county sheriff, and a county, alleging that the officers used excessive force against him, deprived him of access to medical care, and retaliated against him. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The detainee appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The court held that the sheriff's office was not liable under § 1983 because the detainee failed to demonstrate that the sheriff's office had a pattern of widespread use of excessive force, inadequate investigation and training regarding use of force, or a code of silence. The court noted that although 783 complaints of excessive force were made against the sheriff's office over a five-year period, none resulted in an indictment, the the training the officers received imposed limitations on the amount of force they could use, and that officers weredisciplined for the use of excessive force. The court held that summary judgment for the officers was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the injuries sustained by the detainee were consistent with his account of the restraint incident involving county corrections officers. Whitt v. Stephens County, 529 F.3d 278 (5th Cir. 2008). The father of a pretrial detainee who purportedly hanged himself while incarcerated at a county jail brought a § 1983 action against a county, the county sheriff, and unknown jail officials. The district court granted summary judgment in part in favor of jail officials and the sheriff in their individual capacities. The father appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The district court denied the father's motion for leave to amend the complaint to identify the unknown jail officials, and granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants on remaining claims. The father again appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the amended complaint to substitute named county jail officials for unknown jail officials did not relate back to the original complaint, for the purpose of avoiding a statute of limitations bar. The court held that the county was not liable under § 1983 for the detainee's purported suicide, where the county had adequate policies and procedures for detainees who posed an obvious risk of suicide, the detainee did not indicate that he was suicidal on an intake form or otherwise exhibit obvious suicidal tendencies, and the county was not deliberately indifferent in failing to train or supervise county jail officials. The court noted that in the specific context of jail suicide prevention, municipalities must provide custodial officials with minimal training to detect the obvious medical needs of pretrial detainees with known, demonstrable, and serious medical disorders, but a failure to train custodial officials in screening procedures to detect latent suicidal tendencies does not rise to the level of a constitutional violation. The court found that in the absence of manifest signs of suicidal tendencies, a city may not be held liable for a pretrial detainee's jailhouse suicide in a § 1983 suit based on a failure to train. Boyd v. Nichols, 616 F.Supp.2d 1331 (M.D.Ga. 2009). A female, who had been housed in a jail for violation of her probation, brought an action against a former jailer, county, and former sheriff, under § 1983 and state law, relating to the sexual assault of the inmate by the jailer. The county and sheriff moved for summary judgment and the district court granted the motions. The court held that the sheriff was not "deliberately indifferent" to a substantial risk of serious harm to the inmate under the Eighth Amendment or the Georgia constitution in failing to protect the inmate from sexual assaults by a jailer, absent evidence that the sheriff had knowledge or indication that the jailer was a threat or danger to inmates, or that male guards, if left alone with female inmates, posed a risk to the inmates' health and safety. The court noted that the sheriff's actions in calling for an investigation and terminating the jailer's employment upon learning of the jailer's actions was not an "indifferent and objectively unreasonable response" to the inmate's claims, and thus, there was no violation of the inmate's rights. The court held that the jail's staffing did not pose a "substantial risk of serious harm" to the inmate who was sexually assaulted by a jailer, as required to show violation of the Eighth Amendment and Georgia constitution, absent evidence that the jail was inadequately staffed. According to the court, the county did not have a policy or custom of underfunding and understaffing the jail, as would constitute deliberate indifference to a substantial risk of serious harm to the inmate, and thus the county could not be liable under § 1983 to the inmate who was sexually assaulted by a jailer. The court found that the sheriff's failure to train deputies and jailers in proper procedures for escorting and handling female inmates did not support supervisory liability on the § 1983 claim of the inmate, where the sheriff had no knowledge of any prior sexual assaults at the jail or any problems with jailers improperly escorting and handling female inmates, and the jailer who committed the assault had been trained previously on how to interact with inmates and knew it was improper to have intimate contact with inmates. During the time period in question, the county did not have a policy prohibiting a male jailer from escorting a female inmate within the Jail. The court held that the county and sheriff had sovereign immunity from the state law claims of the inmate, absent evidence that such immunity had been waived by an act of the General Assembly. Chester v. Beard, 657 F.Supp.2d 534 (M.D.Pa. 2009). Pennsylvania death-row inmates brought a class action under § 1983 against Pennsylvania Department of Corrections officials, seeking a permanent injunctive relief against alleged violations of their right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment and their right to due process, arising from Pennsylvania's use of lethal injection as an execution method. The district court denied the defendants' motion to dismiss. The court held that the inmates had Article III standing to bring a § 1983 challenge to the state's use of lethal injection as an execution method, seeking permanent injunctive relief, even if the inmates were not under active death warrants. The court noted that the fact that the inmates were subject to the death sentence conferred a sufficient personal stake in the action to satisfy the standing requirements. The court held that the death-row inmates stated a § 1983 claim against the DOC by alleging that the state's use of lethal injection as an execution method, in the absence of adequate training for those conducting the executions, exposed the inmates to the risk of extreme pain and suffering. The personal representative of the estate of a prisoner, who was killed while incarcerated, brought a § 1983 action against the District of Columbia and several individual officials and jail employees, alleging negligence, deliberate and reckless indifference to allegedly dangerous conditions at a jail, and wrongful death. The district court granted summary judgment in part and denied in part. The court found that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to: (1) whether the District of Columbia's inmate and detainee classification policies, procedures, and practices were inadequate; (2) whether the District of Columbia's jail staffing policies, procedures, and practices were inadequate; (3) whether the security policies, procedures, and practices were inadequate; (4) whether the District of Columbia adequately trained Department of Corrections officials; and (5) whether officials provided adequate supervision of inmates. Francis ex rel. Estate of Francis v. Northumberland County, 636 F.Supp.2d 368 (M.D.Pa. 2009). The administrator of the estate of a detainee who committed suicide while in a county prison brought an action against the county and prison officials, asserting claims for Fifth and Fourteenth Amendment reckless indifference and Eighth Amendment cruel and unusual punishment under § 1983. The administrator also alleged wrongful death under state law. The county defendants brought third-party claims against a psychiatrist who evaluated the detainee, and the psychiatrist counter-claimed. The county defendants and psychiatrist moved separately for summary judgment. The court held that the County, which paid $360,000 in exchange for a release of claims brought by the estate of the detainee, would be entitled to indemnity on third-party claims against the psychiatrist who evaluated the detainee if a jury determined that the psychiatrist was at fault in the detainee's suicide. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to: (1) whether the evaluating psychiatrist knew the pretrial detainee was a suicide risk and failed to take necessary and available precautions to prevent the detainee's suicide as would show deliberate indifference to the detainee's medical needs; (2) whether the evaluating psychiatrist was an employee of the county prison entitled to immunity under the Pennsylvania Political Subdivision Tort Claim Act (PSTCA) or was an independent contractor excluded from such immunity; (3) whether the evaluating psychiatrist's failure to appropriately document the pretrial detainee's medical records led to the detainee's removal from a suicide watch; (4) whether the recordation of the pretrial detainee's suicide watch level was customary, precluding summary judgment as to whether the evaluating psychiatrist had a duty to record this information; (5) whether the evaluating psychiatrist's failure to communicate the appropriate suicide watch level to county prison officials resulted in the pretrial detainee's suicide; and (6) whether the evaluating psychiatrist communicated the appropriate suicide watch level for the pretrial detainee to county prison officials and whether the psychiatrist was required to record the watch level in the detainee's medical records.

The court found that the county prison had an effective suicide policy in place and thus the psychiatrist who evaluated the pretrial detainee had no viable Fourteenth Amendment inadequate medical care and failure to train counterclaims under § 1983 against the county. According to the court, while at least one individual at the prison may have failed to carry out protocols for the diagnosis and care of suicidal detainees, the policy would have been effective if properly followed as was customary at the prison. The court held that the county prison warden adequately trained subordinates with regard to protocols for the care and supervision of suicidal inmates and adequately supervised execution of these protocols, and thus the psychiatrist who evaluated the pretrial detainee had no viable counterclaim under § 1983 against the warden for failure to adequately train or supervise under the Fourteenth Amendment. Hamilton v. Lajoie, 660 F.Supp.2d 261 (D.Conn. 2009). An inmate filed a pro se § 1983 action against the State of Connecticut, a warden, and correctional officers, seeking compensatory and punitive damages for head trauma, abrasions to his ear and shoulder, and post-traumatic stress due to an officers' alleged use of unconstitutionally excessive force during a prison altercation. The inmate also alleged inadequate supervision, negligence, and willful misconduct. The court held that the inmate's factual allegations against correctional officers, in their individual capacities, were sufficient for a claim of excessive force in violation of the inmate's Eighth Amendment rights. The officers allegedly pinned the inmate to the ground near his cell, following an inspection for contraband, and purportedly sprayed the inmate in the face with a chemical agent despite his complaints that he had asthma. The court found that the inmate's allegations against the warden in his individual capacity were sufficient for a claim of supervisory liability, under § 1983, based on the warden's specific conduct before and after the altercation between the inmate and correctional officers. The inmate alleged that the warden was responsible for policies that led to his injuries and for procedures followed by medical staff following the incident, and the warden failed to properly train officers, to adequately supervise medical staff, to review video evidence of the incident, and to order outside medical treatment of the inmate's injuries even though a correctional officer received prompt medical care at an outside hospital for his head injury sustained in the altercation. Hardy v. District of Columbia, 601 F.Supp.2d 182 (D.D.C. 2009). Pretrial detainees, allegedly assaulted by fellow inmates, brought a suit against the former Director of the District of Columbia Department of Corrections and a former jail warden in both their official and individual capacities, and against the District of Columbia. The detainees sought damages under § 1983 for alleged Fifth and Eighth Amendment violations. The district court dismissed the case in part. The court held that the detainees' § 1983 official capacity claims against the former Director and former jail warden were redundant to the claims against the District of Columbia, warranting dismissal. The court noted that claims brought against government employees in their official capacity are treated as claims against the employing government and serve no independent purpose when the government is also sued. The detainees alleged that before the scalding attacks that injured them, one of the very assailants had committed a similar scalding attack using water heated in an unguarded microwave, and that the locations where their assaults occurred were inadequately staffed with corrections officers and resulted in the assaults taking place without any officers in the vicinity. The court held that these allegations were sufficient to plead conditions of detention that posed a substantial risk of serious harm, as required to state a failure-to-protect claim against the Director of the District of Columbia Department of Corrections and the jail warden. The court found that the detainees' allegation that the Director and jail warden were deliberately indifferent to negligent supervision of correctional officers and lack of staff training, was sufficient to state a § 1983 failure to train claim violative of their due process rights. The detainees alleged that the warden and Director were at the top of the "chain of command" at the jail, that they had been aware of violence issues for many years, and that they had been instructed to take action against violence on numerous occasions. The district court denied qualified immunity for the Director and jail warden, noting that the detainees' due process rights against deliberate indifference were clearly established at the time of violent scalding attacks by fellow inmates. Jackson v. Gerl, 622 F.Supp.2d 738 (W.D.Wis. 2009). A prisoner brought a § 1983 action against a warden and other prison officials, alleging that the use of a stinger grenade to extract him from his cell constituted excessive force in violation of the Eighth Amendment, and that an abusive strip search following the deployment of the grenade also violated the Eighth Amendment. The defendants moved for summary judgment and the district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that a prison lieutenant's extraction of the prisoner from inside his cell by means of a stinger grenade, which when detonated created a bright flash of light, emitted a loud blast accompanied by smoke, and fired rubber balls, was not "de minimis," as would bar a claim for excessive force under the Eighth Amendment. The court found that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the extraction of the prisoner from his cell by means of a stinger grenade was malicious and sadistic, or whether the use was in a good-faith effort to maintain or restore discipline. The court held that the prison security director's authorization of the prisoner's extraction by means of a stinger grenade was not malicious and sadistic, as required to establish excessive force under the Eighth Amendment. According to the court, the director was aware that the prisoner was refusing to cooperate, the prisoner had invited officials to "suit up" to "come in and play," and had covered his window and had put water on the floor. The director knew that tasers and incapacitating agents could not be used against the prisoner, and relied on the lieutenant's statements that she had been trained and was certified in the use of the grenade, having never used one himself. According to the court, the prison's training captain and the commander of the emergency response unit did not provide inadequate training on the use of a stinger grenade, with a deliberate or reckless disregard to the prisoners' Eighth Amendment rights against excessive force, as required to subject the captain to § 1983 liability, even though the captain advised trainees that stinger grenades could be used in a cell and did not tell them of the danger of using the grenade in the presence of water. The captain lacked knowledge that using the grenade in a cell or in the presence of water would likely be an excessive use of force even where immediate weapons would otherwise be justified. Lewis v. City of West Palm Beach, Fla., 561 F.3d 1288 (11th Cir. 2009). The survivor of a detainee who had died in police custody brought a § 1983 action against a city and against individual officers, alleging use of excessive force. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants and the survivor appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the detainee's right not to be restrained via "hobbling" and being "hogtied" was not clearly established. The detainee became unconscious and died during detention. According to the court, the officers' conduct was not so egregious as to be plainly unlawful to any reasonable officer, given the detainee's agitated state when first detained and given his continued uncooperative and agitated state, presenting a safety risk to himself and others, during restraint. After handcuffing the detainee did not prevent his continued violent behavior, the officers attached an ankle restraint to the handcuffs with a hobble cord (also known as "TARP," the total appendage restraint position). The hobble was tightened so that Lewis's hands and feet were close together behind his back in a "hogtied" position. The court held that the city was not potentially liable for failure to train officers in the use of restraints, where the need for training in the application of "hobble" restraints did not rise to the level of obviousness that would render the city potentially liable under § 1983 for deliberate indifference based on the failure to administer such training. The court noted that hobble restraints did not have the same potential flagrant risk of constitutional violations as the use of deadly firearms. (West Palm Beach Police Department, Florida)

Parlin v. Cumberland County, 659 F.Supp.2d 201 (D.Me. 2009). A female former county jail inmate brought an action against jail officers, a county, and a sheriff, under § 1983 and Maine law, alleging deliberate indifference to her serious medical needs, negligence, and excessive force. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants in part and denied in part. The court held that: (1) the officers were not deliberately indifferent to a serious medical need; (2) an officer who fell on the inmate did not use excessive force; (3) the county was not liable for deprivation of medical care; and (4) the county was not liable for failure to train. The court held that the officers were not entitled to absolute immunity from excessive force claims where a genuine issue of material fact existed as to whether the officers used excessive force in transferring the jail inmate between cells. According to the court, there was no evidence that jail officers were subjectively aware of the jail inmate's serious medical condition, where the inmate made no mention of her shoulder injury to the officers other than crying out "my shoulder" after she had fallen. Powers-Bunce v. District of Columbia, 659 F.Supp.2d 173 (D.D.C. 2009). A mother, for herself and as the personal representative of an arrestee who hanged himself in a holding cell at a police precinct shortly after he was arrested by the United States Secret Service, brought an action against the District of Columbia and several police and Secret Service officers. The District of Columbia moved for judgment on the pleadings, or in the alternative, for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The court held that: (1) the District of Columbia did not violate the Fifth Amendment right of the arrestee to be free from deliberate indifference to his substantial risk of committing suicide; (2) the District of Columbia could not be held liable for a police officers' failure to attempt to revive the arrestee; and (3) the District of Columbia could not be held liable for officers' inadequate training and supervision. The court held that inadequate training and supervision of District of Columbia police officers, who failed to follow police department procedures when they did not attempt to revive the arrestee who had hanged himself in his cell, failed to expeditiously obtain assistance from Emergency Medical Services, and failed to maintain and operate the video surveillance system, did not reflect a deliberate or conscious choice by the District of Columbia, as required to hold the District of Columbia liable under § 1983 for the detainee's death. The mother of a deceased prisoner, who died in his solitary cell as a result of asphyxia due to hanging after an apparent attempt to feign suicide, brought a § 1983 action against Delaware Corrections officials. The district court denied the defendants' motion for summary judgment. The court held that fact issues precluded summary judgment on the mother's § 1983 claim, custom or policies claim, deliberate indifference claim, qualified immunity grounds, wrongful death claim, and claim for punitive damages. The court found genuine issues of material fact as to: (1) whether the prisoner's detention was valid at the time of his death; (2) whether Delaware Corrections officials failed to train and or maintain customs, policies, practices, or procedures, relating to the prisoner's repeated release inquiry; (3) whether Delaware Corrections officials' ignored the prisoner's risk of hurting himself to get the attention of guards as to his repeated release inquiries; (4) whether a correctional officer acted in good faith and without gross or wanton negligence in throwing the prisoner against a bench in his cell while holding his throat and threatening him verbally; and (5) whether Delaware Corrections officials' conduct in ignoring the prisoner's repeated release inquiries was a proximate cause of the prisoner's ultimate death. The court also found that fact issues existed as to whether Delaware Corrections officials acted outrageously and with reckless indifference to the rights of others, precluding summary judgment on the mother's § 1983 claim for punitive damages. Beatty v. Davidson, 713 F.Supp.2d 167 (W.D.N.Y. 2010). A former pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against a county, jail officials, and a nurse, alleging that the defendants denied him adequate medical care while he was a pretrial detainee, in violation of his Fourteenth Amendment rights. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court denied the motion. The court held that the detainee's diabetic condition was a serious medical condition and that a genuine issue of material fact existed as to whether the nurse was deliberately indifferent to the detainee's diabetic condition, precluding summary judgment for the nurse. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether jail officials were grossly negligent in supervising subordinates who allegedly violated the former pretrial detainee's constitutional rights. According to the court, a genuine issue of material fact existed as to whether the county lacked a system at its jail for managing chronically ill inmates and failed to train and properly supervise its staff, precluding summary judgment for the county on the former pretrial detainee's municipal liability claim under § 1983. The estate of a pretrial detainee, who died of a gastrointestinal hemorrhage while in pretrial custody, brought a § 1983 action against a county sheriff in his individual and official capacity for failure to train and supervise the jail's medical employees and for maintaining an unconstitutional policy of deliberate indifference to serious medical needs. The district court denied the sheriff's motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity. The sheriff appealed. The appeals court reversed. The court held that the county sheriff was not deliberately indifferent to a known or obvious risk of inadequate medical care toward pretrial detainees arising from the supervising jail physician's unpleasant attitude or practice of intimidation toward jail nurses, which allegedly discouraged nurses from calling the physician or sending patients to the emergency room. The court noted that the detainee's gastrointestinal hemorrhage was neither referred for treatment by a hospital emergency room nor treated by the jail's supervising physician. According to the court, despite the physician's bad temper, despite one nurse's expressed fear of an "ass-chewing" from the physician had she sent the detainee to the emergency room, and even though the nurses and physician had disagreed in two instances on whether inmates should be sent to an emergency room, the two nurses had previously decided to send inmates to the emergency room over the physician's objections. The sheriff had reportedly counseled the physician and ordered the nurses to act appropriately notwithstanding the physician's distemper, and there was no prior instance in which the sheriff's instruction to the nurses was not followed. Castro v. Melchor, 760 F.Supp.2d 970(D.Hawai'I 2010). A female pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against correctional facility officials and medical staff, alleging the defendants were deliberately indifferent to his serious medical needs resulting in the delivery of a stillborn child. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the correctional facility's medical staff subjectively knew the pretrial detainee's complaints of vaginal bleeding presented a serious medical need. The court held that the staff's failure to ensure the detainee received an ultrasound and consultation was no more than

gross negligence, and the medical staff did not deny, delay, or intentionally interfere with the pretrial detainee's medical treatment. According to the court, summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the correctional facility officials' actions and inactions in training the facility's medical staff resulted in the alleged deprivation of the pretrial detainee's right to medical treatment and whether the officials consciously disregarded serious health risks by failing to apply the women's lock-down policies. Following a verbal exchange with a guard, two officers physically forced the detainee to the ground from a standing position. While she was lying on the ground on her stomach, the officers restrained her by holding their body weights against her back and legs and placing her in handcuffs. A pretrial detainee brought an action under § 1983 and various state law authority against a county, county sheriff's department, and a sheriff, alleging the defendants violated his rights in failing to ensure his safety after a fire broke out at the county jail. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The detainee appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the county jail's smoking policy did not demonstrate that the sheriff acted with deliberate indifference in violation of the due process rights of the detainee caught in his cell during a jail fire, even if a jailer supplied cigarettes to inmates, since the jail had an anti-smoking policy in effect at all relevant times. The court noted that the jailer who allegedly supplied the cigarettes to the inmates had retired nine months before the fire occurred, and jail officials made sweeps for contraband as recently as five days before the fire. The court held that any failure of the sheriff to engage his officers in more exhaustive emergency training did not amount to deliberate indifference in violation of the due process rights of the detainee caught in his cell during a fire, even if the officers' lack of training presented a substantial safety risk. The court noted that the officers' actions in removing inmates from their cells after they discovered the fire demonstrated that they did not disregard the risk. (Oregon County Jail, Missouri)

Estate of Crouch v. Madison County, 682 F.Supp.2d 862 (S.D.Ind. 2010). An inmate's estate brought a § 1983 suit against a county and corrections officers, claiming that the officers were deliberately indifferent to the inmate's serious medical needs in violation of the Eighth Amendment, and that the county was liable for failure to train its officers or establish policies regarding the medical care of inmates. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The court held that the inmate did not show signs of an objectively serious need for medical attention prior to 3:00 a.m. on the day of his death from a drug overdose, at which time he was found unresponsive. According to the court, the Indiana Tort Claims Act entitled the corrections officers and county to immunity on state law negligence claims arising from the inmate's death, which occurred while he was assigned to a community corrections program maintained under the supervision of a governmental entity. Parrish v. Ball, 594 F.3d 993 (8th Cir. 2010). A female detainee filed a § 1983 suit against a sheriff and a deputy, individually and in their official capacities, alleging failure to train the deputy, who had sexually assaulted the detainee. After bench trial the district court granted in part and denied in part the sheriff's motion for summary judgment. The sheriff and the detainee cross-appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The court held that the sheriff in his official capacity was not liable for the deputy's inadequate training, and that the sheriff in his individual capacity was entitled to qualified immunity from the failure to train claim. The court noted that although the deputy received minimal training at best for his law enforcement position, the inadequacy of his training was not so likely to result in violation of the constitutional rights of the detainee, so that the county could reasonably be said to have been deliberately indifferent to the need for training, especially when the county had no notice at all that a sexual assault was likely. According to the court, there was no patently obvious need to train the deputy not to sexually assault women, and the sexual assault was a consequence too remote to conclude that failure to train the deputy caused him to sexually assault the detainee. Stack v. Karnes, 750 F.Supp.2d 892 (S.D.Ohio 2010). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against a county and the county Board of Commissioners, alleging violations of the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments. The defendants filed a motion to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the county was not entitled to immunity afforded under Ohio law to counties. The court found that the inmate's allegations that the county historically had a policy, custom, and practice of failing to implement adequate training programs for jail personnel, and that he was denied medical treatment for his diabetes, were sufficient to state a Monell claim against the county for violation of the Eighth Amendment . According to the court, the county Board of Commissioners had no duty to keep a safe jail, and therefore, could not be liable in the inmate's § 1983 action alleging he was denied adequate medical care in violation of the Eighth Amendment, where the sheriff was the entity in charge of the jail, rather than the Board. Teague v. St. Charles County, 708 F.Supp.2d 935 (E.D.Mo. 2010). The mother of a detainee who committed suicide in a cell in county detention center brought an action against the county and corrections officials, asserting claims for wrongful death under § 1983 and under the Missouri Wrongful Death Statute. The county and the commanding officer moved to dismiss for failure to state a claim. The district court granted in the motion, in part. The court held that the mother failed to allege that the detention center's commanding officer personally participated. The court found that the mother's allegations that her son was demonstrating that he was under the influence of narcotics at the time of his detention, that her son had expressed suicidal tendencies, and that jail employees heard or were told of choking sounds coming from her son's cell but took no action, were sufficient to state a Fourteenth Amendment deliberate indifference claim under § 1983. The court held that the mother's allegation that the county unconstitutionally failed to train and supervise its employees with respect to custody of persons with symptoms of narcotics withdrawal and suicidal tendencies was sufficient to state a failure to train claim against the county, under § 1983, arising out of the death of her son who committed suicide while housed as a pretrial detainee. The detainee had used a bed sheet to hang himself and the mother alleged that the county failed to check him every 20 minutes, as required by jail policy. Wereb v. Maui County, 727 F.Supp.2d 898 (D.Hawai'i 2010). Parents of a pretrial detainee, a diabetic who died in custody, brought an action against a county and county police department employees, alleging under § 1983 that the defendants were deliberately indifferent to the detainee's medical needs, and asserting a claim for wrongful death under state law. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The detainee died in a 2-cell police lockup. The court held that county police officers and public safety aids who did not interact with or observe the pretrial detainee not moving in his cell were not subjectively aware of the serious medical need of the detainee, and thus those officers and aids were not deliberately indifferent to that need, in violation of the detainee's due process rights. The court held that summary judgment as to the § 1983 Fourteenth Amendment deliberate indifference claim was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether county police officers who interacted with the pretrial detainee and/or a county public safety aid who did not see the detainee move around in his cell while she monitored him over video had subjective knowledge of the serious medical need of detainee, precluding summary judgment.

The court found that neither county police officers who interacted with the pretrial detainee, nor a county public safety aid who did not see the detainee move around in his cell while she monitored him over video, were entitled to qualified immunity from the § 1983 Fourteenth Amendment deliberate indifference claim brought by the detainee's parents, where at the time of the detainee's death, it was clearly established that officers could not intentionally deny or delay access to medical care. The court held that summary judgment was precluded on the § 1983 municipal liability claim by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the county adequately trained its employees to monitor the medical needs of the pretrial detainees, and, if so, as to whether the county's inadequate training of its employees was deliberately different, and as to whether inadequate training "actually caused" the death of the pretrial detainee. Coscia v. Town of Pembroke, Mass., 659 F.3d 37 (1st Cir. 2011). The estate of a detainee who committed suicide after being released from custody brought a § 1983 action against police officers, their supervisors, and a town, alleging that the officers and supervisors were deliberately indifferent to the arrestee's medical needs and that the town failed to train the officers to prevent detainee suicides. The district court denied the individual defendants' motion for judgment on the pleadings and they appealed. The appeals court reversed. The appeals court held that the estate failed to state a claim for deliberate indifference to a substantial risk of serious harm to health under the Fourteenth Amendment. According to the court, the estate failed to allege facts sufficient to demonstrate a causal relationship between the police officers' failure to furnish medical care to the detainee during a seven-hour period of custody and the detainee's act of committing suicide by walking in front of a train 14 hours after his release from custody. The court noted that the detainee had been thinking about suicide at the time he was arrested, the detainee was thinking about suicide at the time he was released from custody, and when the police released the detainee from custody they placed him in no worse position than that in which he would have been had they not acted at all. The court found that in the absence of a risk of harm created or intensified by a state action, there is no due process liability for harm suffered by a prior detainee after release from custody in circumstances that do not effectively extend any state impediment to exercising self-help or to receiving whatever aid by others may normally be available. The twenty-one-year-old detainee had been involved in a one-car accident, he was arrested about eleven o'clock in the morning and brought to the police station. On the way there he said he intended to throw himself in front of a train, and he continued to utter suicide threats at the station house accompanied by self-destructive behavior, to the point of licking an electrical outlet. As a consequence, the police did not lock him in a cell, but placed him in leg restraints and followed an evaluation protocol that showed a high suicide risk. He was not examined by a doctor, but was released on his own recognizance about six o'clock that evening. (Town of Pembroke, Massachusetts)

Morse v. Regents of University of California, Berkeley, 821 F.Supp.2d 1112 (N.D.Cal. 2011). A journalist arrested while covering a demonstration at a university sued the university's board of regents, its police department and various officers on the department, asserting § 1983 claims for violation of the First Amendment, the Fourth Amendment, and the Excessive Bail Clause of the Eighth Amendment, as well as a claim for violation of the Privacy Protection Act. The defendants filed a partial motion to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the journalist stated a § 1983 claim for violation of the Excessive Bail Clause of the Eighth Amendment on the theory that the defendants added unsupported charges for the sole purpose of increasing his bail. The court found that the theory was viable under the Excessive Bail Clause, despite the indirect means the defendants allegedly used to obtain the higher bail, and the intervening actions of the judicial officer who actually set bail. The court found that the journalist stated a § 1983 claim against the police chief in his individual capacity where the journalist asserted that the chief failed to train or supervise those individuals who directly deprived the journalist of his constitutional rights and that, by his policy decisions, he set in motion the acts that deprived the journalist of his constitutional rights. The court held that the journalist's claims that he was wrongfully arrested by university police and that his property was subject to searches and seizures without proper cause and without the proper warrants, stated a claim under the Privacy Protection Act (PPA) against the university police chief for failure to screen, train, and supervise. The court noted that the journalist's claim related specifically to the statutory provisions of the PPA, that he alleged sufficient facts to support his claim of a causal connection between the police chief's conduct and the statutory violation, and liability was not limited to those personally involved in the statutory violation. (University of California, Berkeley)

Newbrough v. Piedmont Regional Jail Authority, 822 F.Supp.2d 558 (E.D.Va. 2011). The administrator of an immigration detainee's estate brought an action against the federal government, a regional jail authority and various of its employees, and several agents of the United States Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE), alleging § 1983 claims in relation to medical treatment received by detainee while in jail, and a claim for wrongful death. The defendants moved to dismiss and the plaintiff moved for a stay. The court held that the stricter deliberate indifference standard, rather than the professional judgment standard, applied to the § 1983 denial–of–medical–care claims brought by the administrator, where immigration detention was more similar to pretrial detention rather than the involuntary commitment of psychiatric patients, in that immigration detention served to secure the detainee's appearance at future proceedings and to protect the community, and pre–removal detention was generally limited in duration. The court held that the allegations of the administrator were sufficient to allege that a prison nurse deliberately denied, delayed, or interfered with the detainee's medical care with knowledge of his serious condition, as required to state a § 1983 denial–of–medical–care claim under Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause. The administrator alleged that the nurse visited the detainee while he was held in isolation in a medical segregation unit with an apparent inability to walk or stand, and yet withheld medication because the detainee was unwilling to stand up and walk to the door to receive that medication. The court noted that the nurse acknowledged that not giving the detainee his medication could cause severe problems. The court found that the administrator sufficiently alleged that the regional jail authority and its superintendent failed to adequately train jail staff, as required to state a § 1983 policy–or–custom claim in relation to the detainee's medical care under the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause. The administrator alleged that prison officers regularly refused to refer requests for medical attention unless a request was in writing, regardless of the urgency of a detainee's need, that prison staff either failed to recognize symptoms of grave illness or ignored them, and that, even in the face of the detainee's potentially fatal infection, staff provided no more than an over–the–counter pain reliever. The court found that the administrator's allegations were sufficient to allege that the jail's superintendent, even if newly hired, was aware of the shortcomings in his facility's medical care, as required to state a § 1983 supervisory liability claim, where the administrator alleged that numerous public investigations and media coverage reported the poor quality of the jail's health services and the superintendent failed to act to improve those services. Palmer v. Board of Com'rs for Payne County Oklahoma, 765 F.Supp.2d 1289 (W.D.Okla. 2011). A former pretrial detainee in a county detention center filed a § 1983 action against a sheriff, deputy sheriff, and county jail administrator for alleged deliberate indifference to the detainee's serious medical needs in violation of the Due Process Clause. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that a deputy sheriff was not deliberately indifferent to the pretrial detainee's serious medical needs, in violation of the Due Process Clause, due to a bacterial infection that required surgical excision of three gangrenous areas of the detainee's body, but rather, he took active and reasonable steps to abate any harm to the detainee. According to the court, there was no evidence of inadequate training of jailers as to the passing on of doctor's instructions for inmates, as required to establish the deliberate indifference of the county sheriff to the serious medical needs of the pretrial detainee who contracted a bacterial infection, in violation of due process,. A female pretrial detainee brought an action against a county, county officials, and a jail guard, alleging that she was coerced into having inappropriate sexual contact with the guard. The defendants moved to dismiss and for summary judgment, and the plaintiff moved to compel discovery and for sanctions. The district court granted the motions, in part. The court held that the detainee was not required to file grievances after being transferred to a state prison before filing her § 1983 action, in order to satisfy the administrative exhaustion requirement under the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA). The court noted that the county jail grievance procedures were not available to detainees after they transferred, and the county did not offer any assistance to the detainee after learning of the alleged assaults. The court found that neither the county nor the county sheriff was deliberately indifferent in failing to train or supervise county jail guards to not sexually assault jail detainees, and thus, the female detainee could not demonstrate that the county or sheriff was liable under § 1983. According to the court, the guards did not need specific training to know that they should refrain from sexually assaulting detainees, and there was no showing that the general training program for guards was deficient or that there was a pattern of prior abuses at county jail. Porter v. Epps, 659 F.3d 440 (5th Cir. 2011). A prisoner who was detained for 15 months beyond his release date as the result of a mistake by employees of the Mississippi Department of Corrections (MDOC) brought suit under § 1983 to recover for alleged violation of his due process rights. The district court denied a motion for judgment as a matter of law filed by the Commissioner of the MDOC on a qualified immunity theory, and the Commissioner appealed. The appeals court reversed, finding that the prisoner did not satisfy the burden of showing that failure on the part of the Commissioner of the MDOC to promulgate a policy to prevent such mistakes by his subordinates was objectively unreasonable in light of clearly established law. The court found that the prisoner failed to satisfy burden of showing that failure on the part of the Commissioner of the MDOC to train employees to prevent such mistakes was objectively unreasonable in light of clearly established law, and the Commissioner was qualifiedly immune from liability under § 1983 on a failure-to-train theory, given evidence that the employees of the MDOC's records department had all attended training sessions with a lawyer to ensure that they better understood court orders. According to the court, the fact that an employee erred in one instance did not show that the Commissioner's alleged actions in failing to train were objectively unreasonable. Smith v. Atkins, 777 F.Supp.2d 955 (E.D.N.C. 2011). The mother of a schizophrenic inmate who committed suicide at a jail and the mother of the inmate's children brought a § 1983 action in state court against a county deputy sheriff, jail officials, a medical contractor, and a nurse employed by the contractor, alleging that the defendants violated the inmate's Eighth Amendment rights in failing to provide adequate medical care. The defendants removed the action to federal court and moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motions. The court held that the deputy sheriff who happened to be at the jail delivering a prisoner when the inmate, who had been diagnosed with schizophrenia, committed suicide, did not know that the inmate was at a substantial risk of committing suicide or intentionally disregarded such risk. The court found that the deputy was not liable under § 1983 where the deputy did not know the inmate or anything about him, or have any responsibilities associated with the inmate's custody. The court held that jail officials' mere failure to comply with a state standard and a jail policy requiring a four-time per hour check on any prisoner who had ever been on a suicide watch did not violate the Eighth Amendment rights of the inmate. The court found that the mother of the inmate failed to show a direct causal link between a specific deficiency in training and an alleged Eighth Amendment violation, as required to sustain the mother's § 1983 Eighth Amendment claim against jail officials based on their alleged failure to train jail employees. Tookes v. U.S., 811 F.Supp.2d 322 (D.D.C. 2011). An arrestee brought an action under the Federal Tort Claims Act (FTCA) against the United States, alleging assault and battery, false imprisonment, and negligent training and supervision. The United States filed a motion for partial summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part, and denied in part. The court held that the training and supervision of Deputy United States Marshals was a discretionary function, and therefore, the discretionary function exception to FTCA precluded subject matter jurisdiction of the arrestee's negligent training and supervision claims, following an alleged attack by marshals. The court noted that there were no statutes, regulations, or policies that specifically prescribed how to train or oversee marshals, and decisions involved social, economic, and political policy in that decisions had to balance budgetary constraints, public perception, economic conditions, individual backgrounds, office diversity, experience, public safety, and employee privacy rights, as well as other considerations. According to the court, there was no evidence that the arrestee should have known she could be diagnosed as suffering from post-traumatic stress disorder following an alleged false imprisonment by United States marshals, and therefore, the arrestee was not limited from seeking greater damages for her emotional injuries than the amount claimed in her administrative form, in her FTCA claim. The court found that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the United States marshals falsely imprisoned the arrestee by bringing her back into a courthouse. The parents of a diabetic pretrial detainee who died in custody brought an action against a county and county police department employees, alleging under § 1983 that the defendants were deliberately indifferent to the detainee's medical needs, and asserting a claim for wrongful death under state law. The district granted summary judgment, in part, in favor of the defendants. The county moved for reconsideration. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by fact issues on the claim that the county failed to train jail employees to monitor detainees' serious medical needs. The court found that the county and its police department were not liable for their alleged failure to train employees on the risks and symptoms of alcohol withdrawal. According to the court, assuming that the detainee died from alcohol withdrawal, no other prisoner in the county jail had suffered injury from alcohol withdrawal for more than 17 years before the detainee's death, so that such a failure to train did not constitute deliberate indifference. Ard v. Rushing, 911 F.Supp.2d 425 (S.D.Miss. 2012). A female inmate brought an action against a sheriff and a deputy asserting claims under § 1983 and § 1985 for violation of the Fourth, Fifth and Eighth Amendments, and also alleging a state law claim for negligence, relating to an incident in which she was sexually assaulted by the deputy while she was incarcerated. The sheriff moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The court held that the sheriff was not deliberately indifferent to a substantial risk of harm to the female jail inmate as would have violated the Eighth Amendment, where the sheriff had established safeguards to ensure the safety of female prisoners, including a female-only, camera-monitored area in which female inmates were housed, a policy that male jailers could not enter the female-only area without a female jailer, and a policy that a female jailer was to cover each shift. The court noted that past allegations that the deputy had engaged in unwanted sexual contact with female inmates had been investigated and found not to be substantiated. The court found that the inmate failed to show that the sheriff had knowledge of the deputy's disregard of the sheriff's policy to ensure the safety of female prisoners, which included a requirement that male jailers could not enter the female-only area without a female jailer, or to show that the sheriff was deliberately indifferent to the need for more or different training, as required to establish an Eighth Amendment failure to train/supervise claim. A parolee brought a civil rights action alleging that his constitutional rights were violated when he failed to receive a $100 cash payment upon his release from a state prison to parole, and by state corrections officials' failure to perform a proper sex offender evaluation, which resulted in the parolee being improperly ordered to participate in sex offense treatment that included a requirement that he have no contact with his children. The defendants moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion. The district court held that: (1) the private sex offender treatment program that contracted with the state and its employees did not qualify as “state actors,” and thus, could not be liable in the parolee's § 1983 claim; (2) the claim against the executive director of the state department of corrections in his official capacity for recovery of a cash payment was barred by the Eleventh Amendment; (3) the executive director was not personally liable for the cash payable to the parolee upon release; (4) the officials were not liable under § 1983 for their alleged negligent supervision, failure to instruct or warn, or failure to implement proper training procedures for parole officers; (5) the parolee's equal protection rights were not violated; and (6) the allegations stated a due process claim against corrections officials. According to the court, allegations by the parolee that Colorado department of corrections officials failed to perform a proper sex offender evaluation prior to releasing him on parole, as required by Colorado law, which allegedly resulted in a parole condition that he have no contact with his children, stated a due process claim against the corrections officials. Facey v. Dickhaut, 892 F.Supp.2d 347 (D.Mass. 2012). A prisoner at a state correctional institution filed a pro se § 1983 action against the prison and officials alleging his Eighth Amendment right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment was violated when officials knowingly placed him in danger by assigning him to a housing unit where he was violently attacked by members of a rival gang. The defendants moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the complaint stated a claim against the deputy superintendent and an assistant for violation of the Eighth Amendment, by alleging that officials were aware of the feud between two rival prison gangs, that the prisoner was a known member of one of the gangs, that despite this knowledge officials had assigned the prisoner to a section of the prison where a rival gang was housed, and as a result he was violently attacked and sustained permanent injuries. The court found that the official who had instituted the gang housing policy could not be held personally liable, since he did not implement the policy, nor was he deliberately indifferent in supervising or training those who did. According to the court, state prison officials who had placed the prisoner known to be a gang member in danger by assigning him to a housing unit where he was violently attacked by members of a rival gang, were not entitled to qualified immunity in the prisoner's § 1983 suit. The court noted that clearly established law provided that the Eighth Amendment was violated if officials disregarded a known, substantial risk to an inmate's health or safety, and the officials had disregarded this risk, as well as violated a prison policy, by placing rival gang members in same housing unit. Gooding v. Ketcher, 838 F.Supp.2d 1231(N.D.Okla. 2012). A musician brought an action against a marshal of the Cherokee Nation and a deputy county sheriff, sheriff, casino employees, county police officer, jail employees, and a nurse, alleging false imprisonment, assault and battery, and violation of his First, Fourth, and Fourteenth Amendment rights, and seeking declaratory judgment that Oklahoma law governing flag burning and desecration was unconstitutional. The musician had been arrested and detained at a local county jail. The defendants moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the musician's allegations that his use of an American flag during his performance at a casino was a constitutionally protected activity, that the county sheriff failed to train his deputies as to the constitutional nature of the activity, and that the sheriff adopted an unconstitutional policy and/or custom which led to the musician's arrest and imprisonment, stated a § 1983 claim against the sheriff in his individual capacity as a supervisor for violations of the musician's First, Fourth, and Fourteenth Amendment rights.

The court found that the musician's allegations that the county sheriff was, at all times relevant to the musician's claims related to his arrest and imprisonment, a commissioned law enforcement officer and the duly-elected sheriff and chief policy maker for county sheriff's office, that the deputy sheriff was a commissioned law enforcement officer acting as a marshal for Cherokee Nation and a deputy sheriff for the county's sheriff's office, and that the deputy sheriff was acting as the sheriff's employee during events giving rise to the musician's claims, were sufficient to demonstrate that the sheriff was responsible for the deputy's training and supervision, as required for the musician's § 1983 inadequate training claim against county sheriff in his official capacity. The court held that the musician's allegations that the seizure and search of his person were unconstitutional because the underlying conduct for which he was seized was legal and did not provide lawful grounds upon which to base his arrest and the subsequent searches of his person, stated a § 1983 claim against the county sheriff in his official capacity. Harris v. Hammon, 914 F.Supp.2d 1026 (D.Minn. 2012). A prisoner brought a § 1983 action against a county and various officials with the state department of corrections (DOC), alleging violations of the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments, as well as state law claims for false imprisonment, intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), and negligent infliction of emotional distress (NIED). The defendants moved for summary judgment and for judgment on the pleadings. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that there was no evidence of a continuing, widespread pattern of misconduct on account of county employees in not releasing prisoners pursuant to court orders, as required for the prisoner's § 1983 failure-to-train claims against the county for alleged violations of the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments. The prisoner had been held for more than five days after a judge ordered his release pending his appeal. According to the court, the former prisoner's allegations were sufficient to plead that department of corrections (DOC) employees were deliberately indifferent to the prisoner's liberty rights under the Fourteenth Amendment, as required to state a § 1983 claim for violations of his due process rights based on his continued detention after a court ordered his release. The prisoner alleged that he had a court order for his release but he was returned to prison, that a judge faxed and mailed the release order to the prison after being contacted by the prisoner's attorney the next day, that the judge's clerk also telephoned employees to inform them that the prisoner was to be released, that one employee did not respond to calls from the prisoner's attorney, that another employee told the attorney he would have to hand deliver a certified copy of order by the end of her shift in three minutes so that the prisoner could be released before the weekend, and that employees told the attorney several days later that they might not be able to release the prisoner because the order could be invalid. The court also held that the prisoner's allegations were sufficient to plead that his continued detention, after his release was ordered by a judge, violated a clearly established right, as required to overcome qualified immunity for department of corrections (DOC) employees. The personal representative of the estate of her deceased son, who committed suicide while detained in a county jail, filed a § 1983 action against the county and jail officials for allegedly violating due process by deliberate indifference to the detainee's medical needs. Following a jury trial, the district court entered judgment for the personal representative, awarding actual and punitive damages as well as attorney fees and costs. The jury awarded $750,000 in compensatory damages and $100,000 in punitive damages. The district court denied the defendants' motion for judgment as a matter of law and the defendants appealed. The appeals court reversed the denial of the defendants' motion and vacated the awards. The appeals court held that while the detainee had a constitutional right to protection from a known risk of suicide, the jail nurse and the jail director were protected by qualified immunity, and the county was not liable. According to the court, the county jail nurse's affirmative but unsuccessful measures to prevent the pretrial detainee's suicide did not constitute deliberate indifference to his risk of suicide, where the nurse assessed the detainee twice after learning from his mother that he had recently attempted suicide, the nurse arranged for the detainee to have two appointments with the jail's psychiatrist, including an appointment on the morning of the detainee's suicide, the nurse contacted the detainee's own psychiatrist to gather information about the detainee's condition, she reviewed the detainee's medical records, and she responded in writing to each of the detainee's requests for medical care. The court held that the county jail director's actions and omissions in managing jail's suicide intervention practices did not rise to the level of deliberate indifference to the pretrial detainee's risk of suicide, even though the director delegated to the jail nurse significant responsibility for suicide intervention before formally training her on suicide policies and procedures, and the jail's actual suicide intervention practices did not comport with the jail's written policy. The court noted that the jail had a practice under the director's management of identifying detainees at risk of committing suicide, placing them on a suicide watch, and providing on-site medical attention, and the detainee remained on suicide watch and received medical attention including on the day of his suicide. The court held that the county lacked a custom, policy, or practice that violated the pretrial detainee's due process rights and caused his suicide, precluding recovery in the § 1983 action. The court found that, even though the county had flaws in its suicide intervention practices, the county did not have a continuing, widespread, and persistent pattern of constitutional misconduct regarding prevention of suicide in the county jail. Manning v. Sweitzer, 891 F.Supp.2d 961 (N.D.Ill. 2012). An arrestee brought an action against various village police officers and a village alleging unreasonable search and seizure of her vehicle, denial of the right to counsel, cruel and unusual punishment, conspiracy under § 1985, failure to train, unlawful detention, and several state law claims. The defendants moved to dismiss for failure to state a claim. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the detainee's allegation that she was offered medication for her unnamed mental ailment while incarcerated, but that she declined to accept the medication "for fear of overmedication or a harmful interaction," failed to establish that she was subjected to inhumane conditions or that the police were deliberately indifferent to a serious medical need, as required to support her claim that she was subjected to cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the Eighth Amendment and the Due Process Clause. According to the court, the arrestee's failure to allege any other incidents of wrongdoing by the village, combined with her failure to show that the unconstitutional consequences of the village's alleged failure to train its police officers were patently obvious, precluded her claim against the village. Olaniyi v. District of Columbia, 876 F.Supp.2d 39 (D.D.C. 2012). A pretrial detainee brought an action against the District of Columbia and the United States, asserting claims under § 1983 and the Federal Tort Claims Act (FTCA), arising from his detention and a separate incident involving a traffic stop. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The court held that past alleged deficiencies in medical services at the District of Columbia jail that were unrelated to unconstitutional forced medication of inmates could not have put the District on notice of the need for training to avoid an alleged due process violation arising from the detainee's being forcibly injected with a psychoactive drug while residing in the jail's mental health unit, and thus could not sustain a finding of deliberate indifference necessary to hold the District liable under § 1983 for an alleged due process violation. The court also held that the detainee failed to establish a pattern of similar due process violations by untrained or inadequately trained jail employees that could have put the District on notice of a need for more training with respect to forced medication of inmates, thus precluding the detainee's § 1983 due process claim against the District based on a failure to train theory. Rogers v. District of Columbia, 880 F.Supp.2d 163 (D.D.C. 2012). A former prisoner brought an action against the District of Columbia, alleging he was over-detained and asserting claims for negligent training and supervision. The district moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to when the prisoner was to be released. The district court began its opinion as follows: "Our saga begins with the tale of plaintiff's numerous arrests. Plaintiff was arrested on four different charges in 2007: two felony charges for violating the Bail Reform Act, one felony charge for Possession with Intent to Distribute a Controlled Substance and one misdemeanor charge for carrying an open can of alcohol without a permit." During the prisoner's time in jail he was sentenced for all of the remaining charges. The prisoner claimed he was over-detained by approximately two months, and that this was the direct result of the D.C. Jail's negligent training and supervision of its employees with regard to calculating jail credits. (District of Columbia Jail)

Schwartz v. Lassen County ex rel. Lassen County Jail (Detention Facility), 838 F.Supp.2d 1045 (E.D.Cal. 2012). The mother of a deceased pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action on behalf of herself and as successor in interest against a county, sheriff, city, police department, and several officers, alleging violations of the Fourteenth Amendment. The defendants filed a motion to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that allegations that: (1) the undersheriff knew the pretrial detainee from various encounters with the county, including his diverticulitis and congenital heart condition that required a restricted diet; (2) the undersheriff gave testimony to set bail for the detainee at $150,000 on a misdemeanor offense; (3) the detainee's doctor sent a letter explaining the detainee should be put on house arrest as opposed to detention because of his medical condition; (4) the detainee had to be admitted to a hospital for emergency surgery during a previous confinement; (5) the detainee's mother requested he be released for medical attention; (6) the detainee lost over 40 pounds during two weeks of detention; (7) the detainee requested to see a doctor but was told to "quit complaining;" and (8) the undersheriff personally knew the detainee was critically ill, were sufficient to plead that the undersheriff knew of and failed to respond to the detainee's serious medical condition, as would be deliberate indifference required to state a § 1983 claim alleging violations of Fourteenth Amendment due process after the detainee died. The court found that allegations that the undersheriff owed the pretrial detainee an affirmative duty to keep the jail and prisoners in it, and that he was answerable for their safekeeping, were sufficient to plead a duty, as required to state a claim of negligent infliction of emotional distress (NIED) under California law against the undersheriff after the detainee died. Woods v. City of Utica, 902 F.Supp.2d 273 (N.D.N.Y. 2012). A wheelchair-using, paraplegic arrestee sued a city, police officer, a county, a former sheriff, and county corrections officers, bringing federal causes of action for violations of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), the Rehabilitation Act, and Fourteenth Amendment equal protection and due process. The arrestee alleged that he was lifted out of his wheelchair and placed on the floor of a sheriff's van, forcing him to maneuver himself onto a bench seat which caused his pants and underwear to fall, exposing his genitals, that he was not secured to the bench with a seatbelt, causing him to be thrown about the passenger compartment and suffer leg spasms during his ride to the jail, that he was forced to urinate into an empty soda bottle and handle his sterile catheter with his hands that were dirty from moving himself around the floor of the van, and that the county corrections officers stood by as he struggled to maneuver himself out of the van and into his wheelchair while other inmates watched. The city and county defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court held that: (1) the city did not fail to accommodate the arrestee's disability, for purposes of the ADA and Rehabilitation Act claims; (2) summary judgment was precluded by fact issues as to whether the arrestee was denied the benefit of safe and appropriate transportation by the county on the day of his arrest when he was moved from a police station to a county jail; (3) the county was entitled to summary judgment to the extent the arrestee's claims involved his transportation from the jail to court proceedings on two other dates; (4) fact issues existed as to whether the county defendants were deliberately indifferent to the paraplegic inmate's known medical need for suppositories every other day, in violation of due process, but they were not deliberately indifferent to his need for catheters and prescription pain medication; and (5) the county defendants were not entitled to qualified immunity. The court noted that while the county defendants disputed the arrestee's version of the facts, corrections officers all denied receiving any training regarding how to transport disabled inmates. Wright v. County of Franklin, Ohio, 881 F.Supp.2d 887 (S.D.Ohio 2012). A pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against a county, sheriff, deputy, medical staff, and physician, alleging deliberate indifference to his serious medical needs in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment, and state common law claims. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the pretrial detainee who had abdominal pain had a serious medical need, as required to support a § 1983 claim against the county, sheriff, deputy, medical staff, and physician for deliberate indifference to his serious medical need in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. According to the court, as a result of the delay in diagnosis and treatment, the detainee was later rushed to a hospital, diagnosed with a small bowel obstruction and a mass in his colon, and subjected to emergency surgery. The court found that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issues of material fact as to: (1) whether a nurse failed to exercise judgment and instead chose to ignore serious symptoms that ultimately led to the pretrial detainee with abdominal pain having to undergo multiple major surgeries; (2) whether nurses did basically nothing in the face of the pretrial detainee's alarming symptoms, including vomiting blood and severe abdominal pain, which later proved to be precursor to a serious gastrointestinal issue. The court found that there was no evidence that the county or sheriff had a policy or custom of recklessly training medical staff who were contracted to work at the prison, as required to support the pretrial detainee's § 1983 claim for failure to train. The court noted that the detainee's claim was based on little more than the argument that the Sheriff's Office and the county did not do enough to ensure that nurses were familiar with policies applicable to inmates who need medical care. Belbachir v. County of McHenry, 726 F.3d 975 (7th Cir. 2013). The administrator of the estate of a female federal detainee who committed suicide in a county jail filed suit against the county, county jail officials, and employees of the medical provider that had a contract with the county to provide medical services at the jail, alleging violation of the detainee's due process rights and Illinois tort claims. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of all county defendants. The administrator appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The appeals court found that the jail inmate who was detained by federal immigration authorities pending her removal hearing was in the same position as a lawfully arrested pretrial detainee. The court noted that a pretrial detainee was entitled, pursuant to the due process clause, to at least as much protection during her detention as convicted criminals were entitled to under the Eighth Amendment--namely protection from harm caused by a defendant's deliberate indifference to the inmate's safety or health. The court asserted that persons who have been involuntarily committed are entitled, under the due process clause, to more considerate treatment during detention than criminals whose conditions of confinement are designed to punish. According to the court, the county sheriff's and county jail director's failure to provide annual training to jail staff on how to recognize the risk of suicide in detainees, and their failure to implement a suicide prevention policy, did not render the county liable under § 1983 for the detainee's suicide during her detention at the jail, absent a showing that such failures caused the detainee's suicide. Christie ex rel. estate of Christie v. Scott, 923 F.Supp.2d 1308 (M.D.Fla. 2013). An estate brought a § 1983 action against a private prison health services provider and corrections officers following the death of a detainee after he was pepper-sprayed over 12 times in 36 hours. The provider moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to: (1) whether failure of the nurses to inspect the detainee after each time he was pepper-sprayed constituted deliberate indifference; (2) whether the sheriff knew that corrections officers were using pepper spray nearly indiscriminately; (3) whether corrections officers were deliberately indifferent to the detainee's physical and medical needs; and (4) whether corrections officers' repeated pepper-spraying of the detainee while he was restrained naked in a chair was malicious and sadistic to the point of shocking the conscience. The estate alleged that the nurses' failed to evaluate the detainee after each time he was pepper-sprayed, failed to follow their employer's policy by not monitoring the detainee every 15 minutes for the periods he was restrained, and failed to offer the detainee fluids or a bedpan while he was restrained. The nurses allegedly checked the inmate only two times during the five hours he was restrained. The court found that the health services provider did not have a policy of understaffing that constituted deliberate indifference to the detainee's health, as required to support a § 1983 claim against the private provider. Eason v. Frye, 972 F.Supp.2d 935 (S.D.Miss. 2013). A pretrial detainee brought a pro se § 1983 action against an officer and a sheriff, alleging that the officer used excessive force by releasing his canine while responding to a fight between the detainee and another inmate, and that he did not receive immediate medical attention after the incident. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The district court held that: (1) the detainee failed to allege that the sheriff was personally involved in the dog bite incident, as required for § 1983 liability; (2) the officer did not use excessive force; (3) prison officials were not deliberately indifferent to the detainee's serious medical needs where there was no evidence that the officials refused to treat the detainee, ignored his complaints, or intentionally treated him incorrectly; (4) the detainee failed to state a § 1983 failure to train or supervise claim; (5) the sheriff was entitled to qualified immunity from the failure to train claim, where the detainee made no specific allegations about how the sheriff was unreasonable in his training and supervising methods; and (6) the detainee could not maintain a claim for mental or emotional suffering. The court noted that the detainee refused to stop fighting when the officer ordered him to stop, thus causing an obvious threat to security. In response, the officer applied the amount of force necessary to restore order on the tier, and as soon as the detainee went to the ground and stopped fighting, the officer ordered the dog to release its grip. The detainee suffered a minor injury when he was bitten by the dog. According to the court, the detainee made no specific allegations regarding how the training and supervision program at the detention facility was inadequate or defective, he contended that his numerous complaints and grievances went unanswered but provided no evidence of inadequate training or supervision, and he made no allegation of an official policy that caused the allegedly inadequate training and supervision. Holscher v. Mille Lacs County, 924 F.Supp.2d 1044 (D.Minn. 2013). Trustees for the next-of-kin of a pretrial detainee who committed suicide while incarcerated at a county jail brought an action against the county, alleging under § 1983 that the county provided inadequate medical care to the detainee, in violation of his due process rights. The trustees also asserted related claims for negligence and wrongful death under state law. The county moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the county had actual knowledge of the pretrial detainee's risk of suicide, as to whether the county was deliberately indifferent to that risk, and as to whether the detainee's death was the result of an unconstitutional custom. The court also held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the county's training of its jail employees on proper implementation of its suicide prevention policy was adequate, as to whether the county was deliberately indifferent in failing to revise its training, and as to whether any inadequate training on the part of the county caused the pretrial detainee's suicide. Konah v. District of Columbia, 915 F.Supp.2d 7 (D.D.C. 2013). A Liberian female formerly employed as a Licensed Practical Nurse (LPN) by a private health care corporation that contracted with the District of Columbia to provide medical treatment to inmates in a penitentiary, whose employment was terminated after she reported alleged harassment and assault and battery by inmates while administering medication to them, sued the District and a correctional officer, claiming they violated the Fourth and Fifth Amendments, Title VII, the District of Columbia Human Rights Act (DCHRA), and common laws. The district court partially granted the defendants' motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim. The employer and correctional officer moved for summary judgment, and the District of Columbia moved for judgment on the pleadings. The district court granted the motions in part. The court held that under District of Columbia law, the correctional officer did not assault, batter, or intentionally inflict emotional distress on the nurse absent evidence he delayed opening the front gate to a corridor outside the unit, in response to the LPN's request so she could get away from inmates making lewd and sexually threatening comments, with the intention that she suffer assault, battery or emotional distress. According to the court, the reason for his delay was that there were inmates in the sally port who would have been able to escape confinement if he opened gate.

The court found that the private health care corporation was not liable for a hostile work environment allegedly created for the LPN when on one occasion inmates made lewd and sexually threatening comments toward her and one grabbed her buttocks while she was administering medication to them. The court found that the corporation took reasonable and appropriate corrective steps to prevent harassment and to ensure that the environment for its nurses at the detention facility would be a safe and non-hostile job situation in a jail requiring direct contact with inmates could be, and the LPN knew of escort policy and a sick call room policy and was apparently in violation of those policies when the incident in question took place.

But the court found that the District of Columbia was not entitled to judgment on the pleadings with regard to the LPN's allegations that the District did not sufficiently train its employees in the Department of Corrections to ensure that nurses employed by the private health care corporation which was contracted to provide medical care for inmates at the detention facility were not subjected to constant gender-based lewd and nasty catcalls or acts by inmates. The court held that the LPN's allegations were sufficiently clear and detailed to make out a § 1983 cause of action based on Monell liability for a policy or custom, and importantly, the LPN had alleged sufficient facts to state a claim that District officials knew of the problem and that their failure to address it was deliberately indifferent. Morris v. Dallas County, 960 F.Supp.2d 665 (N.D.Tex. 2013) The parents of a detainee who died while in custody at a county jail brought a § 1983 action in state court against the county, the county jail medical staff, and officials, alleging violation of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) and constitutional violations. The action was removed to federal court. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that summary judgment for the defendants was precluded by fact issues with regard to: (1) the nurses who were defendants; (2) the claim that the county failed to monitor the detainee's health; and (3) failure to train officers on how to observe and assess the jail detainees' medical needs and respond to those needs. The court noted that the way the jail infirmary was structured, including the lack of direct access between the detainees and the nursing staff, and the absence of procedures for communication between the nurses and the correctional officers concerning emergent medical symptoms, were a county custom. According to the court, whether that custom was adopted or continued, even though it was obvious that its likely consequence would be a deprivation of medical care for the detainees, precluded summary judgment in favor of the county in the § 1983 deliberate indifference claim brought against the county. Poche v. Gautreaux, 973 F.Supp.2d 658 (M.D.La. 2013). A pretrial detainee brought an action against a district attorney and prison officials, among others, alleging various constitutional violations pursuant to § 1983, statutory violations under the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) and the Rehabilitation Act (RA), as well as state law claims, all related to her alleged unlawful detention for seven months. The district attorney and prison officials moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motions in part and denied in part. The court held that the detainee sufficiently alleged an official policy or custom, as required to establish local government liability for constitutional torts, by alleging that failures of the district attorney and the prison officials to implement policies designed to prevent the constitutional deprivations alleged, and to adequately train their employees in such tasks as processing paperwork related to detention, created such obvious dangers of constitutional violations that the district attorney and the prison officials could all be reasonably said to have acted with conscious indifference. The court found that the pretrial detainee stated a procedural due process claim against the district attorney and the prison officials under § 1983 related to her alleged unlawful detention for seven months, by alleging that it was official policy and custom of the officials to skirt constitutional requirements related to procedures for: (1) establishing probable cause to detain; (2) arraignment; (3) bail; and (4) appointment of counsel, and that the officials' policy and custom resulted in a deprivation of her liberty without due process. The court held that the detainee stated an equal protection claim against the prison officials under § 1983, by alleging that the officials acted with a discriminatory animus toward her because she was mentally disabled, and that she was repeatedly and deliberately punished for, and discriminated against, on that basis. Wilson v. Montano, 715 F.3d 847 (10th Cir. 2013). An arrestee brought a § 1983 action against a county sheriff, several deputies, and the warden of the county's detention center, alleging that he was unlawfully detained, and that his right to a prompt probable cause determination was violated. The district court denied the defendants' motion to dismiss. The defendants appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded in part. The detainee had been held for 11 days without a hearing and without charges being filed. The appeals court held that the defendants were not entitled to qualified immunity from the claim that they violated the arrestee's right to a prompt post-arrest probable cause determination, where the Fourth Amendment right to a prompt probable cause determination was clearly established at the time. The court held that the arrestee sufficiently alleged that the arresting sheriff's deputy was personally involved in the deprivation of his Fourth Amendment right to a prompt probable cause hearing, as required to support his § 1983 claim against the deputy. The arrestee alleged that he was arrested without a warrant, and that the deputy wrote out a criminal complaint but failed to file it in any court with jurisdiction to hear a misdemeanor charge until after he was released from the county's detention facility, despite having a clear duty under New Mexico law to ensure that the arrestee received a prompt probable cause determination. According to the court, under New Mexico law, the warden of the county's detention facility and the county sheriff were responsible for policies or customs that operated and were enforced by their subordinates, and for any failure to adequately train their subordinates. The court noted that statutes charged both the warden and the sheriff with responsibility to supervise subordinates in diligently filing a criminal complaint or information and ensuring that arrestees received a prompt probable cause hearing. The court found that the arrestee sufficiently alleged that the warden promulgated policies that caused the arrestee's prolonged detention without a probable cause hearing, and that the warden acted with the requisite mental state, as required to support his § 1983 claim against the warden, regardless of whether the arrestee ever had direct contact with the warden. The arrestee alleged that the warden did not require filing of written criminal complaints, resulting in the detainees' being held without receiving a probable cause hearing, and that the warden acted with deliberate indifference to routine constitutional violations at the facility.

The court held that the arrestee sufficiently alleged that the county sheriff established a policy or custom that led to the arrestee's prolonged detention without a probable cause hearing, and that the sheriff acted with the requisite mental state, as required to support his § 1983 claim against the sheriff, by alleging that: (1) the sheriff allowed deputies to arrest people and wait before filing charges, thus resulting in the arrest and detention of citizens with charges never being filed; (2) the sheriff was deliberately indifferent to ongoing constitutional violations occurring under his supervision and due to his failure to adequately train his employees; (3) routine warrantless arrest and incarceration of citizens without charges being filed amounted to a policy or custom; and (4) such policy was the significant moving force behind the arrestee's illegal detention. The estate and the widow of a pretrial detainee who died in a county jail brought civil rights and wrongful death actions against jail personnel and medical care providers who serviced the jail. The county defendants and the medical defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court held that: (1) the evidence was sufficient for a reasonable juror to find that the correctional officers and a jail superintendent were deliberately indifferent to the detainee's medical needs; (2) summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the officers knew that the detainee was suffering seizures while in jail and failed to take appropriate action; (3) a reasonable juror could have found that neither a physician nor a nurse made a reasoned medical judgment not to prescribe a particular anti-seizure drug for the detainee; and, (4) in the Seventh Circuit, private health care workers providing medical services to inmates are not entitled to assert qualified immunity. The court also found that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact concerning whether failure of the sheriff's office and the jail's medical services provider to provide adequate medical training to correctional officers caused the detainee's death.(Grundy County Jail, Illinois)

Finn v. Warren County, Kentucky, 768 F.3d 441 (6th Cir. 2014). The administrator of an inmate's estate and the guardian of the inmate's minor children brought a § 1983 action against a county, a jail's health care provider, and various jail employees, alleging violation of the inmate's Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment rights to receive adequate medical care while incarcerated. The district court granted summary judgment to some parties, and a jury returned verdicts for the remaining defendants on the remaining claims. The plaintiffs appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded in part and affirmed in part. The court held that a supervisory jailer was not entitled to qualified immunity for his ministerial acts of training deputy jailers to follow a written emergency medical services (EMS) policy and to enforce that policy as written. When the inmate's condition worsened, cellmates threw objects at a speaker in the top of the cell to activate the intercom to get the guards' attention. The cellmates reported to the guards ten to fifteen times that something was wrong with the inmate and that he needed to be taken to the hospital. According to the inmates, the guards ignored their pleas for help and turned off the television in their housing unit. A senior supervisor's incident report alleged that he checked on the inmate several times, while the jail's observation log showed that he checked on the inmate only twice: at 5:27 a.m. and at 6:28 a.m. Later the inmate died in the cell, and although he was found dead in his cell, a deputy entered on the observation log "appears to be okay." Graham v. Hodge, 69 F.Supp.3d 618 (S.D.Miss. 2014). The spouse of a pretrial detainee who died of cardiac arrhythmia brought a wrongful death action against a sheriff and a county alleging deliberate indifference to the detainee's medical care under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, as well as failure to train under § 1983. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The court held that a nurse was not deliberately indifferent to the detainee's medical needs, notwithstanding that the nurse waited 13 days to fax a medical authorization to a care center, that she sent the detainee to a medical clinic that had no cardiologist, that she was not aware for several months that the detainee was not taking necessary heart medication, and that the detainee ultimately died of cardiac arrhythmia. According to the court, the nurse regularly treated the detainee, which included providing him with his medication once she was made aware of its necessity, and the detainee's death was not proximately caused by the months-long lack of medicine. The court found that the detainee's death was not a highly predictable consequence of failing to train the jail nurse. (Jones County Adult Detention Facility, Mississippi)

Hernandez v. County of Monterey, 70 F.Supp.3d 963 (N.D.Cal. 2014). Current and recently released inmates from a county jail brought an action against the county, the sheriff's office, and the private company that administered all jail health care facilities and services, alleging, on behalf of a class of inmates, that substandard conditions at the jail violated the federal and state constitutions, the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), the Rehabilitation Act, and a California statute prohibiting discrimination in state-funded programs. The inmates sought declaratory and injunctive relief. The defendants filed motions to dismiss. The district court denied the motions. The court held that both current and recently released inmates had standing to pursue their claims against the county and others for allegedly substandard conditions at the jail, even though the recently released inmates were no longer subject to the conditions they challenged. The court noted that the short average length of stay of inmates in the proposed class, which was largely made up of pretrial detainees, was approximately 34 days, and that short period, coupled with the plodding speed of legal action and the fact that other persons similarly situated would continue to be subject to the challenged conduct, qualified the plaintiffs for the "inherently transitory" exception to the mootness doctrine.

The court found that the inmates sufficiently alleged that the private company that administered all jail health care facilities and services operated a place of public accommodation, as required to state a claim for violation of ADA Title III. The court noted that: "The complaint alleges a litany of substandard conditions at the jail, including: violence due to understaffing, overcrowding, inadequate training, policies, procedures, facilities, and prisoner classification; inadequate medical and mental health care screening, attention, distribution, and resources; and lack of policies and practices for identifying, tracking, responding, communicating, and providing accessibility for accommodations for prisoners with disabilities." Kitchen v. Dallas County, Tex., 759 F.3d 468 (5th Cir. 2014). The widow of a pretrial detainee who died of asphyxiation while he was being extracted from his jail cell brought a § 1983 action against the county, detention officers, and others, alleging that the defendants used excessive force and acted with deliberate indifference to the detainee's medical needs. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in its entirety, and the plaintiff appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded in part, and affirmed in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to both the timing and the degree of force used in extracting the detainee from his jail cell. According to the court, the widow failed to establish that the county failed to provide proper training to personnel located in the facility's North tower, where the detainee was being held when he died, where the widow pointed to no pattern of past constitutional violations bearing a sufficient resemblance to the events surrounding the death of detainee. Nam Dang v. Sheriff of Seminole County, Fla., 38 F.Supp.3d 1333 (M.D.Fla. 2014). A pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against a county sheriff, county jail medical staff, and others, alleging that he was deprived of his constitutional right to receive adequate medical care for his meningitis, resulting in multiple strokes and severe brain damage. The defendants moved to dismiss. The district court denied the motions, finding that the pretrial detainee had serious medical needs, his allegations stated a claim against jail nurses for deliberate indifference to his serious medical needs, and the detainee stated a § 1983 claim against the county sheriff. The detainee allegedly experienced severe and increasing neck and back pain, minimal neck rotation, fever, and bouts of unconsciousness and was eventually diagnosed with meningitis, and ended up suffering multiple strokes and brain damage. The inmate alleged that the nurses who regularly attended to the detainee over a period of weeks were well aware of his increasing symptoms and declining health, that the nurses allegedly put him on muscle relaxants and returned him repeatedly to the general population, that the nurses allegedly made no meaningful effort to diagnose or treat his condition, until he passed out in a wheelchair, could not sit up, and became unresponsive. The court held that the detainee's allegations that the lack of meaningful health care training of county jail personnel was the result of the county sheriff's deliberate cost-cutting efforts, and that the lack of such training was reckless and created an obvious risk that the detainee's constitutional right to adequate medical care for his serious medical need of meningitis would be violated, stated a § 1983 claim against county sheriff. Robinson v. Keita, 20 F.Supp.3d 1140 (D.Colo. 2014). An arrestee brought an action against a city, city police officers, a county, and sheriff's deputies, alleging under § 1983 that he was unreasonably arrested and incarcerated for a 12-day period. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that: (1) a front desk officer was entitled to qualified immunity from unlawful arrest claim; (2) the deputies who transported the arrestee from a police station across the street to a detention facility, and assisted in the arrestee's booking, were entitled to qualified immunity from a substantive due process claim; (3) there was no evidence that the city's alleged policy of relying on the state court to schedule a hearing after promptly being advised of a warrant arrest was substantially certain to result in a constitutional violation; but (4) summary judgment was precluded by fact issues as to whether the city had actual or constructive notice that its failure to train as to how to process conflicting information during the process of "packing" an arrest warrant for distribution was substantially certain to result in a constitutional violation, and as to whether the city substantially chose to disregard the risk of harm. Rowlery v. Genesee County, 54 F.Supp.3d 763 (E.D.Mich. 2014). A detainee brought an action against a county and officers and deputies in the county sheriff's department, alleging that he was assaulted by deputies on two occasions when he was lodged at the county jail. The defendants moved for partial summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The district court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to: (1) whether the county adequately trained officers and deputies regarding the use of force; (2) whether certain officers and deputies came into physical contact with the detainee; (3) whether certain officers and deputies failed to act reasonably when they did not act to prevent or limit other deputies' use of force on the detainee; and (4) whether the alleged failure of certain officers and deputies to put a stop to other deputies' use of force on the detainee was the proximate cause of the detainee's injuries. Shepherd v. Powers, 55 F.Supp.3d 508 (S.D.N.Y. 2014). An inmate at a county jail brought a § 1983 action against a first correction officer, a second correction officer, and a county, asserting excessive force in violation of the Eighth Amendment, malicious prosecution, and denying or interfering with the inmate's religious rights. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court denied the motion. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine dispute of material fact as to whether the force a correction officer at the county jail used in grabbing and squeezing the inmate's testicles was applied maliciously or sadistically to cause harm, in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The court also found fact issues as to whether the correction officer's conduct, including throwing the inmate to the floor, was objectively malicious and sadistic. According to the court, fact issues existed as to whether the county had a custom and practice of using excessive force or failed to adequately train or supervise correction officers in the use of force, precluding summary judgment on the inmate's § 1983 claim against the county. Thomas v. Cumberland County, 749 F.3d 217 (3rd Cir. 2014). Following an attack by other inmates at a county correctional facility, an inmate brought an action against the county and corrections officers at the facility pursuant to § 1983 and the New Jersey Civil Rights Act, alleging failure to train, failure to protect, failure to intervene, and incitement. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the county and an officer. The inmate's claims against the other officer proceeded to trial, and a jury found in favor of the officer. The inmate appealed the district court's grant of summary judgment in the county's favor on the § 1983 failure to train claim. The appeals court vacated. The court held that a triable issue remained as to whether the county exhibited deliberate indifference to the need for pre-service training for officers in conflict de-escalation and intervention and whether the lack of such training caused the inmate's injuries. Brauner v. Coody, 793 F.3d 493 (5th Cir. 2015). A state prisoner, who was a paraplegic, brought an action against a prison medical director, assistant warden, and prison doctors, alleging deliberate indifference to his serious medical condition. The district court denied the parties' cross-motions for summary judgment. The defendants appealed. The appeals court reversed, finding that: (1) prison doctors were not deliberately indifferent to the prisoner's serious medical needs by failing to provide him with adequate pain management; (2) officials were not deliberately indifferent by subjecting the prisoner to unsanitary showers; and (3) doctors did not fail to provide adequate training and supervision regarding proper wound care, even if the prisoner's wound care by nurses and other subordinates was occasionally sporadic, where the doctors were active in managing it, and they regularly changed the prescribed frequency of the bandage changes based on the changing condition of the prisoner's wounds, and also prescribed antibiotic therapy regimens to assist with healing. The court noted that it was undisputed that the showers were cleaned twice per day with bleach, that the prisoner was given a disinfectant spray bottle for his personal use, and that the prisoner was permitted to enter the showers before the other prisoners so that he could clean himself without interference, and there was no showing that the prisoner was ever prohibited from using the showers. Coley v. Lucas County, Ohio, 799 F.3d 530 (6th Cir. 2015). The administrator of a pretrial detainee's estate brought a state court action against a county, county sheriff, police officer and police sergeant, alleging § 1983 violations of the detainee's constitutional rights and various state law claims. The district court denied the defendants' motions to dismiss and denied individual defendants' requests for qualified immunity. The defendants appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that a police officer's act of shoving a fully restrained pretrial detainee in a jail booking area, causing the detainee to strike his head on the wall as he fell to the cement floor without any way to break his fall, constituted "gratuitous force" in violation of the detainee's Fourteenth Amendment right to be free from excessive force. The court noted that the detainee's state of being handcuffed, in a belly chain and leg irons, led to a reasonable inference that the officer's actions were a result of his frustration with the detainee's prior restraint behavior, since the detainee was not in any condition to cause a disruption that would have provoked the officer to use such force. The court held that the police officer was on notice that his actions were unconstitutional, and therefore he was not entitled to qualified immunity from liability under § 1983. According to the court, the officer's attempts to cover up the assault by filing false reports and lying to federal investigators following the death of the detainee led to a reasonable conclusion that the officer understood that his actions violated the detainees' clearly established right not to be gratuitously assaulted while fully restrained and subdued. The court found that the county sheriff could be held personally liable under § 1983, based on his failure to train and supervise employees in the use of excessive force, the use of a chokehold and injuries derived therefrom, and to ensure that the medical needs of persons in the sheriff's custody were met. Ewing v. Cumberland County, 152 F.Supp.3d 269 (D. N.J. 2015). A former arrestee brought a § 1983 action, bringing claims against county correctional officers, police officers, and a number of municipal entities for use of excessive force and other constitutional violations. The defendants filed nine motions for summary judgment. The district court held that (1) issues of fact existed as to whether the force used on detainee was imposed maliciously and sadistically to cause harm; (2) issues of fact existed as to whether two officers who were not in the room when excessive force was allegedly used on the pre-trial detainee knew of and failed to intervene in the assault; (3) issues of fact existed as to whether five correctional officers conspired to cover up their actions; (4) issues of fact existed as to whether the police officer who had taken the detainee back to the jail after a trip to the hospital had reason to believe that the detainee's safety was in jeopardy when the officer left the jail, and (5) genuine issues of material fact existed as to whether the county trained its correctional officers on the use of force, whether the other trainings that took place were inadequate and untimely, whether that failure to train amounted to deliberate indifference, and whether there was a causal link between that lack of training and the injuries the detainee sustained at the hands of correction officers, precluding summary judgment for the defendants in the failure to train claim. According to the court, the detainee, while unarmed, suffered life-threatening injuries while in an isolated room with five officers, and that none of the officers were injured, indicated that the officers used force beyond what was necessary to take down the detainee, in a manner intended to inflict pain. The court noted that it was clearly established, at the time of the incident, that prisoners were protected from excessive force and wanton beatings that exceed good-faith efforts to maintain discipline and order, and a reasonable officer would have known that the force used was excessive. Shadrick v. Hopkins County, Ky., 805 F.3d 724 (6th Cir. 2015). The mother of deceased inmate brought a § 1983 action against a county and a medical provider, which contracted with county to provide medical services to county inmates, alleging that the medical provider's failure to train and supervise its nurses violated the inmate's constitutional right to adequate medical care and that the medical provider was negligent under state law. The twenty-five year old inmate had entered the jail to serve a short sentence for a misdemeanor offense. He died three days later from complications of an untreated methicillin-resistant staphylococcus aureas (MRSA) infection. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the medical provider. The mother appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the medical provider's training program was inadequate, whether the inadequacy resulted from its deliberate indifference to inmate's right to adequate medical care, and whether the inadequacy caused, or was closely related to, the inmate's death. The court noted that the nurses were required to make professional judgments outside their area of medical expertise, and unless training was provided, the nurses lacked knowledge about the constitutional consequences of their actions or inactions in providing medical care to inmates. The court found that the medical provider did not derive its existence and status from the county, and thus was not entitled to share the county's governmental immunity on a Kentucky negligence claim. The court noted that nearly all of the inmate's medical conditions-- high blood pressure, rheumatoid arthritis, gout, osteoporosis, and staph infection-- had been diagnosed by a private physician as mandating treatment, and deputy jailers could tell that the inmate needed prompt medical treatment even though they did not have the same medical training as the nurses who were employed at the county jail. Shaidnagle v. Adams County, Miss., 88 F.Supp.3d 705 (S.D.Miss. 2015). After a detainee committed suicide while being held in a county jail, his mother, individually, on behalf of the detainee's wrongful death beneficiaries, and as administratrix of the detainee's estate, brought an action against the county, sheriff, jail staff, and others, asserting claims for deprivation of civil rights, equitable relief, and declaratory judgment. The defendants brought a § 1988 cross-claim for attorney fees and costs against the plaintiff, and subsequently moved for summary judgment. The court held that neither the sheriff nor another alleged policymaker could be held liable on a theory of supervisory liability for failure to train or supervise, where the mother did not show that the training jail staff received was inadequate, and the policy in place to determine whether the detainee was a suicide risk was not the "moving force" behind a constitutional violation. The court held that the correct legal standard was not whether jail officers "knew or should have known," but whether they had gained actual knowledge of the substantial risk of suicide and responded with deliberate indifference. The court held that neither party was entitled to attorney fees as the "prevailing party." (Adams County Jail, Mississippi)

Shepard v. Hansford County, 110 F.Supp.3d 696 (N.D. Tex. 2015). A husband brought an action against a county and a county jail employee under § 1983 alleging deliberate indifference to detainee health in violation of the right to provision of adequate medical treatment under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, following his wife's suicide while in the county jail. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that: (1) the jail employee was entitled to qualified immunity; (2) summary judgment was precluded by a fact issue as to whether the jail employee violated the detainee's rights, (3) the county had an adequate suicide risk prevention training policy, where employees were required to attend training to learn about suicide risk detection and prevention methods, and were required to read the county's policy on conducting face-to-face suicide checks with detainees; (4) the county adequately trained employees on cell entry; but (5) a fact issue existed as to whether the county had an unwritten policy of understaffing the jail, precluding summary judgment. The court noted that it was not clearly established at the time of the suicide that an employee was required to abandon other duties to ensure that suicide watch checks were completed, and it was not clearly established that the employee was prohibited from providing a detainee with a towel in a cell with "tie-off points," since the employee was not aware of any other suicides in that cell. According to the court, the jail cell entry policy prohibiting jail employees from entering a cell alone did not amount to training employees to be deliberately indifferent to the needs of detainees, and was not causally related to the detainee's death, and thus the county was not liable under § 1983 for deliberate indifference to detainee health. Young v. District of Columbia, 107 F.Supp.3d 69 (D.D.C. 2015). A pretrial detainee who was shot in the back by a police officer brought an action against the municipal police department and the officer, alleging under § 1983 that the defendants violated his Fourth Amendment rights by seizing him without probable cause and using excessive force. The defendants moved for partial dismissal for failure to state claim. The district court granted the motions in part and denied in part. The court held that the officer was entitled to qualified immunity from the claim that handcuffing and shackling of the detainee during hospital treatment violated his due process rights, where the law regarding use of handcuffs and shackles on a pretrial detainee during hospital treatment was not clearly established at the time of the incident in question. The court held that the detainee failed to state a § 1983 claim based on the municipality's alleged failure to train the officer, absent allegations regarding any specific policy or custom, the enforcement of which caused the detainee's injury, or any particular deficiency in training or supervision resulting in the officer's allegedly shooting an unarmed man with his hands raised. (District of Columbia and D.C. Metropolitan Police Department)

U.S. Supreme Court
DUE PROCESS

Meachum v. Fano, 427 U.S. 215 (1976), reh'g denied, 429 U.S. 873 (1976).
Fano and other sentenced inmates confined in the Massachusetts Correctional Institute at Norfolk brought this 42 U.S.C. Section 1983 action against Meachum, the prison superintendent, the State Commissioner of Corrections, and the Acting Deputy for Classification and Treatment, alleging that by being transferred to a less favorable institution without an adequate fact-finding hearing, the inmates are being denied liberty without due process of law. The inmates sought injunctive and declaratory relief, as well as damages. The U.S. District Court, interpreting Wolff v. McDonnell, 418 U.S. 539 (1974) granted relief, and a divided First Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed. The prison official's petition for writ of certiorari was granted.

HELD: Absent a state law or practice conditioning such transfers on proof of serious misconduct or the occurrence of other events, the due process clause of the fourteenth amendment does not entitle a state prisoner to a hearing when he is transferred to a prison where the conditions are substantially less favorable to the prisoner. 427 U.S. at 216.

REASONING: a. [G]iven a valid conviction, the criminal defendant has been constitutionally deprived of his liberty to the extent that the state may confine him and subject him to the rules of its prison system so long as the conditions of confinement do not otherwise violate the Constitution.

b. The Constitution does not require that the state have more than one prison for convicted felons; nor does it guarantee that the convicted inmate will be placed in any particular prison if, as is likely, the state had more than one correctional institution. The initial decision to assign the convict to a particular institution is not subject to audit under the due process clause, although the degree of confinement in one prison may be quite different from that in another. 427 U.S. at 224.

c. Confinement in any of the state's institutions is within the normal limits or range of custody which the conviction has authorized the state to impose. That life in one prison is much more disagreeable than in another does not in itself signify that a fourteenth amendment liberty interest is implicated when a prisoner is transferred to the institution with more severe rules.

d. [T]o hold... that any substantial deprivation imposed by prison authorities triggers the procedural protections of the due process clause would subject to judicial review a wide spectrum of discretionary actions that traditionally have been the business of prison administrators rather than of the federal courts. 427 U.S. at 225.

e. Whatever expectation the prisoner may have in remaining at a particular prison so long as he behaves himself, it is too ephemeral and insubstantial to trigger procedural due process protections as long as prison officials have discretion to transfer him for whatever reason, or for no reason at all. 427 U.S. at 228.

NOTE: This case was distinguished from Wolff in that in Wolff a state created right--good time credits--involved a liberty interest necessitating due process protection. In this case, no such state-created right was present. Thus, the Wolff due process procedures are not applicable. (Massachusetts Correctional Institute, Norfolk)

REPRISAL
DUE PROCESS

Montayne v. Haymes, 427 U.S. 236 (1976). Following his removal from assignment as inmate clerk in the Attica Correctional Facility law library, Haymes circulated a petition signed by eighty-two inmates addressed to a federal judge alleging that his removal denied them access to adequate legal assistance. Prison officials seized the petition and Haymes was transferred to another maximum security institution.

Haymes initiated this 42 U.S.C. Section 1983, 28 U.S.C. 2 1343 action against Montayne, superintendent at Attica, contending his transfer was in reprisal for having rendered legal assistance to other inmates as well as having sought redress in the courts. The U.S. District Court dismissed the complaint, but the Second Circuit Court of Appeals reversed and remanded for determination whether in fact the transfer was reprisal. Montayne sought certiorari from the U.S. Supreme Court. (Reversed.) HELD: "We...disagree with the...general proposition that the due process clause by its own force requires hearings whenever prison authorities transfer a prisoner to another institution because of his breech of prison rules, at least where the transfer may be said to involve substantially burdensome consequences. As long as the conditions or the degree of confinement to which the prisoner is subjected is within the sentence imposed upon him and is not otherwise violative of the Constitution, the due process clause does not in itself subject an inmate's treatment by prison authorities to judicial oversight. The clause does not require hearings in connection with transfers whether or not they are the result of the inmate's misbehavior or may be labeled as disciplinary or punitive." 427 U.S. at 242.

NOTE: Under New York law, convicted adults are committed to the custody of the Commissioner of Corrections who initially assigns them to specific institutions and may subsequently transfer them from one correctional facility to another. The transfer is not conditioned upon or limited to the occurrence of misconduct. 427 U.S. at 243. (Attica Correctional Facility, New York)

Ward v. Johnson, 437 F.Supp. 1053 (E.D. Vir. 1977). In an action by a state prisoner under the 1871 civil rights statute, the district court held that the prisoner's claims that he was unjustly transferred from one state prison to another, that his transfer was accomplished without approval of a central classification board, that his personal property was sent to his home and he had to purchase similar items from the prison commissary and that he was defamed by a correctional officer and threatened by a correctional officer, failed to state any claim cognizable in federal court. States, not federal courts are supervisors of state prisons, and federal court will intervene only to protect constitutional interests. State Appeals Court
STATE STATUTE

State v. Grey, 602 S.W.2d 259 (Tenn. Crim. App. 1980). A pretrial detainee, about whom rumors of escape were abundant, could not be transferred to the state penitentiary under the Tennessee safekeeping statute. Barry Grey was incarcerated in the Davidson, Tennessee County Jail, unable to post bond after an arrest. Shortly after his arrest, based upon alleged rumors of an imminent escape attempt, the state sought to transfer him. The statute involved, (T.C.A. 41-1125) provides: In all cases where the jail in which a prisoner is confined becomes insufficient from any cause, any circuit or criminal judge, upon the application of the sheriff and proof of the fact, may order the prisoner, by mittimus or warrant, to be removed to the nearest sufficient jail.

Based upon the above statute the trial judge before whom the motion was presented allowed the transfer, and an immediate appeal was taken. On appeal, the Court of Criminal Appeals of Tennessee held that the state penitentiary was not a "jail" as defined by the statute. The court noted that the stigma attached to confinement in the state penitentiary should not be imposed upon a pretrial detainee without specific statutory authorization. The court then ruled that this statute did not provide such authorization. (Davidson County Jail, Tennessee)

U.S. Appeals Court
COURT TRANSFER

Streeter v. Hopper, 618 F.2d 1178 (5th Cir. 1980). Racial tensions were purportedly running high at the Georgia State Prison, and an inmate committee was formed to negotiate with officials to bring about changes. The two plaintiffs, Ron Streeter and Dwight Lindsey, were named to the committee. Subsequently, negotiations broke down, and the prison chapel was set on fire. Officials at the prison later received information that Streeter and Lindsey had ordered the fires, and they were placed in administrative segregation. The two inmates filed a lawsuit challenging their segregation. They later asked the court to transfer them to another prison, allegedly because their lives were in danger.

The district court ordered their transfer, and in this opinion, the trial court's judgment was affirmed. The U.S. Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals stated that in cases like this, trial courts should proceed with caution. In this case, however, there was testimony that a prison officer with a reputation for violence among the inmates had threatened the two plaintiffs. The two men also claimed to have received threats from other inmates and from other officers.

The appellate court ruled that under these circumstances, the transfer was proper. However, the appellate court emphasized the fact that under the terms of the lower court order, the inmates were to be returned upon their request or if the officials could demonstrate at a hearing that the conditions of endangerment had been eliminated. (State Prison, Reidsville, Georgia)

U.S. Supreme Court
MENTAL INSTITUTION
DUE PROCESS

Vitek v. Jones, 100 S.Ct. 1254 (1980). Pursuant to a Nebraska statute allowing transfer to a mental institution when an inmate is found to be suffering from a mental illness or defect which cannot be treated at the correctional facility, Jones was to be transferred from the Nebraska State Prison to a State Mental Hospital. In this suit against state officials, Jones challenged the adequacy of the procedures by which the statute permits transfers, on a procedural due process basis.

A three judge U.S. district court declared the statute unconstitutional as violating the fourteenth amendment due process protections. The court permanently enjoined the state from transferring Jones, unless it adhered to certain procedures outlined by the Court.

The Supreme Court noted probable jurisdiction (434 U.S. 1060). Meanwhile, Jones had been paroled on condition that he accept psychiatric treatment at a VA Hospital. In light of this, the Supreme Court vacated the district court's judgment and remanded the case to that court for a determination on the question of mootness. (Vitek v. Jones, 436 U.S. 407 1978). Both Jones and the state agreed the case was not moot. The district court reinstated its original judgment and the case came back to the Supreme Court for a hearing on the merits. Jones, meanwhile was back in prison for violation of parole. (Affirmed.)

HELD: The district court correctly identified a liberty interest in the Nebraska statute, under which a prisoner could reasonably expect that he would not be transferred to a mental hospital without a finding that he was suffering from a mental illness for which he could not secure treatment in the correctional facility. Further, the district court correctly concluded that transferring Jones to a mental institution had "some stigmatizing" consequences, which together with the mandating behavior modification treatment Jones would be subjected to at the hospital, constituted a major change in the conditions of confinement amounting to a grave loss "that should not be imposed without the opportunity for notice and an adequate hearing."

HELD: The objective expectation, firmly fixed in state law and official correctional practice that a prisoner would not be transferred unless he suffered from a mental disease or defect that could not be adequately treated in the prison, gave Jones a liberty interest that entitled him to the benefits of appropriate procedures in connection with determining the conditions that warranted his transfer to a mental hospital.

HELD: "Nebraska's reliance on the opinion of a designated physician or psychologist for determining whether the conditions warranting a transfer exist neither removes the prisoner's interest from due process protection, nor answers the question of what process is due under the Constitution." 100 S.Ct. 1262.

HELD: "[A] convicted felon...is entitled to the benefit of procedures appropriate in the circumstances before he is found to have a mental disease and transferred to a mental hospital." 100 S.Ct. at 1263.

HELD: "[T]he stigmatizing consequences of a transfer to a mental hospital for involuntary psychiatric treatment coupled with the subjection of the prisoner to mandatory behavior modification as a treatment for mental illness constitute the kind of deprivations of liberty that require procedural protections." 100 S.Ct. at 1264.

HELD: "Because prisoners facing involuntary transfer to a mental hospital are threatened with immediate deprivation of liberty interests they are currently enjoying and because of the inherent risk of a mistaken transfer, the district court properly determined that procedures similar to those required by the court in Morrissey v. Brewer, 408 U.S. 471 (1972] were appropriate in the circumstances present here.

The district court held that to afford sufficient protection to the liberty identified, the following minimum procedures must be observed before transferring a prisoner to a mental hospital:

a. Written notice to the prisoner that a transfer to a mental hospital is being considered;

b. A hearing, sufficiently after the notice, to permit the prisoner to prepare, at which disclosure to the prisoner is made of the evidence being relied upon for the transfer and at which an opportunity to be heard in person and to present documentary evidence is given;

c. An opportunity at the hearing to present testimony of witnesses by the defense and to confront and cross-examine witnesses called by the state, except upon a finding, not arbitrarily made, of good cause for not permitting such presentation, confrontation or cross-examination;

d. An independent decision-maker;

e. A written statement by the fact finder as to the evidence relied on and the reasons for transferring the inmate;

f. Availability of legal counsel, furnished by the state, if the inmate is financially unable to furnish his own, and;

g. Effective and timely notice of all the frequency rights.

DETAINEES
DUE PROCESS

Cobb v. Atych, 643 F.2d 946 (3rd Cir. 1981). The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit, sitting en banc, held that the sixth amendment right to counsel prohibits the transference of pretrial detainees to distant state prisons without first affording them notice and an opportunity to be heard in court. Such transfers, the court found, severely interfere with the inmates' access to counsel. A majority of the court also relied heavily on the speedy trial clause in its argument. Eighty percent of the pretrial detainees involved in the suit were represented by the public defenders, who were financially unable to make long trips to the state institutions. Due to the prolonging of the pretrial period due to continuances and other factors associated with the distance to the detention facility, some transferred inmates spent more time incarcerated pretrial than the eventual length of their sentences. Three of the judges also concluded that the right to counsel, speedy trial provisions and the bail clause of the eighth amendment create a federally protected interest in reducing pretrial incarceration and minimizing interference with a pretrial detainee's liberty. "The eighth amendment's prohibition against excessive bail bears plainly and directly upon the ability of charged persons to prepare for trial and upon the presumption of a right to be free from restraint which those persons enjoy. It should also be read as preventing not merely the fact of detention, but also those forms of detention that unnecessarily interfere with those liberty interests." The case also involved the transfer of sentenced prisoners and those who have been convicted but are still awaiting sentencing. The court found that no federally protected interests were involved for the sentenced population, but unsentenced prisoners have speedy-trial and counsel rights similar to those of pretrial detainees. State v. Berger, 618 S.W.2d 215 (Ct. App. Mo. 1981). Transfer to another jail does not violate due process. TRANSFER

Lyons v. Papantoniou, 558 F.Supp. 4 (E.D. Tenn. 1982), aff'd, 705 F.2d 455 (6th Cir. 1982). Transfer from one county jail to another does not violate constitutional rights. Since the federal constitution did not secure the right of an inmate to be confined in any particular jail, the federal district court did not have reason to review the transfer. The inmate's temporary twenty-four hour confinement in the latter jail in a cell lacking adequate bathroom facilities and cigarettes did not amount to cruel and unusual punishment. Portis v. Evans, 297 S.E.2d 248 (Sup. Ct. Ga. 1982). Court has discretion to transfer an inmate to a prison with a law library. DETAINEES

Black v. Delbello, 575 F.Supp. 28 (S.D. N.Y. 1983). Pretrial detainee's transfer left within the discretion of jail officials. A pretrial detainee was transferred to another jail by administrators who cited overcrowding as the reason for the transfer. The detainee sued, alleging that since there were many empty beds in the facility, there was no need for the transfer.

The federal district court found that the transfer was authorized by New York statutes and an order by the New York State Commission of Corrections. Relying on Meachum v. Fano, 427 U.S. 215, 96 S.Ct. 2532 (1976), the court refused to interfere, finding that this matter was properly left within the discretion of jail officials. LIBERTY INTEREST

Breest v. Moran, 571 F.Supp. 343 (D. R.I. 1983). A New Hampshire inmate may be transferred to Rhode Island. Challenging his transfer from a New Hampshire prison to a prison in Rhode Island, an inmate filed a petition for a writ of habeas corpus. The district court found that under New Hampshire law, a prisoner had no continuing right to remain incarcerated at a specific facility. Since he had no such right under state law, he had no protectable liberty interest under the federal Constitution that would have prevented his transfer to Rhode Island. The prisoner's petition was denied and dismissed. (Adult Correctional Facility, Cranston, Rhode Island)

U.S. Supreme Court
LIBERTY INTEREST

Olim v. Wakinekona, 461 U.S. 238 (1983). Petitioner were members of a prison "Program Committee" who investigated a breakdown in discipline and the failure of certain programs within the maximum control unit of the Hawaii State Prison outside Honolulu and singled out the respondent and another inmate as troublemakers. After a hearing, the respondent having been notified thereof and having retained counsel to represent him, the same committee recommended that the respondent's classification as a maximum security risk be continued and that he be transferred to a prison on the mainland.

The administrator of the prison accepted the Committee's recommendation, and the respondent was transferred to a California state prison. He then filed suit against the petitioners in federal district court, alleging that he had been denied procedural due process because the Committee that recommended his transfer consisted of the same persons who had initiated the hearing, contrary to a Hawaii prison regulation, and because the Committee was biased against him.

The district court dismissed the complaint, holding that the Hawaii prison regulations governing prison transfers did not create a substantive liberty interest protected by the due process clause of the fourteenth amendment. The court of appeals disagreed and reversed.

The United States Supreme Court held: 1. An interstate prison transfer does not deprive an inmate of any liberty interest protected by the due process clause in and of itself. Just as an inmate has no justifiable expectation that he will be incarcerated in any particular prison within a state so as to implicate the due process clause directly when an intrastate prison transfer is made, Meachum v. Fano, 427 U.S. 215; Montanye v. Haymes, 427 U.S. 236, he has no justifiable expectation that he will be incarcerated in any particular state. Statutes and interstate agreements recognize that, from time to time, it is necessary to transfer inmates to prisons in other states. Confinement in another state is within the normal limits or range of custody which the conviction has authorized the transferring state to impose. Even when, as here, the transfer involves long distances and an ocean crossing, the confinement remains within constitutional limits. Pp. 244-248.

2. Nor do Hawaii's prison regulations create a constitutionally protected liberty interest. Although a state creates a protected liberty interest by placing substantive limitations on official discretion, Hawaii's prison regulations place no substantive limitations on the prison administrator's discretion to transfer an inmate. For that matter, the regulations prescribe no substantive standards to guide the Program Committee whose task is to advise the administrator. Thus no significance attaches to the fact that the prison regulations require a particular kind of hearing before the administrator can exercise his unfettered discretion. Pp. 248-251. 664 F.2d 708, reversed. (Hawaii State Prison)

U.S. District Court
ACCESS TO ATTORNEY

Pino v. Dalsheim, 558 F.Supp. 673 (S.D. N.Y. 1983). Access to legal counsel does not have to be ideal. Inmates are not entitled to special consideration in consulting their attorneys, the Federal District Court for the Southern District of New York has held. The plaintiff in this case, Wilfred Pino, Jr. filed a pro se (representing himself) action in federal district court in New York alleging violation of his due process rights as a result of disciplinary action taken against him while he was an inmate at the Downstate Correctional Facility. At his request, counsel was appointed for him. He was then transferred to the Clinton Correctional Facility in Dannemore, New York, which is more than 300 miles from the offices of Pino's court appointed counsel. Pino did not contend that his transfer was retaliation against him for filing the complaint. Prison officials agreed to transfer him back to Downstate sixty days before trial to afford him an opportunity to prepare.

Regulations of the Clinton facility allowed unlimited, uncensored correspondence between inmates and their attorneys, private visits with their attorneys as often as they wish, but only two, eight minute telephone calls each month. The telephone calls include those with family members. Calls to attorneys are counted against the limit. Only under emergency circumstances are inmates allowed to receive telephone calls. Cleveland v. Goin, 703 P.2d 204 (Ore. Sup. Ct., 1985). Prisoner ordered back to jail in county of trial. The plaintiff was transferred to a jail in another county because, according to the sheriff, his jail was overcrowded. As a result, the prisoner was ordered housed in the jail in which his upcoming trial would be held. (Clatsop County Jail, Oregon)

DUE PROCESS

Bean v. Cunningham, 650 F.Supp. 709 (D.N.H. 1986). An inmate filed a suit seeking money damages and declaratory and injunctive relief alleging violations of the eighth amendment and the due process clause. Following a bench trial, the district court held that: (1) the inmate failed to establish that the force applied by corrections officers during the transfer of the inmate from a medium security to a maximum security housing unit was unreasonable; (2) the inmate failed to establish that he was afflicted by serious medical needs; (3) the inmate failed to establish that the loss of folders of legal papers was intentional; and (4) the inmate failed to establish that the withholding of his books was unreasonable, given readily available alternative legal library resources, or that access to his personal books was necessary in order for him to obtain meaningful access to the courts. (New Hampshire State Prison)

U.S. Appeals Court
LIBERTY INTEREST

Beard v. Livesay, 798 F.2d 874 (6th Cir. 1986). A prison inmate brought an action challenging his reclassification without a hearing from minimum security to medium security as violating his liberty interest and his security status. The United States District Court granted summary judgment to the inmate, and the prison officials appealed. The court of appeals held that: (1) Tennessee regulations (requiring elaborate procedures for security reclassification of prison inmates and imposing limitations that the inmate must merit reduction or enhancement of security designation) create a protectable liberty interest; (2) the inmate was not entitled to have his transfer records expunged; and (3) the inmate's reclassification from minimum to medium security would be expunged from record. Prison officials may create liberty interests protected by due process clause by policy statements, regulations, or other official promulgations; inmates, however, must have a legitimate claim of entitlement to interest, not merely a unilateral expectation. (Bledsoe County, Tennessee Regional Correctional Facility)

U.S. District Court
ACCESS TO COURT

Blake v. Berman, 625 F.Supp. 1523 (D. Mass. 1986). Prisoner housed for state in federal system raises issues of access to courts. An inmate brought action against former and present commissioners of the Massachusetts Department of Correction alleging his constitutional right of access to courts was violated during the time he was incarcerated in the federal penitentiary system as a state contract prisoner. The inmate moved for summary judgment on the issue of liability, and defendants moved for partial summary judgment. The federal district court held that existence of Kansas defender project did not by itself provide adequate access to courts for Massachusetts state prisoners in federal custody at Leavenworth.

The court found that there is no duty to provide prisoners with state law libraries if they choose not to avail themselves of adequate alternative services. However, when prison officials choose to rely solely on trained legal assistance to fulfill constitutional mandates that inmates be given adequate access to courts, aid must be available in preparation of initial pleadings in habeas corpus and civil rights suits. Thus, those providing legal assistance cannot interpose a screening process between the inmate and courts. (Massachusetts Department of Corrections)

LIBERTY INTEREST

James-Bey v. Freeman, 638 F.Supp. 758 (D.D.C. 1986). Prison officials did not violate a prisoner's due process rights, even though they considered his unadjudicated offenses in deciding to transfer him to another facility. The due process clause alone did not protect against transfer, even if confinement conditions at the new institution were substantially more severe. Because incarceration at the new facility was within the prisoner's sentence, and because prison regulations placed no substantive limits on the transfer decision, the prisoner had no liberty interest to assert under the due process clause. (United States Penitentiary, Marion, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
TRANSSEXUAL

Lamb v. Maschner, 633 F.Supp. 351 (D. Kan. 1986). Court rules that transsexual inmate is not entitled to transfer to women's facility, hormone treatments, sex change operation or female clothing and cosmetics. An inmate who claimed he was transsexual moved for partial summary judgment seeking transfer to women's facility, female clothing and cosmetics, or preoperative hormone treatment and sex change operation. Prison officials moved for summary judgment. The federal district court held that: (1) the inmate did not have constitutional right to transfer to women's facility or to receive cosmetics and female clothing; and (2) the inmate did not have a constitutional right to preoperative hormone treatment and sex change operation.

There was some question as to whether the plaintiff was in fact a transsexual. A transsexual is someone who sincerely feels they are a member of the opposite sex, or who has actually had a sex change. Evaluations from various medical doctors and psychiatrists did not recommend surgery for a sex change. The court noted that if a transsexual fears sexual harassment or molestation, a request for protection is valid, and officials may order segregation. However, denying transfer to a women's prison of a male inmate who claims he is transsexual served a rational purpose of segregating sexes and did not deny inmate's constitutional rights. (State Security Hospital, Kansas)

U.S. District Court

Olynick v. Taylor County, 643 F.Supp. 1100 (W.D. Wis. 1986). A former prisoner in a county jail brought a civil rights action, claiming that she was a victim of sexual discrimination and was denied due process when she was not allowed to exercise work release privileges during her jail sentence. On cross motions for summary judgment, the district court held that: (1) the plaintiff was denied liberty without due process when she was denied the right to exercise work release privileges because of her transfer to another county jail; (2) the plaintiff's inability to exercise work release privilege outside of county to whose jail she was transferred did not constitute false imprisonment under Wisconsin law; and (3) the sheriff was entitled to qualified immunity because the prisoner's constitutional right to exercise work release privileges was not clearly established. Changes in condition of confinement, even those with a substantial impact, are not alone enough to invoke due process protections as long as the conditions or degree of confinement to which the prisoner is subjected is within the sentence imposed upon him. LIBERTY INTEREST

Paoli v. Lally, 636 F.Supp. 1252 (D.Md. 1986). The actions of Maryland's Commissioner of Corrections in transferring a prisoner from a minimum security facility to a maximum security institution and in denying minimum security classification did not violate the provisions of Maryland statutes or regulations and did not contravene liberty interests, if any, established by them in favor of persons such as the prisoner. The prisoner suffered from a physiological defect, a testosterone level approximately twice that of a normal male, which gave rise to his criminal behavior. It was an appropriate concern of the commissioner that the prisoner posed a danger to others if he should escape from minimum security and failed to continue to receive regularly scheduled Depo-Provera injections. Ross v. United States, 641 F.Supp. 368 (D.D.C. 1986). The District of Columbia, its mayor, and a corrections director were not liable for the alleged negligent transfer of an inmate into the federal prison system at Marion, Illinois. The inmate was killed by other inmates. The inmate was transferred into the federal system at the request of District of Columbia officials after he seized hostages in an escape attempt. The District of Columbia officials did not request that the inmate be transferred to any particular federal prison. (United States Prison at Marion, Illinois)

Webb v. Keohane, 804 F.2d 413 (7th Cir. 1986). A prisoner who requested a transfer either to federal prison or to another Indiana jail waived any objection to his subsequent Indiana conviction under the "anti-shuttling" provision of the Interstate Agreement on Detainers (IAD). The provision required the dismissal of an indictment with prejudice if a prisoner, transferred pursuant to the IAD, was returned to his original place of imprisonment prior to trial. The fact that the prisoner included the possibility of a transfer to another Indiana prison did not affect the waiver. (U.S. Penitentiary, Indiana)

MENTAL HEALTH

Baugh v. Woodard, 808 F.2d 333 (4th Cir. 1987). A class action was brought in which state prisoners alleged that procedures followed by the department of corrections in transferring a prisoner to a correctional mental health facility were inadequate to satisfy due process requirements. The United States District Court, 604 F.Supp 1529, required a hearing prior to a transfer in order to protect due process rights. The State appealed. The court of appeals held that a hearing conducted promptly after the prisoner's physical transfer to an in-patient mental health facility for treatment, but before commencement of any psychiatric treatment, would protect interest in avoiding erroneous mental health transfers and, therefore, would comply with due process without imposing undue burdens on the delivery of mental health care to prisoners. U.S. District Court
LIBERTY INTEREST

Shropshire v. Duckworth, 654 F.Supp. 369 (N.D.Ind. 1987). An inmate filed a suit alleging that his civil rights had been violated. Prison officials filed a motion for summary judgment. The district court held that: (1) the state policy governing institutional transfers did not create a liberty interest protected by the fourteenth amendment; (2) any claims against prison officials in their official capacities were barred by the eleventh amendment; and (3) the procedures used, before the inmate was placed in administrative segregation, satisfied the minimum requirements of due process. Simple negligence in the transfer of an inmate from one correctional institution to another did not violate the inmate's rights. It was necessary that there be deliberate indifference or reckless disregard to the inmate's rights analogous to obligation under the eighth amendment. Procedures accorded an inmate when he was placed in administrative segregation satisfied minimum requirements of due process: the inmate received a hearing within eight days of being placed in administrative segregation; he received notice of the hearing three days prior to it; he was permitted to be present throughout hearings, except during deliberations; he was permitted to speak on his own behalf and present evidence, call witnesses and have lay advocate; and he was in fact assisted by lay advocate of his choice. DUE PROCESS

Jenkins v. Fauver, 530 A.2d 790 (N.J. Super. A.D. 1986). According to a state court, inmates do not have a protectable interest arising from a due process clause along in residing in a particular environment. Inmates who, prior to reclassification, had been assigned to "full minimum" custodial status, filed a lawsuit claiming they were denied due process when they were transferred from a minimum security camp to the main prison and had their custodial classification changed to "full minimum, inside only" or "gang minimum." The action was taken in response to a series of escapes of inmates convicted of violent crimes. However, the appeals court, 528 A.2d 563, ruled against the "nonindividualized reclassification" of prison camp inmates with prior homicide convictions. (Rahway State Prison, New Jersey)

Section 1983 action contesting that placement and also other aspects of his confinement. After reviewing the magistrate's report, the district court held that: (1) the prisoner had no protectable liberty interest in earning work time credit and a Section 1983 claim based on his placement in a segregation unit and resultant deprivation of an opportunity to work was frivolous; (2) the prisoner's claim that lack of access to the Nevada statutes and case law prevented him from seeking postconviction relief, states a viable Section 1983 claim based on lack of access to the courts; and (3) the prisoner would be permitted time to file amended complaint with regard to the challenge to his initial transfer and other claims. PURPOSE

Maldonado Santiago v. Velazguez Garcia, 821 F.2d 822 (1st Cir. 1987). While a federal appeals court upheld the transfer of an inmate following a disturbance, it ruled that prison officials' violated a prison rule which required that the inmate be afforded a post-transfer hearing within seven working days after her transfer--and that this violated the her due process rights. The court ruled that she was entitled to damages, to be determined on remand, for four extra days she spent in the maximum security prison to which she was transferred. The court found that evidence that prison officials were faced with an angry crowd of over 20 prisoners, and that the plaintiff inmate played a predominant role in the activity, was sufficient to support the finding in the civil rights action that the prison officials' decision to transfer the inmate to another prison was in compliance with prison rules. Female inmates who were incarcerated in a federal facility because of a lack of facilities within the District of Columbia filed an action challenging the constitutionality of such confinement. The federal district court held that female offenders failed to establish that programs at the federal facility were inferior to programs provided at the District of Columbia facility for male offenders and although the location of the facility posed certain hardships on the female offenders, it did not violate their constitutional rights.

LIBERTY INTEREST

Salahuddin v. Coughlin, 674 F.Supp. 1048 (S.D.N.Y. 1987). Prison regulations specified that inmates transferred involuntarily (such as for purposes of distribution of population) would retain the same wage grade they had achieved. The regulations did not provide this guarantee to those transferred upon their own request. An inmate who participated in a job training program sued prison officials, alleging he was entitled to maintain his wage grade following a voluntary transfer. Prior to his transfer he had progressed from a compensation level of Wage Grade I ($.90 per day) to Wage Grade 4.2 ($2.19 per day). He requested a transfer to another prison in order to be closer to his family. The transfer was approved, but the inmate found that he was paid $1.30 a day in the lower wage grade when he was placed in at the new institution. The court found that the inmate had no legitimate claim of entitlement of retaining the same wage grade from one facility to the next and therefore had no due process right to either notice or hearing before his wage grade was reduced following transfer. Finding that the transfer had no impact on the pending lawsuits and that the government officials sued, including the warden, an associate warden and a Regional Director for the Bureau of Prisons, were all entitled to qualified immunity as to any damage claims against them in their individual capacity arising out of the transfer, the federal appeals court ordered the prisoner's complaint dismissed. Bruscino v. Carlson, 854 F.2d 162 (7th Cir. 1988), cert. denied, 109 S.Ct. 3193. In a class action suit brought against the Marion Penitentiary in Illinois by inmates held in the Control Unit, the inmates claimed use of excessive force and other charges because they were subjected to rectal searches every time they left or re-entered the unit. The appeals court ruled that because inmates in the Control Unit require greater supervision than other prisoners, rectal searches can be legally performed on such inmates. Use of physical restraints during attorney visitation and limited out-of-cell time was also upheld by the federal district court. The court found that extraordinary security measures employed in a maximum security federal prison, such as limitation of time spent outside cells, denial of opportunities for socialization, handcuffing, shackling, spread-eagling and rectal searches were reasonable measures in view of the history of violence at the prison and the incorrigible character of the inmates and thus it did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment. Further, the court found that the transfer of prisoners to a maximum security federal prison did not result in incremental deprivation so great as to constitute actionable deprivation of natural liberty and thus require a hearing. The appeals court held that: (1) the prisoner's complaint was properly dismissed for failure to exhaust administrative remedies; (2) the Bureau of Prisons had no duty to transfer the prisoner to a prison near the wife's residence; (3) the wife had no right to conjugal visits; and (4) the prisoner's incarceration did not violate the wife's rights against cruel and unusual punishment. Gassler v. Rayl, 862 F.2d 706 (8th Cir. 1988). An inmate who had provided legal assistance to fellow prisoners brought a suit against prison officials who had participated in the decision to transfer him to another facility. The U.S. District Court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment, and the inmate appealed. The appeal court found that the prison inmate had no constitutional right to provide his fellow inmates with legal assistance, and could not maintain action on his own behalf against the prison officials even assuming that he was transferred to another facility for providing legal assistance to inmates. The transfer to another facility did not violate the prisoners' constitutional right of access to courts, where two jailhouse lawyers remained at the prison and were employed full-time in the prison's law library. An inmate's right of access to courts includes the right to receive legal assistance from fellow inmates, unless prison officials provide reasonable alternative assistance.

An inmate has no right to receive legal assistance from a jailhouse lawyer independent of the right of access to courts. (North Dakota State Penitentiary)

Getch v. Rosenbach, 700 F.Supp. 1365 (D. N.J. 1988). A state prisoner brought a civil rights action against the prison superintendent. The superintendent moved for summary judgment. The district court found that the state prisoner did not have a liberty interest in being confined to a county facility after his conviction was overturned and he became a pretrial detainee while awaiting a second trial. The Governor's executive order, which provided that only a person sentenced to a prison or committed to the custody of the Commissioner of the Department of Corrections could be confined in the state prison, did not give the state prisoner, whose conviction was overturned and who became a pretrial detainee while awaiting a second trial, a liberty interest in begin confined in a county jail. The prisoner was not a pretrial detainee at the time he was sent to the state prison but was a duly convicted and sentenced prisoner, and the executive order was not explicitly mandatory in prescribing the confinement of a prisoner who acquired the status of a pretrial detainee while incarcerated in the state prison. Matiyn v. Henderson, 841 F.2d 31 (2nd Cir. 1988), cert. denied, 108 S.Ct. 2876. A federal appeals court ruled that an inmate had no constitutionally based liberty interest which was subject to due process protection with respect to his being transferred between prisons. Even if his four-day confinement in a special housing unit prior to the transfer deprived him of a protected liberty interest, corrections officials were protected from liability by the doctrine of qualified immunity. Finally, even if he was placed in the special housing unit partly for punitive reasons, he was not entitled to the procedures normally associated with disciplinary confinement, because the confinement would have been undertaken in any event for administrative purposes alone. The court also found that prison inmates generally have no liberty interest in remaining within the general prison population and out of administrative segregation, unless the state has chosen to create such an interest by enacting certain statutory or regulatory measures. The prisoner, who was a leader of the Sunni Muslim sect, had been prevented from attending communal religious services and claimed his first amendment rights had been violated. The court held that these actions were permissible because the reasons were related to legitimate penological objections and there were rumors of impending trouble among fractions of the Muslim community of prisoners. Also, weapons were found in a folder thought to belong to the inmate. 108 S.Ct. 2876 writ of certiorari denied. (Auburn Correctional Facility)

Baptist v. Lane, 708 F.Supp. 920 (N.D. Ill. 1989). The U.S. District Court ruled that inmates' due process rights were not violated when they were transferred from a minimum security farm at a correctional center back into general population of the maximum security unit. According to the court, no state prisoner has an inherent due process right either to serve his sentence in a particular prison or section of prison or to receive a particular security classification. The state regulation governing inmate transfers effectively allows prison officials to reassign inmates for any reason. Therefore, inmates did not have a justifiable expectation of remaining on the farm to support a due process challenge to their transfer. Their due process claims were frivolous, and they were not entitled to file a civil rights action in forma pauperis. (Stateville Correctional Center, Illinois)

Baraldini v. Thornburgh, 884 F.2d 615 (D.C. Cir. 1989). A federal district court's determination that female inmates' first amendment rights were being violated was appealed by the defendants. Reversing and remanding the decision of the lower court, the appeals court found that there was sufficient merit to the placement of the inmates in the Federal Bureau of Prisons' highest security confinement institution for women. It was shown that the female inmates had associated with gangs and had access to dangerous weapons. They had helped in prison escapes, and had personally taken part in violent and criminal activities of those groups before their federal incarceration. It was also determined by the court that placement of inmates in the stated institution "solely" because of their "subversive statements and thoughts" was clearly erroneous. While inmates have a constitutional right to hold violent or revolutionary views and to maintain memberships in revolutionary organizations, prison administrators are not required to ignore those views and memberships when assessing dangers of their escapes from custody with outside help from those who hold like views and/or memberships. Barfield v. Brierton, 883 F.2d 923 (11th Cir. 1989). A state prisoner brought a civil rights action against state corrections officials, alleging a violation of his constitutional rights through his transfer to an adult prison facility in violation of his liberty interest as a youthful offender. The prisoner appealed after the district court granted summary judgment for correctional officials. The court of appeals reversed the lower court and remanded the case. The court stated that the prisoner had raised genuine issues of material fact regarding the existence of liberty interest in him as a youthful offender, and whether the transfer violated his liberty interest as a youthful offender. Chitwood v. Dowd, 889 F.2d 781 (8th Cir. 1989), cert. denied, 110 S.Ct. 2219. A prisoner filed a petition for a writ of habeas corpus and the U.S. District Court granted a petition for which appeal was taken. The appeals court found that the transfer of the prisoner to Oklahoma was the only course of action that would insure that the Oklahoma sentence would run concurrently with Missouri, as ordered by a Missouri court. The prisoner had a legitimate expectation that the Missouri Department of Corrections would transfer him to Oklahoma, in which that the expectation was a liberty interest which was protected by due process and enforceable by way of habeas corpus.

It was also found by the court that the unconditional release of the prisoner from serving any time remaining on either Missouri sentence may not have been an appropriate remedy. The complete exhaustion of state remedies prior to bringing a habeas corpus petition was excused by special circumstances, including the petitioner's continual good-faith effort to bring his petition before the proper forum and the state officials' failure to take any action to rectify the petitioner's predicament. Coakley v. Murphy, 884 F.2d 1218 (9th Cir. 1989). When a state prison inmate was approved for work release, he was transported to a center where work release inmates live. He informed a counselor, upon his arrival, that he would not sign a copy of the work release agreement, which stipulated the conditions under which the inmates participated in the program. He was warned that if he failed to sign the agreement, he would be sent back to the penitentiary. He persisted in refusing to sign, stating that the agreement was illegal, that he was "civilly dead" as a prisoner under state law, and that he was therefore precluded from entering into contracts. He also said that if he signed, the agreement would be void because it was signed under duress. As a result of this persistent refusal, the inmate was returned to the penitentiary. He brought a Section 1983 action to challenge the denial of a hearing upon the transfer from the work release program to the penitentiary. The U.S. District Court dismissed the action, and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed the lower court decision, ruling that the case was analogous to transfer from one institution to another within a state prison system; Idaho law placed no restrictions on transfers from work release centers, and there was no constitutional right to rehabilitation. The court of appeals found that the inmate had no due process liberty or property interest limiting the transfer from a work release program to the penitentiary upon the inmate's failure to sign a work release agreement and that the requirement that the inmate sign a work release agreement was rationally related to the legitimate interest in insuring that the inmate understand the obligations and therefore equal protections were not violated. Dudley v. Shaver, 770 S.W.2d 712 (Mo.App. 1989). A prisoner brought an action against prison officials and others based on his transfer to another facility which did not offer courses he needed to complete his paralegal training which he had begun at transferor facility. The 14th Judicial Circuit Court dismissed the petition for failure to state a claim, and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that the prisoner was not denied of a potential liberty interest in remaining in a particular state penal institution, and the petition failed to state a claim. The prisoner did not have a potential liberty interest in remaining in a particular state penal institution which would have supported his civil rights action arising out of a transfer to a different facility which did not offer college level paralegal training courses he had been enrolled in at that other prison, and for which he had received a partial scholarship. Gillihan v. Shillinger, 872 F.2d 935 (10th Cir. 1989). An inmate who had been transferred from another prison brought a civil rights action against prison officials after the officials froze funds in his prison account until he paid for transportation expenses. The U.S. District Court entered a judgment in favor of the officials, and the inmate appealed. The appeals court, affirming in part, reversing in part, and remanding the case, found that the inmate's allegations were sufficient to state a civil rights claim based on the deprivation of property without due process, but freezing of the inmate's account was not cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the eighth amendment. According to the court, the inmate had a property interest in funds in his prison account for due process purposes, to the extent the funds constituted monies received from friends and family outside prisons or represented wages earned while incarcerated. Section 1983 does not distinguish between personal liberties and property rights, and the deprivation of the latter without due process gives rise to a claim under Section 1983.

Prison officials argued that the suit should have been dismissed because the inmate had adequate administrative and state remedies. But the court disagreed, noting that this was not a random and unauthorized act, but one taken pursuant to institution policy. "In such cases, the availability of an adequate state post-deprivation remedy is irrelevant..." said the court. The case was sent back to the district court to determine the exact nature and timing of the hearing due to the inmate. (Wyoming State Prison)

Lanier v. Fair, 876 F.2d 243 (1st Cir. 1989). An inmate sued the Massachusetts Parole Board alleging that his due process rights were violated by his removal from a halfway house program and by the rescission of his previously established reserve parole date. The district court rendered a summary judgment for the defendants, and the inmate appealed. The appeals court found that the inmate established a liberty interest in remaining at the halfway house but the procedure he received following his transfer was adequate for due process purposes. Although the inmate established a liberty interest in his reserve parole date, the defendants were entitled to qualified immunity on that claim; and the Parole Board's decision to rescind the reserve parole date was based on sufficient evidence. Regulations governed specific instances in which inmates could be terminated from halfway house program participation, and inmates had a legitimate expectation that they would be removed only for violating those regulations. The inmate objected to the timeliness of his hearing arguing that he was entitled to meet with the reclassification committee prior to his transfer from the halfway house or, in any event, at a time earlier than three months following his removal. Contrary to these assertions, the court found that the inmate was not entitled to a hearing prior to his removal from the halfway house, nor did they feel that three months constituted an unreasonably long delay so as to violate Lanier's constitutional rights. Raines v. Lack, 714 F.Supp. 889 (M.D. Tenn. 1989). An inmate brought an action against prison officials alleging a deprivation of due process in connection with his administrative segregation. On the inmate's motion for summary judgment, the district court found that the inmate was afforded all process he was due at the transferee prison, and although the warden at the first prison deprived the inmate of due process, the warden was entitled to qualified immunity from liability for damages. The inmate was confined to administrative segregation and transferred to another institution based upon allegations that he had instigated or participated in a prison riot and had the due process right only to receive the notice of the charges against him and an opportunity to present his views to prison officials. More formal procedures afforded to inmates faced with losing good-time credits and disciplinary segregation were not required. The inmate, who was placed in administrative segregation because of his suspected role in a prison riot was not denied due process upon his transfer to the state prison. The defendant received an informal review eight days after his transfer, at which time he was aware of charges against him and had an opportunity to present his views to the review board, though the hearing involved no additional review of evidence underlying the initial segregation. The warden who deprived the inmate of due process by failing to inform him and the disciplinary board of the factual basis for his disagreement with the board's recommendation that the inmate be released from administrative segregation, was entitled to qualified immunity. It was not clear that the warden needed to provide anything more than a general statement of charges, or that a more specific statement was required in the event the warden disagreed with the board's recommendation. Scalise v. Meese, 891 F.2d 640 (7th Cir. 1989). American prisoners sentenced in England sought transfer from a foreign prison to an American prison pursuant to the Transfer of Offenders To and From Foreign Countries Act. Upon the Attorney General's denial of request, the prisoners sought writ of mandamus ordering the Attorney General to establish regulations which would govern the grant or denial of the request as well as order a finding of the Attorney General's refusal to be a violation of the prisoners' due process rights. On the prisoners' motion for summary judgment, the district court, granting the writ, found that the Attorney General violated his duty under the Act to promulgate regulations setting forth standards and guidelines to govern requests of Americans incarcerated abroad to be transferred to American prisons. According to the lower court, the Attorney General acted arbitrarily and capriciously, and abused his discretion in denying the requests; he also deprived the prisoners of due process of law in denying the requests without sufficient explanation and elaboration of a decision and without an opportunity to rebut. The Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals reversed the lower court ruling, finding that the prisoners did not have a liberty interest and that the lower court had improperly issued its writ of mandamus. Wilson v. Brown, 889 F.2d 1195 (1st Cir. 1989). A prisoner sued the warden of a Rhode Island state prison in his official capacity for money damages under 42 U.S.C.A. Section 1983, alleging that his transfer to a Massachusetts prison was unconstitutional as a violation of due process and the New England Interstate Corrections Compact. The inmate sought compensation for alleged resulting mental and physical anguish, his divorce from his wife, psychological assistance his son required as a result of the transfer, his inability to see relatives, and other purported injuries. The court entered a summary judgment for the defendant. The appellate court affirmed, noting that each of these allegations sought monetary damages and that injunctive relief would not be an appropriate remedy for any of the alleged injustices. Because the U.S. Supreme Court, in Will v. Michigan Dept. of State Police, 108 S.Ct. 1466 (1989) held that state are not "persons" amendable to suit under 42 U.S.C.A. Section 1983, the court found that the inmate could not sue the warden in his official capacity for such damages. While a state official may be enjoined against future violations of an inmate's rights, "retrospective relief" is barred, the court noted, and in any event, the inmate in this case did not seek injunctive relief. A prisoner appealed the dismissal of his suit in which he sought a transfer out of the city system into a state or federal prison system because of alleged brutality by prison guards and police officers. The federal district court dismissed the suit on the grounds that a petition for habeas corpus was the prisoner's exclusive avenue for that relief, and that he could not obtain that relief because he failed to exhaust his remedies in the State courts. The appeals court reversed the judgment, dismissing his suit, and remanded it to the district court for further proceedings. The court ruled that a Section 1983 action is the proper remedy for a state prisoner who is making a constitutional challenge to conditions of his prison life, but not to the fact or length of his custody. Ali v. U.S., 743 F.Supp. 50 (D. D.C. 1990). An inmate convicted of murder under District of Columbia Code brought a civil rights action challenging his transfer from Virginia to California for allegedly punitive reasons. The district court found that once legally convicted, an inmate had no constitutionally protected right to incarceration in any particular facility. The prisoner was one of many prisoners transferred from the D.C. prison system to the federal system to free up room in the local prisons. The plaintiff's designation to Lompoc "was based upon objective criteria including sentence length, history and violence and severity of the current offense." The plaintiff was transferred solely for administrative reasons and because he satisfied their objective criteria for determining transfer eligibility. Although the transfer meant that the distance was much greater between the plaintiff and the courts in which he was litigating, the plaintiff had the same constitutional right of meaningful access to courts. An inmate filed a civil rights action alleging his constitutional rights were violated when he was transferred from general population to administrative segregation without being given a notice of opportunity to argue against the transfer. The district court found that the transfer of the inmate did not implicate any liberty interest and the case was dismissed. Neither the prison code of penal discipline nor the administrative regulations contained language concerning administrative segregation but, rather, vested discretion in the Delaware Department of Corrections to determine the inmate's classification and, thus, did not create a liberty interest in the inmate's right to be free from administrative segregation. Frazier v. Dubois, 922 F.2d 560 (10th Cir. 1990). A prisoner brought an action alleging that he was transferred to another institution in retaliation for his activities as chairman of the "Afrikan Cultural Society" in violation of his First Amendment rights. The complaint was dismissed as frivolous by the U.S. District Court, and the inmate appealed. The court of appeals found that while a prisoner enjoys no constitutional right to remain in a particular institution and generally is not entitled to due process protections prior to a transfer, the prison officials do not have discretion to punish the inmate for exercising his First Amendment rights by transferring him to a different institution, and the prisoner's complaint was not frivolous. It was also found that, in evaluating a claim by a prison inmate that he was transferred to another institution in retaliation for exercise of his First Amendment rights, the court must determine whether a prison action is reasonably related to legitimate penological interests, which requires the weighing of the following factors: Whether there is a valid, rational connection between the prison action and the legitimate government interest put forward to justify it; whether there are alternative means of exercising the right that remains open to prison inmates; and the impact of the accommodation of the asserted constitutional right on guards and other inmates and on allocation of prison resources generally, but it is not necessary to show that the least restrictive alternative has been adopted, and substantial deference is to be accorded to the prison authorities. A prison inmate filed a Bivens claim against prison officials, alleging that he was assaulted by fellow inmates after his repeated requests for a transfer to another unit were denied. Prison officials moved to dismiss or for summary judgment. The district court found that prison officials did not act with deliberate or reckless indifference or callous disregard when they denied the inmate's transfer request. The inmate had to prove intentional conduct, deliberate or reckless indifference to his safety, or callous disregard on the part of the prison officials, not bad faith on the officials' part, in order to prevail on a Bivens action. Although the inmate indicated to officials that he feared for his life, he did not disclose the identity of the alleged perpetrators or indicate that they threatened him and the inmate's exclamation of fear, without more information, could lead officials to deduce that the inmate was attempting to manipulate the transfer. A prisoner brought an action against officials in the correctional administration of the Puerto Rico penal system, claiming that his transfer from one facility to another deprived him of civil rights in violation of Section 1983 and the fourteenth amendment of the constitution. The defendants moved for a dismissal. The district court denied the motion, finding that the prisoner's due process liberty interests were implicated by the transfer from one facility to another. Although authorities contended that the prisoner has no interest to remain at the facility of his choice, the transfer in question was apparently disciplinary in nature, and regulations required a pre or posttransfer hearing to investigate the incident leading to the transfer. Regulations governing the administrative decisions within the Puerto Rico penal system grant prisoners an expectation that they will be given some procedure to investigate an allegedly improper transfer. Armstrong v. Lane, 771 F.Supp. 943 (C.D. Ill. 1991). An inmate brought a civil rights action challenging the constitutionality of the Illinois Department of Corrections' "Circuit Rider" program, in which difficult-to-control inmates were transferred from segregation unit to segregation unit among various state prisons. The district court found that the program did not subject the inmate to conditions of confinement so brutal as to implicate the Eighth Amendment. The inmate had no right to a hearing or any other procedures with respect to prison officials' decision to place him on the Circuit Rider program. First, due to the absence of regulations concerning the program, the court found that the plaintiff had no protected interest in not being a circuit rider. Furthermore, the undisputed facts showed that the inmate posed a great security risk and requires close supervision, thus justifying placement in the tightly-controlled program. Placement was also justified in light of the inmate's extensive criminal history and lack of institutional adjustment. (Illinois Department of Corrections)

The U.S. District Court found that the inmate's claims were insufficiently specific to support a grant of relief sought. Although the inmate claims that the regimen at the facility he was currently incarcerated in did not permit him to exercise during one-hour per day recreation period in the manner prescribed by a psychologist, he did not show why he could not perform corrective exercises during the remaining 23 hours, and the court found that the inmate was transferred as a result of his misbehavior and it was shown that the present facility had a fine medical staff and that there was no medical reason to transfer the inmate. An inmate brought a pro se Section 1983 action against Indiana Department of Corrections officials alleging a violation of due process rights when he was transferred without notice or a hearing from a lower-security assignment to maximum security. The officials moved to dismiss or for summary judgment. The district court found that the inmate did not have a liberty interest in not being transferred to maximum security assignment without notice or a hearing. The inmates' reassignment was based solely upon the fact that he no longer met the criteria for assignment to the lower-security and the transfer was not based upon institutional conduct or misconduct. A transfer from one prison to another did not deprive the prisoner of liberty or property within the meaning of the due process clause, and therefore did not require notice and an opportunity for a hearing. The court also found that prison regulations and Indiana statutes did not create a protectable liberty interest; the statute merely called for periodic review of offenders' classification and assignment. The establishment of such a review procedure, however, cannot itself give rise to a protected liberty interest. (Indiana State Prison)

Grayson v. Rison, 945 F.2d 1064 (9th Cir. 1991). A former federal prisoner brought an action against three prison officials, seeking damages for an allegedly unlawful transfer between prison facilities. The U.S. District Court granted summary judgment for the officials based on a finding of qualified immunity, and the former prisoner appealed. The court of appeals found that the transfer of the prisoner from a less restrictive section to a more restrictive section did not deny the prisoner due process, and the federal prisoner was not entitled to notice and a hearing. Placement was a direct result of the prisoner's holdover status, and the federal prisoner, transferred to the institution for civil depositions, was not entitled to memorandum and formal review otherwise required. The transfer did not deny the prisoner due process, although the transfer from one section to another was made without procedural safeguards. When prison officials have a legitimate administrative authority, such as discretion to move inmates from prison to prison or from cell to cell, the due process clause imposes few restrictions on the use of that authority, regardless of what motives are claimed to exist for the transfer. The prison officials moved to dismiss for failure to state a claim. The district court found that, absent a state-created interest, neither a change in a prisoner's security classification nor a prisoner's transfer from one prison to another implicates a liberty interest within the meaning of the due process clause. However, it was improper to dismiss the prisoner's civil rights complaint based on the prisoner's placement in a segregation unit of the medium security facility before correctional officials had answered the prisoner's allegations that the segregation served no valid administrative purpose and the record failed to disclose whether the prisoner was placed in segregation for administrative or supervisory reasons. In addition, the prisoner stated a cause of action based on denial of equal protection by alleging that his case manager told him that several prisoners with similar sentences were housed in the medium security prison, where, under the Colorado Department of Corrections regulation the prisoners received a notice of the segregation and a hearing but the prisoner had received neither. A prisoner filed a civil rights complaint and petitioned for writ of habeas corpus, alleging that his transfer to an out-of-state prison was illegal and resulted in false imprisonment. The district court found that the petition for writ of habeas corpus had to be dismissed, where the prisoner did not allege that the issue had been presented to appropriate state courts. In addition, the prisoner maintained no right or justifiable interest in remaining in a Connecticut correctional facility, and therefore the prisoner's challenge under a federal civil rights statute to the authenticity of a state contract regarding the transfer of prisoners to an out-of-state prison failed to state a cognizable constitutional claim, where no Connecticut statute, rule or regulation substantively limited the discretion of the Commissioner of Correction to transfer prisoners. HABEAS CORPUS

Venable v. Thornburgh, 766 F.Supp. 1012 (D. Kan. 1991). A petition was filed for writ of habeas corpus in which an inmate complained that he was wrongfully withheld by federal authorities because his transfer from a District of Columbia prison to a federal prison was not authorized. The district court found that the inmate was not required to exhaust administrative remedies before bringing a habeas petition challenging a transfer from a District of Columbia prison to a federal prison. The inmate challenged the underlying constitutional validity of the basis for his incarceration in the federal prison and relief through a federal prison administrative grievance procedure would have been so unlikely that to require exhaustion would serve only as an obstructive formality. In addition, the court found that the custody of state offender statute, which authorizes the Attorney General to contract with proper officials of a state or territory for custody of those convicted of criminal offenses in court of a state or territory, provided lawful authority for the District of Columbia to transfer the inmate to federal custody. Williams v. McGinnis, 755 F.Supp. 230 (N.D. Ill. 1991). A state prisoner brought an action to compel a transfer to another facility. On motion for preliminary injunction, the U.S. District Court found that the prisoner did not have a constitutional right to be transferred. He was not entitled to an injunction requiring his transfer to another facility based on allegations that he was endangered at the prison where he was being confined, where the only attack upon him happened more than a year earlier and, since then, prison officials had taken steps to secure his safety by placing him in protective custody. His desire to be transferred to another facility so that he could participate in programs there was not sufficient for him to prevail on the merits because prison officials are not required by the constitution to provide educational, rehabilitative, or vocational programs. U.S. District Court
RETALIATION

Adams v. James, 797 F.Supp. 940 (M.D. Fla. 1992). A civil rights action was brought alleging that the transfer in job and institutional assignments of inmate law clerks unconstitutionally infringed on their right to file law suits and help other inmates. On motion of the defendants for summary judgment, the district court found that the inmate law clerks did not have unique personal rights to hold particular jobs as law clerks or to be assigned to a particular institution on the grounds that they were moving for social change in that institution by filing suits against officers of the institution concerning conditions of confinement. No such personal right protected by the First Amendment existed on the grounds that the law clerks were more visible than other inmates in instituting legal action against the correctional institution. In addition, the inmates failed to establish their claims of retaliatory transfer. The prison officials' action of reassigning the inmate law clerks, based on suspicions that the clerks were charging for their services, was reasonable. In addition, it was rationally and validly connected to the government's interest in protecting inmates from exploitation by one another. (Polk Correctional Institution, Florida).

Candelaria v. Coughlin, 787 F.Supp. 368 (S.D.N.Y. 1992), affirmed, 979 F.2d 845. A paraplegic inmate was not entitled to a preliminary injunction against an alleged retaliatory transfer to a new institution without a paraplegic facility, as his request was not properly directed to the defendants named in the action. However, the court noted that the plaintiff may bring a new action, including one for injunctive relief directed against the proper defendants. (Clinton Correctional Facility, New York)

Falcon v. Knowles, 807 F.Supp. 1531 (S.D. Fla. 1992). Prisoners who were transferred from a Miami prison to the Federal Correctional Institute (FCI) in Talledega, Alabama due to damage to the Miami prison caused by a hurricane, petitioned for a writ of habeas corpus, seeking immediate transfer to the Federal Detention Center in Tallahassee, Florida. The district court denied the petition, finding that the prison officials did not purposely and intentionally discriminate against the prisoners in ordering the transfer. Other prisoners were also transferred to Alabama, and there was no information to suggest that the transfer was punitive or arbitrary and capricious. (Metropolitan Correctional Center, Florida)

Story v. Morgan, 786 F.Supp. 523 (W.D. Pa. 1992). On report of a magistrate judge recommending dismissal of an inmate's in forma pauperis complaint, the district court found that the inmate's claim that his transfer from a state correctional facility in Pennsylvania to a federal facility in Indiana violated his right of access to the courts because the federal facility lacked Pennsylvania legal material was sufficient to state a cause of action under Section 1983. Wright v. Caspari, 779 F.Supp. 1025 (E.D. Mo. 1992). An inmate brought a civil rights action against prison officials. The district court found that there was sufficient evidence to support a finding of disciplinary violation by the inmate, and he was not entitled to take a lie detector test in connection with the disciplinary proceedings. In addition, the refusal of the prison disciplinary board to call the inmate's witnesses to the disciplinary hearing did not deprive him of due process where the witnesses had been interviewed and it was determined that they were character witnesses rather than fact witnesses. It was also found that the impending transfer of the inmate to another penal institution following disciplinary proceedings did not rise to the level of an Eighth Amendment violation. A prisoner does not have a constitutional right to pick and choose his prison, although he cannot be transferred for exercising his constitutional rights. (Missouri Department of Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
RETALIATION

Brookins v. Kolb, 990 F.2d 308 (7th Cir. 1993). A prisoner transferred to another prison filed a civil rights action against prison officials, alleging retaliation. The U.S. District Court found no constitutional rights were violated, and the inmate appealed. The court of appeals found that the inmate, who was a co-chairman of an approved prisoners' committee that helped inmates with legal research, failed to meet his burden of presenting substantial evidence at the summary judgment stage to show that prison officials, in reacting to his letter on the committee's official stationery, exaggerated their response to preserving legitimate penological objectives of the prison environment. The First Amendment rights the inmate had in his capacity as co-chairman were associational rights to act on behalf of another inmate being helped with legal research. Furthermore, the transfer of the inmate was not in retaliation for the exercise of his constitutional rights, but because he ignored an established prison policy governing the sending of prison committee and group correspondence, and thus there was no violation of his civil rights. (Waupun Correctional Institution, Wisconsin)

U.S. District Court
RETALIATION

Cooper v. Ellsworth Correctional Work Facility, 817 F.Supp. 84 (D.Kan. 1993), affirmed, 2 F.3d 1160. An inmate brought a Section 1983 action alleging that the use of excessive force was cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the Eighth Amendment and that his transfer was retaliatory. The district court found that correctional officers' use of force on the inmate was not excessive. Refusal to allow the inmate to attend a doctor's appointment and correctional officers' use of force to escort the inmate to the guard captain's office did not violate the Eighth Amendment's prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment. The inmate was not allowed to attend the doctor's appointment because he refused to put his pants on. Use of force occurred only after the inmate attempted to use his cane on one correctional officer and several officers came to his assistance to escort the inmate to the captain's office. Furthermore, the inmate did not allege that he sustained any injuries in the altercation. The court also found that the decision to transfer the inmate because of the episode in which several correctional officers were required to restore order clearly advanced legitimate correctional concerns and was not in retaliation for the inmate's conduct. Crane v. Logli, 992 F.2d 136 (7th Cir. 1993), cert. denied, 114 S.Ct. 245. A prisoner sued prison officials under Section 1983 for violation of his due process rights. The U.S. District Court dismissed the complaint, and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court found that the prisoner's continued incarceration in a maximum security prison, after reversal of his conviction for murder but before the reviewing court issued its mandate, did not violate due process, as he did not have a liberty interest in the type of prison for his incarceration. He continued to be a convicted prisoner and had not become a "pretrial detainee." Furthermore, the decision of Illinois Department of Correction officials to hold the prisoner at the maximum security prison until the Supreme Court issued its mandate following reversal of the conviction did not violate any of the prisoner's constitutional rights. The decision was a management decision within the scope of the officials' discretion. (Joliet Correction Center, Illinois)

The U.S. District Court dismissed and the detainee appealed. The court of appeals, affirming the decision, found that the detainee was not denied due process when he was transferred to a jail in a different judicial district. An Arkansas statute providing that a sheriff, where there is no jail or the jail of the county is insufficient, may commit a person in his custody to the nearest jail in another county in the same judicial district, did not contain mandatory language and, thus, did not create a protectable liberty interest in favor of the pretrial detainee challenging his transfer. Gay v. Turner, 994 F.2d 425 (8th Cir. 1993). A state inmate brought a civil rights action against prison officials alleging she was involuntarily detained at a state mental hospital and forcibly injected with antipsychotic drugs in violation of due process. The U.S. District Court granted summary judgment for the officials, and the inmate appealed. The court of appeals, affirming the decision, found that the temporary transfer of the inmate to a state mental hospital did not constitute a major change in conditions of confinement that required procedural protections. At the time prison officials acted in administering forced medications to the inmate, the inmates' rights to avoid unwanted administration of antipsychotic drugs were not sufficiently clear, and the officials were entitled to qualified immunity. Goff v. Burton, 7 F.3d 734 (8th Cir. 1993) U.S. cert. denied 114 S.Ct. 2684. A prisoner sued officials for allegedly transferring him to a maximum security facility in retaliation for his participation in a lawsuit against prison officials. The U.S. District Court found for the prisoner and awarded damages. The defendants appealed. The court of appeals, reversing and remanding, found that the fact that an impermissible retaliatory motive may have played a factor in the transfer would not establish a claim absent proof that discipline would not have been imposed "but for" the unconstitutional retaliatory motive. The court also found that the standard of "some evidence" for reliability of a confidential informant did not require an independent assessment of the credibility of witnesses. Harrison v. Raney, 837 F.Supp. 875 (W.D. Tenn. 1993). A prison inmate brought a civil rights action asserting claims that he was transferred and reclassified without a hearing. On motion of defendants for summary judgment, the district court found that Tennessee Department of Corrections (TDOC) regulations did not create a liberty interest requiring state officials to afford any due process under the Fourteenth Amendment before either reclassification or transfer of inmates. Even if the regulations required hearings to follow certain procedures, they lacked any mandatory language that would require the warden to base a decision on any particular criteria, and unlimited discretion was explicitly conferred on the warden. Even if some types of transfers of inmates required security reclassification and due process protections, population management transfers did not, under the Tennessee regulation. King v. Fairman, 997 F.2d 259 (7th Cir. 1993). An inmate sued corrections officials under Section 1983 for failing to prevent injuries inflicted by other inmates. The U.S. District Court entered judgment notwithstanding the verdict for the prison officials, and the inmate appealed. The appeals court found that the transfer of the inmate to a correction facility that housed members of a gang to which the inmate had once belonged, despite a known threat to the inmate's safety, was not "cruel and unusual punishment" for the purpose of the inmate's Section 1983 action. The transfer was necessary because the inmate's admitted liaison with a female staff member had compromised security at the prison from which he was transferred. As a result, prison officials were not "deliberately indifferent" to the inmate's safety. (Illinois Department of Corrections)

A New York state inmate brought a Section 1983 action challenging the constitutionality of his removal from a shock incarceration program. The district court found that the inmate's removal from the shock incarceration program did not implicate the inmate's procedural due process rights because the inmate did not have a protected liberty interest in remaining in the program. The inmate's removal was based not on his behavior while in the program, but on new information regarding circumstances of the inmate's crimes. Regulations concerning removal provided for a hearing only when the removal was premised on conduct while in the program. (Monterey Shock Incarceration Facility, New York)

An inmate filed a Section 1983 civil rights claim against various prison hearing officers, prison administrators, and New York state corrections officials. Motions for summary judgment were filed by both parties. The district court found that evidence that the inmate was transferred to another correctional facility because of a belief that the inmate had been the chief organizer of a food strike precluded the Section 1983 civil rights claim by the inmate alleging that the transfer occurred solely because of the inmate's race, in violation of the inmate's right to equal protection. Hazen v. Reagen, 16 F.3d 921 (8th Cir. 1994). An inmate at the Iowa State Penitentiary (ISP) who was nominated to serve on an elected inmate advisory council at ISP, and whom prison officials subsequently transferred to a Florida prison, moved for an order to show cause why prison officials should not be held in contempt of a consent decree pursuant to which the council was created. The inmate alleged that the transfer was intended to frustrate his nomination to the council. The U.S. District Court denied the motion, and the inmate appealed. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that the inmate's transfer did not violate the consent decree. The Prisoners' Advisory Council (PAC) bylaws did not prohibit the legitimate transfer of the inmate to another institution, even if he had been selected as a PAC representative. In addition, the inmate's First Amendment rights were not violated, where the reason for the transfer was not because the inmate sought redress of grievances, but because of the authorities' reasonable belief of the inmate's troublesome, manipulative character. The U.S. District Court ruled for the defendants and the detainee appealed. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that the transfer of the detainee to a jail in another judicial district did not violate the detainee's due process rights. An Arkansas statute providing that a person in custody could be committed to the nearest jail in the same judicial district did not contain mandatory language limiting the discretion of prison officials, and therefore that was no right to be free from a transfer. The U.S. District Court entered judgment in favor of the inmate and the prison officials appealed. The appeals court, reversing and remanding, found that the settlement agreement allegedly entitling the inmate to a permanent transfer to a particular prison did not implicate any fundamental right. In addition, the settlement agreement was a mere contract applicable to a particular inmate, which thus could not create a due process liberty interest. (Occoquan Facility, District of Columbia)

RECORDS

Coleman v. Wilson, 912 F.Supp. 1282 (E.D.Cal. 1995). Inmates challenged the adequacy of mental health care provided at institutions operated by the California Department of Corrections, alleging that the inadequacies were cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The district court reviewed the findings and recommendations of the chief magistrate judge after objections were filed by the defendants. The court found that evidence supported the magistrate's findings and recommendations regarding many aspects of the Department's mental health services, and ordered that a special master be appointed to monitor the Department's compliance with court-ordered injunctive relief.

The Department's mental illness screening procedures were based on self-reporting, use of records of prior hospitalization and/or past or current use of psychotropic medications, exhibition of bizarre behavior, and requests for care. The court found these procedures were used haphazardly and depended for efficacy on incomplete or nonexistent medical records, or observations of custodial staff who were inadequately trained to recognize the signs and symptoms of mental illness.

The court found that medication management for mentally ill inmates was constitutionally deficient because: computers were not networked preventing inmate medication to be tracked when an inmate was transferred; some inmates were receiving timely medication and appropriate monitoring while others were not; and some medications that were effective in the treatment of serious mental disorders were not available. The court found deficiencies with the medical records maintained by the Department, including: disorganized, untimely and incomplete filing of medical records; incomplete or nonexistent treatment plans; and failure to send medical records with inmates when they were transferred. The court noted that it was the Department's responsibility to take reasonable steps to implement policies that would aid in obtaining medical information from counties from which inmates were transferred. The court supported the decision of the magistrate to refrain from specifying the exact mechanism for screening of inmates, the number of staff to be hired, the specific level of competence to be possessed by staff, the precise methods of medication management, and the manner of maintaining medical records. The magistrate appropriately proposed leaving matters of creation of protocols, standards, procedures and forms to be developed to the defendant, in consultation with court-appointed medical experts. An inmate brought a § 1983 action against prison officials alleging violation of his right of access to courts by their failure to provide reasonable access to the prison's law library. The district court granted summary judgment for the inmate and entered an injunction requiring improvements to the library. The appeals court held that the appeal was moot because the inmate was transferred, but that remand was warranted to determine if the officials' conduct caused the mootness such that the injunction should not be vacated. A special master had been appointed by the district court, who recommended: expanding both the size of the library and its holdings; permitting inmates to have open access to the stacks or to check out four rather than three books at a time; a training program for inmate law clerks; increasing both the length and frequency of inmates' visits to the library; implementing a system for scheduling inmates' use of the library; and providing more opportunities for inmates with jobs to use the library. Hall v. Griego, 896 F.Supp. 1043 (D.Colo. 1995). An inmate brought an action against prison officials alleging violation of his rights under the Religious Freedom Restoration Act (RFRA). The district court found that the inmate stated a claim for violation of his rights under RFRA in being prohibited from wearing headgear and being transferred after conducting religious services. The court held that material questions of fact precluded summary judgment on whether the inmate's transfers were retaliatory. The court noted that if a second correctional facility offers fewer or inferior opportunities for religious practice, the transfer of an inmate to that facility may be punitive, so as to be impermissible retaliation. The court found that reclassification of the inmate's security status did not trigger constitutional due process. (Colorado State Penitentiary)

Ishaaq v. Compton, 900 F.Supp. 935 (W.D.Tenn. 1995). An inmate filed a § 1983 suit against state prison officials seeking damages for violation of his constitutional rights which allegedly resulted from denial of his grievances, a disciplinary conviction, verbal threats and a transfer. The district court dismissed the case, finding that denying the inmate's request to telephone his attorney did not deny him the right of access to courts. The court held that the inmate's transfer to another facility following threats by another inmate did not violate due process, regardless of the motivation of prison officials, given that the transfer did not produce a significant change in the conditions of his sentence. The court also found that the inmate's substantive due process rights were not violated even if the transfer was in retaliation for the inmate's habit of filing numerous grievances. On remand from the court of appeals the district court held that: (1) inmates' equal protection rights were violated by the Board of Pardons and Paroles consideration--without disclosure--of protest statements; (2) inmates' due process rights were violated by the Board's consideration of writ-writing activities; and (3) out-of-state inmates were not denied equal protection by the Board's practice of considering successful completion of furlough. Jones v. Kelly, 918 F.Supp. 74 (W.D.N.Y. 1995). An inmate filed a civil rights suit against corrections officials alleging that they knowingly placed his life in danger by transferring him to a certain correctional facility. After his transfer the inmate's cell was set on fire and he was assaulted by other inmates. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants, finding that they had taken appropriate measures at every reasonable opportunity to ensure the inmate's safety, although the risk of harm to the inmate was substantial and the officials had knowledge of the risk. Maguire v. Coughlin, 901 F.Supp. 101 (N.D.N.Y. 1995). A former inmate sued corrections officials to recover for alleged verbal and physical abuse, inadequate cell conditions, and transfers. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants, in part, and denied it in part. The court found that the alleged verbal and physical abuse was not cruel and unusual punishment since officers did not apply force maliciously and sadistically to cause harm and did not use more than de minimus force. The court held that the former inmate's transfers did not implicate a due process liberty interest; merely transferring the former inmate among and within four correctional facilities in a span of three weeks in order to carry out an escape investigation did not implicate due process. Because an inmate's Eighth Amendment right to adequate cell conditions was clearly established at the time of the alleged violations, the court held that the defendants were not entitled to qualified immunity. The district court granted a preliminary injunction against the inmate, which the appeals court reversed and remanded. The appeals court held that the prisoner failed to establish that the transfer was retaliatory and was not justified by neutral institutional objectives. The prisoner had given an interview to a television network and had been successful in previous lawsuits against prison officials; the interview occurred after the officials had met to transfer the prisoner, and there was no evidence that officials at the new prison who placed the inmate in a double cell were aware of the interview. Schroeder v. McDonald, 55 F.3d 454 (9th Cir. 1995). An inmate filed a pro se civil rights action alleging he was transferred in retaliation for filing a civil rights action against a prison guard. The district court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment in part and the appeals court reversed in part and remanded. The appeals court found that the prison officials were entitled to qualified immunity and that state prison regulations generally requiring that an inmate be held in the least restrictive level of confinement did not give rise to any liberty interest protected by due process. The court noted that evidence showed that the inmate was disrupting internal discipline during his first 16 days after transfer to a minimum security facility and that he was creating an excessive burden on staff by constantly demanding access to the law library and continuously requesting legal materials. The inmate was transferred back to the medium security facility from which he had come, and the court found that inmate had no constitutional right to remain in a facility which corresponded to the risk level at which he had been classified. (Hawai'i Department of Public Safety, Corrections Division)

Sisneros v. Nix, 884 F.Supp. 1313 (S.D.Iowa 1995). A prisoner incarcerated in an Arizona facility brought suit against Iowa prison officials alleging deprivation of his First Amendment rights while he was confined in Iowa before his transfer. The district court held that the prison regulation which required that mail sent and received by the prisoner be in the English language did not violate the inmate's First Amendment rights. However, the court found that Iowa officials had erred by transferring the prisoner to Arizona in retaliation for his assertion of his First Amendment rights, and that the prisoner was entitled to compensatory and punitive damages. The court issued an injunction which required Iowa officials to exercise all available efforts to secure the prisoner's return to Iowa, although it was asserted that it would be ineffectual because it could not be applied to Arizona officials who have the ultimate transfer decision authority. This case compelled the district court judge to begin his decision with the following: "Given the crescendo of public uproar over frivolous prisoner litigation clogging the federal courts, this case is an important reminder that however fortissimo the public clamor, the court must always listen for a solo voice with a legitimate complaint of a constitutional violation. This is such a case." The prisoner was transferred from Arizona to Iowa under an interstate compact. Prison officials ordered him transferred back to Arizona in retaliation for having brought grievances and lawsuits. The court found that the prisoner was entitled to compensatory damages of $5,000, which was approximately $10.50 per day, covering out-of-cell time lost when Arizona authorities placed him in involuntary protective custody, loss of access to yard and exercise facilities and loss of access to communal activities including meals and sports. The court also awarded punitive damages of $1,000 against each Iowa official who had been involved in the wrongful transfer. (Iowa State Penitentiary)

A inmate sued prison officials alleging violation of his rights as the result of a transfer from one prison to another because he exercised his right to seek redress of grievances. The district court denied summary judgment for the defendants on the grounds of qualified immunity. The appeals court reversed, finding that the officials could permissibly transfer an inmate from a level II institution to another in order to give prison staff a respite from the inmate's continuous barrage of grievances, even if the new facility was less desirable than the facility from which the inmate was transferred. The court noted that the inmate had no constitutional right not to be transferred when prison officials determine, in exercise of their discretion, that the prisoner was an adjustment problem. Alnutt v. Cleary, 913 F.Supp. 160 (W.D.N.Y. 1996). An inmate filed a civil rights action alleging his constitutional rights were violated by corrections officials while he was serving as an inmate representative on a grievance committee. The defendants moved to dismiss the case and the district court denied the motion in part, finding that summary judgment for the defendants was precluded on one claim. The inmate alleged that state corrections officials verbally harassed him, made direct threats, and prepared a false misbehavior report charging him with marijuana use following his election as a representative on an inmate grievance resolution committee. While the court ruled that these allegations did not give rise to a civil rights cause of action, the allegations suggested a correlation between adverse actions against the inmate and his activities as an inmate representative--precluding summary judgment on the inmate's retaliation claim. The court also found that the transfer of the inmate to another state correctional facility, without a hearing, violated a state regulation and did not meet the emergency exception to the hearing requirement. Babcock v. White, 102 F.3d 267 (7th Cir. 1996). A prisoner brought a Bivens claim against prison officials alleging violation of his rights as the result of his retention in administrative segregation and delays in transferring him to another facility. The prisoner had requested a transfer to another prison because of gang members who had threatened to kill him. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded the case. The appeals court held that prison officials did not violate the prisoner's Eighth Amendment rights or due process rights by keeping him in the facility despite his fear of physical harm, because no harm was inflicted and there was no indication of malice on the part of the officials. The court noted that the prisoner had originally requested placement in administrative segregation and therefore could not claim that he was deprived of the opportunity to earn good time credits. But the appeals court found that the prisoner had stated a claim that the officials had acted in retaliation for the prisoner's right to petition for redress of grievances, precluding summary judgment. The court also held that the officials were not entitled to qualified immunity. In its decision, the appeals court stated "John Babcock is living proof of the dangers that prison gangs pose to inmates, and of the logistical nightmare they create for prison administrators." Babcock had claimed that he was held in administrative segregation for ten months while the officials processed his request to be transferred to another prison. Cochran v. Morris, 73 F.3d 1310 (4th Cir. 1996). A prisoner filed an in forma pauperis suit against prison officials and it was dismissed by the district court. The appeals court affirmed the lower court decision, finding that the district court did not abuse its discretion in finding that the claims were virtually identical to those in a previous unsuccessful complaint. The court held that the prisoner's allegation that prison officials transferred him in retaliation for filing lawsuits was not sufficiently linked to the specific transfer decision and was therefore not sufficient to state a cause of action. STATE STATUTE

LAW LIBRARY

Counts v. Newhart, 951 F.Supp. 579 (E.D.Va. 1996). A state prison inmate brought a § 1983 action against a sheriff and corrections department official challenging conditions at a city jail and the department's failure to transfer the inmate to another facility. The district court held that the inmate had no right to transfer from a local jail to a state prison under either the due process clause or state statutes, and that failure to transfer the inmate did not constitute an equal protection violation. The court held that a state statute providing for the transfer of inmates from local jails to a state prison within 60 days of sentencing did not create an interest protected by due process, as the statute was merely a procedural device governing the location of the prisoner, and that retaining an inmate in a local jail beyond the 60-day period did not exceed the normal limits of custody. The court found that jail conditions did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment and that the provision of an allegedly inadequate law library did not violate the inmate's right of access to courts. Goff v. Burton, 91 F.3d 1188 (8th Cir. 1996). A prisoner brought a § 1983 action against prison officials alleging damages arising out of retaliatory transfer and punishment. The district court entered judgment for the prisoner and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court found that the sequence of events supported the determination that the prisoner was transferred from a correctional center to a penitentiary in retaliation for a civil rights action the prisoner had brought against the prison. The appeals court also found that the district court could conclude that a disciplinary action imposed on the prisoner was in retaliation for filing a suit, as the penitentiary did not put forward "some evidence" in support of its disciplinary action. The appeals court held that the trial court could impose damages of $2,250 for 225 days spent in segregation. The court noted that although prison officials had information tending to implicate the prisoner in an assault, they took no action until after the civil complaint had been received. Kass v. Reno, 83 F.3d 1186 (10th Cir. 1996). A prisoner who was transferred from Mexico to the United States under the terms of a prisoner exchange treaty filed a petition for habeas corpus relief challenging his Mexican conviction. The district court denied relief and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed the lower court decision. The court found that the requirement of the prisoner exchange treaty that the prisoner seeking the transfer must agree not to challenge the Mexican conviction in United States court was not unconstitutional because the prisoner relinquished no vested rights by consenting to the treaty terms; Americans incarcerated in Mexican prisons have no right to relief from United States courts and therefore they lose nothing by consenting to limit themselves solely to Mexican limits after they are transferred. The court also found that the prisoner forfeited potential early release under Mexican law when he agreed to transfer to the United States, and that Mexico had exclusive jurisdiction over the prisoner's claim that Mexican authorities miscalculated his work credits. Laza v. Reish, 84 F.3d 578 (2nd Cir. 1996). A prisoner brought a § 1983 action against a warden alleging that he had been subjected to unlawful punishment as a pretrial detainee when he was transferred from state prison and held in a federal prison to await trial on federal charges. The district court dismissed the suit and the appeals court affirmed, ruling that since the prisoner had not completed his state sentence at the time he was held, he had not been a pretrial detainee with a due process right to freedom from punishment under Bell v. Wolfish. The prisoner assaulted a counselor who was attempting to conduct a routine search of his cell and was transferred two days later from a federal metropolitan correctional facility to a federal correctional institution where he was placed in administrative detention. Marshall v. Reno, 915 F.Supp. 426 (D.D.C. 1996). A former federal prisoner who was a Canadian citizen sued federal officials alleging violation of his rights due to the officials' failure to transfer or deport him to his home country and denial of access to release programs which were available to United States citizens. The district court dismissed the case, finding that the prisoner did not have a protected liberty interest in obtaining deportation or transfer, nor did he have a right to be incarcerated at a particular prison or under a certain security classification. Although there was a treaty between the United States and Canada that allowed the transfer of the prisoner, the court noted that this was a discretionary matter which afforded the prisoner no right to a transfer. The Federal Bureau of Prisons program statement that limited access of aliens to community confinement facilities and minimum security facilities did not, according to the court, violate the equal protection clause. Moorman v. Thalacker, 83 F.3d 970 (8th Cir. 1996). A prisoner filed a § 1983 action against prison officials, alleging a due process violation arising from discipline imposed for violation of prison regulations. The district court denied the defendants' request for qualified immunity and ruled in favor of the prisoner. The defendants appealed. The appeals court reversed the lower court decision, ruling that the discretionary transfer of the prisoner to a medium security prison was not a disruption exceeding the ordinary incidents of prison life and therefore did not implicate a due process liberty interest. The court also ruled that the prison officials were entitled to qualified immunity. The officials had found that the prisoner violated prison regulations when he had a conversation with a fellow prisoner about obtaining a handgun immediately upon the prisoner's imminent release; the prisoner's discipline included the loss of sixteen days of good time. Niece v. Fitzner, 922 F.Supp. 1208 (E.D.Mich. 1996). A prisoner and his deaf fiance brought a civil rights suit under the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), Rehabilitation Act, and state law, alleging discrimination and retaliation. The district court found that the prison's provision of telephone access to prisoners was a "service" within the meaning of ADA and that the prisoner's fiance stated a claim upon which relief could be granted. The court held that prison officials--in their individual capacities--were proper defendants to the ADA suit and that compensatory damages were available under ADA. The court found that the prisoner had standing to bring the suit alleging that he was discriminated against because of his known association with his deaf fiance and on the grounds that he was retaliated against when he was transferred from a minimum security facility to a maximum security facility after he complained about the lack of access to telephonic equipment allowing him to communicate with his fiance. The court also found the fiance stated a claim that prison officials discriminated against her by not allowing her to bring a plastic tumbler with handles on her visits to the prison, in retaliation for her complaint to the Department of Justice and her participation in the Department's investigation of violations of ADA in the prison. A Canadian serving a federal prison sentence sought injunctive relief under the Alien Tort Claims Act seeking transfer to Canada to serve the remainder of her sentence, pursuant to the Convention on the Transfer of Sentenced Persons. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the prison official, finding that the transfer was not retaliation for filing a lawsuit and that the official was entitled to qualified immunity. Corrections officials stated that the inmate was transferred because he had become too familiar with staff and procedures and the court agreed that the transfer would have occurred even if the inmate had not filed a lawsuit. Dodson v. Reno, 958 F.Supp. 49 (D.Puerto Rico 1997). An inmate in a federal pretrial detention facility brought a Bivens action against facility officials challenging his proposed transfer to a segregated wing of a federal penitentiary which also housed members of a gang that posed a threat to his life. The district court granted summary judgment for the officials, finding that the proposed transfer did not violate the inmate's Eighth Amendment rights and that the inmate was not entitled to an injunction preventing prison officials from transferring him to any penitentiary in the United States. The court noted that the proposed facility offered an unusually high level of security for inmates whose lives were threatened by other inmates, making the transfer a reasonable measure designed to ensure the inmate's safety. The court also held that denying the inmate physical access to a prison law library did not deny him his right of access to courts. (Metropolitan Detention Center, Puerto Rico)

FAILURE TO PROTECT

Fisher v. Goord, 981 F.Supp. 140 (W.D.N.Y. 1997). A female state prisoner filed a civil rights action against corrections officers and officials claiming she had been raped and sexually abused by officers. The prisoner moved for a preliminary injunction transferring her to another institution and the court denied the motion. The court held that it did not have the authority to transfer the state prisoner to a federal prison, and that prison officials had taken steps to protect the prisoner from attacks in the future. A newly enacted state law classified any sexual relations between a prison employee and an inmate as statutory rape, and the court suggested that this was likely to deter any further misconduct. The court held that the alleged consensual interactions between a correction officer and the prisoner, although inappropriate, were not cruel and unusual punishment under the Eighth Amendment, nor did the officer's alleged conduct in stroking the prisoner's hair while she was asleep and giving her an unsolicited kiss. The court also held that inmates do not have a First Amendment right to write love letters to corrections officers and that prison authorities have a significant and legitimate interest in prohibiting and punishing such conduct. DUE PROCESS

Freitas v. Ault, 109 F.3d 1335 (8th Cir. 1997). An inmate filed a civil rights suit against a warden and prison employee alleging he was sexually harassed by the employee, and challenging his transfer to another facility. The district court entered judgment for the inmate on the due process claim associated with the transfer. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The appeals court held that the transfer of the inmate, without a hearing, from a minimum security facility to a medium security facility did not violate the inmate's due process rights because it did not subject the inmate to conditions that were an atypical and significant hardship. The appeals court also held that the alleged sexual harassment did not rise to the level of an Eighth Amendment violation. The inmate had been assigned to a job as a painter under a female staff member and a romantic relationship developed between the two that lasted for several months. The two would meet in secluded areas of the facility where they would hug, kiss, and talk. At her request, the inmate would write her "hot sexy" letters several times each week, and she occasionally dressed in tight skirts and high heels for the inmate's benefit. The inmate informed the warden of the relationship after he became angry at the woman for having a male friend stay at her home over the weekend. In his letter to the warden, the inmate referred to the "relationship" between them, and stated that he had been "as much at fault" as her. The court found that the inmate's welcome and voluntary sexual interactions with the correctional employee, no matter how inappropriate, could not as a matter of law constitute "pain" to the inmate as required to show a violation of the Eighth Amendment. Hendricks v. Coughlin, 114 F.3d 390 (2nd Cir. 1997). An indigent inmate brought a federal civil rights action against corrections officers alleging that he was transferred in retaliation for legal actions. The inmate, a self-described jailhouse lawyer, had requested appointment of counsel. The district court denied the inmate's request for counsel and dismissed the action. The appeals court reversed the order denying counsel, vacated the judgment of dismissal and remanded the case. The appeals court found that the district court's automatic denial of the inmate's request for appointment of counsel, on the ground that the case had not survived a dispositive motion, was an abuse of discretion. The court noted that the complexity of legal issues was considerable, and that appointed counsel could possibly cure flaws in the inmate's complaint and shortfalls in evidentiary proof. Some officers had admitted involvement with at least one allegedly retaliatory transfer. (Southport Correctional Facility, New York)

Luong v. Hatt, 979 F.Supp. 481 (N.D.Tex. 1997). A state prisoner who was being housed in a privately-operated prison facility brought a pro se action against prison officials seeking transfer to another facility and damages for their failure to protect him from assaults by other inmates. The district court dismissed the case, finding that the prisoner did not demonstrate violations of his rights sufficient to support an order from the court requiring his transfer to another institution. The court also held that the prisoner could not recover damages in the absence of any indication that suffered a "physical injury" within the meaning of the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA). According to the court, the cuts, scratches, bruises and similar injuries suffered by the prisoner lasted only two or three days and did not constitute the requisite level of physical injury. The court concluded that the appropriate de minimis standard is whether the injury is of a nature that would require a free-world person to visit an emergency room or to be attended by a doctor; injuries treatable at home with over-the-counter drugs, heating pads, rest and similar methods do not fall within the parameters of the PLRA requirements for a "physical injury." The appeals court affirmed, finding that the Bureau of Prisons had discretion to consider the inmate's alien status in setting his conditions of confinement. Batts v. Richards, 4 F.Supp.2d 96 (D.Conn. 1998). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against correctional officials alleging that his placement in administrative segregation and transfer to a different facility violated his due process rights. The district court granted summary judgment for the officials, finding that no due process violation occurred. According to the court, the inmate received due process because he was given written notice of a classification hearing 48 hours in advance, was given the opportunity to call witnesses, was given a hearing before a hearing officer with a staff advocate acting on his behalf, and the hearing officer issued a written report. Castle v. Clymer, 15 F.Supp.2d 640 (E.D.Pa. 1998). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against prison officials alleging that he was transferred to another facility in retaliation for exercise of his First Amendment free speech rights. The district court entered judgment for the prisoner, finding that transferring him based on his correspondence with a newspaper reporter violated his right to free speech. The court held that transferring the prisoner because he participated in a preauthorized interview with a reporter violated his right to procedural due process, as did transferring him based on his activities as president of an advocacy group for life prisoners. The court found that the prisoner had a free speech right to send outgoing correspondence to a newspaper reporter, subject to reasonable prison regulations. The court held that compensatory damages were not warranted for the prisoner's loss of his position as a para-law library clerk, and that punitive damages were not warranted because there was no finding that the officials acted with callous indifference or an evil motive; the court awarded the prisoner nominal damages of $1. The court declined to order the receiving facility to give the prisoner the same job and the single-cell status the prisoner enjoyed at the original facility, because the receiving facility was not involved in the constitutional violations that gave rise to the case. In its decision, the court outlined three tests to determine whether the prisoner was transferred in retaliation for exercising his constitutional rights: the "but for" test, the "significant factor" test, and the "narrowly tailored" test. Collins v. Hannigan, 14 F.Supp.2d 1239 (D.Kan. 1998). An inmate brought a pro se action against prison officials, a physician and a nurse, alleging that his constitutional rights were violated by their responses to his health-related complaints, which resulted in his transfer from minimum security to maximum security. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court found that changes in the inmate's medical and security classifications which resulted in his transfer from minimum security to maximum security, his inability to participate in a work program, and short visitation periods, did not pose an atypical and significant hardship that violated the due process clause. According to the court, denial of the opportunity to participate in an in-house work program does not raise due process concerns. The court held that a corrections officer did not violate the Eighth Amendment when he ordered the inmate, who had a heart condition, to clean baseboards. The inmate did not suffer serious injury but at most was dizzy and suffered some pain, and the officer checked with a physician before ordering the inmate to work. The court also found that the Eighth Amendment was not violated when a corrections officer allegedly waited 15 minutes before summoning medical assistance at the request of the inmate. The court held that the transfer of the inmate to a maximum security facility after his heart condition prevented him from working did not violate equal protection, and was justified by his need to be located close to a prison clinic. A former prisoner who had been transported from Oregon to Colorado by employees of a Tennessee corporation which contracted with the Colorado Department of Corrections to transport prisoners to other states, sued the corporation under § 1983 alleging that she had been sexually assaulted and otherwise endangered during the trip. The district court held that the corporation and its employees, who were nonresidents of Colorado, were subject to personal jurisdiction in Colorado. The court found that the prisoner stated a § 1983 claim by alleging that she had been sexually assaulted by one employee and that another employee failed to stop the assaults. The court found that the employees were acting as agents and prison guards of the State of Colorado, and used state power as a coercive force to further their wrongful acts. Higgins v. Correctional Medical Services of Ill., 8 F.Supp.2d 821 (N.D.Ill. 1998). A pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against medical personnel and a correctional medical provider for allegedly denying him his constitutional right to medical care. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court found that medical personnel's failure to order x-rays of the inmate's shoulder based on the inmate's claim that it was dislocated was an exercise of medical judgment and did not amount to deliberate indifference. The court found that evidence was insufficient to establish that medical personnel strongly suspected that the inmate's shoulder was dislocated. The court also found that the inmate failed to establish that the correctional medical service provider had conspired to deny medical treatment to inmates who were soon to be transferred. The court noted that the provider was contractually obligated to provide inmates with medical care mandated by the Eighth Amendment and therefore could be held liable for constitutional violations under § 1983. Hudson v. McHugh, 148 F.3d 859 (7th Cir. 1998). A county jail inmate brought a § 1983 action against a halfway house, a county sheriff and others, alleging violation of the Eighth Amendment when he was deprived of his epilepsy medicine following his transfer from a halfway house to a county jail. The district court entered summary judgment for the defendants and the appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The appeals court held that the director and assistant director lacked knowledge that the inmate was being deprived of his medication and thus did not violate the Eighth Amendment. But the alleged inaction of county jail officers and a nurse constituted deliberate indifference to a serious medical need in violation of the Eighth Amendment, according to the appeals court. The inmate, a federal prisoner serving the end of his sentence at a halfway house, tested positive for cocaine use and was transferred to a county jail. (Rock County Jail, Wisconsin)

Jackson v. New York Dept. of Correctional Services, 994 F.Supp. 219 (S.D.N.Y. 1998). A prison inmate who had been placed in keeplock for 13 days and then transferred to another prison brought a § 1983 action against prison officials. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants, finding that the inmate's placement and transfer did not implicate any protected liberty interest. The court also held that the inmate could not recover for false imprisonment for his 13 days in keeplock, where he was placed there for legitimate purposes and the prison attempted to hold a hearing on the disciplinary charges but was unable to because the inmate was transferred. The inmate was placed in keeplock as the result of a misbehavior report, which the inmate had claimed was falsified. The inmate was transferred to avoid a conflict with another inmate who was transferred to the prison, with whom he had a previous altercation. The court found that the accidental placement of the second inmate, who was regarded by prison officials as an "enemy" of the plaintiff, in the same prison was not the result of deliberate indifference. The transfer of the plaintiff, instead of the second inmate, was supported by the fact that the second inmate had at least ten enemies throughout the prison system and it would have been more difficult to transfer him. A prisoner who was convicted of a drug offense in a Mexican court, but was transferred to the United States under a prisoner exchange treaty appealed the decision of the United States Parole Commission which calculated his release date. The appeals court affirmed the Commission's calculation, finding that the prisoner was not entitled to a sentence reduction for acceptance of responsibility in view of the prisoner's "stonewalling" behavior, including affirmative denials of her guilt. The court also held that the Commission's alleged failure to follow its internal guidelines did not result in a denial of due process. The court noted that the guideline was not intended to have the force of law, but was instead used only as an interpretive, procedural rule to guide Commission practice. The guideline required the hearing examiner to warn the prisoner that if the prisoner continued to contest the conduct which was necessarily the basis of the foreign conviction, she would not qualify for the acceptance of responsibility adjustment. The court also held that the inmate's constitutional right of access to court did not entitle him to access to English translations of Brazilian law in order to research and challenge his arrest and extradition. Lambert v. Sullivan, 35 F.Supp.2d 1131 (E.D.Wis. 1999). A state prisoner filed for a writ of habeas corpus in an attempt to prevent his transfer to a privately-operated correctional facility in another state. The district court denied the petition, finding that the proposed transfer did not violate the prisoner's rights under state law nor did it violate the prisoner's due process rights. The court noted that as a general matter, a state prisoner has no federal constitutional right to serve his sentence in any particular place of confinement. The court also rejected the prisoner's assertion that his transfer would violate the Thirteenth Amendment's proscription against involuntary servitude because he would be required to work at the private facility. According to the court, it is well established that the forced labor of state convicts does not violate the Thirteenth Amendment, and the same rule of law applies regardless of whether the convict is incarcerated in a public or private facility. Inmates of several Wisconsin state prisons sought habeas corpus relief to invalidate, under the Thirteen Amendment's ban on involuntary servitude, a state statute that authorizes prison authorities to enter into contracts with private prisons in other states for the confinement of Wisconsin prisoners. Federal district courts denied the inmates' petitions. The appeals court denied the applications for appealability, finding that § 1983, not habeas corpus, was the proper means to challenge the constitutionality of the statute, and that the claims were frivolous. According to the court, the Thirteenth Amendment ban on involuntary servitude has an express exception for persons imprisoned pursuant to conviction of a crime. (Wisconsin)

U.S. District Court
DUE PROCESS

Rienholtz v. Campbell, 64 F.Supp.2d 721 (W.D.Tenn. 1999). A prison inmate brought a pro se action under § 1983 alleging that termination from his prison law library position, his transfer to another facility, and his termination from a commissary clerical job, resulted in violation of his First Amendment and due process rights. The district court held that the handling of the inmate's prison grievances did not implicate his First Amendment right of access to courts. According to the court, right of access applies only to court actions, not prison grievances. The court also found that the inmate's alleged lack of access to a prison law library because a computerized research system had not been installed did not violate the First Amendment. The court held that an inmate has no liberty interest protected by the due process clause in assignment to a particular job, to a particular prison, or in freedom from segregation. The court noted that although mandatory language in state prison regulations might have been violated, these procedural regulations did not implicate a protected liberty interest. (West Tennessee Prison Site I, Henning, Tennessee)

HABEAS CORPUS

Rizvi v. Crabtree, 42 F.Supp.2d 1024 (D.Or. 1999). An inmate who had been placed in administrative segregation, transferred and barred from communicating with his son who was another inmate, for allegedly planning an escape, petitioned for habeas corpus relief. The district court granted the petition, finding that the inmate had been denied procedural due process. According to the court, the inmate should have been given advance written notice of alleged violations, a written statement of fact finders as to evidence relied on and reasons for disciplinary action, and the opportunity to call witnesses and present documentary evidence in his defense. The inmate and his son had been placed in administrative segregation along with three other men after an informant told prison staff that they were planning an escape. The group was then transferred to a local county jail where they remained in administrative segregation for two more months, and then were transferred to different federal institutions. (Federal Bureau of Prisons, FCI Safford, Arizona)

U.S. Appeals Court
RETALIATION
OTHER STATE

Rouse v. Benson, 193 F.3d 936 (8th Cir. 1999). A state prisoner brought a civil rights action against prison officials alleging that his transfer from one prison to another was in retaliation for his exercise exercise of his Native American religion and violated his equal protection rights. The district court entered summary judgment in favor of the officials and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded, finding that fact issues as to whether the transfer was in retaliation for exercise of a First Amendment activity precluded summary judgment. The prisoner had been convicted and incarcerated in Iowa but was transferred at his request to a state prison in Minnesota where he hoped to have greater opportunities to practice his Native American religion, specifically the practices of Lakota. While incarcerated in Minnesota he complained about various religious restrictions and filed several grievances. He was returned to Iowa and alleged that his transfer was in retaliation for his grievances and his efforts to practice his religion. (Minnesota Correctional Facility, Stillwater)

U.S. District Court
LIBERTY INTEREST

Sinnett v. Simmons, 45 F.Supp.2d 1210 (D.Kan. 1999). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against various prison workers alleging interference with his freedom of religion, violations of due process and equal protection, and failure to provide adequate protection. The court found that the inmate had no liberty interest in a prison-to-prison transfer, absent a showing that a transfer resulted in a hardship that was "atypical" or "significant" when compared to ordinary prison life. Denial of smoking privileges, extended exercise time, library visits, and participation in certain programs had been necessary to contain disturbances throughout the correctional system and the restrictions were lifted within three weeks. The court held that prison staff did not violate the prisoner's Eighth Amendment rights to be protected from harm when they placed an inmate with a violent history in protective custody with him, even though he had been labeled a "snitch" for cooperating with prison officials. The court noted that the prison staff lacked knowledge that the violent inmate would harm the cooperating inmate. (Ellsworth Correctional Facility, Kansas)

FOREIGN COUNTRIES

Wong v. Warden, FCI Raybrook, 171 F.3d 148 (2nd Cir. 1999). An inmate who was a Canadian citizen sought habeas corpus relief alleging that he was denied transfer to a Canadian prison, under the provisions of the Convention on the Transfer of Sentenced Persons, based on his race and national origin. The district court denied the petition and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the Department of Justice's decision to deny the inmate transfer to a Canadian prison was subject to judicial review, given the inmate's allegations of unconstitutional discrimination. (Fed. Corr. Inst., Raybrook, N.Y.)

U.S. District Court
FOREIGN COUNTRIES

Coleman v. Reno, 91 F.Supp.2d 130 (D.D.C. 2000). A prisoner who was a dual citizen of the United States and Canada who was incarcerated in a Canadian prison filed a complaint seeking an order directing the United States Attorney General to accept custody of him to allow his return to the United States. The district court dismissed the case, finding that the treaty between the two countries pertaining to the execution of penal sentences did not provide a private right of action and that the decision to approve a transfer was committed to the discretion of the Attorney General and was not subject to review. (U.S. Department of Justice)

Doe v. Ward, 124 F.Supp.2d 900 (W.D.Pa. 2000). A convicted sex offender filed a complaint seeking preliminary and permanent injunctive relief in connection with the application of the Pennsylvania Registration of Sex Offenders Act, to the extent that he had been subjected to community notification for an out-of-state conviction. The district court granted the offender's motion, finding that the offender did not waive the process according to in-state offenders prior to community notification when he applied to transfer to Pennsylvania under the terms of the Interstate Compact Concerning Parole. The court noted that once a sending state grants permission, the receiving state must assume supervision and treat the offender the same as in-state offenders. (Pennsylvania Board of Probation and Parole)

PRIVATE FACILITY

Evans v. Holm, 114 F.Supp.2d 706 (W.D.Tenn. 2000). A prisoner who had been transferred to a privately-operated out-of-state prison petitioned for habeas corpus relief. The district court denied the petition, finding that the transfer did not amount to a deprivation of liberty. The court noted that the prisoner did not reside in the other state because he had not chosen to live there and would be returned to the prosecuting state for release and any post-release supervision. The court found that a prisoner does not enjoy a federal constitutional right to be confined within a convicting state's borders, regardless of that state's statutes or prison regulations. (West Tennessee Detention Facility, operated by the Corrections Corporation of America)

U.S. Appeals Court
OUT OF STATE
PRIVATE FACILITY

Montez v. McKinna, 208 F.3d 862 (10th Cir. 2000). A prisoner brought a pro se petition for a writ of habeas corpus challenging his interstate transfers under state and federal law. The district court dismissed the claims and the appeals court dismissed the appeal. The appeals court held that federal law did not prohibit the inmate's transfer from one state to a private facility in another state. The inmate had been transferred from a Wyoming state-operated prison to a private Texas correctional facility and then to a private Colorado correctional facility. (Cowley County Correctional Facility, Colorado)

U.S. Appeals Court

Rael v. Williams, 223 F.3d 1153 (10th Cir. 2000). A state prisoner who was incarcerated in a privately-run prison facility under a contract between the state and a private corporation filed a habeas corpus petition. The district court dismissed the petition. The appeals court held that the fact that a state prisoner is transferred to, or must reside in, a privately operated facility, simply does not raise a federal constitutional claim. Berdine v. Sullivan, 161 F.Supp.2d 972 (E.D.Wis. 2001). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action alleging that his transfer to an out-of-state correctional facility violated his due process rights and constituted cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The court held that the prisoner has no liberty interest in avoiding transfer to another prison, be it out-of-state, more restrictive, or owned and run by a private corporation. The court found that the attendant loss of visitation associated with his transfer to an out-of-state prison did not violate the Eighth Amendment because it did not totally deprive him of visitation privileges. (Whiteville Correctional Facility, Tennessee, and Oshkosh Correctional Facility, Wisconsin)

RETALIATION

Farver v. Schwartz, 255 F.3d 473 (8th Cir. 2001). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against prison officials alleging that harassment from correctional officers prompted a urine test which resulted in his loss of good time credits, change of class, and relocation. The district court dismissed the action and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part and remanded. The appeals court held that the inmate stated a claim under § 1983 with respect to allegedly false disciplinary charges and allegedly retaliatory relocation. The inmate had been relocated 250 miles from his home after he questioned an officer's right to deny him legal assistance. The inmate had previously filed a grievance against another officer that allegedly resulted in false disciplinary charges. (Cummins Unit, Arkansas Department of Correction)

U.S. Appeals Court
DISCIPLINE
DUE PROCESS

Giano v. Selsky, 238 F.3d 223 (2nd Cir. 2001). A state prisoner brought an action alleging his placement in administrative segregation violated his due process rights. The district court granted summary judgment to the defendants and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court vacated the district court decision and remanded the case. The appeals court held that a 92 day continuation of the prisoner's confinement in administrative segregation at a prison to which the prisoner was transferred, which extended his 670 day period of segregation served at the sending prison, created a liberty interest under New York law, implicating due process concerns. The court held that the periods of segregation must be considered in the aggregate and that the segregation at the second facility was simply a continuation of his initial segregation. (Clinton Correctional Facility, N.Y.)

U.S. Appeals Court
RETALIATION

Smith v. Campbell, 250 F.3d 1032 (6th Cir. 2001). A prisoner brought a § 1983 action asserting a First Amendment retaliation claim against a prison counselor and another prison official. The district court dismissed portions of the case and granted summary judgment for the defendants on the remaining portions. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the prisoner's filing of grievances against prison officials on behalf of himself and others, in a manner that violated legitimate prison regulations and objectives in light of his aggressive attitudes and his attempts to intimidate staff members, was not a protected activity. The court also held that the prisoner failed to establish a causal connection between protected conduct and his transfer. (Northeast Corr'l Complex, Tenn.)

U.S. District Court
RETALIATION

Spruytte v. Hoffner, 181 F.Supp.2d 736 (W.D.Mich. 2001). Prisoners brought an action alleging they were transferred to other facilities in retaliation for exercise of their First Amendment rights. The district court found in favor of the inmates, holding that the prisoners were subjected to adverse actions in retaliation for writing a letter to a newspaper editor. (Lakeland Corr'l Facility, Michigan)

U.S. District Court

Tart v. Young, 168 F.Supp.2d 590 (W.D.Va. 2001). An inmate brought § 1983 claims against a warden and commissioner of corrections alleging they violated his free exercise rights. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court held that a prison policy that prohibited inmates from "smudging" with herbs did not violate the First Amendment. The court noted that the prison policy required all religious groups to have more than one inmate from a housing unit. According to the court, the inmate's transfer from a Connecticut prison to a Virginia prison did not violate the inmate's rights under the Equal Protection Clause. (Wallens Ridge State Prison, Virginia)

Ali v. District of Columbia, 278 F.3d 1 (D.C. Cir. 2002). A District of Columbia inmate who was transferred to a Virginia prison and then back again, sued state and District officials alleging various violations of his constitutional rights and the Religious Freedom Restoration Act (RFRA). The district court dismissed the action and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the inmate could not establish that D.C. prison officials were liable under § 1983 for alleged constitutional violations by Virginia prison officials. The Virginia officials required the inmate to register under this birth name rather than his religiously-inspired legal name. The court noted that the Interstate Corrections Compact provided that confinement in the receiving state would not deprive an inmate of any legal rights which he would have had if confined in the sending state, but did not waive the receiving state's sovereign immunity under the Eleventh Amendment. (District of Columbia Lorton Central Facility, and Sussex II, Virginia.)

OTHER STATE PRIVATE FACILITY

Doty v. Doyle, 182 F.Supp.2d 750 (E.D.Wis. 2002). A state prisoner petitioned for habeas relief after he was transferred to a private out-of-state prison, alleging that the state lost its authority once it shipped him beyond its boundaries. The district court denied the petition and the prisoner appealed. The district court held that the state no longer had the authority to divert a portion of the prisoner's income to release accounts while he was confined in a private out-of-state prison. But the court held that the state had the authority to continue administering the prisoner's trust account, under the terms that were in place when it was created, and therefore retained the authority to deny the prisoner's request for the return of all funds in the entire account. Officials had diverted over $500 of the prisoner's money to be held in his name for his use upon his possible future release. (Wisconsin Department of Corrections, and Whiteville Corr'l Facility, Tennessee)

LIBERTY INTEREST

Fermin-Rodriguez v. Westchester County Jail Med., 191 F.Supp.2d 358 (S.D.N.Y. 2002). An inmate brought a pro se § 1983 action against county jail and federal law enforcement officials. The district court dismissed the case, finding that the inmate had no liberty interest in being returned to a state prison from a county jail, and that the delay in returning the inmate to state detainee status was not a due process violation. The court noted that prison officials generally have discretion to transfer an inmate from one correctional facility to another. The inmate claimed that conditions in the state correctional facility were superior to those in a county jail. (Westchester Co. Jail, N.Y.)

MEDICAL CARE NOTIFICATION

Gonzalez-Jimenez De Ruiz v. U.S., 231 F.Supp.2d 1187 (M.D.Fla. 2002). Survivors of a federal prison inmate who died while in custody brought claims under the Federal Tort Claims Act (FTCA). The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court held that the family failed to state a claim under Florida law. The family alleged that prison officials deceived the inmate's family regarding the inmate's terminal condition, failed to provide the family with reasonable access to the inmate during his illness, failed to inform the family of the inmate's death, offered the inmate substandard care, and delayed transporting the inmate's remains for nine days after his death. The inmate had been transferred from a correctional facility in Florida to a nearby hospital, and then to a correctional medical facility in Texas where he died after nine days. The family claimed that the officials' conduct exacerbated one of the family member's pre-existing diabetes condition, caused one child to experience difficulty in school, and triggered another child's asthma. Halpin v. Simmons, 33 Fed.Appx. 961 (10th Cir. 2002). A prisoner brought a § 1983 action and the district court dismissed the claim. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed and remanded in part. The appeals court held that a violation of the Interstate Corrections Compact (ICC) was not a violation of federal law and therefore could not be subject to a § 1983 action. The appeals court found that the prisoner stated an Eighth Amendment claim of deliberate indifference to his medical condition when he alleged that authorities ignored his repeated requests for treatment of a severe heart condition and for gastric pain. According to the prisoner, officials also refused to provide heart medication and to honor a prohibition on stair climbing that had been ordered by cardiologists. Koos v. Holm, 204 F.Supp.2d 1099 (W.D.Tenn. 2002). A state prisoner petitioned for a writ of habeas corpus, challenging his transfer to a private out-of-state prison. Martinez v. Johnson, 33 Fed.Appx. 395 (10th Cir. 2002). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action challenging his confinement in privately owned correctional facilities. The district court dismissed all claims and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the prisoner's claims that officials in the privately owned prison violated state laws and contract requirements, did not violate any federal constitutional right so as to support a § 1983 claim. (New Mexico)

TRANSPORTATION RESTRAINTS

Thielman v. Leean, 282 F.3d 478 (7th Cir. 2002). An inmate housed in a medium-security treatment facility for sexually violent persons brought a § 1983 action seeking declaratory and injunctive relief, alleging that the facility's inmate transport policy violated his rights to procedural due process and equal protection under the Fourteenth Amendment. The district court dismissed the case and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the inmate had no state-created liberty interest in being free from restraint during transportation, even if the state's statutes gave the inmate a right to the least restrictive conditions of confinement during transport. According to the court, subjecting sexually violent persons to full restraints during transport to and from the medium-security facility, while not subjecting mental health or other patients to such full restraints, did not violate the inmate's equal protection rights. The inmate had a medical condition that required him to be transported from the facility for outside medical treatment an average of three times per month. The transport policy stated, in part, that "Inmates shall be placed in full and double-locked restraints, chain-belt type waist restraints with attached handcuffs, security Blackbox, and leg restraints." Toolasprashad v. Bureau of Prisons, 286 F.3d 576 (D.C. Cir. 2002). A prisoner who was allegedly transferred and reclassified as a "special offender" in retaliation for exercising his First Amendment rights, brought a pro se action for violation of the Privacy Act. The district court dismissed the case and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The inmate alleged that he was transferred in retaliation for filing grievances. PRETRIAL DETAINEE

U.S. v. Johnson, 225 F.Supp.2d 982 (N.D.Iowa 2002). A pretrial detainee charged with murder while engaged in a conspiracy moved to be transferred to a different facility. The district court denied the motion, finding that denial of the transfer motion was not clearly erroneous, absent a showing that detention at the current facility had interfered with the detainee's right to counsel. The court noted that one of the detainee's attorneys had an office in the same city as the current detention facility. The court also found that transfer was not warranted absent a showing that conditions at the current facility amounted to unconstitutional "punishment." (Linn Co. Jail, Iowa)

U.S. District Court
RESTRAINTS

Williams-El v. McLemore, 213 F.Supp.2d 783 (E.D.Mich. 2002). A prisoner brought a civil rights action seeking monetary and equitable relief. The district court denied the defendants' summary judgment motion, in part. The court held that summary judgment was barred by genuine issues of material fact as to: whether officials were deliberately indifferent to the prisoner's protection from harm and the sufficiency of their actions to protect the prisoner from fellow inmates; and whether the inmate was disabled in the context of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA). The prisoner had a congenital deformity known as Kasabach Merritt Syndrome which caused his right hand to be severely curled inward at the wrist and caused pain when his extremities were improperly positioned. The prisoner alleged that prison officials failed to provide him with large handcuffs, rather than standard handcuffs, for transportation. (Standish Maximum Security Facility, and Josephine McCallum Facility, Michigan)

2003

RETALIATION

Bruce v. Ylst, 351 F.3d 1283 (9th Cir. 2003). A state prison inmate brought a § 1983 action against prison officials, alleging that they validated him as a prison gang affiliate in retaliation for his jail house lawyering activities and his filing of prison grievances. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the officials and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The appeals court held that fact issues as to whether the officials abused the prison gang validation procedure as a cover or ruse to silence and punish the inmate, barred summary judgment on his First Amendment retaliation claim. (Salinas Valley State Prison, California)

U.S. District Court
DISCIPLINE

Childers v. Maloney, 247 F.Supp.2d 32 (D.Mass. 2003). A state prisoner sued prison officials alleging violation of his due process rights during a prison disciplinary hearing. The district court dismissed the action. The court held that the prisoner's liberty interests were not infringed upon by his loss of visitation for six weeks, placement in isolation, and transfer to another prison as discipline for violation of prison regulations. The court found that the prisoner did not have a liberty interest, under state law, in his position as "Minority Co-Camp Chairman." The court noted that the statute authorizing the corrections commissioner to establish work programs in prisons did not indicate any limitations on the commissioner's discretion to suspend or revoke the prisoner's position. (Old Colony Correctional Center, Massachusetts)

U.S. District Court
ACCESS TO COURT
OTHER STATE

Hannon v. Allen, 241 F.Supp.2d 71 (D.Mass. 2003). A Pennsylvania inmate who was transferred to a prison in Massachusetts brought a § 1983 action claiming denial of his right of access to Pennsylvania courts, seeking a preliminary injunction. The district court denied the inmate's request for an injunction, finding that the inmate failed to satisfy the requirement that he would be likely to succeed on the merits of the case. The court noted that the Massachusetts prison could elect to satisfy its access obligations to the inmate by arranging for his legal representation in Pennsylvania. (Massachusetts Correctional Institution-Cedar Junction, and Pennsylvania Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
RETALIATION

Johnson v. Kingston, 292 F.Supp.2d 1146 (W.D.Wis. 2003). A prisoner brought a civil rights action against prison officials, alleging that they violated his First Amendment rights by retaliating against him for his involvement in other lawsuits against prison employees. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the officials. The court held that although the prisoner stated a legally viable claim that was not moot, he failed to provide evidence that would support his allegation that the defendants knew about his prior lawsuit, even though the lawsuit was widely publicized in state newspapers. The court noted that the prisoner inferred that he had been transferred in retaliation. (Waupun Correctional Institution, Wisconsin)

U.S. District Court
RETALIATION

Koger v. Snyder, 252 F.Supp.2d 723 (C.D.Ill. 2003). A state prisoner brought an action alleging violation of his rights in connection with the search and seizure of various documents in his cell, and his subsequent transfer to a different prison. According to the court, the prisoner did not have a constitutionally protected right to remain in a particular prison and his lateral transfer to another prison, based on a warden's legitimate penological reasons, did not violate the prisoner's rights. The warden transferred the prisoner to send a message to the prison population that violation of the excess property rules would not be tolerated. (Danville Corr'l Center, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
ACCESS TO COURT

Konigsberg v. Lefevre, 267 F.Supp.2d 255 (N.D.N.Y. 2003). A state inmate brought two civil rights actions against state correctional officials and employees, alleging denial of access to the courts, and conspiracy to violate his civil rights. The district court entered summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court held that the inmate failed to establish that his access to courts rights were denied with his general claim that his legal materials were lost, copied, or purposely destroyed by prison officials during his transfer. The court noted that the inmate failed to identify particular documents, show how the allegedly missing documents related to his appeal or a resulting new trial, or assert facts showing that his pursuit of litigation was affected by his lack of access to any particular documents. (Clinton Corr'l Facility, Attica Corr'l Facility, New York)

Oregon Advocacy Center v. Mink, 322 F.3d 1101 (9th Cir. 2003). Nonprofit organizations sued state officials, contending that delays by a state mental hospital in accepting mentally incapacitated criminal defendants for evaluation and treatment, violated the defendants' substantive and procedural due process rights. The district court entered an injunction requiring the hospital to admit criminal defendants within seven days of a trial court's finding of their incapacity to proceed to trial. The state officials appealed and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the hospital's delay in admitting incapacitated defendants violated their substantive due process rights. According to the court, under state law it is the state mental hospital, not counties, that has the duty to accept mentally incapacitated defendants for evaluation and treatment. Sulton v. Wright, 265 F.Supp.2d 292 (S.D.N.Y. 2003). A prison inmate sued physicians and a state corrections department's medical director, alleging that his Eighth Amendment rights were violated when surgery to repair his torn knee ligaments was delayed for four years. The district court denied qualified immunity for the defendants. The court held that the inmate stated a claim of deliberate indifference against the physicians, and against the medical director based on a policy that contributed to the delay. The policy required transferee inmates to be evaluated as new cases, causing a delay in the inmate's surgery. (Wende Correctional Facility, Green Haven Correctional Facility, New York)

Ashford v. District of Columbia, 306 F.Supp.2d 8 (D.D.C. 2004). A prisoner brought a civil rights action against the District of Columbia and its employees, alleging they were liable to him for injuries resulting from an attack by other inmates. The district court held that the prisoner stated a sufficient causal connection between his injuries and the District's alleged policy or custom of transferring inmates without informing the receiving institutions about active separation orders. The court also found that the prisoner stated a claim under § 1983 against the District's Interstate Compacts administrator. The court noted that the prisoner told prison officials at the receiving facility about the separation orders, but that an official separation order would have received more consideration and attention. Brown v. Missouri Dept. of Corrections, 353 F.3d 1038 (8th Cir. 2004). A state inmate brought a § 1983 action, alleging that officials were liable for injuries he received in an accident while en route to a correctional facility, for denying post-accident care, and for providing inadequate care. The district court dismissed the action and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The court held that the inmate had sufficiently alleged § 1983 claims for deliberate indifference to his safety and deliberate indifference to his medical needs. The inmate alleged that he asked officials to fasten his seatbelt and they refused, and that he was unable to do it himself because he was shackled. The inmate also alleged that he asked correctional officers of three occasions to let him see medical staff, claiming he was having severe complications from the accident, including difficulty seeing and standing and shaky legs, but his requests were ignored. Overturf v. Massie, 385 F.3d 1276 (10th Cir. 2004). State prison inmates who had been transferred from Hawaii to a privately owned correctional facility in another state sought federal habeas relief, alleging they should have been transferred when the private facility was purchased by the state. The district court dismissed the action, finding that inmates have no protected liberty interest in the location of their confinement. The court also held that the transferor state did not lose jurisdiction over the inmates, and that the original transfer did not constitute "banishment" in violation of the Eighth Amendment. McCray v. First State Medical System, 379 F.Supp.2d 635 (D.Del. 2005). A prisoner brought a § 1983 action against the state prison system's health care provider, alleging deliberate indifference to his medical needs. The district court granted the provider's motion to dismiss. The court held that the claim was subject to the exhaustion requirement of the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA) and that the prisoner failed to exhaust remedies. The prisoner attributed his failure to file a grievance to his blood sugar level being out of control at the time of the incident. The court also held that the prisoner failed to state a cause of action with his claim that his rights were violated by a 2-hour commute to another prison facility. Officials had transferred the prisoner to another prison for a medical procedure, rather than using a local hospital. (Gander Hill Correctional Institution, and Delaware Correctional Center, Delaware)

U.S. Appeals Court
RETALIATION

Rhodes v. Robinson, 408 F.3d 559 (9th Cir. 2005). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against prison officials, alleging that they retaliated against him for exercising his First Amendment rights to file prison grievances. The district court dismissed the action for failure to state a claim and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The court held that the fact that the prisoner undertook exhaustive efforts to remedy a myriad of alleged violations of his First Amendment rights did not demonstrate that his rights were not violated at all. The court noted that adoption of such a theory would subject prisoners to a "Catch 22" by establishing a rule that, by virtue of an inmate having fulfilled the requirements necessary to pursue a cause of action in federal court, he would be precluded from prosecuting the very claim he was forced to exhaust. According to the court, the prisoner presented the "very archetype of a cognizable First Amendment retaliation claim" in alleging that prison officials: (1) arbitrarily confiscated, withheld and eventually destroyed his property, threatened to transfer him to another facility, and ultimately assaulted him; (2) because he; (3) exercised his First Amendment rights to file prison grievances and otherwise seek access to the legal process, and that; (4) beyond imposing those tangible harms, the officers' actions chilled the prisoner's First Amendment rights; and (5) were not undertaken in narrowly tailored furtherance of legitimate penological purposes. The court noted that the prisoner's conflict with the officers "has its genesis in the most unlikely of places: the servicing of his Canon typewriter." Scott v. Garcia, 370 F.Supp.2d 1056 (S.D.Cal. 2005). An inmate brought a suit against a state corrections department alleging violation of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), and against individual department employees for violation of the Eighth Amendment. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants in part and denied it in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded on a claim that members of the prison's classification committee violated the inmate's Eighth Amendment rights by not recommending his transfer to a facility with acute hospital care, and on a claim that the prison system violated ADA by not allowing him a longer time to eat his meals or by allowing him to eat small frequent meals. Shaheed-Muhammad v. Dipaolo, 393 F.Supp.2d 80 (D.Mass. 2005). A prisoner brought a civil rights action against employees of a state corrections department alleging violation of his right to practice his Muslim religion. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants in part, and denied it in part. The court held that the defendant failed to establish that the prisoner's religious beliefs were not sincerely held, noting that although the prisoner had a long history of pro se litigation, he might have been both litigious and religiously observant. According to the court, the fact that the prisoner first sought a pork-free diet and four months later sought a vegetarian diet could have suggested an evolution of his beliefs, and not "backsliding" or nonobservance of religious tenets. The court found that the prisoner failed to establish that prison officials retaliated against him by transferring him from one facility to another after he attempted to exercise his First Amendment rights. According to the court, although there were inconsistencies in the officials' arguments, they presented evidence of two disciplinary infractions that preceded the transfer which conceivably could have provided a basis for the transfer, and there was an indication that the prisoner had "numerous enemies" at the first facility. Siggers-El v. Barlow, 412 F.3d 693 (6th Cir. 2005). A state prisoner brought an action against a prison block officer, alleging that the officer transferred him to another prison in retaliation for exercising his First Amendment rights when he complained to the officer's supervisors that the officer had failed to authorize disbursements of money from his prison account to pay his lawyer to review his appellate brief and file. The district court denied the officer's motion for summary judgment and the officer appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the prisoner engaged in protected conduct when he informed the officer's supervisor about the refusal to release funds, for the purposes of his First Amendment retaliation claim. The court found that the officer took an adverse action against the prisoner even though the officer's action simply made the prisoner eligible for a routine transfer, and the violation involved a clearly established right of which a reasonable officer would have been aware. Simkins v. Bruce, 406 F.3d 1239 (10th Cir. 2005). A prisoner brought a pro se § 1983 action alleging that corrections officials failed to forward his mail to him while he was temporarily housed in another facility, causing him to lose a lawsuit. The district court granted summary judgment for the officials and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The court held that a prison mail room supervisor's conduct of holding the prisoner's mail rather than forwarding it to him constituted intentional conduct that violated the prisoner's right of access to the courts. The court noted that a prisoner's right to receive his legal mail was clearly established. (Hutchinson Correctional Facility, Kansas)

Thiel v. Wisconsin, 399 F.Supp.2d 929 (W.D.Wisc. 2005). A detainee held under the Wisconsin Sexually Violent Persons Law (WSVPL) brought a § 1983 action alleging due process violations in connection with his commitment. The district court denied the detainee's motion to proceed in forma pauperis and dismissed the action. The court held that no due process liberty interests were implicated by the manner in which the detainee was treated, either in regard to his commitment, or in regard to trips outside the facility to a county jail for court proceedings. The court found that the maximum security classification imposed on the detainee was an ordinary incident of such confinement and did not pose atypical or significant hardships. The court found no violations with the manner in which the detainee was strip searched, dressed in prison clothes and placed in restraints before being transported to a county jail for court proceedings. Torres Garcia v. Puerto Rico, 402 F.Supp.2d 373 (D.Puerto Rico 2005). A prisoner filed a civil rights suit claiming violations of his constitutional rights. The district court granted the defendants' motions to dismiss in part, and denied in part. The court held that the prisoner stated a due process claim against prison officials based on his transfer from a minimum security unit to a maximum security unit in violation of a prison rule that required a timely post-transfer hearing, but noted that the prisoner could only seek prospective injunctive relief. The court found that the prisoner's expectations of prison employment did not amount to a property or liberty interest entitled to due process protection, noting that earning wages while incarcerated was a privilege, not a right. The court held that the inmate failed to state an Eighth Amendment claim that prison officials failed to afford him adequate protection from an attack by other inmates, absent an allegation that he had sustained any injury at their hands. Westefer v. Snyder, 422 F.3d 570 (7th Cir. 2005). State prisoners brought a § 1983 action challenging their transfers to a higher-security prison. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants and the prisoners appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The court held that the prisoners' suit challenging transfers to a high security prison was not subject to dismissal for failure to exhaust administrative remedies as required by the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA), where the transfer review process was not available to prisoners in disciplinary segregation, and the prisoners' grievances were sufficient to alert the prison that the transfer decisions were being challenged. The court held that the alleged change in a prison policy that required transferring gang members to a high security facility did not constitute an ex post facto violation. The court ruled that the prisoners stated a claim for denial of due process, where the conditions at the high security prison were arguably different enough to give the prisoners a liberty interest in not being transferred there, and there was a dispute as to whether the state provided sufficient pre- and post-transfer opportunities for the prisoners to challenge the propriety of the transfers. The court held that the transfers did not violate the gang members' First Amendment associational rights, noting that prisoners had no right to associate with gangs. Anderson-Bey v. District of Columbia, 466 F.Supp.2d 51 (D.D.C. 2006). Prisoners transported between out-of-state correctional facilities brought a civil rights action against the District of Columbia and corrections officers, alleging common law torts and violation of their constitutional rights under First and Eighth Amendments. The prisoners had been transported in two groups, with trips lasting between 10 and 15 hours. The defendants brought motions to dismiss or for summary judgment which the court denied with regard to the District of Columbia. The court held that: (1) a fact issue existed as to whether the restraints used on prisoners during the prolonged transport caused greater pain than was necessary to ensure they were securely restrained; (2) a fact issue existed as to whether the officers acted with deliberate indifference to the prisoners' health or safety in the transport of the prisoners; (3) a causal nexus existed between the protected speech of the prisoners in bringing the civil lawsuit against the corrections officers and subsequent alleged retaliation by the officers during the transport of prisoners; (4) a fact issue existed as to whether the officers attempted to chill the prisoners' participation in the pending civil lawsuit against the officers; and (5) a fact issue existed as to whether conditions imposed on the prisoners during the transport were justified by valid penological needs. The court found that the denial of food during a bus ride that lasted between 10 and 15 hours was insufficiently serious to state a stand-alone cruel and unusual punishment civil rights claim under the Eighth Amendment. The court also found that the denial of bathroom breaks during the 10 to 15 hour bus trip, did not, without more, constitute cruel and unusual punishment under the Eighth Amendment. The court stated that the extremely uncomfortable and painful shackles applied for the numerous hours during transports, exacerbated by taunting, threats, and denial of food, water, medicine, and toilets, was outrageous conduct under District of Columbia law, precluding summary judgment on the prisoners' intentional infliction of emotional distress claim against the corrections officers. Austin v. Wilkinson, 502 F.Supp.2d 675 (N.D.Ohio 2006). A state inmate filed a § 1983 action alleging that the procedure for transferring him to a super maximum security prison violated due process. The inmate moved to compel the state to reduce his security placement level. The district court granted the motion. The court held that the process used by the state to increase the inmate's security placement level after he killed his cellmate violated due process, even though the prison's rules infraction board found insufficient evidence that the inmate acted solely in self-defense, where the prison's classification committee recommended that the inmate's security placement remain unchanged, the inmate was not given notice of the warden's decision to override the committee's recommendation or opportunity to argue his position and submit evidence, the inmate was not given a hearing on administrative appeal, the board's finding was subject to review by the committee, and the inmate was transferred to a super maximum security prison before the review process was complete. According to the court, due process required that the warden and the state's administrative appeals board provide adequate reasoned statements to justify their decisions to override the prison's classification committee's recommendation that the inmate's security placement remain unchanged after he killed his cellmate. The court held that the state prison system was required to provide an individualized review of the security risk presented by an inmate following his transfer to a super maximum security prison, and thus the state's use of a boilerplate checklist violated the inmate's due process rights, where the inmate received no meaningful review of his situation or of the events leading to his transfer. Austin v. Wilkinson, 502 F.Supp.2d 660 (N.D.Ohio 2006). State inmates in a super maximum security prison facility brought a class action against corrections officials under § 1983 alleging that procedures for transferring them to, and retaining them at, the prison violated due process. The district court ruled that the procedures denied due process and ordered modifications. Prison officials appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part and remanded. Certiorari was granted. The United States Supreme Court affirmed in part, reversed in part and remanded. On remand, the inmates moved for an order extending the court's jurisdiction over due process issues for one year, and the officials' moved to terminate prospective relief. The district court granted the inmates' motion and denied the officials' motion. (Ohio State Penitentiary)

Daniels v. Crosby, 444 F.Supp.2d 1220 (N.D.Fla. 2006). An inmate brought a § 1983 suit against corrections officials, alleging that they violated his due process rights by unconstitutionally depriving him of wages, occupational training, and other benefits. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court held that the inmate had no liberty or property interest in wages for his work in prison, possession of particular items of personal property, or involvement in rehabilitative programs. The court noted that the Kentucky inmate, incarcerated in Florida for a Kentucky offense pursuant to an interstate corrections compact, had no liberty or property interest, and that while Kentucky officials may have owed a legal duty to the inmate to provide such benefits, Florida corrections officials did not. The inmate had argued that Kentucky pays prisoners for work they do in prison at the rate of $1 per day and that Florida owed him these back wages. He claimed entitlement to pay, to possess the same kind of personal property (typewriter, television, stereo receiver, ice chest, hot pot, bed linen) he was allowed to possess in Kentucky, and to enroll in a vocational trade as he was allowed to do in Kentucky. (Florida Department of Corrections)

Dukes v. Georgia, 428 F.Supp.2d 1298 (N.D.Ga. 2006). A pretrial detainee brought an action against state and county defendants as well as jail personnel, alleging deliberate indifference to a serious medical need, violations of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) and the Rehabilitation Act, and medical malpractice. The defendants filed motions for summary judgment. The court held that jail personnel did not violate the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) or the Rehabilitation Act when an officer and others allegedly told other inmates of the detainee's status as an HIV infected person, where the detainee did not show that such disclosure denied him the benefits of any program or service or that it discriminated against him. The court also found no ADA or Rehabilitation Act violation when an officer did not place a mask on the detainee when he was being transported to the hospital, where the failure to place a mask on the detainee did not deny him the benefits of any program or service or discriminate against him. The court noted that transportation can be construed as a "program or service provided by the public entity" for the purposes of Title II of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA). According to the court, even if a physician's failure to diagnose the pretrial detainee's cryptococcus was negligent or even severely negligent, her actions and treatment of the detainee did not constitute deliberate indifference to the detainee's serious medical needs in violation of due process where the detainee was receiving treatment for his symptoms and his underlying illness, HIV, and while in hindsight it appeared that a lesion shown by the x-rays was in fact cryptococcus, there was no showing that indicated that the physician was ever aware of that severe risk. The court held that a jail nurse was not deliberately indifferent to the detainee's serious medical needs in violation of the due process clause, where she responded to all requests for medical service and conveyed the requests and relevant information to a physician, and did not have substantial knowledge of a serious medical risk when she observed that the detainee was not moving about, was urinating on his mat, and was cursing at the staff. Garcia v. Lemaster, 439 F.3d 1215 (10th Cir. 2006). A New Mexico inmate housed in California pursuant to an Interstate Corrections Compact (ICC) filed a civil rights action against New Mexico defendants challenging his classification and denial of recreation in California. The district court granted the defendants' motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim and the inmate appealed. The court of appeals affirmed, finding that the inmate was required to bring his civil rights suit challenging the conditions of his confinement against his California custodians, and that the inmate did not have a state-created liberty interest in conditions of confinement in accord with New Mexico regulations when he was housed in another state. According to the court, an inmate incarcerated in another state pursuant to the ICC had no liberty interest entitling him to the application of the sending state's classification and recreation rules while confined in the receiving state. The court also found that the inmate had no statutory right under the ICC to be classified and afforded recreation pursuant to New Mexico regulations, noting that the ICC specifically provided that such inmates were entitled to treatment equal to that afforded similar inmates of the receiving state. Gilmore v. Goord, 415 F.Supp.2d 220 (W.D.N.Y. 2006). A prisoner brought a civil rights action against prison officials and employees, claiming that they violated his constitutional rights in connection with an administrative segregation hearing. The defendants moved for summary judgment and the district court granted the motion. The court held that the inmate's administrative segregation for nineteen days did not implicate a protected liberty interest, nor did his transfer from a medium-security facility to maximum-security facility. The court found that the prisoner had no protected liberty interest in parole, and no justifiable expectation that he would be incarcerated in any particular prison within a state, and therefore, transfers from one facility to another generally do not implicate any due process-protected liberty interest, even if the transfer involves a change in security classification as well. Mark v. Gustafson, 482 F.Supp.2d 1084 (W.D.Wis. 2006). A state prison inmate sued a prison and individuals, alleging that "magic seals" were removed from the interior of his prison cell in violation of his religious rights, and that officials conspired to transfer him to another facility. The district court entered judgment for the defendants. The court found that the absence of any evidence that officials made any kind of concerted effort to send the inmate to a state prison that lacked adequate legal research facilities precluded his claim that his transfer was the result of a conspiracy to deny his right to pursue legal remedies, rather than the stated purposes of sending him closer to home to ease his return to the outside world. Morris v. Powell, 449 F.3d 682 (5th Cir. 2006). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against prison officials, alleging that they retaliated against him for exercising his First Amendment right to use the prison grievance system. Following denial of the defendants' first motion for summary judgment, the appeals court remanded for consideration of whether an inmate's retaliation claim must allege more than a de minimis adverse act. On remand, the district court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment. The inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, vacated in part, and remanded. The court held that: (1) when addressing an issue of apparent first impression for the court, prisoners bringing § 1983 retaliation claims against prison officials must allege more than an inconsequential or de minimis retaliatory act to establish a constitutional violation; (2) the officials' alleged actions in moving the inmate to a less desirable job within the prison did not rise to the level of an actionable retaliation; (3) the inmate's claim that he was transferred to an inferior and more dangerous prison satisfied the de minimis threshold; and (4) the defendants were entitled to qualified immunity on the inmate's job transfer claim. The court noted that although the inmate's official job classification was switched from the commissary to the kitchen for about six weeks, he was actually made to work in the kitchen for only a week at most, and he spent just one day in the "pot room," which was evidently an unpleasant work station, after which he was moved to the butcher shop, about which he raised no complaints. Price v. *Wall, 428 F.Supp.2d 52 (D.R.I. 2006). An inmate brought a § 1983 suit against corrections officials, alleging that he was intentionally transferred to the facility where he was confined in an effort to frustrate his rehabilitation, in retaliation for his filing of a motion to compel compliance with a state court order, in violation of the First Amendment. The defendants moved to dismiss. The district court held that the inmate stated a First Amendment retaliation claim where he alleged that corrections officials intentionally transferred him to the facility in retaliation for his court action. According to the court, the question was not whether the defendants had a right to transfer the inmate, but whether such action was accomplished for an unlawful purpose. The inmate had been required, as a condition of his sentence, to complete certain rehabilitative programs, including psychological and psychiatric treatment while incarcerated. After not receiving any of the court-mandated treatment, the inmate filed a motion in the state courts seeking to compel the Department of Corrections to comply with the state court order. After several skirmishes, the Department of Corrections agreed to provide the inmate with the court-mandated treatment. The parties further agreed that if the inmate successfully completed the first round of treatment, the Department of Corrections would upgrade his classification status, permitting him to participate in further rehabilitative treatment as mandated by the state court. The inmate successfully completed his first round of treatment and appeared before a classification board for review of his classification status. Based on his successful completion of the initial round of treatment and pursuant to the agreement between the inmate and the Department, the board recommended that the inmate's classification be upgraded. But the defendants refused to permit an upgrade and instead launched no less than three separate, unrelated investigations into various matters, delaying the inmate's classification status upgrade and prohibiting him from participating in further rehabilitation. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court held that: (1) the prisoner's transfer to an out-of-state correctional system was not adverse; (2) the prisoner's classification while confined in the out-of-state correctional facility to a restrictive or harsh classification was not adverse, for the purposes of his First Amendment retaliation claim; (3) the prisoner's transfer was not in retaliation for his legal activities; and (4) the officials were not liable for retaliation based on the prisoner's classification while confined in the out-of-state correctional facility. The district court entered summary judgment in favor of the defendants and the offender appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court found that the offender's transfer was not in retaliation for his alleged advocacy for another patient, so as to violate the offender's speech rights, where the sex offender program officials indicated that they transferred the offender to lessen his contact with the patient, whom the offender was suspected of exploiting, and where the offender failed to present any evidence that the transfer took place for any other reason. Siggers-El v. *Barlow, 433 F.Supp.2d 811(E.D.Mich. 2006). A state inmate filed a § 1983 action alleging that a prison official transferred him in retaliation for his exercising his First Amendment rights. After a jury verdict in the inmate's favor, the official filed a motion for a new trial, and the inmate moved for costs and attorney fees. The district court held that the Civil Rights of Institutionalized Persons Act (CRIPA) that prohibited inmates from recovering mental or emotional damages in the absence of a the physical injury, did not bar the inmate's claim for emotional damages and that evidence supported the award of punitive damages. According to the court, the jury's award of punitive damages against the prison official was supported by evidence that the official transferred the inmate in retaliation for the inmate's exercise of his First Amendment free speech rights in complaining to the official's superiors about the official's misconduct, even though the official was aware that the transfer would prevent the inmate from seeing his attorney, from paying his attorney, and from seeing his emotionally-disabled daughter. The court found that the jury did not improperly use punitive damages to compensate the inmate for the prison official's misconduct because the amount of economic damages, $4,000, was too low. The court held that the prison official's conduct in transferring the inmate was sufficiently reprehensible to warrant a punitive damages award of $200,000, even though prisoner transfers were routine, and the inmate suffered only $4,000 in economic damages. According to the court, a lesser award would have encouraged bad behavior by prison officials. (Michigan Department of Corrections)

An inmate brought an action against the federal Bureau of Prisons, alleging that his pending transfer to another facility would deprive him of participation in vocational training programs. The inmate moved for a preliminary injunction. The district court denied the motion. The court held that the inmate failed to demonstrate the likelihood of success on his due process claim, as required to obtain a preliminary injunction preventing his transfer, where removal from programs did not constitute an atypical or significant deprivation of the inmate's rights, nor did it affect the duration of his sentence, as may have impaired his protected liberty interests. But the court found that the inmate demonstrated that he would suffer an irreparable injury if injunctive relief were not granted, as required to obtain a preliminary injunction, because the transfer was certain to result in the loss of access to an aquaculture program in which he was employed, loss of pay grade and loss of eligibility for a cable technician program. The district court granted the defendants' motion to dismiss in part and denied in part. The court held that the detainee sufficiently alleged that the Director of District of Columbia Department of Corrections (DOC) was directly involved in violations of the detainee's constitutional rights, as required to state a claim under § 1983 against a government official in his individual capacity. The detainee alleged that the Director refused to transfer the detainee from the jail to a correctional treatment facility and failed to train DOC employees under his supervision in such a way as to prevent the detainee's over-detention (detention beyond proper release date). The court found that the Director of District of Columbia Department of Corrections (DOC) could not be liable in his individual capacity, under the theory of respondeat superior, to the jail detainee for allegedly unconstitutional actions or omissions of his subordinates. The court held that the alleged refusal of officials of Department of Corrections (DOC) to transfer the detainee to a correctional treatment facility at which conditions were far less restrictive did not implicate a due process liberty interest. The court noted that an inmate has no due process liberty interest in a particular place of confinement or a particular level of security. (Central Detention Facility. Farmer v. Kavanagh, 494 F.Supp.2d 345 (D.Md. 2007). A state prison inmate sued officials, claiming her Fourteenth Amendment due process rights and her Eighth Amendment right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment were violated when she was transferred from a medium to a maximum security facility. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court entered judgment for the officials on the federal claims and dismissed the state law claim. The court held that the inmate had a liberty interest in not being sent to a maximum security prison, as required in order to bring a claim that transfer to maximum security facility without prior notice and an opportunity to be heard, was a violation of her Fourteenth Amendment rights. The court noted that the maximum security prison's strict control over every aspect of an inmate's life, and almost virtual isolation from any human contact, imposed conditions of confinement far worse than her previous situation in the general population of a medium security prison. But the court found that the officials had qualified immunity from the inmate's due process claim because, at the time of the transfer, it was not clearly established that an inmate could have a liberty interest in not being transferred to a maximum security prison.

The court held that the officials' alleged difference in access to health care providers, between the medium security prison and the maximum security prison to which the inmate was transferred, was insufficient to support a determination that prison officials showed deliberate indifference to her medical needs by transferring her. The court noted that the inmate's delivery of drugs required for AIDS treatment was delayed and intermittently interrupted, but the patient's file did not reflect the seriousness of her condition, and when one maximum security prison employee was found derelict in making deliveries of medications, the employee was fired. A former state inmate sued prison officials for declaratory, injunctive, and monetary relief, alleging that he was subjected to retaliatory transfer and that his rights under the First and Eighth Amendments and Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA) were violated. The court granted the officials' motion for summary judgment.The court held that the warden was not involved in the inmate's transfer to a maximum security institution, precluding the warden's liability on the claim alleging that he transferred the inmate in retaliation for the inmate's filing of an earlier lawsuit against him. The court found that there was no evidence that any of the prison officials sued by the inmate were personally involved in denying delivery to the inmate of the letter underlying his free speech claim, and therefore the officials could not be held liable under § 1983. According to the court, there were no facts in evidence that the former state inmate was prevented from ordering publications about his religion of atheism while incarcerated at a maximum security facility, was in the facility's step program, or was in any other way injured by the step program's no-publications policy, and therefore the former inmate lacked standing to litigate his claim that the policy violated his free exercise rights and rights under Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA). The court held that the former state inmate did not show that while he was incarcerated at a maximum security facility, he ever chose to use out-of-cell time to visit the law library, as opposed to out-of-door exercise, and thus to show an injury-in-fact required for the former inmate to have standing to challenge the prison official's policy of requiring inmates to choose between out-of-cell exercise time and law library time under the Eighth Amendment. RETALIATION

Montoya v. Board of County Com'rs, 506 F.Supp.2d 434 (D.Colo. 2007). A jail inmate brought civil rights and civil rights conspiracy claims against sheriffs, a deputy sheriff, and officials of two counties alleging violation of his constitutional rights when he was tasered by a correctional officer and later transferred and placed in segregation in alleged retaliation for complaining to the press about the tasering incident. The defendants moved for summary judgment and the district court granted the motion. The court held that a civil rights claim was not stated against counties and sheriffs in their official capacities for the inmate's transfer and placement in segregated confinement in alleged retaliation for his complaints to press, given the inmate's complete failure to allege any specific facts suggesting that segregation was the result of a custom or policy, rather than being simply a single act of deprivation disconnected from any wider scheme. According to the court, the county sheriffs were entitled to qualified immunity on individual capacity claims involving conspiracy to transfer and place jail inmate in protective, segregated confinement in retaliation for the exercise of his First Amendment rights, absent any indication that the sheriffs, who never communicated with each other about the transfer, were personally involved in the decision, exercised discretionary control over the decision, or failed to supervise jail administrators who actually made the transfer. Price v. Correctional Medical Services, 493 F.Supp.2d 740 (D.Del. 2007). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against a prison's medical services provider and prison officials, alleging deliberate indifference to his serious medical needs. The provider moved to dismiss, and the inmate moved for appointment of counsel. The district court denied the motions. The court held that the prisoner stated a claim under § 1983 against the prison's medical services provider for deliberate indifference to a serious medical need, in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The prisoner alleged that the refusal of prompt medical care to his recently surgically repaired wrists, upon his transfer from another facility, by employees of the prison's medical services provider, was, or could have been, partially responsible for the permanent damage to his wrists that was independently verified by an outside doctor. The court noted that the seriousness of the prisoner's medical need was so obvious, from the condition he arrived in, his description of the events to nurses, and from the obvious pain he was under for a period of weeks, that any lay person would have recognized the need for a doctor. Brown v. Fortner, 518 F.3d 552 (8th Cir. 2008). A former inmate brought a § 1983 action against correction officers alleging deliberate indifference by failing to provide safe transportation. The district court denied the officers' claims of qualified immunity and denied their motions for summary judgment. The officers appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part and remanded. The court held that evidence that a correction officer transporting inmates as part of a convoy refused to fasten the inmate's seatbelt knowing that he could not do so himself because of his shackles, and drove recklessly while ignoring requests to slow down, was sufficient for a reasonable jury to conclude that the officer manifested deliberate indifference for the inmate's safety in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The court found that another correction officer who was driving a vehicle as part of the convoy who drove too fast and followed the lead vehicle too closely did not act with deliberate indifference for the safety of the inmate passenger in the lead vehicle, even though the officer's driving proximately caused a multiple vehicle rear-end accident which resulted in the inmate's injuries, absent evidence that the officer was asked to slow down and refused, or that the officer knew that the inmate had been denied a seatbelt. Dantone v. Bhaddi, 570 F.Supp.2d 167 (D.Mass. 2008). A prisoner brought an action against the United States under the Federal Tort Claims Act (FTCA) and against a prison doctor under Bivens, seeking to recover for injuries allegedly sustained when the seat of a van in which he was being transported collapsed. The district court denied the defendant's motion to dismiss. The court held that the prisoner's allegations that prison staff breached its duty of care in their transportation of him by failing to properly install, maintain, and inspect the seating in a transport van, and that this breach resulted in the collapse of the seat, which resulted in the injuries to his head and neck, and ongoing pain, were sufficient facts to state a negligence claim against the United States under the Federal Tort Claims Act. The court found that the prisoner's allegations that he received no meaningful medical care following the accident, that the magnetic resonance imaging (MRI) which he eventually received six months after the accident was untimely, and that, to date, he had been unable to obtain any medical information about the results of his tests, all despite repeated complaints to the prison doctor, were sufficient to state a claim against the doctor of deliberate indifference to his medical needs in violation of the Eighth Amendment. Estate of Harvey ex rel. Dent v. Roanoke City Sheriff's Office, 585 F.Supp.2d 844 (W.D.Va. 2008). The administrator of a pretrial detainee's estate brought a civil rights action under §§ 1983, 1985, and 1986 and Virginia law, against a city sheriff's department, sheriff, deputies, and prison health providers, alleging excessive use of force, failure to train, assault, battery, conspiracy, breach of a non-delegable fiduciary duty, intentional infliction of emotional distress and wrongful death. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motions. The court held that the estate of the pretrial detainee who died following cardiac arrest after transfer from a jail to a hospital could not sustain a deliberate indifference claim under the Fourteenth Amendment against the employees of a prison health provider, absent evidence that they actually knew of and disregarded a serious risk of harm to the detainee, or that they actually knew of and ignored a serious need for medical care. The court noted that the city sheriff and sheriff's deputies did not knowingly disregard a substantial risk of harm to the pretrial detainee in violation of Fourteenth Amendment when they relied on medical personnel's decisions as to the appropriate course of treatment for the detainee's medical needs. Hannon v. Beard, 524 F.3d 275 (1st Cir. 2008). A prisoner who was formerly incarcerated in Pennsylvania and transferred to Massachusetts brought an action against the Secretary of the Pennsylvania Department of Corrections, alleging that he was transferred out-of-state in retaliation for prior lawsuits. The previous lawsuits were against a Pennsylvania prison librarian, who allegedly denied his requests for legal materials, and against numerous Massachusetts prison officials. The district court dismissed the action and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded the case for further proceedings regarding the Secretary of the Department of Corrections. The court held that the conduct by the Secretary of the Pennsylvania Department of Corrections, in authorizing, directing, and arranging the Pennsylvania prisoner's transfer from a Pennsylvania prison to a Massachusetts prison, pursuant to an Interstate Corrections Compact, was sufficient to constitute the "transaction of business" in Massachusetts, as would support the exercise of personal jurisdiction by the district court. The court found that the prison librarian's conduct in responding to requests for legal materials by the prisoner incarcerated in Massachusetts was insufficient to constitute the "transaction of business" in Massachusetts, within the meaning of the Massachusetts long-arm statute. The court noted that the prisoner "…has been the quintessential 'jailhouse lawyer,' pursuing post-conviction relief and filing numerous grievances and lawsuits on behalf of himself and other prisoners challenging their conditions of confinement." The prisoner estimated that he had represented "thousands" of his fellow inmates in proceedings. He alleged that the Pennsylvania DOC grew tired of his lawsuits and agitation and, in order to prevent him from filing more lawsuits and in retaliation for the actions he had already taken, began a strategy of transferring him to out-of-state prisons. A prisoner who suffered from antisocial personality and borderline personality disorders challenged his mental health treatment and an attempt to transfer him to a correctional facility with dormitory housing, alleging violation of the Eighth Amendment. The prisoner moved for a preliminary injunction to prevent his transfer and to be prescribed lithium and assigned to a single cell. The district court denied the motion. The court found that the prisoner did not have a likelihood of success on the merits of his claim, and that the prisoner would not suffer irreparable harm without an injunction. The court noted that the prisoner's medical treatment was adequate, as lithium was generally not used to treat such disorders, and that no medical diagnosis precluded his transfer to a dormitory setting or required confinement in single cell. Kinslow v. Pullara, 538 F.3d 687 (7th Cir. 2008). A state inmate filed a § 1983 action against prison officials at the Illinois Department of Corrections (IDOC) and the New Mexico Department of Corrections (NMDOC), and against a private transportation company and its employees. The inmate alleged violation of his constitutional right to adequate medical treatment during his transfer between institutions, resulting in the failure of chemotherapy for his advanced liver disease from hepatitis C. The district court dismissed the claims against the NMDOC, and dismissed the claimsagainst the remaining parties after settlement. The inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that NMDOC officials lacked sufficient contacts with Illinois for the exercise of personal jurisdiction. The court noted that New Mexico officials had only arranged and planned the inmate's transfer by a handful of phone calls, but did not purposefully avail themselves of the privileges of conducting activities in Illinois, and had not deliberately engaged in significant activities or created continuing obligations in Illinois. The inmate's transfer took place in October 2004. The court noted that although the inmate's bus trip to New Mexico could have been completed in less than 24 hours, the route that the private transport company (TransCor) chose lasted six days. Moreover, while the Illinois and New Mexico prison officials were all well aware of the inmate's prescribed treatment and of how strictly it had to be followed, they failed to establish procedures that would ensure proper medical care for the inmate during the trip. According to the court, "During his transfer, everything that could go wrong with [the inmate's] treatment, did." A state prisoner filed a pro se § 1983 action against prison officials alleging that he was denied procedural due process when transferred to a state facility and when he was forced to take psychotropic medications. The district court granted summary judgment to the officials and denied motions for reconsideration. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the prisoner failed to exhaust challenges to the transfers and forced medication. The court also found that the prisoner forfeited the argument that exhaustion should be excused because of an inadequate law library because that issue had not been raised in the district court. The court noted that a prisoner's exhaustion of administrative remedies before filing a § 1983 claim is required even if the prisoner believes his efforts in securing relief will be futile or if the administrative authority has no power to grant the requested relief. Pugh v. Goord, 571 F.Supp.2d 477 (S.D.N.Y. 2008). State prisoners sued prison officials, alleging violations of their constitutional and statutory rights to free exercise of Shi'a Islam and to be free from the establishment of Sunni Islam. Following remand from the appeals court, the plaintiffs moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motions in part and denied in part. The court held that one prisoner's claim for injunctive relief qualified for a "capable of repetition, yet evading review" exception, and therefore was not rendered moot by his transfer to another facility. The court noted that the corrections department had the ability to freely transfer the prisoner between facilities prior to the full litigation of his claims, and there was a reasonable expectation that the prisoner would be subject to the same action again, given that the department's policies were applicable to all of its prison facilities. Shilling v. Crawford, 536 F.Supp.2d 1227 (D.Nev. 2008). A Washington prisoner who was being housed in Nevada brought an action against prison officials, claiming violation of his rights under the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA). The district court granted the officials' motion for summary judgment. The court held that prison authorities imposed a substantial burden on the prisoner's religious beliefs when they conditioned the prisoner's receipt of a kosher meal on his relinquishment of the benefits of living in a lower-security facility. But the court held that even if the prisoner could bring an individual capacity claim against prison officials under RLUIPA, the officials would be entitled to qualified immunity since it would not have been clear to a reasonable official in April 2004 that offering the prisoner a transfer to a higher security prison to accommodate his religious diet would violate his rights under RLUIPA. Stutes v. Tipto, 540 F.Supp.2d 516 (D.Vt. 2008). A Vermont inmate incarcerated in Oklahoma in a privately-owned facility brought an action against Vermont prison officials and facility employees claiming cruel and unusual punishment. The inmate alleged that his time spent outdoors in cold weather exposed him to "the potential of hypothermia, frostbite, and cold-related infections such as influenza, ear infections, upper respiratory infections, bronchitis and more." Shortly after his exposure to the cold, he began suffering from flu-like symptoms. The district court dismissed the action. The court held that a state corrections commissioner was not subject to liability under § 1983 for alleged mistreatment of the inmate, even though the inmate sent a letter to the commissioner asking for protection from retaliation, and submitted a formal grievance form to the commissioner after the alleged mistreatment, where there was no indication that the commissioner was responsible for a policy or custom that led to the wrongdoing, or that he failed to properly supervise employees who committed the allegedly wrongful acts. Whitt v. Stephens County, 529 F.3d 278 (5th Cir. 2008). The father of a pretrial detainee who purportedly hanged himself while incarcerated at a county jail brought a § 1983 action against a county, the county sheriff, and unknown jail officials. The district court granted summary judgment in part in favor of jail officials and the sheriff in their individual capacities. The father appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The district court denied the father's motion for leave to amend the complaint to identify the unknown jail officials, and granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants on remaining claims. The father again appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the amended complaint to substitute named county jail officials for unknown jail officials did not relate back to the original complaint, for the purpose of avoiding a statute of limitations bar. The court found that the county sheriff was not liable under § 1983 for the death of the pretrial detainee, where the sheriff was not present at the jail until after the detainee was found dead, and there was no showing that the sheriff played any part in the detainee's death, or that the sheriff was deliberately indifferent in failing to attempt to resuscitate the detainee or obtain additional medical care for the detainee. The court held that the county was not liable under § 1983 for the detainee's purported suicide, where the county had adequate policies and procedures for detainees who posed an obvious risk of suicide, the detainee did not indicate that he was suicidal on an intake form or otherwise exhibit obvious suicidal tendencies, and the county was not deliberately indifferent in failing to train or supervise county jail officials. The court noted that in the specific context of jail suicide prevention, municipalities must provide custodial officials with minimal training to detect the obvious medical needs of pretrial detainees with known, demonstrable, and serious medical disorders, but a failure to train custodial officials in screening procedures to detect latent suicidal tendencies does not rise to the level of a constitutional violation. The court found that in the absence of manifest signs of suicidal tendencies, a city may not be held liable for a pretrial detainee's jailhouse suicide in a § 1983 suit based on a failure to train. Bailey v. Pataki, 636 F.Supp.2d 288 (S.D.N.Y. 2009). Convicted sex offenders brought an action against state officials, alleging that their involuntary psychiatric commitment deprived them of constitutional due process protections. The defendants moved to dismiss for failure to state a claim, or, in the alternative, for a stay pending resolution of certain pending state court proceedings. The district court denied the motion. The court held that the allegations of the convicted sex offenders were sufficient to state a procedural due process claim against state officials for deprivation of the offenders' liberty interests in not being confined unnecessarily for medical treatment. The offenders alleged that: (1) they were involuntarily transferred to state-run mental institutions based on the certification of doctors designated by the New York State Office of Mental Health and the New York Department of Correctional Services, instead of independent, court-appointed doctors; (2) that some were never served with a notice of petition for their involuntary commitment; (3) that notice was not provided to any of the offenders' friends and family; (4) and that they were not provided an opportunity to request a pre-commitment hearing and an opportunity to be heard. The court found that the procedural due process rights of the convicted sex offenders, to certain pre-transfer procedural safeguards, including notice, an opportunity to be heard, and a psychiatric evaluation by court-appointed doctors, was clearly established at the time of their involuntary commitment and transfer from prison to a mental hospital, so as to preclude any claim of qualified immunity on the part of New York officials. The court noted that the offenders were certified for involuntary commitment after being examined for short periods of time lasting no more than 20 minutes, and once certified, all six offenders were transported in handcuffs and shackles where they were broadly evaluated for treatment. Inmates brought a pro se § 1983 action against prison officials, alleging retaliatory transfer, deliberate indifference and due process violations. The district court granted the officials' motion for summary judgment. The court held that the inmates failed to demonstrate that they would not have been transferred to a new prison but for the prison officials' retaliatory motive, for filing grievances about being required to install security screens on other prisoners' windows. The court noted that the inmates had refused to perform work assignments in the prison's maintenance shop in violation of prison regulations. According to the court, prison officials were not deliberately indifferent to the inmates' safety in violation of the Eighth Amendment by refusing to reassign them to new jobs despite their fear of retribution by other prisoners. The prisoners had installed security screens on other prisoners' windows as part of their job duties. The court noted that there was no evidence that the inmates were subjected to ominous threats or violence by other prisoners. (Bay State Correctional Center, Massachusetts)

A former federal prisoner brought an action against a state prosecutor, the general counsel of the Georgia Department of Corrections (DOC) and the warden of a Georgia prison, alleging violations of his constitutional rights by having him transferred from federal to state custody at the end of his federal sentence. The district court granted the defendants' motion for judgment on the pleadings on the ground they were entitled to absolute immunity. The plaintiff appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, vacated in part, and remanded. The court held that the prosecutor was entitled to absolute immunity for his role in the plaintiff's transfer. But the court held that the general counsel of the Georgia Department of Corrections (DOC) and the warden of a Georgia prison were not entitled to absolute immunity from liability under § 1983 and state law for causing the issuance of a second state warrant against the prisoner prior to his release from federal prison, and issuing a notice of surrender to the prisoner and threatening further prosecution following his release. The court noted that the general counsel's role as legal advisor to the DOC and the warden's role as chief jailer of the prison where the prisoner was incarcerated were not roles intimately associated with the judicial phase of the criminal process. Holland v. Taylor, 604 F.Supp.2d 692 (D.Del. 2009). The prisoner moved to appoint counsel, and the defendants brought a renewed motion for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion for summary judgment and denied the motion to appoint counsel. The court found that neither Delaware law nor Delaware Department of Correction regulations create a liberty interest, the denial of which would constitute a due process violation, in a prisoner's classification within an institution. The court found that the state prisoner had no constitutionally protected right to work release, and thus, neither the alleged failure of a multi-disciplinary team (MDT) member to inform the inmate of a disciplinary review meeting regarding his alleged work release program violation, nor the prisoner's transfer following completion of the sentence imposed in connection with the disciplinary meeting, to another facility to await return to the work-release facility, violated the prisoner's due process rights, absent any atypical or significant hardship by being housed at the other facility as compared to a work-release facility. Kim v. Veglas, 607 F.Supp.2d 286 (D.Mass. 2009). A prisoner, who was initially convicted and incarcerated in Maine, brought an action against various prison officials in Massachusetts and Maine alleging that his transfer to a Massachusetts corrections facility violated a variety of his constitutional and statutory rights. The district court dismissed the case in part. The court held that a Maine prison law librarian was subject to Massachusetts' long-arm statute, for the purposes of a claim of denial of access to the courts brought by the prisoner. The court noted that, in a letter to the prisoner in response to his request for legal materials, the librarian stated that he was the individual to contact for Maine legal materials, and that he required the prisoner to provide "exact citations" for requested legal materials. The prisoner contended that this requirement essentially prohibited him from acquiring Maine legal materials, and thus caused his constitutional injury. The court held that the prisoner's allegations were sufficient to satisfy the relatedness requirement for exercise of specific personal jurisdiction over the librarian, consistent with due process. According to the court, the librarian's alleged conduct was both the "but-for" and proximate cause of the prisoner's inability to access the courts, and the foreseeable result of the letter the librarian sent into Massachusetts was that it would prevent the prisoner from having meaningful access to legal materials. The court held that the exercise by the Massachusetts court of personal jurisdiction over the Maine prison law librarian would be reasonable, as required to comply with due process. The court found that Massachusetts had an interest in adjudicating the dispute because: (1) the Commonwealth would be less willing to accept inmates pursuant to the New England Interstate Corrections Compact if the prisoners it accepted must bring suit in Maine; (2) the prisoner had a great interest in accessing the federal courts in Massachusetts, given that he had adequate access to Massachusetts legal materials; (3) litigating in Massachusetts would promote judicial economy because the prisoner had already been appointed pro bono counsel and the case was pending in Massachusetts for several years; and (4) the suit would promote a substantive social policy of ensuring that interstate transfers of prisoners were not used as a means of cutting off inmates' ability to access the courts to seek redress for injuries suffered at the hands of donor states. Kiyemba v. Obama, 561 F.3d 509 (D.C. Cir. 2009). Nine detainees at the United States naval base at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, petitioned for a writ of habeas corpus. The detainees requested interim relief requiring the government to provide 30 days' notice to the court and counsel before transferring them from the naval base, asserting fears that they would be transferred to a country where they might be tortured or further detained. The district court entered requested orders and the government appealed. The appeals court vacated. The court held that the district court could exercise jurisdiction over claims related to the detainees' potential transfer. According to the court, a provision of the Military Commissions Act (MCA) eliminating jurisdiction over non-habeas actions against the United States or its agents relating to any aspect of a detainees' transfer did not apply to preclude jurisdiction over the detainees' claims for notice of transfer. But the court found that a writ of habeas corpus was not available to bar the detainee's transfer based upon the likelihood of a detainee being tortured in recipient country. The district court could not issue a writ of habeas corpus to bar the transfer of a detainee based upon the expectation that the recipient country would detain or prosecute the detainee. Inmates brought a class action against county and sheriff, alleging that the county's policy of strip searching inmates was unconstitutional. The parties cross-moved for summary judgment, and the inmates additionally moved for class certification. The district court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact existed as to whether the county's blanket policy of strip searching all individuals transported from another correctional or detention facility was justified by the need for institutional security. The court denied class certification, finding the county's strip search policy regarding arrestees did not present common questions of law or fact. The court stayed the action, noting that the appellate court was reviewing a city's strip search policy at the time. (Washington Co. Jail, Oregon)

Roubideaux v. North Dakota Dept. of Corrections and Rehabilitation, 570 F.3d 966 (8th Cir. 2009). North Dakota prison inmates, representing a certified class of female inmates, brought a sex discrimination suit under § 1983 and Title IX, alleging that a state prison system provided them with unequal programs and facilities as compared to male inmates. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants and the inmates appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that North Dakota's gender-explicit statutes, allowing the Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation to place female inmates in county jails and allowing the Department to place female inmates in "grade one correctional facilities" for more than one year, was substantially related to the important governmental objective of providing adequate segregated housing for female inmates, and thus the statutes were facially valid under heightened equal protection review. According to the court, even if the decision to house them at the women's center was based on economic concerns, where the female prison population as a whole was much smaller than the male population, sufficient space to house the female prisoners was becoming an issue as the entire prison population increased. Female inmates were in need of a separate facility to better meet their needs, and statutes expressly required the Department to contract with county facilities that had adequate space and the ability to provide appropriate level of services and programs for female inmates. The court held that the female inmates, by expressing an assertion before the district court that they were not challenging the programming decisions made by Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation upon transfer to county jails for housing, abandoned an "as-applied" challenge to the gender-explicit statutes facilitating such transfers. Prison inmates brought a civil rights action against prison officials for allegedly violating their civil rights in connection with reassignment of the inmates to different cells and assaults allegedly committed upon them. Inmates not only asserted unlawful retaliation claims, but claimed that officials exercised excessive force in violation of their Eighth Amendment rights and unlawfully conspired to violate their rights. The officials moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether prison officials, in separating the cellmates from each other and in transferring one to another facility, were retaliating against the cellmates for their pursuit of grievances, or were taking necessary action to prevent the cellmates from engaging in homosexual activity in a cell. The court also found a genuine issue of material fact as to how an inmate sustained an injury to his face while he was being transferred to another cell. The district court dismissed the complaint. The court held that it lacked jurisdiction to entertain claims against federal government officials, in their official capacities, where the government was sued for damages for constitutional torts. The court found that the prison inmate was not subjected to such "extreme deprivations" as to support a claim for cruel and unusual punishment, based on not being allowed to serve his sentence in Canada, which made it difficult for his family to visit him, and not being allowed, as a foreigner, to participate in certain rehabilitation programs. The court held that the inmate's allegations that he was denied transfer to a minimum security prison, was prevented from working, and was kept in disciplinary confinement for several months as a result of a grievance he had filed were sufficient to state a claim of retaliation for the exercise of his First Amendment rights by prison employees. Walker v. Gomez, 609 F.Supp.2d 1149 (S.D.Cal. 2009). A prisoner brought an action against the California Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation, alleging violations of their settlement agreement with the prisoner that resulted from a prior complaint, discrimination based on race as a policy, and retaliation. The prisoner moved to enforce the settlement agreement and for monetary sanctions. The court held that the prison officials' conduct of placing the prisoner under lockdown for a period of 10 days following incidents of riots and attempted murder was not a severe restriction on the prisoner's activities amounting to a breach of the terms of the prior settlement agreement. The court held that a prison counselor's conduct of asking the prisoner if he wished to transfer to another prison that would cater to his "sensitive needs" was not in retaliation in violation of the settlement agreement. The court noted that the act of asking the prisoner if he would like to volunteer for a transfer was simply because a new facility was in place and inmates were needed to successfully operate it, and, moreover, the counselor testified that she asked the same question of other inmates and she posted a sign on her office window conveying the same inquiry she posed to prisoner, and, further, the prisoner was never transferred. Wilbert v. Quarterman, 647 F.Supp.2d 760 (S.D.Tex. 2009). A state prisoner, proceeding pro se, brought a § 1983 action alleging that two correctional officers violated his Eighth Amendment right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment when they allowed him to be transported without seatbelts, resulting in injuries following the vehicle's sudden stop. The district court granted the defendants' motion to dismiss. Although the court held that the prisoner stated a claim of deliberate indifference in violation of the Eighth Amendment, the prisoner did not timely file a grievance and therefore the prisoner did not satisfy the exhaustion of the administrative remedies requirement of the Prison Litigation Reform Act. The prisoner alleged that he had requested a seatbelt and was denied, that he was not properly seated in the Texas Department of Criminal Justice (TDCJ) transport van, that the van was traveling at an unsafe speed, and that he was injured when the van suddenly stopped. Colvin v. Caruso, 605 F.3d 282 (6th Cir. 2010). A state prisoner brought pro se action against prison officials, asserting that the prison's 16–day denial of kosher meals, multiple mistakes in administering the kosher-meal program, and the lack of Jewish services and literature at the prison, violated his constitutional rights and the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA). The district court denied the prisoner's motion for a preliminary injunction, and subsequently granted summary judgment in favor of the officials. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, vacated in part, and remanded. The court held that the prisoner's pro se claims for injunctive and declaratory relief under RLUIPA, challenging a particular prison's kosher meal program and the alleged denial of Jewish services and literature at the prison, were rendered moot by the prisoner's transfer to another prison. The court noted that the claims were directed specifically at the particular prison's policies and procedures, not at the state prison system's programs as a whole. The court found that the prisoner's First Amendment right of freedom of religion was not violated by the prison's lack of Jewish services and literature, and thus, the prisoner could not prevail in his § 1983 First Amendment claim on that basis. The court noted that the prisoner was the only inmate requesting Jewish services and literature, that prison policies reasonably required a minimum number of inmates to request religious services before they would be held, and there was no showing that the prisoner was restricted from practicing Judaism privately or that the prison prevented him from requesting religious literature. The appeals court held that the prisoner's pro se claims for injunctive and declaratory relief under RLUIPA, challenging his removal from a kosher meal program and his failure to be reinstated into the kosher meal program, were not rendered moot by his transfer to another prison, noting that the prisoner's non-kosher status traveled with him to the transferee prison. The court held that the prisoner's amended claims against prison officials, challenging his removal from a kosher meal program and his failure to be reinstated into the kosher meal program following his transfer to a different prison, were not futile, for the purpose of the prisoner's motion to amend. The court noted that the prisoner consistently stated his religious preference as Jewish throughout his incarceration, and he submitted numerous grievances concerning alleged violations of kosher practice by prison kitchen staff. (Michigan Department of Corrections, Alger Maximum Correctional Facility)

Hartmann v. Carroll, 719 F.Supp.2d 366 (D.Del. 2010). A state inmate filed a § 1983 action alleging that prison officials failed to provide professional prevention, diagnosis, and treatment for his thyroid disease and failed to provide medical transportation. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court held that the officials were not liable for failing to provide a medical transfer, where the officials had no personal involvement in the transfer decision, and were not aware of the risk of serious injury that could have occurred to the inmate and purposefully failed to take appropriate steps. The court found that a state prison medical official was not deliberately indifferent to the inmate's thyroid disease, in violation of the Eighth Amendment, where the inmate received medical care for his throat complaints and his thyroid condition. Hawkins v. Brooks, 694 F.Supp.2d 434 (W.D.Pa. 2010.) A state prisoner brought a pro se § 1983 action against various prison officials and corrections officers, alleging retaliation, harassment, due process violations, defamation of character, and mental anguish. The defendants moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the prisoner's conduct of pressing charges against a corrections officer who the prisoner claimed raped and impregnated her and complaining about other officers' alleged harassment amounted to a "constitutionally protected activity," as required for the prisoner to state a § 1983 retaliation claim. The court found that corrections officers' alleged conduct of withholding the prisoner's incoming and outgoing mail in retaliation for the prisoner's pressing rape charges against an officer at another prison amounted to an "adverse action," as required to establish a prima facie pro se § 1983 retaliation claim against the officers. But the court found that a prison official's alleged conduct of reassigning the prisoner to a different unit in the same prison did not rise to the level of an "adverse action," as required to establish a prima facie pro se § 1983 retaliation claim. The court found that the prisoner had no liberty interest in her place of confinement, transfer, or classification, and thus, prison officials' alleged refusal to have the prisoner transferred to an out-of-state institution did not violate her due process rights. The court found that the prisoner's assertions that she made supervisory prison officials aware of the harassment and retaliation she allegedly suffered at the hands of correctional officers as a result of her pressing rape charges against a correctional officer at another facility, and that none of the supervisory officials offered assistance or took any corrective action, were sufficient to state a claim for supervisory liability, in her § 1983 retaliation action. Lin Li Qu v. Central Falls Detention Facility Corp., 717 F.Supp.2d 233 (D.R.I. 2010). A federal immigration detainee's widow sued the Government under the Federal Tort Claims Act (FTCA), asserting claims arising out of the detainee's care while he was detained by Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE). The government moved to dismiss. The district court denied the motion. The court held that the widow met the FTCA's notice requirement and that her FTCA claims were not barred by the independent contractor defense. The court held that the widow stated negligence claims actionable under the Federal Tort Claims Act (FTCA), when she alleged that after the Government was aware, or should have been aware, of the detainee's deteriorating medical condition, it acted negligently when it ordered the transfers of the detainee to different facilities and when it improperly reviewed the basis for his custody and detention. Rupe v. Cate, 688 F.Supp.2d 1035 (E.D.Cal. 2010). A state prisoner brought an action against prison officials for violation of his rights under the First and Fourteenth Amendments and the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA), alleging that the officials failed to accommodate his Druid religious practices and retaliated against him for protected activities. The officials moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court found that the prisoner's claims for injunctive relief based on the California Department of Corrections' (DOC) alleged systemic discrimination against those practicing the Pagan religion were not moot, even though he had been transferred from the prison where many of the alleged violations of his rights occurred, where he was still incarcerated in a prison run by the DOC. The court held that the prisoner's claims for damages under RLUIPA against state prison officials in their official capacity were barred by Eleventh Amendment sovereign immunity, since RLUIPA did not provide a clear statement requiring states to waive immunity from liability for money damages. The court found that the prisoner stated claim for retaliation by prison officials for conduct protected by the Free Exercise Clause by alleging that he was strip-searched as harassment for writing letters to prison and government officials in which he complained about the lack of accommodations for his religion. The prisoner also alleged that officials conspired to place him in administrative segregation and ultimately to transfer him to requite his complaints about their previous adverse actions against him, and that the actions taken against him were motivated solely by the officials' desire to inhibit his religious worship. The court found that the prisoner stated a claim against prison officials for violation of his right to equal protection by alleging that he and other Pagans were denied opportunities to practice their religion that were available to mainstream religions and that the officials engaged in a pattern of discrimination against Pagan practitioners. Silverstein v. Federal Bureau Of Prisons, 704 F.Supp.2d 1077 (D.Colo. 2010). A federal inmate brought a civil rights action against the Bureau of Prisons and correctional officers, challenging conditions of his confinement. The district court denied the defendants' motion to dismiss in part. The court held that the allegation that the inmate was indefinitely placed in solitary confinement, isolated from other inmates and correctional facility staff, and subjected to continuous lighting and camera surveillance, was sufficient to allege a liberty interest in conditions of his confinement. The court found that the allegation that the inmate was subjected to solitary confinement for more than two decades was sufficient to state claim under the Eighth Amendment against the Bureau. But, according to the court, the inmate did not have a liberty interest in avoiding transfer to administrative segregation facility. (United States Penitentiary, Administrative Maximum facility, Florence, Colorado)

Tafari v. McCarthy, 714 F.Supp.2d 317 (N.D.N.Y. 2010). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against employees of the New York State Department of Correctional Services (DOCS), alleging, among other things, that the employees violated his constitutional rights by subjecting him to excessive force, destroying his personal property, denying him medical care, and subjecting him to inhumane conditions of confinement. The employees moved for summary judgment, and the prisoner moved to file a second amended complaint and to appoint counsel. The court held that a state prison correctional officer's alleged throwing of urine and feces on the prisoner to wake him up, while certainly repulsive, was de minimis use of force, and was not sufficiently severe to be considered repugnant to the conscience of mankind, and thus the officer's conduct did not violate the Eighth Amendment. The court found that officers who were present in the prisoner's cell when another officer allegedly threw urine and feces on the prisoner lacked a reasonable opportunity to stop the alleged violation, given the brief and unexpected nature of the incident, and thus the officers present in the cell could not be held liable for failing to intervene. The court found that even if a correctional officers' captain failed to thoroughly investigate the alleged incident in which one officer threw urine and feces on the prisoner to wake him up, such failure to investigate did not violate the prisoner's due process rights, since the prisoner did not have due process right to a thorough investigation of his grievances.

According to the court, one incident in which state correctional officers allegedly interfered with the prisoner's outgoing legal mail did not create a cognizable claim under § 1983 for violation of the prisoner's First and Fourteenth Amendment rights, absent a showing that the prisoner suffered any actual injury, that his access to courts was chilled, or that his ability to legally represent himself was impaired. The court held that there was no evidence that the state prisoner suffered any physical injury as result of an alleged incident in which a correctional officer spit chewing tobacco in his face, as required to maintain an Eighth Amendment claim based on denial of medical care. The court found that, even if a state prisoner's right to file prison grievances was protected by the First Amendment, a restriction limiting the prisoner's filing of grievances to two per week did not violate the prisoner's constitutional rights, since the prisoner was abusing the grievance program. The court noted that the prisoner filed an exorbitant amount of grievances, including 115 in a two-month period, most of which were deemed frivolous.

The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether state correctional officers used excessive force against the prisoner in the course of his transport to a different facility. The court held that state correctional officers were not entitled to qualified immunity from the prisoner's § 1983 excessive force claim arising from his alleged beating by officers during his transfer to a different facility, where a reasonable juror could have concluded that the officers knew or should have known that their conduct violated the prisoner's Eighth Amendment rights, and it was clearly established that prison official's use of force against an inmate for reasons that did not serve penological purpose violated the inmate's constitutional rights. The inmate allegedly suffered injuries, including bruises and superficial lacerations on his body, which the court found did not constitute a serious medical condition.

The court held that state prison officials' alleged retaliatory act of leaving the lights on in the prisoner's cell in a special housing unit (SHU) 24 hours per day did not amount to cruel and unusual treatment, in violation of the Eighth Amendment. According to the court, the prisoner failed to demonstrate a causal connection between his conduct and the adverse action of leaving the lights on 24 hours per day, since the illumination policy applied to all inmates in SHU, not just the prisoner, and constant illumination was related to a legitimate penological interest in protecting both guards and inmates in SHU. Whitson v. Stone County Jail, 602 F.3d 920 (8th Cir. 2010). The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The appeals court held that summary judgment was precluded by a fact issue as to whether the officers were deliberately indifferent to the safety of the female prisoner who was placed in the back of a dark van for transport with two male inmates and allegedly raped by one of them. Aref v. Holder, 774 F.Supp.2d 147 (D.D.C. 2011). A group of prisoners who were, or who had been, incarcerated in communication management units (CMU) at federal correctional institutions (FCI) designed to monitor high-risk prisoners filed suit against the United States Attorney General, the federal Bureau of Prisons (BOP), and BOP officials, alleging that CMU incarceration violated the First, Fifth, and Eighth Amendments. Four additional prisoners moved to intervene and the defendants moved to dismiss. The district court denied the motion to intervene, and granted the motion to dismiss in part and denied in part. The court held that even though a federal prisoner who had been convicted of solicitation of bank robbery was no longer housed in the federal prison's communication management unit (CMU), he had standing under Article III to pursue constitutional claims against the Bureau of Prisons (BOP) for alleged violations since there was a realistic threat that he might be redesignated to a CMU. The court noted that the prisoner had originally been placed in CMU because of the nature of his underlying conviction and because of his alleged efforts to radicalize other inmates, and these reasons for placing him in CMU remained.

The court found that the restrictions a federal prison put on prisoners housed within a communication management unit (CMU), which included that all communications be conducted in English, that visits were monitored and subject to recording, that each prisoner received only eight visitation hours per month, and that prisoners' telephone calls were limited and subjected to monitoring, did not violate the prisoners' alleged First Amendment right to family integrity, since the restrictions were rationally related to a legitimate penological interest. The court noted that prisoners assigned to the unit typically had offenses related to international or domestic terrorism or had misused approved communication methods while incarcerated. The court found that a federal prisoner stated a First Amendment retaliation claim against the Bureau of Prisons (BOP) by alleging: (1) that he was "an outspoken and litigious prisoner;" (2) that he had written books about improper prison conditions and filed grievances and complaints on his own behalf; (3) that his prison record contained "no serious disciplinary infractions" and "one minor communications-related infraction" from 1997; (4) that prison staff told him he would be "sent east" if he continued filing complaints; and (5) that he filed a complaint about that alleged threat and he was then transferred to a high-risk inmate monitoring communication management unit (CMU) at a federal correctional institution. Hannon v. Beard, 645 F.3d 45 (1st Cir. 2011). A state inmate filed a § 1983 action against the secretary of a state department of corrections, alleging that he was transferred to an out-of-state prison in retaliation for his advocacy on behalf of himself and other convicts. The district court entered summary judgment in the secretary's favor, and denied the inmate's motion for reconsideration. The inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the decision by the secretary to transfer the inmate to an out-of-state maximum security prison was not in retaliation for the inmate's advocacy on behalf of himself and other convicts, and thus did not violate the inmate's First Amendment free speech rights, even though the inmate had not received any misconduct reports in the fourteen years before transfer, and posed no danger to staff or other prisoners. According to the court, the initial decision to transfer the inmate was made three years before the secretary assumed his current position, the inmate had accumulated a large number of legitimate separations while incarcerated in the state prison system, and the transfer did not violate any standard prison policies or procedures. Maraj v. Massachusetts, 836 F.Supp.2d 17 (D.Mass. 2011). The mother of a deceased inmate brought an action, as administratrix of the inmate's estate, against the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, a county sheriff's department, a county sheriff, and corrections officers, alleging that the defendants violated the inmate's Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment rights. She also brought common law claims of wrongful death, negligence, and assault and battery. The defendants moved to dismiss for failure to state claim. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the Commonwealth, in enacting legislation effectuating the assumption of county sheriff's department by the Commonwealth, did not waive sovereign immunity as to § 1983 claims filed against the Commonwealth, the department, and corrections officers in their official capacities after the transfer took effect. The court found that the correction officers who were no longer participating in the transfer of the inmate at the time inmate first resisted and the officers who took the first responsive measure by "double locking" the inmate's handcuffs were not subject to liability in their individual capacities as to the § 1983 substantive due process claim brought by inmate's mother arising from the inmate's death following the transfer. According to the court, corrections officers who applied physical force to the resisting inmate during the transfer of the inmate, or were present when the inmate was unresponsive and requiring medical attention, were subject to liability, in their individual capacities, as to the § 1983 substantive due process claim brought by the inmate's mother. The court held that the county sheriff and corrections officers who participated in the transfer of the inmate, who died following the transfer, were immune from negligence and wrongful death claims brought by the inmate's mother under the Massachusetts Tort Claims Act (MTCA) provision which categorically protected public employees acting within the scope of their employment from liability for "personal injury or death" caused by their individual negligence. But the court found that the mother properly alleged that county corrections officers' contact with the inmate amounted to excessive force, and that a supervisor instructed the use of excessive force, as required to state a claim for assault and battery, under Massachusetts law, against the officers. The appeals court affirmed, finding that RLUIPA did not constrain prison transfers based on disadvantages at the transferee prison that were not themselves of the government's creation. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants and the patients appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that: (1) the MSOP policy of performing unclothed body searches of patients was not unreasonable; (2) the policy of placing full restraints on patients during transport was not unreasonable; (3) officials were not liable for using excessive force in handcuffing patients; (4) the officials' seizure of televisions from the patients' rooms was not unreasonable; (5) the MSOP telephone-use policy did not violate the First Amendment; and (6) there was no evidence that officials were deliberately indifferent to the patients' health or safety. Coffey v. U.S., 870 F.Supp.2d 1202 (D.N.M. 2012). The mother of a deceased inmate brought an action against the government under the Federal Tort Claims Act (FTCA), alleging, among other things, that Bureau of Indian Affairs (BIA) was negligent in failing to medically screen the inmate prior to his transfer to a different facility. The government moved to dismiss for lack of subject matter jurisdiction and for failure to state claim or, in the alternative, for summary judgment. The district court denied the motion for summary judgment. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact: (1) as to whether the Bureau of Indian affairs (BIA), which transferred custody of the inmate with a heart condition to a county jail, where he died, engaged in conduct that breached its duty to conduct some screening of the inmate's condition; (2) as to whether BIA's conduct caused the inmate's death; (3) as to whether BIA engaged in conduct that breached its duty to take some steps to ensure that the jail would learn of his condition; (4) as to whether BIA's conduct caused the inmate's death; (5) as to whether BIA engaged in conduct that breached its duty to take some steps to ensure that the inmate's medical needs were addressed when it chose to transfer him; and (6) as to whether BIA engaged in conduct that breached its duty to act reasonably in terms of sending the inmate to the jail. The mother of a decedent, a Native American who died in a county correctional institution, brought actions on behalf of her son and his children against the government, alleging wrongful death and negligence claims arising from his treatment while in the institution. After a two-day bench trial, the district court found that: (1) the notice provided to the Bureau of Indian Affairs (BIA) in the mother's administrative claim was sufficient, thereby providing jurisdiction over the mother's wrongful death and negligence claims; (2) the BIA's decision whether to screen and transfer the inmate were not choices susceptible to policy analysis, and thus, the discretionary-function exception to the Federal Tort Claims Act (FTCA) did not preclude jurisdiction; (3) the mother's negligent screening claims were precluded; (4) the mother's negligent transfer claims were precluded; and (5) the mother's wrongful death claims, arising under FTCA, were precluded. The mother had filed a standard two-page form and submitted it to Indian Health Services and the Department of Health and Human Services (HHS), claiming that her son was denied medication, and that he was transferred by BIA to another correctional facility. Curtis v. TransCor America, LLC, 877 F.Supp.2d 578 (N.D.Ill. 2012). A prisoner's son brought a wrongful death action against a prisoner transport company, alleging that the company was liable for damages resulting from the death of the prisoner while in the company's custody. The district court held that it was necessary and proper for the court to resolve a narrow question of fact prior to trial for choice of law purposes, that Illinois law, rather than the law of Indiana, governed the issue of compensatory damages, and that the prisoner's son would be allowed to pursue punitive damages. The prisoner suffered a stroke that was allegedly caused, at least in part, by excessive temperatures in the prisoner compartment of the transport vehicle. According to the court, even though the complaint for wrongful death of the prisoner during a ride in a bus with a broken air conditioning unit had not requested punitive damages, the plaintiff could seek such damages against the prisoner transport company at trial. The court noted that although the company faced increased liability exposure, allegations suggesting that the employees ignored indications that the prisoner was in distress went beyond mere negligence. A state inmate filed a § 1983 action alleging excessive force, deliberate indifference to his serious medical condition, and retaliation for filing a grievance. After appointing counsel for the inmate and allowing him to proceed in forma pauperis, the district court granted an attorney's motion to withdraw and dismissed the case. The inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The court held that the statutory period for the inmate to file a § 1983 action alleging that an unidentified corrections officer who fired two rounds from shotgun into the inmate population violated an Eighth Amendment's prohibition against excessive force was tolled while the inmate completed the administrative grievance process. The court held that the issue of when the inmate completed the prison's grievance process with regard to his claim involved fact issues that could not be resolved on a motion to dismiss. The court found that the inmate's allegations that he used the prison's grievance system to address his injury and lack of treatment he received following his injury, that he was transferred to a correctional center where he had known enemies when he refused to drop his grievance, and that there was no other explanation for his transfer, were sufficient to state a claim of retaliation in violation of his First Amendment right to use a prison grievance system. The defendants moved to dismiss for failure to state a claim. The district court granted the motion and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the failure of prison officials to provide inmates in transport with seatbelts does not, without more, violate the Eighth Amendment's prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment or the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The court noted that a bus seatbelt for a prison inmate in transport is not a life necessity, the deprivation of which constitutes cruel and unusual punishment under the Eighth Amendment. According to the court, a correctional facility's use of vehicles without seatbelts to transport prison inmates, when based on legitimate penological concerns rather than an intent to punish, is reasonable under the Eighth Amendment. Knows His Gun v. Montana, 866 F.Supp.2d 1235 (D.Mont. 2012). Native American state prisoners brought an action against a state, the state department of corrections (DOC), a private prison facility, and wardens, alleging violations of the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA). Defendants filed motion to dismiss. The district court held that: (1) the allegations were sufficient to plead the searches were a substantial burden on their religious exercise; (2) the allegations were sufficient plead the confiscations and prohibitions were a substantial burden on their religious exercise; (3) the allegations about relieving a prisoner from the pipe carrier position were sufficient to plead it was a substantial burden on his religious exercise; (4) transferred prisoners did not have standing for claims for injunctive and declaratory relief; (5) the private facility was a state actor; and (6) the private facility was an instrumentality of the state. The Native American prisoners' alleged that the prison subjected them to en masse strip searches before and after sweat lodge ceremonies, that the searches sometimes occurred in a hallway where other inmates could see them and at least one occurred in a gym with video cameras monitored by a female guard, and that some inmates declined to participate in the ceremony due to the degrading nature of the searches. According to the court, the prisoners' allegations that sacred items were confiscated or prohibited by the prison for their sweat lodge ceremonies, including smudge tobacco and antlers, and that the items were essential for the ceremony to be meaningful and proper were sufficient to plead confiscations and prohibitions were a substantial burden on their religious exercise, as required for their claims under RLUIPA. The prisoner also alleged that they were subject to pat down searches before and after entering the ceremonial sweat lodge grounds, that they were provided insufficient water and toilet facilities, that the size of the sweat lodge and the frequency of the ceremonies was inadequate, and that they were not provided a Native American spiritual advisor. Miller v. Harbaugh, 698 F.3d 956 (7th Cir. 2012). The mother of a minor who hanged himself while incarcerated at a state youth detention facility, on her own behalf and as the minor's representative, brought a § 1983 action against state officials, alleging deliberate indifference to the minor's serious mental illness. The 16-year-old youth had a history of mental illness and was known to have attempted suicide at least three times. The district court granted summary judgment for the officials. The mother appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that, even assuming that state supervisory officials' decision to use metal bunk beds in rooms of a youth detention facility that were occupied by residents who were mentally disturbed but did not appear to be imminently suicidal, amounted to deliberate indifference to the residents' serious medical needs, the law was not then so clearly established as to defeat the officials' defense of qualified immunity to the due process claim. The court found that a psychologist at the state youth detention facility, who had authorized the minor's transfer after learning of minor's unsuccessful participation in the facility's drug abuse program, was not deliberately indifferent to the minor's serious medical needs, in violation of due process. According to the court, even if he knew that the minor, who had mental health issues, presented a suicide risk and that the transferee facility was using metal bunk beds like that which the minor thereafter used to hang himself. The court found that the psychologist's involvement with the minor was minimal, the decision to make the transfer was made after the psychologist met with the facility's entire treatment staff, and the psychologist did not know which room at the transferee facility the minor would be given or that the facility's other suicide prevention measures would prove inadequate. Federal inmates, who were convicted of terrorism-related offenses, brought an action against the Federal Bureau of Prisons (BOP) and BOP officials, alleging that they had a liberty interest in avoiding transfer without due process to the Administrative Maximum Prison (ADX). The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The inmates appealed. The appeals court held that the action was not moot, even though the inmates were currently housed in less-restrictive facilities when compared to ADX, where the inmates' transfers to less-restrictive facilities did not completely and irrevocably eradicate the effects of the alleged violation because the inmates were never returned to their pre-ADX placements, and some prospective relief remained available. The court found that the inmates did not have a liberty interest in avoiding conditions of confinement at Administrative Maximum Prison (ADX), and thus the inmates were not entitled to due process in the BOP's transfer determination. According to the court, the inmates' segregated confinement related to and furthered by the BOP's legitimate penological interests in prison safety and national security, conditions of confinement at ADX, although undeniably harsh, were not extreme, inmates' placements at ADX did not increase the duration of their confinement, and the inmates' placements at ADX were not indeterminate, as the inmates were given regular reevaluations of their placements in the form of twice-yearly program reviews. The father of a detainee who committed suicide while in police custody brought a § 1983 action against police officers, alleging deliberate indifference to the detainee's risk of suicide in violation of the detainee's right to due process under Fourteenth Amendment. The district court granted summary judgment to the police officers, and the father appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the police officers did not intentionally disregard a substantial risk that the detainee would commit suicide, as required for liability on a due-process claim alleging deliberately indifferent treatment of the detainee. The detainee committed suicide while being transported to a mental health facility after exhibiting self-destructive behavior. The officers failed to discover the detainee's razor blade, which he used to commit suicide. According to the court, their overall actions toward the detainee showed protection and compassion by searching the detainee, arranging for assessment of his mental condition, ensuring his comfort during transportation, and personally administering first aid despite his resistance. Surles v. Andison, 678 F.3d 452 (6th Cir. 2012). A state inmate filed a § 1983 action alleging that prison officials had confiscated his legal papers and computer disks on multiple occasions, damaged or destroyed legal and religious papers and property, taken actions to deprive him of access to courts, violated his First Amendment rights, retaliated against him by filing false misconduct charges and transferring him to other prisons, and conspired against him to violate his rights. The district court entered summary judgment in the officials' favor, and the inmate appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the state inmate exhausted his administrative remedies, and whether prison officials prevented the inmate from filing grievances and exhausting his administrative remedies. Westefer v. Neal, 682 F.3d 679 (7th Cir. 2012). Past and present inmates in the custody of the Illinois Department of Corrections (IDOC), who had been incarcerated in a supermax prison, brought a § 1983 action against IDOC officials and employees, alleging that defendants violated their right to procedural due process by employing unconstitutionally inadequate procedures when assigning inmates to the supermax prison, and seeking injunctive and declaratory relief. The district court granted injunctive relief, and the defendants appealed. The appeals court vacated and remanded with instructions. The appeals court held that the scope and specificity of the district court's injunction exceeded what was required to remedy a due-process violation, contrary to the terms of the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA) and cautionary language from the Supreme Court about remedial flexibility and deference to prison administrators. The court held that the IDOC's ten–point plan should be used as a constitutional baseline, revising the challenged procedures and including a detailed transfer-review process. According to the court, this would eliminate the operational discretion and flexibility of prison administrators, far exceeding what due process required and violating the mandate of the PLRA. The court found that, under the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA), injunctive relief to remedy unconstitutional prison conditions must be narrowly drawn, extend no further than necessary to remedy the constitutional violation, and use the least intrusive means to correct the violation of the federal right. The court noted that informal due process, which is mandatory for inmates transferred to a supermax prison, requires some notice of the reasons for the inmate's placement and enough time to prepare adequately for the administrative review. The court found that, to satisfy due process regarding inmates transferred to a supermax prison, only a single prison official is needed as a neutral reviewer, not necessarily a committee, noting that informal due process requires only that the inmate be given an opportunity to present his views, not necessarily a full-blown hearing. Similarly, the informal due process does not necessarily require a written decision describing the reasons for an inmate's placement, or mandate an appeal procedure. Woods v. City of Utica, 902 F.Supp.2d 273 (N.D.N.Y. 2012). A wheelchair-using, paraplegic arrestee sued a city, police officer, a county, a former sheriff, and county corrections officers, bringing federal causes of action for violations of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), the Rehabilitation Act, and Fourteenth Amendment equal protection and due process. The arrestee alleged that he was lifted out of his wheelchair and placed on the floor of a sheriff's van, forcing him to maneuver himself onto a bench seat which caused his pants and underwear to fall, exposing his genitals, that he was not secured to the bench with a seatbelt, causing him to be thrown about the passenger compartment and suffer leg spasms during his ride to the jail, that he was forced to urinate into an empty soda bottle and handle his sterile catheter with his hands that were dirty from moving himself around the floor of the van, and that the county corrections officers stood by as he struggled to maneuver himself out of the van and into his wheelchair while other inmates watched. The city and county defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court held that: (1) the city did not fail to accommodate the arrestee's disability, for purposes of the ADA and Rehabilitation Act claims; (2) summary judgment was precluded by fact issues as to whether the arrestee was denied the benefit of safe and appropriate transportation by the county on the day of his arrest when he was moved from a police station to a county jail; (3) the county was entitled to summary judgment to the extent the arrestee's claims involved his transportation from the jail to court proceedings on two other dates; (4) fact issues existed as to whether the county defendants were deliberately indifferent to the paraplegic inmate's known medical need for suppositories every other day, in violation of due process, but they were not deliberately indifferent to his need for catheters and prescription pain medication; and (5) the county defendants were not entitled to qualified immunity. The court noted that while the county defendants disputed the arrestee's version of the facts, corrections officers all denied receiving any training regarding how to transport disabled inmates. Benton v. Rousseau, 940 F.Supp.2d 1370 (M.D.Fla. 2013). A pretrial detainee, who alleged that he was beaten by drivers while being transported to prison, brought a § 1983 action against drivers of a private company which was in the business of transporting prisoners throughout the State of Florida. The district court held that the inmate established a § 1983 First Amendment retaliation claim and a § 1983 Fourteenth Amendment excessive force claim. According to the court: (1) the prisoner engaged in constitutionally protected speech because he complained about conditions of his confinement in the transport vehicle; (2) the driver of transport vehicle engaged in adverse or retaliatory conduct by pulling the inmate out of the van and onto the ground and beating and kicking the inmate; and (3) there was a causal connection between the driver's retaliatory action and inmate's protected speech, in that the incident would not have occurred but for the inmate's complaints regarding conditions of his confinement. The court noted that the inmate's injuries included headaches and facial scars, and his injuries, although perhaps not serious, amounted to more than de minimis injuries. The court ruled that the inmate was entitled to $45,012 in compensatory damages because the inmate had scarring on his face and suffered from headaches and numbness in his side, he suffered the loss of a $12 shirt, and he suffered mental and emotional anguish as a result of actions of drivers of transport van, who kicked and beat him. The court held that the inmate was entitled to punitive damages in the amount of $15,000 based on the violation of his First and Fourteenth Amendment rights by the drivers. The court noted that although the drivers were no longer employed by their private employer, the employer did not investigate after the incident nor did it punish the drivers for their actions, and imposition of punitive damages would deter the drivers from taking similar actions in the future. Blackmon v. Sutton, 734 F.3d 1237 (10th Cir. 2013). A former juvenile pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against various members of a juvenile detention center's staff, alleging they violated the Fourteenth Amendment rights guaranteed to him as a pretrial detainee. The district court denied the defendants' motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity. The defendants appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, and reversed in part. The court held that the eleven-year-old pretrial detainee's right to be free from punishment altogether was clearly established at the time the staff allegedly used a chair bearing wrist, waist, chest, and ankle restraints to punish detainee, for the purposes of the juvenile detention center's staff's qualified immunity defense. According to the court, the senior correctional officer approved a decision by one of his subordinates, a fully grown man, to sit on the chest of the eleven-year-old without any penological purpose. The court found that the detainee's Fourteenth Amendment due process rights were violated when employees allegedly failed to provide the eleven-year-old detainee with any meaningful mental health care despite his obvious need for it. The court noted that prison officials who assumed a "gate keeping" authority over the prisoner's access to medical professionals were deliberately indifferent to the detainee's medical needs when they denied or delayed access to medical care. But the court also held that the detainee's alleged right to be placed in a particular facility of his choice while awaiting trial was not clearly established at the time the director failed to transfer detainee to a nearby shelter, for purposes of the juvenile detention center director's qualified immunity defense.. The court stated: "Weeks before eleven-year-old, 4'11," 96–pound Brandon Blackmon arrived at the juvenile detention center in Sedgwick, Kansas, officials there made a new purchase: the Pro–Straint Restraining Chair, Violent Prisoner Chair Model RC–1200LX. The chair bore wrist, waist, chest, and ankle restraints. In the months that followed, the staff made liberal use of their new acquisition on the center's youngest and smallest charge. Sometimes in a legitimate effort to thwart his attempts at suicide and self-harm. But sometimes, it seems, only to punish him. And that's the nub of this lawsuit." Estate of Prasad ex rel. Prasad v. County of Sutter, 958 F.Supp.2d 1101 (E.D.Cal. 2013). The estate of a deceased pretrial detainee brought an action against jail employees and officials, as well as medical staff, alleging violations of the Fourteenth Amendment. The defendants moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that: (1) although the detainee died at a hospital, liability for the jail employees and officials was not precluded, where the jail employees and officials could have contributed to detainee's death despite the transfer to the hospital; (2) allegations were sufficient plead deliberate indifference to serious medical needs by the deputies and medical staff; (3) allegations were sufficient to state a claim for supervisory liability; (4) allegations were sufficient to state a claim for supervisory liability against the corrections officers in charge; (5) allegations were sufficient to state a claim against the county; (6) allegations were sufficient to state a claim for wrongful death under California law; and (7) the health care provider was a state actor. The court found that a statement by health care providers, in an attachment to the complaint, that even if the detainee had been transferred to the hospital sooner, it "probably" would not have changed his death, was possibly self serving, and did not contradict the complaint's allegations that the detainee's death was unnecessary and unavoidable.

According to the court, allegations that the county maintained customs or practices whereby no medical staff whatsoever were at the jail for one-sixth of every day, that the staff lacked authority to respond to emergency and critical inmate needs, and that the jail records system withheld information from affiliated health care providers, were sufficient to state a § 1983 claim against the county, alleging violations of the Fourteenth Amendment after the pretrial detainee died. The court held that allegations that deficiencies in medical care at the jail, including lack of 24-hour emergency care, were longstanding, repeatedly documented, and expressly noted by officials in the past., and that the doctor who was employed by the health care provider that contracted with the prison was aware of the deficiencies, and that the doctor discharged the pretrial detainee to the jail were sufficient to plead deliberate indifference to serious medical needs, as required to state a § 1983 action against the doctor for violations of the Fourteenth Amendment after the detainee died. Fluker v. County of Kankakee, 945 F.Supp.2d 972 (C.D.Ill. 2013). An inmate and his wife filed a § 1983 action in state court against a county and the county sheriff's office to recover for injuries the inmate suffered when a correctional officer who was driving his prison transport vehicle was required to brake suddenly, causing the inmate to hurtle forward and hit his head on a metal divider. The case was removed to federal court. The district court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment. The court held that: (1) the officials' failure to fasten the inmate's seatbelt did not violate the Eighth Amendment; the official's alleged driving above the posted speed limit did not violate the Eighth Amendment; and the officials' failure to immediately call for an ambulance did not violate the Eighth Amendment. The court noted that the officials, who were not medically trained, called a supervisor for guidance within one minute of the accident, and were told to continue to the jail where a trained first responder immediately assessed the inmate and cleaned and bandaged a laceration on his head when the transport van arrived 7 to 10 minutes later. The inmate was transported to a hospital within 10 to 15 minutes of arriving at the jail. (Jerome Combs Detention Center, Kankakee County, Illinois)

McKinney v. U.S., 950 F.Supp.2d 923 (N.D.Tex. 2013). A 79-year-old federal prisoner, who allegedly had been injured while being transported to a medical center, filed suit against the United States pursuant to the Federal Torts Claim Act (FTCA). The district court denied the defendants' motion to dismiss, holding that the prisoner's tort claim was not barred under the discretionary function exception to FTCA's waiver of sovereign immunity. The court noted that a prisoner has the right to bring a cause of action under FTCA for a breach of the duty prescribed by federal statute requiring the Bureau of Prisons to provide for the safekeeping, care, and subsistence of all federal prisoners. The prisoner alleged that he was injured when officials failed to assist him on stairs when he was exiting an airplane, while he was fully restrained in handcuffs, shackles, and a belly chain. According to the court, there were no legitimate policy considerations at play in the officials' choice not to assist a fully restrained, elderly, ill, and outnumbered prisoner on the stairs of an airplane. The prisoner alleged that, due to his fall, he suffered intense pain, has reoccurring medical issues, must now use a walker to get around, continues to need medication for pain, and requires counseling to address the mental and emotional stress he has suffered. Payne v. Friel, 919 F.Supp.2d 1185 (D.Utah 2013). A state inmate brought a § 1983 action against prison officials, certain members of the state board of pardons and paroles, and lawyers working under contract with the prison to provide limited legal services to inmates, alleging numerous constitutional violations. The district court dismissed the complaint, and inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, dismissed in part, and remanded. On remand, the district court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment. The court held that the inmate's initial placement in administrative segregation did not violate his due process rights, where the inmate was promptly evaluated by proper officials and was assigned to ad-seg based on legitimate safety and security concerns, and given the reason for the inmate's return to the state-- termination of his interstate compact placement following his conviction for murdering another inmate while in ad-seg there-- there could be little doubt that officials were justified in initially placing the inmate in the most secure housing available pending future review. The court noted that the inmate promptly received a thorough evaluation under the prison's standard review procedures which included a reasoned examination of his assignment. The court found that the inmate was not entitled to a formal hearing regarding the implementation of an Executive Director Override (EDO) and that the former director's failure to personally review the EDO for an 18-month period did not violate due process. Robinson v. Phelps, 946 F.Supp.2d 354 (D.Del. 2013). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against prison officials alleging excessive force and failure to protect. The district court held that the prisoner stated cognizable and non-frivolous claims for excessive force, failure to protect, and denial of medical care. The prisoner alleged that on one occasion a sergeant assaulted him and that a lieutenant arrived during the assault and that he sustained injuries but was denied medical care by these officers and other prison personnel, that another sergeant shoved and pushed him when he was taken to a medical grievance hearing, making his injuries worse, that this sergeant shoved him to the ground while escorting him to the shower, and then dragged him when he could not get up, requiring that he be taken away by stretcher, and that other officers later choked him until he lost consciousness. The court found that the prisoner also stated cognizable and non-frivolous Eighth Amendment claims against a prison physician for denial or delay of medical treatment; the prisoner alleged that after he was assaulted by a corrections officer, he was seen by the physician, who would not prescribe pain medication and advised the prisoner that he would be x-rayed within seven to ten days, but the x-rays were not taken for a month and a half, and he alleged that some months later he was taken to an outside facility for a magnetic resonance imaging (MRI) of the neck and back.

According to the court, the prisoner's allegations were sufficient to state an Eighth Amendment claim that the physicians denied his requests for medically necessary accommodations. The prisoner alleged that medical officials did not authorize his housing on a lower bunk and, as a result, he slept on the floor, that an officer later moved him to an upstairs cell even though he knew that the prisoner required lower housing due to his neck and back injuries, and that the prisoner showed the officer a memo from a superior officer indicating the prisoner needed the housing, (James T. Rogers v. Boatright, 709 F.3d 403 (5th Cir. 2013). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against corrections officers and their supervisor, alleging that he was seriously injured when the prison van in which he was riding stopped abruptly, and that he was provided with inadequate and untimely medical care for his injuries. The district court dismissed the suit. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The appeals court held that the prisoner stated a non-frivolous claim that an officer acted with deliberate indifference to his safety in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The prisoner alleged that he sustained a serious injury while being transported in a prison van because a corrections officer operated the van recklessly and had to brake suddenly to avoid hitting another vehicle, that he was shackled in leg irons and handcuffs and was not provided with a seatbelt and thus could not protect himself when the prison van stopped abruptly, and that the officer had told another officer that other inmates similarly had been injured the prior week and during other incidents. A dissenting appeals judge asserted that "…there is no constitutional requirement that inmates be buckled with seatbelts during transportation. Nearly all courts have rejected such claims, because the use of seatbelts on shackled prisoners presents inevitable, non-trivial security concerns for other passengers and the guards." The appeals court held that the corrections officers transporting the prisoner to a hospital in a prison van did not show deliberate indifference to the prisoner's serious medical needs, in violation of the Eighth Amendment, when, after the prisoner was injured, the officers proceeded to the hospital, had the prisoner checked by a physician, but then failed to take the prisoner to the emergency room for treatment of his bleeding wounds as that physician had directed, but instead brought the prisoner to the prison's medical facility, where he was treated some five hours later. Best v. New York City Dept. of Correction, 14 F.Supp.3d 341 (S.D.N.Y. 2014). A pretrial detainee filed a § 1983 action alleging that state prison officials denied him due process at an infraction hearing, improperly placed him in segregated housing, and failed to protect him while being transported to court. The officials moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the issues of whether the detainee's placement in segregated housing following the infraction hearing was administrative or punitive in nature, and whether he was provided the opportunity to call a witnesses at a hearing involved fact issues that could not be resolved on a motion to dismiss the detainee's claim that prison officials' denied him procedural due process at the hearing. According to the court, the officials' failure to provide the detainee with a seat belt while he was being transported to court with his hands handcuffed behind his back did not demonstrate deliberate indifference to the detainee's safety. Plaintiff alleges that, some time after he was placed in segregated housing, "while being transported to court, handcuffs [were] placed behind [Plaintiff's] back and [he was] "placed in a cage with no seatbelt or a way to protect [himself] in case of a sudden stop or accident." and that, "while riding[, he sat] on a slippery seat that cause[d] [him] to continuously slide." According to the detainee, "On [his] way to court, the bus kept stopping short and [Plaintiff] continued to bump [his] head on the gate in front of [him]." The detainee complained to the driver and after he returned to the detention facility he was taken to the medical center where his injuries were assessed and an injury report was filed. The detainee claims that, as a result of the injuries that he sustained during this trip, his neck and shoulders were injured, and that "he now has to take medication for migraine headaches. A state prisoner, who was an adherent of the Essene faith, brought a § 1983 action against a private prison management company, warden, and the State of Hawai'i Department of Public Safety, alleging that, following his assignment to a prison in Arizona, he was denied a raw-food, vegetarian diet that had been requested, consistent with his religious beliefs, in violation of the First Amendment and the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA). The district court granted the defendants' motion for a change of venue to the District of Arizona. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion, finding that: (1) material fact issues existed as to the sincerity of the prisoner's beliefs and whether those beliefs were substantially burdened; (2) the potential perception of preferential treatment was not a compelling interest to justify a burden on the prisoner's religious practice under RLUIPA; (3) an inconsistency with simplified food service and additional costs presented a compelling interest to justify the burden on the prisoner's religious practice under RLUIPA; (4) rejecting the prisoner's requested diet was the least restrictive means to further a compelling government interest; and (5) refusing the prisoner's requested diet did not violate his First Amendment rights. Griffin v. Gomez, 741 F.3d 10 (9th Cir. 2014). A state inmate filed a petition for a writ of habeas corpus challenging his placement in a security housing unit (SHU). After the writ was issued, the district court ordered the state to release the inmate from segregated housing conditions, and the state appealed. The appeals court vacated, reversed, and remanded. The appeals court held that the district court abused its discretion by finding that the state had violated its order issuing a writ of habeas corpus requiring the state to release the inmate from the facility's security housing unit (SHU). According to the court, the state subsequently placed the inmate in the facility's administrative segregation unit (ASU) and then in another facility's SHU. The court noted that the inmate had been released into federal custody before the order was issued, his placement in ASU after he was released from federal custody pending evaluation of his gang status was standard procedure, and the inmate was validated as an active gang member and placed in other SHU. According to the court, the district court improperly impeded state prison management. (Pelican Bay State Prison, California)

Mori v. Allegheny County, 51 F.Supp.3d 558 (W.D.Pa. 2014). An inmate who was seven and one-half months into a "high risk" pregnancy brought an action under § 1983 against a county for deliberate indifference to her health in violation of the Eighth Amendment prohibition of cruel and unusual punishment, and survival and wrongful death claims for violations of the Fourteenth Amendment, after the loss of the child following a placental abruption. The county moved to dismiss. The district court denied the motion. The court held that the prisoner: (1) stated an Eighth Amendment claim based on failure to monitor the unborn child after the prisoner complained of vaginal bleeding; (2) stated a claim against the county based on custom and practice; (3) sufficiently alleged a causal link between the policies and the loss of the child; (4) stated a claim against county officials for individual liability; and (5) stated wrongful death and survivor claims for the death of the child. The inmate alleged that individual policy makers, including the chief operating officer of the county jail's health services, and the jail's nursing supervisor, were responsible for the policies that led to failure to provide adequate medical treatment. The prisoner also alleged that she was made to wait over 24 hours before being sent to a hospital after her vaginal bleeding started, that she was transported by a police cruiser rather than ambulance, that it was well known that bleeding late in pregnancy often indicated serious medical issues, that the child was alive during birth, and that the delay in medical treatment contributed to the injuries during birth and the death of the child shortly after birth. Thomas v. Adams, 55 F.Supp.3d 552 (D.N.J. 2014). Civilly-committed sexually violent predators (SVP) brought an action against corrections officials, and other defendants, challenging the adequacy of treatment after they were transferred to a new facility for SVPs. The defendants moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motions in part and denied in part. The inmate's claimed that he was diagnosed as a sexually violent predator (SVP) requiring treatment, and after he was transferred to a different facility his prescribed amount of therapy was reduced, and eventually denied without any mental health evaluation. The inmate alleged that the denials were based on his placement in a segregated housing unit (SHU). The court held that the inmate sufficiently alleged a substantive due process challenge against high-ranking, supervising corrections officers involved in the decision to transfer SVPs to a new facility, despite the contention that the officials played no role in the inmate's day-to-day affairs. Pretrial detainees brought a class action against the Washington Department of Social and Health Services and two state hospitals, alleging that in-jail waiting times for court-ordered competency evaluations and restoration services violated their Fourteenth Amendment due process rights. The detainees moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion, finding that in-jail waiting times for court-ordered competency evaluations and restoration services violated the Fourteenth Amendment substantive due process rights of mentally incapacitated pretrial detainees. The court noted that detainees were incarcerated for many weeks, not because they were convicted, found to be dangerous, or posed a flight risk, but because Department of Social and Health Services and state hospitals did not have sufficient bed space or available staff to provide the services they were required to provide. Some detainees were held in solitary confinement due to space issues, exacerbating any mental illness, and the rate of medication compliance was lower in jail. Chavarriaga v. New Jersey Dept. of Corrections, 806 F.3d 210 (3d Cir. 2015). A former prisoner brought a § 1983 action in state court against the New Jersey Department of Corrections (NJDOC), the former New Jersey Attorney General, the New Jersey Commissioner of Corrections, a correctional sergeant, and various other correctional officers. The prisoner alleged that the defendants violated her constitutional rights when they transferred her from one place of confinement to another where they denied her potable water, clothing, sanitary napkins, and subjected her to an unlawful body cavity search. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the Attorney General, Commissioner of Corrections, and correctional sergeant, and dismissed the remaining claims. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part and reversed in part and remanded. The appeals court held that NJDOC's policies regarding custodial placements and the Due Process Clause did not give the prisoner a liberty interest in being housed in a particular institution, as required to support a due process claim based on the prisoner's transfers among custodial facilities. The court noted that a state has broad authority to confine an inmate in any of its institutions, and thus, courts recognize that a state's authority to place inmates anywhere within the prison system is among a wide spectrum of discretionary actions that traditionally have been the business of prison administrators rather than of the federal courts. A Puerto Rico prisoner brought a pro se § 1983 action against the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, the head of a prison's security, and others, alleging his prison transfer violated his civil rights. The prisoner sought $75,000 to compensate him for damages suffered. The defendants moved to dismiss and the district court granted the motion. The court held that the prisoner's allusions to negligence on the part of prison's head of security in immediately transferring the prisoner to another institution, after confidential information about which the prisoner was the author was disseminated to the penal population, were insufficient to state a due process claim that the security head and others endangered the prisoner. According to the court, the prison's head of security had sovereign immunity from the prisoner's § 1983 suit, where the head of security was at all times acting within the scope of his employment, and in his official capacity. The district court dismissed the prisoner's Eighth Amendment claim for failure to state a claim and granted the defendant's motion for summary judgment as to the Fourth Amendment claim. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The court held that: (1) the prisoner was required to direct his grievance to the jail, not the state prison, in order to satisfy the Prison Litigation Reform Act's (PLRA) exhaustion requirement; (2) the jail's grievance procedure was not "available," within the meaning of PLRA; (3) allegations were sufficient to state a claim under the Eighth Amendment; and (4) the jail's requirement that the prisoner wear a transparent jumpsuit did not violate the Fourth Amendment. A prisoner brought an action against prison officials under § 1983, alleging First Amendment retaliation arising from his transfer to a higher security prison due to his participation in a state-court class action against the prison officials. After a bench trial, the district court found in favor of the prison officials. The appeals court reversed with respect to three officials. On remand, the district court entered judgment in favor of the prisoner and ordered compensatory damages and attorney fees, but denied the prisoner's request for punitive damages and injunctive relief. Both parties appealed. The appeals court vacated and remanded. The court held that: (1) the district court properly awarded prisoner compensatory damages; (2) the district court's award of compensatory damages to equal $5 a day for each day he was kept in a higher security prison was not a reversible error; (3) the district court relied on an incorrect legal standard in concluding that the prisoner was not entitled to punitive damages; (4) the prisoner was not entitled to injunctive relief requiring the department of corrections to remove certain documents from his file that allegedly violated his due process rights; and (5) the district court abused its discretion in failing to charge up to 25% of the attorney fees awarded to the prisoner against his compensatory damages award. U.S. District Court

EQUAL PROTECTION

Sassman v. Brown, 99 F.Supp.3d 1223 (E.D. Cal. 2015). A male prisoner filed a civil rights action against the Governor of California and the Secretary of the California Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation (CDCR), alleging that the exclusion of male prisoners from California's Alternative Custody Program (ACP), under which female prisoners were allowed to apply for release from prison to serve the last 24 months of their sentence in the community, violated the Equal Protection Clause. The male prisoner moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The court held that California's ACP violated the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, and the provision excluding male prisoners from applying to the ACP would be stricken to expand the ACP to male prisoners. OTHER COUNTRIES

Sluss v. United States Department of Justice, 78 F.Supp.3d 61 (D.D.C. 2015). A federal prisoner sought to compel the Department of Justice (DOJ) to transfer him, pursuant to an international treaty, to his birthplace of Canada to carry out the remainder of his sentence. The DOJ moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion. The court held that decisions regarding the international transfer of prisoners constituted an agency action, which was committed to agency discretion by law, and thus the decisions were not reviewable under the Administrative Procedure Act (APA). TRANSPORTATION

Turner v. Mull, 784 F.3d 485 (8th Cir. 2015). A state inmate filed a § 1983 action alleging that correctional officials violated his rights under the Eighth Amendment, Fourteenth Amendment, Title II of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), and Rehabilitation Act by failing to transport him in wheelchair-accessible van, exposing him to unsanitary conditions in the van, and retaliating against him for filing a complaint. The district court entered summary judgment in the officials' favor and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the officials were not deliberately indifferent to the inmate's serious medical needs when they precluded him from using a wheelchair-accessible van, even if the inmate was required to crawl into the van and to his seat. The court noted that the inmate was able to ambulate, stand, and sit with the use of leg braces and crutches, the inmate did not ask to use a readily available wheelchair, no physician ordered or issued a wheelchair for the inmate, and improperly using or standing on a lift was considered dangerous due to the possibility of a fall. According to the court, officials were not deliberately indifferent to the serious medical needs of the inmate in violation of Eighth Amendment when they required him to be transported and to crawl in an unsanitary van, where the inmate was exposed to unsanitary conditions on a single day for a combined maximum of approximately six hours. The court found that prison officials did not discriminate against the inmate on the basis of his disability, in violation of the Rehabilitation Act, when they refused to transport him in a wheelchair-accessible van, where the prison's wheelchair-users-only policy was rooted in concerns over undisputed safety hazards associated with people standing on or otherwise improperly using a lift, and the inmate did not use a wheelchair or obtain a physician's order to use a wheelchair-accessible van. U.S. Appeals Court
FAILURE TO PROTECT

U.S. v. Mujahid, 799 F.3d 1228 (9th Cir. 2015). A federal prisoner was convicted in the district court for aggravated sexual abuse and abusive sexual contact against other prisoners while in custody in a state prison, awaiting transfer to a federal prison. The prisoner appealed his conviction. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the question of whether or not a contract to house federal prisoners existed between the United States Marshals Service and the state department of corrections was a question of law that was within the district court's authority to decide. The appeals court found that a district court may determine as a matter of law whether the facility at which an alleged crime took place was the one in which the persons were held in custody by direction of, or pursuant to, a contract or agreement with the head of any federal department or agency. (Anchorage Correctional Complex, U.S. Marshals Service)

MEDICAL CARE

White v. Bukowski, 800 F.3d 392 (7th Cir. 2015). A pregnant county prisoner brought a civil rights action under § 1983 against a county sheriff's office, alleging violation of her Eighth Amendment rights, alleging deliberate indifference to her need for proper prenatal care and prompt transport to a hospital for delivery of her baby while she was in their temporary custody. The county moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded, finding that no administrative remedies were available, and thus the prisoner did not fail to exhaust administrative remedies under the requirements of the Prison Litigation Reform Act. The prisoner alleged that the delay in her transport to the hospital contributed to her baby's birth defects. According to the court, the prisoner had no opportunity to grieve the delay in transport until after the harm was done, the prisoner was uninformed about any deadline for filing a grievance, the prisoner would not have known that she would be transferred to another jail four days after returning from the hospital, and the prisoner could not have filed a grievance after she was transferred. U.S. Appeals Court
RETALIATION
MENTAL HEALTH

Saylor v. Nebraska, 812 F.3d 637 (8th Cir. 2016). A state inmate filed a § 1983 action alleging that prison officials retaliated against him by transferring and reclassifying him, that the transfer and classification review process violated his due process rights, and that officials were deliberately indifferent to his post–traumatic stress disorder (PTSD). The district court denied the officials' motion for summary judgment, and they appealed. The appeals court reversed. The court held that the prison's medical officials were not deliberately indifferent to the inmate's post–traumatic stress disorder (PTSD), in violation of Eighth Amendment, despite the inmate's contention that treatment that occurred after his treating psychiatrist left the prison rose to the level of cruel and unusual punishment. The court noted that officials attempted to provide the inmate with another psychiatrist at the facility, ultimately found him another psychiatrist at a different facility, continued medication as they saw fit within their independent medical judgment, and gave him his requested private cell. The court found that the officials' decision to transfer the inmate to another facility and to place him in administrative segregation was not in retaliation for his complaints about his medical care, in violation of the First Amendment, where the reason for the transfer was to provide the inmate with necessary psychiatric care after his treating psychiatrist's contract with the state ended and the inmate refused to meet with the facility's other psychiatrist. The court noted that the inmate was placed in administrative segregation because he refused to share a cell within any other prisoners, and there were no other private cells. SECTION 48: USE OF FORCE

The following pages present summaries of court decisions which address this topic area. These summaries provide readers with highlights of each case, but are not intended to be a substitute for the review of the full case. The cases do not represent all court decisions which address this topic area, but rather offer a sampling of relevant holdings.

The decisions summarized below were current as of the date indicated on the title page of this edition of the Catalog. Prior to publication, the citation for each case was verified, and the case was researched in Shepard's Citations to determine if it had been altered upon appeal (reversed or modified). The Catalog is updated annually. An annual supplement provides replacement pages for cases in the prior edition which have changed, and adds new cases. Readers are encouraged to consult the Topic Index to identify related topics of interest. The text in the section entitled "How to Use The Catalog" at the beginning of the Catalog provides an overview which may also be helpful to some readers.

The case summaries which follow are organized by year, with the earliest case presented first. Within each year, cases are organized alphabetically by the name of the plaintiff. The left margin offers a quick reference, highlighting the type of court involved and identifying appropriate subtopics addressed by each case.

U.S. Supreme Court
EXCESSIVE FORCE

Screws v. United States, 325 U.S. 91 (1945). Screws, sheriff of Buker County, Georgia, a policeman and a deputy sheriff arrested Robert Hall at his home late one night on a warrant charging Hall with theft of a tire. Hall, a negro, was handcuffed and taken by car to the court house. Upon alighting from the car at the court house, Hall was beaten by the three men with fists and a blackjack for fifteen to thirty minutes. Hall was later removed to a hospital where he died.

Indictments were returned against the three men, one count charging a violation of Section 20 of the Criminal Code (predecessor of 42 U.S.C. Section 1983) and another charging a conspiracy to violate Section 20.

A district court jury returned a verdict of guilty, and a fine and imprisonment on each count was imposed. The Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed and Screws petitioned for a writ of certiorari. (Reversed, remanded for new trial.)

In discussing allegations that "under color of law" were designed to include only actions taken by officials pursuant to state law, the court stated:

DICTA: "It is clear that under 'color' of law means under 'pretense' of law. Thus acts of officers in the ambit of their personal pursuit are plainly excluded. Acts of officers who undertake to perform their official duties are included whether they hew to the line of their authority or overstep it." 325 U.S. at 111 (emphasis added). FIRE HOSE

Collins v. Schoonfield, 363 F.Supp. 1152 (D. Md. 1973). Court held that the use of chemical mace and a fire hose on rioting inmates who were assaulting a guard is justified. (Baltimore City Jail, Maryland)

U.S. Appeals Court
BRUTALITY

Johnson v. Glick, 481 F.2d 1028 (2nd Cir. 1973), cert. denied, 414 U.S. 1033. While it is doubtful that the cruel and unusual punishment clause applies to pretrial detainees, they are protected by the due process clause against acts of brutality by correction officers. However, protection is less extensive than that provided by common law torts. (Manhattan House of Detention, New York)

U.S. Supreme Court
USE OF FORCE

Scheur v. Rhodes, 416 U.S. 232 (1974). Personal representatives of the estates of students who were killed on the Kent State University, Ohio campus in 1970 brought damages action under 42 U.S.C. Section 1983 against the governor, adjutant general of the Ohio National Guard, various guard officers and enlisted members, and the university president, claiming these officials, acting under color of state law caused the death to the students unnecessarily and illegally. This decision is important in a corrections law context due to the decision in Procunier v. Navarette, 434 U.S. 555 (1978). In that decision the Supreme Court ruled that the state officials and governor could rely only on the qualified immunity described in Scheur.

HELD: "[I]n varying scope, a qualified immunity is available to officers of the executive branch of government, the variation being dependent upon the scope of discretion and responsibilities of the office and all the circumstances as they reasonably appeared at the time of the action on which liabilities are sought to be based. It is the existence of reasonable grounds for the belief formed at the time and in light of all the circumstances, applied with good faith belief, that affords a basis for qualified immunity of executive officers for acts performed in the course of official conduct." 416 U.S. at 247-248. U.S. District Court

Campbell v. McGruder, 416 F.Supp. 100 (D. D.C. 1975). If a detainee displays unusual behavior suggestive of possible mental illness, such behavior shall be immediately reported to the medical staff. Restraints will be used only in a hospital setting or medical authorization, with strict recordkeeping. (D.C. Jail)

BRUTALITY

Collins v. Cundy, 603 F.2d 825 (10th Cir. 1979). Mere verbal abuse of a prisoner does not state a claim for relief under Section 1983, but an allegation that a jailer beat the plaintiff does state a claim. (Campbell County Jail, Wyoming)

U.S. District Court
CHEMICAL AGENTS

LeBlanc v. Foti, 487 F.Supp. 272 (E.D. La. 1980). Failure of the chief administrative officer to establish procedures for the use of mace and tear gas does not state a claim for violation of civil rights in favor of an inmate on which it was used. The use of these is in the sound discretion of the institutional administration, and their use to quell a disturbance is quite proper. (Orleans Parish Prison, Louisiana)

U.S. Appeals Court
EXCESSIVE FORCE

Martinez v. Rosado, 614 F.2d 829 (2nd Cir. 1980). When force is used not with respect to the duty to maintain order and enforce rules but with the intention of causing injury, the injured prisoner may maintain an action for violation of civil rights. (Ossining Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court

Picariello v. Fenton, 491 F.Supp. 1026 (M.D. Penn. 1980). Force employed by a guard to restrain an inmate is privileged. Where the force employed is greater than necessary or longer in duration than necessary, a claim under the Federal Tort Claims Act is stated. An extended use of restraints (three days) was excessive under the facts. $200 per inmate was awarded. (United States Penitentiary, Lewisburg, Pennsylvania)

U.S. Appeals Court
EXCESSIVE FORCE

Ridley v. Leavitt, 631 F.2d 358 (4th Cir. 1980). The fact that the plaintiff inmate was found guilty of assaulting a guard does not preclude the maintenance of a civil rights actions for the use of excessive force by a guard. (Norfolk City Jail)

U.S. District Court
EXCESSIVE FORCE

Santiago v. Yarde, 487 F.Supp. 52 (S.D. N.Y. 1980). The allegation of the use of force to remove the plaintiff from the cell does not shock the conscience since the force used was apparently not excessive. Therefore, the use of force does not constitute a cruel and unusual punishment. (Bronx House of Detention, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
USE OF FORCE

Williams v. Kelly, 624 F.2d 695 (5th Cir. 1980), cert. denied, 451 U.S. 1019 (1980). Mother of prisoner, whose death was apparently caused when jailers applied choke hold to him, brought wrongful death action against the jailers resting on statute authorizing a civil action for deprivation of rights. The United States District Court for the Northern District of Georgia entered judgment in favor of the jailers and the prisoner's mother appealed. The court of appeals held that the district court's findings that jailers applied fatal choke hold to prisoner in order to protect their own safety and in a good faith effort to maintain order or discipline were not clearly erroneous and therefore their conduct was not constitutionally tortious. (Atlanta Police Station, Holding Room)

EXCESSIVE FORCE

Biancone v. Kramer, 513 F.Supp. 908 (E.D. Penn. 1981). The fact that the plaintiff may have been verbally abusive to the sheriff does not justify the use of excessive or unnecessary force. (Berks County, Pennsylvania)

U.S. District Court
EXCESSIVE FORCE

Brandon v. Allen, 516 F.Supp. 1355 (1981). A Civil Rights Act suit was brought against a police officer and the Director of the Police Department seeking damages because of assault and battery committed on the plaintiffs by the officer. Default judgment was taken against the officer. The district court held that since the city police director should have known of officer's dangerous propensities the director was liable in his official capacity. For one to be held liable under Civil Rights Act of 1871 he must act under color of law and in doing so he must play an affirmative part in deprivation of the constitutional rights of another. Although the police officer was technically off duty at the time of the alleged assault and battery, he acted under "color of law" within the meaning of Civil Rights Act of 1871 because off-duty officers were authorized to be armed and were required to act if they observed commission of a crime.

Since the city police director should have known of officer's dangerous propensities the director was liable in his official capacity for violation of plaintiffs' civil rights when they were attacked by the officer, in that the director failed to take proper action to become informed of the officer's dangerous propensities. The officer's reputation for maladaptive behavior was widespread among fellow officers and although at least one officer personally informed police precinct supervisors of the fellow officer's morbid tendencies, no investigation and action were undertaken.

Police officers are vested by the law with great responsibility and must be held to high standards of official conduct. Officials of the police department must become informed of the presence in the department of officers who pose a threat of danger to the safety of the community. When knowledge of a particular officer's dangerous propensities is widespread among the ranks of police officers, the department officials ought to be held liable for the officer's infringement of another's civil rights. 42 U.S.C.A. Section 1983.

Lock v. Jenkins, 641 F.2d 488 (7th Cir. 1981). The test for determining the constitutionality of treatment of pretrial detainees alleged to deprive them of liberty without due process of law is whether those conditions amount to punishment of the detainee. It is appropriate to consider together all the conditions of confinement in order to determine whether they amount to punishment. The use of tear gas to retrieve a metal food tray from a pretrial detainee or to stop others from shouting and uttering threats was found constitutionally impermissible. O'Connor v. Keller, 510 F.Supp. 1359 (D. Md. 1981). An inmate may not employ force against a guard unless he is responding to the guard's use of excessive force against him. Here the force used by the guard was reasonable under the circumstances. (Maryland Correctional Institution)

EXCESSIVE FORCE

Freeman v. Franzen, 695 F.2d 485 (7th Cir. 1982), cert. denied, 463 U.S. 1214 (1982). Guards are found to have used excessive force in moving inmate between cells. The Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed the decision of the lower court in finding for the plaintiffs in this case. The court noted that action for excessive force lies not only under the eighth amendment but under the due process clause of the fourteenth amendment as well.

The incident occurred at the Stateville Correctional Center in Joliet, Illinois. The jury awarded the plaintiff $2,500 compensatory and $1,000 punitive damages. $12,000 in attorney fees were awarded. (Stateville Correctional Center, Illinois)

EXCESSIVE FORCE

Peterson v. Davis, 551 F.Supp. 137 (D. Md. 1982), aff'd, 729 F.2d 1453 (4th Cir. 1984). Use of tear gas is not excessive force. The United States District Court held that the use of tear gas to quell a disturbance in this instance did not give rise to a Section 1983 action, nor did the confining of inmates in an old recreation area following the use of tear gas. Also, the court ruled that even if the use of tear gas was found unconstitutional, the warden and officers would have been immune from liability. (Maryland House of Correction)

U.S. Appeals Court
CHEMICAL AGENTS

Smith v. Iron County, 692 F.2d 685 (10th Cir. 1982). Use of mace on pretrial detainee is found reasonable. The court found that the use of mace did not violate any constitutional rights in this case. The plaintiff, awaiting disposition on a burglary charge, was found on the floor under his bunk making banging noises. The jailer warned the inmate that he would use mace if he was not given the object making the noise. Because the jailer was the only person on duty in the facility in Cedar City, Utah, and because he had reason to believe that a heavy metal object (six pound drain cover) might have been used to harm anyone near the inmate, the use of mace was reasonable.

The court also noted that the jailer could not enter the cell without risking the escape of the plaintiff and his cell mate. (Iron County Jail, Utah)

U.S. District Court
RESTRAINTS

Brown v. City of Chicago, 573 F.Supp. 1375 (N.D. Ill. 1983). City officials could be held liable for injuries caused by prisoner transportation practices. The plaintiff, now a quadriplegic, accused the city of Chicago of purchasing unsafe "paddy wagons," and handcuffing prisoners in a manner which produces injuries during transport. A federal district court had found that the city may be liable for injuries which result from the alleged practices. (City of Chicago, Illinois)

Lazano v. Smith, 718 F.2d 756 (5th Cir. 1983). U.S. Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals remands case to determine if excessive force caused death of mentally ill inmate. The inmate died following a struggle with jail personnel when they entered the cell to restrain him from banging his head against the door. (Ector County Jail, Texas)

U.S. District Court
USE OF FORCE

Overbay v. Lilliman, 572 F.Supp. 174 (W.D. Mo. 1983). Sheriff and county could be liable for failure to train and supervise deputy. A prisoner was allowed to amend his complaint in federal district court, adding the county sheriff as a defendant. The original complaint alleged that a deputy sheriff had violated his civil rights and assaulted him. Later, the plaintiff asked to add the county sheriff as a defendant, alleging that the sheriff knew of the past violent behavior of the deputy and failed to train and supervise the deputy properly. The district court granted the plaintiff's motion, citing several circuit court decisions which allow sheriffs to be held liable because they are responsible for setting policy. (LaFayette County, Missouri)

U.S. Appeals Court
EXCESSIVE FORCE

Putman v. Gerloff, 701 F.2d 63 (1983). Sheriff uses reasonable force to prevent escape. The Circuit Court of Appeals has decided that a sheriff and his deputy used no more force than was necessary to prevent the escape attempt of two pretrial detainees being held at the Gasconede County Jail in Hermann, Missouri.

The plaintiffs were awaiting trial on charges of armed robbery. They attempted to escape from the jail by using saw blades to cut through the bars on a door leading to the jail's main room. They succeeded in removing the bars and one crawled into the hallway. The second became stuck. The two were discovered at this time by the sheriff and his deputy.

The plaintiffs claimed that they were grabbed by the hair, thrown to the floor, kicked in the side, and beaten about the head numerous times with the butt of a shotgun, and that after their escape was discovered and they were recaptured, they were chained, back to back, and left in that position in a holding cell overnight.

The defendants described the events differently, with the sheriff admitting to having struck one of the plaintiffs on the head, because he could not determine if the plaintiff had a weapon. The deputy admitted that the plaintiffs were handcuffed together but only remained so for about thirty minutes. Several jail inmates verified the testimony of the sheriff and his deputy.

The plaintiffs appealed, alleging that they were entitled to a directed verdict at trial on the issue of liability. The court of appeals rejected this argument, finding that the jury could reasonably have concluded that the sheriff and his deputy had told the truth and had used force which was no more severe than was reasonably necessary under the circumstances. Soto v. Cady, 566 F.Supp. 773 (E.D. Wisc. 1983). Use of mace is found improper. A district court in Wisconsin has found that the practices at a prison in Wisconsin are improper, and that the use of mace on inmates whose disobedient behavior was passive was in violation of the inmate's rights. Several inmates testified of routine use of mace in 130 incidents during a three year period. (Correctional Institution, Waupun, Wisconsin)

Bush v. Ware, 589 F.Supp. 1454 (E.D. Wisc. 1984). Two correctional officers ordered to pay prisoner $2,000 for using excessive force. Although the prisoner had swung a towel with a metal object wrapped inside at the guards, testimony at the trial indicated that the guards entered the cell with a flashlight and ankle restraints with the intent to use them as weapons.

The county was not found liable, even though no written policy existed, because it had advised all guards to use minimal force. (Waukesha County Jail, Wisconsin)

Gibson v. Babcock, 601 F.Supp. 1156 (N.D. Ill. 1984). Supervisors liable for detainee beating. A federal district court has held supervisors responsible for failing to protect a detainee from an assault by another prisoner. The court found that knowledge of a history of violence within a jail, rather than a specific risk of harm to a particular prisoner, was enough to hold the supervisors liable. The court found that the eighth amendment proscription against cruel and unusual punishment does not apply to pretrial detainees, and that a detainee need not demonstrate deliberate indifference to state a claim for denial of medical care under the due process clause of the eighth amendment. (Lake County Jail, Waukegan, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
EXCESSIVE FORCE

Raley v. Fraser, 747 F.2d 287 (5th Cir. 1984). Arrestee awarded only $1,000 for claims of alleged excessive force during arrest and detention; court determines plaintiff is not considered "prevailing party" for purposes of attorney's fees. The United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit has affirmed the decision of a federal district court in a civil rights action against two police officers.

The plaintiff, Robert Dean Raley, was arrested for public intoxication by two Amarillo police officers (Thomas Fraser and Gary Trupe). The officers observed Raley knock over a sign after leaving his car at 1:00 a.m., and in the ensuing encounter Raley was not cooperative.

Raley was booked at the police station, and officer Fraser applied choke holds on Raley four times during the process. Raley's arms were bruised, his face scraped, and the handcuffs raised welts on his wrists. There was no permanent injury.

Raley filed civil rights actions, under Section 1983, U.S.C.A. The district court found that Officer Fraser acted "overzealously" rather than maliciously, and therefore the plaintiff was not entitled to punitive damages under Section 1983.

Raley was awarded $1,000 as actual damages for pain and mental suffering, after the court found that Fraser's actions were not wanton or malicious. The damages were awarded on a state tort claim, the court finding against his Section 1983 claim. Raley appealed, arguing that the trial court erred in its findings. The Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed all aspects of the lower court decision. (Amarillo Police Department, Texas)

Slakan v. Porter, 737 F.2d 368 (4th Cir. 1984), cert. denied, 105 S.Ct. 1413 (1984). Prisoner awarded $32,500 for officer brutality; warden and other officials not immune and held liable for failing to supervise. An inmate injured when prison guards used high-pressure water hoses, tear gas and billy clubs to subdue him while he was confined in a one man cell brought a civil rights suit under Section 1983 against three guards and high ranking prison officials, alleging excessive force in violation of the eighth amendment, and that supervisory officials were deliberately indifferent to a known risk of harm. The federal district court found for the plaintiff inmate, awarding $32,500 damages. On appeal, the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed the lower court decision, holding that: (1) the guards' heavy-handed use of force crossed the line separating necessary force from brutality; (2) evidence established the supervisory liability of the warden, director of prisons and secretary of corrections; (3) supervisory officials were not entitled to qualified immunity since they had explicit legal guideposts to follow and were aware, or should have been aware, of a duty to ensure that instruments of control were not misused. Tuttle v. City of Oklahoma City, 728 F.2d 456 (10th Cir. 1984), reh'g denied, 106 S.Ct. 16 (1983). Reversed by City of Oklahoma City v. Tuttle, 105 S.Ct. 2427 (1985). Proof of single instance of unconstitutional activity not sufficient to impose liability under Monell rule unless....

The widow of a man shot by a police officer brought a civil rights suit against the officer and his employer city. The federal district court held against the city but absolved the officer. On appeal (728 F.2d 456) the Court of Appeals for the Tenth Circuit affirmed the lower court decision. On appeal to the United States Supreme Court, the majority reversed the lower courts' decisions, holding that it was a reversible error to allow the jury to infer a thoroughly nebulous "policy" of "inadequate training" on the city's part from the single shooting incident in question and at the same time sanction the inference that the policy was the cause of the incident, thereby giving rise to liability under the Civil Rights Act of 1861.

To impose a civil rights liability on the city under Monell v. New York City Department of Social Services, 436 U.S. 658, for a single incident, the plaintiff must prove that the incident was caused by an existing unconstitutional municipal policy which can be attributed to a municipal policymaker. The existence of the unconstitutional policy and its origin must be separately proved and where the policy relied on is not itself unconstitutional, considerably more proof than the single incident is necessary in every case to establish both the requisite fault on the part of the municipality and the causal connection between the "policy" and the constitutional deprivation. The court also held that there must be an affirmative link between the training and adequacies alleged in the particular constitutional violation at issue. The court found that the fact that a municipal "policy" might lead to police misconduct is hardly sufficient to satisfy the Monell requirement for municipal liability under 42 U.S.C. Section 1983. City of Shepherdsville, Kentucky v. Rymer, 105 S.Ct. 3518 (6th Cir. 1985) (Memorandum Decision). Supreme court remands case for further consideration in light of Oklahoma city ruling. Ruling on Rymer v. Davis, 754 F.2d 198 (1984). City police were found by the federal district court to have used excessive force during the arrest of the plaintiff. The court of appeals upheld the finding of the lower court, including award of $32,000 compensatory damages against the police officer, $50,000 punitive damages against the city and $25,000 compensatory damages against the city. The appeals court ruled that the city's failure to train police officers regarding arrest procedures was a proper basis for liability in a civil rights action arising from injuries sustained by the arrestee, and that official acquiescence in police misconduct may be inferred from lack of training even in the face of only one incident of brutal misconduct. The Supreme Court vacated the appeals court decision, remanding it for further consideration in light of its decision in City of Oklahoma City v. Tuttle, 105 S.Ct. 2427 (1985). In that decision, the court ruled that proof of a single instance of unconstitutional activity is not sufficient to impose civil rights liability on a city under the Monell rule unless proof of the incident includes proof that it was caused by an existing unconstitutional municipal policy, which can be attributed to a municipal policymaker. RESTRAINTS Ferola v. Moran, 622 F.Supp. 814 (D.C. R.I. 1985). An inmate brought a civil rights action charging that defendants subjected him to cruel and unusual punishment by denying him psychiatric care and by cruelly and abusively shackling him to his bed. The United States District Court held that: (1) a record of care afforded the prisoner did not reflect denial of psychiatric care or deliberate indifference to his psychiatric needs; (2) shackling of the defendant violated the eighth amendment; (3) the director of Department of Corrections was liable; (4) the inmate was entitled to damages of $1,000 for physical and psychological injury suffered; and (5) shackling of the inmate warranted equitable relief. There was no medical monitoring, control, or supervision of the inmate during the twenty hours he was confined. Secondly, he was spreadeagled with almost no ability to move. The unpadded chains that were used caused nerve damage when he attempted movement in his agitated state. Because of no monitoring or supervision, he was denied use of a toilet for at least fourteen hours. Because the warden had set no policies that would safeguard inmates against the unconstitutional conduct of his subordinates, he was responsible for damages in the amount of $1,000 for the plaintiff's trauma, pain, and suffering. Judgment was also entered against a supervisor on duty who participated in the shackling. (Adult Correctional Institution, Rhode Island)

Madden v. City of Meriden, 602 F.Supp. 1160 (D. Conn. 1985). Police officers can be held liable under Section 1983 for beating mentally ill arrestee. The administrator of the estate of a mentally ill man who hanged himself while detained by police filed suit against two officers and the city, alleging that the officers beat the prisoner, denied him medical care for the resulting serious injuries and placed him alone in a cell where he hanged himself. The prisoner could not be observed in his cell because the television monitoring system was not operating, nor was there an audio monitoring system. The plaintiff further alleged that although the officers knew of previous suicide attempts they did not take away objects that the prisoner could use to injure himself. The defendants filed a motion for dismissal which was denied by a magistrate. On appeal, the federal district court affirmed the magistrate's order, finding that the police officers could be liable under Section 1983. (Meriden Police Lockup, Connecticut)

Marchese v. Lucas, 758 F.2d 181 (6th Cir. 1985), cert denied, 107 S.Ct. 1369. Court upholds $125,000 award for failure to train and discipline officers; sheriff and county held liable. The plaintiff alleged that he was beaten upon entering the detention area following his arrest, and that a deputy later opened his cell door, allowing another beating to be administered. A federal jury believed his story, awarding $125,000 to the plaintiff. Under the Michigan constitution, the sheriff is the law enforcement arm of the county and makes policy in police matters for the county. The court held that the government entity is responsible when the execution of a government's policy (in this case, brutality), inflicts an injury.

The plaintiff alleged that the county and the sheriff failed to train and discipline the officers and failed to order an investigation of the incident after it came to the attention of county officials. The sheriff claimed that he knew nothing of the incident until years later, just before the trial. The court ruled that even though the sheriff did not know of the incident, he should have known and found him jointly liable with the county. The county shared liability with the sheriff because of its close relationship with the sheriff, who was an elected official and made policy for the county. The county board of supervisors appropriated funds and established the budget for the sheriff's department. (Wayne County Jail, Michigan)

Peebles v. Frey, 617 F.Supp. 1072 (D.C.Mo. 1985). While guards were giving an orientation to new inmates, the plaintiff inmate shouted annoying language from his maximum security unit, disrupting the orientation procedure. Correctional officers attempted to quiet the inmate, who ultimately had to be moved to another cell. He grabbed one officer's shirt, causing scratch marks on the guard, at which time a fellow officer delivered a single blow with his fist smacking the inmate in the forehead. The inmate was handcuffed and placed in the cell. The court found the blow was not excessive force given the inmate's provocative behavior. (Missouri Correctional Center)

Rock v. McCoy, 763 F.2d 394 (10th Cir. 1985). City to pay $100,000 damages to prisoner for excessive force and failing to provide treatment while detained. The plaintiff was arrested by city police following a complaint by his mother-in-law who had called them because he was drunk. After following his car home, two officers grabbed his feet as he left his car, pulled him out and kicked him several times in the ribs, legs and face, and repeatedly slammed the car door against his shins. Upon admission to the city jail he received no medical treatment beyond wiping the blood from his nose. He was released the next day. A district court jury found for the plaintiff, awarding $100,000 actual damages against the city, $2,100 actual damages against each police officer, and $1,000 in punitive damages against each officer. On appeal, the Tenth Circuit Court of Appeals upheld both the verdict and the awards. (Chelotah, Oklahoma Police)

Thomson v. Jones, 619 F.Supp. 745 (7th Cir. 1985). A state prison inmate brought action under the Federal Civil Rights statute against correctional officers and warden seeking damages arising out of beating and hearing loss. The district court held that: (1) the guards' use of excessive force violated the inmate's eighth and fourteenth amendment rights; (2) a warden was not liable on ratification theory for failure to discipline guards; (3) an award of $25,000 was neither inadequate nor excessive compensation for permanent hearing loss; and (4) a punitive damages award of $10,000 against the guard who actually caused the hearing loss, and $5,000 against the guard who acquiesced in the first guard's use of force, was proper.

A prison guard's acquiescence and failure to intercede in another guard's beating of an inmate was proximate cause of the inmate's injuries, rendering the acquiescing guard jointly and severally liable with other guard for compensatory damages due inmate as result of consequent hearing loss. Wells v. Franzen, 777 F.2d 1258 (7th Cir. 1985). The 7th Circuit Court of Appeals refused to grant summary judgment to officials accused of shackling an inmate for nine days without consulting a psychiatrist or physician to determine if he was suicidal. The inmate admits that after five days a psychiatrist did interview him, but it was too "shallow" for the doctor to make an adequate decision as to his suicidal tendencies. He insisted to officials throughout that he was not going to kill himself. Long-term restraint decisions are appropriately made by psychiatric personnel. Short-term decisions are appropriately made by nurses and non-psychiatric physicians, noted the court. The plaintiff also alleged that during the nine-day period, he was not allowed to shower, have clean bedding, use the bathroom, have regular water access, send or receive mail, and that the restraints were applied carelessly. The court dismissed various claims and ordered others to proceed, primarily, concerning the shackling itself. (Menard Correctional Center, Illinois)

Albert v. DePinto, 638 F.Supp. 1307 (D.Conn. 1986). The plaintiffs brought a civil rights action against police officers and the city alleging use of excessive force by officers. The district court held that: (1) the city was not liable for damages under the civil rights statute for the acts of individual officers; (2) there was evidence from which a reasonable jury could have found that the officers either used unconstitutionally excessive force against one plaintiff or knew that other officers were using force but did nothing to stop them; and (3) a reasonable jury could have found sufficient evidence of pain and suffering experienced by plaintiffs, and reckless and callous disregard of constitutional rights to justify substantial compensatory and punitive damages.

A plaintiff who seeks to hold a municipality liable in damages under a civil rights statute must establish that an official policy or custom was cause of deprivation of constitutional rights. The city was not liable for damages because evidence established that police officers were provided with police department rules and regulations, stating that the use of physical and deadly force would be in accordance with current departmental directives and state statutes; that police officers were unaware of any recent "directives" on the subject of physical force that might have been issued by the police department; and that, while they received training in the appropriate use of physical force at the time they joined the police department they received no refresher courses. Burris v. Kirkpatrick, 649 F.Supp. 740 (N.D. Ind. 1986). An inmate brought action against a prison guard for injuries resulting when the guard threw hot water into the inmate's cell. The district court held that the guard who threw hot water into cell of two inmates following argument between guard and one inmate was liable to the nonoffending inmate for resulting injuries, as his act amounted to deliberate indifference to the inmate's constitutional rights. Where substantive constitutional rights are violated, damages can be presumed even in absence of discernible consequential damages. (Indiana State Prison)

THREATENING

Burton v. Livingston, 791 F.2d 97 (8th Cir. 1986). A prisoner stated a claim against a guard for cruel and unusual punishment. The complaint stated that the guard pointed a lethal weapon at the prisoner, cocked it and threatened him with instant death. The incident occurred immediately after the prisoner had given testimony against another guard in a Section 1983 action. The death threat was accompanied by racial epithets. In determining whether the conduct of a prison guard has impermissibly infringed the protected right of a prisoner, the court of appeals must consider need for guard's action, the relationship between that necessity and amount of force actually used, the degree of injury to the prisoner's retained rights, and whether the conduct was a good-faith effort to maintain discipline or engaged in maliciously and sadistically for the sole purpose of causing harm. H.C. by Hewett v. Jarrard, 786 F.2d 1080 (11th Cir. 1986). A juvenile, who had been confined at a juvenile detention center pending a trial on delinquency charges, brought action for imposition of isolation without notice or hearing, excessive length and conditions of isolation, unjustified and excessive force applied to him by superintendent of the center, and denial of medical care. The United States District Court awarded nominal damages on claims that isolation without notice and hearing and conditions of isolation violated due process and determined that the juvenile had not been deliberately deprived of medical attention, and that battery of the juvenile by the superintendent did not rise to a constitutional violation.

The juvenile appealed. The court of appeals held that: (1) the superintendent's battery of the juvenile violated the juvenile's liberty interests protected by the fourteenth amendment; (2) the superintendent was liable both personally and in his capacity as the center's superintendent for denying the juvenile medical care; (3) compensatory damages should have been awarded to the juvenile for imposition of isolation without procedural due process, for being a period beyond the maximum period set out in relevant regulations, and for his humiliation and dejection sustained as a result of such isolation; and (4) the superintendent's conduct warranted the award of punitive damages.

The due process clause forbids punishment of pretrial juvenile detainees. The conditions of a pretrial juvenile detainee incarceration affect interests protected by the fourteenth amendment rather than the eighth amendment.

The superintendent of the juvenile detention center shoved the juvenile and slammed him against a wall and a metal bunk of the isolation cell after the juvenile laughed at a prank of another detainee and protested imposition of isolation of that detainee. This violated liberty interests protected by the fourteenth amendment, where the juvenile had not threatened to harm any property, employees, or other detainees at the center. The juvenile's injuries required medical treatment, and the superintendent's act was one of a series intended to punish the juvenile rather than maintain discipline at the center.

In determining whether the injuries sustained by the juvenile from the conduct of the superintendent of the juvenile detention center violated the juvenile's liberty interests protected by the fourteenth amendment, the fact that the juvenile did not suffer broken bones and permanent disfigurement did not require dismissal of the juvenile's injuries as negligible.

A three-day refusal to provide medical attention to the juvenile detained at the juvenile detention center pending trial on delinquency charges was a reckless disregard of the juvenile's medical needs.

Instead of an award of nominal damages of one dollar, the juvenile, who had been a pretrial detainee at the juvenile detention center, should have been awarded compensatory damages for imposition of isolation without procedural due process, for being a period beyond the maximum period set out in regulations of the Florida Department of Health and Rehabilitative Services, and for his humiliation and dejection sustained as a result of such isolation, where the juvenile was isolated for several days, shackled and handcuffed to a metal bunk for part of that time, and deprived of virtually every physical or emotional stimulus. Justice v. Dennis, 793 F.2d 573 (4th Cir. 1986). The lower court's jury instruction, setting out a spectrum in which intentional conduct was contrasted with simple negligence and failing to suggest that conduct short of intentional wrongdoing, such as wantonness, recklessness, or gross negligence, was sufficient for imposition of liability, constituted reversible error in the pretrial detainee's action against a state highway patrol trooper for alleged unconstitutionally excessive force used while the detainee was held in the county courthouse jail. The source of constitutional protection against the use of excessive force on a pretrial detainee is the detainee's liberty interest in bodily security, grounded in the fifth and fourteenth amendments rather than the fourth amendment. The fundamental inquiry in all excessive force cases, regardless of protected interest's fourth, fifth, or eighth amendment origins, is whether the degree of force used against the arrestee was necessary to protect legitimate state interest and, thus, was permissible under all the circumstances. McCullough v. Cady, 640 F.Supp. 1012 (E.D. Mich. 1986). An inmate brought a civil rights action against a prison guard arising from an incident in which the guard shot the inmate. The prison guard and other defendants moved for judgment notwithstanding the verdict after the jury returned verdict for the inmate. The district court held that: (1) there was sufficient evidence for the jury to reasonably infer that the prison guard deliberately and wantonly inflicted pain upon the inmate in violation of the eighth amendment; (2) the prison guard did not enjoy qualified immunity from liability; and (3) the inmate was entitled to recover attorney's fees and costs.

An overwhelming weight of evidence was that the prison guard intentionally shot the inmate who did not pose a threat to the safety of anyone; therefore, the prison guard was not entitled to qualified immunity from liability in the inmate's civil rights action. McRorie v. Shimoda, 795 F.2d 780 (9th Cir. 1986). A prison inmate brought a civil rights action based on allegations that a prison guard attempted to plunge a riot stick into his anus during a strip search after a shakedown. The United States District Court dismissed the suit for failure to state a claim on which relief could be granted, and the inmate appealed. The court of appeals held that: (1) the inmate's allegations, if proved, stated an eighth amendment violation; (2) if true, the prison guard's alleged conduct amounted to deprivation of the inmate's liberty interest which rose to the level of a substantive due process violation; and (3) the availability of state court relief did not bar federal relief under Section 1983 for alleged prison guard brutality which constituted a deprivation of substantive due process. In determining whether a prison guard's conduct amounts to brutality and is therefore a liberty deprivation without due process, the court must look to such factors as a need for the application of force, the relationship between the need and amount of force that was used, the extent of the injury inflicted, and whether force was applied in a good faith effort to maintain or restore discipline or applied maliciously and sadistically for the very purpose of causing harm. Owens v. City of Atlanta, 780 F.2d 1564 (11th Cir. 1986). City not liable for prisoner death in police detention facility. The decedent was arrested while intoxicated by Atlanta police. He became disruptive while in custody and was placed on a wooden bench in the back of his cell. His arms were crossed in front of him and were cuffed to the bench; his ankles were locked in leg irons, stretched and attached to the cell wall (called the "stretch" hold position). He died from asphyxiation after he fell off the bench, with his face forward. The district court found that the individual officers were not liable in this civil rights suit for merely negligent conduct, and that the city was not liable for its policy, as there was no evidence that police had previously misused the restraining device. The appeals court affirmed. (Atlanta Bureau of Police Services, Detention Unit, Georgia)

U.S. Supreme Court

Whitley v. Albers, 106 S.Ct (1986). Supreme Court rules that use of lethal force to quell a prison disturbance does not violate constitutional rights. During a disturbance at the Oregon State Penitentiary a correctional officer was taken hostage and placed in a cell on the upper tier of a two tier cellblock. Attempting to free the hostage, prison officials devised a plan which called for a manager to enter the cellblock unarmed, followed by officers armed with shotguns; the officers were instructed to fire a warning shot, and to shoot low at any inmate who attempted to climb the cellblock stairs. After firing a warning shot, an officer shot a prisoner in the knee when he started up the stairs. The prisoner filed suit against prison officials alleging violation of his eighth and fourteenth amendment rights.

The federal district court ruled for the defendants, finding their "use of deadly force was justified under the unique circumstances of this case." The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit reversed the lower court decision. The U.S. Supreme Court reversed the appeals court decision, finding the use of force to be justified in this case.

The Court ruled that the infliction of pain in the course of a prison security measure is only an eighth amendment violation if it is "inflicted unnecessarily and wantonly." The Supreme Court found that the "deliberate indifference" standard for evaluating eighth amendment claims which was established in Estelle v. Gamble, 429 U.S. 427 (1976), is not sufficiently broad enough to be used to analyze deadly force claims associated with riot situations. Wantonness must consider if the force was applied as part of a good faith effort to maintain or restore discipline, or if it was applied maliciously or sadistically for the purpose of causing harm, as well as efforts made to temper the severity of the forceful response. Young v. City of Atlanta, 631 F.Supp. 1498 (N.D. Ga. 1986). Use of wrist and ankle cuffs on injured misdemeanor arrestee while receiving treatment at public hospital upheld. A federal district court upheld standard operating procedures of Atlanta, Georgia, which call for the use of wrist and ankle cuffs on injured arrestees who need to go to the hospital before jail. A female attorney had been arrested for violation of minor traffic laws, and had been injured in the accident which led to her arrest. She was taken to a local public hospital for treatment, and consistent with operating procedures of the police agency, she was taken in handcuffs and manacles. She claimed she was humiliated and embarrassed by being in public view for several hours at the hospital in these restraints.

The court noted that "...since most detainees treated at Grady [hospital] are brought there directly from the streets, there is no opportunity to screen and classify them to determine the potential for escape and for harm to others."

The federal court concluded that police procedures were justified by the security considerations associated with taking a pretrial detainee to a public hospital where emergency treatment was provided in public areas, stating that "...the use of physical restraints, as directed in the procedures, is also intended to allow efficient use of corrections officers and to avoid the expense of building a hospital detention facility or of requiring a corrections officer to accompany each detainee through the frequently lengthy hospital treatment process." Action was brought by federal inmates complaining of use of excessive force, performance of rectal searches, amount of time they had to spend in their cell, transfer procedures and various other conditions that had existed at prison since "lockdown" began. On objections to magistrate's report and recommendation, the district court held that: (1) restraining control unit inmates during legal visits did not violate their right of access to the courts; (2) rectal searches at the prison did not constitute unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain within the meaning of the eighth amendment; (3) restraining federal inmates to beds for prolonged periods without checking them every thirty minutes violated federal regulations but because incidents were isolated, there was no policy or practice of abuse and thus no constitutional violation requiring injunctive relief; (4) "out of cell time" granted federal prisoners for exercise and recreation did not violate the eighth amendment where the inmates in disciplinary segregation and protective custody were allowed five hours exercise per week outside their cells, and the prisoners in control unit were permitted seven hours exercise per week, and general population inmates received eleven hours of exercise per week; and (5) inmates had no right to a due process hearing before placement at and/or transfer to a maximum security federal prison. Brown v. Smith, 813 F.2d 1187 (11th Cir. 1987). Whether a prison guard's application of force to an inmate is actionable turns on whether that force was applied in a good faith effort to maintain or restore discipline. According to an appeals court, neither judge nor jury is free to substitute its own judgment for that of prison officials. A mere conclusory allegation by a prison inmate that a guard acted with malice when he placed his riot stick across the inmate's throat after the inmate refused to go back into his cell was not sufficient to establish the liability of the guard where the actual facts would not support a reliable inference of wantonness. Two inmates who were nearby filed a claim for using the tear gas without regard for their health and safety. The district court ruled that prison officials were reasonable in their use of tear gas because an effort had been made to open windows and ventilate the area where the chemical was to be thrown. The court found that using tear gas to regain control and free inmates was proper under emergency circumstances. According to the court, the fact that alternative methods, other than tear gas, were available to subdue riotous prisoners did not mean that use of tear gas constituted cruel and unusual punishment when prison officials otherwise acted in good faith and employed special precautions to minimize harmful effects of tear gas upon innocent bystanders. CHEMICAL AGENTS

Holloway v. Lockhart, 813 F.2d 874 (8th Cir. 1987). A federal appeals court disagreed with a lower court and ruled that an inmate could bring a federal suit for being forced to inhale tear gas sprayed by guards to subdue fellow inmates. The inmate claimed that he, along with about 20 other inmates, was injured while they were sleeping when guards sprayed a barrage of the chemical at disruptive inmates; this caused the fellow inmates to be forced to inhale the substance causing them to choke, pass out, suffer temporary blindness and breathing problems. James v. Alfred, 832 F.2d 339 (5th Cir. 1987). A federal appeals court affirmed a lower court decision that dismissed an inmate's claim that guards physically assaulted him when he made a request. According to the court, the event was at most, "an isolated incident" and the inmate had not suffered a "serious, debilitating or permanent injury." The claim was dismissed because it did not demonstrate conduct which violated any constitutional right. The level of force that is permitted in the pursuit of prison security is governed by the standard announced in Whitley v. Albers, 475 U.S. 312 (1987), which inquires "whether force was applied in a good faith effort to maintain or restore discipline or maliciously and sadistically for the very purpose of causing harm." Since there was no severe injury in this case, the court found that the claim was frivolous. (Texas State Prison)

O'Donnell v. Thomas, 826 F.2d 788 (8th Cir. 1987). According to a federal appeals court, it is not cruel and unusual punishment to bind an inmate to a hospital bed with leather restraints and metal handcuffs upon advice of a physician. An inmate incarcerated at a county jail complained of stomach pains and an inability to sleep. Sleeping pills were prescribed and the inmate was admitted to the hospital for tests where he was diagnosed as having an ulcer and was prescribed medication and a bland diet. The inmate attempted suicide when he returned to the jail by swallowing a number of hoarded sleeping pills. He was again hospitalized and the doctor ordered that physical restraints be used when necessary as a suicide precaution. He was bound by leather restraints around each wrist and ankle for most of the five days he was in the hospital, and for a six hour period on the second day of hospitalization, a second set of restraints, metal handcuffs, were added because he was belligerent, abusive and fighting. The inmate was constantly monitored for physical discomfort during the entire period he was restrained. Because the restraints were used on the advice of a physician and were no more severe than necessary to prevent the inmate from harming himself, the court found that the practice was constitutional. Pressly v. Gregory, 831 F.2d 514 (4th Cir. 1987). According to a federal court, a medical examination and a photograph taken of an inmate the day after an alleged assault were sufficient evidence to support the officers' version of the incident. The inmate plaintiff was being transferred from one prison to another when he resisted efforts to be handcuffed. He alleged that five officers fell on him "en masse" and beat him although he was offering only passive resistance. The court found that there was a need for the application of force since the inmate even admitted that it was applied against him only after he refused to cooperate and resisted efforts to be handcuffed. While the court noted that force justified at its inception may still cross the boundary of constitutionality if the level of coercion actually applied dramatically exceeds the amount needed to accomplish legitimate goals and causes unnecessary injury. It ruled that the force inflicted by the officers here was not of such an impermissible degree. While the inmate alleged his injuries caused pain for weeks following the incident, a medical examination and a photograph of appellate taken the next day revealed no indication of any physical injury. Although evidence did not support the arrestee's claim of excessive use of force by police officer, the officer was not entitled to award of attorney fees in civil rights action, as the fact that the arrestee was injured, possibly by a blow from police officer, was enough to allow him to bring suit and conduct discovery into officer's state of mind to determine existence of malice. The arrestee's belief that a police officer attempted to keep him in jail in order to hide his injuries from others was sufficient to permit him to bring claim for unreasonable detention against police officer, so that the officer was not entitled to award of attorney fees even though officer prevailed on the merits. Tyler v. White, 811 F.2d 1204 (8th Cir. 1987). According to a federal appeals court, the lower court properly admitted as evidence in a civil rights suit brought by inmates under sections 1981 and 1983 a photograph of a fatally stabbed prison guard to challenge inmates' claims that they were physically injured in violation of constitutional rights. The appellate court explained that the photograph depicted the seriousness of the disturbance prison officials were up against in a way in which testimony could not match. On appeal the inmates had also claimed that the magistrate erred in refusing to grant a mistrial when defense counsel told jurors that one inmate refused to undergo a lie detector test. A mistrial was unnecessary, said the court, because the magistrate properly instructed the jury to disregard the question. The magistrate may have erred in allowing defense counsel to argue to the jury that plaintiffs failure to call certain witnesses inferred that their testimony would have been damaging, but the error did not constitute grounds for reversal, because the verdict was supported by additional evidence. Anderson v. Sullivan, 702 F.Supp. 424 (S.D.N.Y. 1988). An inmate sued correction officials alleging excessive use of force, in violation of his civil rights. The U.S. District Court held that officers did not use excessive force in handcuffing the inmate. According to the court, an inmate's constitutional protection against excessive force by correction officers is nowhere nearly so extensive as that afforded by common-law tort action for battery.

The court found that the officers did not use excessive force on the prisoner, in violation of his eighth amendment rights, when they pushed him into a bar and put his hands behind his back to apply handcuffs. The amount of force was not significantly disproportional to a legitimate goal of handcuffing the inmate while transporting him within the facility, and the incident resulted in little or no harm to the inmate.

According to the court, the fact that the inmate was confined to his cell pending a disciplinary hearing that did not transpire did not violate a liberty interest. The confinement was administrative, not disciplinary. (Sing Sing Correctional Facility, New York)

Bruscino v. Carlson, 854 F.2d 162 (7th Cir. 1988), cert. denied, 109 S.Ct. 3193. In a class action suit brought against the Marion Penitentiary in Illinois by inmates held in the Control Unit, the inmates claimed use of excessive force and other charges because they were subjected to rectal searches every time they left or re-entered the unit. The appeals court ruled that because inmates in the Control Unit require greater supervision than other prisoners, rectal searches can be legally performed on such inmates. Use of physical restraints during attorney visitation and limited out-of-cell time was also upheld by the federal district court. The court found that extraordinary security measures employed in a maximum security federal prison, such as limitation of time spent outside cells, denial of opportunities for socialization, handcuffing, shackling, spread-eagling and rectal searches were reasonable measures in view of the history of violence at the prison and the incorrigible character of the inmates and thus it did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment. Further, the court found that the transfer of prisoners to a maximum security federal prison did not result in incremental deprivation so great as to constitute actionable deprivation of natural liberty and thus require a hearing. Clark v. Evans, 840 F.2d 876 (11th Cir. 1988) A civil rights action was brought, based on the fatal shooting of a prisoner who was attempting to escape from the state prison, against the Commissioner of the State Department of Corrections, the prison warden, the guard who fatally shot the prisoner, and guards who were on yard or in building complex nearby when prisoner attempted to escape. The district court dismissed all claims against all defendants in their official capacities, granted summary judgment for the commissioner and guards located near the prisoner, but rejected qualified immunity defense asserted by the warden and guard who shot the prisoner in their individual capacities. The warden and the guard who shot the prisoner appealed, and the plaintiffs appealed the dismissal of the other defendants. The appeals court held that: (1) a reasonable officer could have believed that the guard's actions in shooting the prisoner were lawful, and accordingly, the guard was entitled to qualified immunity for use of deadly force; (2) the commissioner was not liable on theory he had instituted and perpetuated a policy that committal orders of state court judges would be ignored and that the prisoner's death occurred as a direct result of the prisoner not having been transferred to a mental hospital pursuant to involuntary commitment order, and (3) nearby guards were not liable on the theory that they were deliberately indifferent to a prisoner's safety or serious medical needs. The court noted that, in determining whether a state prison guard who fatally shot a prisoner who was attempting to escape was entitled to qualified immunity in a civil rights action based on the shooting, the proper inquiry was not whether escape could reasonably have been prevented in a less violent manner, but rather, whether a reasonable officer with information available to the guard who shot the prisoner could have believed that less violent means were not reasonably available (see Anderson v. Creighton, 107 S.Ct. 3034 (1987). The plaintiffs also argued that the use of deadly force in this instance was unlawful, since the law forbids the execution of insane persons. The court disagreed, noting that the inmate was not executed (killed as a punishment), but instead was shot in an effort to prevent escape. (Georgia State Prison)

Francis v. Pike County, Ohio, 708 F.Supp. 170 (S.D. Ohio 1988). The administrator and personal representative of a deceased arrestee brought a Section 1983 action against the city, county, and their law enforcement officers for the failure to remove a belt of the deceased arrestee who then committed suicide while in a cell. The defendants moved for a summary judgment. The district court found that the police officers did not use excessive force in arresting the arrestee. It was also found that neither the city nor its police officers were liable for the arrestee's suicide while in the county jail following the arrest assisted by the city officer. Since the arrestee was not in their custody or control at the time of the suicide, the county deputies' failure to remove the drunk driving arrestee's belt before placing him in a holding cell, without knowledge or reason to know that the arrestee would commit suicide, did not impose a civil rights liability on them after the arrestee committed suicide. The lack of allegations or evidence that the county was grossly negligent in training its law enforcement officers precluded its liability. (Pike County Jail, Ohio)

Parker v. Asher, 701 F.Supp. 192 (D. Nev. 1988). An inmate brought a civil rights action against a correctional officer. The inmate's allegations, that the correctional officer threatened to shoot him with a "taser gun" for no legitimate penological reason and in fact pointed the loaded gun at him, and that the inmate suffered great anguish and distress due to his fear that the officer would in fact subject him to immediate bodily harm, stated a cognizable claim for violation of the inmate's eighth amendment right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment. The court stated that prison guards cannot aim "taser guns" at inmates for the malicious purpose of inflicting gratuitous fear. (Nevada State Prison)

Unwin v. Campbell, 863 F.2d 124 (1st Cir. 1988). A prison inmate sued state and local police officers seeking damages for injuries sustained during the quelling of a disturbance. Defendants moved for summary judgment on the grounds of qualified immunity. The U.S. District Court denied the motion as to certain defendants, and they appealed. The appeals court reversing in part and affirming in part, found that two of the defendants were entitled to qualified immunity, absent evidence that they had any contact with the defendant; but there were issues of fact, precluding summary judgment in favor of the remaining defendants, as to the magnitude of the disturbance in question.

Allegations of the complaint concerning the attempt to subdue a boisterous inmate did not support the inference of a prison disturbance of such magnitude that it indisputably posed significant risks to the safety of the inmates and prison staff, and thus to state an eighth amendment claim. An inmate not involved in the struggle, who was injured by police action, did not have to allege that the defendant policemen and state troopers acted maliciously and sadistically for the very purpose of causing harm. Allegations of the complaint to the effect that one or more of the state troopers or police officers seriously injured the prison inmate when they unjustifiably struck him several times while he was innocently standing in the dayroom observing an isolated struggle between two inmates, if true, would tend to show that the officers violated clearly established law and thus were not entitled to qualified immunity. When prison officials are responding to an outbreak of violence, they cannot be expected to measure nicely the precise amount of force necessary to restore order. Where the institutional security is not at stake, the officials' license to use force is more limited, and to establish an eighth amendment liability, an injured inmate need not prove malicious and sadistic intent, and liability will be imposed where the officials' actions involved wanton and unnecessary infliction of pain as determined by the need for the application of force, the relationship between the need and the amount of force used, and the extent of the injury inflicted. An inmate brought a Section 1983 action alleging that he was beaten without cause by a guard wielding a pipe and was sprayed with mace by other guards on another occasion, also without cause. The federal appeals court held that while "severe injury" may not have been an element of constitutional tort, judgment against inmate would not be disturbed, where the inmate himself proposed the instruction informing jury that "severe injury" was an essential element. The court noted that the standard set forth in Whitley v. Albers, 475 U.S. 312 (1986), for cases in which jailers shoot prisoner, must apply to beating prisoners as well. An inmate sued a warden and other after his arm was broken by a correctional officer trying to force him back into his cell. While the question of whether the officer intentionally or accidentally broke Williams' arm had not yet been decided, it was clear, said the court, that the warden could not be held liable. Unless the inmate could show that the officer was implementing a policy or practice established by the warden or that a history of widespread abuse or improper behavior had put the warden on notice of the need to take corrective action, the warden could not be held liable. In a federal civil rights action under Section 1983, a supervisor is not automatically liable for the acts of his subordinates, the court said. (West Jefferson Correctional Facility, Alabama)

An inmate brought a class action against the former New York Governor and state officials and correctional personnel to recover for injuries resulting from police action to quell a prison uprising and to rescue hostages. The U.S. District Court dismissed the action against the Governor's estate, and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed the decision and found that the Governor's involvement was insufficient to establish a Section 1983 liability, and the Governor enjoyed qualified immunity. The Governor's involvement in the decisions and formulation and implementation of the plan to retake the prison from the inmates and to rescue the hostages was insufficient to establish a Section 1983 liability for injury to the inmate, even though the Governor was abreast of the events. The Governor ratified the decision by the New York State Commissioner of the Department of Correctional Services to abandon negotiations, to order the state police to formulate a plan to regain control of the prison, and to approve commencement of the actual retaking. Arnold v. Jones, 891 F.2d 1370 (8th Cir. 1989). An inmate sued prison officials to recover for damages suffered when he was beaten by another inmate. The court of appeals held that unarmed corrections officers had no constitutional duty to physically intervene in an assault by one inmate on another, when intervention may cause them serious injury or worsen the situation. Bolin v. Black, 875 F.2d 1343 (8th Cir. 1989), cert. denied, 110 S.Ct. 542. State prisoners sued prison officials and corrections officers claiming that beatings by prison guards following a prison riot violated their constitutional rights. The district court ruled in favor of the prisoners awarding both compensatory and punitive damages. The appeals court affirmed the lower court decision, finding that the evidence was sufficient to hold prison supervisors liable for excessive use of force by other corrections officers. During an interview with an inmate, the associate warden made reference to the possibility of retaliatory punishment. He took no steps to avoid the possibility of retaliatory punishment, even though he knew or should have known that flaring tempers among prison guards would lead them to retaliate against inmates. He chose not to ride on the bus transporting inmates from one prison to another despite his knowledge that a guard had been killed and that the entire staff, including the officers riding with the inmates, were upset. There was sufficient evidence to hold the captain of corrections officers liable for excess use of force against the prisoners by subordinate corrections officers following the prison riot. Inmates testified that the captain was present when guards removed certain inmates from their cells to administer beatings on the laundry table. The captain himself testified that he saw five or six inmates brought to rotunda of prison and laid on the laundry table and that he gave the order that he did not want anybody killed. The captain's later statement to highway patrol investigators that "I've seen a lot more ass kicking than was done in there" implied that he knew of beatings. A jury found in favor of the plaintiffs and assessed damages against each defendant. One inmate was awarded $9,500 compensatory damages and $56,000 punitive damages, the second $14,500 compensatory and $74,000 punitive damages, and the third $14,000 compensatory and $73,000 punitive damages, for a total award of $241,000. Campbell v. Grammer, 889 F.2d 797 (8th Cir. 1989). Inmates brought an action against prison officials alleging that their constitutional and statutory rights were violated during a prison lockdown. The U.S. District Court entered a judgment in favor of the inmates and awarded attorneys' fees; the defendants appealed. The court of appeals found that the supervising lieutenant's failure to issue jumpsuits pursuant to his superiors' order after a shakedown did not rise to the level of cruel and unusual punishment. The lieutenant had been assigned to supervise the adjustment center for the first time on the day of the lockdown and thus, the failure to carry out his superiors' orders was due to misunderstanding, inexperience, oversight, inadvertence or recklessness. Courts should ordinarily accord actions of prison officials much deference; courts should be especially reluctant to interpose their hindsight when challenged conduct occurred during a prison disturbance. When faced with the necessity of using force to quell a disturbance, prison officials are compelled to balance competing concerns of insuring safety of inmates and staff and of using the least confining or least dangerous measure to control those who threaten the safety of others. Given the fact that such decisions are necessarily made in haste and under pressure, measures taken will not be held to be an eighth amendment violation if imposed in a good faith effort to maintain or restore discipline and not maliciously and sadistically for the very purpose of causing harm. The court found however, that the inmates had been intentionally, rather than accidentally, sprayed with the high-powered firehoses, which resulted in an eighth amendment violation. As a result, they upheld awards to the inmates of $750, $100 and $50. (Nebraska State Penitentiary)

Davis v. City of Ellensburg, 869 F.2d 1230 (9th Cir. 1989). A civil rights action was brought against the city and police officers for injuries suffered by an arrestee who died. The U.S. District Court granted a summary judgment for the city, and the plaintiffs appealed. The appeals court found that the city was not liable on the theory it had a policy of inadequate training of officers, inadequate medical treatment of prisoners, or a deliberate indifference to the use of excessive force. The city's failure to have written policy regarding the proper use of force in a misdemeanor arrest did not amount to delegation of policymaking authority to rank and file police officers so as to render the city liable in a civil rights action for injuries suffered by an arrestee by transforming the individual police officers into municipal policymakers whose decisions in individual cases might give rise to a municipal liability. The court also found that the city was not liable on the theory it had a policy or custom of inadequately supervising its police officers. According to the court, the plaintiff cannot prove the existence of a municipal policy or custom for purposes of a civil rights action under Section 1983 based solely on the occurrence of a single incident of unconstitutional action by a nonpolicymaking employee. The city was not liable for injuries suffered by the arrestee who died on the theory the city had a policy or custom of inadequately supervising its police officers; the chief sent an officer with an alleged alcohol problem and an officer with an alleged mental disorder to the police psychologist for an evaluation. The chief allowed the officers to remain on active duty only after receiving written reports that both were competent to perform their duties, and the chief received informal reports that the officer with an alleged alcohol problem was no longer drinking, so the evidence did not establish that the chief acted with deliberate indifference in failing to remove the officers from active duty. Henry v. Perry, 866 F.2d 657 (3rd Cir. 1989). A prisoner brought a civil rights action against a prison guard arising out of the prison guard's use of deadly force in attempting to prevent the prisoner's escape. In his complaint, the plaintiff alleged that, while being returned to Pittsburgh from a track meet and upon arrival at Pittsburgh and believing the officers in charge of him including the defendant to be unarmed, he proceeded to effect an escape and that thereupon "Mr. Perry commenced to fire 5 or 6 shots at me without ordering me to stop or that he had a weapon and would shoot to kill." One of the shots wounded the plaintiff in the arm. He completed his escape but was subsequently recaptured. The U.S. District Court denied the prison guard's motion for summary judgment and the prison guard appealed. The court of appeals, reversing and remanding with directions, found that the prison guard was entitled to qualified immunity from liability. The appeals court stated that the use by prison guards of deadly force on an escapee may be cruel and unusual punishment within the meaning of the eighth amendment but where the escapee has committed crime involving the infliction of serious bodily harm, deadly force may be used as necessary to prevent an escape and if, where feasible, some warning has been given. Using deadly force appeared to be the "only means of preventing his escape and even that did not actually do so." Where an escapee has committed a crime involving the infliction of serious bodily harm, the court stated, citing Tennessee v. Garner, 471 U.S.1 (1985), such as the murder committed by the prisoner, deadly force may be used if necessary to prevent escape, and if, where feasible, some warning if given. Miller v. Leathers, 885 F.2d 151 (4th Cir. 1989). A prison inmate brought a civil rights action alleging the use of excessive force by a prison officer. The U.S. District Court entered a summary judgment against the inmate, and he appealed. The appeals court affirmed and found that the officer's striking the inmate three times with his baton did not violate the eighth amendment. A white inmate called a black correctional officer a "slush-headed nigger," threatened him with physical harm and sexually insulted his mother. In addition, the inmate also refused an order to proceed through a cellblock exit, and turned around to confront the officer. At this time, a brief scuffle occurred, during which the officer struck the inmate three times with his baton. The inmate then armed himself with a broomstick and charged the officer, but was subdued. He suffered a minor fracture on his right forearm, and filed a civil rights suit against the officer, alleging excessive use of force. Confrontations between correctional officers and inmates in the prison setting "are legion," the court stated. The test for use of excessive force against a convicted prisoner, as pointed out by the court, is based on the eight amendment's cruel and unusual punishment clause. Even if it may appear in retrospect that the degree of force used was unreasonable, this will not indicate cruel and unusual punishment unless the force was used merely to inflict "unnecessary and wanton pain." An inmate's father brought a Section 1983 action against a prison guard, administrator, and supervisors to recover for the shooting death of an escaping inmate. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion and found that using deadly force against a convicted, escaping inmate was not an unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain, did not violate the eighth amendment, and was within the guard's qualified immunity from Section 1983 liability. The guard tried to physically prevent the escape, and was prevented from doing so by the inmate's spear. He warned the inmate to desist, fired a warning shot, and fired the revolver after the inmate had jumped to the street outside the prison and started to run. The inmate's father failed to establish in the Section 1983 action that the training of guards and the use of firearms caused the death of the escaping inmate, that the policy on the use of deadly force deprived the inmate of constitutional rights, or that the administrator and supervisors were grossly negligent or deliberately indifferent. Smallwood v. Renfro, 708 F.Supp. 182 (N.D.Ill. 1989). A prisoner brought a suit against correctional facility officers for allegedly denying him medical treatment and using excessive force. The correctional officers moved for summary judgment. The district court found that the claims asserted against the defendants in their official capacities were barred by the eleventh amendment. The disputed issues of material fact precluded summary judgment on the prisoner's eighth amendment claim for deprivation of medical care and use of excessive force against the supervising officer. The chairman of the prison institutional board and the warden had no personal involvement in the alleged eighth amendment violations such as to render them potentially liable. The inferior officer who obeyed the superior's order not to take the prisoner to the hospital and the duty warden who deferred to the supervising officer's decision were entitled to qualified immunity. A genuine issue of fact as to whether the officer employed wanton and unnecessary excessive force precluded summary judgment in the officer's favor for an alleged incident in which he allegedly choked the prisoner and hit him with a radio while transferring the prisoner to a segregation unit. Neither the prison warden nor the prison institutional board chairman could have any personal responsibility for alleged eighth amendment violations of the prisoner's rights in allegedly denying him medical care or using excessive force, where neither was present during the events nor had any involvement in the violations themselves. Section 1983 could not render the warden personally liable simply because he supervised the alleged wrongdoers. (Joliet Correctional Center, Illinois)

USE OF FORCE

Adams v. Hansen, 906 F.2d 192 (5th Cir. 1990). A new test for Eighth Amendment excessive force claims, adopted by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, requires the showing of: 1) a significant injury; which 2) resulted directly and only from the use of force that was clearly excessive to the need, the excessiveness of which was; 3) objectively unreasonable; and 4) the action constituted an unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain. Applying this standard, the appeals court overturned a trial court's dismissal of a prisoner's complaint as frivolous. The allegation that a prison guard smashed a prisoner's fingers in a small opening on a cell door, requiring stitches in two fingers, stated a claim for use of excessive force. The inmate also claimed that the defendant guard, "in an act of gratuitous brutality," grabbed and twisted his right arm in an attempt to break it. The court found that these allegations stated the occurrence of a significant injury resulting from the defendant's use of excessive force that was objectively unreasonable and done for the sole purpose of inflicting unnecessary pain, and therefore the complaint should not have been dismissed. A lawsuit was filed against the prison warden and prison staff officers by an inmate who claimed his constitutional rights were violated through excessive use of force and the failure to provide due process. The federal appeals court found that the amount of force used by officers was appropriate based on the prison's security interest in maintaining order and the minimal injuries sustained by the inmate. According to the court, the inmate's civil rights actions failed to support the reasonable inference of wantonness in infliction of pain required to establish a constitutional violation. There was undisputed evidence that the inmate created a disturbance, which necessitated the use of force, and although other inmates' affidavits attested to guards grabbing the inmate by the throat and pushing him against bars, there was no other evidence supporting the inmate's claim that an officer struck him with a night stick. The inmate's medical records contained no report of head injuries or treatment for pain following the incident. (Augusta Correctional and Medical Institution, Georgia)

Cawthon v. City of Greenville, 745 F.Supp. 377 (N.D. Miss. 1990). Plaintiffs brought a suit against a city under Section 1983, alleging their constitutional rights were violated pursuant to municipal policy when they were assaulted by a desk sergeant after they were brought to the station to be booked on various misdemeanor charges. On the defendant's motion for summary judgment, the U.S. District Court found that the city could not be held liable under Section 1983 for the desk sergeant's assault on the arrestees, based on the assertion that the city knew of the sergeant's alleged propensity for violence, yet failed to take sufficient steps to protect the public, absent evidence of deliberate indifference on the part of the city. Through the police chief, the city consistently implemented reasonable safeguards to respond to each new bit of information it received about the sergeant, and although the chief underestimated the sergeant's irascibility, his error did not rise to a level of deliberate indifference. The police chief's failure to deliver a more adequate reprimand to the desk sergeant on a prior occasion could not be construed as a conscious policy decision, custom or practice which could be the basis of municipal liability. It was also found that the failure of witnessing officers to intervene to prevent the desk sergeant's use of excessive force against arrestees, and the police chief's later failure to issue reprimands for that passivity did not establish a police department practice of abusing or tolerating excessive force against the general public, sufficient to constitute a municipal custom, for purposes of Section 1983 liability. Though the officers did not physically confront the desk sergeant, who was a superior officer, one officer shouted his disapproval of the desk sergeant's actions and several others immediately went to the radio room to summon the lieutenant. CHEMICAL AGENTS

Colon v. Schneider, 899 F.2d 660 (7th Cir. 1990). An inmate brought a Section 1983 action, alleging that a corrections official violated his rights under the due process clause of the fourteenth amendment when the official used chemical mace to compel him to submit to a strip search during the course of the inmate's transfer from one area of a correctional institution to another. The U.S. District Court issued an injunction prohibiting the official from using mace solely to compel strip searches incident to the transfer of inmates within the institution, and the official appealed. The inmate cross-appealed, arguing that he was entitled to one dollar in compensatory damages and that the district court erred in vacating the jury's award of punitive damages. The appeals court found that Wisconsin regulations governing the use of mace in prisons do not create a federally-protected liberty interest on behalf of inmates, and even if such regulations did create a liberty interest, the inmate failed to satisfy his burden that he was maced in the absence of constitutionally required procedural safeguards. The appeals court also found that, under the eleventh amendment, the district court lacked jurisdiction to adjudicate the claim which was nothing more than an allegation that the prison official violated state law, or to enjoin the official from engaging in the allegedly violative conduct. According to the court, in order for state regulations to create a constitutionally and protected liberty interest, the regulations must employ language of an unmistakably mandatory character, requiring that certain procedures "shall," "will," or "must" be employed, and that the challenged action will not occur absent specific substantive predicates. Gaudreault v. Municipality of Salem, Mass., 923 F.2d 203 (1st Cir. 1990), cert. denied, 111 S.Ct. 2266. A pretrial detainee brought an action against arresting officers, the city, the mayor, the city solicitor, the police chief, and others to recover for alleged use of excessive force during the arrest. The U.S. District Court entered summary judgment against the detainee, and he appealed. The court of appeals found that the police officers used objectively reasonable force when arresting the visibly intoxicated bar patron and complied with the Fourth Amendment. The patron actively resisted arrest by flailing arms, striking one officer in the face, and causing severe injury to the ligaments in the officer's thumb, and the officers never drew weapons and did not cause any noticeable injury to the patron. Gilbert v. Collins, 905 F.2d 61 (5th Cir. 1990). A state prisoner sued a prison officer, claiming that he kicked the door to the food slot of his cell, cutting off the tip of his finger, which had to be attached by plastic surgery. The prisoner testified that the officer's action was intentional. At a hearing to determine whether to dismiss the suit as frivolous, a prison employee testified that a prison use-of-force report exonerated the officer. A magistrate relied on this testimony, as well as a medical report and internal affairs report stating that the officer's action in kicking the slot door was a reflex unintentional act, and dismissed the suit as frivolous, finding that the act was performed without malice. The appeals court reversed. It agreed that if there was no malice in the officer's action, it being unintentional, the prisoner could not prevail. But the court was troubled by the "factual underpinnings of the finding." The use of hearsay witnesses and "unauthenticated records" to counter the prisoner's testimony was improper, and the court ordered further proceedings in the matter. Huguet v. Barnett, 900 F.2d 838 (5th Cir. 1990). An inmate in a state correctional facility filed a civil rights lawsuit against two officers, alleging that they assaulted him during a routine cell search. The trial court dismissed the excessive force claim. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, in upholding the dismissal, adopted a new standard for assessing Eighth Amendment excessive force claims. In order for a plaintiff to prevail on excessive force claims, the court held, he/she must prove: 1) a significant injury, which; 2) resulted directly and only from the use of force that was clearly excessive to the need, the excessiveness of which was; 3) objectively unreasonable, and; 4) the action constituted an unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain. The court must ask whether the force was "applied in a good faith effort to maintain or restore discipline or maliciously and sadistically for the very purpose of causing harm." If this last element is missing, there is no liability, the court stated, regardless of "how significant the injury, how far in excess of the need, and how unreasonable" the force used. In this case, the court found that the prisoner was "recalcitrant" during the cell search and that officers responded with force that was "in accord with the need." Additionally there was no evidence of the "wanton infliction of pain." The claim was therefore properly dismissed. (Texas Department of Corrections)

Miller v. Leathers, 913 F.2d 1085 (4th Cir. 1990), cert. denied, 111 S.Ct. 1018. An inmate brought a Section 1983 action against a prison guard claiming use of excessive force in violation of the Eighth Amendment rights. The U.S. District Court granted the guard's motion for summary judgment, and the inmate appealed. The court of appeals affirmed. On rehearing, the court of appeals found that genuine issue of material fact existed, precluding summary judgment for the prison guard on the inmate's claim of use of excessive force, on whether the inmate provided the guard with anything more than verbal provocation before the official struck the inmate with a riot baton resulting in a fractured arm and swollen elbow; verbal provocation alone did not justify the response. The U.S. District Court dismissed the action, and the inmate appealed. The court of appeals found that the magistrate improperly applied a "severe injury" test, rather than "significant injury" test in recommending dismissal of the inmate's civil rights claim against the prison guards. In addition, it was found that the inmate did not have a constitutional right to have the guards criminally prosecuted, for purposes of his civil rights claim against the sheriff who refused to file charges. Ospina v. Department of Corrections, State of Del., 749 F.Supp. 572 (D. Del. 1990). An arrestee brought a civil rights action against the arresting officer. On the defendants' motion to dismiss, the district court found that the arresting officer accused of using excessive force was not entitled to qualified immunity from Section 1983 liability. The arrestee's right to freedom from excessive force in effecting an arrest was "clearly established" at the time of the challenged conduct, and a reasonable officer would not have believed that use of such force in face of no resistance was lawful. Rubins v. Roetker, 737 F.Supp. 1140 (D. Colo. 1990). A state inmate filed a civil rights action alleging violations of his eighth amendment right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment. The district court dismissed the case, finding that the prison guards' use of force against the inmate, including the use of a stun gun, did not involve the unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain so as to constitute cruel and unusual punishment. The inmate had become very loud and aggressive and expressed the desire to get into a physical altercation in a violent setting, and the guards' use of force to subdue the inmate did not involve the unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain. The inmate, who had filed seven motions in conjunction with his civil rights action and 15 other cases of which 14 had been dismissed, was ordered to have future complaints or petition "screened" by the Department of Corrections legal access attorney before being permitted to file them as a sanction for his consistent and repeated abuse of the legal system. He was enjoined from raising the same or similar allegations in subsequent actions, and was restricted to filing one action per year unless he claimed he was about to be subjected to immediate physical harm. Simpson v. Hines, 903 F.2d 400 (5th Cir. 1990). A prisoner's survivors brought a Section 1983 action against police officers to recover for the death of a prisoner from alleged use of excessive force and lack of medical care. The officers moved for summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity. The U.S. District Court denied the motion, and the officers appealed. The court of appeals, affirming in part, reversing in part, and dismissing in part, found that the officers who had entered the cell were not entitled to qualified immunity. The police officers were not entitled to qualified immunity in the 1983 action to recover for the death of the prisoner from asphyxia after being searched and subdued, even though no evidence indicated that each officer's actions caused severe injuries. The captain admitted placing the prisoner in a neck hold and exerting sufficient pressure to subdue him, another officer sat on the prisoner, a tape recording allegedly indicated the prisoner's screams and repeated cries for mercy and contained statements from which the trier-of-fact could infer malice, and the officers discussed beforehand how to handle the situation and functioned as a unit once inside the cell. The officers knew that the prisoner heavily exerted himself and was "strung out" on drugs, and the tape recording indicated that the officers paid scant attention to the prisoner's physical condition during the approximately five minutes between the lapse into silence and the officers' exit from the cell. Pretrial detainees brought a Section 1983 action alleging deliberate indifference and use of excessive force by the sheriff and deputies when quelling an escape attempt. Following a bungled, violent but brief attempted jailbreak, this action was brought under Title 42 U.S.C. Section 1983 against the Sheriff and three of his deputies, individually, and not in their official capacities. The court found that the force used in quelling the jailbreak by pretrial detainees was not excessive. The detainees had already rendered one jailor unconscious and when deterred in their attempt to escape, began hand-to-hand combat with officers. (Hardin County Jail, Texas)

Stenzel v. Ellis, 916 F.2d 423 (8th Cir. 1990). An inmate who was forcibly removed to an isolation cell brought a Section 1983 action against the jailers. The U.S. District Court granted summary judgment for the defendants, and appeal was taken. The court of appeals found that the guards use of force to remove the inmate from a regular cell to an isolation cell was justified, and thus did not constitute an Eighth Amendment violation. The inmate had been asked three times to uncover his head while sleeping and had finally unequivocally refused, and his size, slippery skin as a result of lotion on his body, and "passive resistance" made him awkward to move. It was also found that the chaining of the inmate to his bunk in the isolation cell, after he refused to remove an obstruction from the observation camera, did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment, in violation of the Eighth Amendment; restraint was accomplished without the use of force, and was the only way to prevent the inmate from breaking a rule once he made it clear that he had no intention of obeying it. Wesson v. Oglesby, 910 F.2d 278 (5th Cir. 1990). An inmate brought a civil rights action against state prison officers, alleging excessive use of force and denial of medical treatment. The U.S. District Court dismissed the action as frivolous, and the inmate appealed. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that the district court's findings were based on improper credibility determinations, but the inmate's allegations were insufficient to state a claim. For a prisoner to prevail in an excessive force claim, four elements must be proven: significant injury, which resulted directly and only from the use of force that was clearly excessive in need, excessiveness of which was objectively unreasonable, and the action constituted unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain. The inmate's allegation that a state prison officer handcuffed him so tightly that his wrists were swollen and bleeding was insufficient to state an excessive force claim against the officer, absent allegations suggesting that the officer's conduct constituted unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain. The inmate's allegation that a state prison officer placed him in a "choke hold" and applied sufficient pressure to cause him to briefly lose consciousness was insufficient to state a claim against the officer for use of excessive force, absent an allegation that the inmate suffered serious or permanent injury stemming from his momentary blackout. White v. Roper, 901 F.2d 1501 (9th Cir. 1990). The U.S. District Court granted summary judgment for the defendants, and the detainee appealed. The appeals court, affirming in part, reversing in part, and remanding, found that genuine issues of material fact existed on the deliberate indifference claim, but the detainee who alleged he suffered a cut wrist and bruises when the officers attempted to subdue him when he resisted being put into another inmate's cell failed to make a showing sufficient to establish use of force against him was excessive or brutal. Genuine issues of material fact existed as to whether an officer was deliberately indifferent to a pretrial detainee's personal safety or intended to punish the pretrial detainee by ordering him in a cell of another detainee who had a history of violent behavior, in spite of the plaintiff inmate's protests and threats by other inmate. The U.S. District Court dismissed the suit as frivolous following a Spears hearing, and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court, affirming in part, vacating and remanding in part, found that the correctional director and prison warden were properly dismissed from the suit; the prisoner adequately alleged a claim for use of excessive force; and the district court made an improper credibility determination in resolving the issue at the Spears hearing. The state prisoner adequately alleged a claim for use of excessive force while he was allegedly obeying an order to move from the cell, notwithstanding prison medical records which indicated that he failed to complain about the alleged injuries at the prehearing physical shortly after the incident; nothing in the prisoner's testimony refuted his allegation that his medical complaints resulted from the guard's actions in stepping on his feet and knees, and prison records could not be used to counter his testimony at the Spears hearing stage of proceedings. Wright v. Whiddon, 747 F.Supp. 694 (M.D. Ga. 1990) reversed 951 F.2d 297. A civil rights action was brought to recover damages for the wrongful death of and deprivation of the constitutional rights of a pretrial detainee, who was fatally shot while attempting to escape, against a city police officer, a city police chief, the city, and the county sheriff. On the defendants' motions for summary judgment, the district court found that the Fourth Amendment, rather than the Eighth Amendment, provided the standard for analyzing a claim that the pretrial detainee who was fatally shot while attempting to escape was subjected to unconstitutional use of excess force. The pretrial detainee had the status of a presumptively innocent individual, so was more akin to suspect than a convicted prisoner, and the Fourth Amendment's objective reasonableness standard accordingly applied. It was also found that genuine issue of material fact existed as to whether a reasonable police officer could believe the pretrial detainee who was attempting an escape posed a serious threat, thus rendering lawful the officer's action in fatally shooting the detainee, so as to preclude summary judgment on the issue of whether the officer was entitled to qualified immunity with respect to constitutional claims asserted under the civil rights statute Section 1983. The county sheriff who ordered the city police officer to shoot the pretrial detainee who was attempting the escape was not liable for violation of the fatally wounded detainee's constitutional rights, although it was argued that the sheriff intentionally authorized the commission of the unlawful act which resulted in the death and violation of constitutional rights. The sheriff did not have authority to command the police officer, and the police officer did not act pursuant to any command from the sheriff, but in reliance on his own training and city policy, in deciding to draw his gun and fire at the detainee. The appeals court reversed the lower court ruling, finding that the officer was entitled to qualified immunity. (Turner County, Georgia)

Brownell v. Figel, 950 F.2d 1285 (7th Cir. 1991). A drunk driving arrestee who suffered a paralyzing spinal injury brought a Section 1983 action against the arresting officers, alleging unreasonable use of force. The U.S. District Court granted summary judgment for the defendants, and appeal was taken. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that the officers had not used excessive force. How much force an officer may reasonably exert in the course of an arrest depends on the severity of the crime at issue, whether the suspect presents an immediate threat to the safety of the officers or others, and whether the suspect is actively resisting arrest or attempting to evade an arrest by flight. The officers who used force in an attempt to move the arrestee who was subsequently diagnosed as a quadriplegic due to a spinal injury were not liable. Even if the officers' conduct may have aggravated the arrestee's undiscovered spinal injury, the doctor had diagnosed the arrestee as merely intoxicated and the officers' attempts to arouse the arrestee from his apparent stupor were objectively reasonable. An inmate filed a Section 1983 action claiming that his right under the Eighth Amendment to be free from cruel and unusual punishment had been abridged by correctional officers as well as prison officials. The U.S. District Court awarded the inmate damages and attorney fees, and both parties appealed. The court of appeals affirmed the lower court decision which found that the inmate was entitled to damages for pain, suffering and humiliation, as a result of an incident in which corrections officers pinned him against a shower wall with a plexiglass riot shield following his refusal to give them his coat. The officers came at the inmate with such force that the handles of the riot shield broke. The inmate at no time acted in a hostile or threatening manner, he simply refused to give the officers his coat. The officers pinned the inmate against the wall and forced him to the floor, where they were able to remove his coat. The inmate suffered multiple abrasions and contusions, a swollen and bleeding nose and a "tender left clavicle." The trial court found that the two officers had used excessive force, and that the two supervisory officers also shared in liability for the injuries, one for ordering the two officers to proceed with the riot shield, and the other for failing to take any action to stop the attack. It awarded the inmate $1,250.00 for pain, suffering and humiliation, and $8,896.76 for attorney fees. (Iowa State Penitentiary)

The U.S. District Court found that the prisoner would be granted provisional leave to proceed in forma pauperis, conditioned on the payment of a partial filing fee of $20.36 in four monthly installments. It also found that the prisoner failed to adequately state a claim against the city for alleged civil rights violations by police officers; the city could not be held liable to the prisoner under a federal civil rights statute, where the prisoner merely alleged that the city was liable for actions of its police officers, and not for any policies executed or implemented by them. The prisoner's claims against police officers did not appear on their face to be totally frivolous or maliciously raised, and therefore the officers were directed to answer or otherwise respond to the prisoner's allegations; the prisoner alleged that the officers pulled him by the hair, struck him in the face and on the head several times with handcuffs, and threw the prisoner face down on the pavement. An arrestee brought a Section 1983 action against the city and a police officer, alleging excessive force in connection with her arrest and detention. The U.S. District Court granted the city and policeman's motion to dismiss, and the arrestee appealed. The appeals court found that the officer had not exerted excessive force by pulling the arrestee's arms through the bars of the jail cell to immobilize her while a matron performed a pat down search. The search was not intended as excessive force to punish the appellant, but rather was intended to meet the legitimate governmental interest of ensuring that the appellant was not in possession of contraband or any means by which to hurt herself. The bruises found on the body of the arrestee were insufficient to preclude summary judgment against her. There was no evidence as to where or how the bruises occurred or more specifically, that the bruises were a result of the search of the appellant in the jail cell. Further, the evidence was insufficient to show that the force used was not reasonable under the circumstances. The court also found that the arrestee had not been denied an opportunity to conduct an adequate discovery; she had approximately four months after the city filed a motion for summary judgment to do so. The inmate also failed to show that prison officials were deliberately indifferent to his serious medical needs and thus failed to sustain a claim for denial of medical care; a nurse examined the inmate for injuries while the movement team which was subduing him was still in the cell, and she returned later that evening and examined the inmate again. The court of appeals found that evidence that the inmate suffered extensive bruising and small lacerations after he was allegedly pushed down stairs by prison guards while handcuffed established the significant injury element of the inmate's Eighth Amendment excessive force claim. The court noted that "lasting harm" or "permanent injury causing disablement" need not be shown to constitute a "significant injury." In this case, the prisoner suffered widespread bruises, as well as lacerations and cuts "which left permanent, albeit small, scars." These injuries were enough to constitute "significant injury." Miller v. Glanz, 948 F.2d 1562 (10th Cir. 1991). An inmate brought a Section 1983 action against a sheriff, deputy sheriffs, an investigator, nurses, and others to recover for alleged use of excessive force, deliberate indifference to medical needs, false imprisonment, malicious prosecution, cruel and unusual punishment, biased investigation, discriminatory acts to prolong incarceration, negligent failure to train and certify deputies, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The U.S. District Court dismissed the claims, and the inmate appealed. The court of appeals found that the inmate's alleged resistance to a deputy sheriff's instructions to place his hands behind his back for handcuffing was an emergency, and, thus, the deputy's alleged actions of apprehending the inmate and moving him to a holding cell were subject to the wantonness standard and were not cruel and unusual punishment, where the deputy did not act maliciously and sadistically with the purpose of causing harm. However, deputy sheriffs' alleged acts of kicking, beating, jumping on, and choking the inmate almost to the point of death, were cruel and unusual punishment, even if the inmate posed a legitimate threat and the deputies were responding to an emergency, as the inmate claimed that he could barely breathe, suffered numerous bruises, and excreted blood, and allegations sufficiently stated that the deputies acted maliciously and sadistically with the purpose of causing harm. The alleged violation of the inmate's Eighth Amendment right to be free from use of excessive force would entitle the inmate to recover for emotional distress. The court also found that absolute immunity from Section 1983 liability based on testimony in a prior trial extended to the alleged conspiracy to present false testimony. However, the action did not involve the "deliberate indifference" required to establish cruel and unusual punishment under the Eighth Amendment; the officer had no intent to inflict harm, and his conduct did not show wantonness. Stewart v. McManus, 924 F.2d 138 (8th Cir. 1991). A prisoner brought a Section 1983 action asserting claims based on his disciplinary treatment by Iowa correctional authorities after he had been transferred from Kansas. The U.S. District Court found no

Eighth Amendment violation occurred when the prisoner was placed in plastic hand cuffs following a cell house disturbance, particularly where the prisoner's alleged wrist injury was slight. The inmate was flex-cuffed in a good-faith effort to restore discipline after a prison riot and only after guards ran out of ordinary handcuffs. (Iowa State Penitentiary)

Valdez v. Farmon, 766 F.Supp. 1529 (E.D. Cal. 1991). A prison inmate brought a civil rights action alleging that a prison official used unnecessary and wanton force in connection with an ordered strip search. On motions for, inter alia, summary judgment, the district court found that the inmate's allegations that prison officials used excessive force against her, allegedly using an electronic stun gun in connection with threatening the inmate to comply with a strip search, were properly analyzed under the Eighth Amendment, rather than the Fourth Amendment, as all of the allegations concerning compensable injury were directed at the means by which the search was undertaken, not the propriety of the search itself. Furthermore, the inmate's allegation that prison officials use of force against her would not be analyzed under the Fourteenth Amendment due process clause as unjustified deprivation of liberty, as such analysis would have been redundant where the case was analyzed under the Eighth Amendment. U.S. Appeals Court

Williams v. Burton, 943 F.2d 1572 (11th Cir. 1991). An inmate brought a Section 1983 action alleging constitutional violations in connection with his being kept in four-point restraints and gagged for over 28 hours. The U.S. District Court entered judgment against the inmate, and he appealed. The court of appeals found that the inmate's initial placement into four-point restraints was both prudent and proper, and the placement of gauze padding and tape over his mouth to prevent him from encouraging further unrest among other inmates in the segregation unit also did not violate the Eighth Amendment, as officials were faced with a volatile situation in the unit, requiring them to act promptly and effectively to prevent further spreading of disturbance. In addition, the continued use of the four-point restraints and gag on the inmate in the segregation unit for more than 28 hours after he had caused a disturbance, with brief intervals for eating, exercise and toilet use, did not violate the Eighth or Fourteenth Amendments. The inmate's history of persistent disobedience and the potential for disturbance in the unit justified the continued use of the restraints and gag until officers were reasonably assured that the situation had abated. Furthermore, the restraints and gag as applied to the inmate did not constitute "punishment," for purposes of the Fourteenth Amendment due process analysis, as the inmate's placement into restraints was a result of a sudden disturbance and, thus, not reflective. It was also found that the inmate failed to establish a serious medical need other than to be constantly monitored to prevent possible choking, or to demonstrate deliberate indifference by the nurse who examined him, as required to establish an Eighth Amendment violation as to medical care, as the nurse suggested that the inmate be allowed to exercise and use the toilet, and recommended that some of his clothing be removed because of the heat in his cell. Berry v. City of Phillipsburg, Kan., 796 F.Supp. 1400 (D.Kan. 1992). An arrestee brought an action against a police officer, the chief of police, and a city, alleging that excessive force was used in effecting her arrest. On the defendants' motions for partial summary judgment, the district court found that evidence raised a triable issue of fact as to whether the police officers used excessive force. Evidence indicated that the plaintiff was arrested for littering, attempted to evade arrest by fleeing to her home, and that the officers broke down the door to the arrestee's home, tackled and choked her, and dragged her from her home by handcuffs and her hair. In addition, the arrestee did not commit an offense of obstructing legal process under Kansas law when she initially refused tickets given to her by the first police officer, then threw them onto the ground, for the purposes of arrestee's claim that she was arrested without probable cause. There was evidence that the mayor was aware that the city chief of police had a history of being unnecessarily rough with persons he stopped, investigated or arrested. He communicated his knowledge to the city counsel and recommended that the chief be fired. This was sufficient to raise a question of fact regarding municipal liability for the police chief's alleged use of excessive force while effecting the arrest. Bogan v. Stroud, 958 F.2d 180 (7th Cir. 1992). A former inmate at a state prison filed an action under 42 U.S.C.A. Section 1983 against correctional officers, alleging the officers violated his rights under the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments by using excessive force against him. The U.S. District Court entered judgments for the inmate on jury verdicts, awarding him punitive but not compensatory damages, and the officers appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that evidence supported the jury's determination that prison officers used excessive force against the inmate in violation of the Eighth Amendment. Witnesses supported the inmate's claim that he was repeatedly stabbed, beaten and kicked after he had been disarmed and subdued. In addition, a physician confirmed that the inmate sustained numerous stab wounds. Punitive damages awards of $5,000 against one officer and $1,000 each against the other two officers were not excessive. (Stateville Correctional Center, Illinois)

Caldwell v. Moore, 968 F.2d 595 (6th Cir. 1992). A prison inmate who was subdued with a stun gun and straight jacket by police officers after refusing to obey jailers' orders brought a civil rights suit. The U.S. District Court granted summary judgment for the defendants and the inmate appealed. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that the police officers' use of the stun gun and straight jacket did not violate the Eighth Amendment. Furthermore, the inmate, who was shot by police officers with the stun gun while the officers attempted to quell his protests in an isolation cell, did not subsequently suffer deliberate indifference to his medical needs at the hands of the jailers, inasmuch as the inmate's injuries were not serious enough to require immediate medical attention, and the inmate produced no evidence that the jailers acted with a

Cummings v. Caspari, 797 F.Supp. 747 (E.D. Mo. 1992). An inmate brought an action against prison officials seeking damages and declaratory and injunctive relief, alleging that the officials denied him due process in certain disciplinary proceedings, subjected him to cruel and unusual punishment and refused him medical care. The officials moved for summary judgment. The use of force by officials did not subject the inmate to cruel and unusual punishment where the audio portion of a videotape contained no indication that officials beat the inmate or acted maliciously and sadistically. In addition, the episode lasted no longer than four minutes during which time the inmate voiced no grievances about the alleged beating. Handcuffs remained on the inmate solely because he refused to comply with instructions for removing them, and a medical examination just after the incident revealed that the inmate had only suffered a scratch from the use of force. Flowers v. Phelps, 956 F.2d 488 (5th Cir. 1992). An inmate brought a Section 1983 action against correctional officers who allegedly beat him, claiming an Eighth Amendment violation. The U.S. District Court entered judgment for the inmate, and appeal was taken. The court of appeals affirmed the decision, as the finding that the correctional officers violated the inmate's Eighth Amendment rights was sufficiently supported by evidence that they attacked the inmate without provocation or rational justification and that, while they did not cause any objectively significant injury, their intention was to cause the inmate sufficient pain to dissuade him from filing requests for administrative relief against them in the future. It was also found that the Eleventh Amendment did not preclude the inmate's claim against the correctional officers as state law did not mandate indemnification of officers in cases of wrongful, intentional acts. Frohmader v. Wayne, 958 F.2d 1024 (10th Cir. 1992). A former arrestee brought an action against the a sheriff's deputy alleging federal claims under the civil rights statute and state law claims. Summary judgment on the federal claims was granted by the U.S. District Court and the state claims were dismissed without prejudice, and the plaintiff appealed. The court of appeals found that there were issues of fact precluding summary judgment as to whether the defendant's behavior was objectively reasonable and whether the actions constituted excessive use of force under the former substantive due process standard, so as to preclude a claim of qualified immunity, but the plaintiff's assertions, unsupported by medical evidence, that his need for treatment for claustrophobia and agoraphobia following the arrest was acute, and thus there was a due process violation in failing to provide medical attention, were insufficient to raise a triable issue as to medical needs. Gabai v. Jacoby, 800 F.Supp. 1149 (S.D.N.Y. 1992). A prison inmate brought a Section 1983 action against prison officials, alleging that one official used excessive force and was otherwise deliberately indifferent to the inmate's medical needs, and that the inmate's due process rights were violated in a disciplinary proceeding. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court, adopting the report and recommendation of the U.S. Magistrate Judge, found that the inmate failed to show serious injury or that the defendant intended to cause physical harm. The inmate failed to establish that a correction officer used excessive force or was otherwise deliberately indifferent to the inmate's medical needs as a bruise allegedly caused by the officer was not a "serious injury," nor was it shown that the officer intended to cause physical harm. The officer stated without rebuttal that he called a nurse when he realized that the inmate might be suffering chest pains and shortness of breath. (Green Haven Correctional Facility, New York)

Giroux v. Sherman, 807 F.Supp. 1182 (E.D. Pa. 1992). An inmate brought a Section 1983 action against eight corrections officers, claiming that, on four separate occasions, various officers beat and tormented him without provocation. The district court found that the inmate was entitled to compensatory damages of $10,000 from one officer who beat him without provocation after refusing to allow the inmate into the prison kitchen to do his job. The inmate subsequently underwent surgery to repair damage caused by repeated blows to his kidneys. In addition, the inmate was entitled to compensatory damages of $10,000 and to award of $10,000 in punitive damages from a second corrections officer who forced the inmate, who had a medical history of heart trouble, to walk the long distance from the prison infirmary to his cell, all the while jabbing and hitting the inmate in the kidney area, despite the fact that the inmate had earlier been taken to the infirmary on a stretcher complaining of severe chest pains. The inmate was also entitled to an award of compensatory damages of $1,000 for pain, humiliation, and mental anguish from a third corrections officer who, without provocation, stepped on the inmate's sneaker and punched him in the throat and head, although the attack did not result in any serious physical injury. Finally, the inmate was entitled to damages of $5,000 from a fourth corrections officer who wantonly and without provocation beat the inmate in the kidneys, causing further injury. Hudson v. McMillian, 112 S.Ct. 995 (1992). A prisoner brought a federal rights suit, alleging his Eighth Amendment rights were violated by a beating he received from state correctional officers. The U.S. District Court entered judgment in favor of the prisoner, and the correctional officers appealed. The court of appeals reversed, holding that the prisoner had no claim because his injuries were minor and required no medical attention. The prisoner petitioned for certiorari. The U.S. Supreme Court, reversing the court of appeals decision, found that the use of excessive physical force against a prisoner may constitute cruel and unusual punishment even though the prisoner does not suffer serious injury. Whenever prison officials stand accused of using excessive physical force in violation of the cruel and unusual punishment clause, the core of judicial inquiry is whether force was applied in a good-faith effort to maintain or restore discipline, or maliciously and sadistically to cause harm. Hudson v. McMillian, 962 F.2d 522 (5th Cir. 1992). A prisoner brought a Section 1983 action, alleging that his Eighth Amendment rights were violated by a beating he received from state corrections officers. The U.S. District Court entered judgment in favor of the prisoner, and the corrections officers appealed. The court of appeals reversed, finding that the prisoner had no claim because his injuries were minor. The prisoner petitioned for certiorari. The U.S. Supreme Court, 112 S.Ct. 995 (1992), reversed. On remand, the court of appeals, affirming the decision, found that the prisoner was entitled to damages under Section 1983 for injuries sustained when prison guards kicked and struck him during a transfer to an administrative lock-down unit, even though the injuries sustained by the prisoner were minor. Jones v. Huff, 789 F.Supp. 526 (N.D.N.Y. 1992). An inmate brought a suit seeking damages for excessive use of force by corrections officers. The district court found that one corrections officer's punch to the inmate, administered in an effort to restore discipline in face of the inmate's deliberate disobedience in ignoring a repeated order to stop walking and in subsequently striking another officer, did not violate the inmate's Eighth Amendment rights. Similarly, an officer's headlock on the inmate as he escorted him to a holding room did not violate the Eighth Amendment, as the inmate continued to struggle as the officer attempted to gain control. However, an officer who did not intercede to stop the unnecessary beating of the inmate by other officers was liable to that inmate for that failure, as kicks and punches were not administered in a good faith effort to restore discipline, and could not have possibly been thought necessary, since the inmate was already pinned face down by two officers. In addition, the inmate's Eighth Amendment rights were violated by another officer when the officer participated in ripping the inmate's clothes off him because the inmate would not come or was too slow to strip. Such force was not necessary, given the number of officers present in the holding room and the fact that by that point the inmate was subdued. The inmate's award of punitive damages of $2,000 was appropriate and would be apportioned equally among two correction officers based on the fact that one officer, through his failure to intercede, and another officer, through striking the inmate, equally contributed to the inmate's injuries. A pro se prisoner brought a civil rights action against a county jail based on conditions of confinement and an assault by a prison guard; the jail moved for summary judgment. The U.S. District Court granted the motion, and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that the guard's assault on the prisoner who was cutting his wrist in a suicide attempt did not involve unconstitutionally excessive force. According to the court, the prisoner did not allege how many times he was struck, whether the blows were significant, or how many people hit him. As the guards were obligated to prevent the prisoner from committing suicide, some force was called for. (Harrison County Jail, Mississippi)

The United States District Court entered judgment on jury verdict for the prison guard, and the detainee appealed. The appeals court, reversing and remanding, found that there were triable issues of fact as to whether the prison guard was entitled to qualified immunity. It was a reversible error for the trial court to refuse to question members of the jury panel regarding whether they would tend to credit the testimony of the law enforcement officer over that of the detainee in connection with the detainee's action. Winder v. Leak, 790 F.Supp. 1403 (N.D. Ill. 1992). An inmate filed a civil rights action against prison officials. The district court granted the motion for summary judgment in part and denied it in part. The court found that material issues of fact existed precluding summary judgment as to whether a correctional officer acted maliciously in pushing the inmate who was allegedly walking with the aid of a leg brace, after the inmate allegedly disobeyed a direct order to move from an unauthorized area. The inmate's claim alleged more than a de minimis use of physical force for Eighth Amendment purposes, and thus could form the basis of a civil rights claim. THREATENING

Collins v. Bopson, 816 F.Supp. 335 (E.D. Pa. 1993). An inmate brought an action against corrections officers, alleging excessive force in violation of Section 1983 and an unspecified state law. On the defendants' motion for summary judgment, the district court found that even if a corrections officer did use force against the inmate, medical evidence suggested that such force was de minimis for Eighth Amendment purposes or was applied to maintain or restore discipline. Records showed that all of the inmate's injuries found after his admission to a restricted housing unit (RHU), where an officer allegedly beat him, had previously existed after officers subdued him in an incident arising from his fight with another inmate. In addition, the doctor examining the inmate on the day after his admission to RHU noted that he had no problems. Evidence did not establish a causative link between a corrections officer's words on the cell block, allegedly falsely accusing the inmate of trying to hit and kick the officer, and the subsequent alleged beating of the inmate in the RHU by the officer's superior, precluding imposition of Section 1983 liability on the officer in connection with the beating. The officer was not in the RHU area when the alleged beating occurred, nor was there evidence that he ordered anyone to beat the inmate or that the superior beat the inmate in response to the inmate's actions against the officer. Furthermore, a corrections officer's alleged action of holding a baton to discourage the inmate from defending himself against the alleged beating or to discourage the inmate from assaulting the correctional officers did not produce a Section 1983 liability. Mere threatening gestures of a custodial officer do not amount to constitutional violations. (Pennsylvania State Correctional Institution, Frackville, Pennsylvania)

Collins v.Kahelski, 828 F. Supp. 614 (E.D. Wis. 1993). An inmate brought an action against state corrections officials, alleging he was denied his rights under the Eighth Amendment as a result of actions taken during a prison disturbance. On cross motions for summary judgment, the district court found that the inmate failed to create a genuine issue of material fact regarding the mental state of the corrections officials. The officials declined to allow him to exit the prison's recreations area that was the site of the prison disturbance, and failed to protect the inmate from violence at the hands of other prisoners. However, the disputed factual matters were not material to the mental state issue and, in any event, were not genuine considering the inmate's earlier statement confirming the corrections officials' version of events. The use of tear gas to quell the disturbance was clearly reasonable and did not involve malicious and sadistic actions amounting to cruel and unusual punishment. There was apparent danger posed by the disturbance, and there was no indication that the amount of tear gas used was excessive or that the sole purpose of using the tear gas was to punish or inflict emotional distress. Cooper v. Ellsworth Correctional Work Facility, 817 F.Supp. 84 (D.Kan. 1993), affirmed, 2 F.3d 1160. An inmate brought a Section 1983 action alleging that the use of excessive force was cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the Eighth Amendment and that his transfer was retaliatory. The district court found that correctional officers' use of force on the inmate was not excessive. Refusal to allow the inmate to attend a doctor's appointment and correctional officers' use of force to escort the inmate to the guard captain's office did not violate the Eighth Amendment's prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment. The inmate was not allowed to attend the doctor's appointment because he refused to put his pants on. Use of force occurred only after the inmate attempted to use his cane on one correctional officer and several officers came to his assistance to escort the inmate to the captain's office. Furthermore, the inmate did not allege that he sustained any injuries in the altercation. The court also found that the decision to transfer the inmate because of the episode in which several correctional officers were required to restore order clearly advanced legitimate correctional concerns and was not in retaliation for the inmate's conduct. An inmate sued prison officials under Section 1983 alleging violation of his constitutional rights by use of excessive force, refusing him medical care, and taking his property. On the defendants' motion for summary judgment the district court found that the force prison officials used to move the inmate from administrative segregation into an isolation cell was applied in a good-faith effort to restore discipline and not maliciously or sadistically for the purposes of causing harm, even assuming the full extent of injuries alleged by the inmate. Even assuming the full extent of injuries alleged by the inmate (a head injury, injuries to wrists and legs, and an injury resulting from being sprayed with mace) they did not present "serious" medical needs within the meaning of the Eighth Amendment. Actions of prison officials in attending to the inmate's medical needs after he was subdued were well within reasonable standards of medical care under the circumstances and did not constitute deliberate indifference in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The court of appeals found that a fact question as to whether the prison sergeant acted in good faith to restore order in the cell block or acted maliciously in allegedly beating the prisoner for refusing to exit his cell precluded summary judgment. The prison sergeant was not entitled to qualified immunity from the claim that he pulled the inmate from his cell by the shoulder and hair, slammed the inmate's head against the bars of an adjacent cell and struck him twice in the face and kneed him in the groin. The U.S. District Court granted judgment for the prison officials, and the inmate appealed. The district court found that the extended use of three-way restraints on the detainee, coupled with the absence of medical review or treatment and the denial of even basic amenities such as personal hygiene and toilet usage constituted deprivation of his due process rights. Various officers at the jail were found liable for $5,000 compensatory damages in their individual capacities. The appeals court, reversing and remanding, found that there were genuine issues of material fact, precluding summary judgment for the prison officials. The prisoner claimed he was assaulted by officials during a prison disturbance and there were doubts as to whether the disturbance was in progress at the time of the assault. Nicholson v. Kent County Sheriff's Dept., 839 F.Supp. 508 (W.D. Mich. 1993). An arrestee who was mentally disturbed and was causing damage to a hospital brought a civil rights action against officers who physically subdued him. The officers moved for summary judgment. The district court found that the plaintiff failed to state an excessive force claim under the civil rights statute against the police officers who subdued him. The officers were called to the hospital by the hospital's own frightened staff to prevent the arrestee from doing further damage and to restore order. The arrestee threatened the officers with physical harm and actually injured them. In addition, the arrestee was a physically strong man and suffered from a bipolar chemical imbalance which caused him to become grossly agitated. The arrestee struck the officers before they struck him and it took eight officers to subdue the arrestee. (Kent County Sheriff's Department, Michigan)

Norman v. Taylor, 9 F.3d 1078 (4th Cir. 1993). An inmate sued a deputy alleging excessive force in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The U.S. District Court granted summary judgment for the deputy finding that the inmate did not adequately refute the deputy's statement that the inmate was causing a disturbance so that force was necessary, and that the amount of force was not excessive. The inmate appealed. The appeals court, reversing and remanding, found that a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the inmate was causing a disturbance justifying the use of force precluded summary judgment in favor of the deputy. According to the court, the actions of the deputy in swinging keys at the inmate's face to stop him from smoking could clearly support a finding that he acted maliciously and sadistically to cause harm and satisfied the subjective component of an Eighth Amendment excessive force claim. Furthermore, the harm alleged by the inmate which included initial and lingering pain to his hand, physical injury sustained including swelling and decreased mobility of his hand, and psychological injury caused from threats by the deputy, were beyond the de minimis level. Risdal v. Martin, 810 F.Supp. 1049 (S.D. Iowa 1993). An inmate brought a Section 1983 action against correctional officers, alleging that excessive physical force was used when he was forced to take a shower. The district court found that the inmate failed to establish he was subjected to unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain in violation of the Eighth Amendment, in view of the testimony presented and the total lack of evidence corroborating the inmate's claim that he was physically assaulted by a corrections officer at the shower cell. Furthermore, the alleged taunting and jostling of the inmate by corrections officers who were returning the inmate to his cell did not amount to conduct so egregious as to cause a violation of the Eighth Amendment; even as alleged by the inmate, the officers' use of force was minimal, caused no physical injury, and was not the type to be physically injurious or painful. On the defendants' motion for summary judgment, the district court found that the use of force, consisting of placing the inmate on the floor and cuffing his hands behind his back to prevent him from fleeing to another section of the prison facility, was reasonable and necessary. The officers had found the inmate, in the dayroom shouting, swinging his arms and running around and when the door opened, the inmate attempted to push past the guard and flee. Valencia v. Wiggins, 981 F.2d 1440 (5th Cir. 1993), cert. denied, 113 S.Ct. 2998. A pretrial detainee brought a civil rights action against a jail official, alleging that the official used excessive force against him during a jail disturbance. The U.S. District Court entered judgment in favor of the detainee, and the official appealed. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that the substantive due process standard, rather than the Fourth Amendment excessive force standard, applied to the pretrial detainee's excessive force case, where the alleged use of excessive force occurred three weeks after the initial arrest.

The court also found that the jail official's use of a choke hold and other force to subdue the nonresisting pretrial detainee during the jail disturbance was a malicious and sadistic use of force to cause harm, rather than a good-faith effort to maintain or restore security, violating due process. The use of force rendered the detainee temporarily unconscious. The officer then struck the detainee while the detainee was handcuffed, kneeling, and nonresisting. The court found that the jail official's use of force was not objectively reasonable, so that the official was not entitled to qualified immunity in the detainee's civil rights action, where the detainee suffered severe injuries as a result. The detainee was awarded damages in the amount of $2,500 from the jail official, and was also granted approximately $27,600 in attorneys' fees and costs. (Brewster County Jail, Texas)

Vineyard v. County of Murray, Ga., 990 F.2d 1207 (11th Cir. 1993), cert. denied, 114 S.Ct. 636. An arrestee brought a Section 1983 action against deputies and a sheriff, alleging that the defendants violated the arrestee's constitutional rights by beating him. The U.S. District Court entered judgment on a jury verdict for the arrestee, and the defendants appealed. The court of appeals found that the evidence supported a finding that the county's deliberate indifference to the rights of arrestees to be free from use of excessive force by the county's deputies was a moving force of the violation of the arrestee's constitutional rights resulting from the beating by deputies. An expert witness testified that, assuming the arrestee's version of the beating was true, the beating would not have occurred if county policies were such that officers knew they must report any confrontations, that others would call the sheriff's department to report complaints to the department, and that the department would investigate complaints. EXCESSIVE FORCE

Boyd v. Selmer, 842 F.Supp. 52 (N.D.N.Y. 1994). An inmate brought a Section 1983 action against correctional officers for the excessive force allegedly applied by officers in forcing the inmate to remove his hands from an open feed-up flap in his cell. The district court found that the force applied by the officers in compelling the inmate to remove his hands, which consisted of striking the inmate three to four times with their batons, was not excessive and did not support the civil rights claim, particularly where the nurse who examined the inmate did not notice any bruises or abrasions. The accidental injury that the inmate sustained when a correctional officer closed the feed-up flap before the inmate had removed his hands would not support an excessive force claim. The correctional officers' altercation with the prison inmate arose in connection with their discharge of their official duties, and would not support an assault and battery claim against the officers in their personal capacity. (Coxsackie Correctional Facility, New York)

DEADLY FORCE

Brothers v. Klevenhagen, 28 F.3d 452 (5th Cir. 1994). Family members of a pretrial detainee who was killed while attempting to escape from custody during transport from one holding cell to another, brought an action in state court against the county and its sheriff alleging excessive force and violation of Section 1983. The defendants removed the action to federal court and the parties cross-moved for summary judgment. The U.S. District Court granted summary judgment for the defendants and the plaintiffs appealed. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that the due process clause, rather than the Fourth Amendment, provided the constitutional standard for determining whether deputies used excessive force in their treatment of the detainee. The deputies' shooting and killing of the unarmed pretrial detainee who was escaping did not violate due process. The sheriff's department policy allowed deadly force only when immediately necessary to prevent escape and was designed in a good faith effort to maintain or restore discipline and not maliciously and sadistically for the purpose of causing harm. The deputies fired at the detainee only as a last resort to prevent an escape, and the detainee would have escaped if the deputies had not fired upon him. (Harris County Jail, Texas)

Culver By and Through Bell v. Fowler, 862 F.Supp. 369 (M.D.Ga. 1994). A former detainee brought a Section 1983 action against police officers, a police chief, and a city, alleging they violated his Eighth Amendment rights. After granting summary judgment to the city and police chief, the district court found that a police officer who was attempting to control the heavily intoxicated, middle aged, mentally retarded male detainee violated the detainee's Eighth Amendment rights by kneeing him twice in the groin. The court ruled that the use of force was of the sort repugnant to the conscience of mankind, and the force was used not in a good faith effort to maintain discipline, but to maliciously and sadistically cause the detainee harm. Punitive damages in the amount of $25,000 were awarded against the police officer as the officer acted with malicious intent to harm the detainee and kneeing him in the groin represented a barbaric and cruel means of control. The detainee was also entitled to $25,000 in compensatory damages and special damages for reimbursement of medical costs in the amount of $6,012. Another officer, who did not physically assault the detainee in any manner except to slap his hand away during an attempt to control the detainee, did not violate the detainee's Eighth Amendment rights. Davidson v. Flynn, 32 F.3d 27 (2nd Cir. 1994). An inmate brought an action against corrections officials to recover for an injury caused by handcuffs. The U.S. District Court adopted a recommendation by a U.S. Magistrate Judge for dismissal and the inmate appealed. The appeals court, reversing and remanding, found that although the inmate was an escape risk and some restraint was necessary beyond that normally used, the inmate stated a claim for cruel and unusual punishment by alleging that the handcuffs were placed too tightly, leading to serious and permanent physical injury, and that excessive force was applied wantonly and maliciously in retaliation for being litigious. Davis v. Moss, 841 F.Supp. 1193 (M.D.Ga. 1994). A former inmate brought a Section 1983 action against correctional officers alleging cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the Eighth Amendment in connection with defendants' treatment during a riot. The district court found that the former inmate was not entitled to recover for lost earning capacity in connection with violation of his Eighth Amendment rights by a correctional officer who shoved the inmate down a fire escape during the riot. Such an award would have been speculative in light of the inmate's meager past work history. The inmate had worked only sporadically at farm jobs and, after being paroled, had failed to go to either the unemployment office or the department of vocational rehabilitation. The inmate was entitled to a damage award of $10,000 for pain and suffering as the fall down the stairs permanently damaged two discs in the inmate's lower back, causing him to undergo surgery. In addition, the inmate was entitled to $25,000 in punitive damages. The imposition of punitive damages was necessary to deter the officer and other correctional officers from using unnecessary and malicious force against inmates. Gibeau v. Nellis, 18 F.3d 107 (2nd Cir. 1994). An incarcerated criminal contemnor brought a Section 1983 action against a jail officer, alleging excessive use of force. The U.S. District Court entered judgment on a jury verdict finding that the officer had used excessive force, but awarded no damages, and the inmate appealed. The appeals court found that whether the contemnor suffered even a minor compensable injury proximately caused by the officer's use of excessive force, so as to mandate an award of compensatory damages, was a question for the jury. The district court should have instructed the jury that it was required to award nominal damages if it found that the plaintiff's Eighth Amendment rights were violated, and the court should have provided a corresponding verdict form. Howard v. Barnett, 21 F.3d 868 (8th Cir. 1994). A prisoner sued a prison official alleging use of excessive force. The U.S. District Court entered judgment on a jury verdict for the prisoner and the official appealed. The appeals court, reversing and remanding, found that a violation of the Eighth Amendment required a finding that force was applied "maliciously and sadistically for the very purpose of causing harm." Force that was excessive within the meaning of the Eighth Amendment would be compensable if it caused the prisoner actual injury, even if the injury was not of great significance. (Missouri)

Lunsford v. Bennett, 17 F.3d 1574 (7th Cir. 1994). Prisoners brought a civil rights action against prison and county officials alleging violations of the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments. The U.S. District Court entered summary judgment for the officials, and the prisoners appealed. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that shackling the prisoners to their cells so that trustees could mop up water in the cell block which prisoners had flooded did not constitute an Eighth Amendment violation. Pouring a bucket of water over the head of an inmate who was shackled to his cell during the cleanup of the cell block did not rise to a level of Eighth Amendment violation. Institutional security was threatened, prisoners and guards were talking "trash" to one another, some prisoners were splashing guards with water, and prison officials were obliged to restore order and control. Although pouring a bucket of water over the head of a prisoner who was already standing ankle deep in water might be seen as unnecessary in retrospect, it was a minor use of force that did not offend the conscience. the inmate's Eighth Amendment rights were violated by the security officer's striking of the inmate with the sole purpose to hurt the inmate rather than out of a good faith effort to restore or maintain discipline or order. The degree of force employed exceeded the amount of force justified under the circumstances; the officer was not acting to protect himself or others or to serve any legitimate penological interest. A pretrial detainee brought a civil rights action against jail administrators and jail guards alleging that conditions of his confinement violated his due process rights. The district court found that the pretrial detainee's allegations that he was severely beaten by one jail guard while another guard watched were sufficient to state a civil rights claim against guards in their individual capacities based on a violation of his due process right against being subjected to excessive force amounting to punishment. Newsome v. Webster, 843 F.Supp. 1460 (S.D. Ga. 1994). Jail detainees brought a Section 1983 action against various officers, alleging excessive use of force. Motions were made to dismiss and for summary judgment. The district court found that the jail detainees failed to establish the liability of the sheriff, either individually or officially. The detainees did not allege that the sheriff had personally participated in any force inflicted upon them, and their conclusory statements as to the inadequacy of training and policies towards the use of force did not show that force was excessive. The detainees had not stated a cause of action for excessive force against personnel who had arrested them or personnel responsible for their jail confinement. (Richmond County Jail, Georgia)

Shearin v. Correction Officer Pennington, 867 F.Supp. 1250 (E.D.Va. 1994). A state inmate brought a Section 1983 action against a corrections officer and other corrections employees, alleging that the officer committed assault and battery against the inmate and that the employees failed to protect the inmate, thereby subjecting the inmate to cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the Eighth Amendment. Both parties moved for summary judgment. The district court found that the inmate was not subjected to cruel and unusual punishment under the Eighth Amendment by the actions of the corrections officer in thrusting a metal window rod through the bars of the inmate's cell and charging at the inmate, after the inmate threw dissolved human waste onto the officer from his cell. The inmate was not subjected to the use of excessive force when the officer verbally provoked the inmate; the inmate was subjected to no further physical contact. There was no evidence that the inmate was physically harmed, and the officer acted to defend himself, rather than with a culpable state of mind. In addition, the inmate was not subjected to cruel and unusual punishment under the Eighth Amendment by the actions of a higher-ranking officer after the incident. The officer visited the inmate a few minutes after the incident and immediately presented the inmate to a physician for treatment. The officer protected the inmate from further harm, and moved to discipline the lower-ranking officer. (Powhatan Correctional Facility, Virginia)

Smith v. Delamaid, 842 F.Supp. 453 (D.Kan. 1994). An arrestee sued police officers and a city under Section 1983. On the defendants' motions for summary judgment, the U.S. District Court found that genuine issues of material fact existed as to whether the amount of force used by the arresting officers was reasonable under the circumstances, and as to whether the arrestee suffered significant injury, precluding summary judgment against the arrestee. The arrestee alleged that the officers used force against him while he was restrained by handcuffs and shackles despite his lack of resistance, and there was medical evidence to support a finding that the arrestee was beaten up. The U.S. District Court denied a summary judgment motion by the librarian and supervisor, and they appealed. The court of appeals, reversing and remanding, found that the prison librarian's supervisor was not deliberately indifferent toward and did not tacitly approve the librarian's act of striking the inmate, and, thus, the supervisor was not liable to the inmate. Wilkens v. Moore, 40 F.3d 954 (8th Cir. 1994). Prison guards appealed the denial by the U.S. District Court of the guards' motion for summary judgment in a civil rights action brought by a prisoner against them. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that the jury could draw reliable inferences as to whether the prison guards' use of force on the prisoner could have been thought to be necessary, or instead exceeded the amount of force that was justified under the circumstances. The prison guards were not entitled to a defense of qualified immunity on a deprivation of clothing claim. The prison guards placed the inmate naked in a strip cell for 22 hours, where the guards allegedly verbally and physically abused the inmate continuously. The district court determined that the inmate's assault claim against the guards was a fact issue for trial, and the prison guards did not appeal this determination. Williams v. Vidor, 17 F.3d 857 (6th Cir. 1994). An inmate brought a civil rights action against a prison officer and deputy warden alleging that he was subject to cruel and unusual punishment and denied his right to equal protection when he was shackled to his bed for 73 hours. The U.S. District Court granted summary judgment for the officer and deputy warden, and the inmate appealed. The appeals court, affirming in part, reversing in part and remanding, found that the officer who carried out the order to place the inmate in shackles had qualified immunity. He did not make the decision to place the inmate in restraints nor to keep them on for any particular period of time, and he did carry out his duty to check on the inmate periodically. However, genuine issues of material fact existed as to whether the deputy warden was responsible for maintaining the inmate in shackles for 73 hours, precluding summary judgment. Wilson v. Groaning, 25 F.3d 581 (7th Cir. 1994). An inmate filed a civil rights action claiming that correctional officers used excessive force in returning him to his cell. The U.S. District Court entered judgment on a jury verdict for the officers and the inmate appealed. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that evidence that the inmate spat on an officer immediately before the officer allegedly punched the inmate was relevant and admissible to support the officer's claim that he felt threatened at the time he allegedly used excessive force. The district court did not abuse its discretion in admitting evidence of three of the inmate's six prior convictions to impeach his testimony. The potential for prejudice resulting from irrelevant and inflammatory evidence that the inmate sprayed another correctional officer with urine and fecal matter after excessive force was used to return the inmate to his cell did not warrant a mistrial in the inmate's civil rights action. The district court gave timely and effective curative instructions and evidence supported the jury's verdict against the inmate. (Shawnee Correctional Center, Vienna, Illinois)

Coleman v. Wilson, 912 F.Supp. 1282 (E.D.Cal. 1995). Inmates challenged the adequacy of mental health care provided at institutions operated by the California Department of Corrections, alleging that the inadequacies were cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The district court reviewed the findings and recommendations of the chief magistrate judge after objections were filed by the defendants. The court found that evidence supported the magistrate's findings and recommendations regarding many aspects of the Department's mental health services, and ordered that a special master be appointed to monitor the Department's compliance with court-ordered injunctive relief. Applying the "deliberate indifference" standard, rather than the "malicious and sadistic" standard, the court found that the use of tasers and 37mm guns against inmates with serious mental disorders had caused serious and substantial harm to mentally ill inmates, whether or not they were on psychotropic medication. Evidence supported the finding that custodial staff were inadequately trained in signs and symptoms of mental illness, supporting allegations that disciplinary and behavior control measures were inappropriately used against mentally ill inmates. The three-hour course received by all new correctional officers, and additional in-service training at the institution level, were not sufficient to prevent some officers from using punitive measures to control inmates' behavior without regard to the cause of the behavior. Fickes v. Jefferson County, 900 F.Supp. 84 (E.D.Tex. 1995). A pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against a county, sheriff, and corrections officials. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants in part and denied it in part. The court found that a corrections officer was at most negligent in leaving mops and brooms in a cell; the detainee alleged that other inmates beat him with the mops and brooms. The court noted that bringing an end to the flood that had disrupted several cells was a legitimate government purpose that justified bringing the mops, brooms and squeegees into the cell. The court held that genuine issues of fact remained as to whether an officer knew of the ongoing attack when he made his rounds and chose to do nothing or whether the altercation erupted after the officer made his rounds, precluding summary judgment. The court held that genuine fact issues remained as to whether officers used excessive force when removing the detainee to another cell by continuing to exert force directly on the detainee's neck by means of a headlock after the detainee announced he had injured his neck, precluding summary judgment. Madrid v. Gomez, 889 F.Supp. 1146 (N.D.Cal. 1995). Inmates brought a class action suit challenging conditions of confinement at a new high-security prison complex in California. The district court found for the plaintiffs in the majority of issues presented, ordered injunctive relief and appointed a special master to direct a remedial plan tailored to correct specific constitutional violations. In the beginning of its lengthy opinion, the court noted that this "...is not a case about inadequate or deteriorating physical conditions...rather, plaintiffs contend that behind the newly-minted walls and shiny equipment lies a prison that is coldly indifferent to the limited, but basic and elemental, rights that incarcerated persons--including the 'worst of the worst'--retain under...our Constitution." The court held that the fact that a prison may be new does not excuse its obligation to operate it in a constitutionally acceptable manner. The court held that prison inmates established prison officials' deliberate indifference to the use of excessive force by showing that they knew that unnecessary and grossly excessive force was being employed against inmates on a frequent basis and that these practices posed a substantial risk of harm to inmates. According to the court, officials consciously disregarded the risk of harm, choosing instead to tolerate and even encourage abuses of force by deliberately ignoring them when they occurred, tacitly accepting a code of silence, and failing to implement adequate systems to control and regulate the use of force. The court found that officials had an affirmative management strategy to permit the use of excessive force for the purpose of punishment and deterrence. (Pelican Bay State Prison, California)

McKinney v. Compton, 888 F.Supp. 75 (W.D.Tenn. 1995). An inmate filed a civil rights suit against prison officials alleging deliberate indifference to his serious medical needs and use of excessive force. The district court found that prison officials did not inflict cruel and unusual punishment in connection with the inmate's eye injury, and that a corrections officer could not be held liable for attempting to handcuff the inmate. However, the court found that the inmate's allegations that a prison official poked him in the eye and injured him after he was already restrained were sufficient to state an Eighth Amendment claim. McLaurin v. Morton, 48 F.3d 944 (6th Cir. 1995). An inmate brought an action alleging a violation of due process and cruel and unusual punishment in connection with the use of mace by a correctional officer. The U.S. District Court denied the correctional officer's motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity and the officer appealed. The appeals court found that the prison's policy directive on the use of chemical agents and physical restraints against prisoners created no due process liberty interest for the inmate. Although the directive contained some mandatory language, taken as a whole, it left considerable official discretion and did not establish mandatory, inflexible procedures which must be followed before chemical agents are used. Pyka v. Village of Orland Park, 906 F.Supp. 1196 (N.D.Ill. 1995). The estate of an arrestee who committed suicide while in detention brought a civil rights action against a village and police officers. An eighteen-year-old youth in police custody committed suicide by hanging himself from the bars of his cell with his t-shirt. The court found that the defendants were entitled to qualified immunity on claims against them in their official capacity, but the officer who put the arrestee in a chokehold was not entitled to immunity on the claim of excessive force, nor was immunity available for an officer who failed to intervene in the first officer's takedown of the arrestee. The court also found that the officers were not entitled to immunity on the claim that they struck the arrestee in violation of his right to be free from pretrial detention that constituted punishment; a videotape showed no sign of aggression or violence by the arrestee before the officer grabbed him and placed him in a chokehold. Inmates at a federal penitentiary filed a Bivens action against correctional officers, alleging claims of excessive force, cruel and unusual punishment, failure to provide medical care and state law claims of assault and battery. The district court granted summary judgment, in part, finding that the inmates failed to provide evidence of serious medical need that was required for a claim of deliberate indifference, and that the inmates failed to present evidence to sustain their claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The complaint was dismissed by the U.S. District Court and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that the use of a "pain compliance hold" on the inmate, without actual application of force, was justified to maintain order in the institution and to maintain the safety of prison personnel and inmates during a strip search, after the inmate refused a direct order to return to his cell from the shower area. The use of force did not constitute an infliction of cruel and unusual punishment. (Iowa State Penitentiary)

Sweatt v. Bailey, 876 F.Supp. 1571 (M.D. Ala. 1995). An arrestee sued an officer for civil rights violations in connection with a beating he received from the officer while in detention. The district court found that a limited exception to the general rule of qualified immunity was justified for the officer who lost his temper and summarily beat the arrestee who was talking on the phone at the time of the attack. The police chief was entitled to qualified immunity on a claim of failure to supervise the arresting officer who beat the arrestee where there was only a bare assertion by an expert witness that the chief took inappropriate action with regard to supervision. The district court found that the arrestee's statement, within the officer's hearing, that the officer is an "ass" should not provoke a violent reaction from the officer and does not fall within the "fighting words" doctrine. Cockrell-El v. District of Columbia, 937 F.Supp. 18 (D.D.C. 1996). An inmate brought an action against corrections officials alleging violation of his constitutional rights in connection with an alleged assault by a guard when the inmate was returning from a religious service, and from a disciplinary proceeding arising from the assault. The district court held that the inmate's right of free exercise of religion pursuant to the Religious Freedom Restoration Act was not violated because the inmate was neither prevented from attending a service nor pressured to commit any act forbidden by his religion. The court found that the inmate failed to establish a denial of due process violation during a disciplinary proceeding because the inmate did not have a protected liberty interest in remaining free from administrative segregation, and was informed of the charges against him and notified of his hearings. The court found that a prison guard did not violate the inmate's Eighth Amendment rights because the guard had asserted that his blow to the inmate's face was necessary for both self-protection and to maintain internal safety in a cell block. The court found the inmate's contention that his hands were in handcuffs to be incredible given the guard's injuries--a cut lower lip and injuries to his wrist and arm. The court found that evidence established that the guard struck the inmate without justification or reasonable apprehension of physical harm, in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The court awarded damages in the amount of $7,500. However, the court found that moving the inmate away from other prisoners to a cell closer to the guard post to prevent him from disrupting and inciting other inmates was not a violation of the inmate's First Amendment right of free speech, and the change of cells did not violate any constitutionally protected liberty interest because the inmate was not moved to a more restrictive unit. Fitts v. Witkowski, 920 F.Supp. 679 (D.S.C. 1996). An inmate sued corrections officials alleging violation of his Eighth Amendment rights by the use of four-point restraints. The district court held that a previous consent decree established a liberty interest in freedom from the use of four-point restraints except under procedures established by the decree and that there was an issue of fact as to whether the defendants complied with the decree. The court noted that this case did not involve a disturbance that threatened prison security so as to make pre-deprivation protections impossible. The court found that prison officials were entitled to qualified immunity for due process and Eighth Amendment claims because the existence of the decree did not clearly establish that the inmate had a liberty interest against the use of four-point restraints. The district court jury exonerated five defendants but awarded $500 in punitive damages against the sixth. The appeals court held that evidence supported the punitive damages award against the sixth officer. The officer allegedly kicked and beat the inmate, snapped his head back with a towel, "mugged" or slapped him twice in the face, and harassed him with several racial epithets and other taunts. The court also held that Florida's hair length rule does not violate the First Amendment or RFRA. (Martin Correctional Institution, Florida)

Jones-Bey v. Wright, 944 F.Supp. 723 (N.D.Ind. 1996). A prisoner who had been placed in a medical isolation unit after he refused to submit to a tuberculosis screening test brought a federal civil rights action against corrections officials. After he was isolated, corrections officials obtained a court order allowing the test to be performed, which they did against the wishes of the prisoner. The district court granted summary judgment to the defendants. The court found that isolation of the prisoner, and the force used to immobilize the prisoner and administer the test, did not violate the Eighth Amendment. The court held that requiring the prisoner to lay down and have his arm immobilized during the test did not violate his rights and that the force used by officials was de minimis because the entire incident took only three or four minutes. A videotape of the incident indicated that the prisoner refused to cooperate and that the officers acted with professionalism and restraint. The court also found that the placement of the prisoner in isolation did not increase his chances of contracting tuberculosis and therefore did not violate the Eighth Amendment. The court found that denying the prisoner permission to participate in congregate religious ceremonies during the time he was medically isolated did not violate the prisoner's free exercise rights. Mathie v. Fries, 935 F.Supp. 1284 (E.D.N.Y. 1996). A former inmate of a county correctional facility brought an action against the facility's Director of Security alleging that the director sexually abused him while he was confined as a pretrial detainee. The district court entered judgment for the inmate, finding that evidence was sufficient to support findings that the director repeatedly sexually abused the inmate and that the director sodomized the inmate while he was handcuffed to pipes in the security office. The court found that these acts violated the inmate's due process rights and that the director was not qualifiedly immune from § 1983 claims, awarding compensatory damages of $250,000 and punitive damages of $500,000. The court noted that evidence showed that the inmate sustained physical injury to his anal area and suffered from post-traumatic stress disorder as a result of sexual abuse by the director. The court called the director's action an outrageous abuse of power and authority. (Suffolk County Correctional Facility, New York)

Mitchell v. Maynard, 80 F.3d 1433 (10th Cir. 1996). A prisoner brought a § 1983 action against prison officials, claiming violation of his rights under the Fifth, Sixth, Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments. The district court granted judgment for the defendants as a matter of law and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded the case for further proceedings. The appeals court ruled that the prisoner failed to state a cause of action that the guards' beating of him violated his rights because he failed to name the guards responsible in the complaint and he did not allege any personal involvement of the warden and director of corrections. According to the prisoner, he tripped and fell to the ground where he was beaten by several guards with night sticks while they shouted racial epithets at him. The prisoner was naked and shackled at the wrists, ankle and belly at the time the attack occurred and there was no indication he had acted inappropriately or posed any disciplinary problem at the time of the beating. Norris v. Detrick, 918 F.Supp. 977 (N.D.W.Va. 1996). A federal prisoner brought a § 1983 action seeking damages based on a state prison official's alleged use of excessive force when he sprayed the prisoner with chemical gas while the prisoner was incarcerated in a state prison. The district court found that administering two doses of CN gas was not excessive force or cruel and unusual punishment; the first use of CN gas was made when the prisoner--who possessed martial arts skills--refused to return to his cell after he was given numerous opportunities to comply with orders. The second use of CN gas was administered only after the prisoner charged officers. The court noted that whether or not the use of gas is unconstitutional depends on the totality of circumstances including provocation, amount of gas used, and the purposes for which the gas was used. Williams v. Benjamin, 77 F.3d 756 (4th Cir, 1996). An inmate filed a civil rights action claiming that correctional officers violated his constitutional rights when they sprayed him with mace, confined him for eight hours in four-point restraints on a bare metal bed frame, refused to allow him to wash off the mace, and denied medical care and the use of a toilet. The district court granted summary judgment to the prison officials and the appeals court affirmed in part and reversed and remanded in part. The appeals court found that the correctional officers' decision to use some force to quell a disturbance was justifiable after inmates threw water at an officer and refused to obey a command to desist. The court ruled that the initial application of mace was not cruel and unusual punishment, but that summary judgment was precluded for the claims that the use of restraints and related actions violated the Eighth Amendment. The court noted that four-point restraints can be used on a limited basis, as a last resort, without violating the Eighth Amendment when other forms of prison discipline have failed, and that the initial application of four-point restraints was justified. But the officers offered no evidence to dispute the inmate's affidavit that his long confinement without being able to wash off the mace caused "immense" pain and that the inmate pleaded with them for water to wash off the mace. According to the court, after the immediacy of the disturbance was at an end the unnecessary infliction of continued pain through a prolonged period of time would support the inference that the officers were acting to punish, rather than to quell a disturbance. Wilson v. Williams, 83 F.3d 807 (7th Cir. 1996). A pretrial detainee brought a civil rights action against a correctional officer for use of allegedly excessive force. The district court granted summary judgment for the officer and an appeals court reversed the decision. On remand, the district court entered judgment on a jury verdict in favor of the officer and the detainee appealed. The appeals court reversed the district court decision. The appeals court found that a jury could properly consider objective factors in determining intent, particularly where the court listed a variety of factors that could be used to infer an intent to punish. The detainee alleged that the correctional officer attacked him without provocation, continued to beat him while he was restrained by other correctional officers, and attacked him again when he was restrained in a different area of the jail. The appeals court ruled that the jury instruction constituted an error. The jury was instructed to determine, through objective means, whether the prohibited punitive intent was present, but was then told even if this was found, a reasonable good faith punitive intent would excuse it. Board of County Com'rs. of Bryan County, Okls. v. Brown, 117 S.Ct. 1382 (1997). Respondent Jill Brown brought a claim for damages against petitioner Bryan County under 42 U.S.C. Sec. 1983. She alleged that a county police officer used excessive force in arresting her, and that the county itself was liable for her injuries based on its sheriff's hiring and training decisions. She prevailed on her claims against the county following a jury trial, and the Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit affirmed the judgment against the county on the basis of the hiring claim alone. The United States Supreme Court held that the Court of Appeals' decision "cannot be squared with our recognition that, in enacting Sec. 1983, Congress did not intend to impose liability on a municipality unless deliberate action attributable to the municipality itself is the 'moving force' behind the plaintiff's deprivation of federal rights." Boddie v. Schnieder, 105 F.3d 857 (2nd Cir. 1997). An inmate brought a pro se § 1983 action against prison officials alleging sexual harassment, use of excessive force, false misbehavior reports, and conspiracy. The district court dismissed the action and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that although a prisoner's allegations of sexual abuse by a corrections officer may state an Eighth Amendment claim, the sexual abuse the inmate claimed to have experienced was not serious enough to be cruel and unusual. The court noted that the isolated episodes of harassment and touching alleged by the inmate were despicable and, if true, might be the basis for a state tort action. The inmate had alleged that there were a small number of incidents in which he was verbally harassed, touched, and pressed against without his consent. The court also found that the inmate's allegations of excessive force, false misbehavior reports, conspiracy and retaliation were unsupported, speculative, and conclusory. Casaburro v. Giuliani, 986 F.Supp. 176 (S.D.N.Y. 1997). A pretrial detainee alleged that he was subjected to cruel and unusual punishment because he was handcuffed in a holding cell for over 7 hours. The district court found that the detainee stated a § 1983 claim against officers, the police department and the city. According to the detainee, he was placed in a holding cage "that had no seats, no water, poor ventilation." He had notified officers that he was under a chiropractor's care for back problems but was allegedly tightly handcuffed behind his back anyway. After he complained he was re-handcuffed to a hook approximately 12 inches off of the floor. After complaining about this he was allegedly cuffed to the front of the cell in a standing position. The district court found that the detainee stated a § 1983 claim against officers, the police department and the city. (City of New York)

Collins v. Scott, 961 F.Supp. 1009 (E.D.Tex. 1997). A male Muslim inmate sued prison officials alleging violation of the Religious Freedom Restoration Act (RFRA) and § 1983 arising from a strip search by a female officer. The district court dismissed the case, finding that ordering the inmate to submit to a strip search did not substantially burden his religious rights and was the least restrictive means of furthering a compelling government interest in maintaining security. The court found that prison officials did not use excessive force in conducting the strip search and that they were entitled to qualified immunity. The officials had shocked the inmate with an electronic capture shield and placed him in restraints when he refused to submit to a search. The court noted that the inmate was willing to be strip searched by a males in all cases, and by females in emergency or extraordinary circumstances, despite the teaching of the inmate's religion that he should not be naked in the presence of males or females. Prison officials usually accommodated the inmate's request to be strip searched by male staff. (Coffield Unit, Texas Department of Criminal Justice)

Dawes v. Coughlin, 964 F.Supp. 652 (N.D.N.Y. 1997). A prisoner brought a § 1983 action alleging that corrections officers had used excessive force against him, failed to provide medical treatment, and improperly issued deprivation and restraint orders. The district court held that the officers did not use excessive force against the prisoner during a struggle initiated by the prisoner which resulted in an officer closing a feeder box door on the prisoner's fingers. The court also upheld the use of force against the prisoner following his refusal to obey an order, although the prisoner sustained a cut over his left eye, and a swollen lip and right eye as a result of the force used against him. The court found that a prison nurse's failure to X-ray the prisoner's ribs for nearly two months following an incident in which he was injured was not denial of medical care in violation of the Eighth Amendment because the prisoner's needs were not sufficiently serious to rise to the level of a constitutional violation. The court found that the prisoner's due process rights were not violated by deprivation orders or restraining orders because the deprivation order was reviewed daily and the restraining orders were not continued for more than seven days without review. The orders, which limited the prisoner's recreation to one hour at a time in full restraints, did not violate the Eighth Amendment because safety and security purposes required the restraints and the prisoner was still able to move around the recreation area. Dennis v. Thurman, 959 F.Supp. 1253 (C.D.Cal. 1997). An inmate proceeding pro se and in forma pauperis brought an action against 36 prison officials alleging constitutional violations because he was deprived of water for 36 hours. He also challenged the force used to extract him from his cell and alleged inadequate and untimely medical care for injuries he sustained during the cell extraction. The district court held that prison officials did not use excessive force in removing the inmate from his cell. The officials had used a block gun, which shot rubber blocks at a high velocity. The court found that no official acted maliciously or sadistically for the purpose of causing the inmate pain, and the cell extraction was necessary to allow a search which was conducted in response to a plan to kill a correctional officer. The court found that even if the inmate was without water for 36 hours during a search of his cell block, there was no Eighth Amendment violation. In the past, the inmate had used water to flood the cell block, creating a dangerous condition for both prison officials and other inmates. (California State Prison--Los Angeles County)

Estate of Davis by Ostenfeld, v. Delo, 115 F.3d 1388 (8th Cir. 1997). A state inmate brought a § 1983 action against correctional officers and prison administrators alleging the use of excessive force when he was removed from his cell. The district court entered judgment against the defendants and they appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that evidence supported the determination that a correctional officer used excessive force against the inmate in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The court also found that evidence supported the determination that other officers and a supervisor were liable for failing to protect the inmate from the use of excessive force, and that the prison superintendent's failure to investigate or take remedial action subjected him to liability. The court held that qualified immunity was not available to the defendants, and that punitive damages were warranted against the correctional officer and prison superintendent. The inmate alleged that the correctional officer struck him in the head and face 20 to 25 times while four other officers were restraining his limbs, after the inmate had complied with an order to lie face down on the floor without resistance. The district court had found that the inmate sustained serious injuries and that the correctional officer used force maliciously and sadistically for the purpose of causing the inmate harm. The prison superintendent had authorized an investigation into the correctional officer's failure to report the use of force, was advised that the officer should be discharged because of persistent complaints, but took no responsive action. The district court had awarded $10,000 in compensatory damages against seven defendants jointly and severally, and awarded punitive damages in the amount of $5,000 each against the correctional officer and the supervisor. Lopez v. Reynolds, 998 F.Supp. 252 (W.D.N.Y. 1997). A prisoner claimed the use of allegedly excessive force in a civil rights action. The district court found that the force used against the prisoner did not amount to cruel and unusual punishment. The court noted that the prisoner's conduct, including his refusal to attend his disciplinary hearing, his refusal to allow guards to remove his leg restraints, and spitting in one guard's face, demonstrated a reasonably perceived threat to the maintenance of prison discipline. Therefore the use of some force to remove the prisoner's leg irons and place him in his cell was not found to be usubjectively excessive. (Southport Correctional Facility, New York)

Price v. Dixon, 961 F. Supp. 894 (E.D.N.C. 1997). An inmate sued prison officials alleging violation of his Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment rights when he was placed in four-point restraints for 28 hours. The court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants, finding that they did not violate any clearly established rights of the inmate and were entitled to qualified immunity. The court upheld the limited use of mace to subdue the inmate who was disruptive and who was throwing urine on prison officers. The inmate had incurred more than 100 rule violations since he was admitted to the facility, and on one occasion the inmate even broke through steel handcuffs that were applied to restrain him. The court held that denying the inmate the opportunity to wash after being sprayed with mace did not violate any clearly establish right of the inmate. The inmate was afforded bathroom breaks and was not totally without access to any source of water. He was checked every 15 minutes and was released for regular meal times. The inmate was also evaluated by medical personnel. (Central Prison, Raleigh, North Carolina)

Riley v. Dorton, 115 F.3d 1159 (4th Cir. 1997). A pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against a police officer, alleging the use of excessive force during an interrogation after his arrest. The district court granted summary judgment for the officer and the detainee appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the Fourth Amendment did not extend protection from excessive force to pretrial detainees, and that the alleged use of force did not violate the Eighth Amendment. According to the court, the Fourth Amendment applies to the initial decision to detain the accused, not to conditions of confinement after that decision has been made. The court also held that the officer's alleged use of force did not violate due process where any injury suffered by the detainee was de minimis. The court found that the detainee's encounter with police officers did not amount to "interrogation" within the meaning of the Fifth Amendment because officers did not directly question the detainee and their other conduct (exchanging insults with the detainee and requesting that the detainee sign a waiver form for genetic testing) was not reasonably likely to elicit an incriminating response. The detainee alleged that the officer used handcuffs, inserted the tip of a pen into the detainee's nose, threatened the detainee and slapped the detainee across the face. The district court granted summary judgment for the marshal, finding that the marshal was not liable for the alleged use of excessive force and had qualified immunity. The court found that the marshal's actions were necessary to secure the detainee, safeguard other marshals, and restore security to the holding cell area. According to the court, there was no indication that the marshal's actions, which may have been the cause of the detainee's bruise or scratch, were disproportionate to the situation. Siglar v. Hightower, 112 F.3d 191 (5th Cir. 1997). An inmate brought an in forma pauperis complaint under § 1983 alleging excessive use of force by prison officers. The district court dismissed the complaint as frivolous and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that under the provisions of the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA), which requires a prisoner to make a showing of physical injury before bringing any federal civil action, the injury must be more than de minimis but need not be significant. The court found that the inmate's sore, bruised ear, which lasted for three days, was de minimis and thus he did not raise a valid Eighth Amendment claim for excessive force. (Texas)

Triplett v. District of Columbia, 108 F.3d 1450 (D.C.Cir. 1997). A prisoner sued the District of Columbia alleging he was injured by correctional officers. The district court awarded the prisoner $135,000 in compensatory damages after finding that the District was liable for negligence, assault and battery and for the use of excessive force in violation of the Eight Amendment. The prisoner's neck was broken as a result of the assault by staff. The District appealed and the appeals court affirmed in part and reversed in part. The appeals court held that evidence sustained the determination that the correctional officers had committed assault and battery for which the District could be held liable, but that the alleged practice of excessive force by correctional officers was not part of a policy of the District for the purposes of establishing municipal liability. The court held that even if low-level supervisors covered up other alleged incidents of excessive force through falsified disciplinary reports, that practice would actually reduce the likelihood that policymakers would learn of the practice. An inmate brought a § 1983 action against prison officials alleging violation of his rights in connection with strip searches and denial of exercise. The district court granted summary judgment for the officials, finding that denial of exercise for only eight days in response to disciplinary problems created by the inmate did not indicate deliberate indifference in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The court also held that alleged repeated strip searches of the inmate, both at the library and as the result of a security check of his cell, did not violate the Fourth Amendment because the inmate failed to show that the searches were conducted in an unreasonable manner, even if they were unnecessary. Adewale v. Whalen, 21 F.Supp.2d 1006 (D.Minn. 1998). An arrestee sued a police officer and the city that employed him under federal civil rights laws and state tort claims. The district court found that the officer was entitled to qualified immunity from liability for his decision to jail the arrestee, but found that genuine issues of material fact precluded summary judgment on the grounds of official immunity on allegations of assault, battery and false imprisonment. The court held that the officer's decision to detain the arrestee for a misdemeanor did not violate her federal rights and was objectively reasonable, given the arrestee's admission that she had been drinking and intended to drive. The court held that the arrestee failed to show that the city improperly trained its officers to arrest noncooperative persons for obstruction of legal process, based only on the decision of a deputy director of police that it was proper to arrest someone for refusing to open a security door for the police. The arrestee suffered a broken arm which she alleged was the result of excessive force used by the officer during a pat-down search. (City of Richfield Police Department, Minnesota)

Aziz Zarif Shabazz v. Pico, 994 F.Supp. 460 (S.D.N.Y. 1998). A prison inmate brought a § 1983 action against prison officials and employees alleging violation of his constitutional rights. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants. The court held that the inmate failed to allege facts sufficient to support a conspiracy claim or that officials had acted in retaliation for the inmate's exercise of protected rights. The court concluded that kicking of the inmate inside his ankles and feet while performing a pat frisk, while not to be condoned, was a de minimis use of force and did not violate the Eighth Amendment. The court noted that at one time the inmate admitted that he had sustained no physical injuries. The court held that the pat frisk and strip frisk searches performed on the inmate were permissible and did not violate the provisions of a consent decree. The court found that performing a strip frisk on the prison inmate prior to his transfer to another facility did not violate his right of free exercise of religion, notwithstanding the inmate's religious objections to the requirement that he remove his clothing. According to the court, alleged verbal taunts, no matter how inappropriate, unprofessional or reprehensible they might seem, did not support a claim of cruel and unusual punishment absent any injury. Any psychological or emotional scars to the inmate were found to be de minimis and did not support a claim of cruel and unusual punishment. (Green Haven Correctional Facility, New York)

The district court found that a prison official had used excessive force in one incident, but the appeals court reversed, finding that the official's action in using pepper mace to quell a disturbance on a bus did not amount to the use of excessive force. The appeals court noted that the incident on the bus was a potentially dangerous situation because inmates on the bus had been involved in a prior prison-yard incident and an ensuing work stoppage, and were being transferred to a more secure facility as the result of their involvement. The official did not allow the inmates to leave the bus to wash off the mace because he was concerned about possible escape attempts in an unfenced area. A prisoner brought a § 1983 action against Colorado corrections officials and employees for alleged attacks on him by a guard and other prisoners following his transfer from Colorado to a Texas prison. The district court dismissed the case, finding that the prisoner failed to state claims against the Colorado corrections director, absent allegations that the director participated in the attack by the guard or that he ever had contact with the guard. The prisoner complained that he was attacked by a law enforcement official of the Texas county in which he was housed, alleging that the officer struck him with a rifle butt to the groin. The prisoner also alleged that several days later he was "brutally attacked without provocation and beaten" by three inmates in an attack that was observed by other law enforcement officers who did nothing to render aid. An arrestee brought § 1983 claims against a police officer, corrections officer and city who allegedly used excessive force and failed to provide medical care. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants, finding that the city was not liable for a custom or policy of using excessive force or for not properly investigating, supervising, training or disciplining its officials. The city's police officers had reviewed the policy on use of force regularly, the night watch commander placed a hold on the videotape of the incident and issued a personal complaint against the police officer who allegedly used excessive force. The city's safety service director eventually fired the officer for his actions, and the city saw to it that the officer was charged and convicted on a misdemeanor assault charge. The court held that the corrections officer was entitled to qualified immunity, where he helped the police officer restrain the arrestee by holding the arrestee's legs and carrying the arrestee to a padded cell. The corrections officer said that he entered the booking room and found the arrestee kicking away at the police officer who was the only officer in the room, and the corrections officer denied that he saw the police officer mistreating the arrestee until he subsequently viewed the video tape of the booking. Buckley v. Rogerson, 133 F.3d 1125 (8th Cir. 1998). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against a warden and state corrections department medical director challenging the use of restraints and segregation in a psychiatric hospital. The district court denied the medical director's motion for summary judgment and he appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the director should have known that the prisoner had a right to medical approval of segregation and the use of restraints. The district court had found that correctional policies allowed facility staff to develop "treatment plans" to address the prisoner's mental illness but rather than assigning its staff doctors to the case the facility entrusted responsibility for implementing and administering many of the prisoner's treatment plans to correctional officers who had no medical training. Part of the prisoner's "treatment" involved stripping him of his clothes and placing him in a Spartan "quiet" or "segregation" cell. Gravely v. Madden, 142 F.3d 345 (6th Cir. 1998). The administrator of an inmate's estate brought a civil rights action against a corrections officer, alleging violation of the inmate's rights when he was fatally shot by the officer following the inmate's escape. The district court denied the officer's motion for summary judgment but the appeals court vacated and remanded. The appeals court held that the officer was acting within the scope of his discretionary authority and his use of deadly force was objectively reasonable, entitling the officer to qualified immunity. The court noted that even if the officer's use of deadly force violated a state regulation permitting the use of such force only when an officer reasonably believes that such force is the least force necessary to apprehend an escapee, the regulation did not create a substantive right that gave rise to a cause of action, but instead provided a guideline for corrections officers. The inmate had escaped from a minimum security farm detail. When the officer and others raided the residence of a friend of the inmate, the officer was stationed on the rear landing of the building. When the inmate came through the back door he was ordered by the officer to freeze and give himself up. He leaped off the landing and ran past the officer, who again told him to stop. The officer then fired a single shot which struck the inmate in the back, fatally injuring him. A butcher knife was found partially hidden beneath the inmate's leg. Hasenmeier-McCarthy v. Rose, 986 F.Supp. 464 (S.D.Ohio 1998). An inmate who was forcibly compelled to submit to a tuberculosis (TB) test brought a § 1983 action against corrections officials seeking injunctive and monetary relief. The district court granted summary judgment for the officials, finding that mandatory TB testing accomplished the legitimate penological objective of protecting other inmates and staff from infectious diseases. The court found that the inmate's unsupported allegations regarding deprivation of communication, clean bedding, clean clothing and hot food during her period of respiratory isolation were not objectively sufficiently serious to support a claim of cruel and unusual punishment. The court supported the prison's policy of placing inmates in respiratory isolation pending their submission to TB tests, noting that inmates were monitored daily. The court also held that the inmate's showing as to the alleged severity of her wounds was insufficient to create a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the officials acted maliciously or sadistically in forcibly administering the TB test. The court found that the forcible testing did not violate the inmate's First Amendment right to freely exercise her religion. (Ohio Reformatory for Women)

EXCESSIVE FORCE

Holland v. Morgan, 6 F.Supp.2d 827 (E.D.Wis. 1998). An inmate who alleged that prison officials used excessive force against him was granted permission to proceed in forma pauperis. The district court found that the inmate stated an excessive force claim by alleging that an official, without provocation, smashed his face against a metal door and applied leg and wrist restraints that were tight and painful. The inmate alleged he was taken to his cell, was blindfolded, and suffered a painful chokehold on the official's orders. (Racine Correctional Institution, Wisconsin)

Jackson v. DeTella, 998 F.Supp. 901 (N.D. Ill. 1998). An inmate filed a pro se § 1983 action against prison officials in their individual and official capacities claiming he was subjected to excessive physical force and that he was subjected to cruel and unusual punishment because of certain conditions of his confinement. The district court held that officials who sprayed the inmate with a chemical agent and beat him were not entitled to qualified immunity. The court found that an eight-day deprivation of personal hygiene items and bedding was not cruel and unusual punishment, where there was no evidence that the deprivation resulted in harm to the inmate. James v. Coughlin, 13 F.Supp.2d 403 (W.D.N.Y. 1998). A state inmate brought a § 1983 suit against corrections officials alleging constitutional violations inconnection with a search. The district court granted summary judgment to the officials, finding that the curtailment of the inmate's First Amendment rights during a pat-frisk was justified. The inmate had failed to comply with pat-frisk procedures and was increasingly loud and boisterous and he was ordered to be quiet by a corrections officer. The court noted that the inmate had other means of expressing his dissatisfaction, such as the grievance procedure. The court found that the alleged conduct of a corrections officer in pushing his genital area against the inmate during the pat-frisk search, and wedging the inmate's pants into his buttocks, was a de minimus activity that did not implicate the Eighth Amendment. The court also found that the alleged conduct of a corrections officer in pushing the inmate back into his cell after the search did not involve the use of excessive force in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The inmate claimed he injured his back, and complained that he was denied medical treatment; the court concluded that corrections officials were not deliberately indifferent to his medical needs because the need for treatment was not apparent, and he was examined by a nurse, who found no injuries, within a half hour. The inmate was denied a single shower after the search because of his conduct, and the court found that this did not implicate any constitutionally protected liberty interest. The court held that placing the inmate on a restricted diet for three days did not violate the Eighth Amendment, absent an allegation that the inmate failed to receive a nutritional meal for the three days or that he suffered an imminent health risk because of the diet. Kapfhammer v. Boyd, 5 F.Supp.2d 689 (E.D.Wis. 1998). A state prisoner sued a correctional officer alleging the use of excessive force in violation of the Eighth Amendment and § 1983. The district court denied summary judgment for the officer, finding that disputed questions of material fact as to the amount and type of force used by the officer to remove the prisoner from his bunk, and whether the prisoner was injured in the course of an actual search, precluded summary judgment. The court also found that there was a disputed issue of material fact regarding the officer's intent at the time he used force. (Waupun Correctional Institution, Wisconsin)

Kesler v. King, 29 F.Supp.2d 356 (S.D.Tex. 1998). Former inmates from Missouri who had served time in a privately-operated unit leased from a county in Texas brought a § 1983 action. The district court found that the county sheriff, his chief deputy, and a county official in charge of the detention center's emergency response team were not entitled to qualified immunity from claims alleging the use of excessive force, failure to train or supervise staff, or failure to screen job applicants. The suit addressed staff actions that had become nationally-publicized through a videotape that depicted staff use of force, including the use of stun guns and dogs. The court held that a defendant's conduct of allowing a canine unit dog to bite five inmates without provocation during a shakedown was not objectively reasonable and the defendant was not entitled to qualified immunity from liability. The court also denied qualified immunity for another defendant who failed to intercede to protect the inmates from excessive force used by officers, failing to stop an officer from allowing a dog to bite inmates, and failing to remove an officer who was using his stun gun on inmates. Mahotep v. DeLuca, 3 F.Supp.2d 385 (W.D.N.Y 1998). A prison inmate sued prison officials under § 1983. The district court held that the inmate presented fact issues with regard to allegations of physical assault by officers. The inmate claimed that as a result of an assault by officers he suffered a ruptured testicle, groin damage, severe pain, a pinched nerve in his ankle, and had a severe asthmatic attack that necessitated a long hospital stay. The court found that allegations of retaliation for legal action presented fact issues, where the inmate's conduct in filing previous grievances against the same officers was clearly protected by the First Amendment, and the alleged assault occurred approximately one week after the inmate filed the grievances. Malik v. Mack, 15 F.Supp.2d 1047 (D.Kan. 1998). A prisoner challenged his isolation from other inmates during his evaluation for placement in the general population. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants, finding that the isolation was not an unreasonable incursion upon his First Amendment rights. The prisoner was isolated during evaluation based on information received prior to his arrival at the facility. The court also found that the routine placement of restraints incident to a cell move, during which the prisoner allegedly sustained a wrist injury and a cut lip, did not constitute excessive force in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants, finding that the detainee's allegations of being slapped three times, without any evidence of any resulting injury, was at most a de minimis injury that did not implicate the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Moore v. Hosier, 43 F.Supp.2d 978 (N.D.Ind. 1998). A former pretrial detainee sued a county sheriff's department and individual law enforcement officers alleging civil rights violations arising out of his treatment while he was being held in county confinement. The district court held that the restraint of the detainee by officers for the purposes of decontaminating him after a pepper spray cannister malfunctioned did not amount to assault and battery under state law. The detainee alleged that officers strapped him to a chair with his arms tied behind his back and beat him about his face and body, and placed his face and mouth in front of a shower. The court held that even if these allegations were true, they did not amount to an invasion of privacy under Indiana law. The court denied summary judgment for officers who did not participate in the beating of the detainee but witnessed it and had the opportunity to stop it. The court held that the sheriff's department did not negligently train its employees in the use of force, where the department had developed and maintained detailed procedures for training incoming officers in handling inmates, and the department policy specifically stated that officers were expected to use force only in a lawful and justifiable manner. The detainee admitted that he was intoxicated when officers arrived at the scene and that he fled on foot when they arrived. The detainee was involved with altercations with officers at a detention center, and was strapped into a restraining chair and was sprayed with pepper spray. Moore v. Novak, 146 F.3d 531 (8th Cir. 1998). An arrestee brought a civil rights action against correctional officers under § 1983, alleging the use of excessive force and violations of equal protection and due process. The district court entered judgment for the officers and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the finding that excessive force was not used was not clearly erroneous, even if the fact that a videotape of the incident was missing raised the inference that the videotape would have supported the arrestee's version of the incident. The court noted that a supervisor's testimony sufficiently rebutted this inference. The arrestee was intoxicated, agitated, and refused to comply with commands, kicked the arresting officer, continued to struggle and attempt to get away, and posed an immediate threat to his own safety and to the safety of the officers. Parkus v. Delo, 135 F.3d 1232 (8th Cir. 1998). An inmate sued corrections officers alleging his rights were violated when he was subdued following his attack on a prison psychologist. The district court entered judgment in favor of the officers and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the district court did not abuse its discretion when it defined "sadistically" in its instruction as "extreme or excessive cruelty or delighting in cruelty." The court noted that the inmate vigorously opposed the officers' efforts to subdue him after he attacked, choked, sexually assaulted and injured a female prison psychologist. The court also found that although an officer was dismissed for using force against the inmate, this action against the officer did not unambiguously decide the issue of whether the officer used excessive force in the context of an Eighth Amendment claim. Rodriguez v. McGinnis, 1 F.Supp.2d 244 (S.D.N.Y. 1998). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against corrections officials alleging violation of his due process rights by the imposition of a 17-day keeplock confinement sanction upon him. The court found that 17-day placement in keeplock was not atypical nor a significant hardship, and that officials were entitled to qualified immunity on the due process claim. The inmate also alleged that an officer violated his Eighth Amendment rights by stepping on his back and kicking him in his lower back numerous times without provocation while he was handcuffed. The district court held that the inmate stated an Eighth Amendment claim with regard to the excessive force allegations. (Downstate Correctional Facility, New York)

Spicer v. Collins, 9 F.Supp.2d 673 (E.D.Tex. 1998). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against prison officials and staff. The district court dismissed the case. The court held that the inmate failed to state a claim based on prison officials' alleged verbal threats, harassment and insults. The court found that the alleged threats were of such a magnitude that they constituted a substantial risk of harm to the inmate. The court found that the inmate failed to state a claim for failure to take action to protect him after he reported that correctional officers had made verbal threats to him. The court concluded that the prisoner failed to suffer "some injury" as required for a § 1983 claim, when he claimed that he suffered only pain in his neck, arms and hands as the result of being handcuffed, and claimed no physical injury as the result of being grabbed by the arm, absent evidence that the force used by officers was repugnant to the conscience of mankind. Stanley v. Hejirika, 134 F.3d 629 (4th Cir. 1998). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against correctional officers who subdued him during a prison disturbance, alleging that they used unconstitutionally excessive force. The district court awarded the inmate $1,000 in compensatory damages and $2,000 in punitive damages. The officers appealed and the appeals court reversed, finding that evidence did not support the finding that the officers acted sadistically and maliciously for the sole purpose of causing harm when they subdued the inmate. The appeals court cited a videotape of the incident which showed that the officers treated the inmate roughly but did not demonstrate wanton sadism. The court also held that as a matter of law, the injuries suffered by the inmate were insufficient to establish the use of unconstitutionally excessive force. The inmate suffered bruises, swelling and a loosened tooth. (A-Wing Tier, Maryland Correction Annex, Jessup, Maryland)

Baker v. Willett, 42 F.Supp.2d 192 (N.D.N.Y. 1999). A jail inmate brought an action against a county and county officials alleging excessive use of force in violation of § 1983. The district court denied, in part, the defendants' motion to dismiss, finding that a named sheriff's deputy was not entitled to qualified immunity because it was clearly established at the time of the incident that unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain constituted cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The deputy allegedly pushed the inmate in the back, causing him to fall off of a table and strike his head on metal bars approximately four or five feet from where he had been sitting. The inmate sustained a laceration on his forehead which required sutures. The county Undersheriff reviewed the incident and spoke to the inmate and the deputy, but did not conduct a formal investigation nor discipline the deputy. The district court dismissed the sheriff's department and county from the suit, finding that they could not be held liable on the ground that the sheriff's department had a practice of not investigating use of force complaints or disciplining officers. The court noted that three of five meritorious complaints in the past ten years had been directed toward one officer who had been terminated after disciplinary proceedings. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants finding that the Eleventh Amendment barred a suit against the state division of parole, that parole officers who took no part in a scuffle could not be held liable, and that the force used by parole officers to restrain the parolee was objectively reasonable. According to the court, the parole officers' use of force to restrain the parolee who was acting in a dangerous and violent manner was reasonable, noting that the scuffle only lasted for a few minutes and resulted in no injury to the parolee. Campbell v. Sikes, 169 F.3d 1353 (11th Cir. 1999). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against a prison official and mental health personnel and the district court granted summary judgment for the defendants. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that a psychiatrist who worked part time at the prison was not deliberately indifferent, absent a showing of subjective mental intent, and that expert testimony did not establish the psychiatrist's subjective mental intent. The psychiatrist allegedly misdiagnosed the prisoner with polysubstance abuse rather than bipolar disorder, and therefore failed to treat the prisoner's bipolar disorder. The court found that the remaining defendants were not deliberately indifferent. The appeals court also found that a prison official and mental health personnel did not use excessive force in using an "L" shaped method of restraint and straightjacket to restrain the prisoner, absent evidence that the force was applied maliciously and sadistically. The court noted that the prisoner posed a serious threat to herself and others, lesser restraints were ineffective, the restraints caused no physical injury, and the prisoner's physical condition was carefully monitored. Drummer v. Luttrell, 75 F.Supp.2d 796 (W.D.Tenn. 1999). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against corrections officials alleging that a disciplinary action violated her due process and Eighth Amendment rights. The district court held that strip-searching and handcuffing the inmate during a unit search did not constitute a due process violation because the action did not impose an atypical and significant hardship on her. The inmate had been strip-searched during a shakedown of her dormitory. After squatting and coughing twice the inmate refused a direct order to do so again and was disciplined. She then left a shower area dressed in nothing but her panties and two male officers were called for assistance. (Shelby County Correctional Center, Tennessee)

Grayson v. Peed, 195 F.3d 692 (4th Cir. 1999). The administrator for the estate of a deceased detainee sued officers and county officials under § 1983 asserting constitutional violations, negligence, gross negligence, negligent training and negligent supervision. The district court granted summary judgement for the defendants on all § 1983 claims and declined to assume supplemental jurisdiction over state law claims. The appeals court affirmed. The detainee had been arrested and transported to the county detention center and the following day was declared brain dead. During his booking the detainee was acting irrationally, his speech was slurred, and he kept repeating in an intoxicated manner "I can't believe this is all over a traffic ticket." He was then taken to a cell and strip searched, but at the conclusion of the search attempted to crawl out of the cell and a struggle ensued. Officers used pepper spray to subdue him. Early the next morning the detainee began acting belligerent again. He resisted being moved to another cell and a five-man cell extraction team pinned him face down. During the struggle he was sprayed with pepper spray and he was punched several times. Once restrained, he was carried face down to another cell and was placed in four-point restraints. A few minutes later he appeared to be unconscious and was checked by medics and was found to be "okay." Another officer then noticed that the detainee was not breathing, CPR was initiated and he was taken to a local hospital where he was found to be brain dead. The appeals court held that officers at the county detention center were not deliberately indifferent to the medical needs of the deceased detainee, either when the detainee was booked or during his custody. A trained medic was on hand in the booking area and discerned no sign of a medical problem. According to the court, the failure to clean pepper spray off of the detainee in a timely manner was, in the first instance, due to the detainee's violent response to the officer's offer to wash the spray off, and in the second instance was due to the need to rush the detainee to a hospital for emergency care. The appeals court held that the officers did not use excessive force against the detainee, but rather that they applied the force necessary in a good faith effort to restore discipline. The court also found that there were no actionable deficiencies in the sheriff's policies, customs or training. According to the court, "...the appellant's own expert penologist conceded that [sheriff] Peed's policies met the standards of both the Virginia Board of Corrections and the American Correctional Association." The court also concluded, "...claims that [sheriff] Peed provided inadequate training for his employees must also fail. As of the time of this incident, the ADC had been accredited for more than ten years by both the American Correctional Association and the National Commission on Correctional Health Care, two organizations whose training requirements often surpass minimal constitutional standards." Hardy v. Town of Hayneville, 50 F.Supp.2d 1176 (M.D.Ala. 1999). An arrestee brought a § 1983 suit against an arresting officer, chief of police, mayor and town, alleging false imprisonment and use of excessive force. The court found that the arrestee's allegations that the police officer arrested him and detained him in a county jail without informing him of the nature and cause of the accusations against him were sufficient to state a Sixth Amendment claim. The court also found that allegations that the police chief and town failed to provide police officers with adequate training on the lawful use of force, and that the unlawful use of force would be condoned by their superiors, were sufficient to state a Fourth Amendment claim. The arrestee had been preaching the gospel and greeting people as they came into a store, with the permission of the owner. A police officer instructed the arrestee to leave the store and then allegedly followed the arrestee to the back of the store when he attempted to protest to the owner. The officer allegedly assaulted the arrestee and battered him about the head and back, threw him to the ground and struck his wrists repeatedly with unopened handcuffs. (Town of Hayneville, Alabama)

The appeals court affirmed in part and remanded, finding that the officials' alleged act of keeping the inmate in hard restraints for two eight-hour periods after he damaged his cell did not amount to cruel and unusual punishment. Lambert v. City of Dumas, 187 F.3d 931 (8th Cir. 1999). The family of a detainee who died in his jail cell brought a § 1983 action against a city and police officers, asserting claims for unlawful arrest, excessive force and wrongful death. The district court denied the defendants' motion for summary judgment and the appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The appeals court held that summary judgment was precluded by factual issues regarding the amount and degree of force used during the detainee's arrest, but that the officers were not liable for wrongful death, absent any evidence that the officers were subjectively aware of any risk that the detainee would inflict harm on himself. The detainee did not threaten to commit suicide during his incarceration or otherwise indicate that he might do so, he was never classified as a suicide risk, and the officers were not shown to have knowledge of a prior incident when the detainee swallowed a metal crack pipe. The court noted that a showing that a jailer was negligent in failing to recognize a prisoner's suicidal tendencies is insufficient to satisfy the § 1983 deliberate indifference standard. An arrestee brought a § 1983 action against a city, police chief, police officer, and physician alleging excessive force during his arrest and deliberate indifference to his serious medical needs. The court entered judgment against the police officer upon jury verdict, granted a directed motion for the physician, and dismissed the remaining claims. The district court found that the physician's failure to take the arrestee's medical history while treating him at the jail, and his failure to diagnose the arrestee's broken ribs, did not establish a claim of deliberate indifference under § 1983. The arrestee was brought to a jail dispensary for treatment after he was arrested. He was moaning, almost incoherent, and complained of severe pain in his chest. The jail physician did not take a medical history. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part and remanded. The appeals court held that whether the officer's use of force was in furtherance of the city's allegedly unconstitutional dog-bite policy was an issue for the jury for the purposes of the arrestee's claims against the city and the chief. The court noted that although the arrestee could not recover further compensatory damages from the city or the chief, nominal damages were available. (City of Los Angeles, California)

The district court denied summary judgment for the guards, finding genuine issues of fact as to whether they had twisted his penis and testicles while he was handcuffed after he had requested medical attention. A corrections officer who was convicted of violating an inmate's constitutional rights appealed his conviction on three counts of violating 18 U.S.C. § 42, which makes it a criminal act to willfully deprive a person of rights protected by the Constitution or laws of the United States while acting under the color of law. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the officer's acts constituted punishment and rose to the level of a constitutional violation. The corrections officer was found to have stepped on an inmate's penis and to have perpetrated other assaults on inmates. The officer, who was six feet two inches tall and weighed over 300 pounds, instructed an inmate to kneel and put his penis on a horizontal bar of his cell, and then stood with his full weight on the penis for a few seconds. The court concluded that the officer was acting under the color of state law, noting that the officer was "on duty and in full uniform, was acting within his authority to supervise and care for inmates under his watch when the assaults occurred." Fuentes v. Wagner, 206 F.3d 335 (3rd Cir. 2000). An inmate who had been detained in a county prison while awaiting sentencing sued corrections officers and prison officials under § 1983 for the alleged use of excessive force. A district court jury returned a verdict in favor of the defendants and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that whether the inmate was placed in a restraint chair to stop his disruptive behavior and maintain prison order or for purposes of punishment was a jury question and that placement of the inmate in a restraint chair for eight hours did not violate substantive due process under the Eighth Amendment. The court noted that the inmate was not kept in the chair any longer than was authorized, his physical condition was checked every fifteen minutes and he was released every two hours for ten minutes to allow stretching, exercise, and use of the toilet. He was examined by a nurse at the end of the eight-hour period. According to the court, an inmate awaiting sentencing had the same status under the Constitution as a pretrial detainee and the Due Process Clause protected him from the use of excessive force amounting to punishment. Garcia v. City of Boston, 115 F.Supp.2d 74 (D.Mass. 2000). A pretrial detainee brought an action against a city, a hospital and the hospital's emergency psychiatric services program, alleging excessive force and denial of medical and psychological care. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants. The detainee had been arrested by the city police following a domestic disturbance and was taken to a police station where he was booked and placed in a cell. That evening the detainee made an apparent attempt to commit suicide by cutting his left wrist with the aluminum top of a juice container that had been given to him with his dinner. An ambulance was summoned but the detainee refused treatment. He was placed on the suicide list at the station and handcuffed to a bar on the wall in the booking area, where he could be closely monitored. The following evening the detainee again attempted to commit suicide when he obtained a book of matches and set fire to his own clothing while still handcuffed to the bar. He sustained burns and was taken to a hospital. Hospital personnel explored various mental health alternatives for the detainee but he was eventually returned to the police station and handcuffed to the bar, where he lit his shirt on fire fifteen minutes after returning from the hospital. The detainee's clothes were taken away and he remained in the booking area. Later that day the detainee pulled an officer's gun out of its holster, shot the officer and another prisoner, and was then shot by another officer. The district court held that the officials and hospital staff were not negligent in their failure to place the detainee in a state mental facility since the detainee was not eligible for placement while charges were pending. The court also held that firing of a gun at the detainee was not an excessive use of force because there was a clear need for the use of force, only one round was fired, and the detainee sustained only a limited injury. (Boston Police Department, Area B, District 2 Police Station, Massachusetts)

Jackson v. Johnson, 118 F.Supp.2d 278 (N.D.N.Y. 2000). Representatives of a juvenile who was incarcerated in a youth center sought damages for injuries sustained by the juvenile when he was subjected to a physical restraint technique (PRT). The district court dismissed the defendants' motions for summary judgment, finding that there were fact issues as to whether aides applied excessive force in violation of the juvenile's substantive due process rights. The court held that the Eighth Amendment did not apply to incarcerated juveniles, but rather that the appropriate constitutional standard for evaluating the treatment of an adjudicated juvenile delinquent is the substantive due process guarantee of the Fourteenth Amendment. The court denied qualified immunity for a nurse at the center, holding that it was not objectively reasonable for her to conclude that the juvenile was faking injury in view of his unresponsiveness and general physical condition. A 220-pound aide had initiated a PRT on the 145-pound juvenile and was assisted by a 250-pound coworker. The PRT was applied for approximately ten minutes before the officer of the day arrived at the scene, by which time the juvenile had become unresponsive, clammy, was gasping for breath and was salivating. The PRT continued to be applied for another twenty minutes, under the supervision of the officer of the day, until the juvenile was rendered unconscious. The facility nurse was summoned and no attempts were made to revive the juvenile before the nurse arrived. After some treatment in the infirmary the juvenile was returned to his housing unit. Later, the juvenile had physical difficulty while in the cafeteria which prompted another round of PRT for more than twenty minutes. When the juvenile did not respond to attempts to resuscitate him, he was transported to a hospital where he remained in a comatose state for two months. The juvenile suffers from serious and permanent physical and mental injuries as the result of the use of force. (Louis Gossett Jr. Residential Center, New York)

Jones-Bey v. Conley, 144 F.Supp.2d 1035 (N.D.Ind. 2000). A state prisoner brought a civil rights suit against prison guards and a nurse, alleging use of excessive force and deliberate indifference to his medical needs. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants on the deliberate indifference claim, finding that although the prisoner's injuries were serious, a nurse examined him within a few hours of the incident and made arrangements for further examination by another nurse that same afternoon. The district court denied summary judgment on the excessive force claims, finding genuine issues of fact regarding the degree of force used by guards in extracting the prisoner from his cell and restraining him after he was handcuffed and shackled. The court also found that a prison guard who had a realistic opportunity to step forward and prevent a fellow guard from violating a prisoner's rights through the excessive use of force, but fails to do so, can be held liable for an Eighth Amendment violation. PEPPER SPRAY

Jones v. Shields, 207 F.3d 491 (8th Cir. 2000). An inmate brought a pro se § 1983 action against a corrections officer alleging that the officer inflicted cruel and unusual punishment by unjustly spraying him with a pepper-based chemical spray. The district court denied judgment for the officer and the appeals court reversed and remanded. The appeals court held that the officer's actions did not violate the Eighth Amendment because the spray resulted in only a de minimis injury and there was no showing that the officer's use of the spray was malicious or sadistic. The court noted that the inmate's own testimony revealed that the effects of the spray had cleared within 45 minutes, that we was twice taken to the infirmary and treated with water during that period, and that a medical examination the following day revealed no lingering effects. Santiago v. C.O. Campisi Shield #4592., 91 F.Supp.2d 665 (S.D.N.Y. 2000). A pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against a city corrections department alleging that an officer assaulted him in his cell. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants, finding that a corrections officer's alleged open-handed slap of the detainee after an altercation was de minimis where the detainee suffered no physical injury. The court found that the slap was not sufficiently repugnant to the conscience of mankind to constitute a due process violation. (Bronx County Courthouse, New York)

Velasco v. Head, 166 F.Supp.2d 1100 (W.D.Va. 2000). A state prisoner sued correctional officers alleging he was subjected to the malicious use of force during an intake procedure, seeking monetary damages for his alleged personal injuries. The district court denied summary judgment in favor of the officers, finding that material fact issues regarding whether the prisoner's shackles were stepped on by correctional officers, and at what point a stun gun was used, precluded summary judgment. The court found that if the allegations regarding the use of a stun gun were proven true, the prisoner would not be required to prove that he suffered a permanent injury to prove that he was subjected to the malicious use of force. Wagner v. Bay City, Tex., 227 F.3d 316 (5th Cir. 2000). Survivors of an arrestee who died in police custody brought a § 1983 action against police officers, alleging the use of excessive force and deliberate indifference to the need for medical attention. The district court denied summary judgment for the officers. The appeals court reversed, entered judgment for the officers, and remanded. The appeals court held that the officers did not act with deliberate indifference to a risk of harm. The arrestee had resisted arrest and struck an officer with his fists. The arrestee stopped breathing and died after officers sprayed him with pepper spray, placed him face down on the pavement to handcuff him, placed a shin across his back to hold him down, and placed him on his stomach in the back of a patrol car to transport him to the jail. The officers said that they heard the arrestee groaning on the way to the police station and therefore believed he was still breathing. Although the officers did not take the arrestee to the hospital, the court noted that pepper spray decontamination could effectively be done in jail and the officers believed the arrestee was still breathing. Warren v. Westchester County Jail, 106 F.Supp.2d 559 (S.D.N.Y. 2000). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against a county jail, administrators and officers, alleging Eighth Amendment violations. The district granted summary judgment for the defendants, holding that a jail officer who fought with the inmate had not employed excessive force when he grabbed the inmate in a bear hug in a good faith effort to restore order, even though the inmate claimed that the officer took advantage of the situation to administer additional blows. The court also held that verbal abuse, which the inmate had alleged he was subjected to, did not rise to the level of a constitutional violation that was actionable under § 1983. Williams v. Department of Corrections, 208 F.3d 681 (8th Cir. 2000). An inmate brought a civil rights action against the Iowa Department of Corrections and other defendants alleging that they had retaliated against him for participating in a hearing by placing leg irons on him too tightly. The district court dismissed the action and the inmate appealed. The appeals court held that the inmate stated a retaliation claim against two correctional officers alleging that they placed leg shackles too tightly on the inmate and refused to loosen or remove the shackles after he complained. The inmate suffered intense pain, swelling and bruises. (Anamosa State Penitentiary, Iowa)

Craw v. Gray, 159 F.Supp.2d 679 (N.D.Ohio 2001). An arrestee sued law enforcement officers under § 1983 asserting claims for use of excessive force. The district court granted partial summary judgment in favor of the officers, finding that the allegations did not support a claim for inadequate training of an officer and that past "use of force" incident reports did not support the claim for inadequate supervision of the officer. According to the court, the assertion that a particular officer may be unsatisfactorily trained does not alone "suffice to fasten § 1983 liability" on a municipality for failure to train. The court noted that none of the reports showed that the deputy acted improperly. The officer had brought the arrestee to a county jail and during the booking process an altercation between the arrestee and the officer resulted in a right hip fracture and dislocation for the arrestee. Davis v. Hill, 173 F.Supp.2d 1136 (D.Kan. 2001). An arrestee brought a § 1983 action against a county, sheriff, and employees alleging that he was the victim of excessive force while detained. The defendants moved for summary judgment and the district court granted the motion in part, and denied it in part. The court held that fact issues as to whether sheriff's deputies beat the arrestee senseless in his cell precluded summary judgment on the detainee's Fourth Amendment excessive force claim. The court also found that the arrestee could maintain a suit against deputies who were near the cell at the time, despite his inability to identify the two who allegedly administered the beating. The arrestee was allegedly handcuffed in his cell during a staff shift change. The arrestee was yelling and kicking his cell door and alleged that an officer entered the cell and hit him behind his ear, knocking him into the steel bed and against a steel wall, and then ground his thumb behind the arrestee's ear. According to the arrestee, another officer entered and the two "proceeded attacking and torturing me on every joint in my body..." (Sedgwick Co. Adult Det. Facility, Kansas)

Despain v. Uphoff, 264 F.3d 965 (10th Cir. 2001). A prison inmate brought a § 1983 action against prison officials alleging Eighth Amendment violations. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the officials and the inmate appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The appeals court held that flooding of the prison's administrative segregation unit was a significant deprivation, as required to support an Eighth Amendment claim, and that there was an issue of material fact as to whether there was an ongoing threat to safety during the flooding that would justify the inmate's exposure to human waste. Because the inmate's extended exposure to human waste as a result of flooding was a violation of clearly established law, the court found that an associate prison warden was not entitled to qualified immunity. The court also found that the inmate stated a claim of excessive use of force in his allegation that a corrections officer indiscriminately discharged pepper spray. (Wyoming State Penitentiary)

Ducally v. Rhode Island Dept. of Corrections, 160 F.Supp.2d 220 (D.R.I. 2001). A prisoner brought a § 1983 action against a corrections department and corrections officers alleging cruel and unusual punishment. The district court dismissed the claims against the department, but found that the prisoner stated a claim against an officer with his allegations that the officer intentionally slammed a cell door on his hand. Evicci v. Baker, 190 F.Supp.2d 233 (D.Mass. 2002). A prisoner brought federal civil rights and state tort actions against corrections officials alleging that he was subjected to excessive force in violation of the Eighth Amendment, and that he was denied medical care. The district court denied summary judgment for the defendants on the excessive force claims because the prisoner alleged that three officers and others engaged in a joint venture to beat him and that other officers refused to document his injuries. The court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants on the medical care claims, noting that the prisoner received 16 sick call examinations during the three months following his alleged assault. The court also found that the prisoner's allegations that officials interfered with his right to petition the government through his legal mail could not be supported in light of the nine suits the prisoner had filed in the previous three years. Foulk v. Charrier, 262 F.3d 687 (8th Cir. 2001). A prisoner brought a § 1983 action against a corrections officer alleging the use of excessive force in violation of his Eighth Amendment rights. The district court entered judgment on a jury verdict, awarded nominal damages of $1 plus interest and costs, and awarded attorney fees. The appeals court affirmed in part, vacated in part, and reversed in part. The appeals court held that the award of nominal damages for an Eighth Amendment violation was permissible, and that the finding of use of excessive force was supported by evidence. The appeals court found that the award of attorney fees was subject to the cap established by the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA), and that the PLRA cap on attorney fees did not violate the equal protection clause. The court noted that under the provisions of PLRA, if non-monetary relief of some kind had been ordered, whether or not there was also a monetary award, the attorney fees cap would not apply. Gailor v. Armstrong, 187 F.Supp.2d 729 (W.D.Ky. 2001). The estate of a deceased pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against a county and correctional officers for the beating death of the detainee by officers. The district granted summary judgment in favor of the county, finding that there was insufficient evidence to hold the county liable, but denied summary judgment for the officers. The court held that fact issues remained as to whether the officers' use of force was excessive. The court ruled that the officers and their supervisor were not entitled to qualified immunity. The court held that the county was not liable under § 1983 because evidence that the officers failed to follow the county's use of force policy, officials allegedly falsified reports, and evidence that some officers received only limited use of force training, did not demonstrate custom or usage necessary to support a § 1983 claim. The court denied summary judgment for a supervisor who allegedly failed to intervene when she saw excessive force being used against the detainee. Hawkins v. Comparet-Cassani, 251 F.3d 1230 (9th Cir. 2001). A convicted prisoner who had a "stun belt" placed on him, and activated, when he appeared in court for sentencing, brought a § 1983 action. The district court certified a class action and granted a preliminary injunction. The appeals court reversed in part and remanded. The appeals court held that the class of all persons in the custody of the county sheriff was improperly certified since the convicted prisoner could not serve as a representative for those prisoners who had not yet been convicted. The appeals court also found the district court injunction against the use of the belt was overbroad because it did not allow for use of the belt to protect courtroom security, such as restricting violence or preventing escape. But the court noted that even at sentencing, where a defendant's guilt is no longer in dispute, shackling is inherently prejudicial and detracts from the dignity and decorum of the proceeding, and impedes the defendant's ability to communicate with his counsel. The district court denied summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds for the defendants. The appeals court reversed and remanded, finding that officers were qualifiedly immune from liability to the inmate. The appeals court reversed and remanded, finding that the officials were qualifiedly immune from civil rights liability and were not deliberately indifferent. The court noted that prison officials had investigated rumors of impending inmate violence before the riot and there was no evidence that they should have done anything differently once the threat materialized. According to the court, a prison warden complied with a statewide housing practice and he had no affirmative duty to change the policy. The inmate had been shot in the neck during the disturbance. Jordan v. Cobb County, Georgia, 227 F.Supp.2d 1322 (N.D.Ga. 2001). A pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against a jail officer and a county, alleging excessive force, wrongful seizure, and assault and battery. The district court held that the officer was not entitled to qualified immunity and that a fact issue as to whether the officer violated the detainee's substantive due process rights, precluded summary judgment. The court found that the county could not be held liable for the officer's alleged conduct. The detainee had been arrested for suspicion of driving under the influence of alcohol and was detained in a holding cell at a police precinct. While in the holding cell, the detainee allegedly resisted being handcuffed by the officer. After a struggle or altercation, the detainee was shot twice in the abdomen by the officer. There were no witnesses to the shooting. The court noted that "virtually all of the facts and circumstances surrounding the altercation and shooting are in dispute." Kostrzewa v. City of Troy, 247 F.3d 633 (6th Cir. 2001). An arrestee sued a city and police officers asserting claims for use of excessive force. The district court dismissed the case but the appeals court reversed and remanded. The appeals court held that the allegations supported a claim for use of excessive force and that the officers were not entitled to qualified immunity. The appeals court found that the city's handcuff policy, that required all detainees to wear handcuffs, supported a § 1983 claim of the arrestee who allegedly suffered pain and injury from being restrained with handcuffs that were too small for his wrists, despite being arrested for a non-violent misdemeanant offense.

The district court found for the defendants, holding that the inmate's four-hour immobilization in "four-point" restraints did not by itself constitute an atypical and significant hardship, where there was no evidence regarding the frequency of such restraints at the prison, how tightly the restraints were fastened, and the effect on the inmate. Lewis v. Board of Sedgwick County Com'rs., 140 F.Supp.2d 1125 (D.Kan. 2001). A detainee brought a federal civil rights suit against a county alleging that jail officers used excessive force against him. A jury returned a verdict of $500,000 in favor of the inmate and the county asked for a new trial or for judgment as a matter of law. The district court granted judgment as a matter of law, finding that evidence was insufficient to show that the county had been deliberately indifferent to the use of excessive force against detainees at the county detention facility. According to the court, the size of the damage award suggested that the jury was excessively or improperly motivated by its desire to punish the county. The court held that the county was not deliberately indifferent to the rights of the detainee because it provided training designed to prevent the use of excessive force at both a training academy and on-the-job, and had established a use-of-force policy of which its detention officers were aware. The court found that it was not a "glaring omission" to fail to instruct detention officers during training that they were prohibited from standing on a detainee's back in an effort to restrain a person. The court held that it was not deliberate indifference by the county to state in county training manuals that it was permissible to use pressure point tactics when inmates were being placed in a restraint chair, where the manuals cautioned that the tactics were to be used with the minimal amount of force necessary to gain compliance. The court noted that the county had encountered only 22 complaints of excessive force in its jail from approximately 90,000 detainees who went through the facility. (Sedgwick Co. Morris v. Crawford County, Ark., 173 F.Supp.2d 870 (W.D.Ark. 2001). A detainee in a county jail brought a § 1983 action and state law battery claims against the county, sheriff and deputies. The defendants moved for summary judgment and the district court granted the motion in part and denied it in part. The court held that genuine issues of material fact existed as to the type of force used by a deputy against the detainee, and whether the detainee sustained injuries, precluding summary judgment. The court also found that the deputy was not entitled to qualified immunity for his alleged use of force on the detainee, who was allegedly not resisting. There was evidence that the deputy used a "knee drop" on the detainee, thereby severing his intestine. (Crawford County Detention Center, Arkansas)

Piedra v. True, 169 F.Supp.2d 1239 (D.Kan. 2001). A federal prisoner brought an action alleging that assaults by prison officers violated his constitutional rights. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the officers, finding that they were entitled to qualified immunity for beating the prisoner while he was handcuffed. According to the court, it was not clearly established at the time that guards could not use force on a combative prisoner who was handcuffed. The court noted that medical records did not support the prisoner's claim that he was repeatedly beaten. According to the court, the prisoner swung a telephone, kicked, spat and verbally assaulted the officers. (United States Penitentiary, Leavenworth, Kansas)

The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants, finding that the force applied by jail officials to restrain the inmate did not violate his rights. The inmate had refused to go to his cell after multiple orders to do so, and struck at one official with a Young v. City of Mount Ranier, 238 F.3d 567 (4th Cir. 2001). The parents of a boy who died in custody brought state law negligence and wrongful death claims, and constitutional claims under § 1983, arising from the death of their son. Following removal from state court, the federal district court dismissed the complaint and the parents appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part and dismissed in part. The appeals court held that the conduct of officers who took the boy into custody for emergency psychiatric evaluation fell within the "middle range of culpability," between gross negligence and intentional misconduct, noting that the boy was owed the same duties owed to a more typical pretrial detainee. The appeals court held that the conduct of the officers fell short of deliberate indifference, as needed to establish § 1983 liability. The boy had resisted when officers tried to take him into custody. The officers used pepper spray to subdue him and then handcuffed him and placed him face down in the back seat of their police car. He was transported to a local hospital where he was found to have no pulse and where efforts to resuscitate him failed. An autopsy revealed that he had PCP in his system. Bozeman v. Orum, 199 F.Supp.2d 1216 (M.D.Ala. 2002). The representative of the estate of a pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against a sheriff and officials at a county detention facility, alleging that the detainee's death was the result constitutional violations. The district court held that detention officers' use of force to restrain the detainee did not violate his Fourteenth Amendment right against the use of excessive force, even though the officers threatened to "kick" the detainee's "ass." The officers apparently punched or slapped the detainee, and the detainee died as the result of the officers' actions, but the court found that some level of force was necessary to restore order where the detainee was apparently undergoing a mental breakdown in his cell. According to the court, the facility provided adequate training in the proper use of deadly force, including warnings on the dangers of positional asphyxia, and was therefore not liable under § 1983 for failing to supervise staff. The district court denied summary judgment in favor of the defendants and the defendants appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part and reversed in part. The appeals court held that correctional officers did not use excessive force when they used two bursts of pepper spray to quell fighting in a cell. But the appeals court found that summary judgment was precluded by fact questions on the issue of officials' potential deliberate indifference to the serious medical needs of inmates in nearby cells who were affected by pepper spray that drifted into their cells. The court noted that excessive force directed at one prisoner can also establish a cause of action for harm that befalls other prisoners. (Pelican Bay State Prison, California)

Combs v. Wilkinson, 315 F.3d 548 (6th Cir. 2002). Death row inmates sued several state corrections supervisors and officers under § 1983, alleging that they used excessive force in quelling a disturbance in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The district court granted the defendants' motions for summary judgment and dismissal, and the inmates appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, and reversed and remanded in part. The appeals court held that an individual officer's use of mace was not malicious or sadistic. The court found that summary judgment was precluded by fact questions as to whether the commander of a special response team adequately briefed the team members, and failed to control the use of chemical agents in the extraction of inmates. The court held that the commander was not liable under § 1983 for failing to admonish team members when he overheard them discussing particular inmates that they wanted to "beat," absent any showing that the commander encouraged or directly participated in the use of excessive force. The court found that the inmates were not entitled to an injunction requiring corrections officers to wear name tags or other identification and to videotape cell extractions, even though their failure to do so was a violation of state corrections policies and regulations. A state prisoner brought § 1983 claims against correctional employees, alleging they used excessive force against him during two entries into his cell, that they refused to provide him with toilet paper for several days, and that they strip-searched him in front of a female employee. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the correctional employees and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that correctional officials did not use excessive force when they physically and mechanically restrained the prisoner and used a stun gun against him during two cell entries. The appeals court found that the failure to provide the prisoner with toilet paper for several days did not violate the prisoner's rights, absent proof that the officials deprived him of toilet paper to unnecessarily and wantonly inflict pain upon the prisoner. The appeals court held that strip-searching the male prisoner in front of female employees did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment. (Kettle Moraine Correctional Institution, Wisconsin)

A prisoner filed a §1983 suit against a county, the county's detention center, and the privately-owned corporation that operated the detention center. The prisoner alleged that he had been assaulted and injured by corporation employees. The court denied the county's motion to dismiss, finding that the county could be held liable under §1983 for the corporation's customs and policies. The court reasoned that operation of a detention center was a significant public function over which the county retained oversight responsibilities, and the county could be held responsible for the actions of the private company it had hired to manage and operate its detention center. Hill v. McKinley, 311 F.3d 899 (8th Cir. 2002). A prisoner brought § 1983 action alleging jail officers and a sheriff violated her Fourth Amendment right to privacy, and her privacy rights under state law. The prisoner had been marched down a hallway naked, escorted by staff members of the opposite sex, and was then strapped face down to a restrainer board in a spread-eagle position. The district court denied the defendants' request for judgment as a matter of law, refused to reduce damages, and granted attorney fees to the prisoner. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded with directions. The appeals court held that the use of male officers in an otherwise justified transfer of an unruly and naked female prisoner did not violate the Fourth Amendment. The court held that the prisoner's Fourth Amendment rights were violated when she was allowed to remain completely exposed to male officers on a restrainer board for a substantial period of time after the threat to security and safety had passed. But the court found that the officers were entitled to qualified immunity because their actions did not violate clearly established law, noting that prisoners were entitled to very narrow zones of privacy. The court found that evidence supported the verdict for the prisoner on her state law privacy claim and the $2,500 compensatory damage award for invasion of privacy. (Story County Jail, Iowa)

Hope v. Pelzer, 122 S.Ct. 2508 (2002). An Alabama prison inmate who was allegedly handcuffed to a "hitching post" twice in 1995 for disruptive conduct, brought a civil rights action against three correctional officers involved in the incidents. The federal appeals court held that the hitching post's use for punitive purposes violated the Eighth Amendment but found that the officers were entitled to qualified immunity. The U.S. Supreme Court reversed, finding that the defense of qualified immunity was not available to the officers at the summary judgment phase of the case. The Court found that the prisoner's allegations, if true, established an Eighth Amendment claim for cruel and unusual punishment because the alleged conduct would be "unnecessary and wanton" infliction of pain for reasons "totally without penological justification." The Court held that a reasonable officer would have known that using a hitching post as the prisoner alleged was unlawful. During a 2-hour period in May of 1995, when the inmate was handcuffed to the hitching post, the inmate was offered drinking water and a bathroom break every 15 minutes. He was handcuffed above shoulder height, and when he tried moving his arms to improve circulation, the handcuffs cut into his wrists, causing pain and discomfort. In a second incident after a fight with anofficer at his chain gang's worksite in June, he was subdued, handcuffed, placed in leg irons, and transported back to the prison. Once there, he was ordered to take off his shirt, thus exposing himself to the sun, and spent seven hours on the hitching post. He was given one or two water breaks, but no bathroom breaks, and he claimed that an officer taunted him about his thirst. (Alabama Department of Corrections)

Johnson v. Breeden, 280 F.3d 1308 (11th Cir. 2002). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against corrections officers alleging that they used excessive force on him in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The district court entered judgment for the prisoner and awarded $25,000 in compensatory damages, $45,000 in punitive damages and attorney fees and expenses in the amount of $85,268. The officers appealed and the appeals court affirmed the award of compensatory damages but vacated the punitive damages and attorney fee awards and remanded the case for determination. The appeals court held that the action was a "civil action with respect to prison conditions" and was therefore subject to limitation on prospective relief under the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA). The appeals court also held that the application of the lodestar method in calculating the attorney's fee award was an abuse of discretion. (Phillips Correctional Institution, Georgia)

PEPPER SPRAY

Lawrence v. Bowersox, 297 F.3d 727 (8th Cir. 2002). Prisoners brought an action against prison officers alleging violation of their Eighth Amendment rights. The district court granted judgment in favor of the prisoners and the appeals court affirmed in part and remanded in part. The appeals court held that evidence was sufficient for a reasonable jury to conclude that the inmates were incarcerated under conditions that posed an objectively substantial risk of harm, and that an unnecessary pepper spray shower violated the inmates' Eighth Amendment rights because a supervisor orchestrated it even though the inmates were confined and had not disobeyed orders. The appeals court found that it was not an abuse of discretion for the district court to require prison officials to pay discovery sanctions where the inmates were "given the runaround" and were forced to take depositions and file motions that would have been unnecessary if the officials had complied with the district court's discovery order. The district court jury awarded $10,003 against an officer and the district court awarded discovery sanctions in the amount of $8,712. (Potosi Corr'l Ctr., Missouri)

EXCESSIVE FORCE

Lynn v. O'Leary, 264 F.Supp.2d 306 (D.Md. 2003). An arrestee sued state prison officials, alleging that he was subjected to an unlawful arrest, excessive force, and an illegal cavity search. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants in part, and denied it in part. The court held that officials were not entitled to governmental official immunity, under state law, in light of allegations that the officials acted with malice or were grossly negligent when they allegedly searched the arrestee's cavities while he was attempting to visit his son, after the officials informed the arrestee that a drug dog had falsely alerted on him. The arrestee had arrived at a state prison with his wife, intending to visit his son who was an inmate. While he was waiting to be admitted to the visiting area, a search dog was brought into the area and canvassed the room on a long leash. The dog gave a positive alert for drugs and the arrestee was subjected to a pat down search and his visitor locker was searched. No drugs were found on his person or in his locker and he was told that the dog had made a false alert. But he was not allowed to visit, and waited in lobby while his wife visited their son. After the visit prison officials ordered the arrestee into a side room where his wife heard him scream in pain. He informed the officials that he suffered from a medical condition. He was informed that he was under arrest and that he would be subjected to a strip and body cavity search, and the arrestee demanded that a warrant be produced. His clothes were forcibly removed and no contraband was found. $2,000 was taken from his wallet and divided among the prison officials. His person was then searched, including a body cavity examination. While he was dressing after the search one officer jerked up the arrestee's left leg, causing him to fall off a chair and hit his head against a wall, and he was knocked unconscious. He was taken to a hospital where he was found to be suffering from a contusion to his brain, and injury to his back, shoulder and arm. He was permanently banned from visiting his son. Pizzuto v. County of Nassau, 240 F.Supp.2d 203 (E.D.N.Y. 2002). The family of a county corrections facility inmate who had been beaten to death by corrections officers, brought a civil action against the county and officials. The district court held that the inmate's mother and father lacked a substantive due process right to companionship of their 38-year-old son. The court noted that the son lived away from home for six years and started a family of his own, prior to returning to occupy a ground floor apartment in his parent's house three months before his death. The court found that the family stated a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress under state law. The inmate had been sentenced to ninety days in jail on a misdemeanor charge of driving under the influence of methadone. Upon admission to the county correctional facility, the inmate was assigned to a single cell in the facility's observation tier, based on his status as an inmate receiving methadone treatment. The next morning the inmate complained that he needed his treatment and after a heated exchange with an officer, all inmates on the tier were ordered to their cells. All cell doors were locked, except the inmate's. Moments later, at the direction of a supervisor, three corrections officers went into the inmate's cell with the intention of using force to control his behavior. While one officer stood outside, two officers donned surgical gloves and beat the inmate for several minutes, punching and kicking him about the face, torso and legs. An extensive cover-up followed. Two days later the inmate collapsed in his cell. He was taken to a hospital where he died from his injuries several days later. (Nassau County Correctional Center, New York)

Shelton v. Angelone, 183 F.Supp.2d 830 (W.D.Va. 2002). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 alleging violation of his 8th and 14th Amendment rights. The district court denied summary judgment, in part, for the defendants. The court held that fact issues about the use of a stun gun to subdue the prisoner precluded summary judgment. The court also found that correctional officers who allegedly used the stun gun were not entitled to qualified immunity. (Red Onion State Prison, Virginia)

Sheppard v. Phoenix, 210 F.Supp.2d 450 (S.D.N.Y. 2002). Current and former inmates filed a class action alleging that city corrections officials engaged in a pattern of brutality and used gratuitous and excessive physical violence at a segregation unit. A detailed consent decree was implemented. The city moved to terminate the decree and the district court granted the motion. The district court noted positive trends for four years of reduced incidents involving serious injuries and head strikes, reduced acts of self-mutilation, unprecedented levels of command discipline, and the institution of procedures to safely and effectively manage the inmate population. Skrtich v. Thornton, 280 F.3d 1295 (11th Cir. 2002). A prison inmate brought a § 1983 action against corrections officers alleging Eighth Amendment violations resulting from an alleged excessive use of force against him. The district court denied the defendants' motions for summary judgment and dismissal and the officers appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the defense of qualified immunity was not available to the officers. According to the court, the inmate's allegations that the officers used excessive force when they went to his cell to extract him when he refused to voluntarily leave to permit a search to be conducted, were sufficient to state a § 1983 claim for violation of his Eighth Amendment rights. The officers used an electronic shield to shock and incapacitate the inmate, and allegedly punched, kicked and beat him to the extent that he had to be airlifted to a hospital for treatment. The court noted that the inmate acknowledged that some degree of force was warranted in light of his history of disciplinary problems and his refusal to cooperate with the search. Treats v. Morgan, 308 F.3d 868 (8th Cir. 2002). A state prisoner sued corrections officials under § 1983 alleging his Eighth Amendment rights were violated when he was sprayed with pepper spray and thrown to the floor. The district court denied the defendants' motion for summary judgment and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether it was reasonable for the officer to use of pepper spray and force against the prisoner who failed to obey commands, but who had not jeopardized any person's safety or threatened prison security. The prisoner alleged that he was sprayed in the face without any warning by an officer, and then thrown to the floor and handcuffed by a lieutenant. Turner v. Kight, 192 F.Supp.2d 391 (D.Md. 2002). A female detainee who was arrested on an outstanding warrant associated with a civil matter and detained at a jail brought an action against county and state officials. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants. The court held that arresting and booking officers were deliberately indifferent to the detainee's serious medical needs when they allegedly removed a neck brace and seized medication, ignoring her complaints of pain and muscle spasm. The court held that the detainee's allegation that she was brutally handcuffed did not present a constitutional violation, particularly in the absence of any explanation of how the handcuffing led to any injury. U.S. District Court
STUN BELT

U.S. v. Durham, 219 F.Supp.2d 1234 (N.D.Fla. 2002). A defendant moved to prohibit the use of a restraining device known as a "stun belt" during his trial. The district court denied the motion and the defendant was convicted. The defendant successfully appealed his conviction. The defendant again moved to prohibit the use of the stun belt and the district court denied the motion, finding its use was warranted. The court noted that the defendant had repeatedly attempted to escape from custody and that less restrictive measures would not have been sufficient. According to the court, the stun belt did not pose any health risk to the defendant and the chance of accidental discharge was 0.01746%. The court found no evidence that the device caused self-urination or self-defecation. According to the court, the stun belt was not visible to the jury and did not impair the defendant's ability to meaningfully participate in his trial. The court described the defendant's level of risk as follows: "It is beyond doubt that Durham possesses a rare combination of skill, ingenuity, cunning and fearlessness. These characteristics, in conjunction with the challenge he appears to relish in attempting to escape, makes this defendant one of the most dangerous and one of the highest escape risks of any defendant to come before this Court" (U.S. District Court, Northern District, Florida)

U.S. Appeals Court
STUN BELT

U.S. v. Durham, 287 F.3d 1297 (11th Cir. 2002). A defendant challenged the use of an electric "stun belt" on him during his trial; his motion was denied by the district court. The defendant was subsequently convicted and appealed. The appeals court vacated and remanded, finding that the district court had abused its discretion by failing to make findings sufficient to justify the use of the stun belt during the trial. According to the court, physical restraints upon a criminal defendant at trial should be used as rarely as possible because their use tends to erode the presumption of innocence that is an integral part of a fair trial. The court held that use of the belt may have had an adverse impact on the defendant's ability to follow the proceedings and to take an active interest in the presentation of his case. The appeals court held that the novelty of the technology employed in the stun belt will likely cause the need for factual findings about the operation of the device, addressing issues such as the criteria for triggering the belt and potential for accidental discharge, to assess the need for its use as compared to less restrictive methods of restraint. The appeals court noted that the district court did not, on the record, consider any less restrictive alternatives to prevent escape and to ensure courtroom safety. The defendant had attempted to escape from a jail and had managed to slip out of a set of leg irons using a key he had concealed on his person. The defendant's attorney argued that the defendant would be "more concerned about receiving such a jolt than he is about thinking about the testimony and giving me aid and assistance in the defense of this case." The court suggested that a stun belt poses "a far more substantial risk of interfering with a defendant's Sixth amendment right to confer with counsel than do leg shackles. The fear of receiving a painful and humiliating shock for any gesture that could be perceived as threatening likely chills a defendant's inclination to make any movements during the trial-- including those movements necessary for effective communication with counsel." The appeals court also found that "stun belts have the potential to be highly detrimental to the dignified administration of criminal justice... If activated, the device poses a serious threat to the dignity and decorum of the courtroom." (U.S. District Court for the Northern District of Florida)

Williams v. City of Las Vegas, 34 Fed.Appx. 297 (9th Cir. 2002). An arrestee brought a suit against a city and correctional officer alleging the use of excessive force. The district court granted summary judgment to the defendants and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the officer's use of force and restraints when the arrestee refused to cooperate during the booking process was not excessive under either the Eighth Amendment standard for prisoners, nor the Fourteenth Amendment standard for pretrial detainees. The court noted that all of the officer's conduct associated with this claim had been videotaped from three different positions by surveillance cameras. According to the court, the use of waist and leg restraints on the inmate in his jail cell did not violate the Eighth Amendment, where the inmate had refused to stand still during a frisk search and displayed erratic and seemingly uncooperative behavior. Bane v. Virginia Dept. of Corrections, 267 F.Supp.2d 514 (W.D.Va. 2003). An inmate brought action against a state corrections department and prison officials, stemming from injuries allegedly suffered while being handcuffed. The district court denied motions to dismiss and for summary judgment. The court found that the inmate properly stated a prima facie claim under the Rehabilitation Act by alleging that he suffered from a chronically unstable right shoulder and that he had been issued a "cuff-front" pass by the corrections department medical personnel. The pass required prison personnel to cuff the inmate with his hands in front to accommodate his injury, but prison officers failed to heed the cuff pass and handcuffed the inmate's arms behind his back. The court noted that acceptance of federal funds by the state corrections department was a waiver of its sovereign immunity from liability under the federal Rehabilitation Act. The court ordered further proceedings to determine if officers destroyed a posted medical order pertaining to the inmate, whether another officer stood by as an officer handcuffed the inmate in a manner contrary to the posted medical order, and whether the officers maliciously intended to cause harm to the inmate. Beckwith v. Hart, 263 F.Supp.2d 1018 (D.Md. 2003). An inmate filed an action against the Federal Bureau of Prisons (BOP) under the Federal Tort Claims Act (FTCA), alleging claims of defamation of character, negligence, battery and constitutional claims. The district court dismissed the action. The court held that the inmate failed to establish that he was subjected to excessive force in violation of his Eighth Amendment rights, when a BOP employee closed the door of a conference room on the inmate's foot after he had interrupted a meeting to request forms, and stuck his foot in the door when the employee attempted to shut it to regain the privacy of the meeting. The court noted that even if the employee's actions contained the requisite application of force to rise to a constitutional violation, the inmate failed to establish that the employee closed the door maliciously for the purpose of causing him harm. Eberle v. City of Newton, 289 F.Supp.2d 1269 (D.Kan. 2003). An arrestee brought a § 1983 action against a city and city officials and staff, alleging that she was subjected to excessive force while in police custody. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants, in spite of finding violations, because the arrestee had signed a waiver of all civil rights claims. The court found that an officer's use of violence against the arrestee during questioning at a police station violated the arrestee's clearly established right to be free from excessive force, and that the officer was not entitled to qualified immunity. The arrestee had attempted to leave an interrogation room and the officer grabbed her by the arm, throwing her in the direction of a chair and causing her to fall, and then the officer kicked the arrestee even though she posed no threat to him. Jackson v. Austin, 241 F.Supp.2d 1313 (D.Kan. 2003). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against state corrections officers, alleging they subjected him to excessive force. The district court entered judgment in favor of the prisoner, finding that the officers used excessive force to restrain him. The court held that the officers were not entitled to qualified immunity, and that the prisoner was not required to prove that he sustained significant or permanent injuries. The court also found that an officer who did not participate in the altercation was liable for failing to intervene. The court ordered the officers to pay $15,000 in compensatory damages, and $30,000 in punitive damages. One officer had grabbed the prisoner, pushed him to the floor and handcuffed him while the prisoner attempted to explain that he was permitted to sit in a medical clinic's waiting room since his knee injury prevented him from standing for long periods. The officer had ordered the prisoner to stand in line and refused to look at the prisoner's written medical restriction. The court noted that the prisoner was 60 years old and the officers were aware that the prisoner had a knee injury. (El Dorado Corr'l Facility, Kansas)

Lolli v. County of Orange, 351 F.3d 410 (9th Cir. 2003). A pretrial detainee filed a § 1983 action alleging the use of excessive force, and deliberate indifference to his serious medical needs. The district court entered judgment in favor of the defendants. The appeals court affirmed in part, and reversed in part and remanded. The court held that summary judgment was precluded on the issue of whether sheriff's department officers employed excessive force against the detainee. The detainee claimed that a deputy grabbed him and pulled him to the ground and that several deputies then kicked him, punched him, hit him with batons or similar objects, twisted his arms and legs, poked his face, knuckled his ear, and pepper sprayed him. The detainee had been arrested for an outstanding warrant on an unpaid parking ticket. The nurse's records indicated that the detainee was not combative, verbally abusive, or agitated at intake. A state prison inmate brought a § 1983 action alleging that an officer's act of shooting him during an assault on another inmate constituted use of excessive force in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The district court denied summary judgment for the officer and the officer appealed. The appeals court reversed, finding that the corrections officer was entitled to qualified immunity. The court found that a reasonable officer could have believed that shooting one inmate in the leg to stop an assault that could have seriously injured or killed another inmate was a good faith effort to restore order, and was therefore lawful. The district court dismissed the suit in part, and denied dismissal in part. Myers v. Milbert, 281 F.Supp.2d 859 (N.D.W.Va. 2003). A state prisoner brought a pro se action against corrections officers, alleging that they violated his rights by inappropriately restraining him for 20 hours on a stretcher, and feeding him a "nutra-loaf" diet for three days. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the officers, finding that the prisoner did not suffer from a serious medical condition as a result of being restrained, and that the disciplinary nutra-loaf diet did not violate the prisoner's Eighth Amendment rights. The court noted that the inmate had assaulted a corrections officer and kicked a door. After being placed on the restraint stretcher, called a "stokes basket," the inmate's handcuffs were loosened and he was given numerous bathroom breaks, medications, and food and liquids. The district court held that the inmate would be treated as a pretrial detainee. The court granted summary judgment in favor of the officers. The court held that the officers did not use excessive force against the detainee when they forcibly undressed and searched him in a courthouse holding cell. Walters v. County of Charleston, 63 Fed.Appx. 116 (4th Cir. 2003) [unpublished]. The personal representative of a detainee who died in custody brought a § 1983 action, alleging that the detainee's death was the result of officers' use of excessive force. The district court entered summary judgment in favor of the defendants and the plaintiff appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the officers' use of force in restraining the detainee was not excessive, even though the detainee died as the result of a compression injury to his neck sustained while officers attempted to subdue him. The court noted that the detainee was an exceptionally large man who became violent while in his cell and after he was let out of his cell, and that there was no evidence that the officers intentionally choked the detainee. The detainee had been housed in a temporary detention facility pursuant to a civil contempt order of a family court, for refusing to pay back child support. A state prisoner at a maximum security prison brought a § 1983 action alleging that he was subjected to excessive force during, and after, his transfer to the prison's segregation unit. The district court granted summary judgment, judgment as a matter of law, and judgment upon a jury verdict in favor of the defendants. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed and remanded in part. The court held that the district court was required to make findings of fact about which, if any, of the named officers pressed the prisoner's face up against cell bars, whether the prisoner was really beaten upon his arrival at the cell, and if the beating occurred, which of the named officers was involved or present. The district court entered judgment against a Captain for $1,500 on the restraint chair claim and against another officer for $500 on the excessive force claim. The district court refused to award punitive damages and the detainee appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the district court's refusal to award punitive damages was not an abuse of discretion. Munera v. Metro West Detention Center, 351 F.Supp.2d 1353 (S.D.Fla. 2004). A former pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against a county correctional officer who escorted him on a visit to an optometrist, alleging that the officer used excessive force, threatened him, and deprived him of access to medical care. The district court entered summary judgment in favor of the defendant. The court held that the alleged profanity and ethnic slurs that the officer directed at the detainee did not rise to the level of a constitutional violation. The court found that the officer's decision to remove the detainee from an eye clinic because of security concerns did not deprive the detainee of needed medical care and did not amount to deliberate indifference to a serious medical need in violation of the Due Process Clause. According to the court, the force applied by the officer was the minimum necessary under the circumstances, where the force included wrist cuffs secured to a waist chain with the detainee seated in a wheelchair. The court noted that the officer checked that the cuffs were properly applied when the detainee complained of discomfort, and told the detainee not to struggle. The officer used additional force and restraints to keep the detainee seated in the wheelchair, when the detainee was repeatedly moving between the wheelchair and another seat in the waiting room. The district court held that the degree of force applied and the seriousness of the injuries were insufficient to support an Eighth Amendment claim. officers, finding that the officers who restrained the inmate's wrists in order to remove the handcuffs following the inmate's refusal to allow the removal, used reasonable force, given the inmate's argumentative nature and minimal injuries. The court noted that the inmate's argumentative nature could have led to a greater disturbance, and that a medical examination found only a cut on one hand and swelling in the wrist, with the full range of motion, and no further treatment was required. A state inmate filed a civil rights action alleging that prison officials failed to provide constitutionally adequate health care, failed to protect him from the use of excessive force, and used excessive force. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants in part, and denied it in part. The district court held that fact issues remained as to whether a prison supervisor adequately trained correctional officers with respect to the use of four-point restraints, and failed to respond to reports and complaints of use of force against the inmate. The court denied qualified immunity, finding that a reasonable prison official ought to have understood in 1998 that it was a constitutional violation to restrain a mentally ill prisoner for twenty-two hours, with no penal justification, no food or water, and no access to a bathroom. Agster v. Maricopa County, 406 F.3d 1091 (9th Cir. 2005). The parents and the representative of the estate of an inmate who died in jail brought an action against the county in state court. The case was removed to federal court, where the county was ordered to produce a mortality review report that was conducted by a private health provider. The county appealed the district court decision. The appeals court upheld the district court order. The appeals court held that no protected privilege of peer review protected the mortality review. The inmate had been arrested and taken to a county jail where he was placed in a restraint chair. His respiration decreased and he developed an irregular heartbeat. Attempts were made to resuscitate him and he was transported to a hospital where he was placed on life support. He was pronounced dead three days later. (Maricopa County Sheriff's Office, Arizona)

Jail inmates brought a § 1983 action against a county and corrections officers, alleging indifference to their mental health needs and mistreatment. The defendants moved to preclude expert witness testimony and for partial summary judgment. The district court granted summary judgment in part and denied it in part. The court found genuine issues of material fact as to whether corrections officers used excessive force against a jail inmate by placing her in a restraint chair after she allegedly threw urine and feces from her cell. The court found that the alleged act of serving food to a jail inmate on a napkin or paper towel on one occasion did not amount to a constitutional deprivation. Beltran v. O'Mara, 405 F.Supp.2d 140 (D.N.H. 2005). A pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against correctional officers, alleging civil rights violations. The court granted summary judgment in favor of the officers in part, and denied in part. The court held that the failure to exhaust some claims did not mandate dismissal of the entire complaint. The court found that fact issues precluded summary judgment regarding whether officers used excessive force in repeatedly placing the detainee in a restraint chair. The court held that the purported withholding of toilet paper from the detainee did not deny him a minimal measure of necessities required for civilized living, as required to establish a Fourteenth Amendment violation. The only evidence that supported the allegation consisted of a complaint that the detainee was regularly made to wait over one hour for toilet paper, and there was no evidence regarding the frequency of such events. Birdine v. Gray, 375 F.Supp.2d 874 (D.Neb. 2005). A pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against jail employees claiming violation of his right to be free of punishment and his right to privacy. The district court dismissed the complaint. The court found no violation when the inmate was placed in a restraint chair because he was confined as a last resort when all other restraint options proved ineffective. According to the court, the detainee was monitored, the chair was not used to punish, and the detainee was offered the opportunity to be released in return for acting appropriately. The court found no due process violation when a stun gun was applied to the detainee two times, after he engaged in violent actions as jail officers attempt to settle him into a cell to which he was being transferred. The court found that the detainee's conduct was an immediate threat to institutional safety, security and efficiency. (Lancaster County Jail, Nebraska)

Bozeman v. Orum, 422 F.3d 1265 (11th Cir. 2005). The representative of the estate of a pretrial detainee who had died during a struggle with county correctional officers brought a § 1983 suit alleging use of excessive force and deliberate indifference to medical needs. The district court granted summary judgment for several defendants but denied summary judgment for corrections officers. The officers appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the officers' alleged conduct in subduing the detainee was actionable as excessive force and that the officers were not entitled to qualified immunity. The court also held that the officers' alleged conduct following the struggle-- waiting 14 minutes before summoning medical assistance even though the detainee appeared lifeless-- was actionable as deliberate indifference and the officers were not entitled to qualified immunity. The court noted that the law defining excessive force was clearly established at the time of the incident, and the officers should have known that continuing to apply force to the unruly detainee after he had given up his struggle was not acceptable. Calhoun v. Thomas, 360 F.Supp.2d 1264 (M.D.Ala. 2005). A detainee brought a § 1983 action against a sheriff and deputy sheriff in their individual capacities, raising excessive force, deliberate indifference and conditions of confinement claims. The defendants moved for summary judgment, which the district court granted in part and denied in part. The court found a potential violation in the alleged conduct of officers during his interrogation. The officers allegedly choked and beat the detainee, who was restrained and posed no threat to anyone's safety, punched him in his gunshot wound, and slammed him into a door several times telling him they wanted to make him suffer as the victim in a robbery and shooting had suffered. The court held that the officers were not entitled to qualified immunity on the excessive force claim. (Pike County Jail, Alabama)

Davis v. Carroll, 390 F.Supp.2d (D.Del. 2005). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against prison personnel alleging violations of his Eighth Amendment rights. The district court denied the defendants' motion to dismiss. The court held that the inmate stated a claim of excessive force with his allegations that correctional officers harmed him on two different occasions while he was handcuffed. The court also found that the inmate stated a claim for deliberate indifference to his serious medical needs. The inmate alleged that a deputy warden wanted to "just stitch him up" when he was hit in the head by correctional officers and that is was only at the insistence of a nurse that an ambulance was called. The inmate also alleged that after he received treatment for head injuries he was moved from an infirmary, despite needing more medical treatment, and that no one came to check on him for several days after he underwent brain surgery. The court also found that the inmate stated a claim for supervisory liability with his allegations that correctional officers planned his beating and encouraged him to act out, and that a deputy warden witnessed the attack and took no action to stop it or punish the officers who were involved. The inmate also alleged that a sergeant stood by as correctional officers harmed him while he was handcuffed. (Delaware Correctional Center)

Davis ex rel. Davis v. Borough of Norristown, 400 F.Supp.2d 790 (E.D.Pa. 2005). A parent and minor child brought a § 1983 action against a borough and police officers, alleging constitutional violations in connection with the child's arrest and detention after the child dropped bottles of beer that he was holding and fled. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants in part, and denied it in part. The court held that fact issues existed as to whether the borough had a policy or custom of detaining juveniles for underage drinking. The court also found fact issues as to whether officers' conduct was reckless or callous with respect to the force used in the arrest. The child alleged that he was tackled into cement steps, punched in the face, kicked in the face and that his arm was pulled so hard that it broke his shoulder. According to the court, the plaintiffs failed to establish that the borough had a custom or policy of inadequately training its officers in the use of force. (Borough of Norristown, Pennsylvania)

Estate of Moreland v. Dieter, 395 F.3d 747 (7th Cir. 2005). Family members of a county jail detainee who died in custody, brought a § 1983 action alleging the use of unnecessary and excessive force. The district court entered judgment, upon jury verdict, in favor of the family members and against county deputies, and awarded $29 million in compensatory damages, and $27.5 million in punitive damages. The parties appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the punitive damages award was not excessive, where evidence showed that the deputies threw the detainee's head against a concrete wall, discharged a can of pepper spray into his face when he was fully restrained, and repeatedly assaulted him, without attending to the detainee's medical needs. The detainee died of a fatal hematoma caused by one of the head traumas inflicted by the deputies. The deputies lied to a jail nurse about the detainee's injuries and filed false reports to conceal their wrongdoing. The court held that neither multiple prior incidents involving the use of pepper spray, nor alleged jail overcrowding, established that a sheriff was deliberately indifferent to a substantial risk of harm to the detainee. The detainee had been admitted to jail after he was arrested for driving under the influence. Shortly after his admission to the jail, the detainee provoked a confrontation with another detainee by directing racial slurs at him. Jail staff responded to the altercation with excessive force. (St. Joseph County Jail, Indiana)

Harper v. Albert, 400 F.3d 1052 (7th Cir. 2005). State prisoners brought a § 1983 action against prison guards alleging excessive force in violation of the Eighth Amendment. Following a jury trial the district court granted judgment as a matter of law for some of the guards, and the jury subsequently found in favor of the remaining guards. The prisoners appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the guards were not jointly and severally liable for their failure to intervene in other guards' alleged use of excessive force during a cell transfer and transport procedure. The court noted that the prisoners failed to establish that each and every guard touched them, much less that any of them used excessive force. The incident happened after a prison cellhouse erupted into violence, with inmates throwing cans, burning rags, light bulbs, bodily fluids and other liquids at the officers. The outburst was apparently in retaliation for a "strip out" or complete search of a cell on the block, and continued to grow more serious during the day. (Menard Correctional Facility, Illinois)

Jeanty v. County of Orange, 379 F.Supp.2d 533 (S.D.N.Y. 2005). A county jail inmate whose arm was broken in an altercation with corrections officers sued the officers and the county, alleging excessive use of force. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants in part, and denied it in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by fact issues as to whether excessive force was applied when the officers allegedly beat the prisoner in his cell to the point of breaking his arm, and wantonly ignored his cries of pain and pleas that they desist. The court also found that summary judgment was precluded by issues of fact as to whether the officers were entitled to qualified immunity. According to the court, the conviction of the inmate for assaulting an officer, arising out of the same incident, did not preclude the inmate's claim. The court held that the Eighth Amendment, not the Fourteenth Amendment, applied to this action because the inmate had been convicted of arson and was awaiting sentencing. Johnson v. Wright, 423 F.Supp.2d 1242 (M.D.Ala. 2005). An arrestee sued an arresting officer, a volunteer riding with the officer, and county jail officers, claiming violation of his Fourth Amendment protections against false arrest and excessive force. The officer, volunteer and jail officers moved for summary judgment. The district court held that the jail officers were not entitled to qualified immunity due to material issues of fact, as to whether the jail officers beat the arrestee without provocation while he was in his cell. According to the arrestee, officers dragged him out of his cell and put him in some type of harness chair, and he was in handcuffs during the entire time he was being beaten at the jail and he was still in handcuffs when he was strapped into the harness chair. The arrestee alleged that officers continued to beat him after he was strapped into the harness chair. (Chilton County Jail, Alabama)

Lopez v. Smiley, 375 F.Supp.2d 19 (D.Conn. 2005). A state inmate filed a § 1983 action alleging that one corrections officer assaulted him and that other officers failed to intervene. The district court denied the inmate's motion to modify his amended complaint, in part, and the inmate moved for reconsideration. The district court granted the motion. The court held that fact issues remained as to whether officials suppressed the inmate's grievance, and whether an officer had legal justification to hit the inmate. The court noted that deliberate obstruction of access to a prison grievance system, if proven, can be grounds to bar the enforcement of the exhaustion requirements of the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA). Manier v. Cook, 394 F.Supp.2d 1282 (E.D.Wash. 2005). A county jail inmate brought a § 1983 action against jail officers, alleging cruel and unusual punishment based on the use of excessive force. The district court entered summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court held that the use of force was within the scope of the jail's policy for maintaining and restoring order. According to the court, the inmate had refused to return to his cell as ordered and he had verbally abused jail officers. An officer fired two Taser gun shots rather than one continuous trigger shot, and the officer decided not to fire a third short. The court noted that the inmate suffered only a minor injury and that he had a history of self harm. (Spokane County Jail, Washington)

Niemyjski v. City of Albuquerque, 379 F.Supp.2d 1221 (D.N.M. 2005). An arrestee brought a state court action against a city, alleging that police officers committed a civil rights violation in connection with his arrest and detention. The action was removed to federal court, where the district court granted summary judgment for the city and remanded state law claims. The court held that the arrestee failed to show that a municipal custom or policy contributed to the alleged violations. The court noted that the city's policy manual stated that staff were required to received training in the legitimate use of force and restraints, and that no correctional officer was permitted to work with inmates until and unless such training was successfully completed. The arrestee had been placed in a holding cell. When he was denied the opportunity to make a telephone call he protested by refusing to have his photograph taken. Because of his resistance, jail officers used force to position him to take his photograph. The arrestee and the officers later traded racial insults. He was taken up stairs rather than an elevator, and he fell down and alleged that officers punched and kicked him resulting in an injury to his ribs. He was released less than 24 hours after his arrest on a warrant. (Bernalillo County Detention Center, New Mexico)

Norton v. The City of Marietta, OK, 432 F.3d 1145 (10th Cir. 2005). A former jail inmate brought a § 1983 action against city and county officials and employees, alleging that he was subjected to excessive force while confined in the county jail. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, vacated in part and remanded. The appeals court held that summary judgment was precluded by material issues of fact as to whether the sheriff and police officers' use of pepper spray on the inmate was subjectively harmful enough to violate the inmate's Eighth Amendment rights. The court noted that several factors must be considered, including how long the inmate was sprayed, whether he was adequately irrigated afterward, and whether the pepper spray was used in a good faith effort to restore discipline or was used maliciously and sadistically for the purpose of causing harm. Orwat v. Maloney, 360 F.Supp.2d 146 (D.Mass. 2005). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against correctional officers and officials and a state corrections department, alleging violations of the First, Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments and various state laws. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants in part, and denied it in part. The court held that an officer was not liable for violating the Eighth Amendment by failing to intervene to protect an inmate from an attack by another officer, where the officer had no reasonable opportunity to prevent the other officer's initial blow to the inmate, and thereafter attempted to intervene. The court found that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether a correctional officer struck the inmate, not to restore or maintain discipline, but maliciously and sadistically to cause harm to him, and whether the officer used more force than was necessary. The officer had hit the inmate in the face and broken his jaw. (MCI-Cedar Junction, Massachusetts)

Owensby v. City of Cincinnati, 414 F.3d 596 (6th Cir. 2005). The estate of a detainee who died in the course of a police encounter sued officers and others, asserting § 1983 and state law claims. The district court resolved certain claims on summary judgment and denied the officers qualified immunity. On appeal, the court held that the officers were not entitled to immunity on the claim that the officers denied the detainee adequate medical care. The court found that the officers had time to fully consider the potential consequences of their conduct during the six minutes that the detainee was denied medical care after being taken into custody, given that the officers had time to do such things as greet each other, prepare for their superiors' arrival, pick up dropped items, and comment on the apparent severity of the detainee's injuries. The court applied the traditional deliberate standard of culpability rather than the heightened standard requiring malice and intent to harm. According to the court, each officer viewed the detainee in significant physical distress, but made no attempt to summon or provide medical care until several minutes later when a sergeant checked on the detainee and discovered that he was not breathing. The detainee's death had been ruled a homicide resulting from the police officers' restraint attempts. The estate alleged that one officer pulled the arrestee's head up when he was on the ground and drove his knees into the arrestee's back. The estate also alleged that an officer twice sprayed mace directly into the arrestee's eyes and nose from a distance of six inches, although police policy directed a distance of five to ten feet. Perez Olivo v. Gonzalez, 384 F.Supp.2d 536 (D.Puerto Rico 2005). An inmate brought a Bivens action against correctional officers, stemming from the alleged use of restraints on him during an escorted medical trip. The district court dismissed the case. The court held that the use of restraints did not violate the inmate's clearly established rights and that the leg irons, as placed, did not violate the inmate's rights. According to the court, the officers exercised their best correctional judgment in applying the leg iron restraints and did not deliberately inflict pain. The court found that the agency's alleged failure to respond in a timely manner to the inmate's complaints did not violate due process. The inmate alleged that he was submitted to unnecessary punishment and discomfort for three hours, resulting in bruised ankles and pain for a period of eight days. Skinner v. Cunningham, 430 F.3d 483 (1st Cir. 2005). A prisoner brought a civil rights action against prison authorities alleging due process violations from his segregation following his killing of another inmate, and Eighth Amendment violations arising from his forced extraction from his cell. The district court entered summary judgment in favor of the authorities on two claims, and judgment on a jury verdict in favor of the authorities on the remaining claim. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court found no Eighth Amendment violation arising from the force used to extract the prisoner from his cell. The prisoner's face was gouged during a struggle that was caused by his resistance to the cell extractions, and the incidents were video taped. Officers were shown on the video tape offering repeated precautions to protect the prisoner's head from injury as he was being dragged from the cell while resisting. (New Hampshire State Prison)

Thomsen v. Ross, 368 F.Supp.2d 961 (D.Minn. 2005). A detainee brought a § 1983 civil rights action against a county and county employees, alleging he was wrongfully strip searched and suffered a broken hand after he arrested on driving under the influence (DUI) charges. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants in part, and denied it in part. The court found that even if a police officer grabbed the detainee and threw him to the floor, his actions did not amount to the use of excessive force in violation of due process, absent evidence that the officer's actions caused the detainee's lost tooth and broken hand. The court found that the detainee's broken hand was not a serious medical need, such that a 48-hour delay by county employees in taking the detainee to a hospital could amount to deliberate indifference to his serious medical needs, absent evidence that a red and swollen hand was a critical or escalating situation requiring immediate attention, or that the delay jeopardized the detainee's prognosis. The court noted that employees took the detainee to the hospital on the on the evening he made the written request for treatment. (Crow Wing County Jail, Minnesota)

U.S. v. Serrata, 425 F.3d 886 (10th Cir. 2005). Former correctional officers who were convicted in federal court of offenses related to an assault on an inmate and subsequent obstruction of justice appealed their convictions. The appeals court affirmed in part, vacated in part, and remanded. The court held that evidence was sufficient to support the conviction of one officer for failing to intervene to prevent an assault. Four eyewitnesses testified that the officer stood within arm's reach and watched another officer attack an inmate who was lying defenseless on the floor with his hands cuffed behind his back. The inmate was examined by a physician who observed that he was groggy, had abrasions on his head, neck, back, ear and eye, and had a black boot scuff mark on the right side of his head. The inmate lost consciousness and was taken to a hospital, but he suffered no permanent physical injuries or impairments as a result of the attack. The court held that the boots worn by an officer when he kicked or stomped on an inmate's head constituted dangerous weapons. The appeals court found that the district court abused its discretion in granting a downward departure under sentencing guidelines based on extraordinary family circumstances, employment records and community service. One officer was sentenced to 51 months, another to 24 months, and a third to 78 months imprisonment. (Lea County Correctional Facility, New Mexico)

The district court denied summary judgment for the guard and he appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the guard was not entitled to qualified immunity from liability. The court held that a reasonable prison guard would have reasonably believed that kicking a helpless prisoner's genitals was cruel and unusual conduct. The court noted that "to suppose that any reasonable person, let alone a trained prison officer, would not know that kicking a helpless prisoner's genitals was cruel and unusual punishment is beyond belief. The Supreme Court did not need to create of a catalogue of all acts by which cruel and sadistic purpose to harm another would be manifest; but if it had, such act would be near the top of the list. Following a jury trial and the entry of a verdict against two officers, the officers renewed their motion for judgment as a matter of law. The district court granted the motion, finding that evidence that the inmate suffered more than a de minimis injury was insufficient to submit to the jury. According to the court, there was no evidence at trial indicating any physical injury resulting from the officers' alleged actions of shoving the inmate against a wall and throwing him in a chair. The court noted that not every push or shove, "even if it may later seem unnecessary in the peace of a judge's chambers," violates a prisoner's Eighth Amendment right to be free of excessive force. Ziemba v. Armstrong, 430 F.3d 623 (2nd Cir. 2005). A state prison inmate brought a civil rights action alleging that prison officials failed to provide constitutionally-adequate health care, failed to protect him from the use of excessive force, and used excessive force. The district court granted summary judgment for the officials, in part, and they appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part and remanded. The court held that evidence was sufficient to establish that a state corrections commissioner exhibited deliberate indifference to the inmate's constitutional rights or was grossly negligent in training subordinates, and that evidence was sufficient to impose supervisory liability on a prison warden. The inmate was allegedly placed in four-point restraints for 22 hours, beaten, and denied medical care. The court found that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether a prison nurse and medic were deliberately indifference to the inmate's serious medical needs. Anderson-Bey v. District of Columbia, 466 F.Supp.2d 51 (D.D.C. 2006). Prisoners transported between out-of-state correctional facilities brought a civil rights action against the District of Columbia and corrections officers, alleging common law torts and violation of their constitutional rights under First and Eighth Amendments. The prisoners had been transported in two groups, with trips lasting between 10 and 15 hours. The defendants brought motions to dismiss or for summary judgment which the court denied with regard to the District of Columbia. The court held that: (1) a fact issue existed as to whether the restraints used on prisoners during the prolonged transport caused greater pain than was necessary to ensure they were securely restrained; (2) a fact issue existed as to whether the officers acted with deliberate indifference to the prisoners' health or safety in the transport of the prisoners; (3) a causal nexus existed between the protected speech of the prisoners in bringing the civil lawsuit against the corrections officers and subsequent alleged retaliation by the officers during the transport of prisoners; (4) a fact issue existed as to whether the officers attempted to chill the prisoners' participation in the pending civil lawsuit against the officers; and (5) a fact issue existed as to whether conditions imposed on the prisoners during the transport were justified by valid penological needs. The court found that the denial of food during a bus ride that lasted between 10 and 15 hours was insufficiently serious to state a stand-alone cruel and unusual punishment civil rights claim under the Eighth Amendment. The court also found that the denial of bathroom breaks during the 10 to 15 hour bus trip, did not, without more, constitute cruel and unusual punishment under the Eighth Amendment. The court stated that the extremely uncomfortable and painful shackles applied for the numerous hours during transports, exacerbated by taunting, threats, and denial of food, water, medicine, and toilets, was outrageous conduct under District of Columbia law, precluding summary judgment on the prisoners' intentional infliction of emotional distress claim against the corrections officers. Avratin v. Bermudez, 420 F.Supp.2d 1121 (S.D.Cal. 2006). A prisoner who was involved in a fight with another inmate brought a civil rights action against a corrections officer, alleging that the officer used excessive force in attempting to stop the fight. The officer moved for summary judgment and the district court granted the motion. The court held that the officer's alleged conduct of firing a wooden projectile from a launcher directly at an unarmed prisoner involved in a fight with another inmate, causing a severe injury to the inmate's leg, violated the prisoner's Eighth Amendment right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment. The court noted that no correctional officers, prison personnel or other inmates were at immediate risk during the fight and the officer failed to use any lesser degree of force before firing his launcher. However, the court found that the officer was entitled to qualified immunity for his alleged conduct because it would not be clear to a reasonable officer that the alleged conduct was unlawful, as a reasonable officer could conclude that the fight posed a risk of serious bodily injury, the officer aimed at the prisoner's leg, virtually eliminating the risk that the prisoner would suffer a life-threatening injury, the fight occurred in a heightened security setting with many other inmates present in the yard, and the prisoner and other inmate refused orders to desist. Buchanan v. Maine, 417 F.Supp.2d 24 (D.Me. 2006). The personal representative of a mentally ill suspect who had been fatally shot by a deputy sheriff brought an action against a state, county, and various officials and officers, alleging civil rights violations. The county and officers moved for summary judgment, which the district court granted. The court held that the deputy sheriffs' warrantless entry of a mentally ill suspect's home was reasonable under the Fourth Amendment, pursuant to the emergency doctrine. According to the court, the deputies had reasonable belief that the suspect posed an immediate threat to his own safety, and developing circumstances at the scene, the late time of day, winter conditions, and the remote location of the suspect's residence made it more reasonable for deputies to enter the home immediately instead of obtaining a warrant. The court found that the personal representative failed to establish that a reasonable officer would have understood his conduct in entering the suspect's home without a warrant contravened clearly established law, and thus the deputies were entitled to qualified immunity as to the Fourth Amendment claim. The court concluded that the deputies would have had reasonable grounds to believe that the protective custody criteria under state law were met. According to the court, a deputy sheriff's shooting of a mentally ill suspect after he had stabbed another deputy did not constitute excessive force, and thus was reasonable under the Fourth Amendment. The other deputy was attacked after attempting to take the suspect into protective custody, and the deputy who shot the suspect had reasonable belief that the other deputy was threatened with death or serious physical injury. The court held that the personal representative failed to demonstrate that the county had a custom or policy relating to mentally ill persons that resulted in deprivation of Fourth Amendment rights, as required to establish the county's municipal liability under § 1983. According to the court, there was no evidence that the county's alleged failure to train officers constituted a well-settled and widespread custom or practice, and that there was no need for increased training in proper methods for making warrantless arrests or for engaging mentally ill and potentially combative persons when the deputy was hired. Calvi v. Knox County, 470 F.3d 422 (1st Cir. 2006). A female arrestee brought a § 1983 action against a city, city officers, a county, and county officers alleging excessive force. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants and the plaintiff appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that an officer who handcuffed the arrestee in the customary manner by cuffing her hands behind her back did not use excessive force, even if the officer knew that the arrestee had a hand deformity. The court noted that the officer's decision to not deviate from the standard practice of placing handcuffs behind the back was a judgment call. The arrestee had told the officer to be gentle because she was frail and had recently undergone elbow surgery. The officer double-locked the handcuffs behind her back so that they would not tighten. He then marched her outside, deposited her in his cruiser, and belted her in for transport to the jail. Upon arriving at the lockup, the arrestee was transferred to the custody of a jail officer, who unlocked the handcuffs, patted her down, and placed her in a holding cell. After other required aspects of the booking process had been completed, another jail officer fingerprinted the arrestee, who claimed that the officer who fingerprinted her repeatedly pushed her fingers down hard, in spite of being told that she had a hand deformity. She also claimed that the fingerprinting caused injuries to her wrist and her surgically repaired middle finger. (Knox County Jail, Maine)

Davis v. Township of Paulsboro, 421 F.Supp.2d 835 (D.N.J. 2006). The parents of an arrestee brought a federal civil rights claim against a county, a township, and various law enforcement officers, arising from arrestee's death which occurred after he had been struck in the head by a bottle during a fight and then taken into police custody. The defendants moved for summary judgment and the district court granted the motion. The court held that the officers did not use excessive force in spraying the suspect with pepper spray, where he was visibly agitated, was acting aggressively, was yelling profanities, banged walls in his house, and shoved an officer three times, and no lasting injury occurred. According to the court, the officers did not use excessive force in waiting to wash the pepper spray from the suspect's eyes until after he had been transported from the site of the spraying to a police station because the suspect continued to physically resist officers and persisted in yelling and cursing after being sprayed. The court found that an officer did not use excessive force in removing the arrestee from his cell, where the officer nudged the arrestee several times on his lower leg in an attempt to rouse him, stepped into the cell and grabbed the arrestee by the arm, smoothly pulled the suspect by the arm off the bench and onto his hands and knees, pulled him a few feet across the floor, and placed handcuffs on him. The court held that Township officers were not deliberately indifferent to the serious medical needs of the arrestee who had been hit on the head with a bottle in a fight prior to arrest, and thus due process principles were not violated, where an ambulance arrived to transport the arrestee to a hospital within minutes of the arrestee's arrival at police headquarters, a doctor examined the arrestee and determined he was fit for incarceration, and the arrestee was periodically checked once back at the police station. According to the court, the fact that the arrestee vomited and was still bleeding upon his return to the police station did not establish deliberate indifference. Hadix v. Caruso, 461 F.Supp.2d 574 (W.D.Mich. 2006). State prisoners filed a class action under § 1983 in 1980, alleging that conditions of their confinement violated their constitutional rights. Following settlement of claims by consent decree, and termination of the enforcement of mental health provisions of the consent decree, a prisoner moved to reopen the judgment regarding mental health care and for the issuance of preliminary injunction. The district court granted the motion. The court held that reopening the mental health provisions of the consent decree was warranted where many recurrent problems noted by physicians concerned "cracks" between medical and mental health care. The court found that the prison's use of mechanical in-cell restraints, including "top of the bed" restraints consisting of chaining a prisoner's hands and feet to a concrete slab, as disciplinary method and/or control mechanism constituted torture and violated the Eighth Amendment, notwithstanding a six-hour limit on bed restraints but which did not prohibit the use of other dangerous restraint devices at end of the six-hour period. Hanks v. Prachar, 457 F.3d 774 (8th Cir. 2006). A former county jail detainee brought a § 1983 action against county jail officials, alleging violation of his due process rights in connection with the use of restraints and confinement, requesting damages and injunctive relief. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the officials and the former detainee appealed. The appeals court affirmed the grant of summary judgment on the claims for injunctive relief, reversed the grant of summary judgment on the claims for damages, and remanded for further proceedings. The court held that the detainee's claim for injunctive relief was rendered moot by detainee's release from jail. The court found that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the detainee was restrained in shackles and chains or confined in a padded unit for the purpose punishment, or for valid reasons related to legitimate goals. The detainee alleged he was placed in four-point restraints, chained to a wall in a "rubber room," forced to shower in waist chains and shackles, and denied hearings before being punished. The detainee was 17 years old when he was admitted to the jail. (St. Louis County Jail, Minnesota)

Jenkins v. Wilson, 432 F.Supp.2d 808 (W.D.Wis. 2006). A pretrial detainee brought a civil rights claim alleging that jail officers used excessive force. Johnson v. Blaukat, 453 F.3d 1108 (8th Cir. 2006). A female inmate brought claims against correctional officers, supervisors, and a county alleging that her constitutional rights were violated by the alleged use of excessive force. The district court entered summary judgment on the claims and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part and reversed and remanded in part. The court held that: (1) genuine issues of fact precluded summary judgment on the claim that officers used excessive force in violation of the Cruel and Unusual Punishment Clause; (2) the supervisor's actions in allegedly using a racial epithet against another inmate and in allegedly removing feminine hygiene products from the cell was not cruel and unusual punishment; and (3) the purported violation of county policies that were not alleged to be unconstitutional provided no basis for civil rights liability for the county. According to the court, genuine issues of material fact as to whether correctional officers used excessive force in tackling and using pepper spray on the inmate when they entered her cell to subdue a cellmate precluded summary judgment on the Eighth Amendment claim; questions included whether their acts were defensive in nature or motivated by frustration or anger, whether the force applied was necessary to maintain order and was commensurate with the situation, whether the inmate failed to comply with the officers' orders and was actively resisting them, whether a verbal warning was issued before the application of pepper spray, and whether the inmate suffered actual injuries. The court found that the correctional officers' alleged violation of county policies regarding the use of force and the use of pepper spray could not give rise to civil rights liability on the part of the county, absent any allegation the policies themselves were unconstitutional. The inmate had testified that her head was slammed down on the floor, her hair was pulled, and that an officer sprayed mace on her face and eyes. She claimed that she sustained injuries from the incident, including bruising and lacerations on her arms, a broken thumb, and two black eyes. The inmate admitted that after the incident an officer gave her a cold towel and she was taken to the shower. (Jasper County Detention Center)

Johnson v. Hamilton, 452 F.3d 967 (8th Cir. 2006). A state prisoner who was involved in a physical altercation with corrections officers brought a § 1983 action, alleging violation of his Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment rights. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court found that the officers' use of force against the prisoner was reasonable. The prisoner pushed and punched one officer in response to an attempt to restrain him and examine his earring to determine whether the earring violated the prison rules. The prisoner continued to assault the officers even after he was restrained. The court noted that the injuries suffered by the officers were much more serious than any suffered by the prisoner, and the prisoner was criminally prosecuted and convicted as a result of his conduct during the altercation. Moore v. Morales, 445 F.Supp.2d 1000 (N.D.Ill. 2006). The administrator of the estate of a detainee who died in police custody brought a § 1983 action against arresting officers, and other officers and employees of a police department who had processed the detainee at a police station, alleging that the defendants either had used excessive force on the detainee, ultimately leading to his death, or had been deliberately indifferent to his medical needs. The defendants moved for summary judgment and the district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the summary judgment was precluded by fact issues as to the degree of force used on the detainee, and whether some police officers failed to stop the infliction of injuries on the detainee by fellow officers. The court found that the police had not shown deliberate indifference to the condition of the detainee and that there was no cover-up of the use of excessive force. Rasul v. Rumsfeld, 414 F.Supp.2d 26 (D.D.C. 2006). Former detainees at a military facility in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, sued the Secretary of Defense and commanding officers, alleging they were tortured. The defendants moved to dismiss and the district court granted the motion in part, and deferred in part. The court held that military personnel supervising the interrogation of detainees at the facility had qualified immunity from a claim that they promoted or condoned torture in violation of Fifth and Eighth Amendment rights of detainees, because the question as to whether the detainees had rights under the constitution had not been resolved by high courts and therefore personnel could not have known that their conduct was wrongful. The court noted that District of Columbia law applied to the question of whether military personnel at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, were acting within the scope of their employment when they allegedly tortured detainees. The prisoners alleged various forms of torture, including hooding, forced nakedness, housing in cages, deprivation of food, forced body cavity searches, subjection to extremes of heat and cold, harassment in the practice of their religion, forced shaving of religious beards, placing the Koran in the toilet, placement in stress positions, beatings with rifle butts, and the use of unmuzzled dogs for intimidation. The court found "most disturbing" their claim that executives of the United States government were directly responsible for the "depraved conduct the plaintiffs suffered over the course of their detention." Serna v. Colorado Dept. of Corrections, 455 F.3d 1146 (10th Cir. 2006). A prisoner brought excessive force and inadequate medical care claims against various officers and officials. A state prison director moved for summary judgment on the ground of qualified immunity. The district court denied summary judgment and director appealed. The court of appeals reversed and remanded. The court held that: (1) the director's authorizing the use of a special team was not personal involvement that could form the basis for supervisory liability; (2) the director's receipt of periodic reports about the team's progress was not direct participation that could give rise to liability; (3) the director's conduct did not constitute failure to supervise; and (4) the director was not deliberately indifferent to the rights of inmates. The director had, at a warden's request, authorized a special team to conduct cell invasions to find a loaded gun. (Colorado Territorial Corrections Facility)

Thomas v. Walton, 461 F.Supp.2d 786 (S.D.Ill. 2006). A state prisoner brought civil rights claims against correctional officials, alleging use of excessive force, deliberate indifference to medical needs, and retaliation in violation of his First Amendment rights. The defendants' motion for partial summary judgment was granted in part and denied in part. The district court held that a one-day delay in providing access to a mental health professional following the prisoner's suicide attempt did not involve deliberate indifference and that a 10-day delay in providing medical attention was not deliberate indifference. The court found that the prisoner's repeated refusal to comply with an order to submit to a strip search during a cell inspection justified spraying him with the chemical agent. The court found that the spraying did not involve the use of excessive force, where the chemical was not used in a quantity greater than necessary to subdue the prisoner, secure his compliance with the order, and assure the safety of the officers. The court noted that the prisoner was being held in segregation in a maximum security prison and had a history of assaults on correctional officers. (Tamms Correctional Center, Illinois)

Tibbs v. City of Chicago, 469 F.3d 661 (7th Cir. 2006). An arrestee brought § 1983 action against an arresting officer and city, alleging Fourth Amendment violations. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants, and the arrestee appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that a police officer acted reasonably, and thus, did not violate the arrestee's Fourth Amendment right against unreasonable seizure, when he made an arrest on an outstanding traffic warrant. The court held that the police officer did not use an unreasonable amount of force, in violation of the Fourth Amendment, by putting tight handcuffs on the arrestee and leaving them on for approximately 30 minutes until the arrestee was taken to a lockup at a police station. The arrestee complained only once to the officer that the handcuffs were too tight, he offered the officer no indication of the degree of pain caused by the handcuffs, he suffered minimal, if any, injury, other than redness on his wrists for less than two days, and he sought no medical care for any wrist injury. The arrestee was held in custody for two days. About twenty to twenty-five minutes after arriving at the station, the arrestee was taken to a lockup where his handcuffs were removed. U.S. v. Gonzales, 436 F.3d 560 (5th Cir. 2006). Following a jury trial, deportation officers were convicted of deprivation of civil rights and one defendant appealed. The appeals court held that evidence was sufficient to support a finding that the defendant willfully sprayed a detainee, who had a broken neck, with pepper spray and that the use of pepper spray resulted in bodily injury. The court noted that a detention officer testified that while the defendant was carrying the detainee to the bus, he said "Let's Mace the fucker and see if he budges" and two other detention officers remembered a similar statement, and when the defendant exited the bus, he was coughing, smirking sarcastically, and claiming that there had been an "accidental discharge." After the pepper spray was used, the detainee's mouth was foaming, he complained of stinging pain, and his eyes were swollen shut for at least three hours. The court found that the force that caused this pain and that the pepper spray was applied when the detainee was paralyzed, handcuffed, and lying on the floor of the bus. The detainee made his injury known to the defendant, screaming "they broke me..." and in response to his pleas the officers taunted him and invited people to wipe their feet on him. Two of the defendants dragged his limp body from a house to the van, dragged him off the van onto a bus, and witnessed his reaction to being pepper sprayed. According to the court, by moving the detainee without stabilizing him, the officers exposed him to a risk of harm. The detainee was left alone on the bus floor, handcuffed, eyes swollen shut, and foaming at the mouth, despite the officers' training that, due to the risk of potentially fatal asphyxiation, those who had been pepper sprayed should be continually monitored and placed upright, never in a prone position. Valdes v. Crosby, 450 F.3d 1231 (11th Cir. 2006). The estate of a death-row inmate who died in prison after an alleged beating by prison guards brought § 1983 and state law actions against prison officials and prison nurses, alleging Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment violations. The inmate's estate alleged that several guards beat the inmate during a cell extraction, and that the inmate did not resist or act aggressively and no weapons were visible in his cell. The inmate was on death row for having killed a guard at another facility during an escape attempt. Evidence indicated that the inmate's death was not due to injuries sustained repeatedly throwing himself off the bunk onto the concrete floor, as the officers reported, but was due to a massive physical beating that occurred within five to ten minutes of his death. The district court granted the defendants' motions for summary judgment in part and denied in part. A former warden appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the plaintiff sufficiently stated a claim that prison guards beat the inmate and that the plaintiff created triable issues as to: (1) whether the prison had a history of widespread abuse of the inmates; (2) whether the warden established customs and policies that resulted in deliberate indifference to constitutional violations; and (3) whether the warden failed to take reasonable measures to correct the alleged deprivations. The court noted that, at the time of the inmate's death, it was clearly established that a warden could face liability under § 1983 when, faced with a history of widespread abuse, he failed to take reasonable steps or he adopted policies or customs that resulted in deliberate indifference. Evidence showed that the prison had a notorious reputation for inmate abuse, the warden's predecessor warned him about abusive guards, yet the warden promoted one such guard and had him work on the wing where inmates with the most serious disciplinary problems were housed. Evidence also showed that the warden discontinued the practice of videotaping guards extracting prisoners from cells, and that the warden did not read the inmates' abuse of force complaints, but gave them to his secretary to handle. The court found that the warden was on notice of the need to correct or to stop the abuse by the officers. (Florida State Prison)

Ziemba v. Armstrong, 433 F.Supp.2d 248 (D.Conn. 2006). A prison inmate sued a correctional officer under § 1983, seeking actual damages of $100,000 and punitive damages of $150,000, for injuries incurred when excessive force was used to place the inmate in a four-point restraint. A jury returned a verdict against one officer, who moved for judgment as matter of law and a new trial. The district court denied the motions, finding that the officer was not entitled to qualified immunity and that the jury could find that the officer had the requisite state of mind when he attacked the inmate. The court found that compensatory damages did not shock the conscience and that punitive damages of $150,000 were warranted. The jury found that the officer hit the inmate in the face, knelt on him and otherwise inflicted pain in the course of securing the inmate in a four-point restraint, where he remained for 22 hours. The court noted that the officer engaged in reprehensible conduct by hitting the inmate after the inmate was secured, and that punitive damages were only 50% higher than compensatory damages. Adams v. Bradshaw, 484 F.Supp.2d 753 (N.D.Ohio 2007). After his convictions for aggravated murder and other offenses were affirmed, an offender sought a writ of habeas corpus. The district court held that, even if a due process violation occurred, the improper use of a stun belt placed on the defendant his during trial was a harmless error because the evidence of guilt was overwhelming. The court noted that due process prohibits the use of shackles on a defendant during a criminal trial, unless there exists an essential state interest, such as the interest in courtroom security. A state inmate brought a pro se § 1983 action against employees of the New York Department of Correctional Services (DOCS) alleging inadequate medical care and use of excessive force. The employees moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The court held that the inmate's refusal to come out of his exercise pen necessitated the use of some force, the force was used only when the inmate ignored repeated pleas to come out, and when the door was opened he not only resisted the officers but charged toward them, and the four punches delivered by an officer did not rise to level of unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain. Allen v. City of New York, 480 F.Supp.2d 689 (S.D.N.Y. 2007). A prison inmate sued a city and corrections officers, claiming violation of the Eighth Amendment, false arrest, and malicious prosecution arising from a beating administered by the officers while being escorted to his cell. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants in part, and denied in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by fact issues regarding whether officers accompanying inmate could and should have intervened to keep one officer from banging the inmate's head against a wall, whether the officer who allegedly banged the inmate's head against a wall used excessive force, whether an officer who filed a criminal assault complaint against the inmate committed malicious prosecution, and whether that officer was entitled to qualified immunity. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that questions as to whether jail officers used excessive

Cockrell v. Sparks, 510 F.3d 1307 (11th Cir. 2007). An inmate who was injured when he was shoved by a deputy while incarcerated in a county jail, brought a § 1983 action against a sheriff and deputy, alleging that the use of excessive force violated his civil rights. The district court granted summary judgment to the defendants and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that a deputy's open-handed push of the inmate, who was drunk and creating a disturbance, in an effort to quiet him so that the deputy could relocate a different prisoner who had attempted suicide, was not so egregious that it shocked the conscience, even though it resulted in the inmate falling, breaking his hip and wrist, and lacerating his ear. Collins v. Kearney, 495 F.Supp.2d 466 (D.Del. 2007). A state prisoner brought a civil rights action under § 1983 against a prison warden, sergeant, corrections officers, nurse, and a physician, alleging claims for excessive force, assault and battery, and deliberate indifference to serious medical needs. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants in part, and denied in part. The district held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the prisoner lunged toward a corrections officer, whether the amount of force used by officers was reasonably related to the need, and whether corrections officers' use of force against prisoner was applied in a good faith effort to maintain or restore discipline or maliciously and sadistically for the purpose of causing harm. The court also held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether a sergeant failed to protect the prisoner when the prisoner was allegedly attacked by other corrections officers. Danley v. Allyn, 485 F.Supp.2d 1260 (N.D.Ala. 2007). A pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against jail officers, alleging that he was subjected to excessive force and then denied medical treatment when they sprayed him with pepper spray. The district court denied the defendants' motions to dismiss and they appealed. The court of appeals vacated and remanded. On the remand, the district court again denied the defendants' motion to dismiss. The court held that the officers were not entitled to qualified immunity from the detainee's claim that the officers subjected him to excessive force, in violation of Fourteenth Amendment, by pepper spraying him in response to a dispute over toilet paper. The court noted that the officers had fair warning that to employ pepper spray as punishment, or for the sadistic pleasure of the sprayers, as distinguished from what was reasonably necessary to maintain prisoner control, was constitutionally prohibited. The court found that the detainee' allegations that a jail administrator and sheriff created an atmosphere or practice under which the defendant officers operated in allegedly subjecting the detainee to excessive force and then denying him medical treatment when they sprayed him with pepper spray, were sufficient, if proven, to create supervisory liability under § 1983. Giles v. Kearney, 516 F.Supp.2d 362 (D.Del.2007). An inmate sued prison officials under § 1983, alleging constitutional violations arising from an alleged use of excessive force at a correctional institution. The district court entered judgment for the defendants. The court held that the incidents in which pepper spray was used against the inmate did not constitute excessive force. According to the court, a corrections officer's use of pepper spray against the inmate was justified in response to the inmate's defiant and argumentative behavior, as well as his repeated refusals to obey orders. Noting that the officer was alone in a shower facility as the inmate continued to yell and defy orders, the court concluded that the officer's use of pepper spray to calm the increasingly volatile situation and prevent injury was a measured and reasonable response. The court also found that the physical force used by the corrections officer after the inmate struck the officer following the officer's use of pepper spray was not excessive considering the evolving series of events. The officer sat on top of the inmate's back, trying to control the inmate as well as the unfolding situation, and the court concluded that the force he used was not maliciously or sadistically applied to cause pain. The court found that there was no deliberate indifference to the inmate's medical needs following incidents in which he was sprayed with pepper spray. The court noted that the inmate received medical care and assessment following each of the events at issue and there was no evidence that defendants obstructed, neglected or prevented him from receiving care or ignored his requests for medication or medical treatment. Hydrick v. Hunter, 500 F.3d 978 (9th Cir. 2007). Sexual offenders who were civilly confined in a state psychiatric hospital under California's Sexually Violent Predators Act (SVP) filed a class action against various state officials under § 1983, challenging the conditions of their confinement. The district court denied the defendants' motion to dismiss, and the defendants appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part and reversed in part. The court held that the First Amendment claims brought against state hospital officials were based on clearly established law for qualified immunity purposes insofar as they challenged retaliation for filing lawsuits, however, officials had qualified immunity to the extent that the plaintiffs' claim relied on a First Amendment right not to participate in treatment sessions. The court found that the plaintiffs stated a § 1983 claim for violations of their Fourth Amendment rights to be free from unreasonable searches and seizures. The court concluded that hospital officials were entitled to qualified immunity with regard to procedural due process claims, but not substantive due process claims. The offenders alleged that they were subjected to public strip searches, to retaliatory searches of their possessions and to arbitrary seizure of their personal belongings, that they were placed in shackles during transport to the hospital and during visits from family and friends, that they were subjected to restraint even if they did not pose any physical risk, and that they were force-medicated. Long v. Morris, 485 F.Supp.2d 1247 (D.Kan. 2007). An inmate brought a pro se suit against a sheriff's deputy, alleging that by using excessive force the deputy violated his rights under the Eighth Amendment to be free from cruel and unusual punishment. The district court held that the deputy was not entitled to qualified immunity. The court held that the law was clearly established that the alleged actions of the deputy violated the inmate's rights under the Eighth Amendment, such that the deputy was not entitled to qualified immunity on the inmate's excessive force claim. According to the court, the record supported an inference that while the inmate was shackled at the wrists, waist and ankles, the deputy took him to the ground, hit his head on the floor hard enough to require stitches, and displaced his collar bone. The district court denied the defendants' motion for summary judgment and they appealed. The appeals court reversed. The court held that even if an officer pushed the arrestee, who was drunk, to the ground as he exited the police vehicle upon arrival at the police station, the officer did not use excessive force. The court noted that the arrestee was on the ground outside of the vehicle for less than fifteen seconds, and as soon as the arrestee ended up on the ground the officer closed the vehicle's door, joined another officer in helping arrestee to his feet, and walked the arrestee inside to the booking room. The court found that the officers did not use excessive force in the booking room when they moved the arrestee's arms behind him and over his head for less than twenty seconds after the arrestee refused to keep his hands on a bench and struck out at an officer with closed-fist swing. According to the court, the officers did not use excessive force outside of the cell in which they attempted to place the arrestee when they restrained the arrestee on the floor for approximately thirty seconds after the arrestee fell. Montoya v. Board of County Com'rs, 506 F.Supp.2d 434 (D.Colo. 2007). A jail inmate brought civil rights and civil rights conspiracy claims against sheriffs, a deputy sheriff, and officials of two counties alleging violation of his constitutional rights when he was tasered by a correctional officer and later transferred and placed in segregation in alleged retaliation for complaining to the press about the tasering incident. The defendants moved for summary judgment and the district court granted the motion. The court held that a civil rights claim was not stated against counties and sheriffs in their official capacities for the inmate's transfer and placement in segregated confinement in alleged retaliation for his complaints to press, given the inmate's complete failure to allege any specific facts suggesting that segregation was the result of a custom or policy, rather than being simply a single act of deprivation disconnected from any wider scheme. According to the court, the county sheriffs were entitled to qualified immunity on individual capacity claims involving conspiracy to transfer and place jail inmate in protective, segregated confinement in retaliation for the exercise of his First Amendment rights, absent any indication that the sheriffs, who never communicated with each other about the transfer, were personally involved in the decision, exercised discretionary control over the decision, or failed to supervise jail administrators who actually made the transfer. Norris v. Engles, 494 F.3d 634 (8th Cir. 2007). A county jail detainee, who had been diagnosed with manic bipolar depression, sued a jail official under § 1983, alleging due process violations arising from his physical restraint. The district court denied the official's motion for summary judgment based upon qualified immunity. The official appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded, finding that the official's alleged conduct of cuffing the detainee to a floor-grate toilet in an uncomfortable manner for approximately three hours, if proven, did not violate the detainee's substantive due process rights. According to the court, the official's alleged actions did not shock the conscience and thus did not violate the detainee's substantive due process rights, inasmuch as official took such action after the detainee, who had been diagnosed with manic bipolar depression, had threatened to pull out her own peripherally inserted central catheter (PICC) so that she would bleed to death, and after the detainee had shown that having her hands handcuffed behind her back was alone not an adequate form of restraint. Stewart v. Beaufort County, 481 F.Supp.2d 483 (D.S.C. 2007). Following removal to federal court, the defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court denied the motion. The court held that a genuine issue of material fact existed as to whether the deputy's use of force in transporting the pretrial detainee to a detention center was excessive, precluding summary judgment for deputy on the basis of qualified immunity. The court noted that, at the time of the alleged violation, a pretrial detainee's right to be free from excessive force was clearly established. (Beaufort County Detention Center, South Carolina)

U.S. v. Miller, 477 F.3d 644 (8th Cir. 2007). A supervisor at a county detention center was convicted in the district court of depriving two prisoners of their Eighth Amendment right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment. The supervisor appealed and the appeals court affirmed. The court held that there was sufficient evidence that the supervisor acted maliciously and sadistically toward the prisoner, in violation of the Eighth Amendment prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment, even though the supervisor could have inflicted even greater injuries upon the prisoner. Evidence indicated that the supervisor punched the prisoner when there was no legitimate reason to do so, kicked the prisoner, and stomped on the prisoner while he was lying on the ground. The court noted that the assailing officer's ability to inflict greater injuries upon a prisoner does not make an attack any less malicious or sadistic, for the purposes of the Eighth Amendment prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment. The court held that the prisoner's medical records, which did not identify the supervisor as the individual responsible for the prisoner's injuries, were admissible under the medical treatment or diagnosis exception to the hearsay records. The district court held that, with respect to three body cavity search incidents, the prisoner would be permitted proceed with his Eighth Amendment excessive force claims against each correctional officer who he alleged was either directly involved in the use of force or was present and either encouraged or failed to stop it. The prisoner alleged that there was no need for force in connection with the first search, that his constitutional rights were violated in connection with the second search when several officers, who lacked legitimate security reasons for conducting a manual body cavity search, made contact with his genitals while conducting a strip search as a means of obtaining sexual gratification or humiliating him, and other officers who were present failed to intervene, and that, with respect to the third search, an officer used a taser against the prisoner when he posed no threat. Adams v. Bouchard, 591 F.Supp.2d 1191 (W.D.Okla. 2008). A jail inmate brought a § 1983 action against sheriff's deputies and a sheriff, alleging the deputies assaulted him, used excessive force, and that the sheriff failed to properly supervise the deputies. The defendants moved for summary judgment and qualified immunity. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the inmate properly exhausted administrative remedies prior to bringing the federal action. The court found that the inmate's efforts towards exhausting his § 1983 excessive force claim against sheriff's deputies were insufficient to satisfy the exhaustion requirement under the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA) as to his claim that the sheriff failed to supervise the deputies. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the force used by the sheriff's deputies against the inmate was necessary. According to the court, the sheriff's deputies were not entitled to qualified immunity from the inmate's Eighth Amendment excessive force claim because it was clearly established at the time of the alleged excessive force that prison officials could not maliciously and sadistically inflict injury for the very purpose of causing harm. Alvarado v. Battaglia, 539 F.Supp.2d 1022 (N.D.Ill. 2008). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against a warden and corrections officers arising from an alleged incident in which an officer discharged a firearm in the direction of the prisoner and other inmates from a guard tower that overlooked the inmates' recreation yard. The district court held that the prisoner stated an excessive force claim against the officer who allegedly discharged the firearm but failed to state a claim against the warden. According to the court, the prisoner's allegations that the corrections officer discharged a firearm in the direction of the prisoner and other inmates in response to the inmates' banter were sufficient to state an excessive force claim, so as to overcome the officer's qualified immunity defense. The court found that the prisoner's allegations that prison officials knew that the corrections officer who allegedly discharged the firearm was mentally unstable, yet allowed her to continue working, were insufficient to establish that the warden acted with deliberate indifference, as required for the warden to be held liable under § 1983 for the officer's actions. Anglin v. City of Aspen, 562 F.Supp.2d 1304 (D.Colo. 2008). A jail inmate brought a civil rights action under § 1983 against a city, former and current police officers, and a police chief, alleging that the defendants violated her rights to due process and free speech, as well as her right to be free from unreasonable seizure, by forcibly injecting her with antipsychotic medication while she was in custody at a county jail. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants. The court held that officers did not deprive the inmate of due process by restraining her while paramedics forcibly sedated her and that the officers' act of restraining the inmate while she was sedated did not amount to excessive use of force. The court found that the police chief was not liable for failure to train and/or supervise officers, where the training reflected the sound conclusion that medical professionals, rather than law enforcement personnel, were the individuals most qualified to determine whether sedation was appropriate. According to the court, absent a policy of sedating detainees, the city was not municipally liable under § 1983. The court held that the officers' act of restraining the inmate while paramedics forcibly administered antipsychotic medication to her was not substantially motivated as a response to her exercise of allegedly constitutionally protected conduct, as would support the inmate's First Amendment free speech retaliation claim against the officers, where the physician, not the officers, had legal authorization to decide whether an emergency existed that justified the inmate's forced sedation, and the officers did not participate in making the decision to forcibly sedate the inmate. Antoine v. County of Sacramento, 566 F.Supp.2d 1045 (E.D.Cal. 2008). A pretrial detainee brought a civil rights action against corrections officers based upon the officers' use of a "grating" restraint practice. After a jury verdict in favor of the detainees, the officers moved for a new trial. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that it was proper to permit an expert witness to express his opinions regarding the propriety of the "grating" practice in the context of whether the officers' decision to employ that practice rather than the "prostraint" restraining chair was appropriate. The court found that the detainee's attorneys' argument that the detainee was "hogtied" by the defendant corrections officers did not constitute misconduct warranting a new trial, where testimony indicated that the detainee's feet were shackled together and his hands were shackled together behind his back, but that his feet were not shackled to his hands. Burns v. Trombly, 624 F.Supp.2d 185 (N.D.N.Y. 2008). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against prison employees, alleging that his constitutional rights under the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments were violated when the employees used excessive force during an attempt to move him to a different prison cell, and when they were deliberately indifferent to his serious medical needs arising from that use of excessive force. The employees moved for partial summary judgment and the district court granted the motion. The court held that the assertion in the prisoner's complaint was insufficient to create a genuine issue of material fact with regard to an employee's personal involvement in the alleged use of excessive force. According to the court, the prison employee who videotaped the alleged use of excessive force was not deliberately indifferent to the prisoner's serious medical needs arising from that incident, where the prisoner did not explain to the employee why he needed to go to the medical clinic, the employee did not hear the prisoner's request, and the employee did not witness any alleged loss of consciousness or facial swelling while standing outside the prisoner's cell door. The court held that the state prisoner's letter complaining to a superintendent was too brief to place prison employees on notice that any constitutional violation had actually occurred, and thus was insufficient to create a genuine issue of material fact with regard to the employees' personal involvement in the alleged use of excessive force and deliberate indifference to his serious medical needs arising from that use of excessive force. Danley v. Allen, 540 F.3d 1298 (11th Cir. 2008). A pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against jailers, alleging that he was subjected to excessive force and then denied medical treatment when they sprayed him with pepper spray. The district court entered orders denying the defendants' motions to dismiss on qualified immunity grounds, and the defendants appealed. The appeals court vacated and remanded. On remand, the district court again denied the motion to dismiss, and defendants again appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the use of pepper spray to subdue the unruly detainee who had twice ignored a jailer's instructions for him to return to his cell did not itself represent the application of excessive force in violation of the detainee's Fourteenth Amendment rights. But the court found that allegations in the detainee's complaint, regarding his subsequent confinement without being allowed to properly clean himself and remove pepper spray from his clothing, in a small, poorly-ventilated cell, were sufficient to state an excessive force claim. According to the court, the entire incident, consisting of both the initial pepper-spraying and the detainee's subsequent confinement in a small, poorly-ventilated cell, could be treated as a single alleged incident of use of excessive force. The court noted that the detainee's eyes nearly swelled shut, he had difficulty breathing, and he nearly passed out, while jail officials allegedly failed to take any, and then only inadequate, steps to alleviate his suffering but instead mocked and ridiculed him. The court found that the alleged mocking of the detainee while he suffered, by jailers who parodied his choking, was circumstantial evidence of their malicious intent. The court found that the allegations were sufficient to state a claim for officials' deliberate indifference to the detainee's serious medical needs. The court determined that the jailers were not entitled to qualified immunity on the detainee's deliberate indifference claim and that the detainee stated a claim against the sheriff and the jail administrator to hold them personally liable under § 1983 for alleged excessive force and deliberate indifference by the jailers. The detainee was allegedly diagnosed with chemical conjunctivitis and bronchospasms as the result of the delay in treatment. The court noted that this, along with the fact that another prisoner allegedly recognized the detainee's distress and was ultimately successful in obtaining a brief shower for him, was sufficient to show the seriousness of his medical need. Davis v. Peters, 566 F.Supp.2d 790 (N.D.Ill. 2008). The detainee claimed that the conditions of his confinement violated his constitutional rights to equal protection and substantive due process. After a bench trial, the district court held that: (1) the practice of searching the detainee prior to his visits with guests and attorneys violated his substantive due process rights; (2) the practice of using a "black-box" restraint system on all of the detainee's trips to and from court over a 15-month period violated his substantive due process rights; (3) requiring the detainee to sleep in a room illuminated by a night light did not violate the detainee's substantive due process rights; (4) a former director was not protected by qualified immunity from liability for the constitutional violations; and (5) the detainee would be awarded compensatory damages in the amount of $30 for each hour he wore the black box in violation of his rights. The court found that a 21-day lockdown following an attempt at organized resistance by a large number of detainees at the facility, shortly after the breakout of several incidents of violence, was not outside the bounds of professional judgment for the purposes of a substantive due process claim asserted by the detainee. Estate of Harvey ex rel. Dent v. Roanoke City Sheriff's Office, 585 F.Supp.2d 844 (W.D.Va. 2008). The administrator of a pretrial detainee's estate brought a civil rights action under §§ 1983, 1985, and 1986 and Virginia law, against a city sheriff's department, sheriff, deputies, and prison health providers, alleging excessive use of force, failure to train, assault, battery, conspiracy, breach of a non-delegable fiduciary duty, intentional infliction of emotional distress and wrongful death. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motions. The court found that the city sheriff's deputies did not act with deliberate indifference when, in an attempt to transfer the detainee to a hospital for treatment, they forcibly removed the detainee from his cell, placed him face down on a stretcher, and covered him with a blanket to stop him from spitting and throwing feces at the deputies. According to the court, there was no evidence that the deputies knew that the detainee suffered from an excited delirium or serious heart condition. The court noted that the detainee was naked, slick with feces and urine, spitting, yelling, being combative, threatening to throw more bodily fluids, trying to bite, and was HIV and Hepatitis C positive. A state inmate brought a § 1983 action against city police officers, alleging they used excessive force when arresting him, and against custody officers at a county jail, alleging they used excessive force by unnecessarily spraying the inmate with pepper spray for an unreasonable period of time. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants, finding that the inmate failed to exhaust his administrative remedies. According to the court, the inmate failed to comply with the requirement, under the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA), of exhausting his administrative remedies before bringing a § 1983 action, because after denial of his belated grievance, he failed to appeal from the denial of the grievance, and the jail's grievance policy would have allowed such an appeal. The district court dismissed the action and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part and reversed in part. The court held that the prisoner had no due process liberty interest in freedom from use of four-point restraints or in having a prison nurse arrive before corrections officers placed the prisoner in the restraints. According to the court, such restraints were expected adverse consequences of confinement, the prisoner had been accused of hitting a corrections officer, and officers entered the prisoner's cell to conduct an investigation. Hart v. Celaya, 548 F.Supp.2d 789 (N.D.Cal. 2008). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against corrections officers, alleging excessive force and deliberate indifference to his serious medical needs. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants. The court held that the officers did not use excessive force in releasing pepper-spray into the prisoner's holding cell after he refused to submit to an unclothed body search. The court noted that the officer released pepper-spray into the cell only after the prisoner refused to comply with the direct orders of three different officers of increasingly higher rank to submit to the search, after the officer explained to the prisoner that all inmates entering administrative segregation were required to submit to an unclothed body search, after the prisoner began yelling and pushing up against his cell door causing it to shake and rattle, and after the officers were concerned that the prisoner would either harm himself or break out of his cell and endanger others. The court found that the officer did not use excessive force in requiring the prisoner to lift his genitals during an unclothed body search, even though the prisoner had pepper spray on his hands. The court held that officers did not use excessive force in violation of the Eighth Amendment when they allegedly attempted to trip the prisoner, pushed him into the frame of a holding cell door, and twisted and pulled his wrists as they put him in leg restraints in order to move the prisoner from the cell to an outside area where he could be decontaminated from the officer's use of pepper-spray. The court noted that the prisoner's medical evaluations, prior to and after the incident indicated that the prisoner did not sustain any injuries, such as cuts, abrasions, swelling or bruises. The court found that the prisoner did not suffer from a "serious medical need" within the meaning of the Eighth Amendment when he was pepper-sprayed in his cell, allegedly roughly handled by corrections officers as they took him to an outside area for decontamination and required him to kneel on a concrete surface for approximately 45 minutes during decontamination. After decontamination the prisoner was examined by a medical technician who listed no evidence of injury and documented the prisoner's decontamination from pepper-spray. A physician's subsequent examination found no long-term or lasting skin, knee, shoulder or pepper-spray related injuries. (Salinas Valley State Prison, California)

Hurt v. Birkett, 566 F.Supp.2d 620 (E.D.Mich. 2008). A state inmate brought an action against prison employees under § 1983, alleging conspiracy, racial discrimination, retaliation, deliberate indifference, excessive force, and failure to report in connection with an incident in which the inmate's arm was broken. The district court dismissed the action. The court held that the inmate's allegations, that state prison employees engaged in a campaign of harassment based on race, failed to state an equal protection claim. The court noted that a single allegation was insufficient to raise the inmate's right to relief above the speculative level. The court found that the inmate's allegations that prison employees conspired to deny him medical care after his arm was broken, in violation of the Eighth Amendment, failed to state a claim of conspiracy against the employees, absent details and allegations of specific acts made in furtherance of such conspiracy. The court held that prison employees were not liable for excessive force for breaking the inmate's arm, where a video of the incident in which the inmate's arm was broken showed the inmate starting an altercation and needing to be subdued, and it was clear that the force applied by the employees was applied in a good-faith effort to restore discipline. Iko v. Shreve, 535 F.3d 225 (4th Cir. 2008). The estate and family of a deceased inmate brought a § 1983 survival and wrongful death action against correctional officers, alleging violations of the inmate's Eighth Amendment rights. The district court granted, in part, the officers' motion for summary judgment. The officers appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part and reversed in part. The court held that an officer violated the deceased inmate's Eighth Amendment right to be free from excessive force, arising from the inmate's death after his extraction from his cell involving the use of pepper spray, and thus the officer was not entitled to qualified immunity on § 1983 claims. The court found there was no question that some dispersal of pepper spray was warranted in carrying out the extraction. But the officer's final burst of pepper spray was deployed after the inmate had laid down on the floor, and the officer and members of the extraction team never changed the inmate's clothing or removed the spit mask covering his nose and mouth and never secured medical treatment for the inmate. Although the inmate proffered his hands through the door pursuant to the officer's order, albeit in front of rather than behind him, the officer deployed several additional bursts of pepper spray even after the inmate attempted to comply with the order, and the inmate never reacted violently. The court held that correction officers were deliberately indifferent to the medical needs of the deceased inmate in violation of the inmate's Eighth Amendment right to adequate medical care, and thus were not entitled to qualified immunity on § 1983 claim brought by the inmate's estate and family. According to the court, the officers' training required decontamination after the use of pepper spray, the state's medical examiner credited pepper spray as contributing to the inmate's death, a lay person would have inferred from the inmate's collapse that he was in need of medical attention, the officers witnessed the inmate's collapse, caught him, and directed him into a wheelchair, and yet the inmate received no medical treatment. The officers argued that the inmate did not appear fazed by the pepper spray and that the inmate's opportunity to breathe fresh air while he was wheeled from the medical room was an adequate alternative to receiving actual medical care. Jean-Laurent v. Wilkinson, 540 F.Supp.2d 501 (S.D.N.Y. 2008). A prisoner in a state correctional facility brought a civil rights action against officers and supervisors claiming violation of his rights under the First, Fourth, Eighth, and Fourteenth Amendments. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants in part and denied in part. The court held that striking the prisoner in the face several times while he was standing naked in a stairwell surrounded by several officers, absent any indication that the prisoner posed a threat, was not within the corrections officer's asserted good-faith effort to maintain order, discipline, and security due to a stabbing that recently had occurred within the prison. The court found that the objective condition for a Fourteenth Amendment excessive force civil rights claim was satisfied where the corrections officer, without reason or provocation, struck the prisoner several times across his face, causing swelling on the left side of his face, a cut to the inside of his mouth, his ear to bleed, and a hearing impairment. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a fact issue as to whether the prisoner was under constant supervision by corrections officers and to what proximity he was to other inmates so as to determine whether he could have acquired contraband. The court also found summary judgment was precluded by a fact issue as to whether senior corrections officers were grossly negligent in supervising a junior officer who allegedly violated the prisoner's Fourth Amendment rights through a strip search, and as to whether the Fourth Amendment rights of the prisoner were violated during a second strip search and alleged use of excessive force. Johnston v. Maha, 584 F.Supp.2d 612 (W.D.N.Y. 2008). A pretrial detainee brought an action against employees of a county jail, alleging violations of his constitutional rights under § 1983 and violations of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA). The defendants moved for summary judgment and the district court granted the motion. The court held that the inmate failed to exhaust administrative remedies for the purposes of the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA) as to some of his § 1983 and Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) claims against employees of the county jail, where the inmate either did not pursue appeals at all, or did not pursue appeals to the final step. According to the court, evidence was insufficient to show that the inmate was injured, or that whatever force was used by correctional officers, who removed the inmate from his cell during his transfer to segregation, was more than necessary, as would have supported the inmate's § 1983 claim for alleged violation of his rights under the Eighth Amendment. The court held that evidence was insufficient to show that medical staff at the county jail acted with deliberate indifferent to the inmate's medical needs as to requested dental care, as required to support his § 1983 claim for violation of the Eighth Amendment. The court noted that although the inmate had to wait two months to see a dentist, the dentist filled the inmate's cavities and took x-rays related to that treatment. (Genesee County Jail, New York)

A state prisoner brought a civil rights action alleging that a corrections officer used excessive force against him, another officer did not protect him, and a former commissioner and a former warden did not properly train and supervise officers in dealing with prisoners. The district court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment. The court held that the supervisors were not the driving force behind the alleged use of excessive force by the corrections officer and were not deliberately indifferent to the plight of the state prisoner. The court denied the prisoner's claim for improper training, noting that the officer received training prior to his employment and that he attened annual refresher courses. The court noted that the officer had never been disciplined. The court held that the officer did not use excessive force against the prisoner, where the officer, alone in a small space with the prisoner who was not handcuffed, perceived a threat from the prisoner, and used minimal force, which included an A-frame chokehold. The court noted that the prisoner was handcuffed once he was under control, received only minimal injury and never sought follow-up medical treatment after his initial visit with a nurse. The use of force was investigated and approved by the officer's supervisor, and the prisoner was found guilty of disorderly and threatening behavior with regard to the incident. The court held that the prison defendants were under a duty to preserve the digital video recording of an altercation between the prisoner and prison staff, where the surveillance footage was relevant, not only to the prisoner's § 1983 action against the prison, but also to the prisoner's pending disciplinary proceeding. The court noted that the defendants were aware that a disciplinary hearing was imminent following the disputed altercation, that the prisoner had made repeated requests for the production of the evidence, and that the defendants should have been able to foresee the harm or prejudice that would have been caused by the non-preservation of the evidence. The court found that spoliation of evidence sanctions were warranted against the prison officials for their alleged failure to preserve the digital video recording. The court found that a genuine issue of material fact existed as to whether prison officials' use of force against the prisoner during an altercation was in good faith and in order to maintain discipline, precluding summary judgment in favor of the officials on the issue of whether the use of force exerted by the officials upon prisoner during the altercation violated the Eighth Amendment. The district court entered summary judgment for the officers and nurses. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the prisoner's act of calling a hearing officer a "foul and corrupted bitch" was not protected conduct. The court found that the prison officers did not use excessive force in violation of the Eighth Amendment in restraining the prisoner after he insulted a hearing officer, where the prisoner did not dispute that he was angered, bit an officer's hand, and verbally threatened the officers. The prisoner stated that the officers merely attempted to shove him down stairs and "almost" broke his glasses, and the prisoner by his own account suffered at most "minor lacerations and cuts." According to the court, the prisoner's injuries from the altercation with the officers, consisting of minor cuts and lacerations, did not create an objectively serious medical need, and any denial of medical treatment thus did not violate his Eighth Amendment rights. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the police officer's use of force against the arrestee and the injuries sustained by the arrestee, allegedly arising out of the officer pushing the arrestee in the jail with such force that he fell into a steel door and plexiglass window, was de minimis under the Fourth Amendment. According to the court, even if the officer pushed the arrestee into a jail house door unprovoked, a hospital found no injuries after the jail incident aside from a minor contusion to the arrestee's right elbow and shoulder. The district court entered judgment on a jury verdict in the defendants' favor and denied the administrators' motions for judgment as a matter of law and for a new trial. The administrators appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that there was sufficient evidence to support the jury's findings. A physician had testified that the nature of the arrestee's injuries indicated that he had most likely been beaten with a baton by jail personnel. But all medical experts agreed that the arrestee suffered from advanced heart disease and died of a heart attack, the arrestee had been in two automobile accidents on the date of his death and had suffered a hand laceration immediately after the second accident, and there was evidence that the arrestee's wrist injuries occurred in an accident or while he was being transported to jail, and that his head injuries occurred when he fell to the floor after a heart attack. (Chicago Police Department, Illinois)

The district court denied the deputy's motion for summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the deputy's repeated use of a taser on the unruly arrestee qualified as wanton and sadistic and was not objectively reasonable, precluding qualified immunity. The court noted that the excessive force claim asserted by the arrestee, who had not been formally charged but was being transported to a jail at the time of the events giving rise to the claim, was analyzed under the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause, not under the Fourth Amendment. According to the court, the deputy first tased the arrestee after she forcefully stated "fuck you" to the deputy, the deputy did not follow the sheriff's department's taser policy requiring initial use of open-hand measures, the arrestee likely was not endangering herself as the deputy had claimed, since she was handcuffed and in a hobbling device while locked in the back-seat cage of the squad car, and the deputy used the taser under the arrestee's breast and on her inner thigh. Parker v. Bladen County, 583 F.Supp.2d 736 (E.D.N.C. 2008). The administratrix of a detainee's estate brought a § 1983 action in state court against county defendants, alleging that they used excessive force when they used tasers on her. The defendants removed the action to federal court. The county and sheriff's department moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion. According to the court, under North Carolina law, the sheriff, not the county encompassing his jurisdiction, has final policymaking authority over hiring, supervising, and discharging personnel in the sheriff's office. The court found that the sheriff's deputies' alleged use of excessive force in attempting to control the detainee by use of tasers, and the sheriff's department's alleged failure to train and supervise its employees as to the use of tasers, could not be attributed to the county, so as to subject it to § 1983 liability for the detainee's death. The court held that the county sheriff's department lacked the legal capacity, under North Carolina law, to be sued under § 1983 liability for the detainee's death. The court denied the officers' motion to reconsider a grant of the prisoner's jury demand on factual issues related to an affirmative defense. The officers filed an interlocutory appeal. The appeals court reversed and remanded. Powers-Bunce v. District of Columbia, 576 F.Supp.2d 67 (D.D.C. 2008). The mother of a detainee who committed suicide while in police custody brought a suit in the District of Columbia Superior Court against police officers, alleging violations of the Fifth, Eighth, and Fourteenth Amendments. The case was removed to federal court and the district court granted the officers' motion to dismiss in part and denied in part. The district court granted summary judgment for the officers. An autopsy identified contusions that were consistent with being struck repeatedly with a night stick or similar weapon. The detainee sustained injuries on his buttocks, back of legs, abdomen, back, shins, and fingers. But the court noted that there was no evidence indicating whether the injuries were inflicted before the detainee's arrest or linking the injuries to the arresting officer. The district court concluded that there was an absence of a factual dispute concerning the Fourth Amendment excessive force claim, and therefore summary judgment was granted to the officers. Richman v. Sheahan, 512 F.3d 876 (7th Cir. 2008). The administrator of the estate of contemnor filed a § 1983 suit individually and in her official capacity against deputy sheriffs in their individual capacities for violating the Fourth and Eighth Amendments. The administrator alleged that the deputies used excessive force, leading to her son's death, while restrainig him for resisting arrest in a state courtroom after a judge held him in contempt. The district court granted in part, and denied in part, the deputies' motion for summary judgment on the ground of official immunity and the deputies appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part and reversed in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by fact issues as to whether the deputy sheriffs applied excessive force with the intent to punish the contemnor, not merely with the intent to arrest. The court found that the deputies were protected by official immunity for seizing the mother. According to the court, the deputy sheriffs did not subject the mother to excessive force by seizing her in the courtroom. Other deputies restrained her son for resisting arrest allegedly sat on his back. The court noted that the deputies moved the mother by wheelchair to another courtroom in a modest use of force. The court found that the use of force was well suited to the situation in which it was essential to remove her after she had tried to force her way back to the courtroom, as her screaming would have likely distracted the deputies or incited the son to further struggles. The court noted that she did not suffer the slightest injury from the short trip in the wheelchair. (Cook County, Illinois)

Simpson v. Thomas, 528 F.3d 685 (9th Cir. 2008). A state inmate brought a § 1983 action against a corrections officer, alleging use of excessive force after the inmate failed to comply with the officer's orders. A jury trial resulted in a verdict in the officer's favor, and the district court denied the inmate's motion for a new trial. The inmate appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The court held that the inmate was not precluded from testifying that the officer started the physical altercation by punching him, and that his subsequent actions were done in self-defense, even if such testimony was contrary to the result of a prison disciplinary proceeding in which the inmate was found guilty of battery on the officer and assessed 150 days of behavioral credit forfeiture. Stanley v. Muzio, 578 F.Supp.2d 443 (D.Conn. 2008). An arrestee brought a § 1983 action against two state judicial marshals, the Connecticut State Police and individual troopers and officers of the Connecticut State Police, alleging false imprisonment and use of excessive force. Following dismissal of claims against the State Police, troopers and officers, the marshals moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court noted that the arrestee's claim for false imprisonment under Connecticut law, alleging that two state judicial marshals kicked him in the head and back after he was forcibly restrained, were sufficient to allege reckless, wanton, or malicious conduct that was outside the scope of the defendants' employment as state judicial marshals. The court found that the arrestee's allegation that two state judicial marshals told him that he had to remain in the courtroom for five minutes following a hearing on a restraining order obtained by his wife and forcibly stopped him when he tried to leave after three minutes stated a § 1983 claim for false imprisonment. Thomas v. Northern, 574 F.Supp.2d 1029 (E.D.Mo. 2008). A state inmate filed a § 1983 action against correctional officers alleging that they violated his constitutional rights. The district court granted summary judgment for the officers and denied in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by fact issues as to whether the correctional officers had an objective need to use pepper spray after the inmate placed his arm in his food port, whether the amount of spray used was reasonable, and whether the officers properly attempted to temper the severity of their use of force. Following a jury trial, the officer was convicted of various counts, including deprivation of rights under the color of law and obstructing justice by writing false reports. The officer moved for a new trial on those counts, alleging that the government had violated its obligations by not disclosing the inmate's psychiatric evaluations. Vondrak v. City of Las Cruces, 535 F.3d 1198 (10th Cir. 2008). An arrestee filed a § 1983 action against a city and its police officers alleging illegal arrest, excessive force, inadequate medical attention, and failure to train. The district court granted in part and denied in part the defendants' motion for summary judgment. The parties filed cross-appeals. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, dismissed in part, and remanded. The appeals court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the police officers ignored the arrestee's complaints that his handcuffs were too tight, and whether the arrestee suffered permanent nerve injury because of the handcuffing. The court noted that for purposes of determining the police officers' qualified immunity from liability under § 1983 for use of excessive force, the arrestee's right to be free from unduly tight handcuffing, and the contours of that right, were clearly established in 2003. The court also found that it was clearly established that all law enforcement officials had an affirmative duty to intervene to protect the constitutional rights of citizens from infringement by other law enforcement officers in their presence, and thus one of the officers was not entitled to qualified immunity from liability, where the officer was in close proximity to the initial handcuffing, and was present thereafter. The arrestee had been taken into custody and transported to the police station, where two blood alcohol tests were administered. Both tests showed no alcohol. He was held for another 90 minutes, during which time he made several requests for someone to loosen his handcuffs because his wrists were hurting. All requests were ignored. Eventually, the officers charged the arrestee with Driving While Under the Influence to the Slightest Degree, and they released him on his own recognizance. The charge was later dropped. Following his release, the arrestee went to an emergency room. A toxicology screening report showed no drugs or alcohol. A doctor who treated the arrestee observed "multiple superficial abrasions and ecchymosis" on both wrists. He diagnosed the arrestee with neurapraxia in both wrists, and a soft tissue sprain of the right wrist. The pain and discomfort in the arrestee's wrists did not subside, and it interfered with his ability to practice as an orthodontist and to play golf. He was diagnosed with a permanent radial nerve injury in his wrists that was caused by the handcuffing. (Las Cruces Police Department, New Mexico)

The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the officers and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court reversed in part and remanded. The appeals court held that summary judgment was precluded by fact issues as to whether corrections officers used reasonable force when they restrained the prisoner on a bench for 24 hours after he refused to accept a specific cell mate, and whether another corrections officer used reasonable force when he used pepper spray after the prisoner admittedly ignored the officer's repeated orders to hand over his food tray. Walker v. Sheahan, 526 F.3d 973 (7th Cir. 2008). A pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against county correctional officers, a county sheriff, and a county, alleging that the officers used excessive force against him, deprived him of access to medical care, and retaliated against him. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The detainee appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The court held that the sheriff's office was not liable under § 1983 because the detainee failed to demonstrate that the sheriff's office had a pattern of widespread use of excessive force, inadequate investigation and training regarding use of force, or a code of silence. The court noted that although 783 complaints of excessive force were made against the sheriff's office over a five-year period, none resulted in an indictment, the the training the officers received imposed limitations on the amount of force they could use, and that officers werediscipline for the use of excessive force. The court held that summary judgment for the officers was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the injuries sustained by the detainee were consistent with his account of the restraint incident involving county corrections officers. Al-Adahi v. Obama, 596 F.Supp.2d 111 (D.D.C. 2009). Aliens who were alleged enemy combatants engaging in voluntary hunger strikes while detained at the U.S. Naval Base at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, moved to enjoin measures taken as part of a forced-feeding program. The district court denied the motion. The court found that the detainees failed to show a likelihood that they would suffer irreparable harm in the absence of an order enjoining the government from using a restraint-chair in order to facilitate force-feeding them. The court noted that pursuant to the Military Commissions Act of 2006 (MCA), the district court lacked jurisdiction to consider the complaints of detained alleged enemy combatants. According to the court, the government officials who imposed various restraints on the detained alleged enemy combatants, including the use of a restraint chair, in order to facilitate force-feeding them in response to their hunger strikes, were not thereby deliberately indifferent to their Eighth Amendment rights. The court found that evidence that the detained alleged enemy combatants had assaulted medical staff and guards during attempts to force-feed them after the detainees engaged in hunger strikes, demonstrated that the government might suffer a substantial injury if the detainees' request for a preliminary injunction against the use of a restraint-chair to facilitate such feedings were granted. Askew v. Sheriff of Cook County, Ill., 568 F.3d 632 (7th Cir. 2009). A pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against a prison guard and a sheriff, asserting excessive force and deliberate indifference claims against the guard and a municipal liability claim against the sheriff. The district court granted the defendants' motion to dismiss. The detainee appealed. The appeals court vacated and remanded. The appeals court held that upon determining that a county was a required party in the pretrial detainee's § 1983 suit against a prison guard and the sheriff, the district court was required to order that the county be made a party, rather than dismissing the suit. The court noted that a county in Illinois is a necessary party in any suit seeking damages from an independently elected county officer, and, because state law requires the county to pay, federal law deems it an indispensable party to the litigation. But the court found that the Illinois county was not a party that was required to be joined if feasible in § 1983 suit brought against a prison guard in his individual capacity. Bowers v. Pollard, 602 F.Supp.2d 977 (E.D.Wis. 2009). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against correctional facility officials, challenging the conditions of his confinement. The court held that the correctional facility's enforcement of a behavior action plan that regularly denied the inmate a sleeping mattress, occasionally required him to wear only a segregation smock or paper gown, and subjected him to frequent restraint did not deny the inmate the minimal civilized measure of life's necessities and was targeted at his misconduct, and thus the plan did not violate the inmate's Eighth Amendment rights. The court noted that the inmate's cell was heated to 73 degrees, he was generally provided some form of dress, he was granted access to hygiene items, and he was only denied a mattress and other possessions after he used them to perpetrate self-abusive behavior, covered his cell with excrement and blood, and injured facility staff.

The court held that the state Department of Corrections' regulations governing procedures for placing an inmate on observational status to ensure his safety and the safety of others, and the procedures for utilizing restraints for inmate safety were sufficient to protect the inmate's liberty interest in avoiding an erroneous determination that his behavior required such measures. The procedures governing observational status required the inmate to be orally informed of the reasons for placement on the status and prohibited placement for more than 15 days without an evidentiary hearing. The procedures governing restraints prohibited restraining an inmate for more than a 12-hour period. (Green Bay Correctional Institution, Wisconsin)

A former state pretrial detainee filed a § 1983 action against nearly 50 defendants, seeking redress for alleged injuries caused by deputies and medical staff of a sheriff's department. The district court granted summary judgment to the defendants. The court held that a deputy's alleged placing of a “white tip poisonous spider” in a safety cell before moving the pretrial detainee back into the cell, grabbing the detainee and bending his arm while he threw him out of the cell, and putting his knee into the center of the detainee's back did not rise to the level of malicious and sadistic use of force, as required for a Fourteenth Amendment excessive force claim. Cabral v. County of Glenn, 624 F.Supp.2d 1184 (E.D.Cal. 2009). A pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against a city and a police officer alleging violations of the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments and claims under California law. The city and officer filed a motion to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the detainee, a psychotic and suicidal individual who collided with the wall of a safety cell and broke his neck, failed to plead that a police officer, who extracted the detainee from his holding cell and used a stun gun and pepper spray on him following an incident in which the detainee rubbed water from his toilet on his body, was deliberately indifferent to the detainee's need for medical attention, as required to state due process claim under § 1983. According to the court, the detainee failed to allege that the officer knew he was suicidal and was not receiving medical care, or that the officer attempted to interfere with the detainee's receipt of such medical attention. The court found that the detainee's allegations that the officer used a stun gun, a stun-type shield and pepper spray in an attempted cell extraction while the detainee was naked, unarmed and hiding behind his toilet were sufficient to state an excessive force claim under § 1983. The court denied qualified immunity for the officer, even though the detainee had not responded to the officers' commands to come out of his cell. The court noted that the law clearly established that police officers could not use a stun gun on a detainee who did not pose a threat and who merely failed to comply with commands. The court held that the detainee sufficiently pleaded that the city had a policy of using stun guns in such situations, as required to state a § 1983 Fourth Amendment excessive force claim against the city. The detainee alleged that nine months prior to his assault, a separate incident occurred that was similar. (City of Willows Police Department, California)

The father alleged that the prisoner died when he was placed in a choke hold and stopped breathing during a medical examination before his planned transfer to a hospital for involuntary commitment, asserting civil rights and supervisory liability claims under § 1983, as well as state law claims for negligence, gross negligence, and willful and wanton negligence. Cusamano v. Sobek, 604 F.Supp.2d 416 (N.D.N.Y. 2009). A former state prisoner brought a pro se action against department of corrections employees, alleging violation of his First, Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment rights as well as the New York Constitution. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants in part, and denied in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact regarding whether a corrections officer was present during, and participated in, the alleged assault of the prisoner. The court noted that an officer's failure to intervene during another officer's use of excessive force can itself constitute excessive force. The court also held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact regarding whether excessive force was used against the prisoner. The court found that there was no meeting of the minds between corrections officers to inflict an unconstitutional injury on the prisoner, as required for the prisoner's conspiracy claim against the officers. According to the court, there was no evidence of an agreement to inflict an injury on the prisoner, or of an overt act done in furtherance of that goal. The court found that there was no evidence that a misbehavior report that a corrections officer filed against the prisoner was a false report intended to cover up the use of excessive force, as required for the prisoner's false misbehavior report claim against the officer. The court also found no causal connection between the state prisoner's grievance and the issuance of the misbehavior report, as required for the state prisoner's retaliation claim against a corrections officer. The court found that the actions of the corrections officers toward the prisoner, including the utterance of profanities and the deprivation of amenities, did not cause the prisoner physical injury or psychological injury that was more than de minimis, as required for the prisoner's harassment claim against the corrections officers under the Eighth Amendment. Fennell v. Gilstrap, 559 F.3d 1212 (11th Cir. 2009). A pretrial detainee brought a Fourteenth Amendment excessive force claim against a sheriff's deputy under § 1983. The district court entered summary judgment for the deputy and the detainee appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that once the district court decided that the detainee had shown excessive force, it could not then find that the deputy was qualifiedly immune because his use of excessive force was not in violation of clearly established law. But the court found that the deputy's kick to the detainee's face, which resulted in fractures, did not constitute excessive force. The court noted that the deputy saw the detainee struggling with six other officers who were unable to restrain him, the detainee had not yet been secured when the deputy kicked him, the deputy intended to kick the detainee in the arm rather than the face, the detainee had grabbed the arm of another officer, and the officers made an immediate offer of medical care. Giles v. Kearney, 571 F.3d 318 (3rd Cir. 2009). A state inmate filed a § 1983 action against correctional officers and others, alleging excessive force and deliberate indifference to his medical needs. The district court entered summary judgment in favor of some officers, and entered judgment in favor of the remaining defendants. The inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part and remanded. The appeals court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the inmate had ceased resisting before correctional officers kicked or “kneed” him in the side. According to the court, an administrative assault determination and a state court no contest plea for the inmate's hitting of a correctional officer, before he was wrestled to the ground, did not provide a blank check justification for the correctional officers' excessive use of force thereafter. The court held that the district court's determination that correctional officers did not act with deliberate indifference to the inmate's serious needs when they denied his request for pain medication and administered pepper spray to subdue the inmate after he became agitated was not a clear error. The court noted that the inmate was in an infirmary, had suffered a broken rib and a punctured lung, and was at risk of death as the result of a delay in diagnosis and transfer to a hospital. The officer checked with the nurse on duty and found that no medication was prescribed, the inmate ignored repeated requests to calm down and continued shouting and hitting and shaking a door late at night, and the officers administered a single spray of pepper spray. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a fact question as to whether correctional officers used excessive force in subduing the resident when he stepped out of the line to receive his medication. The court also found a fact question as to whether correctional officers who observed the alleged beating of the resident by other officers violated the resident's constitutional rights by failing to intervene in the beating. Hamilton v. Lajoie, 660 F.Supp.2d 261 (D.Conn. 2009). An inmate filed a pro se § 1983 action against the State of Connecticut, a warden, and correctional officers, seeking compensatory and punitive damages for head trauma, abrasions to his ear and shoulder, and post-traumatic stress due to an officers' alleged use of unconstitutionally excessive force during a prison altercation. The inmate also alleged inadequate supervision, negligence, and willful misconduct. The court held that the inmate's factual allegations against correctional officers, in their individual capacities, were sufficient for a claim of excessive force in violation of the inmate's Eighth Amendment rights. The officers allegedly pinned the inmate to the ground near his cell, following an inspection for contraband, and purportedly sprayed the inmate in the face with a chemical agent despite his complaints that he had asthma. The court found that the inmate's allegations against the warden in his individual capacity were sufficient for a claim of supervisory liability, under § 1983, based on the warden's specific conduct before and after the altercation between the inmate and correctional officers. The inmate alleged that the warden was responsible for policies that led to his injuries and for procedures followed by medical staff following the incident, and the warden failed to properly train officers, to adequately supervise medical staff, to review video evidence of the incident, and to order outside medical treatment of the inmate's injuries even though a correctional officer received prompt medical care at an outside hospital for his head injury sustained in the altercation. A pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against a city and police officers, alleging that he was subjected to excessive force and inadequate medical care, and discriminated against on account of his race, while being booked at a jail. The district court denied the defendants' motion for summary judgment and the defendants appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that summary judgment was precluded by fact issues on the excessive force claim, the deliberate indifference claim, and the equal protection claim. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether police officers' use of force against the detainee, in yanking at the detainee's necklace and kicking his leg out from under him causing the detainee to fall and hit his head, in using a takedown maneuver to get the detainee down on the floor in a booking area, and in kicking the detainee in the ribs, was objectively reasonable or shocked the conscience. According to the court, summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the detainee had a serious need for medical care that was so obvious that even a layperson would easily recognize the need for a doctor's attention, following the police officers' exercise of force against him. The court also held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether police officers used excessive force and delayed medical treatment of the detainee on account of his African-American race. Harris v. Curtin, 656 F.Supp.2d 732 (W.D.Mich. 2009). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action alleging that a warden, nurse, and corrections officer violated his Eighth Amendment rights when he was sprayed with a chemical agent. The district court granted summary judgment to the defendants and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. On remand, the defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the corrections officer used excessive force without regard to the health risks posed to the prisoner, who had asthma and a history of a brain aneurysm. The officer sprayed a chemical agent into the prisoner's cell while attempting to place the prisoner in restraints for having broken his cell window. The court held that the prison nurse's authorization of the use of the chemical agent to restrain the prisoner did not constitute malicious or sadistic behavior prohibited by the Eighth Amendment; even thought the prisoner, who had asthma and a history of brain aneurysm, was classified in prison medical records as a high risk for unwanted side effects from chemical agents. According to the court, such a classification did not preclude the use of chemical agents on him. (Michigan Department of Corrections)

Hendrickson v. Cooper, 589 F.3d 887 (7th Cir. 2009). A prisoner brought a § 1983 action against a prison officer alleging excessive force. The district court entered judgment following a jury verdict in favor of the prisoner and denied the officer's motion for judgment as matter of law or a new trial. The officer appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the issue of whether the officer attacked the prisoner for the malicious purpose of causing harm was for the jury, as was the issue of whether the attack caused the prisoner to feel pain. According to the court, the jury's award of compensatory damages of $75,000 for the prisoner's pain and suffering was not excessive, noting that objective medical evidence was not required to support a compensatory damages award. The court also found that the jury's punitive damages award of $125,000 against the officer was not excessive, in light of the prisoner's description of how much pain the officer inflicted by throwing him to the ground and kneeing him in the back. The court noted that the officer acted with a malicious desire to cause the prisoner harm, the officer's use of force was completely unjustified, the officer goaded the prisoner into leveling an assault which the officer then used as an excuse to attack, the officer laid in wait for the prisoner to enter a housing unit, the prisoner was disabled, and when the prisoner appeared the officer grabbed, shoved, floored, and kneed him. The appeals court opinion began with the following statement: "Prison is rough. Violent prisoners can pose a serious threat, requiring prison officers to use force to maintain order. Sometimes, though, the only real threat comes from a rogue officer who attacks a prisoner for no good reason." (Wabash Valley Correctional Facility, Indiana)

STINGER GRENADE

Jackson v. Gerl, 622 F.Supp.2d 738 (W.D.Wis. 2009). A prisoner brought a § 1983 action against a warden and other prison officials, alleging that the use of a stinger grenade to extract him from his cell constituted excessive force in violation of the Eighth Amendment, and that an abusive strip search following the deployment of the grenade also violated the Eighth Amendment. The defendants moved for summary judgment and the district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that a prison lieutenant's extraction of the prisoner from inside his cell by means of a stinger grenade, which when detonated created a bright flash of light, emitted a loud blast accompanied by smoke, and fired rubber balls, was not "de minimis," as would bar a claim for excessive force under the Eighth Amendment. The court found that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the extraction of the prisoner from his cell by means of a stinger grenade was malicious and sadistic, or whether the use was in a good-faith effort to maintain or restore discipline. The court held that the prison security director's authorization of the prisoner's extraction by means of a stinger grenade was not malicious and sadistic, as required to establish excessive force under the Eighth Amendment. According to the court, the director was aware that the prisoner was refusing to cooperate, the prisoner had invited officials to "suit up" to "come in and play," and had covered his window and had put water on the floor. The director knew that tasers and incapacitating agents could not be used against the prisoner, and relied on the lieutenant's statements that she had been trained and was certified in the use of the grenade, having never used one himself.

The court held that members of the prison's emergency response unit did not act with deliberate or reckless disregard of the prisoner's rights against excessive force under the Eighth Amendment when they failed to speak out against higher ranking officers from extracting prisoner from cell by means of a stinger grenade.

According to the court, the prison's training captain and the commander of the emergency response unit did not provide inadequate training on the use of a stinger grenade, with a deliberate or reckless disregard to the prisoners' Eighth Amendment rights against excessive force, as required to subject the captain to § 1983 liability, even though the captain advised trainees that stinger grenades could be used in a cell and did not tell them of the danger of using the grenade in the presence of water. The captain lacked knowledge that using the grenade in a cell or in the presence of water would likely be an excessive use of force even where immediate weapons would otherwise be justified.

The court found that the officials' alleged failure to give the prisoner an opportunity to strip down on his own so that officials could perform a visual inspection of his person rather than be subject to a manual strip search was for a legitimate penological purpose, and thus did not violate the Eighth Amendment as a wanton infliction of psychological pain. The officials decided to manually strip search the prisoner after he had resisted following orders along every step of the way. The court noted that the performance of the strip search in front of a cell, rather than inside a cell, was not done to demean and humiliate the plaintiff, where the cell was not in an area widely visible to prisoners, but rather was at the end of a hall with no cell across from it. Krout v. Goemmer, 583 F.3d 557 (8th Cir. 2009). The administratrix of a pretrial detainee's estate brought a § 1983 action against police officers and correctional officers alleging excessive force and deprivation of medical care. The district court denied the defendants' motions for summary judgment and the defendants appealed. The appeals court dismissed in part, affirmed in part, and reversed in part. The appeals court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether fellow police officers used excessive force in making a traffic stop and arrest. According to the court, it was clearly established at the time of the arrest that a police officer had a duty to intervene to prevent the excessive use of force by other officers. Lewis v. City of West Palm Beach, Fla., 561 F.3d 1288 (11th Cir. 2009). The survivor of a detainee who had died in police custody brought a § 1983 action against a city and against individual officers, alleging use of excessive force. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants and the survivor appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the detainee's right not to be restrained via “hobbling” and being “hogtied” was not clearly established. The detainee became unconscious and died during detention. According to the court, the officers' conduct was not so egregious as to be plainly unlawful to any reasonable officer, given the detainee's agitated state when first detained and given his continued uncooperative and agitated state, presenting a safety risk to himself and others, during restraint. After handcuffing the detainee did not prevent his continued violent behavior, the officers attached an ankle restraint to the handcuffs with a hobble cord (also known as “TARP,” the total appendage restraint position). The hobble was tightened so that Lewis's hands and feet were close together behind his back in a “hogtied” position. The court held that the city was not potentially liable for failure to train officers in the use of restraints, where the need for training in the application of “hobble” restraints did not rise to the level of obviousness that would render the city potentially liable under § 1983 for deliberate indifference based on the failure to administer such training. The court noted that hobble restraints did not have the same potential flagrant risk of constitutional violations as the use of deadly firearms. (West Palm Beach Police Department, Florida)

Lewis v. Downey, 581 F.3d 467 (7th Cir. 2009). A federal prisoner in custody at a county jail filed a pro se § 1983 action, alleging jail guards' conduct in shooting him with a taser gun amounted to cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, vacated in part, and remanded. The court held that a jail guard who stood by while another guard shot a taser gun at the inmate in response to a superior officer's order, after the inmate refused an order to get out of bed, could not be liable in the inmate's § 1983 excessive force claim, where the bystander guard had no realistic opportunity to stop the other guard from discharging the taser gun. The court found that the jail guard's use of a taser gun against the prisoner after the prisoner refused an order to get out of bed amounted to more than a de minimis application of force, as required to prove the prisoner's pro se § 1983 excessive force claim. The court noted that it was undisputed that the taser sent an electric shock through the prisoner's body strong enough to cause him to fall from his bed and render him helpless while the guards secured him and removed him from his cell. The court found that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the guard acted in a good-faith effort to maintain or restore discipline, or maliciously and sadistically to cause harm. The court held that the guard was not entitled to qualified immunity from liability for his use of a taser gun against the prisoner, where, at the time of the conduct, the prisoner was allegedly prone on his bed, weakened, and docile. According to the court, the guard allegedly used the taser without warning the prisoner first, and the prisoner allegedly did not have enough time to respond to the guard's order to get out of bed, so that no reasonable guard would think he was justified in using the taser gun under the circumstances as alleged. (Jerome Combs Detention Center, Kankakee County, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court

Mann v. Taser Intern., Inc., 588 F.3d 1291 (11th Cir. 2009). The administrators of an estate, the husband, and guardians of the children of an arrestee who died following her arrest by sheriff's deputies and her admission to a county jail, brought an action under § 1983 and state law against the deputies and the manufacturer and distributor of the stun gun used by deputies during the arrest. The district court granted summary judgment to the defendants and the plaintiffs appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the use of the stun gun constituted reasonable force where the arrestee's behavior was violent, aggressive and prolonged, demonstrating that she was clearly a danger to herself and others, and the deputy warned the arrestee to stop her behavior and discharged his stun gun only after she refused to comply with the his orders. According to the court, the plaintiffs failed to establish that the arrestee's death was caused by the use of a stun gun. The court noted that the plaintiffs' own medical expert testified that, while it would have been naive of him to say that the use of the stun gun did not contribute in some degree to the arrestee's death, he was unable to declare to a reasonable degree of medical certainty that the arrestee would have survived but for its use. The court held that the sheriff's deputies were not deliberately indifferent to the arrestee's serious medical condition of "excited delirium" when they opted to take her to jail instead of to a hospital. Although one deputy had knowledge of the arrestee's past methamphetamine use, and the arrestee's mother and another person told a different deputy that the arrestee was sick and needed to go to the hospital, the deputies had no prior knowledge of the medical condition called "excited delirium" or its accompanying risk of death. The court noted that the arrestee's physical resistance and verbal communication suggested to the deputies that, although agitated, the arrestee was not in immediate medical danger, which was an opinion shared by emergency medical personnel called to the scene by the deputies. Moore v. Thomas, 653 F.Supp.2d 984 (N.D.Cal. 2009). A state prisoner filed a civil rights action in California state court against prison defendants, alleging various claims stemming from his incarceration. After removal to federal court, the defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the alleged force was applied by a correctional officer maliciously and sadistically to cause harm to the prisoner, or whether the officer was using the force necessary to subdue the prisoner, who was engaged in a mutual combat with a fellow inmate and refused to follow orders that he stop fighting. The court also found a fact issue as to whether the force used was excessive. (Pelican Bay State Prison, California Medical Facility)

Nelson v. Correctional Medical Services, 583 F.3d 522 (8th Cir. 2009). A state inmate brought a § 1983 action against the director of the Arkansas Department of Correction (ADC), and a corrections officer, alleging that while giving birth to her child she was forced to go through the final stages of labor with both legs shackled to her hospital bed in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The district court denied the defendants' motion for summary judgment. On rehearing en banc, the Court of Appeals affirmed in part, reversed in part and remanded. The appeals court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the corrections officer's conduct in forcing the inmate to go through the final stages of labor with both legs shackled to her hospital bed constituted "deliberate indifference" in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The appeals court held that the inmate, in the final stages of labor, had a "clearly established" right not to be shackled absent clear and convincing evidence that she was a security or flight risk, and thus a government official would not be protected from § 1983 liability for violating that right based on qualified immunity. Padilla v. Yoo, 633 F.Supp.2d 1005 (N.D.Cal.2009). reversed 678 F3d 748. A detainee, a United States citizen who was designated an "enemy combatant" and detained in a military brig in South Carolina, brought an action against a senior government official, alleging denial of access to counsel, denial of access to court, unconstitutional conditions of confinement, unconstitutional interrogations, denial of freedom of religion, denial of right of information, denial of right to association, unconstitutional military detention, denial of right to be free from unreasonable seizures, and denial of due process. The defendant moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the detainee, who was a United States citizen, had no other means of redress for alleged injuries he sustained as a result of his detention, as required for Bivens claim against the senior government official, alleging the official's actions violated constitutional rights. The court noted that the Military Commissions Act was only applicable to alien, or non-citizen, unlawful enemy combatants, and the Detainee Treatment Act did not "affect the rights under the United States Constitution of any person in the custody of the United States." The court found that national security was not a special factor counseling hesitation and precluding judicial review in the Bivens action brought by the detainee. Documents drafted by the official were public record, and litigation may be necessary to ensure compliance with the law. According to the court, the detainee's allegations that a senior government official bore responsibility for his conditions of confinement due to his drafting opinions that purported to create legal legitimacy for such treatment, were sufficient to state a claim under the Eighth Amendment, and thus stated a due process claim under the Fourteenth Amendment. The detainee alleged that while detained, he suffered prolonged shackling in painful positions and relentless periods of illumination and intentional interference with sleep by means of loud noises at all hours, that he was subjected to extreme psychological stress and impermissibly denied medical care, that these restrictions and conditions were not justified by a legitimate penological interest, but rather were intended to intensify the coerciveness of interrogations. The court held that federal officials were cognizant of basic fundamental civil rights afforded to detainees under the United States Constitution, and thus a senior government official was not entitled to qualified immunity from claims brought by the detainee. The court also held that the official was not qualifiedly immune from claims brought by the detainee under the Religious Freedom Restoration Act (RFRA). On appeal, 678 F3d 748, the appeals court reversed the district court decision, finding that the official was entitled to qualified immunity because there had not been a violation of well established law. Parlin v. Cumberland County, 659 F.Supp.2d 201 (D.Me. 2009). A female former county jail inmate brought an action against jail officers, a county, and a sheriff, under § 1983 and Maine law, alleging deliberate indifference to her serious medical needs, negligence, and excessive force. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants in part and denied in part. The court held that: (1) the officers were not deliberately indifferent to a serious medical need; (2) an officer who fell on the inmate did not use excessive force; (3) the county was not liable for deprivation of medical care; and (4) the county was not liable for failure to train. The court held that the officers were not entitled to absolute immunity from excessive force claims where a genuine issue of material fact existed as to whether the officers used excessive force in transferring the jail inmate between cells. According to the court, there was no evidence that jail officers were subjectively aware of the jail inmate's serious medical condition, where the inmate made no mention of her shoulder injury to the officers other than crying out "my shoulder" after she had fallen. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether a corrections officers' knee strikes against the pretrial detainee were administered in response to a threat, due to the detainee's alleged refusal to surrender a pen that he possessed, and thus whether the strikes were reasonable uses of force. Smith v. Ozmint, 578 F.3d 246 (4th Cir. 2009). A South Carolina prisoner brought an action alleging that a prison grooming policy violated the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA). The South Carolina Department of Corrections moved for summary judgment and the district court granted the motion. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, vacated in part, and remanded. The court held that the prison's policy requiring maximum security inmates to wear closely cropped hair, and which allowed for implementation of that policy through physical force, imposed a substantial burden on the inmate's religious practice within the meaning of the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA), where the policy compelled an inmate to modify his behavior in violation of his genuinely held religious beliefs. According to the court, an affidavit offered by the Department of Corrections in support of summary judgment did not demonstrate that the prison policy of forcibly shaving the heads of maximum security unit prisoners who wore long hair as a matter of religious belief furthered a compelling governmental interest in space utilization, hygiene, or security by the least restrictive means under RLUIPA. The court noted that the affidavit dealt solely with the grooming policy applied to special management unit prisoners, and the Department failed to explain how the rationale offered for not accommodating special management unit prisoners applied to maximum security unit prisoners. Spears v. Ruth, 589 F.3d 249 (6th Cir. 2009). The estate of a deceased detainee brought a § 1983 action against a police officer and a city, alleging deliberate indifference to the detainee's serious illness or injury while in the officer's care. The district court denied summary judgment and the officer and city brought an appeal. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The court held that the pretrial detainee's condition and need for medical attention was not so obvious to the police officer as to establish the existence of a serious medical need, for the purposes of a claim of deliberate indifference in violation of due process. The officer allegedly failed to inform emergency medical technicians (EMT) on the scene and at the jail that the detainee, who later died from respiratory and cardiac failure resulting from cocaine use, had admitted that he smoked crack cocaine. According to the court, the EMTs and jail nurse, who presumably had a greater facility than the average layperson to recognize an individual's medical need, observed the detainee's behavior and administered tests based on those observations, and both the EMTs and the jail officers concluded that the detainee did not need to be transported to the hospital. After admission to the jail, the detainee continued to hallucinate and officers placed him in a restraint chair "for his own safety," tasing him to "relax his muscles." The detainee remained restrained for approximately three and a half hours, during which time he was calm but continued to hallucinate. Shortly after the officers released him from the chair, the detainee began to shake and spit up blood and then became unconscious. He was taken to a hospital where he was diagnosed with respiratory and cardiac failure and multi-organ failure resulting from cocaine use. He lapsed into a coma and died eleven months later. Teague v. Mayo, 553 F.3d 1068 (7th Cir. 2009). A prisoner brought a § 1983 action against corrections officers. The district court granted summary judgment for the officers on the claim of deliberate indifference to the prisoner's serious medical needs, and, following a jury trial, entered judgment for the officers on an excessive force claim. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that while the prisoner was in segregation, two corrections officers could not have been deliberately indifferent to his serious medical needs relating to his degenerative joint disease and other back problems, in violation of Eighth Amendment, where the officers were not assigned to the segregation unit at the time. Vallario v. Vandehey, 554 F.3d 1259 (10th Cir. 2009). County jail inmates sued a county sheriff and a county's administrator of jail operations in their official capacities, alleging disregard of risks to inmates from restraint chairs and other devices, and the denial of access to psychiatric care for indigent inmates. The district court granted the inmates' motion for class certification and the defendants petitioned for interlocutory appeal. The appeals court granted the petition and remanded the case. The court held that the district court abused its discretion by misconstruing the complaint as alleging that denial of adequate mental health treatment affected all inmates, and abused its discretion by refraining from any consideration whatsoever of the action's merits. Wasserman v. Rodacker, 557 F.3d 635 (D.C. Cir. 2009). An arrestee brought an action against the government and a police officer, alleging tort and constitutional claims based on his arrest for violating a leash law and assaulting a police officer. The government substituted itself as a defendant and moved to dismiss. The district court dismissed the tort claims and granted summary judgment on the constitutional claims. The arrestee appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the government properly substituted itself as a party defendant and that the force used in the arrest was reasonable. The court found that the arrestee's detention was not unreasonable, in violation of Fourth Amendment, despite having been premised on an assault charge that was later dropped by the government, where the length of detention was less than 48 hours, and the arrestee failed to allege that the delay of a probable cause hearing was a result of ill will or some other malicious purpose. Wright v. Goord, 554 F.3d 255 (2nd Cir. 2009). A prisoner brought two § 1983 actions against prison officers, alleging excessive force and retaliation in violation of the First and Eighth Amendments. The district court summarily dismissed both actions. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the prisoner did not sufficiently allege excessive force by the prison officers in violation of the Eighth Amendment where the prisoner failed to concretely allege a physical assault by an officer. According to the court, the assault alleged in his complaint involved the prisoner's cellmate, and the prisoner proffered no evidence to support the suggestion that the officers returned a cane to a cellmate after learning that the cellmate had allegedly hit the prisoner with a cane. The court found that a prison officer's action in grabbing the prisoner did not constitute "excessive force" in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The court noted that apart from several minutes where the prisoner alleged he experienced a shortness of breath, the inmate did not allege any physical injuries resulting from the encounter. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to: (1) whether corrections officers and prison officials knew or should have known that an officer would apply excessive force to the inmate by shocking him when he was restrained and whether they could have prevented the officer's excessive use of force; (2) whether the inmates exhausted administrative remedies by filing grievances regarding use of a restraint chair, lack of mattresses, inability to shower, cell conditions, and issues with mail; (3) whether the use of mechanical restraints against the inmates constituted wanton infliction of pain in violation of the Eighth Amendment; (4) whether an inmate complied with officials when extracted from a cell, rendering the use of oleoresin capsicum spray excessive and unjustified; (5) whether cell conditions posed a substantial risk of harm to inmates and whether corrections officers and prison officials were deliberately indifferent to that risk; and (6) whether the warden of the county jail was aware of and condoned the use of excessive force against inmates at jail. Aldini v. Johnson, 609 F.3d 858 (6th Cir. 2010). A detainee brought a § 1983 excessive force case against four corrections officers, arising out of a beating which occurred while the detainee was being held in a booking room pending completion of the booking process, but after he had been surrendered to jailers by his arresting officer. The district court granted summary judgment to two of the officers based on qualified immunity. The detainee, and the officers whose motions for summary judgment were denied, appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, and vacated and remanded in part. The court held that the district court's error, in not applying the Fourth Amendment reasonableness test to the officer whose actions the court found violated the higher Fourteenth Amendment due process "shocks-the-conscience" standard, was harmless. Brawley v. Washington, 712 F.Supp.2d 1208 (W.D.Wash. 2010). A female former inmate brought a § 1983 action against the Washington State Department of Corrections and various officials, seeking relief from violations of her constitutional rights that she alleged occurred during the birth of her first child. The Department filed a motion for summary judgment, which the district court granted in part and denied in part. The court held that the female inmate, who was shackled to a hospital bed while giving birth, showed, from an objective standpoint, that she had a serious medical need and was exposed to an unnecessary risk of harm for the purposes of her § 1983 Eighth Amendment claim. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by material issues of fact as to whether officers were deliberately indifferent to the risks of harm to the inmate and her serious medical needs when they shackled her to a hospital bed. According to the court, the inmate showed that shackling inmates while they were in labor was clearly established as a violation of the Eighth Amendment's prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment, thereby barring the Department of Corrections' qualified immunity defense. The court held that the pretrial detainee's allegations that a correctional officer slammed him into a wall, that another officer was "on his neck" while he was handcuffed, and that these actions resulted in injuries to his knee and shoulder were sufficient to state a § 1983 claim for excessive force in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. Caldwell v. Luzerne County Corrections Facility Management Employees, 732 F.Supp.2d 458 (M.D.Pa. 2010). A county prison inmate brought civil rights claims against prison officials. The officials moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the inmate stated claims of excessive force against prison officials with respect to various incidents in which he was allegedly tased, causing him to hit his forehead on a cell wall, forced to remain on a hard mattress at an uncomfortable angle, causing severe neck pain, strip searched, placed in 5-point restraints, causing swollen and bleeding wrists, pulled forcefully while handcuffed, causing his hands to swell and bleed, punched and slapped in the back while handcuffed, maced, and slammed onto the floor, kicked and punched. The court held that the inmate's allegations that in four incidents occurring over a span of four months he was placed on a mattress at an awkward angle for over 12 hours and subjected to severe pain, not permitted to use the bathroom, eat, drink, or shower while placed in 5-point restraints for many hours, and was refused a blanket while restrained in a cell with broken windows and an air vent blowing directly on him, were sufficient to state a conditions of confinement claim under the Eighth Amendment. The court held that the inmate's allegations that he was subjected by prison officials to excessive force and unconstitutional conditions of confinement, and that the officials' conduct reflected retaliation for his filing of lawsuits against them, stated a claim for retaliation under § 1983. Castro v. Melchor, 760 F.Supp.2d 970(D.Hawai'i 2010). A female pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against correctional facility officials and medical staff, alleging the defendants were deliberately indifferent to his serious medical needs resulting in the delivery of a stillborn child. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the correctional facility's medical staff subjectively knew the pretrial detainee's complaints of vaginal bleeding presented a serious medical need. The court held that the staff's failure to ensure the detainee received an ultrasound and consultation was no more than gross negligence, and the medical staff did not deny, delay, or intentionally interfere with the pretrial detainee's medical treatment. According to the court, summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the correctional facility officials' actions and inactions in training the facility's medical staff resulted in the alleged deprivation of the pretrial detainee's right to medical treatment and whether the officials consciously disregarded serious health risks by failing to apply the women's lock-down policies. Following a verbal exchange with a guard, two officers physically forced the detainee to the ground from a standing position. While she was lying on the ground on her stomach, the officers restrained her by holding their body weights against her back and legs and placing her in handcuffs. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court denied the motion. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether correctional officers' repeated verbal threats, including death threats, combined with physical assaults, against the Black Muslim prisoner caused the prisoner extreme psychological harm, and as to whether the officers maliciously and sadistically used force against the prisoner because he was black or because he practiced the Muslim faith. The court also found that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the prison warden had the ability to remove the Black Muslim prisoner from the supervision of the correctional officer who was allegedly verbally and physically abusing him, but refused to do so, and denied the prisoner's request for protective custody. A civil detainee brought a pro se civil rights action against correctional facility officers and physicians, asserting claims for excessive force. The officers and physicians moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The court held that officers did not use excessive force against the civil detainee in violation of his due process rights by spraying him with pepper spray, handcuffing him, and escorting him from a detention unit in restraints, where the detainee did not sustain any serious injury, and the decision to use pepper spray was only made after officers attempted for more than one hour to verbally convince the detainee to cooperate and leave the unit where his interaction with officers was causing a disturbance. The court noted that there was no indication that the force was imposed as punishment rather than in a good faith effort to further the need to maintain order and security on a unit where numerous sexually violent predators (SVPs) were held. The district court dismissed the complaint for failure to pre-pay the filing fee, and a motions panel authorized the prisoner's appeal. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that that while the prisoner's allegation of excessive force satisfied the three strikes provision's imminent danger requirement, the prisoner failed to exhaust administrative remedies under the PLRA. A pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against a police officer alleging the officer used excessive force against him when he used a stun gun in a holding cell. The district court entered summary judgment for the officer. The detainee appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the officer did not violate the pretrial detainee's right to be free of illegal search and seizure when he used a stun gun on the detainee while attempting to conduct a strip search in a holding cell following the detainee's arrest. The court held that the officer's decision to use the stun gun on the detainee did not violate the detainee's due process guarantees, where the officer was aware that the detainee had attacked another officer earlier in the night, and the detainee appeared to be intoxicated. The court noted that the detainee was a relatively large man confined in an enclosed space of relatively small area, and he was facing the officer, pacing in the cell, clenching his fists, and yelling obscenities in response to orders to comply with the strip search policy. Griffin v. Hardrick, 604 F.3d 949 (6th Cir. 2010).A pretrial detainee brought an action against a county jail officer, alleging use of excessive force under § 1983 and state-law battery. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the officer. The detainee appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that a videotape of the incident between the detainee and a county jail officer was properly considered by the district court, in determining the officer's motion for summary judgment, where the detainee's version of events was blatantly contradicted by the videotape. The court found that the county jail officer's use of a leg-sweep maneuver to bring the pretrial detainee to the floor, which resulted in the detainee's leg being fractured, did not constitute wanton infliction of pain, and thus, the detainee could not prevail in her § 1983 Fourteenth Amendment excessive force claim against the officer. The court noted that it was undisputed that the detainee was acting in a manner, that she attempted to jerk away from the officer, and struggled with the officer when he attempted to lead her away. It was undisputed that the leg-sweep maneuver was in compliance with the jail's policies on the use of force. The leg fracture resulted from the accident of another officer collapsing on the detainee as they both fell to floor. (Davidson County Criminal Justice Center, Tennessee)

EXCESSIVE FORCE

Hanson v. U.S., 712 F.Supp.2d 321 (D.N.J. 2010). An inmate brought a Federal Tort Claims Act (FTCA) action, alleging that a Bureau of Prisons (BOP) officer slammed his head on the floor and choked him in an attempt to force the inmate to spit out contraband that the inmate was attempting to swallow. The government filed a motion for summary judgment and the district court denied the motion. The court held, for the purposes of the inmate's FTCA claim, under New Jersey law the BOP officers employed unreasonable force while attempting to search the inmate for contraband. According to the court, summary judgment was precluded by material issues of fact regarding whether the BOP officers used reasonable force in holding and searching the inmate. (Fed. Harvey v. Jordan, 605 F.3d 681 (9th Cir. 2010). An inmate brought a suit alleging that prison officials' use of pepper spray to extract him from his cell during a building-wide search of all prisoners' cells constituted excessive force and that his right to due process was denied in connection with a disciplinary charge stemming from his refusal to comply with the search. The district court granted the defendants' motion to dismiss for failure to exhaust administrative remedies under the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA). The inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The court held that the inmate exhausted administrative process, as required by PLRA, for the claim that he was denied due process in connection with a disciplinary charge when prison officials purported to grant relief that resolved his grievance to his satisfaction, a hearing and access to a videotape. The court noted that the inmate was not required to appeal that decision. (Salinas Valley State Prison, California)

Johnson v. Deloach, 692 F.Supp.2d 1316 (M.D.Ala. 2010). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against prison supervisory officials and correctional officers, challenging the constitutionality of actions taken against him during his incarceration. The prisoner alleged that an officer, without justification, repeatedly slapped him about his face and head causing the back of his head to strike the wall, and the prisoner "became dazed and disoriented...." The officer allegedly stopped slapping the prisoner and then grabbed the prisoner around his throat and began choking him while shoving his back and head against the wall. The officer then allegedly stopped choking the prisoner, lifted the prisoner off the floor and slammed him to the floor causing his back, head and left leg to hit a pole protruding from the wall. According to the prisoner, two other officers watched these actions and failed to intervene. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants in part and denied in part. The court held that state prison officials were absolutely immune from the prisoner's § 1983 claims brought against them in their official capacities, since Alabama had not waived its Eleventh Amendment immunity, and Congress had not abrogated Alabama's immunity. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact regarding the need for the use of force against the state prisoner by a correctional officer and the amount of force used by the officer, as to whether the officer acted "maliciously and sadistically" to cause harm, and as to whether two other officers witnessed the use of excessive force and failed to intervene. The court noted that a correctional officer who is present at a scene and who fails to take reasonable steps to protect the victim of another officer's use of excessive force can be held personally liable under § 1983 for his nonfeasance.(Draper Correctional Facility, Alabama)

STUN GUN

Johnson v. Roberts, 721 F.Supp.2d 1017 (D.Kan. 2010). A former county jail inmate brought an action against a deputy, sheriff, and county board of commissioners, alleging use of excessive force when the deputy used a stun gun on the inmate. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court held that the use of a stun gun to subdue the county jail inmate was reasonable and did not violate the inmate's Eighth Amendment rights. The court noted that the inmate had placed a towel in front of a security camera in violation of a jail rule, and when deputies responded to the inmate's cell to confiscate the towel and the inmate's property box, the inmate refused to hand over the box and either dropped or threw the box to the floor and refused an order to pick it up, placing the deputy in the position of bending down to retrieve the box from directly in front of the noncompliant inmate. The court found that the use of a stun gun was not a clearly established violation of the Eighth Amendment at the time of the incident and thus the deputy, sheriff, and county board of commissioners were entitled to qualified immunity. The court noted that the deputy used the stun gun to ensure the inmate's compliance with orders and not to punish the inmate. (Miami County Jail, Kansas)

Johnston v. Maha, 606 F.3d 39 (2nd Cir. 2010). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against employees of a county jail, alleging violations of his constitutional rights and of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) in connection with detention and medical care while in jail. The district court granted the defendants summary judgment. The inmate petitioned for the appointment of counsel in his appeal. The appeals court granted the petition. The court held that the appointment of counsel was appropriate in connection with the inmate's appeal from dismissal of his claim that his placement in solitary confinement, and subsequent excessive force he suffered, violated his constitutional rights, since there was likely merit in the inmate's claims. The court found that it appeared from the inmate's complaint that he might have been a pretrial detainee at the time he was placed in solitary confinement, and thus the claim that the inmate was subjected to excessive force as a detainee would arise under the Fifth, not the Eighth Amendment, because as a detainee he could not be punished at all. The court noted that there was no evidence that the inmate violated any rule or was provided with a pre-deprivation hearing. According to the court, the legal issues were fairly complex, especially with respect to whether the inmate's pretrial detention was substantial enough to give rise to a constitutional violation of a procedural due process right. Kendrick v. Faust, 682 F.Supp.2d 932 (E.D. Ark. 2010). A female state prison inmate brought a § 1983 action against employees of the Arkansas Department of Correction (ADC), alleging various violations of her constitutional rights. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the inmate failed to allege that she sustained an actual injury or that an Arkansas Department of Correction (ADC) official denied her the opportunity to review her mail prior to its being confiscated, as required to support a claim that the official violated the inmate's constitutional right of access to the courts and her First Amendment right to send and receive mail. The court found that an ADC employee's use of force against the inmate was justified by the inmate's disruptive behavior during the search of her cell and thus did not give rise to the ADC employee's liability on an excessive force claim. The inmate alleged that the ADC employee grabbed her by the arm, dragged her from her cell, and threw her into the shower. The court note that there was no medical evidence that the ADC employee's use of handcuffs caused any permanent injury to the inmate as required to support a claim that the employee used excessive force against the inmate. The court found that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether there was a legitimate penological interest for the alleged destruction of the prison inmate's bible, precluding summary judgment as to whether ADC employees violated the inmate's right to freedom of religion by destroying her bible. (Arkansas Department of Corrections)

Lewis v. Mollette, 752 F.Supp.2d 233 (N.D.N.Y. 2010). A former juvenile inmate at the Office of Child and Family Services (OCFS) brought a § 1983 action against OCFS employees, alleging use of excessive force and failure to intervene. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court denied the motion. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to: (1) the events leading up to the use of a physical restraint technique (PRT) on the juvenile inmate by OCFS employees; (2) the need for a second employee to assist the first employee with the PRT; and (3) the cause of the arm fracture the inmate sustained during the incident. Molina v. New York, 697 F.Supp.2d 276 (N.D.N.Y. 2010). A juvenile detainee brought an action against a state, its Office of Children and Family Services (OCFS) that operated a youth correctional facility, state and facility officials, and detention aides, asserting § 1983 claims and claims of negligence and assault and battery. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the juvenile detainee's allegations that detention aides at the youth correctional facility broke his arm while restraining him were sufficient to support a plausible Eighth Amendment claim that the aides used excessive force. The court held that the detainee's allegations that he had to wait approximately 15 hours before being diagnosed and scheduled for surgery despite the obviousness of his injuries and his own pleading for assistance, were sufficient to state an Eighth Amendment claim of deliberate indifference to his serious medical needs. Porro v. Barnes, 624 F.3d 1322 (10th Cir. 2010). An immigration detainee brought a § 1983 excessive force claim against a jail employee, sheriff, and the sheriff's successor, related to an incident in which a stun gun was used on the detainee. The district court granted the sheriff's motion for summary judgment and the successor's motion for summary judgment. The detainee appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the sheriff who was not present during the incident in which a stun gun was used on the detainee while he was restrained was not liable under § 1983, where the sheriff did not employ any force on the detainee, was not present when the force was applied, and did not give any advance approval to the use of the stun gun on the detainee. The court found that the county jail's policy of training jailers to use stun guns only if and when an inmate should become violent, combative, and pose a direct threat to the security of staff did not exhibit deliberate indifference to the immigration detainee's due process rights against the use of excessive force, as required for § 1983 liability. Santiago v. Walls, 599 F.3d 749 (7th Cir. 2010). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against certain officers and employees of the Illinois Department of Corrections (IDOC), alleging that they violated his constitutional rights by failing to protect him from other inmates, failing to provide him with medical care, and retaliating against him for speaking out against the IDOC. Following a jury trial, the district court entered judgment in favor of the defendants. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed and remanded in part. The court held that the prisoner failed to state a claim against two correctional officers for failure to protect him from attack by an inmate. The court also found no claim was stated by the prisoner's allegations that one prison official sprayed him with pepper spray and that, while escorting him to the infirmary, another official “brutally yank[ed] and rip[ped]” backwards on his handcuffs. But the court held that a claim was stated against the prison warden for failure to protect him from an assault by his cellmate. The prisoner alleged that the warden knew or should have known that his cellmate had a history of assaulting his cellmates and that the warden disregarded this risk. Four days prior to his assault, the plaintiff had filed an emergency grievance with the warden, requesting that his cellmate be placed on his enemy list and that a “cell change be conducted to prevent a physical confrontation.” According to the appeals court, the district court abused its discretion in denying the pro se state prisoner's request for counsel under the federal in forma pauperis statute during the discovery phase of his § 1983 action. The appeals court found that the district court failed to consider the relatively difficult allegations the prisoner had to prove, the difficulty posed by the prisoner's confinement in another facility during trial preparation, the prisoner's inability to identify parties and witnesses, and a decidedly uncooperative prison administration who had the assurances of the magistrate judge that it would not have to worry about a lawyer being around during the discovery period. The appeals court ruled that the prisoner was prejudiced by district court's denial of his request for counsel, requiring reversal. (Menard Correctional Center, Illinois)

Tafari v. McCarthy, 714 F.Supp.2d 317 (N.D.N.Y. 2010). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against employees of the New York State Department of Correctional Services (DOCS), alleging, among other things, that the employees violated his constitutional rights by subjecting him to excessive force, destroying his personal property, denying him medical care, and subjecting him to inhumane conditions of confinement. The employees moved for summary judgment, and the prisoner moved to file a second amended complaint and to appoint counsel. The court held that a state prison correctional officer's alleged throwing of urine and feces on the prisoner to wake him up, while certainly repulsive, was de minimis use of force, and was not sufficiently severe to be considered repugnant to the conscience of mankind, and thus the officer's conduct did not violate the Eighth Amendment. The court found that officers who were present in the prisoner's cell when another officer allegedly threw urine and feces on the prisoner lacked a reasonable opportunity to stop the alleged violation, given the brief and unexpected nature of the incident, and thus the officers present in the cell could not be held liable for failing to intervene. The court found that even if a correctional officers' captain failed to thoroughly investigate the alleged incident in which one officer threw urine and feces on the prisoner to wake him up, such failure to investigate did not violate the prisoner's due process rights, since the prisoner did not have due process right to a thorough investigation of his grievances.

According to the court, one incident in which state correctional officers allegedly interfered with the prisoner's outgoing legal mail did not create a cognizable claim under § 1983 for violation of the prisoner's First and Fourteenth Amendment rights, absent a showing that the prisoner suffered any actual injury, that his access to courts was chilled, or that his ability to legally represent himself was impaired. The court held that there was no evidence that the state prisoner suffered any physical injury as result of an alleged incident in which a correctional officer spit chewing tobacco in his face, as required to maintain an Eighth Amendment claim based on denial of medical care. The court found that, even if a state prisoner's right to file prison grievances was protected by the First Amendment, a restriction limiting the prisoner's filing of grievances to two per week did not violate the prisoner's constitutional rights, since the prisoner was abusing the grievance program. The court noted that the prisoner filed an exorbitant amount of grievances, including 115 in a two-month period, most of which were deemed frivolous.

The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether state correctional officers used excessive force against the prisoner in the course of his transport to a different facility. The court held that state correctional officers were not entitled to qualified immunity from the prisoner's § 1983 excessive force claim arising from his alleged beating by officers during his transfer to a different facility, where a reasonable juror could have concluded that the officers knew or should have known that their conduct violated the prisoner's Eighth Amendment rights, and it was clearly established that prison official's use of force against an inmate for reasons that did not serve penological purpose violated the inmate's constitutional rights. The inmate allegedly suffered injuries, including bruises and superficial lacerations on his body, which the court found did not constitute a serious medical condition. The court held that state prison officials' alleged retaliatory act of leaving the lights on in the prisoner's cell in a special housing unit (SHU) 24 hours per day did not amount to cruel and unusual treatment, in violation of the Eighth Amendment. According to the court, the prisoner failed to demonstrate a causal connection between his conduct and the adverse action of leaving the lights on 24 hours per day, since the illumination policy applied to all inmates in SHU, not just the prisoner, and constant illumination was related to a legitimate penological interest in protecting both guards and inmates in SHU. Thomas v. Bryant, 614 F.3d 1288 (11th Cir. 2010). Inmates incarcerated at the Florida State Prison (FSP) brought a § 1983 action against various officers and employees of the Florida Department of Corrections (DOC), alleging that the use of chemical agents on inmates with mental illness and other vulnerabilities violated the Eighth Amendment's prohibition on cruel and unusual punishment. The claims against individual correctional officers responsible for administering the agents were settled. After a five-day bench trial on the remaining claims against the DOC Secretary and the FSP warden for declaratory judgment and injunctive relief, the district court entered findings of fact and conclusions of law. The court ended final judgment and a final permanent injunction in the inmates' favor. The Secretary and warden appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that, notwithstanding his untimely death, the inmate who obtained declaratory and injunctive relief could still be the "prevailing party" entitled to attorney fees for the cost of district court litigation under the Civil Rights Attorney's Fees Awards Act (42 U.S.C.A. §§ 1983, 1988.)

The court found that in reaching its conclusion the district court did not clearly err in finding that an inmate was sprayed with chemical agents at times when he had no capacity to comply with officers' orders because of his mental illness, or in finding that those sprayings caused the inmate lasting psychological injuries. According to the court, the repeated non-spontaneous use of chemical agents on an inmate with a serious mental illness constituted an extreme deprivation sufficient to satisfy the objective prong of the test for an Eighth Amendment violation. The court noted that the inmate's well-documented history of mental illness and psychotic episodes rendered him unable to comply at the times he was sprayed, such that the policy was unnecessary and without penological justification in his specific case.

The court found that the DOC's policy and practice of spraying inmates with chemical agents, as applied to an inmate who was fully secured in his seven-by-nine-foot steel cell, was not presenting a threat of immediate harm to himself or others, and was unable to understand and comply with officers' orders due to his mental illness, were extreme deprivations violating the broad and idealistic concepts of dignity, civilized standards, humanity and decency embodied in the Eighth Amendment. The court held that the district court did not clearly err in finding that the record demonstrated that DOC officials acted with deliberate indifference to the severe risk of harm an inmate faced when officers repeatedly sprayed him with chemical agents for behaviors caused by his mental illness.

The appeals court held that the district court did not abuse its discretion in concluding that injunctive relief was warranted and necessary, despite contentions that an inmate was currently incarcerated at a facility where he was not subject to DOC's chemical agents policy. The court noted that the permanent injunction against violations of the mentally ill inmate's Eighth Amendment rights from sprayings with chemical agents did not extend further than necessary to correct a constitutional violation and was not overly intrusive. According to the court, in addition to being closely tethered to the identified harm, the district court's permanent injunctive relief was narrowly drawn and plainly adhered to the requirements of Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA). A correctional officer moved for summary judgment and for dismissal. The district court granted the motions in part and denied in part. Alspaugh v. McConnell, 643 F.3d 162 (6th Cir. 2011). A state prisoner filed a civil rights action alleging excessive force and deliberate indifference against numerous state and private defendants. The district court granted summary judgment against the prisoner. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part and reversed in part. The appeals court held that the prisoner's request for a videotape of a fight was of the nature that it would have changed legal and factual deficiencies of his civil rights action alleging excessive force, and thus the prisoner was entitled to production of it, since the videotape would have shown how much force had been used in subduing the prisoner. But the court held that the prisoner who was alleging excessive force and deliberate indifference was not entitled to the production of his medical records before considering the state's motion for summary judgment, where the state and private defendants produced enough evidence to demonstrate that medical personnel were not deliberately indifferent to his medical needs. A state prisoner brought an action against a county sheriff's department, a sheriff, corrections officers, and others, alleging unconstitutional deprivations of his rights while in custody in a county jail. The defendants moved to dismiss and for an award of attorney fees. The district court granted the motions. The district court held that: (1) neither the Fourteenth Amendment nor the Fourth Amendment's excessive force prohibition applied to the sentenced offender; (2) the sheriff and supervisory officials were entitled to qualified immunity; (3) allegations did not state an Eighth Amendment claim based on jail overcrowding; (4) the officers' alleged conduct in tasering the prisoner did not violate the Eighth Amendment; (5) allegations did not state a § 1983 claim for an unconstitutional strip search; (6) placement of the prisoner alone in closet-sized cell for eight hours after the alleged incident did not amount to unconstitutional confinement; and (7) the officers' alleged conduct in searching the prisoner's cell did not amount to retaliation for prisoner's prior lawsuit. The court noted that the prisoner admitted that he repeatedly refused the officers' verbal commands and fled his cell, he was repeatedly warned that he would be shocked if he did not comply with the officers' commands, and he was shocked by a taser only once before he fled his cell and then two to three times after he did so. Barrington v. New York, 806 F.Supp.2d 730 (S.D.N.Y. 2011.) A prisoner brought a § 1983 action against correctional officers and a state, alleging violation of his constitutional rights as the result of an assault from officers in retaliation for filing grievances about disciplinary actions taken against him. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the state was entitled to sovereign immunity. The court found that the prisoner's § 1983 excessive force suit against correctional officers in their individual capacities did not implicate a rule against double recovery, under New York law, despite the officers' contention that the prisoner had already won an excessive force suit in state court against the officers in their official capacities and now wanted "a second bite at the apple." The court noted that there was no court in which the prisoner could have brought both an excessive force claim under state law against the state and the officers in their official capacities and a § 1983 claim against the officers in individual capacities for which punitive damages were available. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the prisoner's filing of a grievance was the motivating factor for the alleged assault by the correctional officers. Bridgewater v. Taylor, 832 F.Supp.2d 337 (S.D.N.Y. 2011). A New York state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against prison officials and correctional officers, alleging excessive force, failure to protect, and failure to supervise and properly train in violation of the Eighth Amendment. After the prisoner's motion for summary judgment against an officer was preliminarily denied, the prisoner moved for reconsideration and the former prison superintendent and another officer moved to dismiss. The district court denied the motion for reconsideration and granted the motion to dismiss. The court held that the prisoner did not properly serve the complaint on the officer or superintendent and that the prisoner failed to state a failure to protect claim against the officer. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the correctional officer acted with malice or wantonness toward the prisoner necessary to constitute an Eighth Amendment violation, or whether he was applying force in a good–faith effort to maintain discipline. The court also found that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the correctional officer's use of physical force against the prisoner was more than de minimus. The district court dismissed the action and the arrestee appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the detention center captain's decision to use force, and the amount of force used in subduing the arrestee during the booking process were objectively reasonable under the circumstances, and he thus did not violate the arrestee's Fourth Amendment rights. The court noted that the arrestee refused to comply with directions, loudly abused correctional officers, and aggressively leapt toward the captain. (Ouachita County Jail, Arkansas)

After a jury verdict in favor of the county, the district court denied the inmates' motion for a new trial and the inmates appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded, ordering a new trial due to the district court's refusal to submit the inmates' proposed instructions to the jury. The court noted that the inmates' proposed instructions explicitly stating that the county's use of an unconstitutional practice or custom could be proven through evidence that incidents of excessive force were not investigated and their perpetrators were not disciplined. Jordan v. Fischer, 773 F.Supp.2d 255 (N.D.N.Y. 2011). A state inmate brought a pro se § 1983 action alleging that corrections officials violated his Eighth Amendment rights through the use of excessive force, failure to intervene, and deliberate indifference to his medical needs. The parties cross-moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motions in part and denied in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the inmate was subjected to excessive force by correction officers, given the existence of some medical evidence supporting the inmate's claims of an assault, as well as another inmate's statement that he saw the plaintiff inmate being pulled out of line, which was inconsistent with the correction officer's statements. The court found that the alleged "sexual slurs" made to the inmate by a prison nurse did not rise to the level of an Eighth Amendment violation even if the inmate felt insulted or harassed, where the inmate alleged that the nurse, while inspecting the inmate's injuries, asked him how much the inmate could bench press and told him he had nice muscles. Maraj v. Massachusetts, 836 F.Supp.2d 17 (D.Mass. 2011). The mother of a deceased inmate brought an action, as administratrix of the inmate's estate, against the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, a county sheriff's department, a county sheriff, and corrections officers, alleging that the defendants violated the inmate's Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment rights. She also brought common law claims of wrongful death, negligence, and assault and battery. The defendants moved to dismiss for failure to state claim. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the Commonwealth, in enacting legislation effectuating the assumption of county sheriff's department by the Commonwealth, did not waive sovereign immunity as to § 1983 claims filed against the Commonwealth, the department, and corrections officers in their official capacities after the transfer took effect. The court found that the correction officers who were no longer participating in the transfer of the inmate at the time inmate first resisted and the officers who took the first responsive measure by "double locking" the inmate's handcuffs were not subject to liability in their individual capacities as to the § 1983 substantive due process claim brought by inmate's mother arising from the inmate's death following the transfer. According to the court, corrections officers who applied physical force to the resisting inmate during the transfer of the inmate, or were present when the inmate was unresponsive and requiring medical attention, were subject to liability, in their individual capacities, as to the § 1983 substantive due process claim brought by the inmate's mother. The court held that the county sheriff and corrections officers who participated in the transfer of the inmate, who died following the transfer, were immune from negligence and wrongful death claims brought by the inmate's mother under the Massachusetts Tort Claims Act (MTCA) provision which categorically protected public employees acting within the scope of their employment from liability for "personal injury or death" caused by their individual negligence. But the court found that the mother properly alleged that county corrections officers' contact with the inmate amounted to excessive force, and that a supervisor instructed the use of excessive force, as required to state a claim for assault and battery, under Massachusetts law, against the officers. Plair v. City of New York, 789 F.Supp.2d 459 (S.D.N.Y. 2011.) A pre-trial detainee at an adolescent jail brought an action against a city, city officials, and corrections officers, asserting claims under § 1983 and state law arising from an incident in which an officer allegedly punched him in the face. The defendants moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the detainee failed to state excessive force claims against supervisory officials and a § 1983 claim against the city. The court found that correctional officers and supervisors did not have immunity under New York law from state law claims and the city did not have immunity under New York law from state law claims brought on the respondeat superior basis. The court held that the determination of whether the pretrial detainee's claim against the city for its negligent hiring, training, and retention of officers and supervisors allegedly involved in the detainee's beating could not be resolved at the motion to dismiss phase because of factual issues as to whether the actions of these officers and supervisors were undertaken in the scope of their employment. Thorpe v. Little, 804 F.Supp.2d 174 (D.Del. 2011.) A pretrial detainee, proceeding in forma pauperis, brought a § 1983 action against a prison, prison officials, and prison medical personnel, alleging violations of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), Civil Rights Act, Civil Rights of Institutionalized Persons Act (CRIPA), and supplemental state law claims. The detainee moved to show cause and for transfer to a different institution. The district court denied the motions and dismissed the claims in part. The court held that the prison did not violate the pretrial detainee's First Amendment right of access to courts by only allowing the detainee to receive legal services from the prison law library through written requests, where the detainee was provided access to courts if he merely submitted a written request, and the detainee was represented by a public defender. The court held that the detainee's complaint, alleging that a corrections officer sprayed him in the face with pepper spray when he did not comply with the officer's order, stated a claim for excessive force, as would violate the Fourteenth Amendment Due Process Clause. The detainee was maced when he would not allow correctional officers to leave his food tray on the cell window flap. The macing caused vision loss and facial irritation. Following the incident, the detainee was taken to isolation where he remained for the next fifteen days. He received a disciplinary write-up for this incident and was found guilty. (James T. Patients who were civilly committed to the Minnesota Sex Offender Program (MSOP) brought a § 1983 action against Minnesota Department of Human Services (DHS) officials and Minnesota Department of Corrections (DOC) officials, alleging that various MSOP policies and practices relating to the patients' conditions of confinement were unconstitutional. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants and the patients appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that: (1) the MSOP policy of performing unclothed body searches of patients was not unreasonable; (2) the policy of placing full restraints on patients during transport was not unreasonable; (3) officials were not liable for using excessive force in handcuffing patients; (4) the officials' seizure of televisions from the patients' rooms was not unreasonable; (5) the MSOP telephone-use policy did not violate the First Amendment; and (6) there was no evidence that officials were deliberately indifferent to the patients' health or safety. Bernini v. City of St. Paul, 665 F.3d 997 (8th Cir. 2012). Thirty-two arrestees filed a § 1983 action against a city and police officers in their individual capacities for allegedly violating the First and Fourth Amendments by detentions and arrests, on the first day of the Republican National Convention. The charges were ultimately dismissed. The district court granted the city and the officers summary judgment and the arrestees appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that police officers' brief detention of seven members of a group at a park during the Republican National Convention comported with Fourth Amendment reasonableness requirements for investigative detention, since the group members were detained only while the officers sought to determine which members were involved in a prior confrontation with officers at an intersection.

The court found that the officers had arguable probable cause for the mass arrest of 160 people in the park, based on an objectively reasonable mistaken belief that all 160 people were part of a unit of 100 protestors that officers had probable cause to believe had committed third-degree riot and unlawful assembly in violation of Minnesota law. According to the court, the officers' deployment of non-lethal munitions, as authorized by the lead sergeant commanding mobile field force operations during the confrontation with a crowd at the Republican National Convention, was not excessive force, under the Fourth Amendment, since officers reasonably believed that the noncompliant crowd intended to penetrate a police line blocking access to the downtown. Covarrubias v. Wallace, 907 F.Supp.2d 808 (E.D.Tex. 2012). A state prisoner brought a pro se § 1983 action against prison guards and officials complaining of alleged violations of his constitutional rights, in connection with an alleged assault by guards and a subsequent disciplinary hearing. The district court held that: (1) picket officers could not be held liable under a supervisory liability theory for failing to intervene when the prisoner was subjected to pepper spray, where even if they had authority to intervene, they did not have a realistic opportunity to intervene; (2) the punishments imposed on the prisoner for assaulting a guard did not violate any due process liberty interest; (3) denial of the prisoner's grievance did not violate any due process liberty interest; and (4) the prisoner failed to state an Eighth Amendment claim for disregarding an excessive risk to his health or safety. But the court found that the prisoner's allegations, that corrections officers used excessive force against him in retaliation for requesting a supervisor and for attempts to informally resolve a complaint, stated § 1983 claims against the officers. The prisoner alleged that as he was being restrained, one officer fired a two- to three-second burst of pepper spray into his right eye, and the officers subsequently tackled him, using their elbows, knees, arms, and hands on his back, legs, arms, and face as they piled on him and pressed his face into the concrete. Gomez v. Randle, 680 F.3d 859 (7th Cir. 2012). A state inmate filed a § 1983 action alleging excessive force, deliberate indifference to his serious medical condition, and retaliation for filing a grievance. After appointing counsel for the inmate and allowing him to proceed in forma pauperis, the district court granted an attorney's motion to withdraw and dismissed the case. The inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The court held that the statutory period for the inmate to file a § 1983 action alleging that an unidentified corrections officer who fired two rounds from shotgun into the inmate population violated an Eighth Amendment's prohibition against excessive force was tolled while the inmate completed the administrative grievance process. The court held that the issue of when the inmate completed the prison's grievance process with regard to his claim involved fact issues that could not be resolved on a motion to dismiss. According to the court, the inmate's allegation that an unidentified corrections officer fired two rounds from a shotgun into inmates who were not involved in an ongoing altercation was sufficient to state an excessive force claim under the Eighth Amendment.

The court found that the inmate's allegations that he suffered a shotgun wound that caused excessive bruising and bleeding, that prison officials waited four days before treating his wound, and that he experienced prolonged, unnecessary pain as result of a readily treatable condition, were sufficient to state a claim for deliberate indifference to his serious medical condition, in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The court found that the inmate's allegations that he used the prison's grievance system to address his injury and lack of treatment he received following his injury, that he was transferred to a correctional center where he had known enemies when he refused to drop his grievance, and that there was no other explanation for his transfer, were sufficient to state a claim of retaliation in violation of his First Amendment right to use a prison grievance system. Gruenberg v. Gempeler, 697 F.3d 573 (7th Cir. 2012). A state prisoner, proceeding pro se, filed a § 1983 action against various prison officials, guards, and medical staff, alleging violations of the Eighth Amendment. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that: (1) the prisoner did not have a clearly established right to not be continually restrained without clothing or cover in a cell for five days following his ingestion of a handcuff key, the master key for belt restraints, and the key used for opening cell doors, where restraint had been imposed to keep the prisoner from re-ingesting those keys; (2) the continuous restraint of the prisoner without clothing or cover in a cell for five days did not violate his Fourteenth Amendment due process rights; (3) the prisoner's Fourth Amendment and Fourteenth Amendment substantive due process claims were barred; and (4) the district court did not abuse its discretion by ruling that the prisoner was competent to advance his case and was not entitled to appointed counsel. Jackson v. Gandy, 877 F.Supp.2d 159 (D.N.J. 2012). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against a department of corrections, corrections officers, and prison officials, alleging violations of his Eighth Amendment right against cruel and unusual punishment. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that there was no evidence that prison officials were personally involved in a corrections officers' alleged assault on the state prisoner, as required to establish supervisory liability against the officials under § 1983, despite defense counsel's bare assertions of deliberate indifference and notice of assaultive history. The court ruled that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the force used by corrections officers to subdue the prisoner was excessive and in violation of Eighth Amendment, and whether a corrections officer participated in the alleged assault on the prisoner. The court held that the corrections officers were not entitled to qualified immunity where the prisoner's complaint alleged a violation of the constitutional right to be free from unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain, and such right was clearly established at the time of the officers' alleged misconduct. The court also held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the prisoner exhausted his administrative remedies regarding the excessive force claim against corrections officials in accordance with the requirements of the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA). Morrison v. Hartman, 898 F.Supp.2d 577 (W.D.N.Y. 2012). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against several state corrections officers, alleging use of excessive force and sexual and verbal abuse in violation of his Eighth Amendment rights. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether, and to what extent, the corrections officers' alleged beating of the prisoner caused injuries or exacerbated pre–existing injuries, and whether the officers acted in a good–faith effort to maintain or restore discipline, or rather with malicious and sadistic intent to cause harm. The court found that the prisoner's allegations that a corrections officer pinched his left nipple and forced him to touch his own buttocks and then his mouth were not severe enough to be considered objectively and sufficiently serious to support the prisoner's § 1983 claim of sexual abuse in violation of his Eighth Amendment rights. According to the court, the prisoner's allegations of verbal abuse by a corrections officer during an incident in which officers allegedly beat the prisoner did not state an independent § 1983 claim for violation of his Eighth Amendment rights, but those allegations were potentially admissible in support of the prisoner's excessive force claim against the officer in relation to the beating. Rice ex rel. Rice v. Correctional Medical Services, 675 F.3d 650 (7th Cir. 2012). Following a pretrial detainee's death while incarcerated, his parents, representing his estate filed suit pursuant to § 1983, alleging among other things that jail officials and medical personnel had deprived the pretrial detainee of due process by exhibiting deliberate indifference to his declining mental and physical condition. The district court entered summary judgment against the estate. The estate filed a second suit reasserting the state wrongful death claims that the judge in the first suit had dismissed without prejudice after disposing of the federal claims. The district court dismissed that case on the basis of collateral estoppel, and the estate appealed both judgments. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The appeals court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether jail officials were deliberately indifferent to the pretrial detainee's conditions of confinement, and whether his conditions of confinement were sufficiently serious to support his Fourteenth Amendment due process claim. The court noted that whether the detainee himself created the unsanitary conditions was a fact relevant to the claim, but given detainee's mental condition, it did not foreclose the claim. The court held that jail officials did not employ excessive force, in violation of due process, to the pretrial detainee who had been fighting with his cellmate and failed to comply with a directive that he step out of his cell which he refused to leave for 18 hours, by spraying his face with pepper foam, and placing him in a restraint chair.

The court found that neither jail guards or supervisors were deliberately indifferent to the risk that the mentally ill pretrial detainee might engage in a behavior such as compulsive water drinking that would cause him to die within a matter of hours and did not consciously disregarded that risk, and therefore they were not liable for his death under § 1983. According to the court, while a factfinder might conclude that the guards exhibited a generalized recklessness with respect to the safety of the inmates housed in the administrative segregation unit by failing to conduct hourly checks of the unit, there was no evidence that the guards or supervisors were subjectively aware of the possibility that the detainee might injure himself to the point of death before anyone could intervene. Stanfill v. Talton, 851 F.Supp.2d 1346 (M.D.Ga. 2012). The father of a pretrial detainee who died while in custody at a county jail brought a § 1983 action individually, and as administrator of the detainee's estate, against a county sheriff and others, alleging that the defendants violated the detainee's rights under the Eighth and Fourteenth amendments. The county defendants moved for summary judgment, and the father cross-moved for partial summary judgment and for sanctions. The district court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment. The court held that the father failed to establish that the county defendants had a duty to preserve any video of the detainee in his cells, as would support sanctions against the defendants in the father's civil rights action. The court noted that the defendants did not anticipate litigation resulting from the detainee's death, the father did not file suit until almost two years after the detainee's death, and there was no indication that the father requested that the defendants impose a litigation hold or provided the defendants any form of notice that litigation was imminent or even contemplated until the lawsuit was actually filed.

The court found that county correctional officers' use of force in placing the detainee in a restraint chair was not excessive, in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment, where less than one hour before the detainee was placed in the chair he had tied tourniquet around his arm, somehow removed metal button from his prison jumpsuit, cut his wrist or arm, and sprayed blood across his cell. The court noted that the officers were familiar with the inmate's history of self-mutilation, and the extent of injury inflicted by the officers' use of the chair was minimal, and the officers made some effort to temper the severity of their use of force. After the detainee was placed back in the restraint chair, he was given water, and a jail nurse, at one officer's request, took the inmate's blood pressure, pulse, and breathing rate, and determined that the detainee appeared in normal health and needed no further medical care.

The court also held that the officers' continued restraint of the detainee in the restraint chair was not excessive, as would violate the Fourteenth Amendment where the officers were aware of detainee's history of self-mutilation, the detainee posed a serious risk of harm to himself, and the particular circumstances confronting the officers justified the continued use of restraints until the officers were reasonably assured that the situation had abated. The court concluded that there was no causal connection between the county correctional officers' alleged indifference to the detainee's medical needs and detainee's death while in custody at the county jail, as would support a Fourteenth Amendment deliberate indifference claim brought by the detainee's father. The court noted that the father's medical expert opined that the detainee's death was not causally related to his restraint in the chair, and although the expert listed dehydration as a contributing cause of the detainee's sudden cardiac dysrhythmia that led to the detainee's death, the expert did not testify that the detainee would have survived had he not been dehydrated. Taylor v. Hale, 909 F.Supp.2d 1320 (N.D.Ala. 2012). A pretrial detainee brought § 1983 and Bivens actions against county deputy sheriffs and deputy United States marshals alleging they used excessive force against him. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion and denied in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether county deputy sheriffs used more force than was necessary to subdue the detainee and place him in a holding cell. The court also found that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether one county deputy sheriff, and a United States Marshal, failed to protect the detainee from an alleged use of excessive force by two other deputy sheriffs. According to the court, a deputy sheriff's and a United States Marshal's alleged conduct of failing to intervene when she witnessed two other deputy sheriffs use excessive force against the detainee violated the clearly established duty of officers to protect inmates in their care from assault by fellow officers, and thus, they were not entitled to qualified immunity on the detainee's § 1983 claim against her, alleging deliberate indifference to a substantial danger to the detainee in violation of his Fourteenth Amendment rights. During the booking process, a deputy allegedly forced the detainee to the floor on his stomach with a "combination of repetitious blows to the temple, jaw, neck, and ribs" and he was then handcuffed dragged to the holding cell where the beating continued. Blackmon v. Sutton, 734 F.3d 1237 (10th Cir. 2013). A former juvenile pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against various members of a juvenile detention center's staff, alleging they violated the Fourteenth Amendment rights guaranteed to him as a pretrial detainee. The district court denied the defendants' motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity. The defendants appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, and reversed in part. The court held that the eleven-year-old pretrial detainee's right to be free from punishment altogether was clearly established at the time the staff allegedly used a chair bearing wrist, waist, chest, and ankle restraints to punish detainee, for the purposes of the juvenile detention center's staff's qualified immunity defense. According to the court, the senior correctional officer approved a decision by one of his subordinates, a fully grown man, to sit on the chest of the eleven-year-old without any penological purpose. The court found that the detainee's Fourteenth Amendment due process rights were violated when employees allegedly failed to provide the eleven-year-old detainee with any meaningful mental health care despite his obvious need for it. The court noted that prison officials who assumed a "gate keeping" authority over the prisoner's access to medical professionals were deliberately indifferent to the detainee's medical needs when they denied or delayed access to medical care. But the court also held that the detainee's alleged right to be placed in a particular facility of his choice while awaiting trial was not clearly established at the time the director failed to transfer detainee to a nearby shelter, for purposes of the juvenile detention center director's qualified immunity defense.. The court stated: "Weeks before eleven-year-old, 4'11," 96–pound Brandon Blackmon arrived at the juvenile detention center in Sedgwick, Kansas, officials there made a new purchase: the Pro–Straint Restraining Chair, Violent Prisoner Chair Model RC–1200LX. The chair bore wrist, waist, chest, and ankle restraints. In the months that followed, the staff made liberal use of their new acquisition on the center's youngest and smallest charge. Sometimes in a legitimate effort to thwart his attempts at suicide and self-harm. But sometimes, it seems, only to punish him. And that's the nub of this lawsuit." Burgess v. Fischer, 735 F.3d 462 (6th Cir. 2013). An arrestee brought an action under § 1983 against a county board of commissioners, sheriff, deputies, and jail nurse, alleging violations of his constitutional rights during his arrest. The defendants moved for summary judgment and the district court granted the motion. The arrestee appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, vacated in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The appeals court held that: (1) a genuine issue of material fact existed as to whether the force used against the arrestee was reasonable; (2) a corrections officer and the jail nurse were not liable for failure to prevent deputy sheriffs from using excessive force, absent a showing that the nurse and officer had both the opportunity and the means to prevent the harm from occurring; (3) the nurse was not liable for deliberate indifference to the arrestee's medical needs, where the arrestee's latent cranial injury was not so obvious that a lay person would easily have recognized the necessity for a doctor's attention; (4) the county board of commissioners was not liable under § 1983 for any alleged conduct of deputy sheriffs in violating the arrestee's federal constitutional rights, absent a showing that any county policy or custom was the moving force behind the alleged violations; (5) a genuine issue of material fact existed as to whether a deputy sheriffs' use of force against the arrestee was reckless under Ohio law; (6) a genuine issue of material fact existed as to whether a deputy sheriff assaulted the arrestee in response to an off-color jibe; and (7) genuine issues of material fact existed as to whether the county board of commissioners, sheriff, and deputies knew that litigation was probable and whether their destruction of videotape evidence of deputies' use of force against the arrestee was willful. The court also found that the jail nurse did not act with malice and in a wanton and willful manner in allowing the arrestee to sit in a county jail cell for 12 hours with serious injuries, where the nurse attended to the arrestee, assessed what she perceived to be minor injuries, provided him with ibuprofen for his pain, and advised him he could contact someone for further medical assistance if necessary. Chennault v. Mitchell, 923 F.Supp.2d 765 (E.D.Va. 2013). The guardian for an incapacitated former pretrial detainee filed § 1983 action against a former sheriff and former officers of the sheriff's department for alleged violation of the detainee's Fourteenth Amendment right to due process, by deliberate indifference to her medical needs that resulted in her permanent brain damage from an attempted suicide. The defendants moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion. The court held that sheriff's department officers were not deliberately indifferent to the serious medical needs of the detainee, as required to support the detainee's § 1983 claim for violation of her Fourteenth Amendment due process rights, where the officers had no knowledge or even any reason to suspect that the detainee presented a risk of suicide, rather than merely a risk of violent behavior towards officers. According to the court, the sheriff's department officers' pepper spraying of the detainee due to her violent behavior toward the officers, and then failing to decontaminate her, did not establish that the officers knew of and disregarded a substantial risk of harm to the detainee, where the officers did not know or have reason to believe that the detainee was suicidal at the time that she was sprayed, the detainee did not allege that the use of spray was unnecessary or excessive in amount, and the detainee did not exhibit any adverse reactions to the spray or to the lack of decontamination.

The court found that the sheriff's department officers' failure to support the detainee's body and/or neck when they cut her shirt on which she hung herself on cell bars in an attempted suicide did not constitute deliberate indifference to her serious medical needs in violation of her Fourteenth Amendment due process rights. The court noted that, even though the detainee's injuries were increased from sliding down cell bars and forcibly striking her head on the cell door, the officers faced an emergency and needed to act quickly and decisively to save the detainee's life. According to the court, their actions "…were not only reasonable in this situation, but laudable." The court held that the detainee's § 1983 claim that the sheriff failed to train jail personnel, to ensure they could adequately respond to the medical needs of combative and/or intoxicated detainees, was foreclosed by the lack of a Fourteenth Amendment violation by jail personnel and a lack of a causal link between the sheriff's policies and the detainee's attempted suicide, where jail personnel were not deliberately indifferent to the detainee's medical needs in violation of the detainee's due process rights, and there was no pattern of unconstitutional violations resulting in suicides or attempted suicides. (Richmond City Jail Annex, Virginia)

The provider moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to: (1) whether failure of the nurses to inspect the detainee after each time he was pepper-sprayed constituted deliberate indifference; (2) whether the sheriff knew that corrections officers were using pepper spray nearly indiscriminately; (3) whether corrections officers were deliberately indifferent to the detainee's physical and medical needs; and (4) whether corrections officers' repeated pepper-spraying of the detainee while he was restrained naked in a chair was malicious and sadistic to the point of shocking the conscience. The court found that the health services provider did not have a policy of understaffing that constituted deliberate indifference to the detainee's health, as required to support a § 1983 claim against the private provider. Clay v. Woodbury County, Iowa, 982 F.Supp.2d 904 (N.D.Iowa 2013). A female arrestee brought a § 1983 action against a city, an arresting officer, county, county sheriff, and jail officers, alleging, among other things, that jail officers "strip searched" her without reasonable suspicion and in unconstitutional manner, and did so in retaliation for her vociferous complaints about her detention and the search of her purse and cell phone. The defendants moved for summary judgment, and the arrestee moved to exclude expert testimony. The district court held that the expert's reference to an incorrect standard for the excessive force claim did not warrant excluding his opinions in their entirety, although portions of the expert's report were inadmissible.

The court found that the incident in which male and female county jail officers forcibly removed the female arrestee's under-wire bra and changed her into jail attire was not a "strip search" within the meaning of the Iowa law which defined a "strip search" as "having a person remove or arrange some or all of the person's clothing so as to permit an inspection of the genitalia, buttocks, female breasts or undergarments of that person or a physical probe by any body cavity," where there was no indication that the officers inspected the arrestee's private parts or physically probed any of her body cavities. The court also found that the arrestee whose clothing was forcibly removed in the presence of male and female county jail officers in a holding cell after the arrestee refused to answer questions during the booking process and to remove her clothing herself, was not subjected to a "strip search" requiring reasonable suspicion under the Fourth Amendment. According to the court, the officers did not violate the arrestee's privacy rights under the Fourth Amendment where the officers' reason for removing the arrestee's bra-- institutional safety-- was substantially justified, and the scope of the intrusion was relatively small. The court also found that the officers were entitled to qualified immunity from the female arrestee's § 1983 unlawful search claim, where the officers neither knew, nor reasonably should have known, that their actions would violate the arrestee's privacy rights. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the amount of force used by female county jail officers during the booking process to forcibly remove the female arrestee's under-wire bra and change her into jail attire after the arrestee refused to answer questions, became disruptive, and refused to remove her clothing herself, was reasonable. The officers allegedly threw the arrestee onto the cell bunk, causing her to bang her head against the bunk or cell wall. The court found that male county jail officers did not use excessive force, within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment, in restraining the female arrestee in a holding cell after the female officers had allegedly thrown the arrestee onto a cell bunk, causing her to bang her head against bunk or cell wall, in an effort to forcibly remove the arrestee's clothing and to change her into jail attire. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The detainee had been booked into a holding cell at the jail and then he was removed from the multi-prisoner cell and taken to a single-inmate "safety cell." He alleges that during the transfer, deputy sheriffs subjected him to excessive force in the course of removing his jacket and shoes. The district court found that "[T]he videotape provides substance to those allegations." Eason v. Frye, 972 F.Supp.2d 935 (S.D.Miss. 2013). A pretrial detainee brought a pro se § 1983 action against an officer and a sheriff, alleging that the officer used excessive force by releasing his canine while responding to a fight between the detainee and another inmate, and that he did not receive immediate medical attention after the incident. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The district court held that: (1) the detainee failed to allege that the sheriff was personally involved in the dog bite incident, as required for § 1983 liability; (2) the officer did not use excessive force; (3) prison officials were not deliberately indifferent to the detainee's serious medical needs where there was no evidence that the officials refused to treat the detainee, ignored his complaints, or intentionally treated him incorrectly; (4) the detainee failed to state a § 1983 failure to train or supervise claim; (5) the sheriff was entitled to qualified immunity from the failure to train claim, where the detainee made no specific allegations about how the sheriff was unreasonable in his training and supervising methods; and (6) the detainee could not maintain a claim for mental or emotional suffering. The court noted that the detainee refused to stop fighting when the officer ordered him to stop, thus causing an obvious threat to security. In response, the officer applied the amount of force necessary to restore order on the tier, and as soon as the detainee went to the ground and stopped fighting, the officer ordered the dog to release its grip. The detainee suffered a minor injury when he was bitten by the dog. According to the court, the detainee made no specific allegations regarding how the training and supervision program at the detention facility was inadequate or defective, he contended that his numerous complaints and grievances went unanswered but provided no evidence of inadequate training or supervision, and he made no allegation of an official policy that caused the allegedly inadequate training and supervision. (Harrison County Adult Detention Center, Mississippi)

Furnace v. Sullivan, 705 F.3d 1021 (9th Cir. 2013). A state prison inmate brought a § 1983 action against correctional officers, alleging they used excessive force in violation of the Eighth Amendment by spraying him with an excessive quantity of pepper spray, and that they violated his rights to equal protection under the Fourteenth Amendment rights when they denied him a vegetarian breakfast as required by his religion. The officers moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motions, and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the inmate posed a threat to correctional officers, and as to whether the officers' discharge of pepper spray on the inmate was required to gain his compliance. The court found that correctional officers who refused to provide the inmate with a vegetarian meal required by his religion did not treat the inmate any differently than others who were similarly situated, and thus the officers did not violate the inmate's Fourteenth Amendment right to equal protection. The court noted that although other prisoners were provided with vegetarian meals for religious reasons, they were not similarly situated to the inmate because the officers did not know the inmate had also been approved for a vegetarian meal. Gwathney v. Warren, 930 F.Supp.2d 1313 (M.D.Ala. 2013). An inmate filed a Bivens suit against a prison officer and others for use of excessive force during a pat-down search, alleging violation of the Eighth Amendment prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment, and other claims. All claims except the excessive use of force claim were dismissed. The officer filed a renewed motion to dismiss on the grounds of qualified immunity, or in the alternative for summary judgment. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the officer. The court held that evidence did not create a fact issue as to whether the prison official maliciously or sadistically inflicted pain on the inmate while conducting a pat-down search, as required for the inmate to survive summary judgment on the defense of qualified immunity. According to the court, when the officer entered the inmate's cubicle, he observed the inmate rise from his bunk, turn, and place his hand down front of his pants, which typically signaled that an inmate was trying to conceal an object. The inmate was facing away from the officer when the officer began the pat-down and thus, the inmate could not observe any expression or movement suggesting that the officer had any malicious motive in touching the inmate's shoulders. Even after the inmate fell to his knees from post-surgery shoulder pain, the officer's statement "[o]h, you still can't raise your arm" did not indicate malice for the sole purpose of inflicting pain, but rather supported an inference that the officer still did not believe the inmate's assertion about shoulder surgery and that he could not raise his arm. Maraj v. Massachusetts, 953 F.Supp.2d 325 (D.Mass. 2013). The estate of a deceased inmate brought a § 1983 excessive-force action against county corrections officers and others, alleging that they used excessive force and were deliberately indifferent to the inmate's medical needs, in violation of the Constitution. The district court partially granted the defendants' motions to dismiss and the defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The defendants allegedly caused the inmate's death by using an emergency restraint belt and delaying medical treatment, but a prison medical examiner determined that the inmate had a pre-existing heart condition that ultimately led to the inmate's cardiac arrest, and the manner of death could not be determined. Moses v. Westchester County Dept. of Corrections, 951 F.Supp.2d 448 (S.D.N.Y. 2013). The estate of a deceased prisoner brought a § 1983 action against a county, its department of corrections (DOC), and a corrections officer, alleging state and federal claims after the prisoner was beaten by the officer. The defendants moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court found that the family exercised reasonable diligence in pursuing the action, as required to equitably toll the limitations period for the § 1983 action. The estate alleged that the corrections officer "kicked and stomped" on the prisoner's head, causing injuries that eventually led to his death. The officer was indicted in county court for assault and the Federal Bureau of Investigations opened an investigation into allegations that the officer had used excessive force against the prisoner. The officer was eventually convicted of reckless assault. The prisoner's death also prompted a federal investigation into conditions at the jail, and investigators found a number of instances of the use of excessive force by jail staff, a failure to provide an adequate review system, and a failure to provide adequate mental and medical health care. Navejar v. Iyiola, 718 F.3d 692 (7th Cir. 2013). A prisoner brought a § 1983 action against prison guards claiming that the guards used excessive force to subdue him after he punched a prison guard. The district court granted summary judgment for the guards. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The appeals court held that the trial court abused its discretion in denying the prisoner's request for the appointment of counsel under the federal in forma pauperis statute in the prisoner's § 1983 action, where the court focused on the prisoner's competency to try his case instead of whether the prisoner appeared competent to litigate his own claims. The appeals court found that the trial court failed to address the prisoner's personal abilities and allegations that he had limited education, mental illness, language difficulties, and lacked access to other resources, and the court applied the appellate review standard of whether the recruitment of counsel would affect the outcome of the case. Randle v. Alexander, 960 F.Supp.2d 457 (S.D.N.Y. 2013). An African-American state inmate with a history of serious mental illness brought an action against officials of the New York State Department of Corrections and Community Supervision (DOCCS), correctional officers, and mental health personnel, alleging under § 1983 that the defendants were deliberately indifferent to his serious medical needs and that he was retaliated against, in violation of his First Amendment rights, among other claims. The defendants moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the correctional officers' alleged actions in forcing the inmate to fight a fellow inmate, and threatening to beat the inmate with a baton and engage in a joint cover-up if the two inmates did not "finish" their fight within a specified area of the prison, which ultimately resulted in the fellow inmate sustaining fatal injuries in the fight, had no legitimate penological purpose, and was far afield of the species of force employed to restore or maintain discipline. The court held that the alleged actions reflected indifference to inmate safety, if not malice toward the inmate, as supported the inmate's § 1983 Eighth Amendment failure to protect claim. According to the court, the alleged forced fight between the inmate and a fellow inmate, orchestrated, condoned, and covered up by correctional officers was an objectively serious violation of the inmate's Eighth Amendment right to reasonably safe conditions of confinement, and the intent evinced by such activity was, at the very least, one of indifference to inmate safety, supporting the inmate's § 1983 Eighth Amendment conditions of confinement claim against the officers.

The court held that the African-American state inmate's allegations in his complaint that a correctional officer arranged inmates in his company so that white inmates were close to officers' posts, whereas black inmates were placed further away, that white inmates were given superior jobs, that the officer's efforts in forcing a fight between the inmate and a fellow inmate were done purposefully for his amusement because both inmates were black, and that the officer's treatment of the inmate and other black inmates was motivated by his intent to discriminate on the basis of race and malicious intent to injure inmates, stated a § 1983 equal protection claim against the officer. The court ruled that the correctional officers were not entitled to qualified immunity from the inmate's § 1983 Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment claims because inmates had a clearly established right to remain incarcerated in reasonably safe conditions, and it was objectively unreasonable to threaten inmates until they agreed to fight each other in front of prison officials.

The court found that the inmate stated an Eighth Amendment inadequate medical care claim against mental health personnel. The inmate alleged that he had a history of serious mental illness, that his symptoms increased following a forced fight with a fellow inmate, that the inmate attempted suicide on three occasions, two of which required his hospitalization, that prison mental health personnel evidenced deliberate indifference to his medical needs, as they recklessly disregarded the risk the inmate faced as result of special housing unit (SHU) confinement, and that the inmate was confined to SHU despite a recommendation that he be placed in a less-restrictive location. Reid v. Cumberland County, 34 F.Supp.3d 396 (D.N.J. 2013). An inmate filed a § 1983 action against a county, its department of corrections, warden, and correctional officers alleging that officers used excessive force against him. The inmate moved to compel discovery. The district court granted the motion. The court held that: (1) information regarding past instances of excessive force by correctional officers was relevant to the inmate's supervisory liability claims; (2) officers' personnel files and internal affairs files were relevant; (3) officers' personnel files and internal affairs files were not protected by the official information privilege; (4) officers' personnel files and internal affairs files were not protected by the deliberative process privilege; (5) internal affairs files concerning the incident in question were subject to discovery; (6) the county failed to adequately demonstrate that the inmate's request for prior instances of excessive force and accompanying documentation was sufficiently burdensome to preclude discovery; and (7) complaints about officers' excessive force, statistics of excessive force, the county's use of force reports, and related internal affairs files were not protected by the official information privilege or the deliberative process privilege. The inmate alleged that officers entered his cell and, without legal justification, willfully, maliciously, and intentionally punched and kicked him until he was curled up on the ground, and that mace was sprayed in his face. The inmate claimed that one officer "not only approved of the beating but also took the affirmative step of opening the cell door…" so two other officers could attack him. The inmate asserted that, as a result of the beating, he was treated for injuries that included broken ribs, a fracture of his left orbital bone, and loss of sensation and nerve damage in his lips and cheek area. Robinson v. Phelps, 946 F.Supp.2d 354 (D.Del. 2013). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against prison officials alleging excessive force and failure to protect. The district court held that the prisoner stated cognizable and non-frivolous claims for excessive force, failure to protect, and denial of medical care. The prisoner alleged that on one occasion a sergeant assaulted him and that a lieutenant arrived during the assault and that he sustained injuries but was denied medical care by these officers and other prison personnel, that another sergeant shoved and pushed him when he was taken to a medical grievance hearing, making his injuries worse, that this sergeant shoved him to the ground while escorting him to the shower, and then dragged him when he could not get up, requiring that he be taken away by stretcher, and that other officers later choked him until he lost consciousness. According to the court, the prisoner's allegations were sufficient to state an Eighth Amendment claim that the physicians denied his requests for medically necessary accommodations. The prisoner alleged that medical officials did not authorize his housing on a lower bunk and, as a result, he slept on the floor, that an officer later moved him to an upstairs cell even though he knew that the prisoner required lower housing due to his neck and back injuries, and that the prisoner showed the officer a memo from a superior officer indicating the prisoner needed the housing, (James T. Santiago v. Blair, 707 F.3d 984 (8th Cir. 2013). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against correctional officers, alleging excessive force and deliberate indifference to his medical needs in violation of the Eighth Amendment and retaliation in violation of the First Amendment. The district court granted the officers' motion for summary judgment with respect to official capacity claims, but denied summary judgment with respect to individual capacity claims. The officers appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The appeals court held that the district court improperly applied the Fourth Amendment excessive force legal standard to the prisoner's § 1983 claim for excessive force in violation of the Eighth Amendment, warranting remand to the district court to inquire whether the force was applied to the prisoner in a good-faith effort to maintain or restore discipline, or maliciously and sadistically to cause harm. The appeals court held that summary judgment in prisoner's First Amendment retaliation action was precluded by a genuine dispute of material fact as to whether a correctional officer's threats of death would chill a prisoner of ordinary firmness from engaging in the prison grievance process. The court also found a genuine dispute of material fact as to whether the correctional officer issued death threats to the prisoner because the prisoner had filed and pursued an excessive force grievance. According to the court, summary judgment in the First Amendment retaliation action was precluded by a genuine dispute of material fact as to whether the correctional officer's placement of the prisoner in a cell without his personal property, proper facilities, bedding, or clothing, and the officer's threat that things would get worse, issued after hearing the prisoner complain that he was being retaliated against, were adverse actions sufficient to chill a prisoner of ordinary firmness from engaging in the prison grievance process. Stone v. Caswell, 963 F.Supp.2d 32 (D.Mass. 2013). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against a correctional officer, a sergeant, a captain, and the Massachusetts Department of Correction (DOC) officials, alleging that the defendants violated his state and federal civil rights while he was in their custody. The officials moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied the motion in part. The court held that the prisoner stated a claim against DOC officials, a sergeant, and a captain for supervisor liability under § 1983. According to the court, even though they did not participate in the underlying constitutional violation—a correctional officer's alleged use of excessive force against the prisoner-- the prisoner alleged that they caused his constitutional rights to be violated by inadequately training and supervising the correctional officer. The prisoner was being held in a cell at a local court when a DOC transportation officer asked about a pair of sneakers located in the prisoner's cell. The prisoner responded that the sneakers did not belong to him. The officer then entered the prisoner's cell, pointed his finger in prisoner's face, grabbed him, forced him into a sitting position and, later, forced him to the ground of the lock-up corridor. U.S. v. McQueen, 727 F.3d 1144 (11th Cir. 2013). After a state prison sergeant was convicted of conspiring to deprive several inmates of their right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment, and for obstruction of justice, and a state prison corrections officer was convicted of obstruction of justice, the district court denied the sergeant's motion for a new trial, and denied the corrections officer's motion for judgment of acquittal or in the alternative, for a new trial, and they appealed. The court affirmed in part, vacated in part, and remanded. The court held that evidence was sufficient to establish an illegal agreement among the sergeant and others to violate the civil rights of numerous inmates, and that any error by the government in improperly bolstering the credibility of a witness did not warrant reversal. The court held that the prison officers' sentences were substantively unreasonable because the district court varied downward from the bottom of the Sentencing Guideline range by more than 90%. The court noted that the sergeant had brutalized more than five young prisoners and then lied about it, and the corrections officer intentionally sought to conceal those serious crimes. Evidence showed that a law enforcement officer, in the sergeant's presence, beat one inmate around the hands with a broomstick when the inmate refused to offer the name of another prisoner who had engaged in a fight, and despite the sergeant's obligation to intervene the sergeant did nothing. The evidence also revealed that the sergeant, in the presence of other officers, assaulted another inmate who had been involved in a prison fight, beating him with a broken broomstick and throwing him to the ground, when the prisoner refused to disclose the name of the inmate with whom he had been fighting. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that summary judgment on the Fourth Amendment excessive force claim was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether a police officer used excessive force against the arrestee by handcuffing her too tightly and shoving her into a police car. The court also found a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the arrestee was sexually assaulted while she was in police custody following her arrest. Verser v. Barfield, 741 F.3d 734 (7th Cir. 2013). An inmate brought a pro se § 1983 action against prison security officers who allegedly held him down and punched him in the stomach during a cell change, alleging that the officers violated his Eighth Amendment right to be free from excessive use of force. Following a jury trial in the district court, a verdict was returned in favor of the officers. The inmate appealed denial of his motion for a new trial. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The appeals court held that the total exclusion of the inmate from the courtroom at the time the verdict was read prevented the inmate from exercising his right to poll the jury. According to the court, the error arising from the district court's total exclusion of the inmate from the courtroom was not harmless, and thus a new trial was warranted. The court noted that a jury poll definitely or even likely would have revealed that the verdict in favor of the officers was not unanimous. (Western Illinois Correctional Center)

Wilkins v. Gaddy, 734 F.3d 344 (4th Cir. 2013). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action alleging an officer maliciously and sadistically assaulted him with excessive force in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The prisoner alleged that the officer "lifted and then slammed him to the concrete floor where, once pinned, punched, kicked, kneed, and choked" him until the officer was removed by another member of the corrections staff. After a jury returned a verdict for the prisoner, the district court granted the prisoner's motion for attorneys' fees, but only in the amount of $1. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the provision of the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA), capping attorneys' fee award at 150% of the value of the prisoner's monetary judgment, satisfied a rational basis review. The court held that the PLRA provision did not violate the Fifth Amendment's equal protection component by treating the prisoner and non-prisoner litigants differently, where the provision rationally forestalled collateral fee litigation while ensuring that the incentive provided by an attorneys' fee award still attached to the most injurious civil rights violations. Burns v. Eaton, 752 F.3d 1136 (8th Cir. 2014). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against two prison officers, claiming his Eighth Amendment rights were violated when the first officer pepper-sprayed him, and the second officer turned off the water and prevented him from rinsing off the pepper-spray. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the prison officers. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that one prison officer did not act maliciously in an effort to cause harm, so as to support the prisoner's Eighth Amendment excessive force claim under § 1983, when the officer deployed pepper spray after the prisoner refused orders to leave a locked shower cell. The court noted that the prison officer warned the prisoner that he would be pepper-sprayed if he did not comply with the officer's order, the prisoner then threw an object or spit at the officer three times, and, after each aggressive act of defiance, the officer deployed a small amount of pepper spray. The district court granted the motions in part. The court held that prison officials' excessive use of force on seriously mentally ill inmates by means of pepper spray and expandable batons, pursuant to prison policies and without regard to the impact on inmates' psychiatric condition, was not yet remedied, as required by the prior judgment in favor of inmates. The court found that prison officials' changes in policies and practices of housing mentally ill inmates in administrative segregation units (ASUs) and segregated housing units (SHUs) were inadequate to remedy the systemic Eighth Amendment violations identified in the prior judgment in favor of inmates. Pretrial detainees in a county jail brought a § 1983 action against the county, county sheriff, and jail guards, alleging use of excessive force, failure to protect, and other constitutional violations. The district court denied, in part, the sheriff's and guards' motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity. The sheriff and a guard appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part and reversed in part. The court found that the guards were not entitled to qualified immunity for their alleged conduct in employing a flash-bang grenade in pretrial detainees' cell, kicking the detainees, and shooting them with bean-bag guns. According to the court, immediately before the guards entered the cell, the detainees were allegedly submissive, lying face-down, which the guards could allegedly see through the cell door, and the detainees allegedly did not resist or otherwise act aggressively, and, at the time of the incident, it was clearly established that such conduct would violate due process. Following removal to federal court, the district court denied the defendants' motion for summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds. The defendants appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the detainee's right to be free from excessive force, including use of a neck restraint, stun gun, and pressure on his back while he was on his stomach and not resisting, was clearly established, for purposes of determining whether the deputies and sergeant were entitled to qualified immunity. According to the court, a reasonable officer would know that failing to check a pretrial detainee's vital signs or provide immediate medical attention after he was rendered unconscious by the use of force, which allegedly included at least a two-minute neck hold, 140 pounds of pressure on his back, and the use of stun gun for eight seconds, was deliberate indifference. After a jury verdict in the detainee's favor, the detainee moved for entry of judgment on the jury verdict, for costs, and for judgment as matter of law. The district court denied the motion as moot, where the award of exemplary damages was justifiable and the detention of the detainee after he was acquitted was unlawful, where the jury found that the deputy's conduct was malicious, or so willful and wanton as to demonstrate reckless disregard of the detainee's rights. The court noted that the proper post-acquittal procedure requires immediate release of a detainee following acquittal, allowing for any possible out-processing to occur without continued or required detention. According to the court, the arrestee's claim requesting records under Kentucky law did not form part of same case or controversy as his federal claim in § 1983, where the arrestee's federal claim was based on the constable's actions in allegedly beating him at time of arrest and at the county jail. Imhoff v. Temas, 67 F.Supp.3d 700 (W.D.Pa. 2014). A pretrial detainee brought an action against employees of a county correctional facility, alleging deliberate indifference to his serious medical need, violation of his rights under the Fourteenth Amendment with regard to conditions of his confinement, and excessive force in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The employees moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the detainee stated a claim against the employees for deliberate indifference to a serious medical need under the Fourteenth Amendment, where the detainee alleged that he informed facility personnel of his extensive drug use, that he had repeatedly requested medical assistance when he began experiencing seizures and hallucinations in conjunction with his drug withdrawal in the presence of facility personnel, and that he was provided no medical treatment for at least eight days despite his requests for medical attention. The court held that the employees were not entitled to qualified immunity from liability because a county correctional facility's constitutional obligation to provide care to inmates suffering unnecessary pain from a serious medical need was clearly established at the time the pretrial detainee allegedly began experiencing seizures in conjunction with drug withdrawal and was not provided medical treatment. The detainee had initially been refused admission to the jail because he displayed signs of a drug overdose and he was admitted to a local hospital. After hospital personnel determined he was stable he was admitted to the jail. At one point in his confinement, the detainee acted out and banged his cell door with a plastic stool. This resulted in the retrieval of the stool by jail officers and, while he was held down by one officer, he was kicked in the face by another officer. When he yelled for help, an officer responded by choking the detainee and then spraying him with pepper spray, and he was not permitted to shower to remove the pepper spray for thirty minutes.

The court found that the detainee's allegations against the employees in their individual capacities regarding the intentional denial of medical treatment, excessive use of force, and violation of his rights under Fourteenth Amendment with regard to conditions of his confinement were sufficient to set forth a plausible claim for punitive damages. The detainee alleged that he was denied basic human needs such as drinking water, access to a toilet and toilet paper, and toiletries such as soap and a toothbrush. The district court granted summary judgment to the defendants, and the detainee appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that: (1) a physician was not deliberately indifferent to the detainee's surgical wound on his abdomen; (2) a nurse was not deliberately indifferent to the detainee's medical needs; (3) absent an underlying constitutional violation, the detainee could not maintain official-capacity and failure-to-supervise claims against a sheriff and a chief of detention; (4) a nurse's act of hitting the pretrial detainee's nose while administering an ammonia inhalant was not excessive force; and (5) the force used by nurses to move the pretrial detainee to his bed after he lost consciousness was not excessive. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in its entirety, and the plaintiff appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded in part, and affirmed in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to both the timing and the degree of force used in extracting the detainee from his jail cell. The court noted that the law was "clearly established" at the relevant time that use of force against an inmate was reserved for good-faith efforts to maintain or restore discipline, rather than for the purpose of causing harm, such that the defendants had reasonable warning that kicking, stomping, and choking a subdued inmate would violate the inmate's constitutional rights under certain circumstances. The court held that the widow failed to demonstrate that detention officers acted with deliberate indifference to the detainee's medical needs, even though they failed to contact medical staff prior to attempting to extract the detainee from his cell, where the need for participation of specialized staff to perform the extraction of a mentally ill inmate from a jail cell was not so apparent that even laymen would recognize this alleged medical need. The detainee alleged that the defendants used excessive force in response to him covering the lens of the video camera in his jail cell. In the first incident, the detained alleged that his arms were twisted, he was pinned against the wall, and he was choked. In the second incident, the detainee alleged that a taser was used to gain his compliance in transferring him to a separate cell. Following a jury trial, the district court entered judgment for the defendants and denied the detainee's motions for new trial. The detainee appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded, finding that the court's errors in failing to conceal the detainee's shackles from jury, and in requiring the detainee to wear prison clothing while the defendants were allowed to wear uniforms were not harmless. According to the court there was no indication that concealment of the restraints would have been infeasible, and visible shackling of the detainee had a prejudicial effect on the jury. The court noted that there would have been no reason for the jury to know that the plaintiff was a prisoner, and being told that the plaintiff was a prisoner and the defendants were guards made a different impression than seeing the plaintiff in a prison uniform and the defendants in guard uniforms. U.S. District Court

Rahman v. Schriro, 22 F.Supp.3d 305 (S.D.N.Y. 2014). A pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against a state prison commissioner, warden, deputy warden, deputy of security, and officers, alleging they violated the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause by forcing him to go through a radiation-emitting X-ray security screening machine in order to get to and from his daily work assignment. The defendants moved to dismiss for failure to state a claim. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the detainee sufficiently alleged a serious present injury or future risk of serious injury, as required to state a deliberate indifference claim against prison officials under the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause, by alleging that he was subjected to at least two full-body X-ray scans each day, that each scan exposed him to a level of radiation that was 10 to 50 times higher than that emitted by airport scanners, that radiation damages cells of the body and that even low doses of radiation increase an individual's risk of cancer, and that federal regulations prohibited prison officials from using even non-repetitive X-ray examinations for security purposes unless the device was operated by licensed practitioner and there was reasonable suspicion that the inmate had recently secreted contraband. According to the court, the detainee's allegations that a prison officer intentionally subjected him to a higher dose of radiation through a full-body X-ray screening machine while calling him a "fake Muslim, homosexual, faggot" were sufficient to allege that the force was not applied to maintain or restore discipline, as required to state an excessive force claim under Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause. The court held that the alleged force exerted by a prison officer on the detainee by setting the full-body X-ray screening machine to a higher radiation dose on one occasion was not excessive in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause. The court noted that the alleged force was de minimis, and the use of a higher setting of radiation, which was designed to produce a better image, in a situation where detainee expressed resistance to the scanning process and could have been conceivably hiding contraband was not the type of force repugnant to the conscience of mankind. CHEMICAL AGENTS

Roberson v. Torres, 770 F.3d 398 (6th Cir. 2014). A state prisoner brought an action against a state corrections officer, alleging that the officer sprayed him with a chemical agent while he was sleeping, in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The district court denied the officer's motion for summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity. The officer appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the corrections officer was not entitled to qualified immunity for his alleged conduct in spraying a sleeping state prisoner with a chemical agent, without prior warning, when the prisoner was covered from head to toe by his blanket. According to the court, the officer's alleged conduct was unreasonable under the alleged circumstances, and the law was clearly established that the use of a chemical agent in an initial attempt to wake a sleeping prisoner, when an officer had no reason to believe that a prisoner was awake and disobeying orders, violated the Eighth Amendment. Rodriguez v. County of Los Angeles, 96 F.Supp.3d 1012 (C.D. Cal. 2014). State detainees brought an action against numerous defendants, including a county, a sheriff's department, and individual jail guards and supervisors, alleging excessive force under § 1983. Following a jury verdict in their favor, the detainees moved for attorney fees. The district court granted the motion, holding that: (1) the detainees were entitled to recover fully compensatory attorney fees, notwithstanding the fact that some individual defendants were dismissed or prevailed at trial and that the detainees did not succeed on all motions, where the detainees succeeded on all of their claims; (2) the detainees were entitled to a lodestar multiplier of 2.0; and, (3) the district court would apply only a 1% contribution of the detainees' $950,000 damages award to their attorney fee award, where the defendants' conduct involved malicious violence leaving some detainees permanently injured. The court awarded over $5.3 million for attorney fees. (Men's Central Jail, Los Angeles County, California)

CELL EXTRACTION

Rodriguez v. County of Los Angeles, 96 F.Supp.3d 990 (C.D. Cal. 2014). Former and current inmates brought an action against a county, a county sheriff's department, and individual deputies, claiming that the deputies used excessive force to remove the inmates from their cells, in violation of the right to be free from excessive force under the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments. After a jury verdict in favor of the inmates, the defendants moved for judgment as a matter of law, to vacate the judgment, and for a new trial. The district court denied the motion. The court held that evidence that supervising law enforcement officials in the county sheriff's department saw or heard inmates being beaten and knowingly and intentionally permitted the use of unconstitutional force, and that deputies engaged in malicious conduct with the intent to harm in removing the inmates from their cells, was sufficient to demonstrate that the officials and deputies used threats, intimidation, or coercion to violate the inmates' constitutional rights, as required to hold the officials and deputies liable. According to the court, the conduct of enforcement officials in supervising the extraction of inmates from their cells was not discretionary, and thus the supervising officials were not immune from liability resulting from the exercise of discretion, where the supervising officials saw or heard inmates being beaten and saw the injuries caused by these beatings. The court found that evidence that the deputies engaged in malicious conduct with intent to harm, by using stun guns on sensitive body parts and on unconscious inmates, was sufficient to demonstrate that the deputies acted without a legitimate purpose in using the force, as required to hold the deputies liable.

According to the court, evidence that officials directed the deployment of riot-control rounds and grenades, and the use of stun guns, to forcibly extract inmates from their cells, and that the force surpassed what was necessary to gain control of the situation, was sufficient to show that the officials directed the use of excessive force and encouraged their subordinates' use of force with the intent to harm, warranting denial of qualified immunity to the officials. The court noted that the force was used on inmates who were not resisting and after the inmates had been incapacitated,

The court found that the jury's award of $210,000 in punitive damages to current and former inmates was not so grossly excessively as would violate the Due Process Clause, despite the contention that the award of punitive damages exceeded the officials' ability to pay, where the jury found that the officials acted maliciously, causing serious physical harm to the inmates. The court noted that there was no major disparity between the award of punitive damages and the $740,000 awarded as compensatory damages. (Los Angeles County Men's Central Jail, California)

Rowlery v. Genesee County, 54 F.Supp.3d 763 (E.D.Mich. 2014). A detainee brought an action against a county and officers and deputies in the county sheriff's department, alleging that he was assaulted by deputies on two occasions when he was lodged at the county jail. The defendants moved for partial summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The district court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to: (1) whether the county adequately trained officers and deputies regarding the use of force; (2) whether certain officers and deputies came into physical contact with the detainee; (3) whether certain officers and deputies failed to act reasonably when they did not act to prevent or limit other deputies' use of force on the detainee; and (4) whether the alleged failure of certain officers and deputies to put a stop to other deputies' use of force on the detainee was the proximate cause of the detainee's injuries. Shepherd v. Powers, 55 F.Supp.3d 508 (S.D.N.Y. 2014). An inmate at a county jail brought a § 1983 action against a first correction officer, a second correction officer, and a county, asserting excessive force in violation of the Eighth Amendment, malicious prosecution, and denying or interfering with the inmate's religious rights. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court denied the motion. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine dispute of material fact as to whether the force a correction officer at the county jail used in grabbing and squeezing the inmate's testicles was applied maliciously or sadistically to cause harm, in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The court also found fact issues as to whether the correction officer's conduct, including throwing the inmate to the floor, was objectively malicious and sadistic. According to the court, fact issues existed as to whether the county had a custom and practice of using excessive force or failed to adequately train or supervise correction officers in the use of force, precluding summary judgment on the inmate's § 1983 claim against the county. Shreve v. Franklin County, Ohio, 743 F.3d 126 (6th Cir. 2014). A detainee brought an action against a county, its sheriff, and sheriff's deputies, alleging that the deputies used excessive force against him when they subdued him with a stun gun while he was in custody. The district court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment. The detainee appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the sheriff's deputies did not act with deliberate indifference towards the detainee's federally protected rights when they subdued the detainee with a stun gun while he was in custody, and therefore the deputies did not use excessive force against the detainee under the Fourteenth Amendment. According to the court: (1) the deputies tried to handcuff the detainee several times before using the stun gun, showing that they sought to minimize the stun gun's use; (2) the deputies also warned the detainee that the stun gun would hurt and that he did not want to have the gun used on him, which showed that they were trying to avoid unnecessary harm; and (3) the deputies faced an ongoing danger with the detainee thrashing about on the cell floor with a loose handcuff, as the deputies had been trained never to lose control of an inmate with a loose handcuff because it could be used as a weapon. The court held that the incident, in which the detainee lunged towards a sheriff's deputy with his hands raised after a hospital examination, was a rapidly evolving, fluid, and dangerous predicament which precluded the luxury of a calm and reflective pre-response deliberation, and therefore the detainee was required to show that the deputy's actions involved force employed maliciously and sadistically for the very purpose of causing harm, rather than in a good faith effort to maintain or restore discipline, in order to establish the use of excessive force under the Fourteenth Amendment. The court noted that the detainee lunged toward the deputy after asking the deputy "Do you want a piece of me?" and the deputy explained that he had "no way of retreating" because of the cramped quarters and the detainee's position over him while standing on the hospital bed. Sloane v. Borawski, 64 F.Supp.3d 473 (W.D.N.Y. 2014). A state inmate brought a § 1983 action alleging that correction officers used excessive force against him, denied him due process in connection with a disciplinary hearing, and denied him adequate medical treatment after the alleged excessive use of force incident. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that: (1) exclusion of proposed witnesses at a prison disciplinary hearing did not violate the inmate's procedural due process rights where the testimony of three witnesses, who were prison employees, would have been irrelevant to the issues presented in the hearing, and another potential witness, a fellow inmate, refused to testify on the grounds that he did not know anything; (2) the hearing officer was not so partial as to violate the inmate's procedural due process rights; (3) the inmate failed to establish that retaliation was the motivating factor behind filing of an allegedly false misbehavior report; (4)

summary judgment was precluded by a fact issue on the Eighth Amendment excessive force claim as to whether correction officers' use of force against the inmate was unrelated to any effort to maintain order or discipline; but, (5) the inmate's injuries, including a two-and-a-half-inch laceration to the top of his head, a laceration to his left eyebrow, and a chin abrasion, did not rise to the level of a serious medical condition warranting Eighth Amendment protection. Smith v. Conway County, Ark., 759 F.3d 853 (8th Cir. 2014). A pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against two jailers, a county jail administrator, the county, and the sheriff, alleging claims for excessive force and failure to supervise under the Fourteenth Amendment. The district court denied qualified immunity to the administrator and jailers and denied summary judgment to the county and individual defendants. The defendants appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part and dismissed in part. The court held that a nonviolent pretrial detainee's right to be free from being shot with a stun gun for non-compliance was clearly established at the time a jailer used a stun gun on the detainee for the purpose of achieving compliance, and thus, the jailer was not entitled to qualified immunity from the detainee's § 1983 claim of excessive force in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. The court found that at the time a jailer failed to intervene when another jailer warned the pretrial detainee and then shot him with a stun gun, that a jail official violated a pretrial detainee's due process rights if the official knew that another official was using excessive force against the detainee but failed to intervene, and thus the jailer was not entitled to qualified immunity from the detainee's § 1983 claim of excessive force in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. Taylor v. Swift, 21 F.Supp.3d 237 (E.D.N.Y. 2014). A pro se prisoner brought a § 1983 action against city jail officials, alleging that officials failed to protect him from an assault from other inmates, and that officials used excessive force in uncuffing the prisoner after escorting him from showers to his cell. The officials moved to dismiss based on failure to exhaust administrative remedies, and the motion was converted to a motion for summary judgment. The district court denied the motion. The court held that it was objectively reasonable for the prisoner, to conclude that no administrative mechanism existed through which to obtain remedies for the alleged attack, and thus the prisoner was not required under the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA) to exhaust administrative remedies before bringing his claim. The court noted that the jail's grievance policy stated that "allegation of assault…by either staff or inmates" was non-grievable, the policy stated that an inmate complaint "is grievable unless it constitutes assault, harassment or criminal misconduct," the prisoner alleged that officials committed criminal misconduct in acting with deliberate indifference toward him, and although the prisoner did not complain of the assault by officials, the prisoner would not have been required to name a defendant in filing a grievance. According to the court, even if city jail officials would have accepted the prisoner's failure-to-protect grievance, the prisoner's mistake in failing to exhaust administrative procedures was subjectively reasonable. The prisoner claimed indifferent supervision of jail officers, when members of the Crips gang served him and other non-gang members "tiny food portions while serving gang members large food portions." The prisoner complained to officials and this resulted in the Crips gang members being admonished and chided. The day after this chiding, the prisoner alleged that he and two other non-Crips-affiliated inmates "were victims of gang assault where [plaintiff] & [another inmate] got cut & stabbed." According to the inmate, while the attack was occurring, a corrections officer allowed the Crips to act with impunity and waited 20 to 30 minutes to press an alarm, and another officer failed to open a door that would lead the prisoner to safety, and failed to use mace to break up the alleged gang assault. Turner v. Rataczak, 28 F.Supp.3d 818 (W.D.Wis. 2014). An inmate at a correctional facility brought a pro se action under § 1983 against a corrections officer alleging excessive force in violation of the Eighth Amendment's prohibition of cruel and unusual punishment, for injuries sustained when the officer allegedly assaulted the inmate without provocation. The corrections officer moved for summary judgment. The district court denied the motion, finding a fact issue existed as to whether the corrections officer maliciously and sadistically "decentralized" the inmate and punched him in the face in order to cause him harm, rather than to restore discipline. Williams v. Champagne, 13 F.Supp.3d 624 (E.D.La. 2014). A former inmate who was a practicing Rastafarian brought an action against a sheriff and prison officials under § 1983, the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA), and state law arising out of a grooming policy which he contended substantially burdened his Rastafarian religious practices, and an alleged incident of excessive force. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The district court held that summary judgment was precluded by: (1) issues of fact as to whether the grooming policy prohibiting dreadlocks and requiring men's hair to be no more than two inches long was the least restrictive means of serving compelling government interests on the RLUIPA claim; (2) issues of fact as to the incident in which the inmate had complied with orders to leave his cell, whether there was any basis for prison officers to use any force at all to maintain discipline after the prisoner had complied with orders to leave his cell, let alone with force sufficient to rip a dreadlock from his scalp; (3) issues of fact as to whether it was objectively unreasonable for prison officers to pull on the chain connecting the prisoner's handcuffs while he was fully restrained in the "suicide chair," and for one officer to strike the prisoner forcefully in the head after the prisoner spit on him, and, (4) issues of fact on the inmate's assault and battery claims.

The court found that prison officers did not violate the prisoner's Eighth Amendment right to be free of cruel and unusual punishment in the form of excessive force when, in the course of a struggle in a hallway as they were bringing the prisoner to the "suicide chair" cell, his head hit a wall, and the officers picked him up and carried him, since video of the incident unambiguously showed the prisoner resisting multiple officers as he was escorted down the hallway. Barnes v. County of Monroe, 85 F.Supp.3d 696 (W.D.N.Y. 2015). A state inmate brought a § 1983 action against a county, county officials, and correctional officers, alleging that the officers used excessive force against him and that he was subjected to unconstitutional conditions of confinement during his pretrial detention. The defendants moved for judgment on the pleadings. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the former pretrial detainee's allegation that a county correctional officer used excessive force when he responded to a fight between the detainee and fellow inmates, and jumped on the detainee's back, striking him in face and knocking out a tooth, and that the officer was not merely using force to maintain or restore discipline but that the entire incident was "premeditated," stated a § 1983 excessive force claim against officer under the Due Process Clause. According to the court, the former detainee's allegations that county correctional officers used excessive force when they pushed him face-first into a glass window, pushed him to the floor, kicked, stomped on and punched him, and used handcuffs to inflict pain, that as a result of the altercation, the inmate urinated and defecated on himself and experienced dizziness and a concussion, and that the force used on him was in response to his reaching for legal papers and attempting to steady himself, stated a § 1983 excessive force claim against the officers under the Due Process Clause.

The court found that the former detainee's allegations that a county correctional officer who responded to a fight between the detainee and other inmates "collaborated" with fellow officers to delay an emergency call, allowing the detainee to be attacked by inmates, stated a conspiracy claim in violation of his constitutional rights under § 1983.

The court held that the former detainee's allegations that, before being placed in a special housing unit (SHU), he was subjected to a strip search by a county correctional officer, that during the course of the strip search the detainee felt that he was degraded and humiliated, and he subsequently filed grievance against the officer, that later the same day the officer approached the detainee's cell and made sexual comments and gestures, and that other officers filed a false misbehavior report against him in retaliation for the detainee's grievance, stated a § 1983 First Amendment retaliation claim against the officers. The court found that the former detainee's allegations that, after he was released from a special housing unit (SHU), county correctional officers placed him in a poorly ventilated cell where he was exposed to human excrement and bodily fluids over the course of multiple days, and that he was subjected to extreme conditions in the SHU by way of 24-hour lighting by the officers, stated a § 1983 conditions-of-confinement claim against the officers under the Due Process Clause. Barnes v. Wilson, 110 F.Supp.3d 624 (D. Md. 2015). An inmate brought an action against certain county jail officials, alleging that a deputy used excessive force when she slammed a door slot on the inmate's hand. The deputy and a supervisor moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by an issue of material fact as to whether the deputy closed the door on the inmate's hand maliciously or in response to a breach of security by the inmate. Chavarriaga v. New Jersey Dept. of Corrections, 806 F.3d 210 (3d Cir. 2015). A former prisoner brought a § 1983 action in state court against the New Jersey Department of Corrections (NJDOC), the former New Jersey Attorney General, the New Jersey Commissioner of Corrections, a correctional sergeant, and various other correctional officers. The prisoner alleged that the defendants violated her constitutional rights when they transferred her from one place of confinement to another where they denied her potable water, clothing, sanitary napkins, and subjected her to an unlawful body cavity search. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the Attorney General, Commissioner of Corrections, and correctional sergeant, and dismissed the remaining claims. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part and reversed in part and remanded. The appeals court held that allegations that correctional officers forced her to walk down a staircase and hallway naked in plain view of male prison personnel and inmates to reach a shower were sufficiently serious so as to reach the level of Eighth Amendment violation. The court held that the prisoner plausibly alleged that a correctional officer maliciously searched her body cavities, as required to state a claim against the officer for using excessive force in violation of the Eighth Amendment, where the prisoner alleged facts demonstrating that a cavity search was not routine, that the cavity search was conducted in a manner that violated New Jersey regulations, and alleged that the cavity search was so painful that during the search prisoner cracked a molar while clenching her teeth. Coley v. Lucas County, Ohio, 799 F.3d 530 (6th Cir. 2015). The administrator of a pretrial detainee's estate brought a state court action against a county, county sheriff, police officer and police sergeant, alleging § 1983 violations of the detainee's constitutional rights and various state law claims. The district court denied the defendants' motions to dismiss and denied individual defendants' requests for qualified immunity. The defendants appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that a police officer's act of shoving a fully restrained pretrial detainee in a jail booking area, causing the detainee to strike his head on the wall as he fell to the cement floor without any way to break his fall, constituted "gratuitous force" in violation of the detainee's Fourteenth Amendment right to be free from excessive force. The court noted that the detainee's state of being handcuffed, in a belly chain and leg irons, led to a reasonable inference that the officer's actions were a result of his frustration with the detainee's prior restraint behavior, since the detainee was not in any condition to cause a disruption that would have provoked the officer to use such force. The court held that the police officer was on notice that his actions were unconstitutional, and therefore he was not entitled to qualified immunity from liability under § 1983. According to the court, the officer's attempts to cover up the assault by filing false reports and lying to federal investigators following the death of the detainee led to a reasonable conclusion that the officer understood that his actions violated the detainees' clearly established right not to be gratuitously assaulted while fully restrained and subdued. The court held that a police sergeant's continued use of a chokehold on the unresisting, fully-shackled pre-trial detainee, after hearing the detainee choke and gurgle, and when a fellow officer was urging him release his chokehold, was objectively unreasonable, in violation of the detainee's Fourteenth Amendment right to be free from excessive force. The court noted that the sergeant's subsequent acts of telling other officers to leave the medical cell after the detainee was rendered unconscious, failing to seek medical help, and refusing to mention the use of a chokehold in incident reports, led to the inference the that sergeant was aware he violated the law and sought to avoid liability. According to the court, the police sergeant was on notice that his actions were unconstitutional, and therefore, he was not entitled to qualified immunity under § 1983.

The court found that the county sheriff could be held personally liable under § 1983, based on his failure to train and supervise employees in the use of excessive force, the use of a chokehold and injuries derived therefrom, and to ensure that the medical needs of persons in the sheriff's custody were met. According to the court, evidence that the sheriff helped his employees cover up their unconstitutional actions by making false statements to federal officials about his knowledge of his employees' assault, chokehold, and deliberate failure to provide medical attention to the detainee demonstrated that the sheriff at least implicitly authorized, approved or knowingly acquiesced in the unconstitutional conduct of the offending employees. The court noted that under Ohio law, allegations by the estate of the pretrial detainee that the county sheriff had full knowledge of the assault but intentionally and deliberately made false statements to federal officials were sufficient to state a claim that the sheriff ratified the conduct of his officers and, thus, was potentially personally liable for his officers' actions. The court concluded that the officers' use of excessive force, failure to provide medical care, assault and battery, and wrongful death could be imputed to the sheriff in his official capacity since the sheriff's false statements to federal investigators were a position that was inconsistent to non-affirmance of the officers' actions. Davis v. Wessel, 792 F.3d 793 (7th Cir. 2015). A civil detainee brought a pro se action under § 1983 against security guards employed at civil detention facility for sexually violent persons, operated by the Illinois Department of Human Services. The detainee alleged violation of his rights under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The district court entered judgment on a jury verdict in favor of the detainee and the security guards appealed. The appeals court vacated and remanded. The court held that the issue of whether security guards employed at the civil detention facility refused to remove the detainee's handcuffs with the intent of humiliating him, by preventing him from using the restroom and forcing him to urinate on himself, was for a jury to decide. The court found that the security guards were not entitled to qualified immunity from the claim by the detainee under § 1983 alleging excessive use of restraints in violation of the Due Process Clause after the guards refused to remove the detainee's handcuffs because it was clearly established at the time the detainee requested to use the restroom, which had no windows, that keeping the handcuffs on was not rationally related to a legitimate non-punitive purpose absent an indication that the detainee was a security risk. Dimanche v. Brown, 783 F.3d 1204 (11th Cir. 2015). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against prison officials, alleging he was subjected to harsh treatment in retaliation for filing grievances about prison conditions and asserting claims for cruel and unusual punishment, due process violations, and First Amendment retaliation. The district court dismissed the case for failure to exhaust administrative remedies and failure to state a claim pursuant to the in forma pauperis statute. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The court held that the grievance sent by the state prisoner directly to the Secretary of the Florida Department of Corrections (FDOC) met the conditions for bypassing the informal and formal grievance steps at the institutional level under Florida law, and thus the prisoner satisfied the Prison Litigation Reform Act's (PLRA) exhaustion requirement with respect to his § 1983 claims alleging cruel and unusual punishment, due process violations, and First Amendment retaliation. The court noted that the prisoner clearly stated at the beginning of the grievance form that he was filing a grievance of reprisal, indicating he feared for his life and that he was "gassed in confinement for grievances [he] wrote," and clearly stated the reason for bypassing the informal and formal grievance steps, namely, his fear that he would be killed if he filed additional grievances at the institutional level, and alleged participation by high-ranking prison officials. The court found that the prisoner stated claims against prison officials for First Amendment retaliation and cruel and unusual punishment by alleging that prison guards and officials sprayed him with tear gas without provocation, denied him prompt medical care, filed false disciplinary reports, and threatened further retaliation, all in retaliation for filing grievances. Ewing v. Cumberland County, 152 F.Supp.3d 269 (D. N.J. 2015). A former arrestee brought a § 1983 action, bringing claims against county correctional officers, police officers, and a number of municipal entities for use of excessive force and other constitutional violations. The defendants filed nine motions for summary judgment. The district court held that (1) issues of fact existed as to whether the force used on detainee was imposed maliciously and sadistically to cause harm; (2) issues of fact existed as to whether two officers who were not in the room when excessive force was allegedly used on the pre-trial detainee knew of and failed to intervene in the assault; (3) issues of fact existed as to whether five correctional officers conspired to cover up their actions; (4) issues of fact existed as to whether the police officer who had taken the detainee back to the jail after a trip to the hospital had reason to believe that the detainee's safety was in jeopardy when the officer left the jail, and (5) genuine issues of material fact existed as to whether the county trained its correctional officers on the use of force, whether the other trainings that took place were inadequate and untimely, whether that failure to train amounted to deliberate indifference, and whether there was a causal link between that lack of training and the injuries the detainee sustained at the hands of correction officers, precluding summary judgment for the defendants in the failure to train claim. According to the court, the detainee, while unarmed, suffered life-threatening injuries while in an isolated room with five officers, and that none of the officers were injured, indicated that the officers used force beyond what was necessary to take down the detainee, in a manner intended to inflict pain. The court noted that it was clearly established, at the time of the incident, that prisoners were protected from excessive force and wanton beatings that exceed good-faith efforts to maintain discipline and order, and a reasonable officer would have known that the force used was excessive. PEPPER SPRAY

Hughes v. Judd, 108 F.Supp.3d 1167 (M.D. Fla. 2015). Several juveniles, as representatives of other juveniles similarly situated, brought a § 1983 action asserting that the sheriff of a Florida county and the health care provider retained by the sheriff violated the juveniles' rights under the Fourteenth Amendment during the juveniles' detention at the county jail. The district court held that the plaintiffs failed to prove that either the sheriff or the health care provider was deliberately indifferent to any substantial risk of serious harm during the juveniles' detention, or that their policies or customs effected any other constitutional violation. According to the court, at most, the juveniles showed only that two persons, each of whom was qualified to testify as an expert, disfavored some of the sheriff's past or present managerial policies and practices and advocated the adoption of others they felt were superior for one reason or another. The court found that the use of pepper spray against the juvenile detainees at the county jail did not violate the Eighth Amendment, where pepper spray was effective for quickly stopping a fight without inflicting injury, nearly every use of pepper spray at that jail was to stop a fight, and there was no evidence that the pepper spray had lasting, negative effect. Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S.Ct. 2466 (2015). A pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against county jail officers, alleging, among other things, that they used excessive force against him in violation of his Fourteenth Amendment rights. The district court entered an order denying the officers' motion for summary judgment on the detainee's excessive force claim, and subsequently entered judgment on a jury verdict in the officers' favor. The detainee appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The U.S. Supreme Court vacated and remanded, finding that the detainee was required to show only that the force used was objectively unreasonable, and that jury instructions improperly added a subjective standard for determining excessiveness. Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 801 F.3d 828 (7th Cir. 2015). A pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against county jail officers, alleging that they used excessive force against him in violation of his Fourteenth Amendment rights. The district court entered an order denying the officers' motion for summary judgment on the detainee's excessive force claim, and subsequently entered judgment on a jury verdict in the officers' favor. The detainee appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The U.S. Supreme Court vacated and remanded. On remand, the appeals court reversed and remanded for a new trial. The appeals court held that the district court's error of instructing the jury that the detainee was required to establish the subjective intent of the officers was not a harmless error, and thus a new trial was warranted, since jurors might have decided that, although the officers had acted in an objectively unreasonable manner, they did not have the subjective intent required by the erroneous instruction. According to the court, a reasonable officer would have been on notice that the detainee was not resisting officers in a manner that justified slamming his head into a wall and using a stun gun while he was manacled, and thus the alleged use of a stun gun on the non-resisting detainee, lying prone and handcuffed behind his back, violated the detainee's clearly established right to be free from excessive force in violation of his Fourteenth Amendment rights. PEPPER SPRAY

Kitchen v. Ickes, 116 F.Supp.3d 613 (D. Md. 2015). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against a corrections officer and a prison health care provider, alleging excessive force in the officer's use of pepper spray and deliberate indifference to a serious medical need. The officer and the provider moved to dismiss, or, in the alternative, for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The court held that the inmate exhausted his available administrative remedies as to his claim that the corrections officer used excessive force in spraying him with pepper spray, as required to file suit against the officer, under the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA). The court noted that the inmate filed a request for an administrative remedy on the issue of alleged use of excessive force, appealed the decision rendered concerning his claim of excessive force, and subsequently filed a grievance with the inmate grievance office regarding the officer's use of pepper spray. But the court held that the officer's use of pepper spray on the inmate was not excessive so as to violate the Eighth Amendment, where officer responded to a fight between the inmate and his cellmate, the officer ordered the inmate to release the cellmate from his grip, after the inmate refused, the officer sprayed the inmate and the cellmate in the head with pepper spray, he subsequently sprayed the inmate in the upper torso after the inmate and the cellmate disobeyed repeated orders to stop fighting, the use of pepper spray ceased immediately after the fighting ceased, and the inmate was immediately removed from the cell and was provided a change of clothes and a shower to mitigate the effect of the chemical agents. McBride v. Lopez, 791 F.3d 1115 (9th Cir. 2015). After a prison's appeals coordinator dismissed a prisoner's administrative grievance as untimely, the prisoner brought an action against prison guards under § 1983 claiming violation of the Eighth Amendment by use of excessive force against him, under the provisions of the Prison Litigation Reform Act ("PLRA"). The district court granted the guards' motion to dismiss and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court noted that a two-part test for determining whether a threat to a prisoner rendered the prison grievance system unavailable had been developed by the 11th Circuit, requiring the prisoner to provide a basis for the court to find that he actually believed prison officials would retaliate against him if he filed a grievance, and if he makes such a showing, he must then demonstrate that his belief was objectively reasonable. The court found that the prisoner subjectively believed that the guards' statements were a threat, where the prisoner had recently been beaten by the guards that made the statement, and the prisoner could have believed the guards bore him considerable hostility and therefore the statement could have been interpreted as threatening. But the court found that the statement could not have reasonably been objectively viewed as a threat of retaliation if the prisoner filed a grievance against the guards, where there was no allegation or evidence that the guards believed the prisoner was contemplating filing a grievance, and the prisoner had not asked for the materials necessary to file a grievance or had given any indication he intended to file a grievance. McBride v. Lopez, 807 F.3d 982 (9th Cir. 2015). After a prison's appeals coordinator dismissed a prisoner's administrative grievance as untimely, the prisoner brought an action against prison guards under § 1983 claiming violation of the Eighth Amendment by use of excessive force against him. The district court granted the guards' motion to dismiss. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that: (1) the threat of retaliation for reporting an incident can render the prison grievance process effectively unavailable and thereby excuse a prisoner's failure to exhaust administrative remedies before filing a court action; (2) the prisoner subjectively perceived prison guards' statement to be a threat not to use the prison grievance system; and (3) prison guards' statement could not have reasonable been objectively viewed as a threat of retaliation if the prisoner filed a grievance against the guards. The guards had stated that he was "lucky," in that the injuries he sustained during an altercation between the prisoner and guards "could have been much worse" than they were, to be a threat not to use the prison grievance system. The court noted that the prisoner had recently been beaten by the guards that made the statement, and the prisoner could have believed the guards bore him considerable hostility and therefore the statement could have been interpreted as threatening. (Pleasant Valley State Prison, California)

Nagy v. Corrections Corporation of America, 79 F.Supp.3d 114 (D.D.C. 2015). A female detainee brought an action in the District of Columbia Superior Court against the operator of a correctional facility, alleging negligence, negligent supervision, negligent infliction of emotional distress, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The operator moved the action to federal court and moved for summary judgment. The district court denied the motion, finding that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to: (1) whether the operator caused the detainee's injuries stemming from a second alleged assault by failing to follow up on the first alleged assault by guards at the correctional facility; (2) whether the detainee was injured by outrageous behavior of the guards; (3) whether the guards negligently handled the detainee, and (4) whether this negligence physically injured the detainee. The detainee alleged that she was abused almost immediately upon arrival at the facility, when two correctional officers grabbed her by the arms, took her to a locked cell, and threw her against the commode. She alleged that she landed sideways on her back, and that the officers kicked her on her right side, broke her ribs, and bruised her body. She reported the incident to corrections officials. Six days later, she was once again allegedly assaulted "by staff and officers." She showed her injuries to a doctor who observed bruises on her buttocks and hips "of varying stages, none that appeared newer than 2–3 days old with some yellowing and fading." (Corr. Pena v. Greffet, 108 F.Supp.3d 1030 (D.N.M. 2015). A former inmate at a privately operated correctional facility brought a civil rights action against a correctional officer, among others, asserting a claim under § 1983 for violation of her Eighth Amendment rights and asserting a claim for battery under state law. The officer moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the inmate failed to state a claim for excessive force under the Eighth Amendment, but sufficiently stated a claim for battery under New Mexico law. According to the court, the inmate's allegations that a privately employed correctional officer pursued the inmate down a hallway after she refused to answer a question, grabbed her from behind, and slammed her against a wall, were insufficient to allege that the officer acted maliciously and sadistically to cause harm, as required to state a claim for excessive force under the Eighth Amendment, since the allegations were just as much in line with the officer's legitimate pursuit of penological goals as they were with his desire to harm or humiliate the inmate. Perry v. Dickhaut, 125 F.Supp.3d 285 (D. Mass. 2015). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against prison officials and a prison nurse, asserting Eighth Amendment claims for excessive force in attempting to double-bunk the prisoner. The district court granted the motions in part and denied in part. The court held that prison officials did not act with deliberate indifference to the risk of serious harm from prisoner violence, as would violate the Eighth Amendment, by repeatedly double-bunking the prisoner in a cell with another prisoner. According to the court, there was no evidence that the officials knew or should have known that the prisoner and his cellmates were enemies, and making an exception to the double-bunk system for one inmate simply because he was purposefully disruptive would pose substantial risks for the overall management of prison. Peters v. Risdal, 786 F.3d 1095 (8th Cir. 2015). A pretrial detainee filed a § 1983 action against a county, county sheriff, and jail officers alleging that she was subjected to an unreasonable search, that her right to freedom of speech was violated, and that the officers used excessive force. The district court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment on the unreasonable search claim, and after a jury verdict, in the officers' favor on the remaining claims, and denied the detainee's motion for a new trial. The detainee appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the officers did not violate the detainee's Fourth Amendment rights when they forcibly removed her clothing in a holding cell. According to the court, it was objectively reasonable for county jail officers to believe that the pretrial detainee presented a risk of harm to herself if she was permitted to retain strings on her clothing, and thus the officers did not violate her Fourth Amendment rights when they forcibly removed her clothing in a holding cell. The court noted that the detainee refused to respond to medical screening questions, refused to comply with a female officer's instruction to change into an orange jumpsuit while male officers were outside the holding cell, and acted aggressively toward the male officers when they entered. The officers restrained the detainee face down on her stomach and covered her with a paper suit while the female officer removed her clothing. (Woodbury County Jail, Iowa)

Senalan v. Curran, 78 F.Supp.3d 905 (N.D. Ill. 2015). A pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against corrections officers at a county jail, the sheriff, and the sheriff's office, alleging unlawful detention and excessive force, as well as conspiracy. The defendants moved to dismiss for failure to state a claim. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the detainee's allegations were sufficient to plead excessive force and were sufficient to state a conspiracy claim. The court found that the detainee's allegations that he was pushed, pepper sprayed, stunned, beaten, and subdued in his cell by correctional officers, that he was naked and prone on the floor of a booking cell when four officers jumped on him and violently restrained him, and that he was not threatening or resisting, were sufficient to plead excessive force, as required for the detainee's § 1983 claim against the officers. According to the court, the detainee's allegations that correctional officers used excessive force against him, and that the officers communicated with each other prior to engaging in their use of force, were sufficient to state a § 1983 claim against the officers for conspiracy to deprive him of his constitutional rights. Shorter v. Baca, 101 F.Supp.3d 876 (C.D. Cal. 2015). A pretrial detainee brought an action against a county, sheriff, and deputies, alleging under § 1983 that the defendants denied her medical care, subjected her to unsanitary living conditions, deprived her of food, clean clothes, and access to exercise, and conducted overly invasive searches. The detainee had been classified as mentally ill and housed in a mental health unit at the detention facility. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to what policies governed classification of pretrial detainees who were mentally ill. The court also found fact issues as to whether the county sheriff's deputies' manner of conducting a visual body cavity search of the female pretrial detainee on three occasions exhibited exaggerated and excessive force, and was vindictive or harassing, precluding summary judgment on the detainee's § 1983 Fourth Amendment unlawful search claim against the deputies. Shuford v. Conway, 86 F.Supp.3d 1344 (N.D.Ga. 2015). Pretrial detainees brought a § 1983 action against a sheriff and other county jail officials and employees, alleging excessive force in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion, finding that the jail employees did not apply force maliciously and sadistically against any detainee. According to the court, in shooting the pretrial detainee with a non-lethal chemical agent projectile, taking him to the floor, and placing him in restraint chair, the employees did not apply force maliciously and sadistically. The court noted that the detainee had hit a wall and metal partition, creating a risk of self-harm, the restraints reduced or eliminated the detainee's ability to inflict harm against himself, and the detainee did not suffer serious or permanent injuries. Smith v. Eovaldi, 112 F.Supp.3d 779 (S.D. Ill. 2015). A state inmate, proceeding in forma pauperis, brought a § 1983 action against several prison officers, alleging use of excessive force and exposure to inhumane conditions in his cell. The prisoner alleged that after he had a "negative outburst" and was "maced" by a lieutenant and removed from his cell by a corrections officer, he was taken to an infirmary bullpen, where he was forced to lie on the floor. While he was on the floor, the prisoner alleged that officers kicked and punched him for ten minutes, causing him to defecate upon himself. He alleged that after the incident, he was stripped of his prison clothes and "inadequately seen" by "medical" personnel. At the screening stage of the case, the district court dismissed the complaint in part against some defendants, but declined to dismiss with regard to the others. The court held that the inmate sufficiently alleged § 1983 claims against several prison officers for use of excessive force by alleging that the officers engaged in prolonged attacks against him and that one officer subsequently attacked him again. The court allowed the prisoner's claims against several prison officers regarding conditions of his confinement to proceed. The prisoner alleged that two officers did not feed him for several days after the alleged attack against him, that two other officers did not allow the inmate to shower or otherwise clean off fecal matter for several months, and that two other officers denied him hygiene products and warm clothing during winter months. Taylor v. United States, 103 F.Supp.3d 87 (D.D.C. 2015). A detainee brought an action under the Federal Tort Claims Act (FTCA), alleging she suffered intentional infliction of emotional distress, assault, and battery while in the custody of the United States Marshals Service. After a bench trial, the district court held that evidence did not support the detainee's intentional infliction of emotional distress claim, and that the officer's use of force against the detainee was protected by law enforcement privilege. The detainee alleged that a detention enforcement officer's use of a leg sweep on her, which caused her to fall and sustain facial injuries, caused intentional infliction of emotional distress. According to the court, the officer's conduct was not extreme and outrageous since the leg sweep maneuver is a standard non-lethal technique that was appropriate in the situation, and the detainee provided no documentation relating to any psychiatric evaluation or counseling for the alleged emotional distress. The court found that the officer's use of the leg sweep maneuver was privileged, and thus could not support her claim of battery against the officer, where the detainee could have posed a legitimate threat to the officer, and the officer responded to the detainee's refusal to obey commands by using a standard non-lethal technique. A state inmate filed a § 1983 action alleging that county correctional officers unlawfully used excessive force in the course of handcuffing him after he disobeyed an order. The district court entered summary judgment in the officers' favor and inmate the appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded, finding that the inmate was not barred by the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA) from bringing the action. The court noted that the inmate did not have an available administrative remedy, where the inmate did not have access to an inmate handbook that set forth the proper grievance procedure, the officer informed the inmate that he could not file a grievance, the handbook only permitted inmates to dispute alleged violations, and the inmate was not contesting his discipline, but rather was challenging the officers' conduct that occurred after his offenses. The inmate alleged that members of the cell extraction team beat him repeatedly in the head and face with batons, punches, and kicks, and that a sergeant "kicked and stomped" on him. The district court denied the officers' motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity and the officers appealed. Vincent v. Sitnewski, 117 F.Supp.3d 329 (S.D.N.Y. 2015). A New York inmate brought a § 1983 action against prison officers, alleging claims for First Amendment retaliation and failure to protect under the Eighth Amendment. The officers moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the alleged sexual groping by a prison officer would have deterred a person of "ordinary firmness" from exercising his constitutional rights, and as to whether the officer who allegedly groped the inmate was motivated by retaliatory purpose. The court found that the inmate's allegations that prison officers handcuffed him to a bedpost for 18 hours, purportedly as payback for filing grievances, even if improbable, were neither fanciful, fantastic, nor delusional, precluding summary judgment on the ground of factual frivolousness on the inmate's § 1983 claim for First Amendment retaliation arising from such conduct. The court noted that the inmate did not contradict himself and his allegations were quite serious, as they showed officers using their power to threaten and dehumanize an inmate they were supposed to protect. The inmate moved for sanctions for alleged spoliation of evidence. The district court granted the motion. The court held that: (1) officers at one point possessed and had the ability to preserve original photographs of the inmate's injuries and the original videotape of his cell extraction; (2) officers were at least negligent with respect to the destruction or loss of both the original photographs and the videotape; and (3) differences between the originals and the copies were sufficient to permit a reasonable trier of fact to conclude that the originals would support inmate's claims. MEDIA

Pell v. Procunier, 417 U.S. 817 (1974). Pell, a journalist, together with two other journalists and four California State Prison inmates, sought injunctive and declaratory relief in a 42 U.S.C. Section 1983 action challenging a California Department of Corrections rule promulgated by Procunier, Director of the Department. The rule provided that press and other media interviews with specific individual inmates would not be permitted. The U.S. District Court for the Southern Division of California granted the requested relief, holding that the rule unconstitutionally infringed their first and fourteenth amendment freedoms. The court dismissed the journalists' claims on the ground that other sources of information were available to them. The prison officials and journalists appealed directly to the U.S. Supreme Court.

HELD: "[S]ince [the rule prohibiting media interviews with specific individual inmates] does not deny the press access to sources of information available to members of the general public, we hold that it does not abridge the protection that the first and fourteenth amendments guarantee." 417 U.S. at 835.

REASONING: a. "[L]awful incarceration brings about the necessary withdrawal or limitation of many privileges and rights, a retraction justified by the considerations underlying our penal system [Cite omitted]." 417 U.S. at 822.

b. "[A] prison inmate retains those first amendment rights that are not inconsistent with his status as a prisoner or with the legitimate penological objectives of the corrective system. Thus, challenges to prison restrictions that are asserted to inhibit first amendment interests must be analyzed in terms of the legitimate policies and goals of the corrections system, to whose custody and care the prisoner has been committed in accordance with due process of law." 417 U.S. at 822.

c. "It is in light of these legitimate penal objectives [deterrence, rehabilitation, and security] that a court must assess challenges to prison regulations based on asserted constitutional rights of prisoners." 417 U.S. at 823.

d. "When the question involves the entry of people into the prisons for face-to-face communication with inmates, it is obvious that institutional considerations such as security and related administrative problems, as well as the accepted and legitimate policy objectives of the corrections system itself, require that some limitation be placed on such visitations." 417 U.S. at 826.

e. "In the judgment of the state corrections officials, this visitation policy will permit inmates to have personal contact with those persons who will aid in their rehabilitation, while keeping visitations at a manageable level that will not compromise institutional security. Such considerations are peculiarly within the province and professional expertise of corrections officials and, in the absence of substantial evidence in the record to indicate that the officials have exaggerated their response to these considerations, courts should ordinarily defer to their expert judgment." 417 U.S. at 827.

f. "[W]hen the issue involves a regulation limiting one of several means of communication by an inmate, the institutional objectives furthered by that regulation, and the measure of judicial deference owed to corrections officials in their attempt to serve those interests are relevant in judging the validity of the regulation." 417 U.S. at 827.

g. "[N]ewsmen have no constitutional right of access to prisons or their inmates beyond that afforded the general public." 417 U.S. at 834.

h. "The right to speak and publish does not carry with it the unrestrained right to gather information." 417 U.S. at 834 at 9, Citing Zemel v. Rusk, 381 U.S. AT 16-17.

NOTE: Important to the Court's holding that the rule did not violate the inmates' rights was its finding that adequate alternatives (mail and visitation) existed to provide inmates with access to the outside world. (Department of Corrections, California)

SCHEDULING

Souza v. Travisono, 498 F.2d 1120 (1st Cir. 1974). The right of an inmate to see his attorney or his attorney's agent is subject to a reasonable spectrum of prison controls that can range from the primary need of maintaining security and discipline to the maintenance of such housekeeping rules as lunch schedules (banning of visits during meals is upheld). A prisoner has a right to consult with his attorney's agent. The right to select a paralegal assistant to meet and confer with the inmate rests with the attorney. U.S. Supreme Court
CONTACT VISITS

Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. 520 (1979). Pretrial detainees confined in the Metropolitan Correction Center (MCC) in New York City challenged virtually every facet of the institution's conditions and practices in a writ of habeas corpus, alleging such conditions and practices violate their constitutional rights.

MCC is a federally operated, short-term detention facility constructed in 1975. Eighty-five percent of all inmates are released within sixty days of admission. MCC was intended to include the most advanced and innovative features of modern design in detention facilities. The key design element of the facility is the "modular" or "unit" concept, whereby each floor housing inmates has one or two self-contained residential units, as opposed to the traditional cellblock jail construction. Within four months of the opening of the twelve-story, 450 inmate capacity facility, this action was initiated.

The U.S. District Court for the Southern District of N.Y. enjoined no less than twenty practices at the MCC on constitutional and statutory grounds, many of which were not appealed. See, United States Ex Rel Wolfish v. Levi, 439 F.Supp. 114 (S.D.N.Y.). The Second Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed the district court decision, See, Wolfish v. Levi, 573 F.2d 118 (2d Cir. 1978), and reasserted the "compelling-necessity" test as the standard for determining limitations on a detainee's freedom.

The U.S. Supreme Court granted certiorari "to consider the important constitutional questions raised by [recent prison decisions] and to resolve an apparent conflict among the circuits." 441 U.S. at 524: Do the publisher-only rule, the prohibition on receiving packages from outside sources, the search of living quarters, and the visual inspection of body cavities after contact visits constitute punishment in violation of the rights of pretrial detainees under the due process clause of the fifth amendment?

HELD: "Nor do we think that the four MCC security restrictions and practices...constitute 'punishment' in violation of the rights of pretrial detainees under the due process clause of the fifth amendment." 441 U.S. at 560, 561.

REASONING: a. [T]he determination whether these restrictions and practices constitute punishment in the constitutional sense depends on whether they are rationally related to a legitimate nonpunitive governmental purpose and whether they appear excessive in relation to that purpose. 441 U.S. at 561.

b. Ensuring security and order at the institution is a permissible nonpunitive objective, whether the facility houses pretrial detainees, convicted inmates, or both...[W]e think that these particular restrictions and practices were reasonable responses by MCC officials to legitimate security concerns. [Detainees] simply have not met their heavy burden of showing that these officials have exaggerated their response to the genuine security considerations that activated these restrictions and practices. 441 U.S. at 561, 662.

CLOSING COMMENTS OF MAJORITY OPINION: "[T]he inquiry of federal courts into prison management must be limited to the issue of whether a particular system violates any prohibition of the constitution, or in the case of a federal prison, a statute. The wide range of 'judgment calls' that meet constitutional and statutory requirements are confided to officials outside of the judicial branch of government." 441 U.S. at 562.

GENERAL NOTES: The Court saw this case, a challenge to virtually every aspect of the operation of a state of the art detention facility, as an opportunity to clarify the judiciary's role in the operation of prisons. The five-four decision indicates there was no general consensus as to what that role is, or how it should be applied. No less than three possible standards of review are contained in the majority and dissenting opinions: 1) A "rational basis", subjective test; 2) A balancing of interests test; 3) An objective standard of review.

Despite J. Rehnquist's statement that "our analysis does not turn on the particulars of the MCC concept or design," the majority's reasoning frequently looks to that concept or design for justification of its positions. 441 U.S. at 525. Clearly, the "double-bunking" holding should be interpreted as applicable only to facilities where:

a) Inmates are locked in their cells a maximum of eight hrs. a day and have access to a wide range of activities and programs; and

b) No inmate is detained longer than sixty days.

Situations other than these likely will not fall within the strict holding on this issue. (Metropolitan Correction Center (MCC), New York)

Cooper v. Morin, 424 N.Y.2d 168 (1979), cert. denied, 100 S.Ct 2965 (1979). The New York State Court of Appeals has ruled that state due process laws do allow for contact visitation rights for pretrial detainees when the government's only argument against such visitation centers on additional administrative costs. The court ruled that, although federal constitutional requirements would not dictate such a finding in light of the Bell v. Wolfish decision, state due process requirements called for an opposite finding. The court examined carefully the rationale that was the basis for the Supreme Court decision in the Bell case and made it clear that, at least in part, they felt the Supreme Court had erred:

> While we are in agreement with the Supreme Court's holding in Bell v. Wolfish that due process forbids the punishment of pretrial detainees because punishment can only be imposed after conviction, we cannot agree that the validity of the regimen imposed upon such persons during detention turns no more than whether a regulation has a legitimate purpose other than punishment and is not excessive in relation to that purpose. So one-sided a concept of due process we regard as unacceptable. In our view what is required is a balancing of the harm to the individual resulting from the condition imposed against the benefit sought by the government through its enforcement.

In a dissenting opinion, two judges took the position that to find that state due process requirements were different from federal requirements was impossible, since the wording in the respective clauses is identical. Therefore, they claimed, the Bell case and its holding must dictate the state court's decision. (Monroe County Jail, New York)

Wool v. Hogan, 505 F.Supp. 928 (D. Vt. 1981). The United States District Court for Vermont dismissed Kirk Wool's 42 U.S.C. Section 1983 suit against the correctional facility. Wool had alleged that prison officials had interfered with his right to marriage and family relationships by requiring his visitors to submit to strip searches. The case arose after Wool began receiving weekly contact visits from his girlfriend and their infant daughter. Three months after these visits began, prison officials began requiring the girlfriend and the infant to submit to strip searches prior to contact visits with Wool. On a visit a few months later, the woman refused to be strip searched, and the two were denied visitation privileges. Wool's relationship with the two eventually deteriorated, and he subsequently filed suit claiming that the strip search policy had discouraged their visits. He also alleged that the officials' denial of his earlier request to marry had violated his fundamental rights under the fourteenth amendment.

In reviewing Wool's complaints, the district court noted that prison administrators are accorded wide ranging authority in the execution of policies that are needed to preserve internal order, discipline and security. The court then held that penal officials have an interest in restricting the flow of contraband into an institution, and that strip searching visitors suspected of carrying such contraband was not an exaggerated response. The court reasoned that the maintenance of a family relationship requires communication, compassion, and constancy, and the strip search policy did not hinder such goals. The court also rejected Wool's claim that the strip searches "chilled" his first amendment right of association. The court stated that while it is clear that free members of society have the right of physical association, such a right is significantly curtailed by a criminal conviction. The court then found that prison security justified any "chilling" effect on Wool's first amendment rights. In dealing with Wool's request to marry, the court determined that the fundamental nature of the right to marry arises from an individual's interest in being free from governmental interference in making important personal decisions. The court noted, however, that states have traditionally had a significant interest in the marriage relationship. In this regard the court ruled that Vermont prison officials had a specific interest in Wool's rehabilitation and concluded that the officials acted reasonably in denying his marriage request in light of those interests. not deny cousins of inmates from attending special family event programs, where others, such as common-law wives, and nieces and nephews were allowed visitation rights. The defendant officials argued that depriving cousins of visitation privileges is within the authority of the commissioner, that his directive had the force of law and that there was no constitutional deprivation or statutory violation. The court found the exclusion of cousins while allowing visitation rights to common-law wives, and nephews and nieces to be inconsistent and directed the commissioner to revise the directive to include cousins. The suit was brought after officials refused to allow a volunteer in a Bible study program to visit one of the inmates with whom she became friends. A facility policy preventing all prison volunteers from visiting inmates was found to be without justification by a federal district court in Wisconsin. The court ruled that the regulation was an "exaggerated response" to any legitimate need to maintain the effectiveness of the volunteer program. Officials tried to justify the rule on the basis that a professional distance needed to be created between the inmates and the prison workers to avoid overly friendly relationships which would undermine the volunteer program. They claimed that a volunteer was more effective in rehabilitating a prisoner if he or she did not become personally involved with that prisoner. In a case filed by the Rhode Island Defense Attorneys' Association, the court found that existing procedures did not violate any constitutional rights. Attorneys are required to pass through a metal detector. If the device is activated, they are asked to remove metal items and to pass through again. A pat-down search is used only as a last resort.

Briefcases are inspected only for the purpose of discovering weapons or other lethal objects. Finally, the facility refuses to allow briefcases in the cell area, but permits attorneys to take files and papers into the cell block.

The court supported these practices, stating that "It is our opinion that these procedures, in light of the potential dangers confronting the state, are reasonable." (Rhode Island Department of Corrections)

A class action suit was filed against the Los Angeles County central jail by pretrial detainees. The Federal District Court ordered twelve changes after a trial; three of the changes were appealed by county officials.

U.S. Supreme Court
CONTACT VISITS
PRETRIAL DETAINEES

Block v. Rutherford, 104 S.Ct. 3227 (1984). U.S. Supreme Court reverses lower court rulings. Pretrial detainees in Los Angeles Central Jail will not have contact visits and will not be allowed to be present when cells are searched.

Pretrial detainees at the Los Angeles County Central Jail brought a class action in federal district court in 1975 against the county sheriff and other officials, challenging the jail's policy of denying pretrial detainees contact visits with their spouses, relatives, children and friends, and the jail's practice of conducting random, irregular "shakedown" searches of cells while the detainees were away at meals, recreation, or other activities. The district court concluded that the danger of permitting lower security risk inmates to have contact visits was not great enough to warrant deprivation of such contact and, with regard to cell searches, that allowing inmates to watch from a distance while their cells are searched would allay inmate concerns that their personal property would be unnecessarily confiscated or destroyed.

In a six to three decision, the Supreme Court relied upon its previous ruling in Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. 520, to uphold practices at the Los Angeles County Central Jail. Writing for the majority, Chief Justice Burger stated that " ...The principles articulated in Wolfish govern resolution of this case....We affirm that, 'proper deference to the informed discretion of prison authorities demands that they, and not the courts, make the difficult judgments which reconcile conflicting claims affecting the security of the institution, the welfare of the prison staff, and the property rights of the detainees.' 441 U.S. at 557. Accordingly, the judgment of the Court of Appeals is reversed."

Contact Visits. The Supreme Court based its decision on a narrow question: is the prohibition of contact visits reasonably related to legitimate governmental objectives? Finding, as in Wolfish, that there is no basis to conclude that pretrial detainees pose any less security risk than convicted inmates, the court noted that detainees may in fact present a greater risk to jail security. The district court had ordered: "Commencing not more than ninety days following the date of this order, the defendants will make available a contact visit once each week to each pretrial detainee that has been held in the jail for one month or more, and concerning whom there is no indication of drug or escape propensities; provided, however, that no more than fifteen hundred such visits need be allowed in any one week. App. to Pet. for Cert. 38.

The majority of the court held that the burden of identifying candidates for contact visits is made even more difficult by the brevity of detention. The majority criticized the district court for not ending its inquiry after the County had established reasons for denying them; the "balancing" that the district court attempted in its decision, "resulted in an impermissible substitution of its view on the proper administration of Central Jail for that of the experienced administrators of the facility," according to the majority opinion. The opinion concluded, on this issue, by stating: "In rejecting the district court's order, we do not in any sense denigrate the importance of visits from family or friends to the detainee. Nor do we intend to suggest that contact visits might not be a factor contributing to the ultimate reintegration of the detainee into society. We hold only that the Constitution does not require that detainees be allowed contact visits when responsible, experienced administrators have determined, in their sound discretion, that such visits will jeopardize the security of the facility."

In a separate concurring opinion, Justice Blackmun challenged the reasoning of the majority, stating that when a detainee attempts to demonstrate the punitive intent of a policy he is necessarily calling into question the good faith of the prison administrators: "Under those circumstances, it seems to me to be somewhat perverse to insist that a court assessing the rationality of a particular administrative practice must accord prison administrators 'wide-ranging deference in the adoption and execution of policies and practices' ...such a requirement boils down to a command that when a court is confronted with a charge of administrative bad faith, it must evaluate the charge by assuming administrative good faith." Merely because they were visiting, they were strip searched. The court ruled that the sheriff was not immune from damages, and that the county was liable for the policy as well. The plaintiff's returning to the prison for visits on future occasions where she was again strip searched did not imply consent to waive her constitutional rights, added the court. Doe v. Coughlin, 509 N.Y.S.2d 209 (A.D. 3 Dept. 1986), cert. denied, 109 S.Ct. 196. An inmate who was diagnosed as having Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome and his wife brought action seeking judgment directing that they be allowed to participate in a family reunion program at the correctional facility which provides for conjugal visitation in a private trailer. The Supreme Court, 505 N.Y.S.2d 534, dismissed the petition, and the inmate and his wife appealed. The Supreme Court, appellate division, held that: (1) the policy of not allowing inmates with AIDS to participate in the program was rational, and (2) the Federal Rehabilitation Act which prohibits discrimination against otherwise qualified handicapped individuals does not apply where the correctional facility used no federal funds to support the program.

The participation of an inmate in a family reunion program is not a right, but rather a privilege, the granting of which is committed to the discretion of the commissioner of correctional services, and a review of that determination is in nature of mandamus. The issue on review was whether the commissioner's determination had a rational basis such that it was not arbitrary or capricious. (Auburn Correctional Facility, New York)

Prison officials contented, and the court agreed, that it is dangerous for young people (under 18 years of age) to travel into the Restricted Housing Unit located in the center of the facility. The court stated: "...the ban in this case is reasonable and the plaintiffs have not in any way dispelled the concerns and justifications for electing to limit visits to those 18 years of age or older. Consequently, assuming arguendo, that a constitutional right is implicated, nothing in the record indicates other reasonable methods of permitting child visitation to those in restricted housing without compromising the internal security of the prison." Jackson v. Gardner, 639 F.Supp. 1005 (E.D.Tenn. 1986). Inmates of a county jail brought a Section 1983 action challenging the constitutionality of conditions of confinement. After resolution of some of the conditions complained of, and stipulation as to others, the district court found that prison conditions under which an average inmate was confined twenty-four hours a day in a physically dilapidated, insect infected, dimly lit, poorly ventilated area averaging under twenty square feet per inmate, without any available recreation or diversion other than some reading or letter writing, sharing a shower which might not have hot water with twelve to fourteen others, sharing a sink and toilet with three or four others, and possibly sleeping on an unsanitary floor, or within inches of a toilet, in clothing which may not have been recently washed, constituted cruel and unusual punishment. In order for the county jail to provide constitutionally acceptable confinement, population at the main jail facility had to be reduced, regular out-of-cell recreation had to be provided, visitation increased, and fire escape plans had to be communicated to inmates and prominently displayed in corridors at all times. According to the court, the attorney's due process rights were not violated by directives at federal correctional institution which restricted her visits to designated times and upon 24 hours notice as a result of her "disruptive and unprofessional behavior" and which allegedly resulted in prison inmates' unwillingness to retain her as counsel. He listed her as his fiancee on his visitor's list and she requested a visit. Prison regulations limit visitation to inmates' family members and prior acquaintances and, therefore, his "pen pal" was denied a visit. The purpose of the regulation was to be sure that visitors have "legitimate personal reasons for coming to the prison, as opposed to satisfying mere curiosity interests." The court found that the regulation was reasonable, particularly since other means of communication, such as mail and the telephone, were still available. In a class action suit brought against the Marion Penitentiary in Illinois by inmates held in the Control Unit, the inmates claimed use of excessive force and other charges because they were subjected to rectal searches every time they left or re-entered the unit. The appeals court ruled that because inmates in the Control Unit require greater supervision than other prisoners, rectal searches can be legally performed on such inmates. Use of physical restraints during attorney visitation and limited out-of-cell time was also upheld by the federal district court. The court found that extraordinary security measures employed in a maximum security federal prison, such as limitation of time spent outside cells, denial of opportunities for socialization, handcuffing, shackling, spread-eagling and rectal searches were reasonable measures in view of the history of violence at the prison and the incorrigible character of the inmates and thus it did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment. Further, the court found that the transfer of prisoners to a maximum security federal prison did not result in incremental deprivation so great as to constitute actionable deprivation of natural liberty and thus require a hearing. Card v. Dugger, 709 F.Supp. 1098 (M.D. Fla. 1988). An inmate, under the sentence of death, brought a civil rights action against prison officials, alleging he was denied daily access to a priest while he was on "death watch." On the defendants' motion for summary judgment, the district court found that the limits placed on the inmate's access to a priest did not violate his right to free exercise of religion, and the state prison policy that allowed prison-employed chaplains to have contact visits with "death watch" inmates on a regular basis, while prohibiting a nonemployee Catholic priest from having contact visits with death watch inmates, did not deprive the Roman Catholic inmate who was on death watch of equal protection of the laws, although all prison chaplains were Protestants. The prison allowed outside religious leaders to visit inmates on a regular basis. All inmates had equal access to outside religious representatives, and all inmates had an equal access to the institutional chaplains. The State Department of Corrections did not violate the establishment clause of the first amendment when it hired only Protestant ministers as chaplains in a state prison system, where the Department secured Catholic priest volunteers to attend to the needs of Cathqlic inmates. The court noted that inmates under the sentence of death have "little reason" to fear ordinary disciplinary action because of their situation. They are therefore "desperate and unpredictable persons" and the prison has a legitimate reason to separate them physically from outside social visitors, including visiting priests. Coleman v. Turner, 838 F. 2nd 1004 (8th Cir. 1988). An inmate and her future husband filed a lawsuit against the Correctional Center's superintendent and a corrections officer. They alleged that officials had violated their right to send and receive mail, had harassed them, had violated their right of access to the courts, and had denied the future husband the opportunity to visit and punished him in a cruel and unusual manner. In a jury trial, the court agreed with the plaintiffs on the claim of retaliation, but the court denied a request for an injunction against future harassment. The court then ruled that since the plaintiffs acted as their own attorney, they were not entitled to attorney's fees under 42 U.S.C. Section 1988; however, they may be able to recover costs, which would be considered during future court appearances. (Renz Correctional Center)

The appeals court held that: (1) the prisoner's complaint was properly dismissed for failure to exhaust administrative remedies; (2) the Bureau of Prisons had no duty to transfer the prisoner to a prison near the wife's residence; (3) the wife had no right to conjugal visits; and (4) the prisoner's incarceration did not violate the wife's rights against cruel and unusual punishment. Shaddy v. Gunter, 690 F.Supp. 860 (D. Neb. 1988). A federal district court ruled that a Nebraska prison regulation that prohibits most forms of physical contact during visitation periods is not unconstitutionally vague. The regulation permitted "an embrace and a kiss at the beginning and end of a visit," but forbid kissing, caressing and fondling" at all other times. After being found to have violated the rule by squeezing his wife's buttocks, an inmate sued saying the regulation was too vague. The court agreed that the regulation could have been written better, but ruled that it was not void for vagueness. The court found that the rule in context with other prison regulations provided sufficient guidance to put the inmate on notice that physical contact in a manner more intimate than hand holding during visitation is prohibited under the rule. Berrios-Berrios v. Thornburg, 716 F.Supp. 987 (E.D. Ky. 1989). A lawsuit was filed by a female inmate to challenge the refusal of prison officials to permit her to breast-feed her child. She moved for a preliminary injunction allowing her to breast-feed her child during normal visitation hours, to store breast milk in a refrigerator, and to compel the defendants to make arrangements for the delivery of the breast milk to the child's caretaker. The court found that the need for immediate resolution of the inmate's request to be allowed to breast-feed her child during normal visitation hours and to store the breast milk negated requirements to exhaust administrative remedies, and that the inmate was entitled to a preliminary injunction allowing her to breast-feed her child during regular visitation periods. A substantial threat existed that the absence of an injunction would irreparably injure the inmate's ability to breast-feed her child and the inmate and her child would unnecessarily be deprived of the beneficial effects of breast-feeding; the defendants failed to allege any harm. However, the court ruled that the inmate's interest in breast-feeding her child with milk stored in a refrigerator was outweighed by the government's compelling interest arising out of the need for security checks, the desire to avoid negligence claims, and the cost and burden of providing the refrigerators and a system for the storage and delivery of the milk to caretakers. Charron v. Medium Sec. Inst., 730 F.Supp. 987 (E.D. Mo. 1989). A former pretrial detainee brought a civil rights action against the city and staff members of a city workhouse, alleging various constitutional violations which occurred in connection with his refusal to work in the kitchen of the workhouse, and the medical treatment that was afforded him for a workhouse injury. The U.S. District Court found that as a pretrial detainee, the plaintiff has no claim under the eighth amendment for cruel and unusual punishment, arising from his being placed in segregation for refusing to work in the workhouse kitchen, however the placement in segregation did amount to punishment in violation of his due process rights. It was also stated that nothing in the Constitution requires that pretrial detainees be allowed contact visits when prison administrators had determined that such visits will jeopardize the security of the facility.

The court also found that the members of the workhouse staff were not entitled to qualified immunity from the civil rights claim; the law clearly established that the unnecessary imposition of security confinement on a pretrial detainee violated the detainee's rights to due process. Protective custody inmates brought an action to challenge the suspension of certain opportunities and benefits that were afforded to the general prison population. The defendants moved for a summary judgment. The district court found that giving certain benefits and opportunities to the general prison population without giving those opportunities and benefits to protective custody inmates was not cruel and unusual punishment. According to the court, a prisoner has no absolute constitutional right to visitation. Cancelling some visits for protective custody inmates due to conflicting visits to prisoners in the general population was constitutional. Giving the protective custody inmates fewer benefits and opportunities than the general prison population was not cruel and unusual punishment and did not violate the fourteenth amendment. The suspension of certain benefits and opportunities represented accommodation with institutional interest in providing adequate protection to protective custody inmates. Following the denial of an injunction and reversal of that denial on appeal, the district court found that the prisoner and his wife were entitled to a preliminary injunction requiring prison officials to remove a stop order from the wife's visiting and releasing the inmate from the special adjustment unit. Actions were taken as a result of determination of misconduct involving sexual activity of the inmate and his wife in the prison's main visiting room, where the adjustment board which found the inmate guilty of a conduct violation included the prison official who had reported the alleged conduct violation. Isaraphanich v. Coughlin, 716 F.Supp. 119 (S.D.N.Y. 1989). An alien inmate who was denied participation in a family reunion program and temporary release program brought a civil rights action alleging, inter alia, a violation of an equal protection clause. On the corrections officials' motion for summary judgment, the district court found that denying inmate's participation in programs on the basis of an outstanding INS detainer was rationally related to a legitimate penological interest of preventing participating inmates from escaping upon release. The family reunion program involves inmates visiting with their family members in a mobile home for 48 hours. The location of this home, near the "edge of a field" is less secure than other parts of the facility and, because of this, prison officials have an increased interest in insuring that individuals who participate in the program do not "have a special incentive to escape," such as facing possible deportation. Kentucky Dept. of Corrections v. Thompson, 109 S.Ct. 1904 (1989). Kentucky inmates brought a suit alleging that the suspension of visitation privileges without a hearing in two instances violated due process. Following the district court's issuance of a consent decree settling a class action brought by Kentucky penal inmates under 42 U.S.C.A. Section 1983, the Commonwealth promulgated "Corrections Policies and Procedures," which, inter alia, contain a nonexhaustive list of prison visitors who "may be excluded," including those who "would constitute a clear and probable danger to the institution's security or interfere with [its] orderly operation." The Kentucky State Reformatory at LaGrange subsequently issued its own "Procedures Memorandum," which, in addition to including language virtually identical to that of the state regulations, sets forth procedures under which a visitor "may" be refused admittance and have his or her visitation privileges suspended by Reformatory officials. After the Reformatory refused to admit several visitors and denied them a hearing, the representatives of an inmate class filed a motion with the district court, claiming, among other things, that the suspensions violated the due process clause of the fourteenth amendment. The court agreed and directed that minimal due process procedures be developed. The court of appeals affirmed and remanded, concluding, inter alia, that the language of the relevant prison policies created a liberty interest protected by the due process clause.

Held: The Kentucky regulations do not give state inmates a liberty interest in receiving visitors that is entitled to the protections of the due process clause. Pp. 1908-1911.

(a) In order to create a protected liberty interest in the prison context, state regulations must use "explicitly mandatory language," in connection with the establishment of "specific substantive predicates" to limit official discretion, and thereby require that a particular outcome be reached upon a finding that the relevant criteria have been met.

(b) Although the regulations at issue do provide certain "substantive predicates" to guide prison decisionmakers in determining whether to allow visitation, the regulations lack the requisite relevant mandatory language, since visitors "may," but need not, be excluded whether they fall within or without one of the listed categories of excludable visitors. Thus, the regulations are not worded in such a way that an inmate could reasonably form an objective expectation that a visit would necessarily be allowed absent the occurrence of one of the listed conditions or reasonably expect to enforce the regulations against the prison officials should that visit not be allowed. Mayo v. Lane, 867 F.2d 374 (7th Cir. 1989). The plaintiff appealed from the dismissal of her suit challenging an order by an official of the Illinois prison system that bars her from visiting any Illinois state prison. She alleged that the order deprived her of liberty and property without due process of law and sought damages and an injunction. She was visiting her grandnephew, who was serving time for armed robbery, when she was seen talking with another inmate after which she entered the women's bathroom without signing in at the visitors' desk first, as required. A search of the bathroom immediately afterwards produced a large quantity of marijuana, concluding that the visitor placed it there. A letter written by the warden to her recited these facts and informed her that "in light of the above, you are permanently restricted from visiting this facility and every other Adult Institution in the State of Illinois." Her grandnephew was paroled shortly thereafter and she then filed this lawsuit. It was noted by the court that a person's "natural liberty" is not infringed by being forbidden to enter a prison. The plaintiff argued that her natural liberty includes a right of association with members of her family, and that this right includes the right to visit them in prison. But the court noted that the complaint did not allege that she has been prevented from visiting her grandnephew or any other relative imprisoned by the State of Illinois. There was no suggestion that she wanted to visit her grandnephew after the date of her visit and before his release on parole or that any of her other relatives are in prison or about to be put there. In the absence of any injury, the plaintiff lacked standing to bring the suit on the mere basis that she felt offense at the order barring her from prison visits. (Illinois State Adult Institutions)

The prison officials had a right to revoke the visitor's contact visiting privileges after the incident. Ross v. Owens, 720 F.Supp. 490 (E.D. Pa. 1989). An inmate sought an injunction and monetary relief against prison officials who refused to allow his 16-year-old son to visit him. The district court dismissed the claim and the inmate moved for reconsideration. The district court denied the motion and found that under Pennsylvania regulations, it was proper for the prison to refuse the inmate's son admittance. The son, who was accompanied by an adult family member, was denied permission for a visit because he did not have any form of identification. The son had been on the list of approved visitors for eight years and had visited numerous times before. The court found that under the current state statutes, the prison had acted correctly in denying the visit based on the absence of showing identification. The lawsuit, which was based on this past refusal, was dismissed as frivolous. However, the court did state that the prison could not refuse to allow visitation based on the failure to provide a form by the son's legal guardian granting approval, and would allow the inmate to file a new complaint if the prison denied visitation on this basis. Taylor v. Armontrout, 894 F.2d 961 (8th Cir. 1989). An inmate brought a civil rights action alleging that he was denied visitation with his son. The U.S. District Court dismissed the complaint as frivolous, and the inmate appealed. The appeals court, reversing and remanding with directions, found that a Missouri Department of Corrections Rule which provided that those persons whose names appear on the inmate's visiting list "shall" be allowed to visit, created a liberty interest protected by the fourteenth amendment, and thus the prisoner could bring a civil rights action after he was denied visitation with his son, who was on an approved visiting list. On July 7, 1986, Taylor's son rode his motorcycle from Florida to visit his father. When he arrived at the visiting room of the prison during regular visiting hours, he requested a visit presenting himself as an approved visitor, in a neat and respectful manner with appropriate picture identification. Prison officials denied him permission to visit Taylor. After being denied permission to visit, Taylor's son went to the local Salvation Army for assistance. The Salvation Army advised Taylor's son to request an interview with the warden concerning the denial of visitation. He made such a request, but the request was refused. Two days later, he again sought the assistance of the Salvation Army. A Salvation Army representative was permitted to visit with Taylor and advised him that his son had attempted to visit him. Taylor than contacted his case worker notifying him of the prison's refusal of the visit. Taylor also wrote the warden notifying him of the refusal as well. Thompson v. Com. of Ky., Dept. of Corrections, 109 S.Ct. 1904 (1989). Prisoners in the Kentucky prison system filed a suit alleging that they had a due process liberty interest in visitation privileges. The federal appeals court stated that a procedures memorandum adopted to govern visitation created a due process liberty interest because the policy specified that each inmate is allowed three separate visits a week, and it also limited the discretion of authorities to deny visitation to certain circumstances. Since it was not clear from the record what set of regulations governed other parts of the Kentucky prison system, the court ordered further proceedings to determine the precise regulations applicable, the limits of prison discretion and "the particular procedural process due the plaintiffs when visitation is denied." However, the Supreme Court disagreed, reversing the lower court decision, holding that the Kentucky regulations do not give state inmates a liberty interest in receiving visitors that is entitled to the protections of the Due Process Clause. Doe v. Sparks, 733 F.Supp. 227 (W.D. Pa. 1990). A female inmate of a county prison brought an action challenging the prohibition on visitation by boyfriends or girlfriends of homosexual inmates. The U.S. District Court found that the rule bore a rational relation to valid goals but its effectiveness was so undercut by other factors as to render it constitutionally infirm. According to the court, if Pennsylvania law holds that it is beyond the power of the Pennsylvania legislature to prohibit adult private consensual homosexual conduct, the federal equal protection clause requires at least a showing of a rational relationship to a permissible end for any governmental policy which requires the disparate treatment for persons who are not seeking to engage in legally permissible sexual conduct but merely to acknowledge the existence of a homosexual affectional or romantic relationship. The prohibition of even consensual homosexual activity is a practical necessity of the prison administration, whether for health or discipline reasons. Concerns for abuse of inmates who are identified as homosexuals and for the protection of discipline and health were valid concerns of prison officials, and the prison policy against visits by the boyfriends or girlfriends of homosexual inmates bore a rational relation to preventing those ills, but the effectiveness of that policy to deal with those ills was so undercut by other factors as to render it constitutionally infirm. The U.S. District Court dismissed the complaint, and the inmate appealed. The court of appeals, affirming the lower court decision, found that the policy prohibiting smoking in the prison visitation area during visiting hours did not violate the inmate's constitutional rights. While a state regulation instructed prison officials to establish a smoking policy, the court found that it did not contain "particularized substantive criteria to guide the officials or mandatory language requiring them to act in a certain way," and therefore did not create a liberty interest. The policy also did not violate the eighth amendment, since it did not deprive inmates of a "minimal civilized measure of life's necessities." The complaint was "nothing more than a claim of infringement of a legal interest that does not exist." (Cummins Unit, Arkansas Department of Correction)

An inmate brought a Section 1983 action against state prison officials based on their denial of visitation privileges to his fiancee, and the officers moved to dismiss. The district court found that even though an inmate had no absolute right to visitation under the First Amendment, Florida law created a liberty interest in the inmate's right to visitation by setting forth both specified substantive predicates and relevant mandatory language concerning denial of visitation. The employees of the Florida Department of Corrections were not entitled to qualified immunity from liability in the inmate's Section 1983 action as the unlawfulness of denying the inmate visitation privileges without legitimate penological objectives was clearly established at the time of the actions challenged. In addition, genuine issue of material fact existed as to whether the state prison official's decision to deny the inmate's fiancee visitor status was rationally related to legitimate security interest or was in retaliation for the inmate's offense of felony-murder of a correctional officer and in retaliation for his actions as an inmate legal aide, precluding summary judgment. Anderson v. Vasquez, 827 F.Supp. 617 (N.D. Cal. 1992) modified 28 F.3d 104. Death row inmates filed a Section 1983 action alleging that the denial of conjugal visits and of the opportunity to preserve sperm for artificial insemination violated the Eighth Amendment. The district court found that the denial of conjugal visits for the death row inmates did not violate their equal protection rights. Although inmates sentenced for life imprisonment were allowed conjugal visits, there was no showing that the death row inmates were similarly situated. In addition, no constitutional right to have inmates' sperm preserved for artificial insemination exists. Although an inmate has a constitutionally protected right to marry, many aspects of marriage, including artificial insemination as a method of begetting a child, are superseded by the fact of confinement. Spouses and other women partners willing to procreate with death row inmates, and potential grandparents of such possible issue, had no standing to assert a claim that denial to inmates of conjugal visits and artificial insemination inflicted cruel and unusual punishment on them in violation of the Eighth Amendment, even though they had not been convicted of a crime. The district court found that the search was based upon reasonable suspicion and that the wife had consented, and the wife appealed. The court of appeals, affirming the decision, found that the wife had a legitimate expectation of privacy when she entered prison to visit her husband, and the search was supported by reasonable individualized suspicion and did not violate the Fourth Amendment. On several occasions, prison visitors complained that the wife wore white denim jeans with a hole in the crotch and that she and her husband engaged in inappropriate sexual conduct during visiting hours. One of the officers involved in ordering the search had also previously observed the wife wearing the offending clothing. The district court denied the motion, finding that the inmate's allegations that prison officials refused to admit his family to the prison for visitation purposes and revoked their visitation privileges for a six-month period, thus preventing him from receiving visitors, sufficiently stated a claim under Section 1983 for violation of civil rights. A prisoner brought a Section 1983 action against administrators and correctional officers at a prison to recover for violation of procedural due process in connection with suspension of visitation privileges. The U.S. District Court entered summary judgment for the defendants, and the prisoner appealed. The court of appeals found that Washington's prison visitation regulations created a due process liberty interest, and, thus, the visiting rights could be suspended under an enumerated list of circumstances only after finding of guilt pursuant to a regular disciplinary hearing. In addition, written notice had to be given to the inmate and visitor, and regulations did not state that administrative staff "reserves the right" to allow or disallow visits. However, the prisoner's procedural due process rights in visitation were not violated by a 90-day suspension and informal infraction hearing, even though the infraction was subsequently dismissed. The dismissal of the charge against the prisoner for attempting to smuggle drugs into the prison did not entitle him to reinstatement of visitation rights under Washington law, as the suspension was continued on the basis of the wife's attempts to smuggle contráband to the prisoner on prior occasions and the finding of a balloon with a white slimy substance and the tip bitten off in a restroom after the prisoner's child used it. A prison inmate and his wife and daughter brought a Bivens action against a warden of a prison seeking declaratory judgment, injunctive relief, and damages for alleged constitutional violations. Upon the defendants' motion to dismiss, or in the alternative, for summary judgment, the district court found that the warden did not act arbitrarily and capriciously in permanently restricting the wife's visitation. The wife refused to complete the first search by prison officials and the fact that she later consented to a second or further search, and the fact that no contraband was found, did not negate the potential consequences of her first refusal. In addition, reliable and confidential information of a drug smuggling scheme that included an inmate and his wife provided probable cause to issue a warrant for a body search of the inmate's wife during her attempt to visit the inmate. Zunker v. Bertrand, 798 F.Supp. 1365 (E.D. Wis. 1992). An inmate brought a Section 1983 action against a prison warden alleging that a policy regarding pre- and post-visitation visual body cavity searches violated the inmate's Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment rights. The district court found that visual body cavity searches conducted after contact visits in prisons as a means of preventing inmates' possession of weapons and contraband, even absent probable cause, were reasonable. In addition, the language of the prison regulation under which a strip search "may only" be conducted in a clean and private place did not establish the prisoner's liberty interest in having visual body cavity searches conducted in complete privacy which could form the basis of a Section 1983 claim for violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. Even if the searches violated provisions of prison regulations, as they were not conducted in a private place, the violation would not give rise to a constitutionally protected liberty interest. ACLU of Maryland v. Wicomico County, MD., 999 F.2d 780 (4th Cir. 1993). A paralegal brought a Section 1983 action against a county prison after the prison refused to allow the paralegal to continue to have contact visits with inmates. The U.S. District Court denied the prison's summary judgment motion, and the prison appealed. The appeals court found that the paralegal failed to show an adverse impact from the visitation restriction, and thus failed to state a retaliation claim under Section 1983. The paralegal was free to visit with inmates in noncontact meeting rooms which were all that the prison provided to any nonprofessional visitor. In addition, the paralegal failed to establish a due process claim based on the prison's former acquiescence to such visits. Such acquiescence was at most an informal arrangement that did not implicate the due process clause, and no evidence existed of a legal guarantee that such visits would continue. The court also found that the paralegal failed to establish an equal protection claim. The warden's withdrawal of the special accommodation he had made for the paralegal affected her alone and merely returned her to the status occupied by other prospective paralegal visitors. Death-row inmates brought a class action against state-related defendants to change a policy of restricting full contact visits with attorneys. The district court found that the limited-contact visits with attorneys presently accorded to death row inmates, with modification, met the requirement of the Sixth and Fourteenth Amendments. Inmates are to be allowed a full view through a clear partition that will not restrict vocal communication. The access by inmates to telephones used for confidential attorney calls which were equipped with a cord long enough to enable the inmate to take the receiver to the back of the cell met the Sixth and Fourteenth Amendment requirements. The appeals court reversed the lower court decision, finding no Sixth Amendment violation. (Oklahoma State Penitentiary, McAlester, Oklahoma)

Percy v. Jabe, 823 F.Supp. 445 (E.D. Mich. 1993). An inmate and his visitor brought a civil rights action against prison officials who placed the visitor on a permanent visitor restriction list when the inmate was found guilty of possessing crack cocaine after a visit. The district court found that the prison officials did not violate the inmate's right to due process in adjudicating his substance abuse charge in a prison misconduct proceeding without bringing criminal charges. The fact that officials chose not to invoke criminal sanctions against the inmate or visitor involved in the incident had no significance regarding the accuracy of the determination that the inmate abused crack cocaine after a visit. In addition, placing the visitor on a restricted list did not violate the inmate's or the visitor's constitutional rights. The restriction was not an irrational or exaggerated response by officials, and even if the inmate had a protected liberty interest in visitation, it would be subject to reasonable restrictions. The district court denied the motion, finding that the visitor to the prison was warned that all visitors will be searched and consented to the search. He could not withdraw his consent after the search had commenced, and thus, the drugs recovered during the search could be suppressed. The warrantless strip search of the prison visitor was found reasonable. After consenting to a pat down of his upper body and thorough inspection of his mouth, the visitor balked at a pat down of his groin area. The visitor attempted to withdraw his consent, and asserted a suspect religious objection to the search. (Occoquan Facility, Lorton Reformatory, Lorton, Virginia)

A prisoner who was being held at a county jail brought an action against prison officials alleging that they violated his constitutional due process and equal protection rights by refusing to provide him with contact visits with his wife and not providing him with satisfactory reasons for such refusal. The district court found that the denial of contact visits between the prisoner and his wife, who was also incarcerated at the jail, was rationally related to valid penological concerns. The prisoner, who was charged with homicide, was not similarly situated to other prisoners who received contact visits, because he was a high risk and posed a serious threat to the security of the jail and to the safety of jail employees and other prisoners. This right may be limited if prison officials can show that such limitations are reasonably related to legitimate penological interests; however, prison officials failed to make such a showing. The court of appeals, reversing and remanding, found that prison officials were entitled to qualified immunity. The U.S. District Court entered judgment for the warden and the visitor appealed. The appeals court, reversing and remanding, found that, as a matter of law, where no independent objective information existed, uncorroborated information upon which the warden relied was insufficient to warrant the strip search, notwithstanding the warden's contention that since some information regarding the visitor's alleged smuggling of drugs into prison came from a reliable officer, they required no corroboration. The officer had simply relayed an anonymous tip to the warden, and letters received by the warden personally were either anonymous or had a fictitious name and provided no reliability. The court found that a generalized suspicion of smuggling activity does not justify a strip search of a visitor. Reasonable suspicion requires individualized suspicion, specifically directed toward a person targeted for a strip search, and exists only if information contained in an anonymous tip is linked to other objective facts known by correctional authorities. A former state prisoner sued an assistant prison warden in a Section 1983 action, alleging he was deprived of civil rights when he was denied visitation with his sister. The district court denied the assistant warden's motion to dismiss. On its own reconsideration, the same court found that the prisoner had a liberty interest in visitation arising from an Illinois statute requiring correctional facilities to permit committed persons to receive visitors. However, the prisoner failed to state a cause of action under Section 1983 against the assistant warden, since the prisoner failed to sufficiently connect the alleged denial of visitation to the assistant warden. The assistant warden was protected by qualified immunity from the suit as the existence of the statutorily created liberty interest in visitation in Illinois was not established at the time of the alleged denial. The U.S. District Court dismissed, and the inmate appealed. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that the inmate did not have a constitutionally protected interest in conjugal visitation. Relevant regulations contained no specific set of criteria that when met would make participation in the program mandatory, or that would significantly limit prison officials' discretion in deciding the best candidates for program participation. Rather, the regulations provided corrections officials with discretionary authority to determine whether a particular visitor should be permitted to enter a correctional facility, whether a particular correctional facility should include a program, and whether a particular inmate should be given the privilege to participate. The court found that partitioning the visitation area, permitting visitation only for periods of 20 minutes, and refusing to permit the husband and wife to visit one another were policies that were within the sound discretion of the detention center officials. However, the court found that an evidentiary hearing was warranted to determine the factual basis for an absolute ban on visitation by children under 12 years of age, and whether the ban was an exaggerated and

The U.S. District Court determined that the policy violated the inmates' constitutional rights but that alterations of that policy unilaterally adopted by the prison during the course of the litigation were in compliance with constitutional requirements, and the inmates appealed. The appeals court found that the prison policy prohibiting contact visitation between death row inmates and their attorneys violated the Sixth Amendment. The prison permitted inmates personal contact with virtually all those with whom they interacted. This included contact with other inmates and law clerks who are also inmates in the law library, contact during religious services and at the barber shop staffed by inmates, contact with medical, psychological, and other prison staff as well as visiting chaplains, contact with the public during tours of the facility, and contact with civilian female librarians and visiting law enforcement personnel. Rodriguez v. Phillips, 66 F.3d 470 (2nd Cir. 1995). A former inmate and his mother filed a § 1983 action against prison officials. The district court denied summary judgment for the defendants and they appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded in part, and dismissed in part. The appeals court found that prison officials' belief that the inmate's three-day administrative confinement, without the opportunity to be heard, was reasonable. The court noted that the officials perceived a threat to security and safety following a report that the inmate's mother had passed contraband into the prison, and that they needed time to search the public spaces of the cell block and interview an informer. The court held that a substantive due process right to be free from excessive force from a state act in a nonseizure, nonprisoner context was not clearly established at the time that a prison officer used excessive force on the inmate's mother. Just before a visit to her son, the mother had apparently leaned against or touched the fence surrounding the prison, pausing before she continued to the visitors reception area. An officer radioed a report to officers inside the facility that he had seen the mother pass a small brown package through the fence to an unidentified inmate. Inside the prison the mother was questioned by officers about the incident and she was told she would not be allowed to visit her son that day. While she was waiting at the bus stop corrections officers seized her and brought her back for further questioning, police were contacted and she was arrested. Unable to make bail she was held overnight and she was released without explanation the next day. The U.S. District Court granted summary judgment against the visitors and they appealed. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that the initial stop of the vehicle as it was attempting to enter the prison, in order to facilitate a drug-sensing dog's sweep of the car and its occupants, did not violate the Fourth Amendment. Public interest in keeping drugs out of prisons and maintaining prison security was substantial, the roadblock was reasonably tailored to achieve those objectives, and interference with the occupants' individual liberty was not significant. After the drug-sniffing dog alerted officers to one of the visitors, prison officials possessed at least reasonable suspicion that the visitor was concealing narcotics and ordering her to submit to a strip search before entering the prison was constitutional. (Dick Conner Correctional Center, Hominy, Oklahoma)

The district court granted summary judgment for the officials on the basis of qualified immunity. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part and remanded the case. The court found that information supplied by a confidential informant that an inmate "was receiving drugs every time a young unrelated female visitor visited" gave prison guards reasonable suspicion and justified a body cavity search of the visitor. The court noted that if prison officials had detained the visitor without probable cause and told her she would not be permitted to depart without submitting to a search, those circumstances would have violated her right to be free from being detained absent probable cause. Prison visitors can be subjected to some searches, such as a pat-down or metal detector sweep, merely as a condition of visitation absent any suspicion, and visitors seeking entry to a controlled environment acknowledge a lesser expectation of privacy. Prison officials may not search a visitor who objects without giving the visitor a chance to abort the visit and depart. A visitor does not consent to an invasive search simply by appearing at the prison for a visit even if he or she may consent to less invasive searches merely by entering the facility. However, the court found that fact questions existed about the exact scope of the search of the visitor's car or whether a sign was posted and visible notifying the visitor that her car would be searched, making summary judgment inappropriate with regard to that search. SEARCHES

Wood v. Clemons, 89 F.3d 922 (1st Cir. 1996). Prison visitors sued prison officials alleging that strip searches violated their Fourth Amendment rights. The district court entered summary judgment for the defendants on the basis of qualified immunity. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the superintendent acted reasonably, in light of information before him, that the visitors would be bringing drugs to the inmate, entitling him to qualified immunity. The court found that reasonable suspicion is the proper standard by which to gauge the constitutionality of prison-visitor strip searches. The court noted that reasonable suspicion is something stronger than a mere "hunch' but something weaker than probable cause and that reasonable suspicion can arise from something that is less reliable than that required to show probable cause. In this case, the superintendent had grown to trust an officer to provide him with reliable information and the superintendent also found a police detective, on whose report the officer's report was based, to be a reliable and trustworthy source of information. The superintendent had approved a strip search of a female inmate's teenaged children based on a tip which he erroneously believed to have been confirmed by two unconnected confidential informants. Bazzetta v. McGinnis, 124 F.3d 774 (6th Cir. 1997). Prisoners brought a class action civil rights suit challenging prison regulations that limited contact visits for certain classes of prisoners. The district court denied the prisoners' motion for preliminary injunctive relief and the prisoners appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the regulations were reasonably related to legitimate penological interests and did not violate the Eighth Amendment. The corrections department grades its prisoners on the basis of their dangerous propensities, from grade I (lowest risk) to grade VI (highest risk). Regulations prohibit contact visits for grades V and VI, with rare exceptions. The regulations included restrictions on contact visits by children, members of the general public and former prisoners. Johnson v. Baker, 108 F.3d 10 (2nd Cir. 1997). A state prison inmate brought a § 1983 action against prison officials challenging a prison policy that required the inmate to admit to sex offenses of which he had been convicted as a prerequisite to participation in the prison's sex offender program. Admission to the sex offender program was itself required for admission to a program that permits inmates to spend extended periods of time with their spouses and family. The district court dismissed the case and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed, holding that the policy in question did not violate the inmate's right to equal protection or his right against self-incrimination. The court found that the prison officials did not violate the prisoner's Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination, as long as the adverse consequence was imposed for failure to answer a relevant inquiry and not for refusal to give up a constitutional right; however, the state may not seek a court order compelling answers to its questions about an alleged offense, require a waiver of immunity, or insist that answers be used in a criminal proceeding. The court noted that the inmate's unwillingness to admit to criminal sexual activity rendered him unlikely to benefit from the rehabilitative process. (Auburn Correctional Facility, New York)

Laughter v. Kay, 986 F.Supp. 1362 (D.Utah 1997). A pregnant prison visitor brought a § 1983 action against officers after she was subjected by the officers to manual body cavity searches along with her three-year-old son. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the plaintiff, finding that a manual body cavity search of a prison visitor must be justified by probable cause and the officers lacked probable cause. The court held that the prison-visitor exception to the prohibition against warrantless searches did not apply because the officers had no intention of allowing the visitor into the prison to visit, that no exigent circumstances existed, and that the visitor's consent to the searches did not validate them. The court denied qualified immunity to the officers. The court found that probable cause was not established by an affidavit relating information about one prisoner's alleged drug activities and the affiant's belief that the visitor would pass drugs to another prisoner, where the affidavit failed to connect the visitor or the prisoner she was visiting to the prisoner who had allegedly engaged in drug activity. The court also found that probable cause was not established by an uncorroborated note from a confidential prisoner-informant referring to a "thing" to be taken to the visitor's address, monitored telephone conversations in which prisoners made oblique references to the visitor, the discovery of syringes in the vehicle the visitor drove to the prison several days before the search, or an uncorroborated tip from one prison officer's mother. A death row inmate sued a prison warden in his official capacity alleging that his right of access to courts was violated because he was denied contact visits with a paralegal, who was also his wife. The district court ordered the Commonwealth of Virginia to allow the inmate to have contact visits with the paralegal, and the Commonwealth appealed. The appeals court reversed, finding that the inmate had failed to show that his right of access to courts was burdened by the denial of contact visits. The court held that the Commonwealth's interest in the security of its prisons outweighed the inmate's Sixth Amendment interest in contact visits with a paralegal. The inmate complained about the propriety of the party and was subsequently charged with a disciplinary violation. Varrone v. Bilotti, 123 F.3d 75 (2nd Cir. 1997). The son of a prison inmate brought a § 1983 action against prison officials arising from the requirement that the son submit to a strip search before he was allowed to visit his father. Summary judgment was denied to all parties and they appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded, finding that officials and their subordinates were entitled to qualified immunity. The court noted that the reasonable suspicion standard for the strip search of a visitor was clearly established at the time of the challenged search, and that the search was authorized based on reasonable suspicion. A corrections official had been provided with information by a narcotics bureau chief and other information which established reasonable suspicion to support the search, even if the corrections official did not personally investigate the reliability of the informant who provided the information to the bureau chief. Abu-Jamal v. Price, 154 F.3d 128 (3rd Cir. 1998). A state inmate brought a § 1983 action challenging a prison rule that prohibited inmates from carrying on a business or profession. The inmate moved for a preliminary injunction which the district court granted in part. The appeals court affirmed in part and reversed in part, remanding with instructions. The appeals court found that the district court's injunction against enforcement of visitation rules was not warranted on the grounds that they were imposed in retaliation for the inmate's writings, and that the corrections department did not violate the inmate's access to the courts by imposing stricter visitation rules. The court found that the department had a valid, content-neutral reason for applying stricter visitation rules to the inmate's visitors, given evidence that the inmate's legal visitation privileges were being abused so that he could receive more than the permitted number of social visits. The department required verification that legal visitors were credentialed or employed by the inmate's attorney. (State Correctional Institution at Greene, Pennsylvania)

A prison inmate who was denied visitation with a woman who, along with the inmate, was a member of an activist group, and who the inmate claimed was his wife, brought a § 1983 action. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants, finding that the inmate failed to show that he and the woman were married for the purposes of Pennsylvania law; therefore, the denial of visitation did not violate equal protection. The court found that no statutory marriage existed, where the inmate had not obtained a marriage license, and there was no evidence that they had entered into an agreement sufficient to create a common law marriage. Austin v. Hopper, 15 F.Supp.2d 1210 (M.D.Ala. 1998). Inmates in a state prison system brought a class action suit under § 1983, challenging several of the system's policies and practices. The district court held that an agreement settling the inmates' chain gang claim was not subject to the limitations on prospective relief imposed by the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA) and the settlement was approved. The court found that an automatic 90-day denial of visitation for inmates assigned to a shock incarceration program did not violate their First Amendment right to visitation. The inmates in the program were recidivists and parole violators. According to the court, the denial of visitation promoted the legitimate penological objectives of deterrence and rehabilitation in a common-sense way, and the inmates had mail and telephone calls as an alternative means of communication. Blair v. Loomis, 1 F.Supp.2d 769 (N.D.Ohio 1998). An inmate and his wife, a former correctional officer, sued prison officials challenging their denial of visitation. The district court denied the plaintiffs' motion for a temporary restraining order and temporary injunction. The court held that regulations governing visitation in Ohio prisons did not create a protectable liberty interest in a right to visitation. The court found that the public interest in a safe and orderly prison system outweighed the interest of the prisoner and his wife in maintaining their family relationship and the prisoner's interest in building a relationship that would help him to lead a law-abiding life upon his release. The court found that it was reasonable for Ohio law to consider present or former correctional officers to be security risks, and to exclude them from visitation for that reason, based upon their training in security procedures and their knowledge of facility operations. The prisoner and his wife were married while the prisoner was incarcerated, and the wife admitted to falsifying information on her visitor application to conceal the fact that she had been a corrections officer. Chimurenga v. City of New York, 45 F.Supp.2d 337 (S.D.N.Y. 1999). A visitor to a juvenile detention facility filed at § 1983 and state law action against a city and corrections officials for false arrest, negligence and violation of her equal protection and due process rights following her arrest for allegedly attempting to smuggle contraband. The court granted summary judgment to the defendants in part and denied in part. The court held that the equal protection rights of the visitor were not violated and that an attorney did not have a liberty interest in access to a pass that would allow her to visit detainees in a juvenile detention facility, where there was no law or regulation that limited the discretion of the state corrections department to grant or deny a pass. But the court found that summary judgment was precluded by fact questions regarding whether correction officers planted a razor blade in a box brought by the visitor. Cooper v. Garcia, 55 F.Supp.2d 1090 (S.D.Cal. 1999). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against prison officials following the denial of family visitation privileges. The district court dismissed the action, finding that the inmate did not have a liberty interest in a state family visitation program, and the classification of the inmate as a "sex offender" did not violate his right to procedural due process. According to the court, state regulations stated that family visitation was a privilege, not a right. The court noted that the classification of the inmate as a "sex offender" without an individualized assessment of security risks did not violate the inmate's due process rights, even though the inmate was not convicted of a sex offense and the inmate was denied family visitation as a result of the classification, because the classification did not result in any mandatory, coercive treatment. The district court dismissed the claims as frivolous and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the denial of eight meals over a seven month period did not violate his constitutional rights where he did not claim that he lost weight or suffered other adverse physical effects or was denied a nutritionally and calorically adequate diet, nor that his health was put at risk. The appeals court also held that prohibiting the inmate from visiting with his mother on one occasion did not amount to cruel and unusual punishment. The district court denied the motion, finding that the recordings did not violate the Fourth Amendment rights of the defendant. The district court denied the defendants' motion to dismiss and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the visitors' right not to be strip searched in the absence of reasonable suspicion that he or she was carrying contraband was clearly established. State prison regulations authorize strip searches of visitors only if the visitor consents and if there is reasonable suspicion that the visitor is carrying contraband. The visitors were the father and wife of inmates on death row and the court found that the state regulations applied indifferently to the visitors of death row inmates and to visitors of other inmates. The district court dismissed the case. The court held that the prisoner did not have a right to procreate through artificial insemination while incarcerated, nor to have conjugal visits. The court found that male inmates were not similarly situated to female inmates with respect to the decision to terminate a pregnancy and therefore the warden's refusal to allow male inmates to engage in artificial insemination while not requiring female inmates to terminate their pregnancies did not violate equal protection. Benjamin v. Fraser, 264 F.3d 175 (2nd Cir. 2001). A city corrections department moved for immediate termination of consent decrees requiring judicial supervision over restrictive housing, inmate correspondence, and law libraries at city jails, pursuant to the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA). The district court vacated the decrees and pretrial detainees appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. On remand the district court granted the motion in part and denied it in part and the city appealed. The appeals affirmed. The appeals court held that the detainees were not required to show actual injury when they challenged regulations which allegedly adversely affected their Sixth Amendment right to counsel by impeding attorney visitation. The appeals court concluded that there was a continuing need for prospective relief with respect to the detainees' right to counsel, and the relief granted by the district court satisfied the requirements of PLRA. The court found that detainees were experiencing unjustified delays during attorney visitation. The district court required procedures to be established to ensure that attorney visits commenced within a specified time period following arrival at the jail, and the city was instructed to ensure the availability of an adequate number of visiting rooms that provide the requisite degree of privacy. The court held that the prisoner has no liberty interest in avoiding transfer to another prison, be it out-of-state, more restrictive, or owned and run by a private corporation. A prison visitor sued a corrections officer, alleging that the officer violated his constitutional rights when the officer refused the visitor's request to use the bathroom during a visit to an inmate. The district court held that the officer violated the visitor's substantive due process rights by refusing to permit him to use the

The 69-year-old visitor and the inmate he was visiting had informed the officer several times that the visitor was in pain and that he needed urgently to use the restroom. The officer, who laughed at the visitor's situation, was found to have been deliberately indifferent to the visitor's due process rights. Gerber v. Hickman, 291 F.3d 617 (9th Cir. 2002). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action and state law claims against a warden, alleging violation of his constitutional right to procreate by the warden's refusal to allow the prisoner to artificially inseminate his wife. The district court dismissed the case; the appeals court reversed, vacated and remanded. On rehearing en banc, the appeals court affirmed the district court decision, finding that while the basic right to marry survives imprisonment, most of the attributes of marriage, including cohabitation, physical intimacy, sexual intercourse, and bearing and raising children, do not. The court noted that prisoners have no due process or Eighth Amendment right to contact visits or conjugal visits. The court found that a prisoner's right to marry while in prison does not include a right to consummate the marriage or to enjoy the "other tangible aspects of marital intimacy." According to the court, the prisoner's equal protection right to be free of forced surgical sterilization did not give the prisoner the right to exercise his ability to procreate while in prison. The court also found that the prisoner's equal protection rights were not violated because some prisoners were allowed to have conjugal visits, because these prisoners would eventually be released into the community, while the plaintiff would never be eligible for release. Gonzalez-Jimenez De Ruiz v. U.S., 231 F.Supp.2d 1187 (M.D.Fla. 2002). Survivors of a federal prison inmate who died while in custody brought claims under the Federal Tort Claims Act (FTCA). The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court held that the family failed to state a claim under Florida law. The family alleged that prison officials deceived the inmate's family regarding the inmate's terminal condition, failed to provide the family with reasonable access to the inmate during his illness, failed to inform the family of the inmate's death, offered the inmate substandard care, and delayed transporting the inmate's remains for nine days after his death. The inmate had been transferred from a correctional facility in Florida to a nearby hospital, and then to a correctional medical facility in Texas where he died after nine days. The family claimed that the officials' conduct exacerbated one of the family member's pre-existing medical conditions, caused one child to experience difficulty in school, and triggered another child's asthma. An action was brought on behalf of an eight-year-old prison visitor who was subjected to a partial strip search without reasonable suspicion. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendant, a correctional officer, and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the encounter did not constitute a partial strip "search" for which reasonable suspicion was required, where the visitor and the grandmother who had brought the girl were told that they could leave at any time. The eight-year-old girl triggered the metal detector that was used to screen potential prison visitors. All concerned agreed that the metal detector was probably triggered by the buttons on the girl's overalls. A prisoner who was indicted for alleged Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act (RICO) violations, filed a writ of habeas corpus challenging restrictions placed on his conditions of confinement. The district court denied the petition. The court held that the secure confinement of the prisoner was justified and that restrictions placed upon his confinement were warranted because the prisoner was a flight risk, and a danger to others. The court upheld restrictions on the prisoner's mail that required mail to be read for threats, conspiracy, or obstruction of justice efforts, because members of the prisoner's gang outside the prison could act on his instructions. Lynn v. O'Leary, 264 F.Supp.2d 306 (D.Md. 2003). An arrestee sued state prison officials, alleging that he was subjected to an unlawful arrest, excessive force, and an illegal cavity search. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants in part, and denied it in part. The court held that officials were not entitled to governmental official immunity, under state law, in light of allegations that the officials acted with malice or were grossly negligent when they allegedly searched the arrestee's cavities while he was attempting to visit his son, after the officials informed the arrestee that a drug dog had falsely alerted on him. The arrestee had arrived at a state prison with his wife, intending to visit his son who was an inmate. While he was waiting to be admitted to the visiting area, a search dog was brought into the area and canvassed the room on a long leash. The dog gave a positive alert for drugs and the arrestee was subjected to a pat down search and his visitor locker was searched. No drugs were found on his person or in his locker and he was told that the dog had made a false alert. But he was not allowed to visit, and waited in lobby while his wife visited their son. After the visit prison officials ordered the arrestee into a side room where his wife heard him scream in pain. He informed the officials that he suffered from a medical condition. He was informed that he was under arrest and that he would be subjected to a strip and body cavity search, and the arrestee demanded that a warrant be produced. His clothes were forcibly removed and no contraband was found. $2,000 was taken from his wallet and divided among the prison officials. His person was then searched, including a body cavity examination. While he was dressing after the search one officer jerked up the arrestee's left leg, causing him to fall off a chair and hit his head against a wall, and he was knocked unconscious. He was taken to a hospital where he was found to be suffering from a contusion to his brain, and injury to his back, shoulder and arm. He was permanently banned from visiting his son. Wood v. Hancock County Sheriff's Dept., 354 F.3d 57 (1st Cir. 2003). A jail inmate sought damages under § 1983, alleging he was unconstitutionally strip searched on three separate occasions by correctional officers. The district court entered judgment in favor of the defendants and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, vacated in part, and remanded for a partial new trial. The appeals court held that a jury instruction that incorrectly defined a strip search, improperly limited the jury's deliberations on the nature of the searches of the misdemeanor detainee. The court found the district court's use of the term "deliberate," when describing a strip search, unduly directed the jurors to the officers' subjective intent, and that other elements of the definition (scrutiny of the mouth and armpits) were not prerequisites for finding that a strip search took place. The court noted that an individual detained on a misdemeanor charge may only be strip searched as part of the booking process if officers have reasonable suspicion that he is either armed or carrying contraband. According to the court, a blanket policy of strip-searching inmates after contact visits is constitutional, except in atypical circumstances. (Hancock County Jail, Maine)

Maydak v. U.S., 363 F.3d 512 (D.C.Cir. 2004). Inmates brought an action against the federal Bureau of Prisons (BOP) alleging that the BOP violated the Privacy Act and the statute that established Inmate Trust Funds by maintaining secret file photographs of inmates and their visitors. The district court entered judgment in favor of the BOP and the inmates appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The appeals court held that the BOP's maintenance of copies of the photos was permitted by the Privacy Act, but only to the extent that it was pertinent to an authorized law enforcement activity. The photos were taken as part of an "Inmate Photography Program" that offered inmates and their visitors the opportunity to purchase photos taken of them during visits. Inmates paid $1 for each photo, which was deposited in the Inmate Trust Fund, which consists of money spent by inmates at prison commissaries and other Trust Fund programs. The Fund paid for cameras, film, processing and administrative costs associated with the program. The BOP had been obtaining a second set of prints of the photos and secretly keeping them for examination and future reference. The inmates discovered the practice when they obtained documents from a photo developer that indicated that duplicate prints were made, but only one print was given to the inmates. The court held that a genuine issue of material act, precluding summary judgment, existed as to whether the duplicate photographs were a "system of records" within the meaning of the Privacy Act. The court held that the BOP's use of monies from the Inmate Trust Fund to obtain a second set of prints violated the statute that created the fund, even though in some instances there was no extra charge for the second set of prints. The court noted that when an agency compiles information about individuals for investigative purposes, Privacy Act concerns "are at their zenith," and if there is evidence of even a few retrievals of information keyed to personal identifiers, it may be a violation of the Privacy Act. CONTACT VISITS

Odenwalt v. Gillis, 327 F.Supp.2d 502 (M.D.Pa. 2004). A convicted sex offender filed a federal civil rights action alleging that state correctional officials had violated his constitutional rights by denying him contact visits with his minor children. The district court dismissed the action, finding that the offender's Eighth or Fourteenth Amendment rights were not violated. The court held that the no-contact regulation was supported by legitimate penological interests, and non-contact visits were offered as an alternative. According to the court, accommodating the request would have impaired prison officials' ability to protect children on the premises, and there was no ready alternative that did not impose significant costs on the prison. Wirsching v. Colorado, 360 F.3d 1191 (10th Cir. 2004). A convicted sex offender who refused to comply with the requirements of a treatment program filed a § 1983 claim. The district court granted summary judgment against the offender and he appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part and dismissed in part. The appeals court held that prison officials did not violate the offender's rights of familial association and his due process rights by refusing to allow visits between his child and himself due to his refusal to comply with the requirements of the treatment program. The court found that the offender's Eighth Amendment rights were not violated by a requirement that he participate in a treatment program that required him to admit that he had committed a sex offense, or forego visitation privileges with his child and the opportunity to earn good time credits at the higher rate available to other prisoners. The department of corrections had a policy that inmates who refuse to participate in labor, educational or work programs, or who refuse to undergo recommended treatment programs, are placed on a Restricted Privileges Status. Because of his placement in Restricted Privileges Status, the offender: (1) could not have a television or radio in his cell; (2) could not use tobacco; (3) had no canteen privileges; (4) had certain personal property removed from his cell; (5) could not engage in recreation with other prisoners; and (6) was required to wear orange pants. Wrinkles v. *Davis, 311 F.Supp.2d 735 (N.D.Ind. 2004). Death row inmates at a state prison brought a § 1983 action in state court, alleging that a 79-day lockdown of the death row area violated their constitutional rights. The lockdown had been implemented after a death row inmate was killed during recreation, apparently by other death row inmates. The court held that ceasing, for security reasons, allowing religious volunteers into the death row unit for group religious services and for spiritual discussions during the lockdown did not violate the inmates' First Amendment right to practice their religion. The court also found no violation for the alleged denial of inmates' access to telephones for 55 days, to hygiene services for 65 days, to hot meals for 30 days, and to exercise equipment. According to the court, suspending all personal visits to death row inmates for the first 54 days of the lockdown did not violate the inmates' First Amendment rights, where visitation privileges were a matter subject to the discretion of prison officials. Bazzetta v. *McGinnis, 423 F.3d 557 (6th Cir. 2005). A class of state prisoners challenged restrictions on visitation. The district court entered judgment for the plaintiffs and the appeals court affirmed. The U.S. Supreme Court reversed and remanded. On remand, the district court declined to dissolve its injunctive order of compliance and the state corrections department appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded, finding that the department regulation that restricted visitation did not, on its face, violate procedural due process. The court noted that prisoners do not have a protected liberty interest in visitation. The regulation indefinitely precluded visitation from persons other than attorneys or clergy for prisoner with two or more substance abuse violations. The appeals court opened its decision by stating "This case marks another chapter in a ten-year controversy between incarcerated felons, their visitors, and the Michigan Department of Corrections." DeToledo v. *County of Suffolk, 379 F.Supp.2d 138 (D.Mass. 2005). A jail visitor who was arrested and briefly detained on an arrest warrant that was intended for another person, and a visitor who was arrested and strip searched on a warrant for her arrest that had been recalled, brought an action against correctional officers, a jail supervisor and the county. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants in part, and denied it in part. The court held that the supervisor's negligent conduct in mistakenly ordering the arrest of the wrong person did not rise to the level of a due process violation that would support a claim under § 1983, where the supervisor made a reasonable assumption as to the warrant target's location in the visiting area and immediately rescinded the arrest when he was alerted to his mistake by another officer. The court found that a fact issue precluded summary judgment in favor of the supervisor for arresting the second visitor, noting that the supervisor had in his hands documents which, if read, would have revealed that the arrest warrant had been recalled. The court granted summary judgment to low-ranking correctional officers who conducted a strip search on the second visitor under then-existing policies that called for strip searches of prisoners. According to the court, reasonable officers in their positions would not have known that their actions would violate the Fourth Amendment. Neumeyer v. *Beard, 421 F.3d 210 (3rd Cir. 2005). Prison visitors filed a § 1983 action seeking a declaration that the prison's practice of subjecting visitors' vehicles to random searches violated their constitutional rights. The district court entered summary judgment in favor of the defendants and the visitors appealed. The appeals court affirmed, holding that the prison's practice of engaging in suspicionless searches of prison visitors' vehicles was valid under the special needs doctrine. According to the court, the relatively minor inconvenience of the searches, balanced against the prison officials' special need to maintain the security and safety of the prison, rose beyond their general need to enforce the law. The court noted that some inmates have outside work details and may have access to the vehicles. The prison had posted large signs at all entranceways to the prison and immediately in front of the visitors' parking lot that stated "…all persons, vehicles and personal property entering or brought on these grounds are subject to search…" Visitors are asked to sign a Consent to Search Vehicle form before a search is conducted and if they refuse they are denied entry into the prison and are asked to leave the premises. Lonegan v. *Hasty, 436 F.Supp.2d 419 (E.D.N.Y. 2006). Defense attorneys brought a Bivens action against officials of a federal Bureau of Prisons (BOP) facility, claiming that the statutory and constitutional rights of themselves and their inmate clients were violated through the practice of videotaping meetings. The district court denied the defendants' motion to dismiss in part, and granted it in part. The court held that: (1) the statute of limitations had not run on the claim that the Wiretap Act was violated; (2) a claim was stated that conversations were actually recorded, as required under the Wiretap Act; (3) a claim was stated that the interception was intentional; (4) a claim was stated that "oral communications" were made with the expectation that they not be recorded; (5) there was no qualified immunity from the Wiretap Act claims; (6) a claim was stated under the Fourth Amendment; (7) there was no qualified immunity from the Fourth Amendment claim; (8) a claim of personal involvement by a warden was stated; and (9) the availability of Fourth Amendment relief precluded a claim under Fifth Amendment. The plaintiffs, attorneys employed by the Legal Aid Society of New York, claimed that, by secretly recording their conversations with certain detainees at the federal Bureau of Prisons' Metropolitan Detention Center ("MDC"), located in Brooklyn, New York, the defendants violated Title III of the Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act of 1968, as amended (the "Wiretap Act" or "Title III"), and the Fourth and Fifth Amendments of the U.S. Constitution. BOP personnel told the attorneys that video cameras were not on during their meeting with their clients, but a subsequent BOP investigation concluded that visual and sound recordings existed for many of the attorney/client meetings. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. According to the court, the county jail's policy prohibiting friends from visiting the pretrial detainee did not violate due process, where the detainee had free access to visits by family clergy and counsel to the extent that they wished to visit him, the detainee had the free use of a telephone in his cell to speak with his friends, and the detainee sent and received over 200 letters while at jail. A visitor to a state treatment and detention facility brought a § 1983 action against facility officers, alleging that she was illegally searched prior to visits. The visitor moved to proceed in forma pauperis, and the district court granted the motion. The court held that the visitor stated Fourth Amendment claims based on unreasonable patdowns and "Rapiscan" scans, an invasion of privacy claim, and an assault and battery claim. The visitor alleged that she was illegally searched prior to visits, claiming invasion of privacy under Illinois law based on intrusion upon seclusion, alleging that her virtual naked image was captured through the Rapiscan machine, kept, and viewed hours later by officers. The court noted that the visitor was neither a patient nor under any criminal investigation. The visitor also alleged that an officer caused her to reasonably believe that she would place her fingers in the visitor's vaginal area, and physically touched her in such a manner at least four times. The superintendent and supervisor moved for summary judgment and the district court granted the motion. The court held that the plaintiffs did not have a due process liberty interest in participation in the conjugal visit program, nor did they have a fundamental right to participate in the conjugal visit program, for equal protection purposes. The court held that the officials' requirement that the inmate and his wife show, through proper documentation, the validity of their marriage as a prerequisite to participation in the facility's conjugal visit program, rationally furthered a legitimate government interest, and thus, the officials were not liable to inmate and his wife under § 1983. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the sheriff and officials. The court held that the inmate failed to allege any injury in fact and thus lacked standing. The court held that the allegations, even if proven, did not violate any First Amendment right of the inmate to have visitors, in that it was reasonable for officials to require visitors to remove scarves to determine that they were not attempting to bring in contraband, and he was not denied visitors, given that visitors were simply required to agree to certain conditions before being allowed to see an inmate. A prison visitor filed an action against the federal Bureau of Prisons (BOP) and the United States Department of Justice under the Federal Tort Claims Act (FTCA) claiming wrongful denial of inmate visitation. The district court dismissed the case for lack of subject matter jurisdiction. The court held that the United States had to be named as a defendant in an action under the Federal Tort Claims Act (FTCA) and that the plaintiff visitor had to provide grounds for relief under Texas law in order to recover. The plaintiff had traveled from Illinois to the Greater El Paso area "for the purpose of visiting her husband," who at the time was a prisoner at the BOP's Federal Satellite Low La Tuna facility. She alleged that upon arriving at La Tuna, a BOP agent selected her for contraband testing pursuant to a mandate from the Director and testing was accomplished using a device called the Ion Spectrometer. The test was positive and the plaintiff was denied visitation with her husband. (Low La Tuna Facility, Federal Bureau of Prisons, Texas)

Davis v. Peters, 566 F.Supp.2d 790 (N.D.Ill. 2008). A detainee who was civilly committed pursuant to the Sexually Violent Persons Commitment Act sued the current and former facility directors of the Illinois Department of Human Services' (DHS) Treatment and Detention Facility (TDF), where the detainee was housed, as well as two former DHS Secretaries, and the current DHS Secretary. The detainee claimed that the conditions of his confinement violated his constitutional rights to equal protection and substantive due process. After a bench trial, the district court held that the practice of searching the detainee prior to his visits with guests and attorneys violated his substantive due process rights. The court noted that strip searches of a detainee prior to his court appearances and upon his return to the institution did not violate substantive due process, where detainees were far more likely to engage in successful escapes if they could carry concealed items during their travel to court, and searches upon their return were closely connected with the goal of keeping contraband out of the facility. The court held that the practice of conducting strip searches of the detainee prior to his visits with guests and attorneys was not within the bounds of professional judgment, and thus, violated the detainee's substantive due process rights, where the only motivation for such searches appeared to be a concern that a detainee would bring a weapon into the meeting, and most weapons should have been detectable through a pat-down search. King v. Caruso, 542 F.Supp.2d 703 (E.D. Mich. 2008). The wife of a state prison inmate brought suit against prison officials alleging violation of her First Amendment rights, her Equal Protection rights, and her Fourteenth Amendment due process rights when her visitation rights were withdrawn for attempting to smuggle a cell phone into an institution. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants. The court held that termination of the spouse's visitation rights did not violate her First Amendment right to freedom of association nor did it infringe upon any liberty interest for purposes of procedural or substantive due process. The court noted that a hearing on the cutoff of visitor's rights could be conducted by a division of the Department of Corrections and that hearing procedures did not deny the spouse procedural due process with respect to any liberty interest she might possess. The court found that the termination was reasonably related to penological interests and did not violate equal protection. (Chippewa Correctional Facility, Michigan)

Delaney v. District of Columbia, 659 F.Supp.2d 185 (D.D.C. 2009). A former inmate and his wife brought a § 1983 action, on behalf of themselves and their child, against the District of Columbia and several D.C. officials and employees, alleging various constitutional violations related to the inmate's incarceration for criminal contempt due to his admitted failure to pay child support. They also alleged the wife encountered difficulties when she and her child attempted to visit the husband at the D.C. jail. The defendants moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the inmate's wife did not allege that any District of Columbia custom or policy caused the alleged violation of her Fourth Amendment right against unreasonable seizure, precluding her § 1983 claim against a D.C. corrections official, even if the corrections officer's request that the inmate's wife wait to speak to a corrections official prior to exiting the visiting area constituted a seizure. The court held that an attorney, who was an African-American woman, stated a § 1983 claim against the District of Columbia and D.C. jail official for violations of her Fifth Amendment due process rights by alleging that an official refused to allow her to visit her clients at the jail based on her gender and race. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the organization. The court held that the requested information was likely to contribute to increased public understanding of government activities, would reach a reasonably broad group of interested persons, and would contribute significantly to public understanding of government activities. The court noted that the organization would analyze and synthesize technical information to relay to prisoners and their families via a website, online newsletter, and Internet chat room that would disseminate information to a sufficiently broad audience. According to the court, the requested information was not yet in the public domain, so that any dissemination by the organization would enhance public understanding of the technology in centralized and easily accessible forums. Hill v. Washington State Dept. of Corrections, 628 F.Supp.2d 1250 (W.D.Wash. 2009). An inmate and his wife brought a § 1983 action against a state department of corrections and various prison officials, alleging a prison regulation regarding extended family visits (EFV) violated their equal protection rights. The district court dismissed the action as moot. On subsequent determination, the district court held that: (1) the inmate did not have a constitutionally protected right to conjugal visits with his wife; (2) the inmate and his wife were not absolutely entitled to equal treatment under EFV policy; (3) EFV regulations were rationally related to a legitimate penological interest; (4) prison officials were entitled to summary judgment; and (5) prison officials had Eleventh Amendment immunity from the § 1983 action. The court noted that denial of prison access to a particular visitor is well within the terms of confinement ordinarily contemplated by a prison sentence, and access to a particular visitor is not independently protected by the Due Process Clause. The challenged EFV policy only allowed those spouses who were legally married to inmates prior to incarceration to participate in extended family visitation. The defendants moved for summary judgment and the district court granted the motion in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether detention center personnel failed to protect the prisoner from an attack by another prisoner. The court held that the prisoner stated a free exercise of religion claim under the First Amendment by alleging that detention center personnel prevented him from practicing the central tenet of his faith of regularly reading his Bible for 19 days while he was in protective custody. According to the court, the prisoner's First Amendment freedom of association and speech rights had not been violated by denial of his visitation, phone, and mailing privileges for two days as the direct result of the prisoner committing a disciplinary infraction while he was in protective custody. Mosher v. Nelson, 589 F.3d 488 (1st Cir. 2009). The administrator of the estate of a pretrial detainee who was killed at a state mental health hospital by another patient brought an action against the superintendent of the hospital, the commissioner of the state department of corrections (DOC), and other state officials, alleging civil rights violations and state-law claims. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The administrator appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the superintendent of the state mental health hospital and the commissioner of the state department of corrections were entitled to qualified immunity from § 1983 liability on the deliberate indifference claim. According to the court, although the patient was able to strangle the detainee while the detainee was visiting the patient in his room, the hospital had a long-standing policy that allowed patients to visit in each others' rooms during the short period during the end of the morning patient count and lunch. The court noted that there was no history of violence or individualized threats made by any patient, and reasonable officials could have believed that allowing the visiting policy to continue and maintaining the current staffing levels at the hospital would not cause a substantial risk of harm. Samford v. Dretke, 562 F.3d 674 (5th Cir. 2009). A state prison inmate brought an in forma pauperis § 1983 action against a corrections official, alleging that a prohibition against any communication between the inmate and his sons constituted a violation of his First Amendment rights to freedom of speech and association. The district court dismissed the petition and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the enforcement of a "negative mail list" that included the inmate's sons did not unduly infringe upon the inmate's First Amendment rights, and the officials' removal of the inmate's sons from the approved visitors list was reasonable. The court found that the restriction was rationally related to the prison's legitimate interest in protecting crime victims and their families from unwanted communications, given the inmate's wife's request that the sons be placed on the list and the fact that the inmate had been imprisoned after violating a probation condition of no contact with the sons. The court noted that an alternate means of communication remained open via the inmate's mother. (Texas Department of Criminal Justice)

Shariff v. Coombe, 655 F.Supp.2d 274 (S.D.N.Y. 2009). Disabled prisoners who depended on wheelchairs for mobility filed an action against a state and its employees asserting claims pursuant to Title II of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), Title V of Rehabilitation Act, New York State Correction Law, and First, Eighth, and Fourteenth Amendments. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the existence of potholes and broken concrete in state prison yards did not constitute a violation of the Eighth Amendment's prohibition on cruel and unusual punishment as to disabled prisoners who depended on wheelchairs for mobility, even if those prisoners had fallen and suffered injuries as a result. According to the court, the inaccessibility of telephones throughout a state prison, inaccessibility of a family reunion site, inaccessibility of a law library, and malfunctioning of a school elevator, that did not cause any physical harm or pain to disabled prisoners who depended on wheelchairs for mobility, were not the kind of deprivations that denied a basic human need, and thus did not constitute a violation of the Eighth Amendment's prohibition on cruel and unusual punishment. Sparks v. Seltzer, 607 F.Supp.2d 437 (E.D.N.Y. 2009). A psychiatric patient, on behalf of himself and all others similarly situated, brought a § 1983 action against a director and a treatment team leader at a psychiatric center in a New York state psychiatric hospital. The patient was housed in an inpatient, long-term locked ward which normally houses a mixture of voluntary patients, patients who have been involuntarily committed under the civil law, and patients committed as a result of a verdict of not guilty by reason of mental disease or defect or a finding of incompetence to stand trial. The patient alleged violations of his First Amendment rights and his "zone of privacy" concerning a supervised visitation policy. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants. The court held that the psychiatric patients' speech during supervised visits at a state psychiatric hospital was not wholly unprotected by the First Amendment, although the speech was casual and among family members or friends. According to the court, the reluctance of psychiatric patients in the state psychiatric hospital to discuss various matters within the earshot of a supervising guard during supervised visitation did not give rise to a cognizable injury to their free speech rights. The court noted that no patient had lost privileges, had the term of involuntary hospitalization extended, or had otherwise been punished or threatened with being punished for anything he or a visitor had said in a supervised visit. Patients were not required to speak loudly enough to be heard, guards did not generally report the contents of conversations to hospital authorities, and no sound recordings of the visits were made. The court held that the state psychiatric hospital's supervised visitation policy imposed upon patients did not invade their "zone of privacy" in violation of the Fourth Amendment, since patients had no reasonable expectation of privacy in a hospital visiting room which could be entered by anyone during a visit and which was used by more than one patient at a time for visits. The court found that the supervised visitation policy did not, on its face or applied to patients, infringe upon their privacy rights under the Fourteenth Amendment. Durrenberger v. Texas Dept. of Criminal Justice, 757 F.Supp.2d 640 (S.D.Tex. 2010). A hearing impaired prison visitor brought an action against the Texas Department of Criminal Justice (TDCJ), alleging failure to accommodate his disability during visits in violation of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) and Rehabilitation Act. The district court denied summary judgment for the defendants and granted summary judgment, in part, for the visitor.

The court held that acceptance by the Texas Department of Criminal Justice (TDCJ) of federal financial assistance waived its Eleventh Amendment immunity from the prison visitor's action alleging disability discrimination in violation of the Rehabilitation Act, where the Act expressly stated that acceptance of federal funds waived immunity.

According to the court, the hearing impaired prison visitor was substantially limited in his ability to communicate with others, and therefore, was disabled for the purposes of his action alleging the prison failed to accommodate his disability in violation of the Rehabilitation Act. The court noted that it was difficult for the visitor to hear when a speaker was not in close proximity to him or when background noise was present, he could not use telephones without amplification devices, and he could not use the telephones in prison visitation rooms.

The court held that the Texas Department of Criminal Justice (TDCJ) failed to provide accommodations to the visitor that would allow the visitor to participate in the visitation program, even though TDCJ allowed the visitor to use the end booth furthest away from the noise of other visitors and made pen and paper available. The court noted that the end booth was not always available, the visitor was still unable to hear while in the end booth, and passing notes was qualitatively different from in-person visitation. The court held that the prison visitor's request for contact visits with the inmate was not a reasonable accommodation for his disability, for the purposes of his Rehabilitation Act failure to accommodate claim, where the inmate was in prison for violently assaulting the visitor, and contact visits required additional staffing and security. According to the court, the provision of a telephone amplification device to the visitor would have been a reasonable accommodation for his disability, where the devices were readily available for approximately $15 to $100. The court also found that allowing the visitor to use an attorney client booth during visitation would have been a reasonable accommodation for his disability, where use of the booth would not fundamentally alter the visitation program, and the booth could be searched before and after visits for contraband.

The court held that summary judgment as to compensatory damages was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to the amount of damages suffered by the visitor by the prison's failure to accommodate his disability.

The court found that a permanent injunction enjoining future violations of the Rehabilitation Act by the Texas Department of Criminal Justice (TDCJ) was warranted in the hearing impaired prison visitor's action alleging failure to accommodate, where TDCJ had not accommodated the visitor in the past, continued to not provide accommodations and gave no indication that it intended to provide any in the future. Mashburn v. Yamhill County, 698 F.Supp.2d 1233 (D.Or. 2010). A class action was brought on behalf of juvenile detainees against a county and officials, challenging strip-search procedures at a juvenile detention facility. The parties cross-moved for summary judgment. The court held that the scope of an admission strip-search policy applied to juvenile detainees was excessive in relation to the government's legitimate interests, in contravention of the Fourth Amendment. According to the court, notwithstanding the county's general obligation to care for and protect juveniles, the searches were highly intrusive, the county made no effort to mitigate the scope and intensity of the searches, and less intrusive alternatives existed. The court found that county officials failed to establish a reasonable relationship between their legitimate interests and post-contact visit strip-searches performed on juvenile detainees, as required under the Fourth Amendment. The court noted that the searches occurred irrespective of whether there was an individualized suspicion that a juvenile had acquired contraband, and most contact visits occurred between juveniles and counsel or therapists. A group of prisoners who were, or who had been, incarcerated in communication management units (CMU) at federal correctional institutions (FCI) designed to monitor high-risk prisoners filed suit against the United States Attorney General, the federal Bureau of Prisons (BOP), and BOP officials, alleging that CMU incarceration violated the First, Fifth, and Eighth Amendments. Four additional prisoners moved to intervene and the defendants moved to dismiss. The district court denied the motion to intervene, and granted the motion to dismiss in part and denied in part. The court held that even though a federal prisoner who had been convicted of solicitation of bank robbery was no longer housed in the federal prison's communication management unit (CMU), he had standing under Article III to pursue constitutional claims against the Bureau of Prisons (BOP) for alleged violations since there was a realistic threat that he might be redesignated to a CMU. The court noted that the prisoner had originally been placed in CMU because of the nature of his underlying conviction and because of his alleged efforts to radicalize other inmates, and these reasons for placing him in CMU remained.

The court found that the restrictions a federal prison put on prisoners housed within a communication management unit (CMU), which included that all communications be conducted in English, that visits were monitored and subject to recording, that each prisoner received only eight visitation hours per month, and that prisoners' telephone calls were limited and subjected to monitoring, did not violate the prisoners' alleged First Amendment right to family integrity, since the restrictions were rationally related to a legitimate penological interest. The court noted that prisoners assigned to the unit typically had offenses related to international or domestic terrorism or had misused approved communication methods while incarcerated.

The court found that prisoners confined to a communication management unit (CMU), stated a procedural due process claim against the Bureau of Prisons (BOP) by alleging that the requirements imposed on CMU prisoners were significantly different than those imposed on prisoners in the general population, and that there was a significant risk that procedures used by the BOP to review whether prisoners should initially be placed within CMU or should continue to be incarcerated there had resulted in erroneous deprivation of their liberty interests. The court noted that CMU prisoners were allowed only eight hours of non-contact visitation per month and two 15 minute telephone calls per week, while the general population at a prison was not subjected to a cap on visitation and had 300 minutes of telephone time per month. The court also noted that the administrative review of CMU status, conducted by officials in Washington, D.C., rather than at a unit itself, was allegedly so vague and generic as to render it illusory. The court found that a federal prisoner stated a First Amendment retaliation claim against the Bureau of Prisons (BOP) by alleging: (1) that he was “an outspoken and litigious prisoner;” (2) that he had written books about improper prison conditions and filed grievances and complaints on his own behalf; (3) that his prison record contained “no serious disciplinary infractions” and “one minor communications-related infraction” from 1997; (4) that prison staff told him he would be “sent east” if he continued filing complaints; and (5) that he filed a complaint about that alleged threat and he was then transferred to a high-risk inmate monitoring communication management unit (CMU) at a federal correctional institution. (Communication Management Units at Federal Correctional Institutions in Terre Haute, Indiana and Marion, Illinois)

Battle v. A & E Television Networks, LLC, 837 F.Supp.2d 767 (M.D.Tenn. 2011). A wife who had unwittingly been filmed by a television crew at a maximum security prison while visiting her husband who was an inmate there filed suit against a television producer and a television network alleging defamation/false light and intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) when the program was aired on the national television network. The defendants moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that, under Tennessee law, the television program which aired on a national network depicting the wife visiting her inmate husband in a maximum security prison, and which contained a voice-over explaining how drugs and contraband were passed to prisoners from outsiders, was capable of a defamatory meaning, and thus the wife stated a claim for defamation/false light against the television producer and the network. According to the court, the stream of audio and visual components interacting with each other suggested that the wife was a drug smuggler, and even though the program indicated that a search of the wife revealed no drugs, the overall impression was that the wife just happened not to get caught on that particular day. But the court found that the actions of television producer and network were not so outrageous as to be beyond all bounds of decency or utterly intolerable in a civilized community, as required to support claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, since the program could also be understood to suggest that the plaintiff had not brought drugs into the facility. The program, "The Squad: Prison Police," was aired by A & E Television Networks, LLC. (Riverbend Maximum Security Institution, Nashville, Tennessee)

McCollum v. California Dept. of Corrections and Rehabilitation, 647 F.3d 870 (9th Cir. 2011). Inmates and a volunteer prison chaplain brought an action against the California Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation (CDCR) and others, challenging CDCR's paid chaplaincy program, and alleging retaliation for bringing such a suit. The defendants moved to dismiss and for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion to dismiss the inmates' claims in part, dismissed the chaplain's Establishment Clause claim for lack of standing, and granted summary judgment on the chaplain's remaining claims. The plaintiffs appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the inmates' grievances failed to alert CDCR that inmates sought redress for wrongs allegedly perpetuated by CDCR's chaplaincy-hiring program, as required to exhaust under the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA). According to the court, while the inmates' grievances gave notice that the inmates alleged the prison policies failed to provide for certain general Wiccan religious needs and free exercise, they did not provide notice that the source of the perceived problem was the absence of a paid Wiccan chaplaincy. But the court found that an inmate's grievance alleging he requested that the prison's administration contact and allow visitation by clergy of his own Wiccan faith, which was denied because his chaplain was not a regular paid chaplain, was sufficient to put CDCR on notice that the paid-chaplaincy hiring policy was the root cause of the inmate's complaint and thus preserved his ability to challenge that policy under PLRA. According to the court, there was no direct evidence of a retaliatory motive by the prison employee who restricted the Wiccan prison chaplain's access to a prison, as required to support the chaplain's First Amendment retaliation claim. The court noted that the incident resulting in restricted access occurred nearly three years after the chaplain filed a lawsuit against CDCR, and an employee's knowledge of the suit, alone, was insufficient to raise a genuine issue of material fact as to a retaliatory motive. Roseboro v. Gillespie, 791 F.Supp.2d 353 (S.D.N.Y. 2011.) A federal prisoner brought a pro se Bivens action against two prison correction officers and a prison counselor, alleging violations of his due process rights, cruel and unusual punishment, and retaliation for filing prison grievances. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The court held that the prisoner could not prove that a prison counselor failed to process his visitor requests and filed a false incident report against him in retaliation for filing a grievance against a corrections officer, as required to establish a retaliation claim under the First Amendment, even if the alleged retaliation occurred close in time to the filing of the grievance. The court noted that the prisoner presented no evidence that the counselor's conduct was motivated by in an intent to retaliate, that she even knew about the grievance, or that the one month time for processing a visitor request was unusually long, and at least one visitor request was denied for the non-retaliatory reason that the visitor had a criminal record. Pouncil v. Tilton, 704 F.3d 568 (9th Cir. 2012). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action alleging that denials by prison officials of his request for a conjugal visit with his wife violated the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA) and the First Amendment by interfering with his practice of a tenet of his Islamic faith requiring him to marry, consummate his marriage, and father children. The district court denied a prison official's motion to dismiss the prisoner's claims as untimely, and the official appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that notwithstanding a prior denial pursuant to the same regulation, denial of the prisoner's second request for a conjugal visit was a separate, discrete act, triggering running of the statute of limitations on the prisoner's Section 1983 claim against prison officials for violation of his First Amendment and RLUIPA rights. Sledge v. U.S., 883 F.Supp.2d 71 (D.D.C. 2012). A federal inmate's relatives brought an action under the Federal Tort Claims Act (FTCA) against the United States, alleging claims for personal injury and wrongful death based on the failure of Bureau of Prisons (BOP) employees to prevent or stop an attack on the inmate. The attack resulted in the inmate's hospitalization and death. The relatives also sought to recover for emotional distress that the inmate and his mother allegedly suffered when BOP employees denied bedside visitation between the mother and the inmate. Following dismissal of some of the claims, the United States moved to dismiss the remaining claims based on FTCA's discretionary function exception. The district court granted the motion. The court found that a correction officer's decision to position himself outside the housing unit, rather than in the sally port, to smoke a cigarette during a controlled move was discretionary, and thus the United States was immune from liability under the Federal Tort Claims Act's (FTCA) discretionary function exception. The court noted that the prison lacked mandatory guidelines that required correctional staff to follow a particular course of action regarding supervision of inmates during controlled moves, and the officer's decision implicated policy concerns, in that it required consideration of the risks posed by inmates moving throughout prison, and required safety and security calculations. The court held that the mother of the deceased federal inmate failed to state a claim for negligent infliction of emotional distress, under Missouri law, arising from the Bureau of Prisons' (BOP) denial of bedside visitation between the mother and inmate, absent allegations that the BOP should have realized that its failure to complete a visitation memorandum involved an unreasonable risk of causing distress, or facts necessary to demonstrate that the mother's emotional distress was "medically diagnosable" and was of sufficient severity as to be "medically significant." The court found that the Bureau of Prisons' (BOP) alleged decision not to allow the mother of federal inmate, who was in coma after being severely beaten by a fellow inmate, to visit her son after the BOP allegedly failed to complete a visitation memorandum, was not so outrageous in character, and so extreme in degree, as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency, and to be regarded as atrocious, and utterly intolerable in civilized community, thus precluding the mother's intentional infliction of emotional distress claim under Missouri law. Chappell v. Mandeville, 706 F.3d 1052 (9th Cir. 2013). A state prison inmate brought a § 1983 action against prison officials, alleging violations of the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments. The defendants moved for summary judgment on the ground of qualified immunity and the district court granted summary judgment as to some, but not all, of the claims. The defendants appealed. The appeals court reversed. The appeals court held that: (1) it was not clearly established that subjecting the prison inmate to a contraband watch violated the Eighth Amendment prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment, and thus prison officials were entitled to qualified immunity on the Eighth Amendment claim; (2) the contraband watch was not such an extreme change in conditions of confinement as to trigger due-process protection; and (3) it was not clearly established whether a state-created liberty interest existed with regard to the contraband watch, and thus officials were entitled to qualified immunity on the claim that the inmate's right to due process was violated because he was not provided with an opportunity to be heard by the official who ordered contraband watch. The inmate's fiancée had visited him, and when she entered the prison she was wearing a ponytail hairpiece. The next day the hairpiece was discovered in a trash can near the visiting room. Prison officials then searched the entire visiting area and found spandex undergarments in the women's bathroom. Both the hairpiece and the undergarments tested positive for cocaine residue. Prison staff conducted a search of the inmate's cell, during which they notified him that they believed that someone had introduced drugs through a hairpiece. The officials discovered three unlabelled bottles of what appeared to be eye drops in the inmate's cell. The liquid in the bottles tested positive for methamphetamine. The inmate was then placed on a contraband watch. The contraband watch conditions included 24-hour lighting, mattress deprivation, taping the inmate into two pairs of underwear and jumpsuits, placing him in a hot cell with no ventilation, chaining him to an iron bed, shackling him at the ankles and waist, and forcing him to eat "like a dog." Corso v. Fischer, 983 F.Supp.2d 320 (S.D.N.Y. 2013). A correctional officer brought an action against the Commissioner of the New York Department of Corrections and Community Supervision's (DOCCS), alleging DOCCS's work rule prohibiting personal association of DOCCS employees with current and former inmates and their associates was overbroad, in violation of the First Amendment. The parties cross-moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the officer's motion. The court held that the work rule was facially overbroad in violation of the First Amendment, where DOCCS had enforced the rule against the officer and denied her the right to associate with her former husband and the father of her grandchild.

The court found that the rule was not narrowly tailored to further the State's compelling interest in maintaining safe and orderly administration of its prisons, as applied to constitutionally protected close familial relationships, and thus, did not withstand strict scrutiny on the First Amendment overbreadth claim. The court noted that the rule provided no temporal or geographical limitation with respect to the former inmate's incarceration, nor did its prohibition account for variations in the seriousness of that person's offense or his or her prison disciplinary history. The court found that the rule was substantially overbroad, in violation of the First Amendment, as applied to close familial relationships, where the rule would prevent a DOCCS employee from visiting, or even corresponding with an incarcerated spouse if the couple had no children or if their children did not maintain a relationship with the incarcerated parent, and the rule prohibited employees from ever reestablishing contact with a spouse, child, sibling, or parent when that person was released and became a "former inmate." Royer v. Federal Bureau of Prisons, 933 F.Supp.2d 170 (D.D.C. 2013). A federal prisoner brought an action against Bureau of Prisoners (BOP), alleging classification as a "terrorist inmate" resulted in violations of the Privacy Act and the First and Fifth Amendments. The BOP moved for summary judgment and to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that BOP rules prohibiting contact visits and limiting noncontact visits and telephone time for federal inmates labeled as "terrorist inmates", more than other inmates, had a rational connection to a legitimate government interest, for the purpose of the inmate's action alleging the rules violated his First Amendment rights of speech and association. According to the court, the prison had an interest in monitoring the inmate's communications and the prison isolated inmates who could pose a threat to others or to the orderly operation of the institution. The court noted that the rules did not preclude the inmate from using alternative means to communicate with his family, where the inmate could send letters, the telephone was available to him, and he could send messages through others allowed to visit. The court found that the inmate's assertions that the prison already had multiple cameras and hypersensitive microphones, and that officers strip searched inmates before and after contact visits, did not establish ready alternatives to a prohibition on contact visits for the inmate and limits on phone usage and noncontact visits due to being labeled as a "terrorist inmate." The court noted that increasing the number of inmates subject to strip searches increased the cost of visitation, and microphones and cameras did not obviate all security concerns that arose from contact visits, such as covert notes or hand signals. The court held that the inmate's allegations that he was segregated from the prison's general population for over six years, that he was subject to restrictions on recreational, religious, and educational opportunities available to other inmates, that contact with his family was limited to one 15 minute phone call per week during business hours when his children were in school, and that he was limited to two 2-hour noncontact visits per month, were sufficient to plead harsh and atypical conditions, as required for his Fifth Amendment procedural due process claim. Williams v. Ozmint, 716 F.3d 801 (4th Cir. 2013). An inmate, proceeding pro se, brought a § 1983 action in state court against a warden, alleging that suspension of his visitation privileges for two years violated the First, Fifth, Eight, and Fourteenth Amendments. Following removal to federal court, the district court granted the warden's motion for summary judgment. The inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part and dismissed in part. The appeals court held that: (1) the inmate did not have clearly established right to visitation; (2) the inmate's claim for injunctive relief was rendered moot when the inmate received restoration of his visitation privileges; (3) there was no evidence that the inmate would be deprived of his visitation privileges in the absence of any culpable conduct on his part; and (4) the inmate's request for "any other relief that seems just and proper" was insufficient to state a claim for declaratory relief. Hernandez v. Montanez, 36 F.Supp.3d 202 (D.Mass. 2014). A prison visitor brought a civil rights action against corrections officers, alleging that a strip-search violated § 1983, the Massachusetts Civil Rights Act (MCRA), and the Massachusetts Privacy Act (MPA). The corrections officers moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the officers did not have reasonable suspicion to strip-search the female prison visitor based on an anonymous tip by an inmate on the prison hotline that another inmate would be receiving drugs from an unidentified visitor. The court noted that the officers had no knowledge of the source of the single anonymous tip or how the source had received his information, and there was no evidence that the anonymous tipster or hotline had provided reliable information in the past. The court found that an objectively reasonable prison official would not have believed that he had reasonable suspicion to strip-search the visitor, and thus the prison official and the corrections officers were not entitled to qualified immunity from visitor's Fourth Amendment claim arising from the strip-search. The court noted that the officers knew that the inmate had enemies in the prison and that inmates often used the hotline to harass other prisoners, and there was no evidence that the visitor was involved in drug activity. Crawford v. Cuomo, 796 F.3d 252 (2nd Cir. 2015). A current state prisoner and a former state prisoner brought an action against a corrections officer, the officer's supervisor, and state officials, alleging that the corrections officer sexually abused them in violation of their Eighth Amendment protection against cruel and unusual punishment, and seeking damages and injunctive relief. The district court dismissed the action for failure to state a claim. The current and former prisoners appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The court held that one prisoner's allegation that the corrections officer, in frisking the prisoner during the prisoner's visit with his wife, fondled and squeezed the prisoner's penis in order to make sure that prisoner did not have an erection, stated a claim for sexual abuse in violation of his Eighth Amendment protection against cruel and unusual punishment. The court found that a prisoner's allegation that the corrections officer, in searching the prisoner after the prisoner left a mess hall, squeezed and fondled the prisoner's penis and roamed his hands down the prisoner's thigh, while making demeaning comments such as "[t]hat doesn't feel like a penis to me" and "I'll run my hands up the crack of your ass if I want to," stated a claim for sexual abuse in violation of the Eighth Amendment protection against cruel and unusual punishment. Jackson v. Humphrey, 776 F.3d 1232 (11th Cir. 2015). A wife brought an action under § 1983 against corrections officials, claiming that revocation of her visitation privileges with her incarcerated husband who was on a hunger strike violated the First Amendment. The district court granted summary judgment, based on qualified immunity, in favor of the officials, for their decision to terminate the wife's visitation privileges during the time of hunger strike. The court denied summary judgment to the officials for the period following the end of the hunger strike, ruling that the question of whether the officials continued to enjoy qualified immunity after the hunger strike ended was one for a jury. The officials appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded, finding that the officials were entitled to qualified immunity. According to the court, the officials' decision had been motivated by lawful considerations even though it had consequences in the future, where the husband had a considerable amount of influence over other prisoners and considered himself, and was viewed by others, to be the leader of the hunger strike. The court noted that evidence suggested that the wife had urged her husband to prolong that strike after the strike had ended, and the officials were legitimately concerned that the strike might spread, about the disruption caused by the strike, and about the security and safety of staff and inmates. Knight v. Washington State Department of Corrections, 147 F.Supp.3d 1165 (W.D. Wash. 2015). A prison visitor who suffered from a seizure disorder, and was subjected to a strip search and pat-down searches, brought an action against the state Department of Corrections (DOC) and DOC officials, alleging that the searches violated the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA). The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion, finding that: (1)the strip search and pat-down searches did not violate ADA; (2) guards did not act with deliberate indifference in conducting a strip search; (3) the prison was not a place of public accommodation, under the Washington Law Against Discrimination, as to visitors participating in an extended family visitation program; (4) the guards' conduct was not sufficiently extreme to support an outrage claim; and (5) the guards' conduct did not support a claim for negligent infliction of emotional distress. According to the court, there was no showing that the guards proceeded in conscious disregard of a high probability of emotional distress when ordering the strip search, as the visitor suggested the strip search as an alternative to a pat search and the guards followed this suggestion, and all visitors were subjected to pat-down searches, which were justified on safety grounds. Riker v. Lemmon, 798 F.3d 546 (7th Cir. 2015). A female former prison worker brought an action against prison officials, alleging that the officials denied her request to marry an inmate in violation of her fundamental rights. The district court granted the officials' motion for summary judgment and the worker appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded, finding that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the prison's decision to deny the worker's request to marry an inmate was reasonably related to its legitimate penological interests. The worker had been an employee of Aramark Correctional Services, Inc. that operated and managed food services in the prison. She became involved with an inmate worker who was under her supervision. She quit her job after being discovered in a romantic relationship with the inmate. She was denied visiting privileges after she left her job. The former worker alleged that prohibiting her marriage to the inmate was an exaggerated response to the prison's security objectives and that the prohibition was unnecessary for the maintenance of a safe and orderly institution. She emphasized that she only sought "a single visit to the institution, of a short duration, for the limited purpose of marrying her fiancé." (Wabash Valley Correctional Facility, Indiana)

United States v. Rivera, 83 F.Supp.3d 1130 (D.Colo. 2015). A federal prisoner moved for an order directing the Bureau of Prisons (BOP) to allow him to have a face-to-face meeting with another inmate, his co-defendant in a federal prosecution. The district court denied the motion. The court held that the prisoner's Fifth Amendment right to a fair trial and his Sixth Amendment right to present witnesses in his own defense were trial rights that did not entitle him to such a "tête-à-tête" witness interview. The court found that the opportunity afforded by the BOP for defense counsel to interview the co-defendant was sufficient, even in the absence of a face-to-face meeting between the defendant and the co-defendant, to satisfy the defendant's constitutional rights. The court noted that the decision by the BOP to keep the inmates separate was supported by a legitimate penological interest in the security of the facility and the safety of its staff and inmates. Liability of several defendants, who were personally involved in a hearing that consisted of several basic constitutional flaws, would be joint and several, ruled a federal district court in New York. The inmate was awarded twenty-five dollars a day for the forty-five days he spent in a special housing unit, and the fifty-two dollars per month income from his library clerk's job that he lost during the forty-five day period. Due process violations included a right to gather facts around the marijuana incident, the failure of his assigned assistant to gather facts or respond to his requests, and the denied right to call live witnesses. His being assigned an employee assistant rather than choosing one from a list was in itself a violation, ruled the court. (Downstate Correctional Facility, New York)

State Appeals Court
ASSIGNMENT

Longval v. Commissioner of Correction, 484 N.E.2d 112 (App.Ct. Mass. 1985). Certain inmates with long prison terms which they alleged exceeded their respective life expectancies brought a suit challenging the validity of a statute pursuant to which they were denied access to the whole of their funds. The Superior Court denied relief, and the prisoners appealed. The appeals court held that a "life term" within meaning of a statute establishing a system for compensating inmates who performed good and satisfactory work in certain work programs was limited to those prisoners who were sentenced to life imprisonment and did not apply to inmates whose aggregate sentences exceeded their statistical life expectancies. WORK ASSIGNMENT

Smith v. Rowe, 761 F.2d 360 (1985). In a civil rights action brought by a former prison inmate, defendants appealed from judgment of the United States District Court. The court of appeals held that: (1) the district court did not abuse its discretion in excluding documents not listed in pretrial submission; (2) the plaintiff's failure to take other job assignments, which resulted in her continued detention and punitive segregation, did not under the circumstances amount to failure to mitigate damages as matter of law; (3) the award of compensatory damages in the amount of $80,770 was not "monstrously excessive" or shocking and did not require a new trial or remittitur; and (4) plaintiff established a prima facie case against director of the Illinois Department of Corrections. Toombs v. Hicks, 773 F.2d 995 (1985). The Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals remanded a case ruling that an inmate stated a claim for cruel and unusual punishment in being assigned a work duty beyond his physical capacity. After his medical reevaluation, he claimed he remained on squad assignment for a two-handed hoe, despite that he was classified as fit for only one-armed duty. The court said that while the inmate may ultimately prove no viable claim, he was to be given the chance to develop his case. (Arkansas Department of Correction)

DEDUCTIONS FROM PAY

Turner v. Nevada Bd. of State Prison Com'rs., 624 F.Supp. 318 (D.Nev. 1985). Nevada inmates no longer have a property right in their work wages in respect to deductions for payment to a victim's family and payment for room and board. A statute was amended to allow deductions for room and board as of 1985. Prior to 1985 the statute read as follows:

> 1. The director shall:
> a. To the greatest extent possible, establish facilities which approximate the normal conditions of training and employment in the community.
> b. To the extent practicable, require each offender, except those whose behavior is found by the director to preclude participation, to spend forty hours each week in vocational training or employment, unless excused for a medical reason.
> c. Use the earnings from services and manufacturing conducted by the institutions and the money paid by private employers who employ the offenders or lease space or facilities within the institutions to offset the costs of operating the prison system and to provide wages for the offenders being trained or employed. The director may first deduct from the wages of any offender such amounts as the director deems reasonable to meet any existing obligation of the offender for the support of his family or restitution to any victim of his crime.

The amended version was to permit maintenance deductions. It reads:

> The director may deduct from the wages earned by an offender from any source during his incarceration:
> 1. An amount determined by the director, with approval of the board, to offset the cost of maintaining the offender in the institution, as reflected in the budget of the department; and
> 2. Such amounts as the director considers reasonable to meet any existing obligation of the offender for the support of his family or restitution to any victim of his crime.

However, prior to the amended version, the court determined, inmates did have a property interest in wages not being deducted for room and board. Therefore, the court refused to dismiss claims brought by those inmates that prison officials violated their rights to due process.

Lastly, the court found no violations in equal protection in deducting wages for room and board only from inmates who earn a gross income of $75.00 or more a month. (Nevada Board of State Prison Commissioners)

TRANSFER

Adams v. James, 784 F.2d 1077 (11th Cir. 1986). Prison inmates brought an action challenging their transfers from jobs as law clerks. The United States District Court denied relief, and the inmates appealed. The court of appeals held that: (1) inmates did not have a property interest in continuing as law clerks; (2) inmates could not assert whatever interest other inmates had in being assisted by them rather than by someone else; (3) benefits which are not classified as entitlements may not be terminated for impermissible reasons; and (4) first amendment rights are identified by balancing the right asserted against the need of the prison for discipline. Several legal principles regarding prisoner writ-writing are well established. A prisoner has a right to be his own jail house lawyer. Sigafus v. Brown, 416 F.2d 105 (7th Cir. 1969). Likewise, a prisoner has the right to assistance from other inmates. Johnson v. Avery, 393 U.S. 483. (Polk Correctional Institute, Florida)

REMOVAL FROM JOB

Dupont v. Saunders, 800 F.2d 8 (1st Cir. 1986). Inmates filed suit alleging that they were wrongfully removed from their law library positions. The United States District Court denied the inmates' motion for a preliminary injunction. The inmates appealed. The court of appeals held that: (1) the inmates failed to establish irreparable harm, even though the challenged disciplinary actions deprived them of the opportunity to earn good-time credits, where they could seek a retroactive award of those credits if it was determined that they were wrongfully discharged, and where other clerks were available to serve as "writ writers" for other inmates; (2) the inmates had no vested property or liberty rights to either obtain or maintain their positions; and (3) the district court's findings that the inmates were terminated for cause and in accordance with prison regulations were not clearly erroneous, even though the inmates claimed that they were removed from their positions in retaliation for filing complaints. PAYMENT

Holton v. Fields, 638 F.Supp. 1319 (S.D. W.Va. 1986). The breach of a promise allegedly made to an inmate by a jail administrator was not actionable under 42 U.S.C.A. Section 1983. The administrator allegedly promised the inmate he would be granted day-for-day good time credit for all of the time he spent as a member of the jail paint crew. Nonpayment of wages or a disallowance of promised good time at best amounts only to an allegation of breach of contract, in the absence of a public policy requiring payment of wages or allowance of good time for work performed while in jail. Neither West Virginia law nor federal law required payment or good time credit under the circumstances. (Cabell County Jail, West Virginia)

DEDUCTION FROM WAGES

Hrbek v. Farrier, 787 F.2d 414 (8th Cir. 1986). A state prisoner brought a suit under Section 1983 following the deduction of court costs from wages he earned while in prison. The United States District Court dismissed, and the prisoner appealed. The court of appeals held that: (1) the prisoner had no constitutionally protected interest in the wages, and thus the prison officials' conduct in deducting the court costs was not actionable under Section 1983, and (2) Iowa statute allowing the deductions did not violate the equal protection clause on the basis that prisoners were being treated differently than nonprisoners, as the classes were not similarly situated and there was a rational basis for the classification. (State Penitentiary, Iowa)

U.S. District Court
IDLENESS

Morales Feliciano v. Romero Bercelo, 672 F.Supp. 591 (D. P.R. 1986). According to a federal court, prison overcrowding, inmate idleness, and the threat of violence among inmates, combined with the continuous frustrations of reasonable expectation produced by administrative incompetence, resulted in an ascertainable psychological deterioration in the Puerto Rican prison population. The psychological deterioration inflicted on inmates in the prison system was an unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain in violation of prisoners' Eighth Amendment protections against cruel and unusual punishment. Insofar as the Puerto Rican prison administration was under a statutory duty to provide rehabilitative programs through which inmates could earn time credits towards early release, unavailability of any form of useful work, study or even recreation, where none of the physical conditions of confinement met constitutional standards, combined with continuous frustrations of reasonable expectations produced by administrative incompetence, inflicted serious psychological harm on inmates, which was independently cognizable under the Eighth Amendment. When inmates' opportunities to study or work within prison were taken away by irregularities in the classification system or the prison administration's inability to provide a safe environment, inmates were deprived of liberty interest implicating a statutorily created expectation that imprisonment could be shortened by work and study. Inmates of Puerto Rican jails were denied due process as a result of inefficient, inexperienced, and often incompetent social-penal counseling system, which had a severe negative impact on inmates' opportunities to establish eligibility for parole and to actually be heard in a timely manner by a parole board. Commingling of pretrial detainees with convicted prisoners, in conjunction with finding that conditions which prevailed in all institutions at which pretrial detainees were housed violated the Eighth Amendment rights of convicted inmates, was a sufficient basis for holding that pretrial detainees were being punished prior to conviction and that, therefore, they were deprived of liberty without due process of law. WORK RELEASE
EQUAL PROTECTION

Olynick v. Taylor County, 643 F.Supp. 1100 (W.D. Wis. 1986). A former prisoner in a county jail brought a civil rights action, claiming that she was a victim of sexual discrimination and was denied due process when she was not allowed to exercise work release privileges during her jail sentence. On cross motions for summary judgment, the district court held that: (1) the plaintiff was denied liberty without due process when she was denied the right to exercise work release privileges because of her transfer to another county jail; (2) the plaintiff's inability to exercise work release privilege outside of county to whose jail she was transferred did not constitute false imprisonment under Wisconsin law; and (3) the sheriff was entitled to qualified immunity because the prisoner's constitutional right to exercise work release privileges was not clearly established. Changes in condition of confinement, even those with a substantial impact, are not alone enough to invoke due process protections as long as the conditions or degree of confinement to which the prisoner is subjected is within the sentence imposed upon him. (Taylor County Jail, Wisconsin)

U.S. District Court
DEDUCTIONS FROM WAGES

Sahagian v. Dickey, 646 F.Supp. 1502 (W.D. Wis. 1986). A prisoner, seeking to challenge a state prison practice of diverting fifteen percent of money sent to a prisoner into a release account to which to prisoner would not have access until he was released from prison, petitioned for leave to proceed without prepayment of fees and costs or security therefor. The district court held that: (1) the practice did not deprive the prisoner of substantive due process; (2) no additional procedures were required in instituting practice to ensure the prisoner procedural due process; and (3) the practice did not violate an equal protection clause by reason of exception for work release wages. Petition denied.

A memorandum explained how funds were to be diverted. It stated:

> fifteen percent of all general inmate receipts including wages, hobby sales and gifts will be diverted to a segregated release account. The only exceptions are: a) work/study release money, b) refunds from outside purchases, c) savings account interest, d) money received from other institutions for inmates transferring in.

The Court ruled the practice did not deprive the inmate of constitutional rights. (Columbia Correctional Institution at Portage, Wisconsin)

Toussaint v. McCarthy, 801 F.2d 1080 (9th Cir. 1986), cert. denied, 107 S.Ct. 2462, and 481 U.S. 1069. Inmates and prison officials appealed an order of the district court, 597 F.Supp. 1388, which granted permanent injunctive relief with respect to placement of prisoners in administrative segregation. The Court of Appeals held that: (1) state regulations gave prisoners liberty interest; (2) due process required only that prison officials hold an informal non-adversary hearing within reasonable time after a prisoner is placed in segregation and inform him of charges against him and give him an opportunity to present his views; (3) it was error for special master or court to substitute their views for those of the administrator in determining when a prisoner should be released; (4) review of segregation should be conducted more frequently than annually; (5) decision to place a prisoner in segregated confinement must be supported by some evidence; and (6) denial of contact visits and work programs did not violate the eighth amendment. Baker v. North Carolina Dept. of Corrections, 354 S.E.2d 733 (N.C. App. 1987). The North Carolina Dept. of Corrections was found liable for inmate employee's negligently injuring a fellow inmate during job performance. Although the State Industrial Commission had ruled that an employee inmate was negligent when he shut a window and it slammed on a fellow inmate's fingers, the State Appeals Court reversed this ruling and found that the employee inmate was not negligent because, although he knew fellow inmates were cleaning windows, he had no reason to believe that the plaintiff was at the very window he was about to shut. Brooks v. Andolina, 826 F.2d 1266 (3rd Cir. 1987). A federal appeals court ruled that (1) it is unlawful to place an inmate in segregation simply because he wrote a letter complaining of a female employee's search of a visitor, (2) prison officials' refusal to permit an inmate to call any witnesses at a disciplinary proceeding violated the inmate's procedural due process rights, and (3) the inmate was not entitled to lost wages. The inmate, who was sentenced in a disciplinary proceeding to 30 days punitive segregation in violation of his First and Fourteenth Amendment rights, was not entitled to damages for lost wages in his Section 1983 action against prison officials. Even though the inmate testified that he lost wages as a result of the unwarranted transfer to punitive segregation, the inmate failed to offer any evidence as to what those wages were. Cooper v. Sumner, 672 F.Supp. 1361 (D.Nev. 1987). A Nevada prisoner who was incarcerated in Arizona pursuant to a western interstate corrections compact brought a 42 U.S.C.A. Section 1983 action contesting that placement and also other aspects of his confinement. After reviewing the magistrate's report, the district court held that: (1) the prisoner had no protectable liberty interest in earning work time credit and a Section 1983 claim based on his placement in a segregation unit and resultant deprivation of an opportunity to work was frivolous; (2) the prisoner's claim that lack of access to the Nevada statutes and case law prevented him from seeking postconviction relief, states a viable Section 1983 claim based on lack of access to the courts; and (3) the prisoner would be permitted time to file amended complaint with regard to the challenge to his initial transfer and other claims. Duhon v. Calcasieu Parish Police Jury, 517 So.2d 1016 (La. App. 3 Cir. 1987). According to a state appeals court, the Louisiana Department of Corrections owes prison inmates the duty of providing equipment and machinery that is safe for tasks the inmates are required to perform. However, the Department is not the insurer of the safety of inmates in prison, and is not required to anticipate and warn against every possible danger to which inmates may be exposed. While participating as a farm crew member in the work program of a minimum security facility, an inmate suffered back injuries when the tractor/trailer he rode on hit a rut in the road and bounced him to the ground. Since the inmate driver was acting within the scope of his employment, the sheriff was found liable for $6,515.60 under the doctrine of respondeat superior. Flittie v. Solem, 827 F.2d 276 (8th Cir. 1987). An inmate at the South Dakota State Penitentiary was dismissed from his position as a law clerk after receiving a disciplinary report. He was therefore allowed to use the law library only after other prisoners who were not regular users were finished with their legal work. According to the appeals court, this prison rule was not unfair or illegal. The restriction amounted to an allocation system to prevent domination of the law library by regular users. Since the plaintiff was still using the law library on an average of three times a week, and had filed six lawsuits since the restriction was imposed, the court noted that he had obviously not been prejudiced by it. A claim for a Section 1983 relief was not supported by the inmate's allegations that prison officials dismissed him from the position as an inmate law clerk in retaliation for his legal activities. A black inmate who alleged that he and other black inmates were denied more desirable and better-paid jobs at the prison because of their race was prevented from undertaking to prove his intentional discrimination claim. The district court construed the statute of limitations to bar any circumstantial evidence of racial discrimination occurring prior to the limitations period. The prisoner's access to information concerning clerk positions was also strictly limited by the district court. (Missouri State Penitentiary)

Gabel v. Estelle, 677 F.Supp. 514 (S.D. Tex. 1987). Inmates suffered no denial of their constitutional rights when, as indicated in their civil rights lawsuit, they were furnished peanut butter sandwiches as the sole nourishment during a lockdown. Prison officials responded to a non-violent work strike of over 150 inmates by locking all striking inmates in their cells without notice or hearing. The court found that the lock-down was imposed upon all striking inmates without partiality and was the kind of action prison officials were entitled to take in response to a confrontation with an inmate. In addition, the court also found no constitutional violation on the mere basis of the inmates' "distaste" for peanut butter. It added that "the strike itself may have been the cause of the limited fare." (Wynne Unit, Texas Department of Corrections)

Gill v. Mooney, 824 F.2d 192 (2nd Cir. 1987). According to a federal court of appeals, changes in an inmate's work assignments which were not requested by the inmate or authorized by the prisoner's program committee did not violate the right to due process. Under New York law, there was no right to a particular job assignment. By not clearly alleging that the job transfer was made in retaliation for the exercise of constitutional rights, the prisoner could not state a claim. (Great Meadow Correctional Facility, New York)

Lafaut v. Smith, 834 F.2d 389 (4th Cir. 1987). A paraplegic inmate was placed in a private room that had no handicap facilities shortly after he was admitted to a federal correctional facility. Because of his physical condition and the absence of a railing for support, the inmate would slip down into the toilet bowl water and also risk falling off the toilet. Because of inaccessible toilets at his work assignments, he suffered another infection which, in addition to being placed in a disciplinary segregation without the use of a catheter for several days nor adequate access to the toilet facilities resulted in hardships for the inmate which included falling off a toilet in the segregation unit and, as a result, breaking his right leg. Despite repeated requests for adequate rehabilitation therapy, and the reports of an orthopedic specialist that he was in need of such therapy, none was provided. A federal appeals court found that the Eighth Amendment was violated because these conditions constituted "deliberate indifference." (Federal Correctional Institution, Butner, North Carolina)

Mahfouz v. Lockhart, 826 F.2d 791 (8th Cir. 1987). An Arkansas Department of Corrections regulation which prohibits any person convicted of a sex crime from participating in work/study release programs for inmates housed outside corrections facilities was upheld by a federal appeals court because it relates to a legitimate governmental purpose--preventing sex crimes. The plaintiff, an inmate serving a sentence for conviction of three counts of sexual abuse involving minors, filed suit alleging his constitutional rights were violated due to the denial of the opportunity to participate in these programs. The appeals court held that state could distinguish sex offenders from other inmates and properly exclude them from work release programs and that Arkansas statutes and regulations did not establish a protectable interest in participating in work release programs. Meis v. Grammer, 411 N.W.2d 355 (Neb. 1987). A state supreme court upheld the denial of the prisoner's request to send money to a non-family member, noting that prison officials were justifiably concerned that the payment might be for an illegal debt incurred while the creditor was a fellow inmate. The prisoner had challenged prison regulations regarding the disbursement of prison funds when his request to hold a portion of his wages in a trust fund to be used to pay a debt to a friend was denied. At the time of his request, the prisoner had $135 in his fund of which $72 were wages earned while at the prison. Prison regulations limited the use of funds earned at the prison, specifying that they could be used for the support of family members and for commissary purchases, and that funds could also be set aside to be provided to the inmate upon release. Ort v. White, 813 F.2d 318 (11th Cir. 1987). A prison officer's denial of water to an inmate was not cruel and unusual punishment where the inmate refused to carry a water keg to the farm work site. The farm squad remained away from the prison for the entire day under supervision of a single officer. The officer's actions were necessary coercive measures undertaken to obtain compliance with a reasonable prison rule that inmates perform their assigned farm squad duties. The officer denied the inmate water only when he refused to carry the keg or refused to work. The officer's actions were necessary to prevent a possible disturbance by other inmates on the farm squad, and the inmate was allowed to drink water when he performed work required of all inmates on his farm squad. Although the officer did not follow usual procedures for filing a disciplinary report and conducting a disciplinary hearing before taking action, because the officer was alone in the field supervising an inmate work squad when he was confronted with spontaneous disruption by one of the inmates in his group, the work squad was to be away from the prison for the entire day, and the officer had to take action to maintain discipline and control until the squad returned to the prison, his actions did not violate inmates' due process rights. Perro v. State, 517 So.2d 258 (La. App. 1 Cir. 1987). An inmate who cut off two of his fingers and damaged his thumb while using a skillsaw to cut some plastic to fix a toilet seat sued claiming negligence on the part of the state. He noted that there was no guard on the blade. The court found the state was negligent in not providing a safe place to work. However, since the inmate had worked in the shop for eight months and had enough experience to know the saw was for cutting wood, not plastic, he could not recover for injuries since a more appropriate tool was available and he chose to use the skillsaw. The court also barred the inmate from recovering under the theory that the saw, as a dangerous instrument, was in the care and custody of the institution and was defective. Salahuddin v. Coughlin, 674 F.Supp. 1048 (S.D.N.Y. 1987). Prison regulations specified that inmates transferred involuntarily (such as for purposes of distribution of population) would retain the same wage grade they had achieved. The regulations did not provide this guarantee to those transferred upon their own request. An inmate who participated in a job training program sued prison officials, alleging he was entitled to maintain his wage grade following a voluntary transfer. Prior to his transfer he had progressed from a compensation level of Wage Grade I ($.90 per day) to Wage Grade 4.2 ($2.19 per day). He requested a transfer to another prison in order to be closer to his family. The transfer was approved, but the inmate found that he was paid $1.30 a day in the lower wage grade when he was placed in at the new institution. The court found that the inmate had no legitimate claim of entitlement of retaining the same wage grade from one facility to the next and therefore had no due process right to either notice or hearing before his wage grade was reduced following transfer. EEOC

Baker v. McNeil Island Corrections Center, 859 F.2d 124 (9th Cir. 1988). A pro se inmate brought a suit against a prison alleging he was denied employment at the prison library due to his race. The U.S. District Court dismissed the inmate's petition. On appeal, the court of appeals, reversing and remanding, found that the district court's action was dismissal, not grant of summary judgment, and the pro se inmate sufficiently state a claim under Title VII. Reversing the trial court's dismissal of the inmate's lawsuit, the court noted that work assignments such as the library aide position in a prison, are in the nature of rehabilitation and employment training, rather than in the nature of commercial employment. But the applicable provision of the law, by its own terms, applies to apprenticeships and "other training or retraining, including on-the-job training programs". Further, the court noted that the EEOC published a Notice of Policy Statement that Title VII applies to prisoners eligible for work release on May 30, 1986. According to this statement, once a prison recommends a prisoner for work release, the prisoner is seeking an employment opportunity with an employer and the jail becomes a third party with the ability to control or interfere with the inmate's employment opportunities and its activities are thus covered by Title VII. Further, the court has also held that Title VII applies in such a situation. Mitchell v. Frank R. Howard Memorial Hosp., 853 F.2d 762, 767 (9th Cir. 1988). While the library aide position is not work release, the court noted, "it is not beyond doubt that a claim could not be proved under Title VII. We simply do not know enough about that position." The trial court had denied the appointment of counsel because it thought the inmate's claim meritless. On remand, the appeals court stated that the trial court must consider whether counsel should be appointed in light of its decision. (McNeil Island Corrections Center, Washington)

Brown v. Sumner, 701 F.Supp. 762 (D. Nev. 1988). An inmate who was denied hobby craft privileges to practice as a television and radio repairman brought a civil rights complaint against prison officials. The defendant sought summary judgment. The district court found that substantial issues of material fact existed as to whether the inmate was denied privileges on the basis of race, precluding summary judgment and denying the motion. The Constitution prohibits prison supervisors from using race as a factor in determining which prisoners can participate in which programs. While a prison inmate does not have an eighth amendment right to participate in a work program, he does have an eighth amendment right to be considered for those programs that do exist without regard to his race, color, or national origin. Where a state has established a particular program, all prisoners have fourteenth amendment equal protection rights regarding administration of that program. (Northern Nevada Correctional Center)

The federal district court dismissed the case. The prisoner and his wife appealed. The appeals court held that the prisoner's complaint was properly dismissed for failure to exhaust administrative remedies. The court further found that a prisoner's wife could not bring a declaratory judgment action alleging that the prisoner might send her money derived from an income-producing job assigned him, if he had one, and that he would have an income-producing job if jobs were not assigned on a racially discriminatory basis. The wife's claim was derivative of the prisoner's claim, and the prisoner's claim was precluded by failure to exhaust administrative remedies. (U.S. Bureau of Prisons)

The administrative plan manual and inmate handbook gave prison officials no discretion to deny benefits to qualified prisoners who have received verified work-related injuries. Fuller v. Lane, 686 F.Supp. 686 (C.D.Ill. 1988). A civil rights lawsuit was filed by two former inmates against various employees of the Illinois Department of Corrections alleging that their constitutional rights had been violated because they had been denied placement in a work release program. The two plaintiffs had been serving sentences for deviate sexual assault and aggravated criminal sexual abuse. They complained that all convicted sex offenders were denied placement in prison work release programs by the defendants. According to a federal district court, systematically excluding prisoners convicted of sex crimes from participating in work release programs is permissible. There is no constitutional right to work in prison. Further, state law does not grant eligible inmates an automatic right to work release. The Illinois statute authorizes prison officials to use their judgement in selecting inmates for the program and to take into account whether the participation of a particular inmate would cause "undue risk to the public." The court noted that there is no constitutional right to enter a discretionary work release program and summary judgment was issued for the defendants. Even if it were true that sex offenders were systematically excluded, the court concluded, there was no violation of equal protection, even if they were found to be a suspect class. The court also held that, even if they were found to be a suspect class, "prison officials' understandable reluctance to allow those inmates free movement in the community without supervision passes strict judicial scrutiny." RIGHT TO WORK

Jackson v. O'Leary, 689 F.Supp. 846 (N.D. Ill. 1988). A federal district court ruled that a prison inmate has no constitutional right to prison employment. Further, in order to demonstrate a violation of his constitutional rights because he was reassigned to a less desirable job, the inmate must invoke state law or regulations that created a protected liberty or property interest in a particular prison job. Also, there would only be an equal protection violation if prison officials made the decision in a manner that involved intentional or purposeful discrimination. There was no violation of the Eighth Amendment's protection against cruel and unusual punishment when the plaintiff was reassigned from an administrative job paying $45 per month to a manual labor job paying $15 per month. The fact that the prisoner had a preference for clerical rather than manual labor did not support a claim of "cruel and unusual punishment." Prison officials had not, in this instance, knowingly compelled the prisoner to do work that caused him undue pain or endangered the prisoner's life or health, or exceeded his physical capacity. State Supreme Court

WORK ASSIGNMENT

Lee v. Coughlin, 530 N.Y.S.2d 884 (A.D. 3 Dept. 1988). A prisoner brought an Article 78 proceeding seeking a review of a determination of the Commissioner of Correctional Services finding the prisoner guilty of violating certain prison disciplinary rules. The State Supreme Court dismissed the petition, and appeal was taken. The supreme court affirmed the judgment and found that the prisoner did not have a liberty interest in obtaining a job closely suited to his perceived abilities, nor did he have a protected right to meet with a counselor prior to such assignment, and the prisoner's refusal to consent to employment, as well as to take a literacy test, constituted a disobedience of direct orders warranting discipline. The prisoner, who was transferred from another facility, was informed that he would be assigned to work in the mess hall. The prisoner refused, arguing that since he had completed college and had worked in a prison academic program for ten years, he should be offered a job commensurate with his abilities. He was found guilty of misbehavior for refusing to report for a mandatory literacy test, refusal to report to the mess hall and other infractions. He sought court review of his penalties of confinement to cell for 50 days and loss of commissary, packages and phone call privileges. (Mt. McGregor Correctional Facility, Saratoga County, New York)

Moody v. Baker, 857 F.2d 256 (5th Cir. 1988). A state prisoner filed his 24th civil rights suit, alleging that he was ordered to work despite his classification as disabled, and that the order represented retaliation for his past complaints. The U.S. District Court found the complaint frivolous, admonished the prisoner, and assessed court costs of $225, and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that the more than 20 prior frivolous civil rights complaints the state prisoner had filed undermined his credibility and occasioned close scrutiny of his pleadings, although when read in a vacuum, the prisoner's pro se complaint stated a claim cognizable under the civil rights statute. The state prisoner's conclusory allegation, that the job he was given represented retaliation for his prior complaints, was a frivolous basis for a civil rights action, standing alone, without an allegation of factual basis, and the $225 court costs was properly imposed on the prisoner, although the imposition of sanctions without prior warning is generally to be avoided. INVOLUNTARY SERVITUDE

Plaisance v. Phelps, 845 F.2d 107 (5th Cir. 1988). An inmate filed a federal civil rights lawsuit alleging that the requirement that he perform assigned work violated the thirteenth amendment's prohibition of "involuntary servitude." An earlier case by the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals, Wendt v. Lynaugh, 841 F.2d 619 (5th Cir. 1988), had noted that the prohibition of involuntary servitude does not apply to its use as "punishment for crime" of which the inmate has been convicted. The court also ruled that the pending appeal of the inmate's conviction did not compel the court to assume that his conviction was "other than duly obtained," and it was not unconstitutional to require him to continue to work until his appealed was decided. REMOVAL FROM JOB

Prows v. U.S. Dept. of Justice, 704 F.Supp. 272 (D.D.C. 1988). A federal prisoner was fired from his job with federal prison industries for failing to comply with the Bureau of Prisons' inmate financial responsibility program. Under the program, the Bureau reviewed an inmate's financial obligations and established a plan for payment of "legitimate financial obligations," such as court-ordered payments or debts owed the federal government. On March 27, 1987, the Bureau issued a "Program Statement" which required that inmates at certain pay levels would be expected to allot not less than 50% of their monthly pay to the payment of "legitimate financial obligations." The inmate refused to comply, continuing to send voluntary support payments instead to his indigent family, an obligation he argued was "legitimate." The Bureau, recognizing as "legitimate" only the payment of his court-imposed criminal fine, fired him from his prison job for noncompliance, and the inmate filed a lawsuit. The court found that the inmate was entitled to restoration of his work assignment and pay level and back pay from the date of his termination. While the Bureau of Prisons had authority to create the Financial Responsibility Program, the 50% requirement was issued without required prior notice and rule-making procedures. The absence of these procedures rendered the requirement null and void, the court concluded. (La Tuna Federal Correctional Institution, Anthony, New Mexico)

State Dept. of Corrections v. Romero, 524 So.2d 1032 (Fla. App. 1988). An inmate who was injured when he fell from the seat of a tractor he was driving as part of a prison work detail sued the Department of Corrections, alleging that it was negligent not to provide a seat belt on the tractor. A jury agreed, awarding the inmate $100,000, and found the inmate to be free of any negligence himself. On appeal, the court noted that the inmate had stopped the tractor to fix his shoelaces. Under the facts as alleged by the inmate, the appeals court found that the inmate could not have been guiltless of all negligence, concluding that the jury verdict could only be a result of misunderstanding the law or "a disregard of that law because of sympathy or prejudice." The appeals court ordered a new trial on the issue of comparative negligence, instructing the amount awarded to be reduced proportionate to the percentage of the inmate's fault for the accident. COMPENSATION

INVOLUNTARY SERVITUDE

Wendt v. Lynaugh, 841 F.2d 619 (5th Cir. 1988). According to a federal appeals court, requiring prisoners to work without pay is not "involuntary servitude." An inmate sued Texas prison officials, complaining that he was forced to work without pay while in prison; the prisoner alleged a violation of the thirteenth amendment. The appeals court found that the fact that some states pay prisoners for work--and that Texas sometimes does so--did not make it involuntary servitude to force a prisoner as punishment for crime to work without pay. The court noted that the thirteenth amendment in fact prohibits slavery and involuntary servitude, "except as a punishment for crime," so an inmate convicted of crime is exempted from the application of the thirteenth amendment. The court also rejected claims that such compelled labor was cruel and unusual punishment or that it was a denial of equal protection to only pay certain prisoners in the absence of some "specific kind of outlawed discrimination." According to the court, prisoners' pay is by "grace of the state." (Texas Department of Corrections)

FAIR LABOR STANDARDS ACT

Young v. Cutter Biological, 694 F.Supp. 651 (D.Ariz. 1988). State inmates brought an action against state defendants and the owner of a plasma treatment center located in a state prison to recover minimum wages allegedly due for labor performed for the plasma center pursuant to a contract between the center and the state Department of Corrections. The inmates sought summary judgment against the plasma center, and the state defendants and the plasma center filed a cross claim for summary judgment. The district court found that inmates could not recover minimum wages from the plasma center or state defendants under the Fair Labor Standards Act. The inmates did not state a cause of action against the plasma center for minimum wages under the Arizona statutory scheme which placed an obligation to pay inmates with the Department of Corrections. The eleventh amendment deprived the federal court of subject-matter jurisdiction to entertain the plaintiff's state law claim for minimum wages against the state, its agencies or its officials. The Section 1983 claim against the plasma center for deprivation of an alleged statutory right to minimum wages without due process could not be maintained and the eleventh amendment barred a Section 1983 cause of action against state defendants based on alleged deprivation of minimum wages under the Arizona statutory scheme in all respects except for prospective-injunctive or declaratory relief. The "economic reality" of the relationship between the inmates and the owner of the plasma center located in the state prison was not one of employer-employee within the meaning of the Fair Labor Standards Act, so as to entitle the inmates to payment of minimum wage from the center, notwithstanding the fact that the plasma center took the responsibility for day-to-day supervision of the inmate workers. The power to hire and fire the inmates, as well as the responsibility for determining their rate and method of pay, was vested solely with the state Department of Corrections pursuant to its contract with the center. The center kept no employment records for the inmate workers. The responsibility to compensate the prisoners was placed by statutory law on the director of the Department of Corrections and the center had no obligation under its contract with the prison to pay inmates directly. Thus, any rights the inmates may have had to minimum wage under the state statutory scheme existed only against the director. (State Prison, Florence, Arizona)

DISCRIMINATION

Canterino v. Wilson, 869 F.2d 948 (6th Cir. 1989). An action was filed challenging the denial of equal protection rights and the conditions of confinement in an institution for women. The U.S. District Court enjoined the enforcement of a statute which lists six categories of inmate in all Kentucky prisons who are ineligible for work release programs and the defendants appealed. The court of appeals found that the prisoners did not have a protected liberty interest in a particular classification, or in the study and/or work programs. The prisoners failed to prove that the denial of study and work release to members of their class was gender-based discrimination on its face; both men and women were included in the class of people who could be denied study and work release. Female prisoners failed to establish proof necessary to shift the burden of proof to prison and prison officials to show a legitimate justification for supposed discrimination; the court could not discern whether female prisoners were claiming that more women were unfairly classified and therefore unfairly denied these opportunities, or whether more women in the institution had committed serious crimes than men who were confined to similar institutions. Charron v. Medium Sec. Inst., 730 F.Supp. 987 (E.D. Mo. 1989). A former pretrial detainee brought a civil rights action against the city and staff members of a city workhouse, alleging various constitutional violations which occurred in connection with his refusal to work in the kitchen of the workhouse, and the medical treatment that was afforded him for a workhouse injury. The U.S. District Court found that as a pretrial detainee, the plaintiff has no claim under the eighth amendment for cruel and unusual punishment, arising from his being placed in segregation for refusing to work in the workhouse kitchen, however the placement in segregation did amount to punishment in violation of his due process rights. According to the court, pretrial detainees do not stand on the same footing as convicted inmates. If pretrial detainees are subjected to restrictions and privations other than those inherent in their confinement itself or which are justified by compelling necessities of jail administration, their rights are violated under the due process and equal protection clauses of the fourteenth amendment. Placing the detainee in segregation was not reasonably related to a legitimate goal or purpose inasmuch as he did not pose a threat to security. The court found that he was entitled to nominal damages, since he suffered no actual harm as a result of his segregation for six days; thus, the plaintiff was awarded the sum of $600 in damages for the six days in punitive segregation at $100 per day. WORK RELEASE

Coakley v. Murphy, 884 F.2d 1218 (9th Cir. 1989). When a state prison inmate was approved for work release, he was transported to a center where work release inmates live. He informed a counselor, upon his arrival, that he would not sign a copy of the work release agreement, which stipulated the conditions under which the inmates participated in the program. He was warned that if he failed to sign the agreement, he would be sent back to the penitentiary. He persisted in refusing to sign, stating that the agreement was illegal, that he was "civilly dead" as a prisoner under state law, and that he was therefore precluded from entering into contracts. He also said that if he signed, the agreement would be void because it was signed under duress. As a result of this persistent refusal, the inmate was returned to the penitentiary. He brought a Section 1983 action to challenge the denial of a hearing upon the transfer from the work release program to the penitentiary. The U.S. District Court dismissed the action, and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed the lower court decision, ruling that the case was analogous to transfer from one institution to another within a state prison system; Idaho law placed no restrictions on transfers from work release centers, and there was no constitutional right to rehabilitation. The court of appeals found that the inmate had no due process liberty or property interest limiting the transfer from a work release program to the penitentiary upon the inmate's failure to sign a work release agreement and that the requirement that the inmate sign a work release agreement was rationally related to the legitimate interest in insuring that the inmate understand the obligations and therefore equal protections were not violated. Cornelius v. Town of Highland Lake, Ala., 880 F.2d 348 (11th Cir. 1989), cert. denied, 110 S.Ct. 1784. In March 1984, the Mayor of the Town of Highland Lake requested that the Alabama Department of Corrections provide the city with inmate labor for general maintenance, clearing and public works purposes. Beginning in May 1984, the St. Clair Correctional Facility provided the inmates for this community work program. According to the record, many community residents in Highland Lake opposed the use of inmate labor within the town and repeatedly voiced their concern to the town's officials. One method of opposition was the circulation of a petition in the community calling for the end to the unsupervised use of inmate labor.

A town clerk who was abducted from the town hall and terrorized by prison inmates assigned to the community work squad program brought a civil rights action against the town and its officials, as well as the prison and its officials. The U.S. District Court granted a summary judgment for the defendants. On appeal, the court of appeals reversed and remanded the case finding that genuine issues of material fact, as to whether a special relationship existed between the town clerk and the defendants and whether the defendants were aware that the clerk faced a special danger from the work squad inmates, precluded a summary judgment. Franklin v. Lockhart, 890 F.2d 96 (8th Cir. 1989). A prison inmate brought a civil rights complaint for prison authorities' alleged violation of free exercise and eighth amendment rights. The U.S. District Court entered an order dismissing the complaint, and the inmate appealed. The appeals court, affirming in part, reversing in part, and remanding, found that the allegations in the inmate's complaint that work which he had to preform while assigned to the prison hoe squad taxed him beyond his physical capacity, were sufficient to state an eighth amendment claim. The allegations in the complaint, that the work involved the handling of manure and dead animals contrary to the inmate's Muslim faith, were also sufficient to state a free exercise claim. Jackson v. Cain, 864 F.2d 1235 (5th Cir. 1989). A prisoner brought a civil rights suit against various prison officials and employees. The U.S. District Court entered a summary judgment for the defendants, and the prison appealed. The appeals court found that the district court did not err in entering a summary judgment in favor of the defendants on issues of handcuffing, mail tampering and medical treatment. Some evidence raised material issues of fact, precluding a summary judgment on a cruel and unusual punishment claim, retaliation claim, failure to follow punishment limitations claim, and procedural due process claims. The prisoner's claim that he was "handcuffed, shackled and binded with a steel chain belt" and escorted from a work assignment at the Louisiana State Capitol by eight officers, inflicting "wanton pain" upon him did not rise to the level of cruel and unusual punishment. The prisoner never alleged that great pain was caused deliberately by the officers or that the particular kind of handcuff was not customarily used on prisoners working outside the prison. There was nothing to show that the prisoner was deliberately treated maliciously or differently from other trustees who might be transported from a work assignment due to unsatisfactory behavior. A prisoner has no protected liberty or property interest per se in avoiding the transfer from a desirable to an onerous job in the prison system, but once the state creates such a liberty or property interest, due process protections attach to the decision to revoke that interest. Evidence in the prisoner's civil right suit raised a genuine issue of material fact regarding the motives behind the decision of the prison authorities to transfer the prisoner from a desirable work assignment to an alleged "punishment crew," precluding a summary judgment against the prisoner on his claim that the move was in retaliation for his use of prison grievance procedures. The prisoner, who alleged that he was forced to work in the summer heat shoveling unshucked corn without a mask in spite of heavy corn dust did not establish that the working conditions, in and of themselves, violated the eighth amendment, in absence of showing that the practice differed from that of the surrounding agricultural community or violated a clearly established law. RIGHT TO WORK

James v. Quinlan, 866 F.2d 627 (3rd Cir. 1989), cert. denied, 110 S.Ct. 197. Inmates brought an action challenging the constitutionality of Federal Bureau of Prisons' inmate financial responsibility program. The U.S. District Court upheld the program, and the inmates appealed. The appeals court found that even if federal inmates had either a liberty or property interest in prison industries job assignments, that right was not violated by the inmate financial responsibility program. Incarceration without being assigned a job was within the sentence imposed upon inmates. Accordingly, the inmates had no liberty interest in their federal prison industries job assignments arising from the due process clause itself. Traditionally, inmates have had no entitlement to a specific job or even to any job. Even if inmates had a constitutional right in federal prison industries job assignments, the right would not be violated by the Federal Bureau of Prisons' inmate financial responsibility program which required the inmates to either sign authorization giving prison officials authority to take 50% of their income for application toward their financial obligations or lose their desirable prison industry job assignments. Kalka v. Vasquez, 867 F.2d 546 (9th Cir. 1989). A prisoner filed a habeas corpus petition, contending that he was entitled to work time credit on a one for-one day basis, rather then a one-for-two day basis, from the time he was available to work until the time he was given work. The U.S. District Court denied the petition, and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court found that the refusal to award the credits on a one-for-one day basis did not violate the prisoner's equal protection rights. Section 2933(b) states that "[w]orktime credit is a privilege, not a right. Worktime credit must be earned and may be forfeited pursuant to the provisions of Section 2932." Except for prisoners ineligible pursuant to Section 2932, "every prisoner shall have a reasonable opportunity to participate in a full-time credit qualifying assignment in a manner consistent with institutional security and available resources." Cal.Penal Code Section 1933(b) (West 1982 & Supp.1989). Inmate advisors filed a suit and sought a preliminary injunction to direct their reappointment as advisors to assist fellow inmates in disciplinary proceedings. The U.S. District Court granted a preliminary injunction, and prison officials appealed. The court of appeals, affirming in part and vacating in part, found that the inmate advisors did not have a due process liberty interest in continuing to serve in their positions. The inmate advisors established a likelihood that they would succeed on the merits of their claim that the warden failed to reappoint them in retaliation for their exercise of first amendment rights. Solomon v. Dixon, 724 F.Supp. 1193 (E.D.N.C. 1989). An inmate brought a suit against the prison officials under Section 1983 or the officials' alleged violation of eighth amendment rights, conspiracy to endanger the inmate's life, and verbal harassment. The inmate alleged that his exposure to a fumigant chemical and the lack of adequate ventilation caused him to experience breathing difficulties, which were exacerbated by prior lung damage from a stab wound. He also alleged that he experienced skin rashes and pain in his left foot, which he had previously injured in a chain saw accident. The prison officials moved to dismiss, or alternatively, for summary judgment. The district court found that the eighth amendment claims arising out of the inmate's assignment to the prison industrial facility, where the inmate was allegedly exposed to a fumigant chemical, were barred by the preclusive effect of finding of the state commissioner, in a prior tort claims action brought by the inmate, that the job assignment was within the inmate's capacity and was not harmful to his health, and slander or defamation does not constitute a basis upon which relief may be granted under Section 1983. State, Dept. of Justice, Inmate Injury Fund v. Spear, 767 P.2d 928 (Or.App. 1989). The Workers' Compensation Board affirmed a referee's order that injury to an inmate was compensable and that attorney's fees, for services before the Board, were to be paid from the inmate injury fund. The State Department of Justice, the administrator of the fund, sought review. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that the injury sustained by the inmate in a fight with another inmate, while both were waiting for transportation back to the prison following work, was compensable. The court also found that the attorney's fees were payable from the fund. The inmate had completed his day's work at a farm annex and was awaiting transportation back to the prison. While waiting, another prisoner who was also awaiting transportation, assaulted him. The court stated that the injuries the inmate sustained during the fight were compensable. Because the inmate was obligated to work at the farm annex, his transportation to and from work was also necessary, as was his waiting for it. Therefore, the court found that his employment "proximately caused" his injury. (Oregon State Penitentiary, Farm Annex).

Baptist v. O'Leary, 742 F.Supp. 975 (N.D. Ill. 1990). A prisoner sued prison officials under Section 1983 in connection with his job reassignment, along with other prisoners who worked with him in the prison's administrative building, following the theft of an engraver owned by the Department of Corrections. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The U.S. District Court found that the prisoner would be entitled in due process terms to a hearing if he were reassigned for punitive reasons, and that the prison officials were entitled to qualified immunity because they demonstrated that their actions could have been objectively justified on security grounds by reasonable prison officials, and no clearly established law at the time that the defendants acted taught that such set of security-oriented transfers would be "disciplinary" within the meaning of an Illinois statute relating to disciplinary actions against prison inmates. Fruit v. Norris, 905 F.2d 1147 (8th Cir. 1990). Inmates brought a civil rights action against prison officials asserting constitutional violations in relation to their being disciplined for refusing to assist the prison maintenance supervisor in cleaning out the wet-well portion of the prison's raw sewage lift-pump station without protective clothing and equipment. The U.S. District Court dismissed after presentation of the inmates' case and the inmates appealed. The appeals court found that the inmates established a prima facie eighth amendment violation and the warden could be held liable for such a violation.

It was found by the court that the prison inmates are protected from punishment for refusing to perform an unconstitutional assignment, as they are protected from having to perform assignment. Certain acts or omissions are so dangerous in respect to health or safety that the knowledge of risk on the part of the prison officials can be inferred, for the purposes of the inmates' eighth amendment claim. Irrespective of whether the officials had actual or constructive knowledge of the presence of toxic or explosive gases in wet-well, in view of the evidence presented regarding the danger of heat stroke, risk of contracting a disease from contact with raw sewage, and general undesirability of being in close proximity to humane waste; forcing inmates to work in shower of human excrement without protective clothing and equipment would be inconsistent with any standard of decency.

While supervisors are not liable under Section 1983 on a respondeat superior theory, they can be liable for their personal involvement in a constitutional violation, or when their corrective action amounts to deliberate indifference to or tacit authorization of violative practices. While the deprivation of good-time credits claimed in a civil rights action would have been properly brought in a habeas action, rather than a civil rights action, the state waived the exhaustion requirement by failing to notify the district court that inmates had not exhausted their claims in state court. An inmate petitioned for a show cause order seeking declaratory and preliminary injunctive relief, including a stay of collection procedures under the Inmate Responsibility Program. The U.S. District Court denied the inmate's petition, and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed the decision and found that the inmate was required to exhaust administrative remedies with the Bureau of Prisons before he could bring a federal action challenging the collection procedures under the Inmate Responsibility Program. The Bureau of Prisons did not exceed its statutory authority nor depart from its own regulations by administering the Inmate Responsibility Program to collect court ordered civil fines and judgments. The U.S. District Court granted the defendants' motions for a summary judgment, and the prisoners appealed. The appeals court, affirming in part and remanding in part, found that the material question of fact, as to whether the prison officials violated the arthritic inmate's eighth amendment rights by requiring him to sit without a coat on the cold concrete floor for four or more hours in an unheated workplace, precluded an entry of a summary judgment on the prisoner's "cruel and unusual punishment" claim, but the inmate did not have a protected "liberty interest" in being classified for a particular job, notwithstanding that the job classification affected the ability to earn good time credits. Mikeska v. Collins, 900 F.2d 833 (5th Cir. 1990). Inmates brought a civil rights action against Texas prison officials, challenging their administrative punishment for refusing to work. The U.S. District Court dismissed the complaint as frivolous, and the inmates appealed. The appeals court affirmed the decision and found that the prison's classification plan satisfied due process. Equal protection did not require that inmates in administrative segregation be accorded the same privileges as prisoners in the general population. Placing an inmate in administrative segregation for refusing to work did not violate the eighth amendment, despite an inmate's claim that his stomach ulcer precluded him from working; the prison officials did not knowingly assign the inmate to a work detail which they knew would aggravate his ailment, and the inmate received adequate medical attention for his stomach problem. Prison officials have a discretion to determine whether and when to provide prisoners with privileges which amount to more than reasonably adequate food, clothing, shelter, sanitation, medical care, and personal safety. This discretion is not absolute and is subject to a constitutional requirement that significant and purposeful differences in treatment must have some rational basis and may not be wholly arbitrary and capricious. Morin v. Department of Corrections, 727 F.Supp. 699 (D. Me. 1990). A prisoner brought a federal civil rights action against a correctional facility's nurse and assistant director, alleging deliberate indifference to his medical needs. The plaintiff alleged that he injured his back while incarcerated at a pre-release center, and that upon his return to the correctional facility he was not provided adequate medical attention and was forced to his injury. The defendants filed a motion for summary judgment, and the district court found that the nurse was not deliberately indifferent to the prisoner's medical needs in violation of the eighth amendment's proscription of cruel and unusual punishment where the nurse heard the prisoner's complaint of back injury, relayed the complaint to the physician, relayed the physician's physical restrictions to the prisoner, and referred the prisoner to the physician when the prisoner again complained a few weeks later. The court also found that the assistant director was not deliberately indifferent to the prisoner's medical needs, even though he assigned the prisoner to work in the woods after the prisoner sustained the back injury, where the prisoner had requested his assignment to the wood harvesting crew, and the assistant director had taken the prisoner's medical restrictions into account. Murray v. Mississippi Dept. of Corrections, 911 F.2d 1167 (5th Cir. 1990), cert. denied, 111 S.Ct. 760. A Mississippi inmate filed a federal lawsuit claiming that forcing him to work on private property without pay violated his constitutional rights against involuntary servitude under the Thirteenth Amendment to the Constitution. A federal appeals court rejected this argument, noting that the Thirteenth Amendment specifically allows involuntary servitude as punishment after conviction of a crime. Compensating prisoners for their work is not a constitutional requirement, but rather "is by the grace of the state." The court declined to create a private property exception to this principle. The prisoner pointed to state law, which contained a provision which appears to prohibit working inmates on private property. The court said that, while it is possible that the inmate might have a state-law cause of action for declaratory, injunctive or monetary relief based on his claim, there was nothing to show that a violation of this state law "rises to constitutional proportions." Warren v. State of Mo., 754 F.Supp. 150 (W.D. Mo. 1990), affirmed, 995 F.2d 130. An inmate brought an action against prison officials for violation of the Eighth Amendment. On the officials' motions to dismiss, the U.S. District Court found that the allegation that the prisoner was required to work with a table saw that was known to be dangerous was sufficient to state a cause of action for violation of the prisoner's Eighth Amendment rights. The prison officials were not entitled to qualified immunity from liability to the inmate who claimed he was injured by the table saw which officials knew posed a serious risk of injury. The officials should have known that the alleged conduct violated a clearly established prohibition against reckless indifference to the prisoner's safety. The court also found that the prisoner, who was alleging a valid Eighth Amendment claim, could not also bring a separate, independent claim under Section 1983 for the same behavior based on substantive due process. Watson v. Graves, 909 F.2d 1549 (5th Cir. 1990). Two Louisiana ex-prisoners filed a civil rights and Fair Labor Standards Act lawsuit against the warden of the jail they had been incarcerated at, the sheriff, and the sheriff's daughter and son-in-law. The last two defendants were the operators of an unincorporated construction company that relied exclusively on inmate labor from a work release program operated by the sheriff and administered by the warden at the jail. The plaintiffs were paid a flat $20 per day for their work, regardless of how many hours they worked, including in excess of twelve hour days. They argued that they were subjected to involuntary servitude in violation of the Thirteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution, and additionally that they had been deprived of the wages legally due them, including overtime. A federal appeals court, while noting that the plaintiffs did not lose the protection of the Thirteenth Amendment, as they were not sentenced to hard labor, found that these prisoners had not been subjected to involuntary servitude, as they were not compelled to agree to work. Evidence showed that they both requested work outside the jail and worked whenever possible. "The choice of whether to work outside of the jail for twenty dollars a day or remain inside the jail and earn nothing may have indeed been 'painful' and quite possibly illegal under state law," the court stated, but it did not amount to forcing them to work against their will. However, the court found by applying an "economic reality" test, that the plaintiffs had been employees of the sheriff's daughter and son-in-law for purposes of the Fair Labor Standards Act, and therefore entitled to payment of the minimum wage and overtime, as well as other legal mandated benefits. These private parties had the power to hire and fire, since they could request particular inmates, the inmates utilized were supervised and controlled only by the employer and no law enforcement officers made patrols or spot checks of the work sites. Although the court ordered the private employers to pay back wages to be determined by the trial court, it also found that any Fair Labor Standards Act claim against the sheriff or warden had been abandoned by the failure to supply facts sufficient to establish an employer-employee relationship with those defendants. Bibbs v. Armontrout, 943 F.2d 26 (8th Cir. 1991), cert. denied, 112 S.Ct. 1212. An inmate appealed from an order of the U.S. District Court which dismissed a claim of cruel and unusual punishment. The inmate had lost portions of two fingers when they became entangled in the gears of the "inker" in the license plate manufacturing facility at the prison. The appeals court found that the negligence in ignoring conditions of machines in the license plate plant and removal of guards covering gears of a machine did not amount to cruel and unusual punishment. No evidence showed that prison officials knew that guards were not covering the gears of the inker or that they willfully overlooked the condition of the equipment. (Missouri State Penitentiary)

Casey v. Lewis, 773 F.Supp. 1365 (D. Ariz. 1991), reversed, 4 F.3d 1516. A class action suit was brought by prisoners challenging certain prison policies. The district court found that a policy prohibiting assignment of prisoners to food services who test HIV positive violated the Rehabilitation Act. The court found that, although a significant risk of transmission of the AIDS virus could justify exclusion of the infected person from a job for which he or she is otherwise qualified, based on reasonable medical judgments, there is no significant risk of transmitting the HIV disease except through: (1) intimate sexual contact with an infected person; (2) invasive exposure to contaminated blood or certain other bodily fluids; or (3) perinatal exposure. HIV-positive prisoners are "handicapped" within the meaning of Section 504 of the Rehabilitation Act. As such, officials must make an individual determination that each HIV-positive prisoner presents a significant risk of transmitting the virus if he or she worked in food services. The appeals court vacated the lower court decision, finding that the plaintiffs lacked standing. (Arizona Department of Corrections)

Choate v. Lockhart, 779 F.Supp. 987 (E.D. Ark. 1991), reversed, 7 F.3d 1370. An inmate who fell from a roof while performing work brought an action against prison officials. The district court found that prison officials were deliberately indifferent to the inmate's safety when he was directed to perform work on a 45-degree angle plywood roof, without toe boards or scaffoldings installed, when the inmate, among other things, possessed a recognizable infirm right leg. The appeals court reversed the lower court finding and dismissed the case. (Arkansas Department of Corrections)

Codd v. Brown, 949 F.2d 879 (6th Cir. 1991). An inmate brought a Section 1983 action alleging that state prison officials had violated his due process rights by removing him from a prison work release program. The U.S. District Court granted the prison officials' motion for summary judgment, and the inmate appealed. The court of appeals found that since the inmate had no established protected liberty interest in his continued participation in the program, he failed to state a cause of action upon which relief could be granted under Section 1983; a prisoner serving a life sentence had no inherent due process clause interest in employment outside a correctional institution. REMOVAL FROM JOB

Kelley v. Vaughn, 760 F.Supp. 161 (W.D. Mo. 1991). A homosexual inmate brought action against a correctional center's food service manager to challenge removal from his job as a bakery worker. The U.S. District Court found that the inmate has no right to be assigned to a particular job. The expectation of keeping a particular job in prison is not a property or liberty interest entitled to due process protection. Because the plaintiff has no protected interest in his job in the prison bakery, denial of that job does not constitute a violation of due process. However, regardless of any liberty or property interest in his position as a bakery worker, if the plaintiff were to be removed from the position because of his race, or prisoner animosity based on race, a constitutional violation would be patent. Whether claims of discrimination because of homosexual orientation will support a valid equal protection claim is a subject of some debate. The inmate was granted permission to proceed in forma pauperis. (Tipton Treatment Center, Tipton, Missouri)

La Bounty v. Adler, 933 F.2d 121 (2nd Cir. 1991). A black inmate allegedly required to complete training before he could become eligible for a maintenance electrician program brought a pro se action alleging Eighth Amendment and equal protection violations. The U.S. District Court dismissed, and the inmate appealed. The court of appeals found that the inmate who alleged that similarly situated white inmates, unlike the plaintiff inmate, were given work assignments without having to complete a training program and that no blacks had been assigned as institution electricians for ten years, stated an actionable equal protection claim in connection with the alleged racially discriminatory treatment of his request for work assignment as an electrician, but the alleged exclusion of the inmate from the prison's maintenance electrician program did not constitute "punishment" for Eighth Amendment purposes. Muhammad v. Moore, 760 F.Supp. 869 (D. Kan. 1991). An inmate brought a pro se civil rights complaint asserting his entitlement to back pay. The U.S. District Court found that the inmate's refusal to participate in an inmate financial responsibility program warranted a reduction of prison earnings to maintenance pay of $5 per month, and the fact that the prisoner's family was forced to provide him with funds for personal use did not identify an arguable deprivation of constitutional dimension and thus did not entitle the prisoner to relief. Wallace v. Robinson, 940 F.2d 243 (7th Cir. 1991), cert. denied, 112 S.Ct. 1563. A prisoner brought a civil rights action against prison officials challenging a change in his job assignment. The U.S. District Court granted the officials' motions for summary judgment, and the prisoner appealed. The court of appeals found that a rule giving prison officials discretion to act for any reason, but placing restraints on their options if their motive was disciplinary, created neither a liberty nor a property interest. An Illinois prison regulation which allowed the transfer of a prisoner's work assignment for any reason except punishment had put restrictions on only one ground of action, and the remaining field of discretion was so large that no prisoner had a legitimate claim of entitlement to a particular job placement. Williams v. Meese, 926 F.2d 994 (10th Cir. 1991). A prison inmate sued prison officials alleging discrimination and retaliation in connection with prison job assignments. The action was dismissed for failure to state a claim by the U.S. District Court, and the inmate appealed. The court of appeals found that the inmate was not an "employee" of the Federal Bureau of Prisons in connection with job assignments, and thus could not pursue a claim for discrimination in connection therewith under either Title VII, the Age Discrimination in Employment Act, the Equal Pay Act, or the Rehabilitation Act. However, the inmate did state a Bivens claim for deprivation of right to equal protection under the Fifth Amendment in claiming discrimination on the basis of age, race or handicap in denying him prison job assignments for which he was qualified. In addition, he stated a claim by the allegation that he was retaliated against in job assignments for exercising his First Amendment rights. (Federal Penitentiary, Leavenworth, Kansas)

RIGHT TO WORK

Adams v. James, 797 F.Supp. 940 (M.D. Fla. 1992). A civil rights action was brought alleging that the transfer in job and institutional assignments of inmate law clerks unconstitutionally infringed on their right to file law suits and help other inmates. On motion of the defendants for summary judgment, the district court found that the inmate law clerks did not have unique personal rights to hold particular jobs as law clerks or to be assigned to a particular institution on the grounds that they were moving for social change in that institution by filing suits against officers of the institution concerning conditions of confinement. No such personal right protected by the First Amendment existed on the grounds that the law clerks were more visible than other inmates in instituting legal action against the correctional institution. In addition, the inmates failed to establish their claims of retaliatory transfer. The prison officials' action of reassigning the inmate law clerks, based on suspicions that the clerks were charging for their services, was reasonable. In addition, it was rationally and validly connected to the government's interest in protecting inmates from exploitation by one another. (Polk Correctional Institution, Florida).

Beasley v. Duncil, 792 F.Supp. 485 (S.D. W.Va. 1992), affirmed, 9 F.3d 1107. Inmates sued alleging that their removal from a community-based work release program without an administrative hearing violated their due process rights. The district court found that West Virginia law afforded no liberty right to work release and, thus, inmates were not denied due process when they were administratively transferred from a work release center to a more restrictive correctional environment without an administrative hearing. Burton v. Armontrout, 975 F.2d 543 (8th Cir. 1992), cert. denied, 113 S.Ct. 2960. Inmates brought an action against correctional officers to recover for cruel and unusual punishment for failing to warn inmates that hospital sewage was contaminated with the AIDS (Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome) virus and other infectious diseases. The U.S. District Court directed a verdict in favor of some officers, entered judgment on a jury verdict in favor of the remaining officers, and granted an injunction. Appeals were taken, and the appeals court found that the injunction requiring the county correctional center to provide adequate protective clothing and warnings to inmates of potential danger of working in contaminated waste was permissible despite a general verdict in favor of correctional officers on constitutional claims. The court found that evidence showed that despite the passage of three years and a greater awareness of dangers of AIDS, prison officials failed to provide adequate protective clothing. The court also found that the county inmates who were involved in the cleanup of the sewage were not subjected to "cruel and unusual punishment" when correctional officers failed to warn that sewage could be contaminated with the AIDS virus and other infectious diseases. DeTomaso v. McGinnis, 970 F.2d 211 (7th Cir. 1992). An inmate brought a federal civil rights action following denial of his application for work release. The U.S. District Court dismissed the suit and the inmate appealed. The appeals court, affirming the lower court decision, found that Illinois regulations setting out eligibility requirements for an inmate to be entitled to work release do not create a liberty or property interest in work release for an inmate who meets the requirements because prison officials have discretion to choose among the eligible inmates. Furthermore, even if Illinois officials acted arbitrarily in allowing felons with records worse than this inmate's to enjoy work release, the regulations did not violate the inmate's equal protection rights as the inmate had no liberty or property interest in work release. The inmate did not contend that race or religion played a part in the decision to deny him work release, and Illinois had a rational explanation for caution in awarding work release status, in that slots were few and potential risks were high. Elliott v. Byers, 975 F.2d 1375 (8th Cir. 1992). Maximum security prisoners, forced to work on a hoe squad in shoulder to shoulder "tightened down" formation, brought a suit against several prison officials alleging violation of their Eighth Amendment right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment because they faced the risk of attack from other prisoners while working in such situations. The U.S. District Court entered judgment upon a jury verdict against the prisoners, and they appealed. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that under the Eighth Amendment cruel and unusual punishment analysis, in order to show reckless disregard of prison officials, the inmates must show that they face a pervasive risk of harm or that the prison officials had reacted unreasonably to any alleged risk. The inmates ordinarily may not show pervasive risk of harm from single or isolated incidents, but it may be shown by frequent assaults that place a prisoner or group of prisoners in reasonable fear for their safety. Franklin v. Banks, 979 F.2d 1330 (8th Cir. 1992). An inmate brought a civil rights action for prison authorities' alleged violation of free exercise and Eighth Amendment rights. The U.S. District Court entered an order dismissing the complaint, and the inmate appealed. The appeals court, affirmed in part, reversed in part and remanded. On appeal following remand, the court of appeals, affirming the decision, found that prison authorities had not "knowingly" required him to do work beyond his physical capabilities. The inmate had never complained about his inability to do work, requested assignment to a less strenuous work detail, or raised a defense of inability in the 165 disciplinary proceedings brought against him for refusing to work. Hansard v. Barrett, 980 F.2d 1059 (6th Cir. 1992). Homosexual inmates at a county jail brought a class action suit against jail officials, alleging they were discriminated against in their opportunity to earn reduction in sentences for work done in jail. The U.S. District Court entered summary judgment in favor of the officials and the inmates appealed. The court of appeals, affirming the decision, found that the administrative rule guaranteeing the inmates in administrative segregation the same rights and privileges as those in the general population did not create a protected liberty interest in favor of the inmates to discretionary sentence reduction based on work performed while incarcerated. State law made sentencing credits discretionary, and did not give any prisoner, whether in the general population or administrative segregation, an absolute right to earn a recommendation for reduction of a sentence because of his or her work in jail. Furthermore, evidence was insufficient to establish that homosexual inmates at the county jail, who were placed in administrative segregation, were denied an equal opportunity to discretionary reductions in sentences available to inmates who performed work during their terms, in violation of equal protection. The jail regulations concerning eligibility for the program did not discriminate against homosexual inmates, and the testimony of two homosexual inmates who were denied jobs at the jail did not establish the existence of a discriminatory policy. Huddleston v. Shirley, 787 F.Supp. 109 (N.D. Miss. 1992). A jail inmate brought a Section 1983 action against the county and sheriff, in his official capacity, alleging that the sheriff disregarded a provision of a state court order directing that the inmate be released during the day to go to work. The inmate moved for summary judgment. The district court found that the sheriff's actions violated the inmate's substantive due process rights; although the sheriff believed the order invalid, he never sought a definitive ruling on its validity through any formal means. As a result, the county and the sheriff were found liable. (Lee County Jail, Mississippi)

Martinez v. Turner, 977 F.2d 421 (8th Cir. 1992), cert. denied, 113 S.Ct. 1658. A pretrial detainee appealed from an order of the U.S. District Court that dismissed his pro se complaint as frivolous. The appeals court found that the pretrial detainee's claim that he was denied due process when placed in administrative segregation for refusing to work was not indisputably meritless, and should not have been dismissed as frivolous. The court noted that it could not, based on the record before it, determine what, if any, work was being asked of the detainee. Requiring a pretrial detainee to work or be placed in administrative segregation is punishment; however, requiring a pretrial detainee to perform general housekeeping chores is not. The dismissal of this claim was reversed and remanded. (United States Medical Center for Federal Prisoners, Missouri)

Mayberry v. Spicer, 808 F.Supp. 563 (E.D. Mich. 1992). A state prisoner filed a pro se civil rights complaint against correctional employees, alleging that they violated his due process rights when they conspired to file false charges against him. The district court found that the correctional employees were entitled to qualified immunity in the suit prompted by the filing of misconduct charges against the inmate after he refused to report to work at the prison laundry, a job he had quit a short time earlier. The employees had been instructed to hire the plaintiff before they could take another prisoner from the pool and could not be expected to realize that the issuance of a work detail would result in a substantive due process violation. Furthermore, the inmate was not deprived of his substantive due process rights when correctional employees wrote a misconduct ticket after he refused to work at the assigned job. Refusal to work was a violation of prison rules and the issuance of a ticket neither shocked the conscience nor constituted an egregious abuse of authority. (State Prison of Southern Michigan)

Pendergrass v. Hannigan, 788 F.Supp. 488 (D. Kan. 1992). A prisoner filed a civil rights complaint alleging that he was subjected to cruel and unusual punishment when he was forced to work outside during dangerously cold conditions, and that if he had complained of the work conditions he would have been transferred without due process to a less desirable correctional facility. The warden filed a motion for summary judgment. The U.S. District Court found that the prisoner's allegation was not, standing alone, enough to state a claim for cruel and unusual punishment; the prisoner did not dispute information provided in an investigatory report that appropriate clothing was issued and available to prisoners during winter work. The prisoner's claim that he would have been summarily transferred without due process guarantees if he had complained about the weather conditions was speculative and was not properly before the court. Chauvin v. Erickson, 998 F.2d 617 (8th Cir. 1993). An inmate who was convicted before Minnesota's enactment of a new requirement that prisoners perform work assignments, when available, to earn good-time credit, brought a civil rights action against prison officials. The U.S. District Court granted summary judgment to the defendants, and the inmate appealed. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that Minnesota's new requirement did not violate the ex post facto clause as applied to the prisoner. The statutory work requirement did not change conditions for earning good-time credit, since, before the enactment of the work requirement, prison regulations imposed a disciplinary infraction for refusing a direct order to work. A prisoner who incurred a disciplinary infraction for refusing to work could not earn good-time credit for that day. (Minnesota)

Choate v. Lockhart, 7 F.3d 1370 (8th Cir. 1993). An inmate who fell off a roof while working on a construction crew on a state-owned residence sued the supervising prison officials and the director of the Department of Corrections. The U.S. District Court found the prison officials liable and awarded the inmate damages for pain and suffering. The inmate appealed the denial of punitive and other compensatory damages, and the prison officials cross-appealed on the finding of liability. The appeals court, reversing and dismissing, found that the immediate supervisors' conduct did not rise to a level of deliberate indifference in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The supervisors had no knowledge of the inmate's physical limitations. In addition, the supervisors did not choose which inmates would work on a project, and they had no duty to check the medical records of crew members assigned to them in determining whether they could do the work assigned. The appeals court also ruled that the Director of the Department of Corrections was not liable to the inmate. The director could not have known about the inmate's suffering on the job, had no duty to check the inmate's medical records, and had no relevant connection with the project at all. The overall supervisor of the construction projects on which inmates were working was not deliberately indifferent to the inmate who had a pre-existing knee injury. The inmate never complained to the overall supervisor about anything. In addition, the supervisor visited the worksite only periodically and there was nothing suggesting that the supervisor should have known about the severity of the inmate's knee injury or his attempts to be taken off of the crew. The supervisor did not assign the inmate to duty and did not have a duty to check the inmate's medical history. (Arkansas Department of Corrections)

Gladson v. Henman, 814 F.Supp. 46 (D.Kan. 1993). An inmate at a federal prison filed a Bivens action to challenge the termination of his job assignment in Federal Prison Industries. Prison officials moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion, finding that evidence showed that the termination of the inmate's job assignment had been a result of discretion in administering the program, not because of any discrimination or additional disciplinary sanction resulting from a charge of the inmate being drunk. Therefore, no due process violation occurred. The termination of the assignment was based on the recommendation that the inmate be reassigned to another job, based on unsatisfactory work performance and violation of work rules, independent of discipline imposed for job-related misconduct. Hale v. State of Ariz., 993 F.2d 1387 (9th Cir. 1993), cert. denied, 114 S.Ct. 386. Inmates who worked for state prison industries programs brought suits seeking to be paid federal minimum wage. The U.S. District Court granted summary judgment for the defendants in one case and dismissed all claims except a Section 1983 claim for injunctive relief in the other case, and appeals were taken and consolidated. The court of appeals affirmed in part, reversed in part and remanded. On rehearing en banc, the appeals court found that inmates working in prison programs structured pursuant to Arizona law requiring prisoners to work at hard labor were not "employees" of the prison entitled to minimum wage under the Fair Labor Standards Act (FLSA). Furthermore, the prison's authorization of an "inmate-operated business enterprise" which made belt buckles did not constitute a contract with a private person, firm, corporation or association, subject to minimum wage requirement under Arizona law. An inmate brought a Section 1983 action against the Director of the Department of Corrections for failing to grant a Morrissey-type hearing before revoking her work release status. The U.S. District Court denied the Director's motion for summary judgment, and the Director appealed. The appeals court found that the constitutional right of the inmate to due process protections of a Morrissey-type hearing due to parolees, rather than to protections due in prison disciplinary hearings, was not clearly established at the time the inmate's work release status was revoked. As a result, the Director was entitled to qualified immunity for his failure to provide such a hearing. Although there were similarities between parolees and work release participants, the department exercised significant control over work release inmates, and relevant statutes referred to work release participants as "inmates." Warren v. State of Mo., 995 F.2d 130 (8th Cir. 1993). An inmate who was injured while operating a table saw in a prison furniture factory brought a Section 1983 action against prison officials. The U.S. District Court granted in part and denied in part the officials' motion to dismiss and, subsequently, entered summary judgment for the officials, and the inmate appealed. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that even if the application of the deliberate indifference standard to prison working conditions was clearly established at the time of the inmate's injury, prison officials were entitled to qualified immunity in the inmate's Section 1983 action as the inmate did not establish that they were deliberately indifferent to the issue of work place safety. Reports of twenty-nine injuries submitted by the officials revealed a variety of accidents and reflected efforts by officials to find out whether saws were in proper working condition when those accidents occurred. The inmate submitted only an unattested list of twenty-one prior injuries described in a legal memorandum as injuries resulting from similar accidents, and, even if officials had knowledge of allegedly similar injuries, that knowledge did not show deliberate indifference, but rather, potential negligence. Arnold v. South Carolina Dept. of Corrections, 843 F.Supp. 110 (D.S.C. 1994). A state prison inmate who was injured while using faulty kitchen equipment brought a Section 1983 claim against prison officials based on Eighth Amendment violations. Upon the prison officials' motion for summary judgment, the district court found that the inmate failed to establish that the officials violated the Eighth Amendment's prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment. The inmate offered no evidence that the officials acted with a requisite culpable state of mind in failing to repair the equipment. Also, the deprivation of rights was not sufficiently serious to satisfy the objective component of violation. The proper remedy for the inmate was to file for workers compensation benefits. The court found that even if the inmate had established that prison officials violated the Eighth Amendment's prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment by failing to repair the faulty steam pot, prison officials were entitled to qualified immunity from the suit because it had not been clearly established that the right to properly functioning prison equipment was of constitutional magnitude. Jeldness v. Pearce, 30 F.3d 1220 (9th Cir. 1994). Women prisoners incarcerated in a state prison brought a class action alleging that the Oregon Department of Corrections discriminated against women inmates in providing educational and vocational opportunities, in violation of Title IX of the Education Amendment of 1972, regulations promulgated thereunder, and the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The U.S. District Court ruled against the inmates and they appealed. The appeals court found that Title IX and its regulations applied to prison educational programs and that Title IX required equality of treatment, rather than parity. The court ruled that penological necessity was not a defense in the Title IX case, but was only a factor in how Title IX was applied in prison. The court also found that the practice of awarding merit pay to men, but not to women, participating in the same vocational training course in the same location amounted to disparate treatment violating Title IX and its regulations. Lee v. Sikes, 870 F.Supp. 1096 (S.D.Ga. 1994). A prison inmate who was attacked by a boar hog while working at assigned duties in the prison's hog farm operation brought a civil rights suit against the warden and the supervisor of the operation. The district court found that the prison inmate failed to show "deliberate indifference" by the supervisor of the hog operation or prison warden, and thus failed to establish an Eighth Amendment violation. The inmate relied almost entirely on a list of safety rules and the supervisor's ignorance of the rules, but there was no evidence indicating deliberate indifference to the rules. In addition, the inmate was protected by the Eighth Amendment, which provides explicit protection to prisoners against cruel and unusual punishment, and could not bring a separate, independent claim for the same behavior by prison officials based on substantive due process. McMaster v. State of Minn., 30 F.3d 976 (8th Cir. 1994). A prison inmate sued state and prison officials challenging the failure to pay minimum and prevailing wages for inmates working in prison industries. The U.S. District Court granted the defendants' motions for dismissal and summary judgment and the inmate appealed. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that the prison inmates who are required to work as part of their sentences and perform labor within the correctional facility as part of a state-run prison industries program, are not "employees" of the state or prison within the meaning of the FLSA minimum wage provisions. In addition, the Ashurst-Sumners Act which prevents shipment of prisoner-made goods in interstate commerce, did not provide a private cause of action to the inmates. The U.S. District Court dismissed the action and the inmate appealed. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that the economic reality of the inmate's work at the prison was that his labor belonged to the institution, and therefore the inmate was not an employee under FLSA. The U.S. District Court dismissed the action, and the inmate appealed. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that the detention officers were not deliberately indifferent to the inmate's serious medical needs when they ordered him to perform cleaning duties notwithstanding his continued complaints of severe abdominal pain, which was diagnosed as a double hernia. The inmate's records stated no medical restrictions, and there was no indication at the time, besides the inmate's assertions of pain, that he had a hernia. (T.L. A prison inmate brought an action alleging his constitutional rights were violated by reassignment from work in a prison food service unit. The court ruled that even if it was found that the prison inmate was removed from the assignment in the food service unit for the purpose of achieving a racial balance, no constitutionally protected interest was implicated. The goal of achieving a racial balance in prison employment and housing units may be accomplished by deliberate transfers by prison officials. (Kansas Department of Corrections)

The U.S. District Court dismissed and the inmate appealed. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that a new prison wage scale that resulted in a reduction of the inmate's wages did not deprive him of a protected property interest without due process. There was no constitutional right to prison wages, and there was no Missouri statute shown that would grant the inmate a property interest to the previous higher wage scale. (Missouri)

The U.S. District Court denied relief, and the prisoner appealed. The court of appeals, affirming the decision, found that the arbitrary denial of good-time credits, resulting in the arbitrary lengthening of imprisonment, cannot be considered harmless or merely a technical violation and is within the habeas corpus jurisdiction of the district court. However, the federal court has no law to apply and is not equipped to evaluate a prisoner's work performance and his claim of arbitrary denial of good-time credits for work while identically situated prisoners received the credits. Walker v. City of Elba, Ala., 874 F.Supp. 361 (M.D. Ala. 1994). A black work release inmate who worked for a city water and electric board brought an action against the city under Title VII and against the board under Title VII and Section 1981 and for Alabama's tort of outrage. The city and board moved for summary judgment. The district court found that since the city did not construct the black work release inmate's schedule, did not set his hours, and did not endorse his paychecks, the city was not the inmate's employer and Title VII was not applicable to the city. The board for which the inmate worked was the inmate's employer for purposes of Title VII and material issues of fact as to whether the inmate was a temporary employee precluded summary judgment for the board on the inmate's Title VII claim. The district court dismissed the suit. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that a Louisiana statute establishing the prison work release program does not contain mandatory language that a prisoner shall be eligible and approved for work release if certain criteria are met, and accordingly does not create a liberty interest. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that evidence was insufficient to establish that prison officials were deliberately indifferent to the inmate's serious medical needs when the inmate was forced to work in hard soled boots, allegedly exacerbating an ankle injury. On various motions, the district court found that the Department of Correction regulation on inmate wages did not establish that the inmate had a property interest in any wage increase, thus precluding relief on his due process claim that he was improperly denied salary increases prior to satisfying an educational requirement. The regulation suggested that wages were a matter of discretion to be determined by the heads of each prison according to available funds, performance of inmates, and value of their work to the institution. Chacon v. U.S., 48 F.3d 508 (Fed. Cir. 1995). A relative of an inmate who was killed while helping to fight a fire as part of a prisoner fire-fighting detail sought benefits under the Public Safety Officers' Benefits Act. The Court of Federal Claims granted the government's motion for summary judgment and the relative appealed. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that the fact that the inmate received a full and unconditional posthumous pardon was not relevant to determining whether he was a public safety officer within the meaning of the Act. Even if the inmate's work detail was a legally organized volunteer fire department under Arizona law, the inmate could not be deemed a "member" of it because he was not a "volunteer" and thus, he was not a public safety officer for the purposes of the Act. The relative failed to demonstrate that the Bureau of Justice Assistance's (BJA) regulatory interpretation of what it meant to "serve in an official capacity" for purposes of the Act was not reasonable or that this interpretation had been misapplied. Dominique v. Weld, 880 F.Supp. 928 (D.Mass. 1995). A state inmate brought an action against prison officials alleging that his removal from a work release program deprived him of due process in violation of Section 1983 and the Massachusetts Civil Rights Act (MCRA). The district court found that the inmate did not have a constitutionally protected liberty interest in remaining in the program. The program granted the inmate some freedom, but not the broad freedoms granted to a parolee, and the program was similar to halfway house programs in which prisoners did not have constitutionally derived liberty interests. The revision of the work release program regulations, which rendered the inmate ineligible for the program, did not constitute ex post facto punishment. The revision was motivated by safety concerns, not a desire to impose further punishment on inmates, and participation in the program was a privilege which the state was entitled to revoke if it found such a measure necessary to ensure community safety. The district court granted the defendants' motion to dismiss, finding no constitutional violation. The court held that the inmate's job reassignment from food preparation to a dishroom was rationally related to the legitimate penological purpose of protecting the inmate from possible harm at the hands of other inmates, where other inmates made derogatory comments to prison officials regarding the inmate's homosexuality and there were rumors the inmate was infected with the HIV virus. The court noted that compelling prison inmates to fulfill work requirements does not violate an inmate's constitutional rights. (Federal Correctional Institution, Seagoville, Texas)

George v. SC Data Center, Inc., 884 F.Supp. 329 (W.D. Wis. 1995). A state inmate brought an action against a private entity, which contracted for data entry services at the correctional facility and for which the inmate worked, and against the correctional facility claiming that he was an employee under the Fair Labor Standards Act (FLSA) entitled to minimum wage. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court found that the state inmate who was working for a private entity was not that entity's "employee" under the FLSA and, accordingly, was not entitled to minimum wages where the inmate was not hired or terminated by the entity nor was his pay, working conditions or work schedule determined by the entity, and the entity kept no records of the inmate's individual work or performance. In addition, the state inmate was not an "employee" of the prison officials or the Wisconsin Bureau of Corrections under the FLSA where remuneration for his labor was set and paid by his custodian. Karacsonyi v. Radloff, 885 F.Supp. 368 (N.D.N.Y. 1995). A federal inmate sued a prison official alleging violation of his constitutional rights by the official's decision to penalize him for not participating in the Inmate Financial Responsibility Program (IFRP). The district court granted summary judgment for the official on issues relating to the IFRP decision, but found that the inmate's placement in a four-person cell which measured approximately 115 square feet (roughly 29 square feet of living space per man) may have amounted to cruel and unusual punishment depending upon the duration of this living situation and whether it lead to deprivations of essential needs, such as sanitation. The inmate had refused to sign a required form which the court held constituted refusal to participate in the IFRP. The court found that the inmate was correctly categorized as refusing to participate in the program where his restitution was due and payable during his incarceration. As a penalty for refusing to participate, the inmate was placed in the lowest housing status (a four-man cell), was denied the opportunity to work in Federal Prison Industries, and was denied the opportunity for a furlough. The court noted that prison officials have broad discretion in denying federal inmates the opportunity to participate in Federal Prison Industries. The court of appeals, affirming the decision, found that the inmate's one-day suspension from his prison job did not violate his constitutional rights. Nicastro v. Clinton, 882 F.Supp. 1128 (D.D.C. 1995). Federal prison inmates sued the President of the United States and a variety of government officials alleging violations of the Fair Labor Standards Act (FLSA). On the defendants' motion to dismiss, the district court found that federal prison inmates were not "employees" covered by the FLSA, as the labor they performed was not voluntary. The court ruled that a federal prisoner seeking to state a claim under the FLSA must at a minimum allege that his or her work was performed without legal compulsion and that his or her compensation was set and paid by a source other than the Bureau of Prisons. Quinn v. Cunningham, 879 F.Supp. 25 (E.D. Pa. 1995). An inmate brought an action against prison officials in charge of a prison shoe plant, alleging that prison officials denied him a position in the plant based on his race and that prison officials denied the inmate certain privileges after he filed a grievance. The prison officials moved for summary judgment. The district court found that the inmate's constitutional right to due process was not violated when he was denied a position in the prison shoe plant, even if the inmate was denied a position based on his race, where the inmate did not have liberty or property interest in any prison work assignment. However, material issues of fact precluded summary judgment for prison officials in the inmate's action which alleged an equal protection violation. Although the inmate had no right to any particular prison job, prison officials could not discriminate against him on the basis of his race in work assignments. Material issues of fact as to whether prison officials abandoned the practice of giving prisoners extra paid hours for doing extra work across the board, or whether they singled out the inmate in retaliation for filing a grievance, precluded summary judgment for the prison officials. The prison officials in charge of the prison shoe plant were not entitled to qualified immunity. Reasonable officials in the prison officials' position could not have believed that discriminating on the basis of race in prison work assignments and retaliating against inmates for filing grievances were lawful actions in light of clearly established law and information that they possessed at the time. Rodriguez v. Phillips, 66 F.3d 470 (2nd Cir. 1995). A former inmate and his mother filed a § 1983 action against prison officials. The district court denied summary judgment for the defendants and they appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded in part, and dismissed in part. The appeals court found that prison officials' belief that the inmate's three-day administrative confinement, without the opportunity to be heard, was reasonable. The court noted that the officials perceived a threat to security and safety following a report that the inmate's mother had passed contraband into the prison, and that they needed time to search the public spaces of the cell block and interview an informer. The court held that a substantive due process right to be free from excessive force from a state act in a nonseizure, nonprisoner context was not clearly established at the time that a prison officer used excessive force on the inmate's mother. Just before a visit to her son, the mother had apparently leaned against or touched the fence surrounding the prison, pausing before she continued to the visitors reception area. An officer radioed a report to officers inside the facility that he had seen the mother pass a small brown package through the fence to an unidentified inmate. Inside the prison the mother was questioned by officers about the incident and she was told she would not be allowed to visit her son that day. While she was waiting at the bus stop corrections officers seized her and brought her back for further questioning, police were contacted and she was arrested. Unable to make bail she was held overnight and she was released without explanation the next day. Two weeks later she arrived to visit her son and she was not allowed to, although her visiting rights had not been formally suspended. She alleged that an officer screamed at her, put both hands on her shoulders and propelled her toward the building entrance and threw her against the front door. Allen v. Cuomo, 100 F.3d 253 (2nd Cir. 1996). Inmates brought a § 1983 action against state officials challenging the constitutionality of a regulation pertaining to disciplinary surcharges and a pay lag for inmate wages. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the imposition of a mandatory $5 disciplinary surcharge on inmates convicted of certain prison infractions did not violate their due process right to an impartial adjudicator. The inmates asserted that the surcharge gives prison disciplinary hearing officers an incentive to impose the surcharge frequently, but the court disagreed, noting that monies collected were credited to the state general fund and not to the corrections agency. The appeals court found that the fact that the surcharge did not contain a hardship waiver for indigent inmates, while other surcharges on unincarcerated persons contained such waivers, did not violate equal protection. The appeals court found that the deterrence of inmate misbehavior and the raising of revenue were legitimate penological interests, supporting the surcharge. The appeals court held that withholding a portion of inmates' wages until their release did not violate the due process clause, takings clause, or contracts clause. The policy calls for 20 percent of an inmate's wages over a 15-week period to be withheld until their release, and the court noted that while state corrections laws created an entitlement of inmates to payment for their labor, it did not create an entitlement to access their wages prior to release. The court also noted that forms signed by inmates consenting to their work assignment contained no details about how or when payments would be made. (Green Haven Correctional Facility, New York)

Baker v. Lehman, 932 F.Supp. 666 (E.D.Pa. 1996). A prisoner sued prison officials alleging they were deliberately indifferent to his Eighth Amendment right to personal safety by failing to protect him from an attack by another inmate. The district court granted summary judgment for the officials, finding that the prisoner did not show that the officials knew of any facts from which an inference of substantial risk of serious harm might be drawn. The court found that given the previous absence of violence in the prison clothing shop, the prisoner did not show that security measures in the clothing shop posed a substantial risk of harm. The prisoner alleged that lack of screening of prisoner-workers on the basis of prior crimes, the provision of only one guard for 150 inmates, and the availability of scissors created a substantial risk of serious harm in the shop. Barber v. Grow, 929 F.Supp. 820 (E.D.Pa. 1996). A prison inmate filed a § 1983 action against a prison guard, alleging that he was injured when the guard pulled a chair from under him. The district court found that the inmate failed to state an Eighth Amendment claim and failed to state a claim under the Federal Tort Claims Act (FTCA). The court found that the Federal Prison Industries Act generally provides the exclusive remedy for injuries sustained by working prisoners, but it does not apply to injuries sustained as the result of intentional conduct. The court found that the guard's alleged conduct in pulling a chair out from under the inmate was not "wanton" and thus did not violate the Eighth Amendment; the inmate did not allege that this happened more than once, and alleged that his injury consisted only of some cuts and bruises to his arm and knee. PRETRIAL DETAINEES

Brooks v. George County Miss., 84 F.3d 157 (5th Cir. 1996). A pretrial detainee whose charges were dropped brought a § 1983 action against a county and various officials. The district court entered a judgment upon jury verdict for the detainee for claims of involuntary servitude and violation of due process based on lost wages. The appeals court affirmed in part, vacated in part, rendered in part and remanded. The court held that the work performed by the detainee during his incarceration was not involuntary servitude and that he was not deprived of property under the due process clause when he did not receive additional wages for work on private property. The court found that the sheriff, but not a deputy, deprived the detainee of a property right in wages for work performed on public property and that the sheriff was not entitled to qualified immunity. The court held that the sheriff had a policy of not paying wages to detainees, thus rendering the county liable for the constitutional deprivation. The sheriff had a statutory duty under Mississippi law to keep records of work performed by pretrial detainees and to transmit such records to ensure that detainees were paid for their work. This duty was mandatory, not discretionary and therefore the sheriff was not entitled to qualified immunity. The statute created a legitimate expectation of entitlement to compensation for work on public property by pretrial detainees. While the detainee was confined in the jail he requested and was granted trusty status which allowed him the freedom to roam in and out of his cell, the Sheriff's office, the jail, and the surrounding grounds. While incarcerated the detainee performed, at his own request, various services for the sheriff, the county and others on public and private property. He performed these services to secure his release from the jail during the day and to earn extra money by working on the outside. But the detainee was not compensated for the services he performed on public property, although he was sometimes paid money or received goods in exchange for services rendered on private property. After a five-day trial the jury returned a verdict for the detainee against the sheriff and two deputies, and against the county, awarding $50,000 damages for the claim of involuntary servitude and $20,000 for lost wages under his due process claim. The jury also awarded punitive damages against the sheriff ($5,000) and a deputy ($500) in their individual capacities. (George County Jail, Mississippi)

IDLENESS

Douglas v. DeBruyn, 936 F.Supp. 572 (S.D.Ind. 1996). An inmate who was assigned to the "idle unit" of a prison filed an in forma pauperis complaint alleging violation of § 1983. The district court found the complaint to be frivolous within the meaning of the in forma pauperis statute. The court held that the absence of a job, and the absence of vocational, educational and rehabilitation programs does not violate due process. The court noted that while such programs and activities might be useful and productive as a matter of correctional policy, the absence of them does not create any atypical and significant hardships on an inmate in relation to the ordinary incidents of prison life. According to the court, to sustain a viable Eighth Amendment violation the inmate would have to allege that conditions in the idle unit constituted an excessive risk to his health or safety. The court also noted that inmates have no constitutional right to recreation and that only the objective harm that can result from significant deprivation of movement implicates the Eighth Amendment. Frazier v. Coughlin, 81 F.3d 313 (2nd Cir. 1996). An inmate sued state corrections officials and employees claiming he was deprived of procedural due process when he was confined in a special housing unit (SHU) and then in a close supervision unit (CSU) for eleven months. The district court dismissed the suit and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed the lower court decision, ruling that the district court made the required findings of fact. The appeals court found that conditions of confinement in the SHU, in which the inmate was housed pending a disciplinary proceeding, were not dramatically different from the basic conditions which could be expected as the result of his indeterminant sentence. The court also found that the inmate had no liberty interest to remain free from confinement in the CSU and that the inmate's prison record did not include erroneous information. The court noted that the only substantive differences between confinement in CSU and the general prison population were that CSU prisoners were ineligible for certain prison jobs and that additional correctional officers may be assigned to CSU. Glover v. Johnson, 931 F.Supp. 1360 (E.D.Mich. 1996). Female prisoners moved to hold prison officials in an ongoing class action which challenged educational and vocational opportunities available to female prisoners in Michigan. The district court held prison officials in contempt of various orders relating to court access, vocational programs, and apprenticeship programs at women's facilities. The court assessed fines of $500/day until compliance with all court orders regarding access to courts was achieved and ordered prison officials to submit policies and plans to achieve compliance in this and other areas. The court also levied a $500/day fine until compliance was achieved in the areas of vocational programming and another $500/day fine until compliance was achieved in the area of apprenticeship programming. The court found that the officials' clear, positive and repeated violation of orders warranted significant monetary contempt sanctions. The court found prison officials in contempt of orders requiring vocational programs at women's prisons, to the extent that they denied court-ordered programming to some female inmates based upon their custody level. The officials were also found in contempt for not providing a work pass program at camp facilities and not providing inmates at camp facilities the opportunity to transfer to facilities which provided vocational, apprenticeship and prison industry programming. The court also found that some eligible inmates were denied an opportunity to participate in court-ordered programming by being transferred directly to camp facilities. The court found prison officials in contempt of orders regarding apprenticeship programs because electrician maintenance, landscape gardener, and building maintenance apprenticeships were never filled before the contempt motion was filed and the subsequently-established positions provided inadequate training and instruction and the officials did not actively recruit apprentices. The prison officials had argued that the electrical maintenance and other apprenticeship programs were not appropriate to the prison setting; the court responded by noting that the prison officials themselves had selected the apprenticeships to be offered and never sought to modify the court order. An inmate filed a pro se action claiming racial discrimination and alleging that prison officials unconstitutionally retaliated against him for protesting the proposed loss of showers in a prison workshop. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants and the appeals court vacated in part and affirmed in part. The appeals court held that fact issues precluded summary judgment for the officials. The officials claimed that the inmate was circulating a petition urging a work slowdown in violation of prison rules, but the inmate and other prisoners claimed he was merely collecting names of prisoners as part of a grievance process and that there was no work to be done on the day the inmate was accused of organizing a slowdown. IDLE PAY

Myers v. Hundley, 101 F.3d 542 (8th Cir. 1996). Inmates in administrative segregation brought a § 1983 action claiming violation of their constitutional rights as the result of a prison practice regarding idle-pay allowances for personal necessities and postage. The district court granted summary judgment for the prison officials and the inmates appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded in part. The court found that material factual issues were raised, precluding summary judgement, by the inmate who specifically asserted that the insufficient amounts left over after purchasing hygiene supplies forced him to miss court deadlines and dismiss cases. The inmate had also listed specific prices of hygiene supplies on which he had to spend his idle pay. Inmates in administrative segregation receive $7.70 per month in idle pay, from which they must buy necessary hygiene supplies (such as soap and toothpaste), non-prescription medications, and stamps and supplies for legal mail. The inmates claimed that the amount is not enough and that they are therefore forced to choose between being clean and pursuing legal claims. (Iowa State Penitentiary)

RIGHT TO WORK

Penrod v. Zavaras, 94 F.3d 1399 (10th Cir. 1996). An inmate brought a § 1983 suit against prison officials alleging several violations. The district court granted summary judgment for the officials and the appeals court affirmed in part and reversed in part. The appeals court held that restrictions placed on the inmate's law library access as the result of his status as an "unassigned" prisoner (one who does not have a job or program assignment), did not violate his right of access to courts. The appeals court held that placement of the inmate in an administrative segregation unit for prisoners who did not have jobs or participate in programs did not violate due process, as the conditions of segregation did not impose an atypical and significant hardship on the inmate. The appeals court held that prison regulations entitling the prisoner to work did not create a constitutional liberty interest because denial of employment opportunities to an inmate does not impose an atypical and significant hardship on the inmate in relation to the ordinary incidents of prison life. ADA-Americans with Disabilities Act
EQUAL PROTECTION

Pierce v. King, 918 F.Supp. 932 (E.D.N.C. 1996). A state inmate filed a § 1983 suit against prison officials alleging violation of his constitutional rights and his rights under the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA). The district court found that the ADA did not create a cause of action for an inmate who is displeased with his prison work assignment and that the prison did not violate the equal protection clause by allegedly refusing to make accommodations that would allow the disabled inmate to participate in work assignments that would allow him to earn good time credits. The court held that the effects of prison labor on interstate commerce were not sufficiently substantial to warrant applying labor laws such as ADA to state prisons, and that the requisite employment and public access relationships did not exist between prisoners and prisons to entitle the prisoner to benefits rooted in the Fourteenth Amendment. The court noted that it was rational for the state to base work assignment decisions on a prisoner's ability, or lack thereof, to perform particular tasks. EQUAL PROTECTION

Tooley v. Boyd, 936 F.Supp. 685 (E.D.Mo. 1996). An inmate sued jail officials under § 1983 alleging equal protection violations. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the officials, finding that the inmate suffered no equal protection violations based on his assignment to segregation following a race riot, where the inmate failed to demonstrate that he was treated dissimilarly from other similarly situated inmates. The court noted that jail officials had a rational basis for the differences in the treatment of involved parties. The court also found that the inmate suffered no equal protection violation based on denial of a kitchen work assignment. The court noted that the inmate was denied the assignment initially because the maximum number of inmates with high bonds or murder charges were already assigned to the kitchen, and when an opening occurred the inmate was given it. ADA-Americans with Disabilities Act

White v. State of Colorado, 82 F.3d 364 (10th Cir. 1996). A former inmate filed civil rights actions for declaratory and injunctive relief against the state and prison officials. The district court entered judgment for the officials and the former inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed the lower court decision, ruling that neither the Rehabilitation Act nor the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) applies to prison employment. The former inmate alleged that prison officials refused to provide him with surgery for a leg injury he suffered in a car accident prior to his incarceration; he also alleged that diagnostic evaluation and treatment of his injury was denied or delayed. Medical evidence was uncontroverted that a one- or two-year delay in having the surgery, until the former inmate was released from prison, would not cause further damage to the inmate's leg. The former inmate had also claimed that he was denied prison employment opportunities because of his disability, seeking relief under the Rehabilitation Act and the Americans with Disabilities Act. REMOVAL FROM JOB

Alley v. Angelone, 962 F.Supp. 827 (E.D.Va. 1997). Prisoners brought a civil rights action against corrections officials and the district court dismissed the case. The court found that the prisoners could not recover under the civil remedies section of the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act (RICO) where they did not allege that they were injured in their business. The court held that the prisones did not have a constitutional right to prison work assignments. The court held that the prisoners did not have a constitutionally protected interest in continued prison employment. The prisoners also failed to state a § 1985 claim with their allegations that corrections officials engaged in a conspiracy to under-staff facilities and to incite riots. The court found that due process was not required before a prison lockdown, as lockdowns were within the normal range of incarceration. (Virginia Department of Corrections)

SAFETY

Bagola v. Kindt, 131 F.3d 632 (7th Cir. 1997). A federal inmate whose arm was severed by a textile machine while he was working in a prison industry program brought a Bivens action against prison officials. The district court entered summary judgment for the prison officials and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the inmate could bring a Bivens claim separate from any claim under workers' compensation but that the officials' failure to protect the inmate did not rise to the level of deliberate indifference. According to the court, it is not the injury itself that gives rise to a Bivens claim for violating the Eighth Amendment, but rather the court must scrutinize whether prison officials acted, or failed to act, with a sufficiently culpable state of mind to determine if the injury was the result of punishment or a tragic accident. The court found that the officials' conduct did not rise to a level of deliberate indifference where evidence indicated that the officials believed that safety violations were abated, did not receive any additional safety citations until after the accident, and continued to attempt to abate any risks associated with the inherently dangerous industrial setting. The officials had required the inmate to attend frequent safety meetings and to sign a job safety analysis. The inmate was working as a "card fixer" in the prison factory's Card and Spin Department, which produced wool blankets. (Federal Prison Industries, U.S. Penitentiary in Terre Haute, Indiana)

A federal inmate brought a pro se suit against the Federal Bureau of Prisons claiming his due process rights were violated because he was deprived of longevity pay by Federal Prison Industries (FPI). The district court held that the inmate did not have any constitutionally-protected property interest in longevity pay. The inmate was employed in the FPI print factory at a penitentiary. For a five month period the FPI superintendent for industries withheld all benefits from the inmate, including longevity pay, because of unsatisfactory work performance. Doyle v. Coombe, 976 F.Supp. 183 (W.D.N.Y. 1997). An inmate filed a civil rights action alleging that prison officials violated his Eighth Amendment right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment by exposing him to dangerous levels of asbestos. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the prison officials, finding that they were entitled to qualified immunity because the inmate's exposure to asbestos predated the controlling law that found exposure to asbestos could support an Eighth Amendment claim. The inmate alleged that he was forced to work in areas where asbestos abatement projects were in progress; he claimed he was ordered to enter into areas in which signs were visibly posted warning that asbestos and asbestos-containing materials were present and that exposure without protective gear was dangerous. Gholson v. Murry, 953 F.Supp. 709 (E.D.Va. 1997). Inmates brought a § 1983 action against prison officials alleging violation of their constitutional rights. The district court granted summary judgment for the officials. The court found that denial of work opportunities and certain educational programs for inmates in segregated housing did violate the due process clause or the Eighth Amendment. The court also found that denial of transfers to other facilities so that inmates could practice their religious diet did not violate the First Amendment, the Religious Freedom Restoration Act (RFRA), the equal protection clause or the Eighth Amendment where the inmates failed to present evidence that they had not received a proper religious diet at the facility at which they were incarcerated. The court held that allegedly small recreation facilities provided to segregated inmates did not violate the Eighth Amendment or the equal protection clause; individual exercise areas measuring approximately 8 feet by 20 feet were provided, and the inmates were permitted at least six hours of outside recreation per week. The court held that officials did not violate the Eighth Amendment with respect to lead in the prison water system because the officials reviewed the situation and informed staff and inmates of the steps they needed to take to safeguard themselves from exposure. Johnstone v. U.S., 980 F.Supp. 148 (E.D.Pa. 1997). A former federal inmate filed a suit asserting a Bivens claim for denial of medical treatment and a claim for judicial review under the federal Inmate Accident Compensation Act. The district court dismissed the case in part, finding that the plaintiff's Bivens claims against the United States, Bureau of Prisons Industries, Inc., UNICOR, and the Department of Health Services of the Bureau of Prisons, were barred by sovereign immunity. The court also found that the complaint against corrections officers who gave the plaintiff a particular work assignment was time barred. The plaintiff alleged that he arrived at a federal facility with medical records that indicated he should be assigned to light duty work because of a heart condition, but he was assigned to a heavy-duty work assignment which led to groin injuries. Jones v. Hannigan, 959 F.Supp. 1400 (D.Kan. 1997). An inmate brought a civil rights action against prison physicians and a director of nursing, claiming they were deliberately indifferent to his serious medical needs and failed to provide adequate and necessary medical care. The district court found that although the inmate's medical needs were serious, there was no evidence that the defendants were deliberately indifferent by failing to include work restrictions and recreational restrictions. When the inmate arrived at the correctional facility he was medically classified as "Class I" which meant that he could undertake any work assignment and live in any standard cellhouse. After seeing a urologist, the inmate was diagnosed with a condition called "resolving epididymitis" and the specialist recommended that the prisoner restrict strenuous activity. Prison officials completed a "Temporary Medical Work Restriction" form for the inmate, but despite this information the inmate alleged that his work supervisor ordered him to perform his job duties, including lifting objects weighing more than 100 pounds. The inmate injured his back and pulled his groin while attempting to lift a table top at work and he was taken to the clinic for an emergency examination. (Hutchinson Correctional Facility, Kansas)

SEGREGATION

Neal v. District of Columbia, 131 F.3d 172 (D.C.Cir. 1997). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against corrections officials alleging violation of his due process liberty interests. The inmate claimed he was kept involuntarily in "voluntary" protective custody for six months. The district court dismissed the case and the appeals court affirmed, finding that the inmate's placement did not constitute an "atypical and significant hardship." The appeals court held that the officials did not violate the inmate's due process liberty interest even though his placement deprived him of approximately half of his out-of-cell time, eliminated his access to employment, and restricted his access to prison facilities. The inmate had initially asked to be placed in voluntary protective custody so he could "become acquainted with the conditions and routine" of the facility, after he was transferred back to the facility. ADA-Americans with Disabilities Act
DISCRIMINATION

Raines v. State of Fla., 983 F.Supp. 1362 (N.D.Fla. 1997). Inmates brought an action under the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) alleging they were denied the maximum amount of incentive gain time because they were disabled. A state regulation deprives handicapped or disabled prisoners of job assignments, educational assignments, or other opportunities to earn the maximum amount of incentive gain time. The district court held that the regulation was not cruel and unusual punishment under the Eighth Amendment because it was adopted to serve as an incentive to prisoners not to feign illness and to work, if possible, not to punish prisoners because of a real disability or illness. But the court held that the regulation excluded persons with disabilities from enjoying the full opportunity to participate in the gain time "program" in violation of ADA. The court ruled that ADA applied to state prisons, and that the regulation created lesser opportunities for disabled prisoners, making only one of four statutory activities available to them. Rowold v. McBride, 973 F.Supp. 829 (N.D.Ind. 1997). A prisoner petitioned for habeas corpus relief from his conviction in a prison disciplinary proceeding. The prisoner alleged that he was ordered to perform extra work duty on his religious day of rest. The district court held that the record supported the guilty finding under the "some evidence" standard. The court found that the prison's interest in assigning extra work duty to the inmate was legitimate and that prison officials did not have to implement other alternatives to prove that the regulation was the least restrictive means available. According to the court, it was neither arbitrary nor irrational to require inmates to perform additional work duty in response to various violations they have committed while incarcerated. INVOLUNTARY SERVITUDE

Villarreal v. Woodham, 113 F.3d 202 (11th Cir. 1997). A pretrial detainee who was allegedly required by correction officials to perform translation services for other inmates, medical personnel, and court personnel, filed suit in federal court. The detainee alleged violation of the Fair Labor Standards Act (FLSA) and violation of his civil rights because he was not paid for his services. The district court dismissed the claim and the detainee appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the detainee was not an "employee" within the meaning of FLSA and that the detainee's forced performance of translation services was not cruel and unusual punishment. The court held that the four-factor standard for determining whether labor falls within the Fair Labor Standards Act does not apply in the prison context, but that a broader approach is applied to inmate labor, focusing on the economic situation as a whole. The court noted that although there was no question that the sheriff's intent in requesting that the detainee perform translation services was punitive in nature, the cerebral task of language translation posed no risk to the detainee's safety or welfare, and presumably the performance of the services served to occupy the detainee's time, keep him out of trouble, and allow him interaction with others. Anthony v. Burkhart, 28 F.Supp.2d 1239 (M.D.Fla. 1998). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against employees of a private, nonprofit corporation which operated correctional work programs for the Florida Department of Corrections (DOC), claiming he was denied an office position in a program and was terminated based on his race for utilizing the program's grievance procedure. The district court granted summary judgment for the employees, finding they were entitled to qualified immunity from liability. The court noted that the employees had no control over which inmates were assigned by the DOC to the factory, and that the inmate did not allege facts that contradicted the DOC's claim that he was terminated for unauthorized use of a copier. WORK CONDITIONS

Austin v. Hopper, 15 F.Supp.2d 1210 (M.D.Ala. 1998). Inmates in a state prison system brought a class action suit under § 1983, challenging several of the system's policies and practices. The district court held that an agreement settling the inmates' chain gang claim was not subject to the limitations on prospective relief imposed by the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA) and the settlement was approved. The agreement called for a complete and permanent cessation of the practice of chaining prisoners together. Inmates on chain gangs had been shackled by leg irons in groups of five, separated by eight feet of chain between them, were required to wear white uniforms with "Chain Gang" printed in black, and were taken to public highways or work sites where they performed manual labor in ten-hour shifts. The court found that an automatic 90-day denial of visitation for inmates assigned to a shock incarceration program did not violate their First Amendment right to visitation. The inmates in the program were recidivists and parole violators. According to the court, the denial of visitation promoted the legitimate penological objectives of deterrence and rehabilitation in a common-sense way, and the inmates had mail and telephone calls as an alternative means of communication. The court held that the practice of disciplining inmates who refused to work or who were disruptive by chaining them to a "hitching post" was cruel and unusual punishment. The inmates experienced actual, significant pain while shackled to the post and were denied access to basic human needs such as shelter, water, and toilet facilities. The court declined to approve a proposed toilet facilities settlement in response to the inmates' claims that inmates on work squads were not provided with adequate toilet facilities. WORK RELEASE

Carter v. McCaleb, 29 F.Supp.2d 423 (W.D.Mich. 1998). A former inmate brought a § 1983 action against corrections officials and a county. The district court held that the inmate, who received a sentence that authorized him to participate in work release, did not have a liberty interest to participate in the work release program that would implicate procedural or substantive due process when the county failed to process him for work release. Although the sentencing judge indicated that he wanted the inmate to "work or seek work" the judge also cautioned the inmate "that you may be on work release, that's simply an okay that you may be put on that status. It's a sheriff's work release program. It belongs to the sheriff, not the court system. I have nothing to do with it." (Calhoun County, Mich.)

TRANSFER

Castle v. Clymer, 15 F.Supp.2d 640 (E.D.Pa. 1998). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against prison officials alleging that he was transferred to another facility in retaliation for exercise of his First Amendment free speech rights. The district court entered judgment for the prisoner, finding that transferring him based on his correspondence with a newspaper reporter violated his right to free speech. The court held that transferring the prisoner because he participated in a preauthorized interview with a reporter violated his right to procedural due process, as did transferring him based on his activities as president of an advocacy group for life prisoners. The court found that the prisoner had a free speech right to send outgoing correspondence to a newspaper reporter, subject to reasonable prison regulations. The court held that compensatory damages were not warranted for the prisoner's loss of his position as a para-law library clerk, and that punitive damages were not warranted because there was no finding that the officials acted with callous indifference or an evil motive; the court awarded the prisoner nominal damages of $1. The court declined to order the receiving facility to give the prisoner the same job and the single-cell status the prisoner enjoyed at the original facility, because the receiving facility was not involved in the constitutional violations that gave rise to the case. In its decision, the court outlined three tests to determine whether the prisoner was transferred in retaliation for exercising his constitutional rights: the "but for" test, the "significant factor" test, and the "narrowly tailored" test. (State Correctional Institution-Dallas, Pennsylvania)

WORK RELEASE PAYMENTS

Christiansen v. Clarke, 147 F.3d 655 (8th Cir. 1998). A former inmate of a community corrections center brought a suit alleging that a prison had deprived him of his property without due process of law, after the prison withdrew $2,790 from his inmate account to cover the costs for room and board during his participation in a work-release program. The district court dismissed the case and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the inmate lacked a constitutionally protected property right to the full amount of his salary from the work-release program because he did not have a constitutionally- protected right to work release. According to the court, a Nebraska statute that authorized the director of correctional services to collect from work-release inmates "such costs incident to the person's confinement" as the director deemed "appropriate and reasonable" provided the statutory authority for the prison's withdrawal of money from the prisoner's inmate account. MEDICAL RESTRICTIONS

Collins v. Hannigan, 14 F.Supp.2d 1239 (D.Kan. 1998). An inmate brought a pro se action against prison officials, a physician and a nurse, alleging that his constitutional rights were violated by their responses to his health-related complaints, which resulted in his transfer from minimum security to maximum security. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court found that changes in the inmate's medical and security classifications which resulted in his transfer from minimum security to maximum security, his inability to participate in a work program, and short visitation periods, did not pose an atypical and significant hardship that violated the due process clause. According to the court, denial of the opportunity to participate in an in-house work program does not raise due process concerns. The court held that a corrections officer did not violate the Eighth Amendment when he ordered the inmate, who had a heart condition, to clean baseboards. The inmate did not suffer serious injury but at most was dizzy and suffered some pain, and the officer checked with a physician before ordering the inmate to work. The court also found that the Eighth Amendment was not violated when a corrections officer allegedly waited 15 minutes before summoning medical assistance at the request of the inmate. The court held that the transfer of the inmate to a maximum security facility after his heart condition prevented him from working did not violate equal protection, and was justified by his need to be located close to a prison clinic. Howard v. Headly, 72 F.Supp.2d 118 (E.D.N.Y. 1999). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against prison officials alleging that they required him to work beyond his physical capabilities. The district court denied qualified immunity for the officials, finding that the prisoner had stated a claim for a violation of the Eighth Amendment. The court noted that the officials required the prisoner, who had a back injury, to work sanitation duty despite the pain and agony that it caused the prisoner, and despite the knowledge that a physician's orders precluded such work. Johnson v. DuBois, 20 F.Supp.2d 138 (D.Mass. 1998). An inmate brought a pro se action to recover for exposure to asbestos. The district court ruled that while the inmate could recover for exposure to asbestos without actually suffering from asbestosis, cancer, or other physical injuries, the inmate failed to establish that he was exposed to asbestos. The inmate alleged, based on news articles, that almost all buildings erected before 1970 used asbestos as fireproofing material, which the court found to be insufficient evidence. The inmate contended that we was exposed to asbestos while working on several corrections department inmate work crews during his incarceration, and that he was not provided with protective clothing or devices. Lewis v. Cook County Dept. of Corrections, 28 F.Supp.2d 1073 (N.D.Ill. 1998). An inmate brought a pro se § 1983 case against county correctional officers in their individual and official capacities. The district court that the inmate stated a claim for retaliation against the officers in their individual capacities by alleging that he was terminated from his position as law library cleaner one month after he filed a grievance against a corrections officer. The court held that the inmate's complaint did not adequately allege that the officers were policymakers of the county department of corrections, so as to support a § 1983 claim against the officers in their official capacities. The court also held that an officer's conduct in forbidding the inmate from continuing with his law library job due to a "hickey" on his neck did not violate the inmate's equal protection rights. DEDUCTIONS FROM WAGES

Montano-Figueroa v. Crabtree, 162 F.3d 548 (9th Cir. 1998). A federal prisoner petitioned for a writ of habeas corpus alleging that the Inmate Financial Responsibility Program (IFRP) impermissibly intruded upon the sentencing court's responsibility to determine the amount and timing of fine payments. The district court denied the petition and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the IFRP, which allowed a prison to withhold a prisoner's wages for payment of a court-ordered fine, was not an improper intrusion upon a court's statutory sentencing authority, and that the IFRP was neither a usurpation of a sentencing court's Article III powers nor a violation of the separation of powers doctrine. (Federal Correctional Institute-Sheridan, Oregon)

Roucchio v. Coughlin, 29 F.Supp.2d 72 (E.D.N.Y. 1998). A former inmate brought a § 1983 suit to recover damages from several state officials, alleging he was deprived of his right to procedural due process through the State's revocation of his right to participate in a temporary work release program (TWRP) without giving him an opportunity to be heard until approximately six months later. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants, finding that the inmate failed to show actual, compensable injuries from the acts of the temporary release committee. The court also found that the defendants were entitled to qualified immunity because the issue of whether the inmate's liberty interest in remaining in the program was sufficient to give rise to a pre-removal hearing was unclear. The former inmate had sought $600,000 in compensatory damages and $500,000 in punitive damages from each of the six defendants. (Queensboro Correctional Facility, New York)

Sanchez v. Taggart, 144 F.3d 1154 (8th Cir. 1998). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against corrections officials alleging that a corrections officer had compelled him to perform labor beyond his physical capacity, thereby endangering his health. The district court granted summary judgment for the officials but the appeals court reversed in part and affirmed in part. The appeals court held that summary judgment was precluded by issues of fact as to whether the officer endangered the inmate's health after he had been told by the inmate that he had a medical condition that restricted his ability to work. The inmate was assigned, along with others, to emergency sandbagging in response to road flooding. The inmates had not been screened because of the expediency of the situation. The inmate was called to report for sandbagging duty and he responded that he was on "no duty status" and that housing unit documents prohibited him from participating in hard labor. An officer, without checking the records, told the inmate that "I'm giving you a direct order" and the inmate went to work. Shortly after he began to work, the inmate seriously reinjured his back and was put on crutches and given medication. (Algoa Correctional Center, Missouri)

Williams v. Norris, Arkansas Dept. Of Corrections, 148 F.3d 983 (8th Cir. 1998). A state inmate brought a § 1983 action against corrections officials and a nurse, alleging that he was required to perform labor that was dangerous because of his medical condition, resulting in a back injury. The district court entered judgment against two corrections officials and a nurse and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the officials and nurse violated the inmate's right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment by imposing a work assignment that exceeded his known medical restrictions. According to the court, neither official took action to "rescue" the inmate from work that was dangerous, even though they knew of his restrictions and his assignment. Judgements of $500 were ordered against each of the three defendants. The inmate had previously incurred a back injury in a car accident and also suffered from hypertension. He was medically classified as M-2P, which meant that he was to do no prolonged stooping, walking, standing, or "strenuous physical activity for periods in excess of four hours." He was assigned to construction work, which included carrying 12 inch cement blocks. pushing wheelbarrows full of cement, and carrying steel rebars. On the same day he began work he saw the nurse, telling her that he was afraid the work would make his health problems worse. The nurse did nothing in response because she did not yet have his medical records. (Jefferson Regional Jail Facility, Arkansas)

Wilson v. Johnson, 999 F.Supp. 394 (W.D.N.Y. 1998). A prison inmate brought a § 1983 action against a facility superintendent and corrections counselor alleging that his work assignment in the prison mess hall violated the Eighth Amendment. The district court ruled in favor of the defendants, finding that the work assignment did not pose a substantial risk of serious harm to the inmate. According to the court, there was nothing in the inmate's medical records that indicated that his claimed back problem was serious enough to prevent him from performing the tasks required of a mess hall worker. There was evidence that the inmate had not only been willing, but was anxious to start his assignment. The inmate had once been given a bed board for his back problem and there was nothing on the record that indicated any further history of back problems. (Orleans Correctional Facility, New York)

Alevras v. Snyder, 49 F.Supp.2d 1112 (E.D.Ark. 1999). A prisoner petitioned for habeas corpus relief challenging the legality of the federal Bureau of Prisons (BOP) Inmate Financial Responsibility Program (IFRP). The district court held that IFRP did not violate a statutory subsection governing the time and method of payment of fines or Article III. The court noted that the sentencing court ordered restitution to be paid in installments, which allowed the prison to withhold wages to pay court-ordered restitution. The district court reviewed conflicting appeals court decisions regarding this issue and concluded that requiring participation in IFRP was appropriate. (Fed. Corr. Inst. in Forrest City, Arkansas)

Baumann v. Walsh, 36 F.Supp.2d 508 (N.D.N.Y. 1999). An inmate who was injured by falling off a top bunk and then reinjured by falling off a shelf at his prison job sued prison officials under § 1983. The district court dismissed all defendants from the case except the inmate's shop supervisor. The court held that the inmate had an objectively serious medical need and that a substantial risk of harm existed with respect to the inmate's working conditions because he was made to climb along shelves and stand on boxes to retrieve material from the top shelves of a storage room. The court denied summary judgment for the shop supervisor, citing material issues of fact to be resolved regarding the supervisor's notice of unsafe work conditions and whether a ladder was available for use by the inmate. ADA-Americans with Disabilities Act

Cassidy v. Indiana Dept. of Correction, 59 F.Supp.2d 787 (S.D.Ind. 1999). A blind inmate brought an action against a state corrections department alleging violations of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) and the Rehabilitation Act. The district court held that the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA) barred the inmate's claims to the extent that he asserted mental or emotional injuries, and that nominal damages were available to the plaintiff. According to the court, to the extent that the inmate's claims under ADA and the Rehabilitation Act addressed the extra offender pay that the inmate lost as the result of being denied the opportunity to work at the prison, the claims would not be barred by the section of PLRA that prohibits a prisoner from bring an action for mental or emotional injury suffered while in custody without the showing of a physical injury. The court also held that nominal damages are available for intentional violations of ADA or the Rehabilitation Act, even if no other damages are available. The inmate had sought relief for the emotional and mental harm he suffered from his inability to pursue the same activities at his newly-assigned prison which did not accommodate his disabilities, compared to his opportunities at a previous facility. Davis v. Woehrer, 32 F.Supp.2d 1078 (E.D.Wis. 1999). A state prisoner filed a pro se civil rights action alleging his Eighth Amendment rights were violated because he was knowingly ordered by prison officials to operate a meat slicer without the proper training. The prisoner claimed that he was severely injured while operating the meat slicer. The defendants moved to have the case dismissed because the prisoner had failed to exhaust administrative remedies. The district court denied the motion, ruling that the exhaustion requirement of the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA) does not apply where the plaintiff is pursuing only monetary damages and the prison grievance procedure does not provide for monetary relief. Ford v. Nassau County Executive, 41 F.Supp.2d 392 (E.D.N.Y. 1999). A pretrial detainee brought an action against a county correctional facility and county executive alleging violation of his constitutional rights because he was required to serve as a "food cart worker" without payment. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court held that making the detainee choose between distributing food to inmates and being segregated in "lock in" could not be deemed punishment, and therefore did not deprive the detainee of liberty without due process. The court also held that requiring the detainee to work without payment as a food cart worker did not violate the Thirteenth Amendment; according to the court, to sustain a claim under the Thirteenth Amendment the detainee would have to demonstrate he was subjected to compulsory labor "akin to African slavery." The court found that the detainee's own alleged assistance in the distribution of food, for which he received at least some consideration, did not rise to the level of the indignity and degradation that accompanied slavery. As a food cart worker the detainee was required to push a pre-loaded food cart approximately 125 yards to an elevator, and occasionally to hand out certain foods such as milk, bread or oranges. He was also sometimes required to perform other tasks, such as sweeping a guard walk or emptying garbage. According to the detainee, he was required to work seven days per week, for all three meals. The detainee was required to take medication to control his epilectic seizures and was accordingly assigned to a "workers and medical dorm," which involved him in work activities. The court held that there was no evidence that the detainee's chores, despite his medical status, were overly burdensome to him. (Nassau County Correctional Center, New York)

Gaston v. Coughlin, 81 F.Supp.2d 381 (N.D.N.Y. 1999). In a § 1983 suit a state prisoner alleged retaliation in violation of his constitutional rights for his complaints about work conditions. The district court found that prison officers were liable for First Amendment retaliation and that they were not entitled to qualified immunity. The court ruled that the prisoner was entitled to pre-judgment compounded interest for lost wages and for monetary awards for educational costs incurred because of the loss of financial aid. The court held that the officers filed false accusations against the prisoner after he met with prison officials to discuss the prison's violation of a state law that limited the number of hours that inmates were required to work. The prisoner was allegedly disciplined for instigating a work stoppage but the court found no evidence that a work stoppage occurred. The prisoner was restricted from his job in the prison kitchen and was transferred to another prison, depriving him of wages and forcing him to delay and alter his educational plans and to incur additional educational costs. The court ruled that the prisoner was not entitled to punitive damages because there was no evidence that the officers were motivated by evil motive or intent or that they acted with reckless or callous indifference to the prisoner's federally-protected rights. Lambert v. Sullivan, 35 F.Supp.2d 1131 (E.D.Wis. 1999). A state prisoner filed for a writ of habeas corpus in an attempt to prevent his transfer to a privately-operated correctional facility in another state. The district court denied the petition, finding that the proposed transfer did not violate the prisoner's rights under state law nor did it violate the prisoner's due process rights. The court noted that as a general matter, a state prisoner has no federal constitutional right to serve his sentence in any particular place of confinement. The court also rejected the prisoner's assertion that his transfer would violate the Thirteenth Amendment's proscription against involuntary servitude because he would be required to work at the private facility. According to the court, it is well established that the forced labor of state convicts does not violate the Thirteenth Amendment, and the same rule of law applies regardless of whether the convict is incarcerated in a public or private facility. MacFarlane v. Walter, 179 F.3d 1131 (9th Cir. 1999). After their state habeas petitions were denied, state prisoners petitioned for federal habeas corpus relief, challenging two counties' "good conduct" and "good performance" policies as they were applied to them. The district court granted summary judgment for the respondent corrections officials, but the appeals court reversed and remanded. The appeals court held that there was an equal protection violation in the counties' allowance of lesser good time credits for defendants who were detained pretrial in county jails because of their financial inability to post bail, than that allowed for defendants who were able to wait to serve their sentences until after sentencing to a state correctional facility. The counties' early release policies limited presentence detainees to a maximum good-conduct credit of 15% of the sentence imposed; the court noted that persons who had posted bail and served their entire sentence at a state correctional facility could end up serving 23 days less on a five- to six-year sentence. The court upheld the policies under which pretrial detainees were not eligible for participation in work and other programs through which they could earn good-performance credit, finding the counties had established a strong rational connection between the legislative means and purpose of protecting community safety. Onishea v. Hopper, 171 F.3d 1289 (11th Cir. 1999). State inmates who tested positive for the human immunodeficiency virus (HIV) brought a class action suit against prison officials challenging segregation of prison recreational, religious and educational programs based on inmates' HIV-positive status. The inmates alleged that the practices were unconstitutional and violated the Rehabilitation Act. At the male prison at which HIV-positive male inmates were housed they were excluded from participation in various prison jobs, vocational classes, inmate barber jobs, laundry jobs, gardening, and other activities and programs. The district court denied relief after a bench trial and the inmates appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part and vacated and remanded in part. On remand the district court again denied relief and the inmates again appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that a "significant risk" of HIV transmission existed for any prison program in which HIV-positive inmates sought participation. The appeals court affirmed the district court's finding that integrated programs would risk violence and that segregation of HIV-positive inmates was not an exaggerated response. The court also affirmed the finding that hiring additional guards to accommodate integration of programs was too costly and imposed an undue burden on the prison system. The court noted that the Rehabilitation Act did not require a state corrections department to do whatever it was legally capable of doing to accommodate HIV-positive inmates. REFUSAL TO WORK

Palmer v. Johnson, 193 F.3d 346 (5th Cir. 1999). A state inmate brought a § 1983 action for monetary and injunctive relief against correctional officials, alleging violation of his constitutional rights when he was forced to spend a night on a work field, along with other members of a work squad, without adequate bathroom facilities and shelter. The district court found a warden and assistant warden liable in their individual capacities, granted injunctive relief, and ordered claims for monetary damages to proceed to trial. The appeals court affirmed in part and remanded, finding that the inmate had demonstrated a violation of his clearly established Eighth Amendment rights and that the warden and assistant warden were not entitled to summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity. The inmate alleged that he and other members of his work crew were confined outdoors overnight without any shelter, jackets, blankets, or a source of heat while the temperature dropped and the wind blew, and without bathroom facilities for 49 inmates sharing a small bounded area. The warden allegedly ordered this "sleep-out" in response to the inmates' response to a lecture they had received from a sergeant after lunch. They were ordered to stop and sit in the field, even though some of them wanted to go to work. They were confined to an area measuring approximately twenty feet by thirty feet, bounded by poles and a string of lights. Correctional officers were ordered to shoot any inmate who attempted to leave the designated area. When the inmate asked permission to leave the area to urinate and defecate he was informed that he would be shot if he attempted to do so outside of the boundaries that had been set. The inmates were dressed in short sleeve shirts for a day of work in the field, but the temperature fell below fifty-nine degrees overnight and the inmates were forced to stay warm by huddling together. Both the warden and assistant warden were present during the evening of the "sleep-out" and the warden allegedly threatened another such event if the inmates refused to work. Phillips v. Booker, 76 F.Supp.2d 1183 (D.Kan. 1999). A prisoner filed a habeas corpus petition challenging the execution of his sentence because the Bureau of Prisons had delegated payments of court-ordered restitution through the Inmate Financial Responsibility Program (IFRP). The court denied the petition, finding that even though restitution was ordered to be paid immediately by the court it did not become void because it could not be paid in full immediately. The court found that the federal prisoner did not possess a liberty or property interest in his Federal Prison Industries job assignment and therefore he could be presented with the choice of assigning one-half of his pay to satisfy his restitution obligation or losing his job, without any violation of his due process rights. Pischke v. Litscher, 178 F.3d 497 (7th Cir. 1999). Inmates of several Wisconsin state prisons sought habeas corpus relief to invalidate, under the Thirteen Amendment's ban on involuntary servitude, a state statute that authorizes prison authorities to enter into contracts with private prisons in other states for the confinement of Wisconsin prisoners. Federal district courts denied the inmates' petitions. The appeals court denied the applications for appealability, finding that § 1983, not habeas corpus, was the proper means to challenge the constitutionality of the statute, and that the claims were frivolous. According to the court, the Thirteenth Amendment ban on involuntary servitude has an express exception for persons imprisoned pursuant to conviction of a crime. (Wisconsin)

Prevard v. Fauver, 47 F.Supp.2d 539 (D.N.J. 1999). Inmates serving indeterminate sentences under a former New Jersey sex offender statute sued the state alleging that denial of work and commutation credits available to defendants under a new criminal code was unconstitutional. The district court held that the denial of credits did not violate due process, equal protection, or prohibitions against ex post facto laws and cruel and unusual punishment. The court held that offenders serving indeterminate sentences under a former sex offender law were not similarly situated to persons serving determinate sentences under a new criminal code. The court noted that even if the state's denial of work and commutation credits to persons convicted of sex offenses affected a liberty interest, the state had a rational basis, consistent with due process, for denying the credits. Quartararo v. Catterson, 73 F.Supp.2d 270 (E.D.N.Y. 1999). A prisoner brought a § 1983 action against corrections and parole officials challenging his removal from a work release program. The district court granted summary judgment in favor in the prisoner, ruling that failure to provide the prisoner with 24 hours' notice of the hearing concerning his removal violated due process. The court also held that a letter justifying the removal of the prisoner from the program solely on the basis of a parole hold did not comport with the due process requirement for a statement of the reasons. According to the court, an inmate in New York State has a protected liberty interest in continuing in a work release program, triggering minimum procedural due process requirements for termination that include notice and reasons. (Temporary Work Release Program, State of New York)

TERMINATION

Rienholtz v. Campbell, 64 F.Supp.2d 721 (W.D.Tenn. 1999). A prison inmate brought a pro se action under § 1983 alleging that termination from his prison law library position, his transfer to another facility, and his termination from a commissary clerical job, resulted in violation of his First Amendment and due process rights. The district court held that the handling of the inmate's prison grievances did not implicate his First Amendment right of access to courts. According to the court, right of access applies only to court actions, not prison grievances. The court also found that the inmate's alleged lack of access to a prison law library because a computerized research system had not been installed did not violate the First Amendment. The court held that an inmate has no liberty interest protected by the due process clause in assignment to a particular job, to a particular prison, or in freedom from segregation. The court noted that although mandatory language in state prison regulations might have been violated, these procedural regulations did not implicate a protected liberty interest. Shabazz v. Cole, 69 F.Supp.2d 177 (D.Mass. 1999). An inmate who worked in a prison library sued the prison librarian and the prison superintendent challenging his treatment by the librarian and the propriety of a disciplinary proceeding. The district court held that there was no procedural due process violation regarding the inmate's loss of library privileges for one week, exclusive of privileges to the law library. The court also found that the inmate failed to state a claim regarding his alleged constructive discharge from his library job. According to the court, the inmate had no vested or property interest in the right to maintain his position in the law library, and therefore failed to state a claim for alleged constructive discharge. The court found that the inmate failed to state a claim of verbal harassment due to his race, despite his allegations of mental suffering to the extent that he could no longer assist other prisoners with legal matters. The court noted that emotional damage by verbal harassment of an inmate does not amount to the infringement of a constitutional right.(Bay State Correctional Center, Massachusetts)

Shehee v. Luttrell, 199 F.3d 295 (6th Cir. 1999). A prisoner sued prison employees and officials claiming violation of his constitutional rights in connection with his termination from a prison work assignment. The district court denied the defendants' motion to dismiss but the appeals court reversed and remanded. The appeals court held that officials who were not involved in the inmate's termination from his commissary job and whose only roles involved the denial of administrative grievances or the failure to act, were not liable under § 1983. The appeals court also held that the commissary supervisor and warehouse foreman could not be liable on the inmate's claims of termination from his job in retaliation for exercise of his First Amendment right in filing grievances, where they neither fired nor had the authority to fire the inmate from his job, despite the contention that they instigated the firing. The inmate had alleged that the supervisor and foreman harassed him by fabricating an allegation against him because he refused to participate in an alleged kickback scheme. The appeals court held that even if true, these allegations did not implicate the inmate's First Amendment rights. The court noted that all of the inmates who worked in the commissary were accused of attempting to make alcohol after rotting fruit was found in the refrigerator. A detainee brought a pro se § 1983 action against state prison officials alleging that his constitutional rights were violated by being compelled to work in a prison cafeteria while he was a pretrial detainee. He also alleged he was denied meaningful access to courts by being compelled to work in the cafeteria while preparing an appeal from his conviction. The detainee asserted that he was entitled to compensation pursuant to the minimum wage provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act (FLSA). The district court dismissed the complaints. The appeals court held that the detainee failed to state a claim for meaningful access to court, and that prisoners and pretrial detainees who perform intra-prison work are not entitled to minimum wages under FLSA. Turner v. Johnson, 46 F.Supp.2d 655 (S.D.Tex. 1999). A state prisoner petitioned for habeas corpus relief challenging the outcome of three prison disciplinary hearings. The district court denied the petition. The court held that a prisoner has no constitutional right to organize a prison work shutdown or to circulate a petition facilitating such an action. The prisoner's own admissions and copies of the work stoppage materials were more than adequate, according to the court, to sustain the conclusions of hearing officers that the prisoner was guilty of disciplinary offenses for attempting to organize a prison work shutdown. SECURITY SEARCHES

U.S. v. Allen, 190 F.3d 1208 (11th Cir. 1999). A federal inmate was convicted in federal district court of possessing a prohibited object and he appealed. The appeals court vacated the district court decision and remanded with instructions. The appeals court held that under the statute that makes it unlawful for a federal inmate to possess a "prohibited object" and which defines a "prohibited object" to include an object that is intended to be used as a weapon, the intent to use the object as a weapon is an element of the offense and not merely a sentencing factor. The inmate worked as a quality assurance inspector at an on-site UNICOR (federal prison industries) mattress factory. One morning he was observed to be acting suspiciously in his conversation with another inmate and he was searched. The search produced three nine-inch tufter needles and a wooden dowel with a hole bored into one in and a rope wrapped around the other end. The needles appeared to have been broken off from one of the sewing machines. The needles fit into the wooden dowel and when assembled could be used as a shank or ice-pick tool or weapon with a lanyard. The inmate did not contest that he possessed these objects but told his supervisor that he had intended to give them to his supervisors privately rather than in view of other inmates. (U. S. The appeals court affirmed the conviction, holding that a willfulness finding could be based on the defendant's failure to seek available employment which would have earned him enough money to meet his child support obligations. The court held that CSRA did not violate the constitutional prohibition against slavery, because not all forced employment is constitutionally prohibited. The offender had been sentenced to six months imprisonment and ordered to pay $56,916 in past due support and restitution. (U.S. Dist. Court, Alaska)

Weller v. Grant County Sheriff, 75 F.Supp.2d 927 (N.D.Ind. 1999). A state prisoner filed a § 1983 action challenging his removal from a temporary work release program. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants, finding that the prisoner did not have a liberty interest in remaining in the work release program. The prisoner had been sentenced to the state corrections department but was allowed, at a sheriff's discretion, to serve his time in a work release program at a county jail. The court held that the inmate did not have a due process right to be heard prior to his removal from the program, to the extent that the removal did not have an impact on his length of incarceration. The prisoner had signed a contract agreeing to abide by all rules when he entered the program. He was terminated from the program after his third violation of the rules. (Grant County Jail, Indiana)

Alexander v. Schenk, 118 F.Supp.2d 298 (N.D.N.Y. 2000). An inmate brought a § 1983 action alleging that his First and Thirteenth Amendment rights were violated because he was compelled to participate in an alcohol and substance abuse program that had religious components. The district court found that the inmate was coerced into participating, in violation of the Establishment Clause. The court noted that the inmate objected to attending program meetings during his initial interview, constantly complained about his enrollment in the program, refused to sign the enrollment contract, raised issues of the program's religious aspects with prison officials, and was ordered to return to the group sessions despite officials' knowledge that he objected to them on religious grounds. The court denied qualified immunity for the officials. The court awarded nominal damages of $1. The court held that requiring the inmate to work without compensation while incarcerated did not violate the Thirteenth Amendment, which expressly did not prohibit involuntary servitude imposed as a legal punishment for a crime. Aupperlee v. Coughlin, 97 F.Supp.2d 336 (E.D.N.Y. 2000). An inmate brought a § 1983 action alleging violation of his due process rights based on prison officials' refusal to reinstate him into a temporary work release program. The district court held that the inmate stated a claim against three former officials in connection with his removal from the program and that the officials were not entitled to qualified immunity. The inmate alleged that the former officials failed to remedy the violation of the inmate's rights after learning of it, and were grossly negligent in supervising the staff who caused the violation. Curry v. Crist, 226 F.3d 974 (8th Cir. 2000). Heirs of an inmate who was murdered by fellow prisoners while the two were alone in an unsupervised area of a prison brought a civil rights action against the prison warden. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the warden and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the warden was not deliberately indifferent to the risks of allowing the inmate to work with the other prisoner in an unsupervised area of the prison. The court noted that the prisoner who made the fatal attack had been convicted of multiple murders and had made threats, 16 months earlier, to murder his fellow inmates. According to the court, there was no evidence that the murderer harbored any animosity toward the murdered inmate or that his selection of him as his victim was anything but fortuitous. The court noted that prison officials are not required to segregate indefinitely all inmates whose original crimes suggest that they might be capable of further violence. The inmate admitted that he killed the prisoner in their basement work area with a stolen plumber's pipe during a 30-minute period between guard patrols. The appeals court held that the prisoner could base a § 1983 claim on his loss of his prison job and the prisoner stated a claim for violation of his constitutional rights based on the loss of his job. The appeals court also held that the prisoner stated a viable claim for retaliation by alleging that officials acted to have him removed from his job after he filed a grievance against an officer. Miller v. Campbell, 108 F.Supp.2d 960 (W.D.Tenn. 2000). A prisoner brought a § 1983 action against prison officials, alleging due process violations arising out of disciplinary proceedings, her segregation and her loss of job or sentence credits. The district court dismissed the case. The court held that the inmate must pay the full $150 filing fee as required under the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA) but that she could take advantage of the in forma pauperis statute to make a down payment on the fee and pay the balance in installments. The district court found that a prisoner did not have liberty or property interest in a prison job or in wages, and that the prisoner's removal from her prison position and loss of wages did not violate the Due Process Clause. The court noted that the Constitution does not create a property interest or liberty interest in a prison work assignment and that any such interest must be created by state law in language of an unmistakenly mandatory character. Nicholas v. Tucker, 89 F.Supp.2d 475 (S.D.N.Y. 2000). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against a state corrections department and officials alleging that he was improperly subjected to prison discipline. The district court held that a state rule that prohibited inmates from misusing, damaging or wasting state property was not unconstitutionally vague. The inmate had been disciplined for his use of a computer in a prison administration building to which he had access as part of his prison work assignment. The inmate had used the computer for personal legal work. A prisoner brought a civil rights action against prison officials alleging violation of his due process rights when he was removed from a temporary work release program. The district court restored the prisoner to the program and held that the prisoner was entitled to compensatory damages for the loss of income and benefits attributable to his unlawful removal from the work release program, as well as emotional distress that he may have suffered. The court held that the officials' actions were not objectively reasonable and that they were not entitled to qualified immunity, noting that the officials failed to comply with their own regulations and failed to provide the prisoner any due process at all. According to the court, the prisoner established that he would not have been removed from the program if he had been afforded the due process to which he was entitled. The court found that prior to removal of a New York prisoner from temporary work release a prisoner must be given the following: written notice of the alleged violation; statement of the actual reason for which removal is being considered; a report or summary of the evidence against him/her; an opportunity to be heard and to present evidence; advance notice of a temporary release committee hearing; the right to confront and cross examine adverse witnesses; a committee composed of neutral decision-makers; and a post-hearing written account of the actual reason for removal. Canell v. Multnomah County, 141 F.Supp.2d 1046 (D.Or. 2001). An inmate brought a § 1983 action alleging that his conditions of confinement in a county jail violated his constitutional rights. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants. The court did not find a constitutional violation that would survive PLRA requirements arising from the inmate's allegations that he was required to wash chairs for 45 minutes, even though the task caused pain in his hands and elevated his blood pressure and stress. The court noted that the inmate must show that he was required to work beyond his strength, that he risked his life or health, or that he suffered undue pain. (Multnomah County Jails, Oregon)

Flint ex rel. Flint v. KY Dept. of Corrections, 270 F.3d 340 (6th Cir. 2001). The estate of a prisoner who had been murdered in prison filed a § 1983 action against state corrections officials. The district court denied the defendants' motion for summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the murder of the prisoner was "sufficiently serious" to constitute a violation of the Eighth Amendment, that officials were deliberately indifferent to threats to the prisoner, and that officials acted unreasonably in taking no action to protect the prisoner. The prisoner worked in the prison print shop, which was managed by a former prisoner who had what was characterized as a "close relationship" with several inmates, allowing them to make telephone calls in violation of prison rules. The prisoner reported this situation and this angered other prisoners and the manager, resulting in threats against the prisoner's life. Prison officials were aware of these threats. The shop was left unsupervised one day by prison staff and another inmate took a hammer from the shop tool room and bludgeoned the prisoner to death. (Luckett Correctional Complex, Kentucky)

Keeling v. Schaefer, 181 F.Supp.2d 1206 (D.Kan. 2001). A prison inmate brought a § 1983 action against corrections officials and a private corporation that employs inmates within a corrections facility. The district court granted summary judgment to the defendants on some of the claims. The court held that an employee of the private corporation was not a "state actor" for the purpose of an action alleging Eighth Amendment violations. The court noted that the corporation was not performing a function--correction and rehabilitation of criminals--traditionally performed only by the state. Rather, the corporation was engaged in making a profit through its embroidery business, and the use of inmate labor and its location inside the facility were merely incidental to its business plan. The court held that corrections officials were not "persons" for the purposes of a § 1983 action to the extent that the prisoner was seeking monetary damages from the defendants in their official capacities. But the court found that fact issues existed, precluding summary judgment, as to whether the employee of the private corporation became a state actor by using prison disciplinary proceedings to obtain a "judgment" against the inmate. The court noted that as private persons, employees of a private corporation operating in a correctional facility were not entitled to a qualified immunity defense in a § 1983 action. The court also found that fact issues as to whether the inmate received procedural due process during a disciplinary hearing precluded summary judgment. The inmate was working for Impact Design, a private for-profit corporation operating within the confines of the Lansing Correctional Facility (Kansas). Impact employed inmates under the provisions of federal laws and regulations administered by the U. S. Department of Justice through the Prison Industry Enhancement Certification Program (PIECP). One of the PIECP requirements compels inmate workers to be paid the prevailing wage in the community for their labor. The inmate's job was to inventory spools of thread used in Impact's embroidery business and provide management with an accurate count of their stock. The inmate alleged that he was attacked by another inmate while he was working. The following day he was charged by prison officials with violating two prison regulations--fighting, and poor work performance. The inmate was subsequently found guilty of the fighting charge and was sentenced to 21 days in disciplinary segregation. The inmate was charged by prison officials with deliberately miscalculating a thread inventory that resulted in a loss of customer orders. The inmate argued that he was unable to complete the inventory because he was attacked by another inmate. An employee of Impact requested restitution for its losses and the prison disciplinary board ordered the inmate to pay $2,965 in restitution. The inmate's prison account was frozen as a result of the judgment. (Lansing Corr'l Facility, Kansas)

MEDICAL RESTRICTIONS

Lewis v. Lynn, 236 F.3d 766 (5th Cir. 2001). A state prison inmate brought a § 1983 action against current and former prison officials, alleging he had been forced to do field work for which he was medically unfit due to asthma, in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The district court entered summary judgment for the current prison officials and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the officials did not show deliberate indifference to the inmate's health, because the officials told the inmate to continue working only after consulting with prison hospital staff, who informed the officials that the inmate was capable of doing the work in question despite his condition. Mays v. Rhodes, 255 F.3d 644 (8th Cir. 2001). The mother of an inmate who died due to heat exhaustion brought a § 1983 action against prison officials, alleging violation of the inmate's Eighth Amendment rights. The inmate had started his first day of work on a "hoe squad." After a lunch break he returned to work and by mid-afternoon the temperature was only seventy-two degrees. The inmate collapsed while working and never regained consciousness after being transported from the prison infirmary to a local hospital. The district court denied summary judgment for the defendants and they appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded the case for dismissal. The appeals court held that the plaintiff failed to show that officials were deliberately indifferent to the inmate's limitations or knowingly compelled the inmate to perform physical labor that was beyond his strength or that was unduly painful. The court noted that there was no evidence showing that the inmate displayed any signs prior to his collapse that would have alerted officials to his medical needs. The court also found that the plaintiff failed to show that officials failed to treat the inmate after his collapse, where they responded by calling other officials who promptly transported the inmate to the prison infirmary. WORK RELEASE

Smith v. Cochran, 216 F.Supp.2d 1286 (N.D.Okla. 2001). A female former inmate filed a § 1983 suit alleging that a state drivers license examiner forced her to have sex with him while she was on work release at the examination center. The district court denied the examiner's motion for summary judgment. The court held that the examiner was acting under the color of state law while he was supervising the inmate and that he was not entitled to qualified immunity. The court found the examiner's alleged actions to be sufficiently outrageous to support the inmate's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court also held that the examiner's alleged sexual contacts with the prisoner while she was on work release demonstrated use of excessive force sufficiently prevalent to demonstrate a pattern that resulted in alleged injuries that were harmful enough to implicate the Eighth Amendment. The court noted that the work release contract gave the examiner control of the inmate and that the inmate was not free to leave while on work release, and could be subject to punishment if she disobeyed the examiner's commands. ADA- Americans with Disabilities Act

Arlt v. Missouri Department of Corrections, 229 F.Supp.2d 938 (D.Mo. 2002). An inmate brought an action under Title II of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) and the Rehabilitation Act, alleging that corrections officials failed to provide him with accommodations for taking a high school equivalency test. The district court held that the department of corrections was liable under the Rehabilitation Act to the disabled inmate who allegedly lost his premium-pay job due to the department's refusal to make accommodations. The court awarded damages in the form of back pay from the date he lost his premium-pay job to the date he was transferred to a different facility. The court noted that it was undisputed that the inmate, who was blind in one eye and has learning disabilities, was disabled within the meaning of the Rehabilitation Act, and that the accommodations requested (extra time to complete the test, as recommended by two psychologists) did not constitute an undue burden on the prison. Calhoun v. Hargrove, 312 F.3d 730 (5th Cir. 2002). A state prisoner filed a pro se civil rights action seeking compensatory and punitive damages and injunctive relief. The district court dismissed the action. The appeals court reversed in part and remanded. The appeals court held that the prisoner's claims of verbal harassment were not actionable under § 1983, nor were his claims that he was once forced to get on his knees and beg for his lunch. The court concluded that such verbal abuse or humiliation qualified as "physical injury" as required to support a claim. The appeals court found that allegations that a prison official, knowing of a maximum 4-hour limitation established by a physician, forced the prisoner to work long hours far in excess of his medically-ordered maximum, were sufficient to state claim and to recover for physical injury. The prisoner alleged that his prolonged work hours resulted in elevated blood pressure levels that were dangerously high. The prisoner was assigned to the prison's administration building as a support services inmate porter. His duties included mopping, sweeping and waxing floors, emptying trash, cleaning windows, dusting offices, cleaning restrooms, moving furniture and other janitorial duties. The prisoner claimed that a prison Captain called him names such as "crack smoker," "thief," and "whore," and made him work 10, 12 and even 14-hour days. (Texas)

Fenelon v. Riddle, 34 Fed.Appx. 265 (9th Cir. 2002). An inmate brought an action against prison officials, alleging that the First Amendment required the prison to permit him to attend a weekly Jumu'ah service for Muslims, and that the time spent in the service should count toward the reduction of his sentence under a state work incentive program. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the inmate and entered a permanent injunction. The appeals court reversed and remanded, finding that the district court had erred in interpreting Jumu'ah as a non-routine religious function, which made it eligible for a prison regulation that governed excused time off. Jones v. Norris, 310 F.3d 610 (8th Cir. 2002). A state inmate sued corrections officials alleging he was incorrectly medically classified and assigned to a job that was inappropriate for his medical needs. The district court dismissed the action and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the inmate had not exhausted his prison grievances with regard to his medical classification and work assignment. The court found that officials did not demonstrate deliberate indifference to the inmate's needs, where the inmate received 13 medical examinations in previous years, was evaluated to determine his need for reclassification, and received recommended non-prescription medication to treat his back pain. The prisoner claimed his back, neck, right hand injuries and hemorrhoids caused him pain at work, and had asked for reassignment from field duty. (Cummins Unit, Arkansas Department of Corrections)

Kitchen v. Upshaw, 286 F.3d 179 (4th Cir. 2002). A former jail inmate brought a § 1983 action against a regional jail authority and jail officials, alleging violation of his due process rights when he was not allowed to participate in a work release program. The district court granted summary judgment to the defendants and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the authority was not an arm of the state and was therefore not protected by Eleventh Amendment immunity. But the court held that the inmate did not have a liberty interest under state law in participating in a work release program that was protected by the due process clause. Lomholt v. Holder, 287 F.3d 683 (8th Cir. 2002). A prisoner appealed the district court's dismissal of his § 1983 action against prison officials. The appeals court affirmed in part and reversed in part. The appeals court held that allegations that the prisoner had been placed "in the hole" for religious fasting were sufficient to state a free exercise of religion claim under § 1983. The court found that the sore feet from which the prisoner suffered did not amount to a serious medical need. The court also held that the prisoner had no right to a particular prison job. The court upheld the dismissal of the prisoner's complaint concerning the handling of his grievances because the prisoner only alleged that officials had denied his grievances, not prohibited him from filing any grievances. The court also held that regulation of the prisoner's access to his attorney did not violate the First Amendment or § 1983 because the prisoner did not show how being denied access to his attorney had impeded his access to the courts. Love v. McKune, 33 Fed.Appx. 369 (10th Cir. 2002). Four prison inmates brought a civil rights action challenging their forced participation in a prison incentive level system that tied inmate privileges to participation in programs and good behavior. The district court dismissed the action and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that forced participation did not violate the inmates' Fourteenth Amendment due process rights. The Internal Management Policy and Procedure (IMPP) system assigned inmates to one of four levels. Each level had a corresponding level of privileges, such as television ownership, handicrafts, participation in organizations, use of outside funds, canteen expenditures, incentive pay, and visitation. The system had been previously upheld by the state supreme court, which found that none of the restrictions denied to inmates on lower levels infringed on inmates' property or liberty interests and therefore did not implicate due process protection. McGoue v. Janecka, 211 F.Supp.2d 627 (E.D.Pa. 2002). A prison inmate brought a § 1983 action claiming that authorities violated his due process rights by removing him from a work release program without notice or hearing. The district court dismissed the case, finding that the inmate did not have a protectable liberty interest sufficient to support a due process deprivation claim. The inmate had been participating in a court-ordered work release program when routine testing identified that he had used alcohol. The inmate argued that he was a barber and was required to handle alcohol-based materials throughout his work day. After a week of investigation the inmate was allowed to return to his position at the barber shop. Three days later a judge removed the inmate from the program and revoked his good time. Mitchell v. Massachusetts Dept. of Correction, 190 F.Supp.2d 204 (D.Mass. 2002). A prisoner brought an action against corrections defendants under Title II of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) and § 1983, alleging that he was denied the opportunity to participate in certain inmate programs during his incarceration, based upon the fact that he suffered from diabetes and a heart condition. The district court denied the plaintiff's motions for injunctive and declaratory relief but did not dismiss the action, finding that the complaint was sufficient to state a claim under Title II of the ADA. The prisoner alleged he was denied participation in various prison work and educational programs due to his "medical condition," which the court found was sufficient to show that corrections officials "regarded" him as disabled. The district court held that the prisoner's claims under Title II and the Rehabilitation Act, seeking monetary damages for sentence-reduction credits that he alleged were improperly denied, would be allowed to proceed. The prisoner had been denied permission to participate in welding, barbering and culinary programs and classes. The prisoner alleged that had be successfully participated in the programs, he would have been granted "good time" credits that would have reduced his sentence by 2 and one-half days for every month he was confined. RIGHT TO WORK

Moore v. Chavez, 36 Fed.Appx. 169 (6th Cir. 2002). A state prisoner brought suits against a state corrections department and correctional officials, alleging that he was improperly denied indigent status after he dropped out of an educational course, and that the defendants denied him employment when he refused to take a qualifying exam. The district court entered judgments generally in favor of the defendants and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the denial of indigent status did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment, even though the prisoner alleged that as a result of losing his indigent status he could not receive a loan to purchase hygiene items. The court noted that the inmate did not allege that he suffered extreme discomfort or that he was completely denied the basic elements of hygiene. The appeals court held that the prisoner's claim that the defendants discriminated against him because he had to use a wheelchair and could not take tests under pressure, was barred by Eleventh Amendment immunity. RELIGION

Murphy v. Carroll, 202 F.Supp.2d 421 (D.Md. 2002). A Jewish inmate brought a pro se § 1983 action against prison officials asking for injunctive relief and damages. The prisoner alleged that the officials violated his First Amendment right to the free exercise of religion by refusing to accommodate his request for an alternative cell cleanup day, other than Saturday. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the officials, finding that while the policy violated the inmate's First Amendment right, this right was not clearly established at the time of the violation and the officials were entitled to qualified immunity. The court found no rational relationship between the Saturday-only cell cleaning policy that outweighed the inmate's right to honor the Jewish Sabbath by not working. The court was critical of the officials', finding them entitled to qualified immunity "despite the patent unreasonableness of the defendants' refusal to provide him with cleaning equipment on a day other than his Sabbath." INJURY

Smith v. Board of County Com'rs. of County of Lyon, 216 F.Supp.2d 1209 (D.Kan. 2002). A prisoner brought state tort and federal Eighth Amendment claims against county officials arising out of a serious spinal chord injury he allegedly suffered in a fall, and for which he did not receive requested medical attention. The defendants moved for summary judgment and the district court granted the motions in part, and denied in part. The court concluded that the inmate's complaint that officials failed to supervise jail staff to ensure compliance with procedures was "far too generic" to support an Eighth Amendment claim, and that he failed to show systemic and gross deficiencies in training jail personnel. The inmate was a trustee in the jail and alleged that he fell while working in the kitchen and sustained injuries. An officer noticed the inmate limping about a week after the alleged fall and immediately took the inmate to the jail medical room for evaluation. The inmate also alleged that the jail failed to follow certain national standards, but according to the court, failed to show that the jail had any duty to follow those national standards. The officials asserted that the minimum legal standards for the operation of county jails are established in state law, rather than by national standards. (Lyon County Jail, Kansas)

U.S. v. Lemons, 302 F.3d 769 (7th Cir. 2002). A pretrial detainee held in a federal jail sued the United States under the Federal Tort Claims Act, seeking compensation for injuries he sustained when he slipped and fell on a wet floor while working in the jail kitchen. The district court dismissed the action and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the Inmate Compensation Program applied to the detainee, even though previous definitions had excluded pretrial detainees. The court noted "We cannot think of any reason why Congress would have wanted two classes of prison workers distinguished." (Metropolitan Correct'l Center, Federal Bureau of Prisons, Chicago)

Wicks v. Shields, 181 F.Supp.2d 423 (E.D.Pa. 2002). A prisoner sued corrections officials challenging his termination as an employee of a legal clinic, restrictions on his private use of the clinic and restrictions on his mail privileges. The district court granted summary judgment to the defendants. The prisoner had asserted that the actions were taken in retaliation for his efforts to report alleged physical abuse of other prisoners. The court found that the actions were not retaliatory. According to the court, the prisoner was fired from his job in the legal clinic for misusing his position when he sent a large volume of mail to a public defenders association. Williams v. Manternach, 192 F.Supp.2d 980 (N.D.Iowa 2002). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against corrections officials alleging due process and equal protection violations arising out of prison disciplinary reports. The district court held that the inmate presented a retaliation and conspiracy claim that officials retaliated against him with disciplinary actions him for "jailhouse lawyering." The disciplinary actions resulted in disciplinary detention, loss of privileges and his

"level V status," and loss of his prison job. The court also found that the inmate asserted equal protection claims with his allegations that inmates serving life sentences received disparate treatment as to prison jobs and level advancements, and quotas imposed on "lifers." A prison inmate brought a civil rights suit against prison officials who revoked his full-time work release status and incarcerated him without a hearing, seeking damages for 15 months he spent in prison after the revocation. The district court dismissed the action and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, and vacated and remanded in part. The appeals court held that the inmate's right to a hearing prior to revocation of his temporary release was clearly established at the time of the revocation and prison officials were not protected by qualified immunity. Boyd v. Anderson, 265 F.Supp.2d 952 (N.D.Ind. 2003). Prisoners filed a complaint in state court, alleging that state corrections officials had violated their federally-protected rights while they were confined in a state prison. The case was removed to federal court, where some of the claims were dismissed. The court held that prisoners do not have a due process protected liberty interest or property interest in a particular prison job assignment. The court held that there was no Fourteenth Amendment equal protection claim stemming from the placement of some prisoners, but not all prisoners, back into their original housing and work assignments after their disciplinary charges were reduced. Burleson v. Glass, 268 F.Supp.2d 699 (W.D.Tex. 2003). A prisoner brought a civil rights action alleging that prison officials were deliberately indifferent to his health when they allowed him to weld with thoriated tungsten electrodes during the two years he worked as a welder at the prison's stainless steel plant. The district court held that a physician's opinion that exposure to thoriated tungsten welding rods causes lung and/or throat cancer was not reliable or relevant because it had never been tested nor submitted for peer review. The court concluded that a reasonable jury could only conclude that the prisoner's cancers were caused from cigarette smoking, given the prisoner's history of heavy smoking, and the abundance of scientific evidence linking smoking to lung and throat cancer. Childers v. Maloney, 247 F.Supp.2d 32 (D.Mass. 2003). A state prisoner sued prison officials alleging violation of his due process rights during a prison disciplinary hearing. The district court dismissed the action. The court held that the prisoner's liberty interests were not infringed upon by his loss of visitation for six weeks, placement in isolation, and transfer to another prison as discipline for violation of prison regulations. The court found that the prisoner did not have a liberty interest, under state law, in his position as "Minority Co-Camp Chairman." The court noted that the statute authorizing the corrections commissioner to establish work programs in prisons did not indicate any limitations on the commissioner's discretion to suspend or revoke the prisoner's position. A state prisoner brought an in forma pauperis § 1983 action against prison officials, seeking monetary and injunctive relief, alleging that his termination from his prison job, which reduced his ability to earn good time credit, violated his due process rights. The district court dismissed the action as frivolous and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the prisoner did not have a liberty interest in his prison job, or in his ability to earn good time credit, so that his termination from his job for misconduct did not violate due process, regardless of the reason for the termination or the alleged inadequacy of the prison's misconduct appeal process. The prisoner had been working in the prison kitchen and was charged with misconduct for an alleged battery. The misconduct charged caused him to be terminated from his job, and reduced his ability to earn good-time credits and cost him 28 days of good time credit. Following a hearing, the misconduct charge was dismissed for failure to comply with due process. (Oklahoma State Penitentiary)

The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the inmate failed to show that his constitutional rights had been violated, or that he was entitled to minimum wage for his work with the prison food contractor. Pate v. Peel, 256 F.Supp.2d 1326 (N.D.Fla. 2003). A state inmate brought an action against a prison nurse practitioner, alleging retaliation in violation of the First Amendment and deliberate indifference to his known serious medical conditions in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the nurse. The inmate had filed a grievance challenging denial of a medical pass for his bashful bladder syndrome (BBS). He had been cleared for arduous field force duty after having been assigned to a less demanding welding job, which the inmate alleged was an adverse action. The court held that the inmate failed to establish that his filing of a grievance was a substantial or motivating factor in the decision to transfer him to field force duty status. The court noted that denial of BBS pass was required by prison policy and had already been approved by the nurse practitioner's superiors at the time of the decision to clear the inmate of unrestricted duty. The district court denied the officers' motion to dismiss. The court held that the officers' alleged conduct supported the inmate's claim for retaliatory transfer, in response to filing a grievance against a corrections officer. The court found that the inmate had a statutory liberty interest in remaining in a work-release program, which could not be terminated without due process. Vance v. Barrett, 345 F.3d 1083 (9th Cir. 2003). Two state prisoners brought separate § 1983 actions, alleging that prison officials violated their constitutional rights by conditioning prison employment on the waiver of their property rights to money in their prison trust accounts, and retaliated against them for refusing to waive such rights. The district court dismissed the actions and prisoners appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. On remand, the suits were consolidated and the court granted summary judgment to the officials on the grounds of qualified immunity. The prisoners again appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The appeals court held that deductions taken from the prisoners' trust fund accounts for charges relating to costs incurred in creating and maintaining such accounts did not constitute a taking without just compensation, absent a showing that the charges were unreasonable or were unrelated to the administration of the accounts. The court held that confiscation of accrued interest from the trust accounts violated the prisoners' due process rights, because a state law provided that the prisoners were entitled to receive accrued interest and prison administrators provided no procedure by which prisoners could contest the deprivation. The court found that officials were entitled to qualified immunity in the prisoners' claim that their prison employment was conditioned upon their willingness to give up their procedural due process rights. But the court denied qualified immunity to the officials for the prisoners' claim that they unconstitutionally retaliated against the prisoners for their refusal to waive their procedural due process rights. Adkins v. Kaspar, 393 F.3d 559 (5th Cir. 2004). A Texas state prisoner who was a member of the Yahweh Evangelical Assembly (YEA) filed a pro se action against the chaplaincy department of a state corrections agency. The prisoner alleged violation of his federal constitutional rights and the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA) in connection with his not being permitted to observe particular days of rest and worship. The district court dismissed the case and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the agency's religious accommodation policy was rationally related to legitimate government objectives and that the inability of YEA inmates to assemble on every Sabbath and holy day did not "substantially burden" the practice of their religion in violation of RLUIPA. The court held that the YEA inmates had alternative means of exercising their religion, in the form of supplemental services, materials and other accommodations, and were not required to work on their Sabbath. The court noted that the inmates were allowed to attend live services when an accredited religious volunteer was able to attend. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the inmate and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the inmate's expert did not present any reliable evidence regarding the extent of the inmate's level of harmful exposure and was unable to link the inmate's type of cancer to the type of electrodes the inmate used while welding. The inmate alleged that thorium dioxide is a compound that is distributed in the air during the welding process and that the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services had determined that thorium dioxide is a carcinogen. A non-profit trade association representing manufacturers of office furniture sued the agency that managed federal inmate labor, alleging that the agency's expansion of production of office furniture violated its authorizing statute, the Administrative Procedures Act, and the Just Compensation Clause. The district court granted summary judgment for the agency and the association appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part and remanded in part, with instructions. The court held that the agency was not required to perform a Comprehensive Advanced Review Process or market share analysis before authorizing a new factory, and that the agency was not required to perform a market share analysis before increasing inmate employment levels. The court held that the agency did not violate a prohibition on the sale of goods to the public in competition with private enterprise. (Federal Prison Industries)

The district court dismissed the claims and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the policy was not an unconstitutional taking in light of the fact that no property interest existed. The court held that inmates had no common law property right in the interest that accrued on their wages that were deposited in bank accounts, and that inmates had only a limited property right in the principal under state law. Homeless persons sued a city board of police commissioners and a police captain, claiming harassment with the intent to remove them from a downtown area in violation of their constitutional rights. The district court entered a preliminary injunction on behalf of the plaintiffs. The court barred the continuation of the challenged police practices, which included a pattern of arrests without probable cause, throwing firecrackers into homeless groups, and inflicting community service work without the adjudication of any crime. Searles v. Dechant, 393 F.3d 1126 (10th Cir. 2004). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against prison officials, alleging they violated his religious freedom by requiring him to work in a prison kitchen where he could not avoid the ingestion of non-kosher odors and handling non-kosher food. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the officials and the inmate appealed. The appeals court dismissed in part and affirmed in part. The court held that the inmate made an insufficient showing that the infringement on his rights outweighed legitimate penological interests. The court found that budgetary concerns and the need for non-discriminatory and consistent prison staffing appeared to be legitimate penological interests, even though the inmate had presented sufficient evidence of the sincerity of his beliefs. The Jewish inmate had alleged that the kitchen area was unclean for a Jewish person, particularly since there was no mikveh (purifying bath involving rainwater stored in a ceremonial fashion) for purification. After refusing to work in the kitchen the inmate was disciplined for a work performance violation. He was again assigned to the kitchen. The prison's religious programs director obtained an opinion from a local rabbi that working in a non-Kosher kitchen did not violate the Jewish faith, and that the inmate could wear gloves if he was concerned about contamination. Walker v. Gomez, 370 F.3d 969 (9th Cir. 2004). A Black state prisoner brought a suit under § 1983 against state defendants, claiming he was denied equal protection because, during three prison lockdowns, he was not allowed to resume his job until after similarly-situated inmates of other races. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part and remanded. The court held that the prisoner was not required to prove discriminatory intent to establish that he was denied equal protection, where the defendants admitted that they used race as the only factor in preliminarily excluding Black inmates from critical-worker lists. The court found that the defendants were entitled to qualified immunity, but that qualified immunity did not preclude injunctive or declaratory relief. (Calipatria State Prison, California)

Hill v. Thalacker, 399 F.Supp.2d 925 (W.D.Wis. 2005). A Black federal prison inmate sued the foreman of a prison factory, claiming that the foreman discriminated against him because of his race by delaying his promotion to the highest pay grade. The district court entered summary judgment in favor of the foreman. The court held that the inmate's delayed promotion was due to the inmate's work shortcomings rather than racial discrimination, including his unwillingness to learn skills required for promotion. The court noted that there was no showing that similarly-situated Caucasian inmates were given preferential treatment. The prison cable manufacturing factory has a 5 tier pay schedule for inmates, ranging from $0.23 per hour to $1.15 per hour. Inmates are also entitled to a variety of bonuses and benefits, including vacation or longevity pay. (Federal Correctional Institution, Oxford, Wisconsin)

Johnson v. Board of Police Com'rs, 370 F.Supp.2d 892 (E.D.Mo. 2005). Homeless persons brought a § 1983 action against a city police captain and a city, claiming that their Fourth, Thirteenth and Fourteenth Amendment rights were violated when they were periodically removed from a downtown area. After the district court entered a preliminary injunction barring the continuation of the alleged harassment, the defendants moved to dismiss. The district court denied the motions. The court held that the Fourth Amendment rights of the homeless persons who were allegedly wrongfully detained were further violated when jailers ordered them to perform manual labor or risk continued confinement, before they were charged with or found guilty of the commission of a crime. A prisoner brought a § 1983 action alleging that various prison officers violated his Fourth, Fifth, Eighth, and Fourteenth Amendment rights, and the New Jersey Conscientious Employee Protection Act (CEPA) by taking retaliatory actions against him for initiating the action. The district court held that an inmate performing intra-prison work was not an employee for the purposes of CEPA. The court noted that the inmate's work assignment did not provide him with annual leave, he did not accrue retirement benefits, neither the prison nor the state paid social security taxes on his behalf, his tasks were not an integral part of the business of the prison, his stipend was deposited into a trust account, he never received a paycheck, and termination of his assignment was controlled by the term of incarceration. Littlejohn v. Moody, 381 F.Supp.2d 507 (E.D.Va. 2005). A federal prisoner brought a pro se action against prison officials, seeking injunctive relief and monetary damages. The inmate alleged violation of his constitutional rights when he was shocked by an electrical surge because a buffing machine that he was using did not have a ground-prong in its plug. The district court granted the defendants' motion to dismiss. The court held that one official did not know of a substantial risk of harm at the time the prisoner was shocked because he had sent the buffer to be repaired when it had shocked prisoners in the past, and he reasonably assumed that the machine was safe when it returned. Although the court found that allegations supported a deliberate indifference claim against a prison safety manager and electrical shop foreman, the court granted them qualified immunity because the right to be protected from a significant risk of injury was not clearly established at the time of the incident. McElroy v. Lopac, 403 F.3d 855 (7th Cir. 2005). An inmate brought a civil rights action against prison officials, alleging that he was fired from his prison job in retaliation for exercising his First Amendment right to free speech. The district court dismissed the case for failure to state a claim, and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the inmate's inquiries about lay-in pay were a matter of purely individual economic importance and not of public concern, and were not protected by the First Amendment. A corrections officer had announced that the sewing shop in which the inmate worked would be closed in two weeks and the inmate had asked whether inmate workers would receive "lay-in pay" while they were waiting to be transferred to another work assignment. Munir v. Kearney, 377 F.Supp.2d 468 (D.Del. 2005). A state prison inmate brought a § 1983 in forma pauperis action against prison officials, alleging among other things that the imposition of discipline for his refusal to complete an essay as part of a substance abuse rehabilitation program violated his free exercise First Amendment rights. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants, finding that the inmate's First Amendment free exercise of religion rights were not violated. The inmate complained that completing the assignment would be a violation of his beliefs under Islam. The court held that the regulation was reasonably related to a legitimate penological interest in rehabilitation programs. The court noted that the inmate had numerous alternative means to exercise his religious freedom, and that it would be unduly burdensome to require the prison to provide an alternative essay question. The prison policy requires all inmates who are enrolled in a program to fully participate in the program. Any inmate who refuses to participate in the program in which he is enrolled is written up for "Refusal to Participate in Classified Treatment Program." Once written up, the inmate is referred to a disciplinary hearing officer and is no longer eligible for an institutional work assignment. The assignment required the inmate to think and write about alternative choices that he could have made prior to being incarcerated, and the impact these choices may have had on his life. The inmate claimed that completing the assignment would be a violation of his religious beliefs, alleging that answering it "knowing the sinful nature in the sight of Allah, is willful and blatant disobedience to Allah." RIGHT TO WORK

Torres Garcia v. Puerto Rico, 402 F.Supp.2d 373 (D.Puerto Rico 2005). A prisoner filed a civil rights suit claiming violations of his constitutional rights. The district court granted the defendants' motions to dismiss in part, and denied in part. The court held that the prisoner stated a due process claim against prison officials based on his transfer from a minimum security unit to a maximum security unit in violation of a prison rule that required a timely post-transfer hearing, but noted that the prisoner could only seek prospective injunctive relief. The court found that the prisoner's expectations of prison employment did not amount to a property or liberty interest entitled to due process protection, noting that earning wages while incarcerated was a privilege, not a right. The court held that the inmate failed to state an Eighth Amendment claim that prison officials failed to afford him adequate protection from an attack by other inmates, absent an allegation that he had sustained any injury at their hands. Williams v. Bitner, 359 F.Supp.2d 370 (M.D.Pa. 2005). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against employees and officials of a state corrections department, alleging violations of his right of free exercise of religion, protected by the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA), and the First Amendment. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants, in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the issuance of a misconduct report against the Muslim inmate who refused to assist in the preparation of pork while working in the prison kitchen, and his placement on cell restriction for 30 days, constituted a substantial burden on his exercise of sincere religious belief and whether the sanctions were the least restrictive means of furthering compelling government interests. The court noted that the right of Muslim inmates to avoid handling pork was clearly established at the time of the incidents. (Pennsylvania Department of Corrections)

DEDUCTIONS FROM PAY

Young v. Wall, 359 F.Supp.2d 84 (D.R.I. 2005). A state prison inmate sued the director of a state corrections department, claiming that the practice of not crediting accrued interest to his inmate accounts funded through deduction from his wages violated his constitutional rights. The district court dismissed the case in part, and denied the director's motion to dismiss in part. The court held that a state statute that provided for wage deductions and the release of funds to the inmate upon his release did not create a property interest protected by the Takings Clause. The court found that the inmate was not entitled to interest under the rule that interest generally follows principal. But the court held that the inmate stated a procedural due process claim with regard to denial of interest in the face of an Inmate Account Policy that seemingly requires the equitable distribution of interest. The court noted that due to the rehabilitative nature of work assignments imposed on prisoners, payment for their labor is purely discretionary for the state, although it is possible for a state to create a right to be paid for labor which could create a limited protected interest in wages it chooses to pay prisoners. According to the court, the statute that provides deduction of 25% of the wages earned by the prison inmate, to be turned over to the inmate upon his release, did not confer upon the inmate full rights of possession, control and disposition of funds sufficient to support a § 1983 action. REMOVAL FROM JOB

Bussey v. Phillips, 419 F.Supp.2d 569 (S.D.N.Y. 2006). An inmate brought a civil rights action against prison officials following his removal from his prison job. The officials moved for summary judgment. The court held that the inmate did not have a constitutionally protected liberty interest in his prison job assignment at a prison shop, and thus his removal from that assignment did not violate due process. According to the court, the inmate's removal from the shop was well within the terms of confinement ordinarily contemplated by his prison sentence. The court found that the inmate's allegations that prison officials allowed white and non-Muslim inmates, but not non-white, Muslim inmates, to return to the prison industry program after rule violations, were sufficient to state an equal protection claim against the officials. (Green Haven Correctional Facility, New York)

Daniels v. Crosby, 444 F.Supp.2d 1220 (N.D.Fla. 2006). An inmate brought a § 1983 suit against corrections officials, alleging that they violated his due process rights by unconstitutionally depriving him of wages, occupational training, and other benefits. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court held that the inmate had no liberty or property interest in wages for his work in prison, possession of particular items of personal property, or involvement in rehabilitative programs. The court noted that the Kentucky inmate, incarcerated in Florida for a Kentucky offense pursuant to an interstate corrections compact, had no liberty or property interest, and that while Kentucky officials may have owed a legal duty to the inmate to provide such benefits, Florida corrections officials did not. The inmate had argued that Kentucky pays prisoners for work they do in prison at the rate of $1 per day and that Florida owed him these back wages. He claimed entitlement to pay, to possess the same kind of personal property (typewriter, television, stereo receiver, ice chest, hot pot, bed linen) he was allowed to possess in Kentucky, and to enroll in a vocational trade as he was allowed to do in Kentucky. WORK CONDITIONS

Flanyak v. Hopta, 410 F.Supp.2d 394 (M.D.Penn. 2006). A state prison inmate filed a § 1983 Eighth Amendment action against the supervisor of the unit overseeing prison jobs and against the prison's health care administrator, alleging that he had been subjected to unsafe conditions while working as a welder. The inmate also alleged that the administrator had been deliberately indifferent to his medical needs arising from those conditions. The defendants moved for summary judgment and the district court granted the motion. The court held that the inmate's failure to exhaust the prison's three-step grievance procedure precluded his § 1983 action, regardless of the reasons given, including futility. The court noted that there is no futility exception to the Prison Litigation Reform Act's (PLRA) administrative exhaustion requirement. According to the court, the supervisor of the state prison unit overseeing prison jobs was not shown to have known of and disregarded a risk to the inmate who had chronic obstructive pulmonary disease, from dust and smoke accompanying his work as a welder, precluding recovery in the inmate's § 1983 Eighth Amendment action against the supervisor alleging unsafe working conditions. The inmate did not complain directly to the supervisor about his working conditions or file a grievance relating to those conditions and declined to wear a dust mask he was given. The court noted that the prison's accreditation required compliance with safe-working-area standards. The court held that the prison's health care administrator could not be liable in the inmate's § 1983 Eighth Amendment action alleging deliberate indifference to serious medical needs because the administrator was neither a prison doctor nor on the medical staff. The inmate was diagnosed and treated by others without ever seeing the administrator, and the inmate never filed any grievances that would have alerted the administrator to any alleged mistreatment. (State Corr'l Inst. at Mahanoy, Penn.)

INJURY

Gobert v. Caldwell, 463 F.3d 339 (5th Cir. 2006). A former inmate whose leg was injured while he was on work release brought a § 1983 action against a state prison physician, alleging constitutionally inadequate medical care. The physician moved for summary judgment. The district court denied qualified immunity, and the physician appealed. The appeals court reversed, finding that the physician was aware of a substantial risk of serious harm to the inmate from the nature of the wound itself, but the inmate failed to demonstrate that the physician disregarded the substantial health risk about which he knew, as required to establish deliberate indifference to a serious medical need. The inmate's leg was crushed while he was on work release when the garbage collection truck on which he worked as a "hopper" collided with another vehicle. The inmate's injury consisted of an open wound. According to medical records, the inmate was given extensive medical treatment for the injury throughout his imprisonment term, and the court held that, at most, there might have been negligence in the one-week lapse in antibiotic treatment. A state inmate brought a § 1983 action against a prison job supervisor, alleging that the supervisor lowered his pay and ultimately fired him for criticizing the supervisor's managerial practices. The supervisor moved for dismissal and the district court dismissed in part, and denied dismissal in part. The court held that the inmate stated a First Amendment retaliation claim, when the complaint alleged that the inmate engaged in the protected activities of writing letter to warden and complaining to others about supervisor's racism and changes in work schedule, and that the inmate experienced adverse actions in response. FLSA- Fair Labor Standards Act
FORCED LABOR

Loving v. Johnson, 455 F.3d 562 (5th Cir. 2006). A prisoner brought an action against a warden asserting he was entitled to the legal minimum wage under the provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act (FLSA) for work he performed as a drying machine operator in a prison laundry. The district court dismissed the action as frivolous and for failure to state a claim. The prisoner appealed and the appeals court affirmed. The court held that a prisoner doing prison work in or for the prison is not an employee under FLSA and is thus not entitled to the federal minimum wage.

According to the court, compelling an inmate to work without pay does not violate the Constitution and the failure of a state to specifically sentence an inmate to hard labor does not change this rule. The court reviewed the history of its rulings: "…In a similar situation, we held that a jail was not the FLSA employer of an inmate working in a work-release program for a private employer outside the jail…we have also held that inmates who work inside a prison for a private enterprise are not FLSA employees for the private company…however, until today we have not expressly stated whether there is any FLSA employment relationship between the prison and its inmates working in and for the prison." The court noted that other circuits uniformly hold that prisoners doing prison work are not the prison's employees under FLSA. (Texas Department of Criminal Justice, Institutional Division)

Morris v. Powell, 449 F.3d 682 (5th Cir. 2006). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against prison officials, alleging that they retaliated against him for exercising his First Amendment right to use the prison grievance system. Following denial of the defendants' first motion for summary judgment, the appeals court remanded for consideration of whether an inmate's retaliation claim must allege more than a de minimis adverse act. On remand, the district court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment. The inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, vacated in part, and remanded. The court held that: (1) when addressing an issue of apparent first impression for the court, prisoners bringing § 1983 retaliation claims against prison officials must allege more than an inconsequential or de minimis retaliatory act to establish a constitutional violation; (2) the officials' alleged actions in moving the inmate to a less desirable job within the prison did not rise to the level of an actionable retaliation; (3) the inmate's claim that he was transferred to an inferior and more dangerous prison satisfied the de minimis threshold; and (4) the defendants were entitled to qualified immunity on the inmate's job transfer claim. The court noted that although the inmate's official job classification was switched from the commissary to the kitchen for about six weeks, he was actually made to work in the kitchen for only a week at most, and he spent just one day in the "pot room," which was evidently an unpleasant work station, after which he was moved to the butcher shop, about which he raised no complaints. Tanner v. Federal Bureau of Prisons, 433 F.Supp.2d 117 (D.D.C. 2006). An inmate brought an action against the federal Bureau of Prisons, alleging that his pending transfer to another facility would deprive him of participation in vocational training programs. The inmate moved for a preliminary injunction. The district court denied the motion. The court held that the inmate failed to demonstrate the likelihood of success on his due process claim, as required to obtain a preliminary injunction preventing his transfer, where removal from programs did not constitute an atypical or significant deprivation of the inmate's rights, nor did it affect the duration of his sentence, as may have impaired his protected liberty interests. But the court found that the inmate demonstrated that he would suffer an irreparable injury if injunctive relief were not granted, as required to obtain a preliminary injunction, because the transfer was certain to result in the loss of access to an aquaculture program in which he was employed, loss of pay grade and loss of eligibility for a cable technician program. Williams v. Bitner, 455 F.3d 186 (3rd Cir. 2006). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against prison officials. The district court denied the officials' motion for summary judgment on the inmate's First Amendment claim, and the officials appealed. The court of appeals affirmed. The court held that the First Amendment right of Muslin inmate to avoid handling pork was clearly established for purposes of qualified immunity. According to the court, the First Amendment right that was violated when prison officials punished the inmate for refusing to handle or assist in preparing pork while working in a prison kitchen was a clearly established right, and thus, officials were not entitled to qualified immunity on the inmate's § 1983 claim that officials violated his right to free exercise of religion. The court noted that although neither the Supreme Court nor court of appeals had directly addressed whether requiring Muslim inmates to handle pork violated their right to free exercise of religion, other courts that had considered this precise question had uniformly held that prison officials had to respect and accommodate, when practicable, Muslim inmates' religious beliefs regarding prohibitions on handling pork. Wilson v. Taylor, 466 F.Supp.2d 567 (D.Del. 2006). Thirty-one Black inmates filed a § 1983 action alleging that state prison officials routinely denied their right to procedural due process during disciplinary hearings and security classification determinations. The officials moved to dismiss the complaint and the inmates asked for summary judgment. The motions were granted in part and denied in part. The court held that Delaware has created no constitutionally protected liberty interest in an inmate's security classification, even when the change in classification is for disciplinary reasons. The court found that the black inmates did not have a liberty interest in prison jobs, a particular security classification, or assignments to particular buildings, and thus the state prison officials' decision in those matters did not violate the inmates' due process rights. The court noted that state prison policies and procedures did not give a reasonable expectation of employment, a particular security classification, or a particular building assignment. The court denied summary judgment for the defendants on the issue of whether state prison officials consistently treated black inmates differently from similarly situated white inmates in job assignments, disciplinary actions, and security classification, and racially segregated the inmates within the facility. According to the court, the issue involved fact questions that could not be resolved on a motion to dismiss the claim against officials for violating their equal protection rights. Allah v. Poole, 506 F.Supp.2d 174 (W.D.N.Y. 2007). A state inmate sued correctional officers under § 1983, alleging various violations of his constitutional rights. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that a commissary supervisor's directive to the inmate and other prisoners working at the commissary, that they speak to each other only in English, did not violate any constitutional right the inmate may have had to converse with fellow prisoners in Spanish. According to the court, the stated rationale for the directive, to ensure the supervisor's own safety, was indisputably legitimate and the restriction on the inmate's use of Spanish applied only while he was working in the commissary. (Five Points Correctional Facility, New York)

Ambrose v. Young, 474 F.3d 1070 (8th Cir. 2007). The personal representative for the estate of a state prisoner who was electrocuted while on a prison work detail brought a § 1983 action against state corrections officials. The district court denied the officials' motion for summary judgment and they appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part and reversed in part. The court held that: (1) the deliberate indifference standard applied; (2) the corrections officer in charge of the prisoner's work crew was deliberately indifferent to the serious risk of the prisoner's electrocution; (3) the corrections officer was not entitled to qualified immunity; (4) the supervisory official for the DOC was not deliberately indifferent; and (5) the warden was not deliberately indifferent to the lack of training of the corrections officer in charge of the work crew. The court noted that the prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment applies to the conditions of confinement, and that prison work assignments fall under the ambit of conditions of confinement. According to the court, the Eighth Amendment forbids knowingly compelling an inmate to perform labor that is beyond an inmate's strength, dangerous to his or her life or health, or unduly painful, and requires supervisors to supervise and train subordinates to prevent the deprivation of the inmate's constitutional rights. The prisoner was on an Emergency Response Team (ERT) when he was killed. ERTs are comprised of minimum-security inmates from South Dakota's four state penitentiaries. The ERTs are dispatched to natural disaster clean-up sites, where they assist in removing downed trees and other debris. The inmates are required to comply with correctional officers' orders and conduct themselves appropriately. The only training the inmate received was watching a chainsaw safety training video. The court found that the corrections officer had the opportunity to deliberate and think before the electrocution incident occurred. The prisoner was electrocuted by a downed power line and the officer knew that the dangling, live power line created a substantial risk of harm, and despite the risk, the officer told the prisoner and other inmates to stomp out a non-threatening fire within arms reach of the line. The court held that the corrections officer was not entitled to qualified immunity for his deliberately indifferent conduct, in ordering the prisoner and other inmates to stomp out a fire near a dangling live power line, where the law was clearly established at the time of the electrocution incident that knowingly compelling a prisoner to perform labor that was dangerous to his life or health violated the Eighth Amendment. Goldhaber v. Higgins, 576 F.Supp.2d 694 (W.D.Pa. 2007). An attorney brought an action against state officials, county officials and a prison board, alleging civil rights violations in connection with his incarceration. The district court granted the defendants' motion for dismissal in part and denied in part. The court held that the attorney adequately alleged that officials retaliated against him for filing a motion for house arrest or work release, as required to state a claim under the Petition Clause. According to the court, the attorney's application to the court made it clear that a prior judicial order had afforded him work release subject to the rules and regulations of the facility where he was housed, and that he was requesting release to house arrest to facilitate work release. The court found that the attorney asserted that he had been subjected to arbitrary and irrational terms of confinement, as required to state an equal protection claim. The court noted that the attorney's complaint alleged conduct on the part of the defendants indicating the presence of discrimination against the attorney for the specific purpose of preventing him from participating in a work release program. Henderson v. Ayers, 476 F.Supp.2d 1168 (C.D.Cal. 2007). An inmate brought a pro se and in forma pauperis suit under § 1983 against an acting warden, in his individual and official capacities, claiming that the warden had denied the inmate his right to attend Friday Islamic prayer services and seeking injunctive relief. The warden moved to dismiss. The district court denied the motion. The court held that the inmate satisfied the exhaustion requirement of the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA), even though he did not specifically name the warden in his grievance. The court noted that exhaustion under the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA) is not necessarily inadequate simply because an individual later sued was not named in the grievances, but rather, compliance with prison grievance procedures is all that is required by the PLRA to properly exhaust. The court held that the inmate stated a claim for violation of the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act of 2000 (RLUIPA) and stated a claim for violation of his First Amendment rights. The inmate alleged that he had been denied excused time-off work to attend Friday Islamic prayer services, as his religion required, and that he had been subjected to progressive discipline, including loss of privileges, for attempting to attend these prayer services. Jackson v. Russo, 495 F.Supp.2d 225 (D.Mass. 2007). A prisoner brought a suit against prison officials claiming that compensation and good time credits awarded to him for participation in a barber program violated his due process and equal protection rights. The prisoner moved for summary judgment, and the defendants moved to dismiss for failure to state a claim. The district court granted the motions in part and denied in part as moot. The court held that the prisoner had no constitutionally created right to conduct business while incarcerated or to receive payment by the prison for services he provided to other inmates as part of a barber vocational program. According to the court, Massachusetts statutes that authorize the corrections commissioner to provide for education, training and employment programs and to establish a system of inmate compensation did not create a protected property interest for inmates in any job or in compensation for a job, for the purposes of a due process claim. The court noted that authorization was dependent on several contingencies, including appropriation of funds, and conferred complete discretion upon the commissioner over programs. The court held that the corrections commissioner's refusal to award additional good time credits to the inmate who enrolled in the barber school, beyond awards granted in 2.5 day increments for participation in various programs, did not create an atypical prison hardship, so as to give rise to an interest protected by due process. The court noted that the prisoner was not unfairly denied the opportunity to participate in other prison activities that might have earned him more credits. According to the court, the prisoner had no constitutional, statutory, or regulatory right to good time credits. The court found that a rational basis existed for differences in levels of compensation received by state prison barbers and kitchen workers in prison vocational programs, based on difficulties in recruiting prisoners, hours, and the demanding nature of the culinary arts program, such that the lesser compensation received by the prisoner enrolled in the barber training program and providing services to other inmates did not violate equal protection. (Souza Baranowski Correctional Center, Massachusetts)

Lewis v. Jacks, 486 F.3d 1025 (8th Cir. 2007). A state prisoner brought an action under § 1983 alleging discrimination and retaliation in his prison employment. The district court entered summary judgment for the defendants and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that: (1) telling admittedly noisy inmates to "shut up" on one occasion did not violate the equal protection clause, even if equally noisy inmates of another race were not equally chastised; (2) the prisoner failed to present affirmative evidence that the garment factory supervisor's work assignments were motivated by race discrimination; (3) the supervisor's work assignments would not have chilled an inmate of ordinary firmness from filing grievances, as was required for a § 1983 retaliation claim; and (4) the prisoner's protected activity of filing a grievance was not causally connected to the alleged retaliation of an increased work load. The court held that the prisoner failed to present affirmative evidence that the garment factory supervisor's work assignments were motivated by race discrimination, in violation of his Fourteenth Amendment right to equal protection. The prisoner, who admitted that he was given no personal production quota, did not refute evidence that each inmate was allowed to work at his own pace, that he was a particularly fast worker, and that he complained to every supervisor that he worked too hard but could have chosen to do less work. The factory manager, responding to the prisoner's complaint that the supervisor was assigning too much work, told the prisoner to "just do what you can." An altercation that occurred when another inmate put more work on the prisoner's bench, which resulted in the prisoner receiving a disciplinary write-up and filing three more grievances, occurred more than two years after the prisoner filed a grievance against the supervisor. The prisoner alleged that the supervisor told him and two other black inmates to "shut up and stop laughing" about ten minutes before break time. DEDUCTIONS FROM WAGES

U.S. v. Young, 533 F.Supp.2d 1086 (D.Nev. 2007). A federal prisoner who had been ordered to pay restitution in the amount of $457,740 and a penalty assessment in the amount of $3,300 moved to set aside the schedule of payments. The district court denied the motion. The court held that the defendant's participation in the federal Bureau of Prison's (BOP) Inmate Financial Responsibility Program (IFRP), which allowed the BOP to withhold $50 per month from the defendant's account, was not under duress, and that withholding 21 percent of the defendant's monthly income was not egregious or unreasonable. The court noted that the prisoner earns approximately $57 while imprisoned and that he typically receives a bonus of approximately $28 per month, bringing his total monthly earnings to approximately $85. The prisoner also receives approximately $150 per month from family members, making his total monthly income $235. (Nevada)

DEDUCTION FROM WAGES
PROPERTY INTEREST

Ward v. Stewart, 511 F.Supp.2d 981 (D.Ariz. 2007). A state inmate brought a pro se § 1983 action alleging violations of his Fifth and Fourteenth Amendment rights based on corrections officials' withholding of a portion of his wages for "gate-money." After dismissal of the inmate's claim was reversed by an appeals court, a partial summary judgment for the corrections officials was granted. A supplemental briefing was ordered as to inmate's request for injunctive relief. The district court denied the request for injunctive relief. The court found that the inmate had a constitutionally protected property interest in his wages, based on an Arizona statute creating a cognizable property interest in inmate wages for purposes of his action alleging that corrections officials violated his rights under the Takings Clause. The court concluded that corrections officials did not violate the inmate's rights under the Takings Clause by withholding a portion of his wages for "gate-money." The court found that even though the money was the inmate's private property, prison inmates forfeit all right to possess, control or dispose of private property. The court also held that state correction officials did not act arbitrarily in withholding a portion of the inmate's wages for "gate-money" even though he was serving a life sentence, and therefore he was not deprived of due process. The court noted that the withholding was intended to promote public welfare and the common good, and that it was not arbitrary since the inmate might be able to obtain release prior to the end of his life and if not, the money would be used to pay costs associated with his cremation or other expenses. DISCRIMINATION

Wilson v. Taylor, 515 F.Supp.2d 469 (D.Del. 2007). Black inmates brought a suit against prison officials asserting an equal protection claim that they were consistently treated differently from similarly situated white inmates in job assignments, disciplinary actions and security classifications. One inmate also asserted a retaliation claim against a deputy warden. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants and denied summary judgment for the plaintiffs. The court held that an inmate failed to establish an equal protection claim against a prison commissioner and warden, absent evidence of the involvement of the commissioner or warden in the alleged incidents of racial discrimination. The court found that an inmate did not establish an equal protection claim based on the allegation that he was not permitted to return to a particular prison building following an investigation while a similarly situated white inmate was permitted to return. According to the court, the exhaustion provision of the Prisoner Litigation Reform Act (PLRA) barred an inmate's claim that his transfer to another facility constituted retaliation for filing grievances and civil rights lawsuits. The inmate had written a letter to the warden's office contesting his transfer, but filed no grievances raising a retaliation claim or even his housing transfer generally. SUPERVISION

Buckley v. Barbour County, Ala., 624 F.Supp.2d 1335 (M.D.Ala. 2008). An inmate brought § 1983, Eighth Amendment and due process claims, as well as state law claims, against a county and a work-crew supervisor, alleging that his back was injured as the result of a failure to train him in equipment safety before he cleared trees as part of a prison work crew. The county and supervisor filed separate motions to dismiss. The district court granted the motions in part and denied in part. The court held that the inmate's allegations that the county failed to train him and another inmate in equipment operations safety, that they were ordered while part of a community work squad to use chainsaws to cut a large oak tree to clear it from a roadway, and that the tree rolled onto the inmate, breaking his back, were sufficient to plead a causal connection between the county's practice or custom of failing to train and the inmate's injury. The court noted that the inmate was not required to allege a specific practice or custom of failing to train inmates to avoid falling trees. The court held that the inmate's allegations were also sufficient to show the county's awareness of facts from which an inference of a substantial risk of harm could be drawn, as required to plead a deliberate indifference § 1983 Eighth Amendment claim. According to the court, the inmate's allegations that a prison work-crew supervisor was aware that the inmate was not trained in equipment safety and felt unqualified to use a chainsaw, yet still ordered the inmate to use a chainsaw to cut a fallen tree hanging over a ditch, were sufficient to plead a § 1983 Eighth Amendment claim against the supervisor. The court also denied qualified immunity from the inmate's allegations. According to the court, under Alabama law, the inmate's allegations that the work-crew supervisor ordered him and another inmate to cut a tree hanging over a ditch with chainsaws, with the knowledge they were not trained in equipment safety, and that the tree rolled onto the inmate breaking his back, were sufficient to plead willful negligence by the supervisor. Cason v. District of Columbia, 580 F.Supp.2d 76 (D.D.C. 2008). A prisoner brought a § 1983 action against a correctional services company, alleging violations of the Eighth Amendment related to an injury to the prisoner's eye, alleged misdiagnosis, and alleged inadequate treatment. The district court granted summary judgment for the company. The court found that the company was not responsible for dishwashing at the prison or for the prisoner's medical care, and thus the company was not liable under § 1983 for the prisoner's alleged eye injury while working in the kitchen as a dishwasher, alleged misdiagnosis by prison medical staff, or alleged inadequate treatment. Cossette v. Poulin, 573 F.Supp.2d 456 (D.N.H. 2008). An inmate at a correctional facility filed a First Amendment retaliation suit against a prison librarian, a major and a former warden, alleging he was removed from his job as a clerk in the prison law library in retribution for giving a written statement to another inmate in support of a planned lawsuit challenging an action taken by the prison librarian. The district court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment. The court held that the inmate did not engage in a constitutionally protected activity by providing a fellow inmate with a written statement. The court noted that the inmate's statement, that a fellow inmate "followed all print procedures" when the librarian allegedly overcharged him for a copy/printout request, dealt with a matter of purely individual economic importance, rather than a matter of "public concern." WORK RELEASE

Domka v. Portage County, Wis., 523 F.3d 776 (7th Cir. 2008). A former county jail inmate brought a § 1983 action against a county, alleging that revocation of his work-release and home-detention privileges, granted through a plea bargain in his prosecution for his third offense of driving under the influence (DUI), had constituted deprivation of due process. The district court granted summary judgment for the county, and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the plea agreement did not give rise to protected liberty interests in home detention and work-release, and that the inmate had knowingly and intelligently waived any due process rights he may have had in the home-detention program by signing an agreement as to the program's terms. The agreement unambiguously stated that the inmate could, and would, be removed from the program without notice if, among other reasons, he tested positive for alcohol use. According to the court, the waiver was knowing and intelligent, regardless of the prisoner's reliance on an allegedly false oral promise that any positive test would be verified by a personally administered retest, since the written agreement conditioned removal on a positive initial test only, not on the prisoner's actually consuming alcohol. The court noted that the inmate received what he bargained for, the opportunity to serve a portion of his time under home detention with work release. Gabriel v. Hamlin, 514 F.3d 734 (7th Cir. 2008). A state prisoner who was seriously burned while working in a prison kitchen filed a § 1983 action against prison officials alleging that they were recklessly indifferent to his serious medical needs. The district court dismissed the action for want of prosecution, and subsequently denied a motion for reconsideration. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded, finding that dismissal of the prisoner's claim was not warranted as a sanction. According to the court, the prisoner's failure to secure a trial deposition of his expert as a contingency did not justify the harsh sanction of dismissal for want of prosecution. Jacobs v. Wilkinson, 529 F.Supp.2d 804 (N.D.Ohio 2008). An inmate brought a § 1983 suit, claiming constitutional violations arising from prison officials' forcing him to shave his beard in contravention of his religious beliefs. The inmate also alleged denial of proper medical work restrictions. The district court dismissed the suit for failure to exhaust administrative remedies as required by the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA). The inmate moved to reopen, and to consolidate his complaint and the court's prior screening order. The court held that a Supreme Court decision holding that courts should not dismiss prisoner complaints under the PLRA in their entirety when the prisoner presents both exhausted and unexhausted claims did not apply retroactively to the inmate's case. Kogut v. Ashe, 592 F.Supp.2d 204 (D.Mass. 2008). A county jail inmate petitioned for a writ of habeas corpus, alleging he was prevented from participating in various jail work programs as a result of discrimination based on his disability. The district court granted petition. The court held that the allegation that the inmate was prevented from participating in a good-time work program that would have affected the duration of his confinement as a result of discrimination in violation of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) was sufficient to form the basis of habeas relief. The court noted that while an inmate may have no right under the Constitution to credit for good-time, he may not under Title II of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) be barred, based on discrimination arising from his disability, from work programs that may have the effect of reducing his sentence. He alleged that he suffers from disabilities which affect his ability to perform certain types of work assigned in the jail. The inmate alleged that he was "denied any and/or all access" to work assigned through the "County Correctional Facilities Work Programs" and provided 16 inmate work request forms in support of this claim. Ringgold v. Lamby, 565 F.Supp.2d 549 (D.Del. 2008). An inmate filed a § 1983 action against a correctional officer, alleging deliberate indifference amounting to cruel and unusual punishment based on the officer's alleged refusal to let him leave his cell early to serve food and the officer's alleged discussion of his hygiene and HIV status with another prisoner. The district court granted the officer's motion for summary judgment. The court held that the officer's alleged discussion of the prisoner's hygiene and HIV status with another prisoner was only verbal harassment and therefore could not be cruel and unusual punishment. The court noted that the inmate's right to privacy under the Fourteenth Amendment prohibited the officer from making any statements to another prisoner about the inmate's hygiene and HIV status, and the statements did not involve correctional goals or institutional security. The court found that the officer's refusal to allow the inmate to leave his cell to serve a meal as a prison food worker was a good faith error and not cruel and unusual punishment, where the officer thought that the inmate worked on a different crew. Sandage v. Board of Com'rs of Vanderburgh County, 548 F.3d 595 (7th Cir. 2008). The family of murder victims brought a civil rights action under § 1983 against county officials, alleging that a county sheriff's department's failure to act on the victims' complaint deprived the victims of their lives without due process of law, in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. The victims had complained that they were being harassed by a murderer who was a county jail inmate and they asked county officials to revoke the inmate's work-release privilege and re-imprison him. The inmate ultimately murdered the victims while he was on work release. The inmate had been serving a four-year sentence for robbery. The district court dismissed the complaint, and the plaintiffs appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the sheriff's department's failure to act on the victims' complaint did not deprive the victims of due process. The court noted that the county officials had no duty to protect the victims against private violence, and the officials' failure to revoke the inmate's work release did not create the danger that the inmate posed to the victims. Sanders v. Hayden, 544 F.3d 812 (7th Cir 2008). A prisoner who was civilly committed to a secure treatment facility as a sexually violent person, after serving a prison sentence, filed a § 1983 suit against state officials, claiming violation of his federal rights by a reduction of pay from $2.50 to $2.00 per hour for work performed at the treatment facility. The district court dismissed the complaint and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the complaint would be construed as asserting a claim under the Fair Labor Standards Act (FLSA), although the complaint did not refer to FLSA, since the prisoner sued without the aid of counsel. The court found that the prisoner was not covered by FLSA, precluding his claims challenging reduction of his pay. The court noted that the payment of sub-minimum wages to prisoners presents no threat of unfair competition to other employers, who must pay the minimum wage to their employees, because the facility does not operate in the marketplace and has no business competitors. St. Louis v. Morris, 573 F.Supp.2d 846 (D.Del. 2008). A state prison inmate brought a § 1983 action against various prison staff and officials, alleging that he was removed from his prison kitchen job in retaliation for exercising his First Amendment rights to report institutional violations. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants. The court held that the prisoner's unsubstantiated deposition testimony concerning informal, verbal complaints he made to prison officials reporting alleged institutional violations was insufficient to defeat summary judgment. The court noted that a prisoner does not have a constitutional right to employment while an inmate. (James T. Vaughn Correctional Center, Delaware)

A prisoner brought a § 1983 action against the Illinois Department of Corrections Director, a correctional center warden, and corrections officer. The district court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact, including the issue of whether the corrections officer was the prisoner's work supervisor. The prisoner alleged that the officer retaliated against him for exercising his First Amendment rights by firing him from his prison job. (Hill Correctional Center, Illinois)

Thompson v. Federal Prisons Industries, Inc., 546 F.Supp.2d 456 (S.D.Tex. 2008). A federal prisoner who sustained a wrist injury while working in a prison kitchen brought a pro se action in state court to enforce a settlement with prison officials for compensation for his injuries. The action was removed to federal court. The district court dismissed the action. The court held that the prisoner was not entitled to receive a lump sum payment of $857 for the settlement until he was released from federal custody. The court noted that the purpose of the Inmate Accident Compensation statutes is to provide accident compensation to former federal inmates or their dependents for physical impairment or death resultant from injuries sustained while performing work assignments in prison. Thompson v. Joslin, 536 F.Supp.2d 799 (S.D.Tex. 2008). A federal prisoner brought a state court action against a warden and kitchen supervisor, seeking compensation for wrist and back injuries. The inmate had been offered a payment of $857.00 for his wrist injury, and $71.42 a month for a back injury. The inmate alleged that the BOP had not yet paid him. The warden and supervisor removed the action to federal court and moved to dismiss. The district court held that the prison operator was the proper defendant and dismissed the action with regard to the warden and kitchen supervisor. The court held that the statute authorizing Federal Prison Industries, Inc. (FPI) to pay compensation to inmates injured in a prison industry or work activity provides the exclusive remedy for inmates injured while working in federal prisons. FPI was substituted as the proper defendant, and FPI was ordered to file an answer or a dispositive motion addressing the claim that the plaintiff not yet been paid. U.S. v. Miller, 547 F.3d 1207 (9th Cir. 2008). A federal supervisee who had been transferred to a county work-release program at the midpoint of his federal prison term, pursuant to a "prerelease custody" statute, moved to dismiss the government's petition to revoke his supervised release. The supervisee contended that his period of supervised release had expired prior to the revocation petition. The district court denied the supervisee's motion, and he appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that transfer to the work-release program did not mark the beginning of the supervised release period, given the continuing Bureau of Prisons (BOP) control. The court noted that the period of work-release was "imprisonment" within the meaning of the statute, and thus the period of supervised release commenced only upon the inmate's release from work-release. U.S. v. Peterson, 544 F.Supp.2d 1363 (M.D.Ga. 2008). A sheriff filed a motion to suppress his grand jury testimony and a motion to dismiss certain counts of an indictment charging him with extortion by a public official, obstruction of justice, perjury, and forced labor. The district court granted the motions in part and denied in part. The court held that the sheriff, who charged inmates for room and board, could not be guilty of extortion by a public official in violation of the Hobbs Act because he collected the funds and remitted them to the county commissioners. The court noted that a public official who obtains property on behalf of the government does not commit the offense of extortion, even if the government does not have a lawful or legal claim to the property. The court held that an indictment charging the sheriff with obtaining an inmate's labor by means of the abuse or threatened abuse of the law or the legal process was factually insufficient. The sheriff was charged with using an inmate's labor at a private business owned by his wife. (Clinch Co. Georgia)

ADA-Americans with Disabilities Act

Burke v. North Dakota Dept. of Correction and Rehabilitation, 620 F.Supp.2d 1035 (D.N.D. 2009). A state inmate filed a § 1983 action against prison officials alleging statutory and constitutional violations, including interference with his free exercise of religion, lack of adequate medical care, retaliation for exercising his constitutional rights, failure to protect, refusal to accommodate his disability, and cruel and unusual punishment. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants. The court held that: (1) failure to provide Hindu worship services on Thursdays did not violate the inmate's equal protection rights; (2) the decision to reduce Hindu worship services at the facility did not violate the Free Exercise Clause; (3) restriction of the Hindu inmate's use of camphor, kumkum, incense, and a butter lamp during worship services did not violate the Free Exercise Clause; and (4) failure to find a qualified Hindu representative to assist the inmate in the study of his religion did not violate the Free Exercise Clause. According to the court, the officials' requirement that the inmate work did not violate the Eighth Amendment, even though the inmate suffered from mental illness and hepatitis C, and the Social Security Administration had determined that he was disabled. The inmate had not requested accommodations in his working conditions on account of his disabilities, and there was no evidence that the inmate was being forced to work beyond his physical strength or that the jobs were endangering his life or health. The court noted that the prison policies and procedures manual established that all inmates were expected to work, regardless of their disability status.

The court found that the inmate's purported schizoid/sociopathic personality did not substantially limit any major life activity, and thus did not constitute a "disability" under ADA, where the inmate did not describe the nature and severity, duration, the anticipated duration, or the long-term impact of his mental impairment. The court held that the inmate failed to demonstrate that his mental impairment substantially limited his ability to care for himself. Similarly, the inmate's hepatitis C did not substantially limit any major life activity, and thus did not constitute a "disability" under ADA. (North Dakota State Penitentiary)

Cox v. Ashcroft, 603 F.Supp.2d 1261 (E.D.Cal. 2009). A prisoner brought a § 1983 action against the United States Attorney General, several federal prosecutors, and the owner and employees of a privately-owned federal facility in which the prisoner was incarcerated, alleging constitutional violations arising from his arrest, prosecution, and incarceration. The district court dismissed the action. The court held that the prisoner did not have any Fourth Amendment rights to privacy in his cell, and thus did not suffer any constitutional injury as a result of the search of his cell and the confiscation of another inmate's legal materials. The court found that the prisoner did not have any liberty or property interest in employment while in prison, and thus the prisoner did not suffer any violation of his due process right related to his termination from his prison job as a result of discipline arising from the search of his cell, precluding liability on the part of facility owner and its employees under § 1983. The court found that the prisoner lacked standing to bring a claim against the warden of a privately-owned federal prison facility, alleging that paying the prisoner at a rate below minimum wage violated the Fair Labor Standards Act (FLSA). The court noted that prisoners were not "employees" within the meaning of FLSA. (Taft Correctional Institution, Wackenhut Corrections Corporation, California)

Holland v. Taylor, 604 F.Supp.2d 692 (D.Del. 2009). A state prisoner brought a pro se § 1983 action against a Department of Correction (DOC) and DOC officials, alleging violations of his constitutional rights to equal protection and due process, deliberate indifference, cruel and unusual punishment, and false imprisonment. The prisoner moved to appoint counsel, and the defendants brought a renewed motion for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion for summary judgment and denied the motion to appoint counsel. The court found that neither Delaware law nor Delaware Department of Correction regulations create a liberty interest, the denial of which would constitute a due process violation, in a prisoner's classification within an institution. The court found that the state prisoner had no constitutionally protected right to work release, and thus, neither the alleged failure of a multi-disciplinary team (MDT) member to inform the inmate of a disciplinary review meeting regarding his alleged work release program violation, nor the prisoner's transfer following completion of the sentence imposed in connection with the disciplinary meeting, to another facility to await return to the work-release facility, violated the prisoner's due process rights, absent any atypical or significant hardship by being housed at the other facility as compared to a work-release facility. Johnson v. Rowley, 569 F.3d 40 (2nd Cir. 2009). A Muslim federal prisoner proceeding pro se filed suit against his supervisor at a prison factory, claiming that his termination from a prison job assignment was due to the supervisor's personal animus towards Muslims in violation of the Due Process Clause and the First Amendment. The district court dismissed the claims and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part. The court held that the federal prisoner had no protected property interest in his job assignment at a prison factory, precluding the prisoner's due process claim against a former supervisor for terminating his job assignment. The court noted that property interests protected by the Due Process Clause are not created by the Constitution, but rather are created and their dimensions are defined by existing rules or understandings that stem from an independent source such as state law, rules or understandings that secure certain benefits and that support claims of entitlement to those benefits. The court also noted that employees "at will" have no property interest protected by the Due Process Clause in their continued employment. The court found that the prisoner failed to exhaust administrative remedies, as required by the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA), where the prisoner failed to comply with the Bureau of Prisons' (BOP) procedural rules creating a four-step administrative grievance system for prisoner complaints, by not raising his First Amendment claim until the third step of grievance process. According to the court, the prisoner lacked good cause for failing to exhaust administrative remedies. (Federal Correctional Institution, Otisville, New York)

Kogut v. Ashe, 602 F.Supp.2d 251 (D.Mass. 2009). A state prisoner filed a petition for a writ of habeas corpus, alleging that he had been discriminatorily excluded from work programs in which he could have earned good-time credits, in violation of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA). The district court dismissed the petition, finding that the prisoner's alleged disabilities were not the reason for his exclusion from the work programs, as would violate the ADA. The prisoner was excluded from the work programs because he had been the subject of over 30 incident reports for harassment of staff, fights with other inmates, and other disciplinary infractions, and several of those incidents required the prisoner's segregation from general prison population. The court noted that disciplinary issues and concerns over prison security may be legitimate non-discriminatory grounds for limiting access to a jail program. (Worcester County Jail, Massachusetts)

Pilgrim v. Luther, 571 F.3d 201 (2nd Cir. 2009). A prisoner, appearing pro se, brought an action against three prison officials alleging they violated his constitutional rights to free speech and due process of law in the course of an investigation and disciplinary hearing related to a pamphlet allegedly written by the prisoner, which encouraged inmates to engage in work stoppages. The district court granted the prison officials' motion for summary judgment. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that entreaties to work stoppages, like petitions protesting prison conditions, are not entitled to First Amendment protection where other less disruptive means of airing grievances are available. According to the court, work stoppages are deliberate disruptions of the regular order of the prison environment and are a species of organized union activity, which are plainly inconsistent with the legitimate objectives of a prison organization. Roubideaux v. North Dakota Dept. of Corrections and Rehabilitation, 570 F.3d 966 (8th Cir. 2009). North Dakota prison inmates, representing a certified class of female inmates, brought a sex discrimination suit under § 1983 and Title IX, alleging that a state prison system provided them with unequal programs and facilities as compared to male inmates. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants and the inmates appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that North Dakota's gender-explicit statutes, allowing the Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation to place female inmates in county jails and allowing the Department to place female inmates in "grade one correctional facilities" for more than one year, was substantially related to the important governmental objective of providing adequate segregated housing for female inmates, and thus the statutes were facially valid under heightened equal protection review. According to the court, even if the decision to house them at the women's center was based on economic concerns, where the female prison population as a whole was much smaller than the male population, sufficient space to house the female prisoners was becoming an issue as the entire prison population increased. Female inmates were in need of a separate facility to better meet their needs, and statutes expressly required the Department to contract with county facilities that had adequate space and the ability to provide appropriate level of services and programs for female inmates. The court held that the female inmates, by expressing an assertion before the district court that they were not challenging the programming decisions made by Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation upon transfer to county jails for housing, abandoned an "as-applied" challenge to the gender-explicit statutes facilitating such transfers.

The court held that North Dakota's "prison industries" program offered at a women's correction and rehabilitation center, under contract between several counties and the state, was not an "educational program" subject to Title IX protections, even though the program provided on-the-job training. The court noted that the program was primarily an inmate work or employment program, providing female inmates with paying jobs and enabling them to make purchases, pay restitution, or support their families, and the contract between the counties and state distinctly separated inmate employment and educational programs.

According to the court, vocational training offered at the center was not discriminatorily inferior to those offered to male inmates at state facilities, as required for a claim under Title IX. Although locational differences existed, like male inmates, female inmates had access to a welding class and classes in basic parenting, social skills, speech, and healthy lifestyles. Skinner v. Holman, 672 F.Supp.2d 657 (D.Del. 2009). A prisoner brought a § 1983 action against prison employees, alleging he was retaliated against for having filed a prison grievance. The defendants moved to dismiss the claims as frivolous and the district court denied the motion. The court held that the inmate's allegations that he was denied transfer to a minimum security prison, was prevented from working, and was kept in disciplinary confinement for several months as a result of a grievance he had filed were sufficient to state a claim of retaliation for the exercise of his First Amendment rights by prison employees. (James T. Correctional Center, Delaware)

WORK CONDITIONS

Smith v. U.S., 561 F.3d 1090 (10th Cir. 2009). An inmate brought an action against prison employees, the U.S. Attorney General, and the director of the Federal Bureau of Prisons, alleging that he was exposed to asbestos while assigned to work at a prison. The district court granted the defendants' motion to dismiss, and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The court held that the Inmate Accident Compensation Act was the exclusive remedy against the government for a prisoner with alleged work-related injuries, and thus dismissal of the prisoner's claims under Federal Tort Claims Act (FTCA) was warranted. The court held that the federal workers' compensation scheme for participants in a prison work program lacked the requisite procedural safeguards of the inmate's constitutional rights to foreclose a Bivens action by the inmate. According to the court, the inmate's allegations that prison employees had known that asbestos was present in a closet in which the inmate was working when he was exposed to asbestos were sufficient to state an Eighth Amendment Bivens claim against those employees. Vuncannon v. U.S., 650 F.Supp.2d 577 (N.D.Miss. 2009). A parolee brought an action against a county and others, alleging claims under § 1983 arising out of injuries he sustained in an accident while operating a forklift as part of a work release project. The court held that summary judgment for the county on the hospital's claim was precluded by a genuine issues of material fact as to (1) whether the parolee was a county prisoner, indigent, and unable to pay; (2) whether the parolee was in need of hospitalization for the entire length of time; and (3) whether the hospital's charges were reasonable and customary. Walton v. U.S., 551 F.3d 1367 (Fed.Cir. 2009). A federal prisoner brought an action to recover from the United States for copyright infringement involving the government's use of calendars he created as part of his assigned duties in prison. The district court dismissed the complaint, and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the prisoner was in the "service of the United States" when he created calendars as part of his assigned duties in prison, and thus the Court of Federal Claims lacked jurisdiction over the prisoner's copyright infringement action against the United States. The court noted that the prisoner worked on the calendar on government-furnished computers while supervised by United States employees as part of his assigned duties at a government facility, and received compensation for his efforts. The prisoner developed and produced desk-blotter calendars for the years 2000 and 2001-2002. Federal Prison Industries made a substantial number of those calendars, which it distributed to General Services Administration warehouses throughout the country, and it also sold the calendars to private purchasers. Prisoners assigned to that work were given compensation ranging from $0.23 to $1.15 per hour and various other benefits. (United States Prison, Leavenworth, Kansas)

Castle v. Eurofresh, Inc., 734 F.Supp.2d 938 (D.Ariz. 2010). A state prisoner brought a pro se action against a state, department of corrections, its current and former directors, and a company to which his services were contracted while in prison, asserting claims under the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), the Rehabilitation Act, and the Arizona Civil Rights Act (ACRA). The court held that the state, the department of corrections, and its current and former directors had Eleventh Amendment immunity as to the prisoner's ADA disability discrimination claims relating to the tomato picking he performed for a private business through a prison program. The court found that the prisoner stated a claim under Title II of the ADA. Americans with Disabilities Act with allegations that: (1) the prison program under which prisoners picked tomatoes for a private business offered six times the wages paid for other prison jobs, as well as bonuses, and job skills not otherwise available; (2) that because of his disability, he was denied access to the program and the ability to obtain the benefits; and (3) that prison and state officials intentionally discriminated against him by denying and ignoring his requests for accommodations.

The court found that the private company that contracted with the state prison for prisoners to perform tomato picking on behalf of the company was not a "public entity" and, thus, it was not subject to Title II of the ADA. According to the court, the prisoner's allegations that state, prison, and state officials received direct federal financial assistance and therefore his claim stated a Rehabilitation Act claim against the state and these officials.

The court found that the prisoner's allegation that the private company that contracted with the state prison for prisoners to perform tomato picking on behalf of the company received an indirect financial benefit and competitive advantage from paying lower wages, was too vague and conclusory, as well as implausible, to satisfy the short and plain statement requirement for stating a claim that company violated the Rehabilitation Act. Christian v. Wagner, 623 F.3d 608 (8th Cir. 2010). A pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against jail officials and employees, alleging a due process violation arising out of his exposure to a cleaning solvent. After a jury found in favor of the defendants, the district court denied the detainee's motion for a new trial or judgment as a matter of law. The detainee appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the jury could reasonably find that the detainee failed to show that a physician or other medical personnel had diagnosed him with a serious medical need while incarcerated, as would support a finding that such need was objectively serious. The court noted that medical personnel who examined the detainee found no objective evidence supporting a diagnosis, and the record did not contain a medical order to jail employees. The court also held that evidence supported the finding that the detainee's need for medical attention was not so obvious that a layperson must have recognized it, as would support a finding that such need was objectively serious. According to the court, the detainee's testimony that he informed jail employees that he coughed up blood and experienced difficulty breathing was corroborated only by his mother, whereas several jail employees testified they did not observe the detainee suffering adverse reactions to cleaning solutions and had no recollection of his complaining of a medical problem. Jackson v. Raemisch, 726 F.Supp.2d 991 (W.D.Wis. 2010). A Muslim inmate brought an action against correctional officials, alleging civil rights violations due to a prohibition against workplace prayer. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the claim brought under the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA) stemming from the defendants' alleged refusal to allow the inmate to pray in a kitchen facility, was moot, since only injunctive or declaratory relief was available under the statute, and the inmate no longer worked in the kitchen and was unlikely to return to work there. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact, regarding whether a correctional official issued a conduct report to the Muslim inmate because of a grievance he filed concerning the prohibition against workplace prayer. The court also found that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact, regarding whether a correctional official directed her staff to take retaliatory action against the Muslim inmate because of a grievance he filed concerning the prohibition against workplace prayer. Jones v. Michigan, 698 F.Supp.2d 905 (E.D.Mich. 2010). A state inmate brought a § 1983 action against a state correctional facility's classification director and a correction officer. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The court held that the inmate's grievance against the classification director and correction officer gave fair notice of his claim that he was harassed and forced to perform work as a sports equipment handler, despite fact that he was wearing a neck brace and walking with a cane due to injuries arising from an automobile accident. But the court found that the correction officer was not deliberately indifferent to the inmate's injuries, in violation of the Eighth Amendment, where the officer was never told by the inmate that he could not perform work duties as a sports equipment handler. Similarly, the classification director was not deliberately indifferent to the inmate's injuries, in violation of the Eighth Amendment, where the director was never advised of an accommodation notice or of the physician's diagnoses that the inmate could not perform work duties. Lymon v. Aramark Corp., 728 F.Supp.2d 1222 (D.N.M. 2010). A former state prisoner brought an action against the New Mexico Department of Corrections (NMDOC), its secretary, prison officers, the private company that managed a prison kitchen, and two of the company's employees, alleging various constitutional claims and negligence under the New Mexico Tort Claims Act (NMTCA). The prisoner had sustained injuries from work he was required to perform in a kitchen, and he made allegations about the injuries and his subsequent treatment. The state defendants moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion. The court held that no New Mexico Department of Corrections (NMDOC) policy or regulation made any provision for the state prisoner's liberty interest in a labor assignment or otherwise provided the prisoner with protection from corrections officers ordering him to perform work in a prison kitchen or protection from orders in contravention of a medical order. The court ruled that the prisoner's § 1983 procedural due process claim arising from injuries he allegedly sustained while performing kitchen work was precluded. According to the court, corrections officers' alleged misclassification and denial of a grievance process did not rise to the degree of outrageousness, or the magnitude of potential or actual harm, that was truly conscience-shocking, precluding the state prisoner's § 1983 substantive due process claims.

The court noted that the state prisoner made no allegation that he contracted any disease while working in the prison kitchen, but only that he suffered a shoulder injury as the result of a heavy-lifting component of his work, thus precluding his § 1983 unconstitutional conditions claim against the New Mexico Department of Corrections (NMDOC) and its secretary. The court held that the prisoner did not personally suffer any injury as a result of a corrections officer's classification of prisoners for work duty, purportedly assigning inmates with known transmissible diseases to kitchen work, precluding the prisoner's claim for an alleged violation of federal public health policy. Nunez v. Duncan, 591 F.3d 1217 (9th Cir. 2010). A federal inmate brought a pro se Bivens action against prison officials, alleging he was subjected to a random strip search in violation of his First, Fourth, and Eighth Amendment rights. The district court entered summary judgment for the officials, and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the strip search of the inmate pursuant to a policy authorizing strip searches of inmates returning from outside work detail was reasonably related to a legitimate penological interest in controlling contraband within the prison, and thus did not violate the inmate's Fourth Amendment rights. Reynolds v. Barrett, 741 F.Supp.2d 416 (W.D.N.Y. 2010). Four African-American inmates brought an action under § 1983 and § 1985 against New York State Department of Correctional Services (DOCS) employees, alleging that they were subjected to discrimination on account of their race in connection with their inmate jobs in a print shop. The actions were consolidated for discovery purposes. The inmates moved to amend their complaints and to certify the class, and the employees moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The court held that: (1) the first inmate failed to establish that white workers were treated differently under similar circumstances; (2) there was no evidence that the second inmate's race was a motivating factor in his removal from the shop; (3) fact issues precluded summary judgment as to third and fourth inmates' discrimination and retaliation claims against a supervisor. The court held that genuine issues of material fact existed as to whether a prison print shop supervisor acted out of retaliatory motives in recommending that an African-American inmate, who filed a grievance over an inmate counseling notification issued by the supervisor, be removed from his job in shop, and as to whether the supervisor acted toward the inmate based on discriminatory animus, precluding summary judgment as to inmate's § 1983 retaliation and racial discrimination claims against supervisor.

The court noted that a poster hanging in a prison print shop supervisor's office on which there was a photograph of an ape staring directly into camera with the words “whoever regards work as pleasure can sure have a HELL of a good time in this institution” was not probative of discriminatory animus on the supervisor's part. According to the court, documents authored by a New York State Department of Correctional Services' (DOCS) diversity trainer regarding the prison print shop supervisor's allegedly discriminatory statements at a training session did not create a genuine issue of material fact sufficient to overcome summary judgment on the African-American inmate's racial discrimination claim under § 1983 arising from his bonus deductions, demotion, and eventual removal from his job in the shop. Serra v. Lappin, 600 F.3d 1191 (9th Cir. 2010). Current and former federal prisoners brought an action against various prison officials, alleging that the low wages they were paid for work performed in prison violated their rights under the Fifth Amendment and international law. The district court granted the defendants' motion to dismiss, and the prisoners appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that current and former federal prisoners did not have a legal entitlement to payment for work performed while incarcerated for federal crimes, and thus prison officials did not violate the prisoners' Fifth Amendment due process rights by allegedly paying them inadequate wages for work performed in prison, absent an allegation that wages paid were less than applicable regulations required. The court found that the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR) conferred no judicially enforceable rights, and thus did not provide current and former federal prisoners a legal claim or remedy against prison officials in their action alleging that low wages inmates were paid for work performed in prison violated their rights under international law. The court noted that ICCPR was ratified on the express understanding that it was not self-executing. Similarly, the court held that the United Nations' document entitled Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners conferred no judicially enforceable rights, and thus did not provide current and former federal prisoners a legal claim or remedy against prison officials in their action. The court noted that the document was not binding on the United States, did not purport to serve as a source of private rights, and even if it were a self-executing treaty, did not specify what wages would qualify as equitable remuneration of prisoners' work. According to the court, the current and former federal prisoners failed to establish that any statute conferred jurisdiction over their claim that customary international law entitled them to higher wages for work performed in prison, and thus the district court did not have jurisdiction over prisoners' "law of nations" claim. The court held that the current and former federal prisoners had no constitutional right to be paid for work performed while in prison, as would be required to state a claim against prison officials in their individual capacities for money damages based on alleged inadequacy of the prisoners' earnings. Ward v. Ryan, 623 F.3d 807 (9th Cir. 2010). A state inmate who was serving a 197-year sentence brought a § 1983 action against the director of the Arizona Department of Corrections, alleging the Department's withholding of a portion of his prison wages for "gate money," to be paid to him upon his release from incarceration, violated his Fifth and Fourteenth Amendment rights since it was unlikely he would be released from prison prior to his death. The appeals court reversed the dismissal of the claim. The district court subsequently denied the inmate injunctive relief and granted summary judgment in favor of the director. The inmate appealed. The appeals court held that the inmate did not have a current possessory property interest in wages withheld in a dedicated discharge account, as required to establish a violation of the Takings Clause. The court noted that Arizona statutes creating a protected property interest in prison inmate wages did not give inmates full and unfettered right to their property. Wright v. Genovese, 694 F.Supp.2d 137 (N.D.N.Y. 2010). A state prisoner, who underwent open-heart surgery, brought a § 1983 action against a private physician and three physicians who were employed by, or contractors for, the Department of Correctional Services (DOCS). The prisoner alleged that the physicians denied him constitutionally adequate medical care and equal protection of law. The district court granted the physicians' motions for summary judgment. The court held that, to the extent the physicians were being sued in their official capacities, they were immune from suit. The court found that the private physician was not deliberately indifferent to the prisoner's medical needs and that the primary treating physician and a consulting cardiologist did not act with deliberate indifference in how they addressed the prisoner's work restrictions following his surgery. According to the court, the primary treating physician was not deliberately indifferent to the prisoner's serious medical needs with respect to prescribing post-operative cardiac and pain medication. FLSA- Fair Labor Standards Act

Martin v. Benson, 827 F.Supp.2d 1022 (D.Minn.2011). A civilly committed sex offender and resident of the Minnesota Sex Offender Program (MSOP) facility brought a pro se action against the chief executive officer (CEO) of MSOP, alleging the CEO violated the minimum wage provision of the Fair Labor Standards Act (FLSA) by withholding 50% of his earnings as a work-related expense to be applied toward the cost of care. The CEO moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion. The court held that the economic reality of the civilly committed sex offender's work within the MSOP vocational work program was not the type of employment covered by FLSA. The court noted that the program was specifically designed to provide "meaningful work skills training, educational training, and development of proper work habits and extended treatment services for civilly committed sex offenders," and to the extent that the program engaged in commercial activity, it was incidental to the program's primary purpose of providing meaningful work for sex offenders. According to the court, the program had few of the indicia of traditional, free market employment, as the limits on the program prevented it from operating in a truly competitive manner, and the offender's basic needs were met almost entirely by the State. The court noted that the conclusion that the FLSA does not apply to a civilly committed sex offender should not be arrived at just because, as a committed individual, he is confined like those in prison or because his confinement is related to criminal activity, "…it is not simply an individual's status as a prisoner that determines the applicability of the FLSA, but the economic reality itself that determines the availability of the law's protections." Maxwell v. South Bend Work Release Center, 787 F.Supp.2d 819 (N.D.Ind. 2011.) An inmate who worked for a metal products production facility pursuant to a work release program brought an action against the employer alleging discrimination under the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) and the Rehabilitation Act. The employer moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The court held that the metal products production facility which employed prisoners in a work-release center was not a public entity within the meaning of Title II of the ADA, where the facility was a private for-profit corporation, and merely contracting with a public entity for the provision of some service did not make the facility an instrumentality of the state. The court noted that the production facility was not a program or activity receiving federal assistance, as required to support the prisoner's claim under the Rehabilitation Act, where the facility was a private employer, and even if the facility participated in a joint venture with the state's department of corrections, it did not actually receive federal financial assistance. Milligan v. Archuleta, 659 F.3d 1294 (10th Cir. 2011). A state inmate filed a § 1983 action alleging that prison officials took away his prison employment in retaliation for his grievance regarding his designation as a potential escape risk, and in violation of his equal protection rights. The district court dismissed the complaint on its own motion and the inmate appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The appeals court held that the district court erred in dismissing the equal protection claim, even though the complaint was deficient because it did not plead facts sufficient to show that the inmate's classification as an escape risk lacked a rational basis or a reasonable relation to a legitimate penological interest. According to the court, amendment of the complaint would not necessarily be futile, and the claim was not based on an indisputably meritless legal theory. The court noted that the fact that the state inmate did not have a constitutional right to employment did not foreclose his retaliation claim against the prison official arising from loss of his prison job after he filed a grievance. A federal prisoner, who was employed by the Department of Justice's Federal Prison Industries (UNICOR) program while in Federal Bureau of Prisons' (BOP) custody, brought a Bivens action against various federal officials, alleging that the defendants denied him promotions and back pay for his UNICOR job, and denied him good time credit for vocational training received through UNICOR and educational training he took at his own expense through a correspondence course. The defendants moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion. The court held that sovereign immunity barred the prisoner's claims against the officials in their official capacities and that the district court lacked personal jurisdiction over the officials in their individual capacities. The court found that the prisoner failed to exhaust administrative remedies under the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA), even though the prisoner had filed an administrative remedy request at the institutional level, where the prisoner had failed to file an administrative remedy request at the regional and central office levels, and the regional and central office levels had the authority to provide relief or to take action in response to the complaint. Murphy v. Lockhart, 826 F.Supp.2d 1016 (E.D.Mich.2011). An inmate at a maximum correctional facility in Michigan brought a § 1983 action against various Michigan Department of Corrections (MDOC) employees alleging that his placement in long-term and/or indefinite segregation was unconstitutional, that he was prohibited from communicating with his friends and family, and that his ability to practice his Christian religion was being hampered in violation of his First Amendment rights. The inmate also alleged that the MDOC's mail policy was unconstitutional. The defendants moved for summary judgment and for a protective order. The court held that the prisoner's statements in a published magazine article discussing an escape attempt were protected speech, and that a fact issue precluded summary judgment on the retaliation claims against the other facility's warden, resident unit manager, and assistant resident unit supervisor stemming from the prisoner's participation in that article. The Esquire Magazine article discussed security flaws at the correctional facility, detailing the prisoners' escape plan and revealing which prison staff he manipulated and how he obtained and built necessary tools to dig a tunnel. The court noted that the prisoner's statements were not directed to fellow inmates, and rather he spoke on issues relating to prison security and was critical of the conduct of Michigan Department of Corrections personnel, which resulted in his near-successful prison break.

The court found that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact, as to whether the defendants' proffered legitimate grounds for removing the prisoner from his coveted administrative segregation work assignment as a porter/painter/laundry worker--discovery that he possessed contraband--were a pretext to retaliate for his protected speech in the published magazine article. The court found that the alleged violation of the prisoner's right to free exercise of his religion from the rejection of a claimed religious publication, Codex Magica, was justified by the prison's legitimate penological interest in limiting prisoners' access to books that included instructions on how to write in code. According to the court, because the prison had a valid penological interest in restricting access to the publication, which contained instructions on how to write in code, the prisoner mail regulation used to censor that book could not be unconstitutional as applied on the ground that it prevented the prisoner's access to that publication. O'Neil v. Texas Dept. of Criminal Justice, 804 F.Supp.2d 532 (N.D.Tex. 2011.) The next friend to a deceased prisoner's minor daughter who died of an asthma attack while confined brought a § 1983 action against the Texas Department of Criminal Justice (TDCJ), a prison doctor, the company that provided health care services at the prison, and others, alleging violations of the Eighth Amendment, the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), and the Rehabilitation Act (RA). The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motions in part and denied in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether a picket officer, in failing to respond to the emergency call button of the prisoner who was suffering from an asthma attack and in refusing to respond to the cellmate's verbal calls to help the prisoner during an asthma attack, knew of a substantial risk of serious harm to the prisoner and failed to act with deliberate indifference to that harm. The court found that the officer was not entitled to qualified immunity. The court held that summary judgment on claims alleging violations of Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) and Rehabilitation Act (RA). Rehabilitation Act of 1973, was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the Texas Department of Criminal Justice (TDCJ), in failing to put the prisoner who suffered from asthma on job restriction from temperature or humidity extremes, failing to allow the prisoner access to his medication on the day he died as the result of an asthma attack, and failing to provide the prisoner with periodic physician follow-up appointments, failed to accommodate the prisoner's disability. The court held that summary judgment on alleged violations of Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) and Rehabilitation Act (RA) was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the company that provided health care services at the prison, in failing to respond to emergency calls for help for the prisoner who suffered from asthma and failing to provide the prisoner with prompt medical attention on the day he died as the result of an asthma attack, failed to accommodate the prisoner's disability. Roberts v. Klein, 770 F.Supp.2d 1102 (D.Nev. 2011). A Black state prisoner filed a civil rights action against prison administrators and employees alleging violation of his First Amendment right to free exercise of religion, his statutory rights under the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA), and the Equal Protection Clause. The defendants moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the prisoner stated a claim that prison officials and employees violated his religious rights under the First Amendment, RLUIPA, and the Equal Protection Clause on allegations that they implemented and enforced a policy that denied him kosher meals because his Jewish faith had not been verified by an outside entity, and the prison did not show that there was valid rational connection between the prison regulation and a legitimate government interest.

The court found that the prisoner stated a claim that a prison employee retaliated against him for exercising his First Amendment right to free exercise of religion, on allegations that he sincerely believed that he must attend religious services and his work assignment was terminated soon after he attended Jewish services, after which the employee stated that "You're no damn Jew," "You're right I'm firing you," and "Around here I'm your God." According to the court, the prisoner also stated a claim that a prison employee retaliated against him for exercising his First Amendment right to free exercise of religion and deprived him of Equal Protection under Fourteenth Amendment, on allegations that he was written up on disciplinary charges for attending Jewish services, as a protected activity, while white inmates of the Jewish faith were not written up on disciplinary charges for attending services, and that he was placed on disciplinary charges two days later because he attended the services. The court held that the prison employees were not entitled to qualified immunity. (Southern Desert Corr'l Center, Nevada)

A state prisoner brought an action against prison employees, alleging that the employees violated the Eighth Amendment by forcing him to work at hard labor in dangerous conditions, and violated the First Amendment by penalizing him for questioning the propriety of the work assignment and preparing to sue. The district court dismissed the complaint. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The court held that the prisoner stated a claim against prison employees for violating his Eighth Amendment right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment by forcing him to work at hard labor in dangerous conditions. The prisoner alleged that he was assigned to uproot tree stumps in cold weather, without being given any protective gear, that he developed blisters from handling heavy tools in the cold without gloves, and that he was subjected to the risk of getting hit by the blades of the tools because they slipped from their handles as prisoners hacked away without proper training. Allen v. Ford, 880 F.Supp.2d 407 (W.D.N.Y. 2012). A state inmate brought a § 1983 action against correction officers, alleging negligence in failing to provide adequate safety equipment while he was working in a cafeteria and in failing to provide treatment when he burned himself, as well as asserting deliberate indifference in instruction and supervision. The officers moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The court held that: (1) the negligence claims were precluded by sovereign immunity; (2) one officer did not know of and disregard the severity of the prisoner's injuries; and (3) the officer advising the prisoner to sign up for sick call for the following morning, rather than providing emergency sick call at that time, was not deliberately indifferent. The court noted that the prisoner reported the incident to the officer, who asked if he was badly burned, the prisoner responded that he did not know, the prisoner's skin did not blister until after he returned to his cell at the end of his shift, and the prisoner visited the medical department the next morning and was transferred to a county medical center. The district court dismissed the complaint for failure to state a claim and the inmate appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The court held that the inmate stated an equal protection claim against prison personnel by alleging that: (1) public-works officers supervising his work crew treated him differently than other inmates, ridiculed and belittled him, and "made a spectacle" of him when they brought him back to the correctional facility after a public-works assignment because of his sexual orientation; (2) the officers did not want to strip search him because he was homosexual and would make "under the breath" remarks when selected to do so; and there were similarly situated, non-homosexual, insulin-dependent diabetic inmates who participated in the public-works program and who were allowed to continue working in the program after an episode in which the inmate believed he was experiencing low blood sugar, which turned out to be a false alarm, while the inmate was removed from the program. Henderson v. Thomas, 913 F.Supp.2d 1267 (M.D.Ala. 2012). Seven HIV-positive inmates brought an action on behalf of themselves and class of all current and future HIV-positive inmates incarcerated in Alabama Department of Corrections (ADOC) facilities, alleging that ADOC's HIV segregation policy discriminated against them on the basis of their disability, in violation of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) and Rehabilitation Act. After a non-jury trial, the district court held that: (1) the class representatives had standing to sue; (2) the claims were not moot even though one inmate had been transferred, where it was reasonable to believe that the challenged practices would continue; (3) inmates housed in a special housing unit were "otherwise qualified," or reasonable accommodation would render them "otherwise qualified;" (4) the blanket policy of categorically segregating all HIV-positive inmates in a special housing unit violated ADA and the Rehabilitation Act; (5) housing HIV-positive inmates at other facilities would not impose an undue burden on the state; and (6) food-service policies that excluded HIV-positive inmates from kitchen jobs within prisons and prohibited HIV-positive inmates from holding food-service jobs in the work-release program irrationally excluded HIV-positive inmates from programs for which they were unquestionably qualified and therefore violated ADA and the Rehabilitation Act.

The court also found that female HIV-positive class representative had standing to challenge ADOC policies that HIV-positive women were segregated within the prison from general-population prisoners and that women were allowed work-release housing at one facility, but not at ADOC's other work-release facility for women. The court held that modification of the ADOC medical classification system to afford HIV-positive inmates individualized determinations, instead of treating HIV status as a dispositive criterion regardless of viral load, history of high-risk behavior, physical and mental health, and any other individual aspects of inmates, was a reasonable accommodation to ensure that HIV-positive inmates housed in the prison's special housing unit were "otherwise qualified," under the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) and the Rehabilitation Act, for integration into the general prison population. According to the court, requiring ADOC to dismantle its policy of segregating HIV-positive female inmates in a particular dormitory at a prison would neither impose undue financial and administrative burdens nor require fundamental alteration in the nature of ADOC's operations. The court suggested that it was almost certain that ADOC was wasting valuable resources by maintaining its segregation policy, in that a large space at a prison filled with empty beds was being used to house only a few women. McGarry v. Pallito, 687 F.3d 505 (2nd Cir. 2012). A pretrial detainee filed an action against state prison officials alleging that compelling him to work in a prison laundry under the threat of physical restraint and legal process violated the Thirteenth Amendment. The district court dismissed the action and the detainee appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The appeals court held that the detainee stated a civil rights claim under the Thirteenth Amendment, on allegations that his work in a prison laundry was compelled and maintained by the use and the threatened use of physical and legal coercion, where state prison officials threatened to send him to "the hole" if he refused to work and that he would thereby be subjected to 23 hour-per-day administrative confinement and shackles. The detainee also alleged that he had been threatened with disciplinary reports, which are alleged to be taken into consideration when making recommendations for a release date and, therefore, lengthen any period of incarceration. The court found that the prohibition against prison officials from rehabilitating pretrial detainees had been clearly established, and thus it was not objectively reasonable for the prison officials to compel and maintain the pretrial detainee's work in the prison laundry by the use and threatened use of physical and legal coercion. The court held that the officials were not entitled to qualified immunity at the pleading stage of the detainee's civil rights claim. According to the court, officers of reasonable competence should have known that compelling a pretrial detainee, as a person not "duly convicted," to work in the laundry for up to 14 hours per day for three days per week, doing other inmates' laundry, reasonably could not be construed as personally-related housekeeping chores. The court found that the work constituted hard labor solely to assist in defraying of institutional costs in violation of the Thirteenth Amendment. (Chittenden Regional Correction Facility, Vermont)

Reynolds v. Barrett, 685 F.3d 193 (2nd Cir. 2012). African–American inmates brought actions under § 1983 and § 1985 against New York State Department of Correctional Services (DOCS) employees, alleging that they were subjected to discrimination on account of their race in connection with their inmate jobs in a print shop. The actions were consolidated for discovery purposes. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants and the plaintiffs appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the disparate-impact theory of liability was not applicable to the African-American inmates' class claims against individual state officials under §§ 1981, 1983, 1985, and 1986, which relied on an equal protection racial discrimination violation as the underlying basis, since equal protection always required intentional discrimination, and disparate impact did not. At the time the suits here were filed, inmates employed in the prison print shop were paid an hourly wage, which ranged from sixteen cents to sixty-five cents per hour depending on the inmate's experience and expertise. In addition, inmates were eligible to receive an "incentive bonus" as a reward for good work. Civilian supervisors determined, in their discretion, whether a particular inmate merited promotion and higher pay. Similarly, these supervisors could recommend to the prison Program Committee—the entity tasked with assigning and removing inmates from various prison programs—that inmates be terminated from employment in the print shop. As a general matter, an inmate would be removed upon two requests. The plaintiffs alleged that print shop supervisors demoted minority inmates more often than white inmates, confined minority inmates to low-paying positions, and unfairly docked the pay of minority inmates. Castle v. Eurofresh, Inc., 731 F.3d 901 (9th Cir. 2013). A former state prisoner brought an action against the state, the state department of corrections (DOC), prison officials, and a private employer who contracted with the state to provide off-site work to prisoners pursuant to a DOC program, alleging violations of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) and the Rehabilitation Act. The district court dismissed claims against the private employer, and granted summary judgment in favor of the state defendants. The prisoner appealed. The court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The court held that the state prisoner who performed work for a private employer that contracted with the state department of corrections (DOC) to provide work opportunities to prisoners through DOC's off-site work program was not "employed" by that private employer, within the meaning of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), where the prisoner had a legal obligation to work under state law. According to the court, the Rehabilitation Act did not apply to the private employer, where the employer did not affirmatively choose to receive any federal funding, either directly or indirectly. But the court found that the DOC could not "contract away" its liability for the alleged violations of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) and the Rehabilitations Act by the private employer, and the district court should not have granted judgment for the DOC. Randle v. Alexander, 960 F.Supp.2d 457 (S.D.N.Y. 2013). An African-American state inmate with a history of serious mental illness brought an action against officials of the New York State Department of Corrections and Community Supervision (DOCCS), correctional officers, and mental health personnel, alleging under § 1983 that the defendants were deliberately indifferent to his serious medical needs and that he was retaliated against, in violation of his First Amendment rights, among other claims. The defendants moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the correctional officers' alleged actions in forcing the inmate to fight a fellow inmate, and threatening to beat the inmate with a baton and engage in a joint cover-up if the two inmates did not "finish" their fight within a specified area of the prison, which ultimately resulted in the fellow inmate sustaining fatal injuries in the fight, had no legitimate penological purpose, and was far afield of the species of force employed to restore or maintain discipline. The court held that the alleged actions reflected indifference to inmate safety, if not malice toward the inmate, as supported the inmate's § 1983 Eighth Amendment failure to protect claim. According to the court, the alleged forced fight between the inmate and a fellow inmate, orchestrated, condoned, and covered up by correctional officers was an objectively serious violation of the inmate's Eighth Amendment right to reasonably safe conditions of confinement, and the intent evinced by such activity was, at the very least, one of indifference to inmate safety, supporting the inmate's § 1983 Eighth Amendment conditions of confinement claim against the officers.

The court held that the African-American state inmate's allegations in his complaint that a correctional officer arranged inmates in his company so that white inmates were close to officers' posts, whereas black inmates were placed further away, that white inmates were given superior jobs, that the officer's efforts in forcing a fight between the inmate and a fellow inmate were done purposefully for his amusement because both inmates were black, and that the officer's treatment of the inmate and other black inmates was motivated by his intent to discriminate on the basis of race and malicious intent to injure inmates, stated a § 1983 equal protection claim against the officer. The court ruled that the correctional officers were not entitled to qualified immunity from the inmate's § 1983 Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment claims because inmates had a clearly established right to remain incarcerated in reasonably safe conditions, and it was objectively unreasonable to threaten inmates until they agreed to fight each other in front of prison officials. The court found that the inmate stated an Eighth Amendment inadequate medical care claim against mental health personnel. The inmate alleged that he had a history of serious mental illness, that his symptoms increased following a forced fight with a fellow inmate, that the inmate attempted suicide on three occasions, two of which required his hospitalization, that prison mental health personnel evidenced deliberate indifference to his medical needs, as they recklessly disregarded the risk the inmate faced as result of special housing unit (SHU) confinement, and that the inmate was confined to SHU despite a recommendation that he be placed in a less-restrictive location. REMOVAL FROM JOB

Spencer v. Jackson County, Mo., 738 F.3d 907 (8th Cir. 2013). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against county detention center employees, alleging violation of his First Amendment rights. The district court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment. The inmate appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by issues of material fast as to: (1) the inmate's First Amendment retaliation claim against a supervisor; (2) First Amendment retaliation claims arising from the inmate's transfer to another housing module; and (3) claims arising from the alleged obstruction of the inmate's access to a grievance process. The court found a dispute of material fact as to whether a program supervisor was motivated by the lawsuit the inmate had previously filed against her, when she removed the inmate from a trustee program almost immediately after he reminded her about his having filed the suit, resulting in his loss of access to income, work opportunities, and housing advantages as well as other privileges.

A fact issue was found as to whether the 53-year old inmate would have been transferred from a housing module for older inmates to a module that housed younger and more violent offenders, but for his use of the grievance process. The inmate had been approved for the detention center's Inmate Worker Program (IWP), also known as the "trustee program." Inmates in the trustee program received job assignments within the detention center and were paid for each shift, with an opportunity to earn more for additional work. They also received a number of privileges and incentives. They were housed in a trustee module and were eligible for late nights, weekend contact visitation rewards, and access to popcorn, soda, and a movie player. One of inmate's work assignments was in the kitchen, where inmates received extra food and may have one meal per work day in the break room area. (Jackson County Detention Center, Missouri)

A county and the medical corporation that treated a county inmate sought reimbursement of medical expenses from the provider of workers' compensation insurance under the Mississippi Workers' Compensation Act (MWCA). The inmate was in a county work program under the sheriff's supervision, for which services he earned $10 per day to be credited "toward any and all charges of F.T.A/cash bonds owed to the county." He was seriously injured in a forklift accident while helping law enforcement officials conduct a "drug bust" pursuant to that program. The inmate's treatment cost more than $640,000. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of provider. The county appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the inmate did not qualify for reimbursement of medical expenses under MWCA. The appeals court noted that the county inmate was not an employee working under contract of hire, and therefore, did not qualify for reimbursement of medical expenses from the provider of workers' compensation insurance under the Mississippi Workers' Compensation Act (MWCA) after he was injured in a county work program. According to the court, there was no express, written contract between the inmate and the county, the inmate did not sign a document transmitted by the sheriff to a county justice court stating that the inmate was placed on a work detail, the document was transmitted after he began working for the county, and inmates were required to work under Mississippi law. Washington v. Afify, 968 F.Supp.2d 532 (W.D.N.Y. 2013). A Muslim inmate, proceeding pro se, brought an action against the department of correctional services (DOCS) employees, alleging violations of the First, Eighth, and Fourteenth Amendments. The employees moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The district court held that: (1) ordering the inmate to clean up human waste did not violate the Eighth Amendment; (2) housing the inmate with a cellmate who allegedly exposed the inmate to pornographic images and prevented him from reciting his daily prayers with necessary humility and tranquility did not violate the inmate's First Amendment free exercise right; (3) the inmate's allegations that he was denied two religious breakfast meals and one evening meal during a Muslim holy month unless he signed up to work in the mess hall were insufficient to state a claim; (4) the Muslim inmate's allegations that he was singled out in being ordered to clean up feces, being transferred to a different cell, and transferred to new prison job were insufficient to state a claim for violations of Fourteenth Amendment equal protection. The court held that the inmate's allegations that he was charged with disobeying a direct order after he refused to clean feces, that he was found guilty by a biased hearing officer, and that the hearing officer called the inmate a “little monkey” and warned that there was “more retaliation on the way” were sufficient to state a § 1983 claim for violations of Fourteenth Amendment due process against the hearing officer. The court also found that the inmate's allegations that he filed a grievance against a prison employee, that the employee told the inmate he was “nuts” and that the inmate “was playing with the wrong one,” and that the employee issued a false misbehavior report against the inmate the next day, were sufficient to state a § 1983 retaliation claim in violation of the First Amendment. Castillo v. Bobelu, 1 F.Supp.3d 1190 (W.D.Okla. 2014). Five female inmates brought a § 1983 action against state officials and employees, alleging they were subjected to sexual abuse while working outside a community corrections center in which they were housed, in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The inmates were participating in the Prisoner Public Works Program (“PPWP”) that allowed offenders to work off-site at different state offices. They were working during the day doing grounds maintenance at the Oklahoma Governor's Mansion, where they were supervised by a groundskeeper and his immediate supervisor. When inmates work at places such as the Governor's Mansion, the DOC does not have a guard stay with the women at the work site. Instead, they are supervised by state workers employed at the work site, who function like guards. These individuals go through an eight hour training program. The inmate claimed that they were sexually harassed and sexually assaulted by the groundskeeper and by a cook employed at the Governor's Mansion. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to (1) whether prison guards were deliberately indifferent. The court held that: (1) the prison district supervisor did not have knowledge of a substantial risk of harm to the inmates because the supervisor did not know that the inmates were working only with males while off-site; (2) the supervisor was not deliberately indifferent; (3) the prison supervising case manager was not deliberately indifferent; and (4) there was no evidence that the employee had supervisory authority over the inmate. The court noted that the inmate did not return to the work assignment where she was allegedly abused by state employees or have contact with the alleged abusers, as required for the continuing violation doctrine to apply to her § 1983 action that alleged violations of the Eighth Amendment.

According to the court, despite the supervisor being aware of misconduct by a groundskeeper under his supervision, the supervisor was aware that the groundskeeper violated certain policies, but did not have knowledge of the sexual assaults, and he investigated the groundskeeper's conduct and counseled the groundskeeper. The court also found that the prison supervising case manager, who oversaw the off-site public works program, was not deliberately indifferent to the excessive risk of sexual assaults of female inmates working at the governor's mansion as part of the program, where the inmates did not complain to the manager and the manager was never informed of misconduct. Colwell v. Bannister, 763 F.3d 1060 (9th Cir. 2014). An inmate, who was blind in one eye due to a cataract, brought an action against Nevada Department of Corrections (NDOC) officials and supervisory medical personnel, alleging under § 1983 that the defendants were deliberately indifferent to his serious medical needs in denying his requests for cataract-removal surgery. The district court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment and the inmate appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded, finding that the inmate's monocular blindness was a serious medical need and the NDOC director was the proper defendant. The court noted that although monocular blindness is not life-threatening, it is the loss of the function of an organ, the inmate's eye had been blind for more than a decade, the inmate's condition affected his perception and rendered him unable to see if he turned to the left. Several doctors, including an ophthalmologist, found the cataract and resulting vision loss “important and worthy of treatment,” and the inmate's monocular blindness caused him a physical injury when he ran his hand through a sewing machine on two occasions while working in the prison mattress factory. According to the court, summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the inmate, who was blind in his right eye due to a cataract, was harmed by prison officials' denial of his requests for cataract-removal surgery, as to whether the officials were deliberately indifferent to the inmate's monocular blindness, and as to whether a particular physician was personally involved in the inmate's medical care. Rahman v. Schriro, 22 F.Supp.3d 305 (S.D.N.Y. 2014). A pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against a state prison commissioner, warden, deputy warden, deputy of security, and officers, alleging they violated the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause by forcing him to go through a radiation-emitting X-ray security screening machine in order to get to and from his daily work assignment. The defendants moved to dismiss for failure to state a claim. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the detainee sufficiently alleged a serious present injury or future risk of serious injury, as required to state a deliberate indifference claim against prison officials under the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause, by alleging that he was subjected to at least two full-body X-ray scans each day, that each scan exposed him to a level of radiation that was 10 to 50 times higher than that emitted by airport scanners, that radiation damages cells of the body and that even low doses of radiation increase an individual's risk of cancer, and that federal regulations prohibited prison officials from using even non-repetitive X-ray examinations for security purposes unless the device was operated by licensed practitioner and there was reasonable suspicion that the inmate had recently secreted contraband. According to the court, the detainee's allegations that a prison officer intentionally subjected him to a higher dose of radiation through a full-body X-ray screening machine while calling him a "fake Muslim, homosexual, faggot" were sufficient to allege that the force was not applied to maintain or restore discipline, as required to state an excessive force claim under Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause. The court held that the alleged force exerted by a prison officer on the detainee by setting the full-body X-ray screening machine to a higher radiation dose on one occasion was not excessive in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause. The court noted that the alleged force was de minimis, and the use of a higher setting of radiation, which was designed to produce a better image, in a situation where detainee expressed resistance to the scanning process and could have been conceivably hiding contraband was not the type of force repugnant to the conscience of mankind.

The court found that the prison commissioner was not entitled to qualified immunity where the right to be free from deliberate indifference to serious medical needs was clearly established, and given the known dangers of radiation, a reasonable person would have understood that exposing the detainee to a cumulative level of radiation that posed a risk of damage to his future health could violate the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. A multiracial Muslim inmate brought a civil rights action alleging that prison officials and employees discriminated against him on the basis of race and religion and retaliated against him for filing grievances. The officials moved to dismiss for failure to state a claim. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that New York State Department of Correctional Services (DOCS) employees were acting within scope of their employment, specifically, the duty of assigning work positions to inmates, when they denied the multiracial Muslim inmate employment outside of his cellblock. The court found that the inmate's allegations that no other inmate in the prison was "isolated by programming" or restricted to an employment position in his or her cellblock, that the inmate was isolated to programs in his cellblock, presumably because of his race and religion, and that prison employees tasked with assigning work refused to place the inmate on a waiting list for his desired program, when waiting lists were open to "all others," sufficiently stated that the inmate was treated differently than similarly-situated individuals, supporting the inmate's § 1983 claim that employees denied him equal protection by restricting him to employment opportunities in his cellblock. The action was transferred to federal court. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants and the estate appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that state prison officials did not shock the conscience or act with deliberate indifference by housing two prisoners with violent criminal pasts, one with a history of multiple escapes and one with a history of planning an escape, in a medium security environment, and giving them job assignments which allowed the prisoners to move within the prison, and thus, the officials did not violate the substantive due process rights of the prison guard who was murdered by prisoners during their attempted escape. Jehovah v. Clarke, 798 F.3d 169 (4th Cir. 2015). Following dismissal of some claims, the district court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment. The inmate appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by fact issues regarding the wine ban. The court also found that the inmate stated an RLUIPA claim based on cell assignment, a First Amendment claim based on cell assignment, and an Eighth Amendment deliberate indifference claim. The court noted that the inmate alleged that he was required to share a cell with a particular inmate who subjected him to "anti-Christian" rhetoric, and that he was "burdened, mocked, and harassed" on account of his religious views by being housed in a cell with that inmate.

The inmate alleged that his religion required him to abstain from working during the "Old Jewish" and "New Christic" Sabbaths, that his cleaning job would not accommodate his Sabbath observations, that his requests for job transfers were denied, that prison officials had not approved him for any job for which he applied in over three years. A Muslim former inmate brought civil rights claims against prison officials under § 1983 and the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA), seeking monetary and injunctive relief. The district court entered summary judgment in favor of the officials and the former inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, vacated, and remanded in part. The court held that the inmate's claims for injunctive relief, arising from an alleged requirement that he handle pork while working in a kitchen, were moot because he had been released from custody. The court found that unsworn statements of an inmate cook who told the Muslim inmate that the food service coordinator had directed the inmate cook to mix pork in with meat used in a tamale pie were hearsay, and thus could not properly be considered in opposition to the prison officials' motion for summary judgment as to the Muslim inmate's claim that his free exercise rights were violated when he was served and ate the pie without notice that it contained pork. But the court held that prison officials were not entitled to qualified immunity from the Muslim inmate's § 1983 claim that he was ordered in 2007 to cook pork loins as part of his job duties in a kitchen, in violation of his religious beliefs. The court noted that the penitentiary implemented a policy prior to the incident in question, providing that an inmate could opt out of handling pork on religious grounds, the inmate alleged that he told the officers in charge that he had the right to not handle pork, and the fact that some officers claimed they were not personally aware of the policy change was not sufficient to show that the inmate's right to avoid handling pork was not clearly established. Menocal v. GEO Group, Inc., 113 F.Supp.3d 1125 (D. Colo. 2015). Current and former detainees at a private, for-profit immigration detention facility brought an action against the facility's owner-operator, alleging that a work program violated the Colorado Minimum Wage Order (CMWO) because detainees were paid $1 per day instead of the state minimum wage, that forcing detainees to clean living areas under the threat of solitary confinement violated the Trafficking Victims Protection Act's (TVPA) prohibition on forced labor, and that the owner-operator was unjustly enriched through the work program. The detainees participate in a "Voluntary Work Program" at the facility where they perform tasks such as maintaining the on-site medical facility that is owned and operated by the same company, doing laundry, preparing meals, and cleaning various parts of the facility for compensation of $1 per day. They also alleged that each day, six randomly selected detainees (whether they participate in the Voluntary Work Program or not) are required to clean the facility's "pods" without compensation under the threat of solitary confinement. The owner-operator moved to dismiss. The court found that the detainees adequately alleged that the owner-operator obtained the detainees' labor by threats of physical restraint, as required to state a claim for violation of TVPA.

The court held that the detainees were not the facility owner-operator's "employees" who could bring claim alleging that a work program violated CMWO. The court noted that the detainees apparently fell within CMWO's broad definition of employee, but so did prisoners to whom the state labor department found CMWO's definition of employee should not apply, and detainees, like prisoners, did not use the wages to provide for themselves, and thus the purposes of CMWO were not served by including them in the definition of employee. Smith v. Dart, 803 F.3d 304 (7th Cir. 2015). A pretrial detainee brought action under § 1983 against a county alleging deliberate indifference to his health in violation of the right to the provision of adequate medical treatment under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, as well as failure to pay adequate wages under the Fair Labor Standards Act (FLSA) for his job in the jail's laundry room. The district court dismissed the case and the detainee appealed. The appeals court held that the detainee sufficiently alleged that the food he received was "well below nutritional value," as required to state a claim under § 1983 for deliberate indifference to his health in violation of the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The court ruled that pretrial detainees are not protected by the Fair Labor Standards Act (FLSA) because they are not employees of their jail. The court noted that the detainee had volunteered to participate in a veteran's program within the county jail that included a job in the jail's laundry room, and that this was not "involuntary servitude" or punishment that would violate the Thirteenth Amendment. According to the court, "[P]eople are not imprisoned for the purpose of enabling them to earn a living. The prison pays for their keep. If it puts them to work, it is to offset some of the cost of keeping them, or to keep them out of mischief, or to ease their transition to the world outside, or to equip them with skills and habits that will make them less likely to return to crime outside. None of these goals is compatible with federal regulation of their wages and hours. The reason the FLSA contains no express exception for prisoners is probably that the idea was too outlandish to occur to anyone when the legislation was under consideration by Congress."
