DETENTION AND CORRECTIONS CASELAW CATALOG

26th Edition
2015-2016

Volume Six: Sec. 39-50

Rod C. Miller
Donald J. Walter

Research and Review:
Joseph Heltzel
Chris Dickey
Richard Drennon
Kyle McCarty

CRS, Inc.
A Non-Profit Organization
925 Johnson Drive
Gettysburg, PA 17325
(717) 338-9100
Fax (717) 718-6178
www.correction.org
rod@correction.org

Table of Contents

DETENTION AND CORRECTIONS CASELAW CATALOG

CRS, Inc. 925 Johnson Drive, Gettysburg, PA 17325 (717) 338-9100
www.correction.org Fax (717) 718-6178 rod@correction.org

SECTION 39: SAFETY AND SECURITY

The following pages present summaries of court decisions which address this topic area. These summaries provide readers with highlights of each case, but are not intended to be a substitute for the review of the full case. The cases do not represent all court decisions which address this topic area, but rather offer a sampling of relevant holdings.

The decisions summarized below were current as of the date indicated on the title page of this edition of the Catalog. Prior to publication, the citation for each case was verified, and the case was researched in Shepard's Citations to determine if it had been altered upon appeal (reversed or modified). The Catalog is updated annually. An annual supplement provides replacement pages for cases in the prior edition which have changed, and adds new cases. Readers are encouraged to consult the Topic Index to identify related topics of interest. The text in the section entitled "How to Use The Catalog" at the beginning of the Catalog provides an overview which may also be helpful to some readers.

The case summaries which follow are organized by year, with the earliest case presented first. Within each year, cases are organized alphabetically by the name of the plaintiff. The left margin offers a quick reference, highlighting the type of court involved and identifying appropriate subtopics addressed by each case.

1964

U.S. District Court
JEWELRY

Banks v. Havener, 234 F.Supp. 27 (E.D. Vir. 1964). An inmate is allowed to wear a religious medal even though jewelry has been banned from prisoners in other cases for security reasons. (Youth Center, Lorton, Virginia)

1967

U.S. District Court
RELIGIOUS GROUPS

Lee v. Crouse, 284 F.Supp. 541 (D. Kan. 1967), aff'd, 396 F.2d 952 (10th Cir. 1968). The size of groups at religious services may be restricted. (Lansing, Kansas)

1968

U.S. District Court
RELIGIOUS SERVICES

Konigsberg v. Ciccone, 285 F.Supp. 585 (W.D. Mo. 1968), aff'd, 417 F.2d 161 (8th Cir. 1969), cert. denied, 397 U.S. 963 (1969). The right to attend religious services can be prohibited in such cases only when it can be shown that institutional security is threatened. (Medical Center For Federal Prisoners, Springfield, Missouri)

U.S. Appeals Court
SAFETY REGULATIONS
DISCRETION

Long v. Parker, 390 F.2d 816 (3rd Cir. 1968). Correctional personnel, not the courts, are responsible for promulgating regulations for the safety of the prison population and public as well as for the maintenance and proper functioning of the institution. Correctional officers must be granted wide discretion in the exercise of such authority. (United States Penitentiary, Lewisburg, Pennsylvania)

U.S. District Court
SEGREGATION

Wilson v. Kelley, 294 F.Supp. 1005 (N.D. Ga. 1968), aff'd, 393 U.S. 266 (1968). State statutes requiring the segregation of races in county jails are unconstitutional, and although prison authorities may take racial tensions into account in maintaining order and security, such consideration should be made after a danger to security, discipline, and good order has become apparent, and not before. (Georgia)

1969

U.S. Appeals Court
RELIGION

Walker v. Blackwell, 411 F.2d 23 (5th Cir. 1969). Services must be permitted equally for all religions, although the time and frequency may be controlled. Security concerns justified refusal of Muslims' request to have a meal after sunset. (Atlanta, Georgia)

1971

U.S. Appeals Court
HAIR LENGTH
FACIAL HAIR

Blake v. Pryse, 444 F.2d 218 (8th Cir. 1971). Regulations covering hair length and facial hair have been held not to raise constitutional issues. Administrators can justify such regulations to achieve purposes of identification, hygiene, discipline and prevention of concealment of contraband. (Federal Correctional Institute, Sandstone, Minnesota)

U.S. District Court
MEDIA ACCESS
DISTURBANCE

Burnham v. Oswald, 333 F.Supp. 1128 (W.D. N.Y., 1971). Newsmen brought suit seeking an order permitting press interviews of inmates in certain state correctional facilities. The district court held that guidelines applied by corrections officials which resulted in forbidding interviews of inmates after a riot took place was not an infringement of newsmen's first amendment rights. A federal court will not substitute its judgment as to restrictions required for safety and security of an institution for that of prison administrators unless a violation of constitutional rights is clear. (Attica Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
LOCKS

Jones v. Wittenberg, 330 F.Supp. 707 (N.D. Oh. 1971), aff'd, 456 F.2d 854 (6th Cir. 1972). Cell-locking system must be placed in good working order. (Lucas Co., OH)

U.S. District Court
HAIR
JEWELRY

Seale v. Mason, 326 F.Supp. 1375 (D. Conn. 1971). Arguments for hair restriction are based on health reasons and the need for identification of inmates. Where a prison regulation limited the jewelry women prisoners might wear to a wristwatch, earrings, a ring and a necklace with a religious medal on it, the court held no infringement of any constitutional right existed. (Montville Correctional Center, Connecticut)

1972

U.S. District Court
LOCKS

Baker v. Hamilton, 345 F.Supp. 345 (W.D. Ky. 1972). Broken locks contribute to a finding of cruel and unusual punishment as to juveniles. (Jefferson County Jail, Kentucky)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEGREGATION

Christman v. Skinner, 468 F.2d 723 (2d Cir. 1972). Putting detainee in "isolation for three days did not constitute punishment, but only maintenance of order and discipline," thus no minimal due process was necessary. (Monroe County Jail, New York)

U.S. District Court
PRETRIAL
DETAINEES

Collins v. Schoonfield, 344 F.Supp. 257 (D. Md. 1972). A detainee can be deprived of constitutional rights "only to the extent such denial is required to insure that he appears at trial and to restrain him from endangering or disrupting the security of the institution in which he is detained, or to deter him, if his conduct has already caused such danger or disruption, from repeating such conduct. Inmates may not be punished for conduct if innocuous or trivial nature under vague and uncertain standards and regulations because such conduct may offend the sensibilities of individual corrections officers where such conduct poses no threat to the security and order of the institution. (Baltimore City Jail, Maryland)

U.S. District Court
ACCESS TO ATTORNEY

Elie v. Henderson, 340 F.Supp. 958 (E.D. La. 1972). Banning of lawyers who seem intent on "instigating trouble" is approved. Attorneys do not have a right to visit inmates who have not sought their advice. (Louisiana State Penitentiary)

U.S. Appeals Court
RELIGIOUS SERVICES

LaReau v. MacDougall, 473 F.2d 974 (2nd Cir. 1972), cert denied, 414 U.S. 878. Prisoners with a history of disruptive activity may be denied attendance at religious services. (Connecticut Correctional Institute, Somers)

1973

U.S. Appeals Court
RELIGIOUS SERVICES
CONTACT VISITS

Fallis v. United States, 476 F.2d 619 (5th Cir. 1973). Security and visiting rules are sufficient grounds for refusing to allow Mormon "Family Home Evening" contact visits. (Atlanta Federal Penitentiary, Georgia)

1974

U.S. Supreme Court
MEDIA ACCESS

Pell v. Procunier, 417 U.S. 817 (1974). Pell, a journalist, together with two other journalists and four California State Prison inmates, sought injunctive and declaratory relief in a 42 U.S.C. Section 1983 action challenging a California Department of Corrections rule promulgated by Procunier, Director of the Department. The rule provided that press and other media interviews with specific individual inmates would not be permitted. The U.S. District Court for the Southern Division of California granted the requested relief, holding that the rule unconstitutionally infringed their first and fourteenth amendment freedoms. The court dismissed the journalists' claims on the ground that other sources of information were available to them. The prison officials and journalists appealed directly to the U.S. Supreme Court.

HELD: "[S]ince [the rule prohibiting media interviews with specific individual inmates] does not deny the press access to sources of information available to members of the general public, we hold that it does not abridge the protection that the first and fourteenth amendments guarantee." 417 U.S. at 835.

REASONING:

a. "[L]awful incarceration brings about the necessary withdrawal or limitation of many privileges and rights, a retraction justified by the considerations underlying our penal system [Cite omitted]." 417 U.S. at 822.

b. "[A] prison inmate retains those first amendment rights that are not inconsistent with his status as a prisoner or with the legitimate penological objectives of the corrective system. Thus, challenges to prison restrictions that are asserted to inhibit first amendment interests must be analyzed in terms of the legitimate policies and goals of the corrections system, to whose custody and care the prisoner has been committed in accordance with due process of law." 417 U.S. at 822.

c. "It is in light of these legitimate penal objectives [deterrence, rehabilitation, and security] that a court must assess challenges to prison regulations based on asserted constitutional rights of prisoners." 417 U.S. at 823.

d. "When the question involves the entry of people into the prisons for face-to-face communication with inmates, it is obvious that institutional considerations such as security and related administrative problems, as well as the accepted and legitimate policy objectives of the corrections system itself, require that some limitation be placed on such visitations." 417 U.S. at 826.

e. "In the judgment of the state corrections officials, this visitation policy will permit inmates to have personal contact with those persons who will aid in their rehabilitation, while keeping visitations at a manageable level that will not compromise institutional security. Such considerations are peculiarly within the province and professional expertise of corrections officials and, in the absence of substantial evidence in the record to indicate that the officials have exaggerated their response to these considerations, courts should ordinarily defer to their expert judgment."

f. "[W]hen the issue involves a regulation limiting one of several means of communication by an inmate, the institutional objectives furthered by that regulation, and the measure of judicial deference owed to corrections officials in their attempt to serve those interests are relevant in judging the validity of the regulation." 417 U.S. at 827.

g. "[N]ewsmen have no constitutional right of access to prisons or their inmates beyond that afforded the general public." 417 U.S. at 834.

h. "The right to speak and publish does not carry with it the unrestrained right to gather information." 417 U.S. at 834 at 9, Citing Zemel v. Rusk, 381 U.S. AT 16-17.

NOTE: Important to the Court's holding that the rule did not violate the inmates' rights was its finding that adequate alternatives (mail and visitation) existed to provide inmates with access to the outside world. (Department of Corrections, California)

1975

U.S. District Court
STAFFING

Alberti v. Sheriff of Harris Co., 406 F.Supp. 649 (S.D. Tex. 1975). Sufficient jail staff shall be hired to provide one jailer for every twenty inmates. The number of jail guards must be increased when additional guards are required for the safekeeping of prisoners and the security of the jail. (Harris County Jail, Texas)

U.S. District Court
"LOCK-IN"

Rhem v. Malcolm, 396 F.Supp. 1195 (S.D. N.Y. 1975), aff'd, 527 F.2d 1041 (2nd Cir. 1975). Institution allowed to lock in inmates, consistent with least restrictive alternative theory, during following times: 1) Post-breakfast lock-in to provide services for inmates going to court. 2) Lock-in of one side of cell block while other side is eating. 3) Night time lock-in. Using proper classification procedures, the institution may impose a more restrictive lock-in schedule for inmates determined to be security risks. (Manhattan House of Detention, New York)

1976

U.S. District Court
SEARCHES

Bell v. Manson, 427 F.Supp. 450 (D. Conn. 1976). Strip and rectal searching after court appearances is upheld. (Community Correctional Center, Bridgeport)

U.S. District Court
VISITS
PRETRIAL
DETAINEES

Wolfish v. Levi, 406 F.Supp. 1243 (S.D. N.Y. 1976). Restrictions on visitation of pretrial inmates must be justified by compelling necessity. Prison officials have the ultimate burden of proof on this issue. Due process requires that the least restraint necessary to assure institutional security and administrative manageability be employed. (Metropolitan Correctional Facility, New York)

1977

U.S. District Court
CONTRABAND

Goldsby v. Carnes, 429 F.Supp. 370 (W.D. Mo. 1977). All living units should be checked for contraband at least once a month. (Jackson County Jail, Missouri)

1978

U.S. District Court
SEGREGATION

Bono v. Saxbe, 450 F.Supp. 934 (E.D. Ill., 1978). Prisoners confined in the control unit of the Marion Federal Penitentiary brought an action challenging the conditions of their confinement. The district court held that: (1) prisoners did not have a fundamental liberty interest in remaining in the general prison population but did have an interest protected by due process as a result of the prison's own rules; (2) placement of prisoners in the control unit, which was done for preventative and not punitive reasons, could not be based on the crime for which the prisoner was convicted or on the possibility of escape since every inmate in the Marion institution was a potential candidate for escape; (3) prisoners placed in the control unit were entitled to written notice of hearing, written reason, impartial decision making, and immediate and later periodic review; (4) prisoners were entitled to be told what affirmative actions they could take to expedite their release from the control unit, and (5) conditions of confinement in the control unit were not cruel and unusual punishment except for the use of closed-front cells. (Federal Penitentiary, Marion, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
FIRE SAFETY

Hamilton v. Covington, 445 F.Supp. 195 (W.D. Ark. 1978). A duty is owed by the sheriff to provide adequate security. Liability may exist for deaths and injuries occurring from a fire in an unattended jail. (Nevada County Jail, Arkansas)

U.S. Supreme Court
MEDIA ACCESS

Houchins v. KQED, Inc., 438 U.S. 1 (1978). This is a 42 U.S.C. Section 1983 action brought by KQED Broadcasting Company against Houchins, the sheriff of Alameda County, Colorado, claiming deprivation of first amendment rights. KQED was refused permission to inspect and photograph areas of a county jail where an inmate suicide had taken place. Shortly after the initiation of this action, the sheriff conducted monthly tours, open to the public, of certain areas of the jail. KQED maintained this was inadequate because once the tours were full media representatives might not have access, and photographic and sound equipment were not allowed on the tours.

The U.S. district court granted a preliminary injunction enjoining Houchins from denying KQED and responsible representatives of the news media access to the jail, and from prohibiting the use of photographic and sound equipment. On interlocutory appeal, the circuit court of appeals affirmed the district court's order, concluding the media had a first amendment and fourteenth amendment right of access to prisons and jails. Houchins sought certiorari from the U.S. Supreme Court. (Reversed and Remanded).

HELD: Neither the First Amendment nor the Fourteenth Amendment mandates a right of access to government information or sources of information within the government's control. Under...[the]...holdings in Pell v. Procunier...[Cite Omitted]...and Saxbe v. Washington Post...[Cite Omitted]..., until the political branches decree otherwise...the media have no special right of access to the Alameda County Jail different from or greater than that accorded the public generally. 438 U.S. at 15, 16. (Alameda County Jail, Colorado)

1979

U.S. Supreme Court
SECURITY
RESTRICTIONS
SEARCHES
VISITS
CELL CAPACITY

Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. 520 (1979). Pretrial detainees confined in the Metropolitan Correction Center (MCC) in New York City challenged virtually every facet of the institution's conditions and practices in a writ of habeas corpus, alleging such conditions and practices violate their constitutional rights.

MCC is a federally operated, short-term detention facility constructed in 1975. Eighty-five percent of all inmates are released within sixty days of admission. MCC was intended to include the most advanced and innovative features of modern design in detention facilities. The key design element of the facility is the "modular" or "unit" concept, whereby each floor housing inmates has one or two self-contained residential units, as opposed to the traditional cellblock jail construction. Within four months of the opening of the twelve-story, 450 inmate capacity facility, this action was initiated.

The U.S. District Court for the Southern District of N.Y. enjoined no less than twenty practices at the MCC on constitutional and statutory grounds, many of which were not appealed. See, United States Ex Rel Wolfish v. Levi, 439 F.Supp. 114 (S.D.N.Y.). The Second Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed the district court decision, See, Wolfish v. Levi, 573 F.2d 118 (2d Cir. 1978), and reasserted the "compelling-necessity" test as the standard for determining limitations on a detainee's freedom.

The U.S. Supreme Court granted certiorari "to consider the important constitutional questions raised by [recent prison decisions] and to resolve an apparent conflict among the circuits." 441 U.S. at 524: Do the publisher-only rule, the prohibition on receiving packages from outside sources, the search of living quarters, and the visual inspection of body cavities after contact visits constitute punishment in violation of the rights of pretrial detainees under the due process clause of the fifth amendment?

HELD: "Nor do we think that the four MCC security restrictions and practices...constitute 'punishment' in violation of the rights of pretrial detainees under the due process clause of the fifth amendment." 441 U.S. at 560, 561.

REASONING: a. [T]he determination whether these restrictions and practices constitute punishment in the constitutional sense depends on whether they are rationally related to a legitimate nonpunitive governmental purpose and whether they appear excessive in relation to that purpose. 441 U.S. at 561.

b. Ensuring security and order at the institution is a permissible nonpunitive objective, whether the facility houses pretrial detainees, convicted inmates, or both...[W]e think that these particular restrictions and practices were reasonable responses by MCC officials to legitimate security concerns. [Detainees] simply have not met their heavy burden of showing that these officials have exaggerated their response to the genuine security considerations that activated these restrictions and practices. 441 U.S. at 561, 662.

CLOSING COMMENTS OF MAJORITY OPINION: "[T]he inquiry of federal courts into prison management must be limited to the issue of whether a particular system violates any prohibition of the constitution, or in the case of a federal prison, a statute. The wide range of 'judgment calls' that meet constitutional and statutory requirements are confided to officials outside of the judicial branch of government." 441 U.S. at 562.

GENERAL NOTES: The Court saw this case, a challenge to virtually every aspect of the operation of a state of the art detention facility, as an opportunity to clarify the judiciary's role in the operation of prisons. The five-four decision indicates there was no general consensus as to what that role is, or how it should be applied. No less than three possible standards of review are contained in the majority and dissenting opinions: 1) A "rational basis", subjective test; 2) A balancing of interests test; 3) An objective standard of review.

Despite J. Rehnquist's statement that "our analysis does not turn on the particulars of the MCC concept or design," the majority's reasoning frequently looks to that concept or design for justification of its positions. 441 U.S. at 525. Clearly, the "double-bunking" holding should be interpreted as applicable only to facilities where:

a) Inmates are locked in their cells a maximum of eight hrs. a day and have access to a wide range of activities and programs; and

b) No inmate is detained longer than sixty days.

Situations other than these likely will not fall within the strict holding on this issue. (Metropolitan Correction Center (MCC), New York)

U.S. District Court
SEGREGATION

Brown v. Neagle, 486 F.Supp. 364 (S.D. W.V. 1979). Placement in administrative detention as an escape risk on the basis of escapes from other institutions by acquaintances of the plaintiff is irrational. Return to general population and credit for the good time which would have been earned in general population is ordered. The plaintiff is to be treated as any other inmate. (Federal Correctional Institution, Alderson, West Virginia)

U.S. Appeals Court
VISITS
CROWDING
MAIL
CLASSIFICATION
PROTECTION

Jones v. Diamond, 594 F.2d 997 (5th Cir. 1979), cert. denied, 102 S.Ct. 27 (1980). In this opinion, the U.S. Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals reviewed Mississippi District Court Judge William Cox's ruling on what the Fifth Circuit termed a "challenge to nearly every conceivable facet of the Jackson County Jail at Pascagoula, Mississippi." The court first noted that the conditions at the Jackson County Jail were not "uncivilized" or "barbaric and inhumane", as the court had found rulings on the conditions of other jails. A peculiar aspect of this case was that convicted felons were being held in the jail while the state penitentiary was being brought up to constitutional standards. Consequently, there were convicted felons, convicted misdemeanants and pretrial detainees in the jail. Accordingly, the court, in reviewing the conditions at the jail, applied different standards depending on whether the inmate was pretrial detainee or a convicted felon or misdemeanant. The court then reviewed the history of corrections in the State of Mississippi and specifically in Jackson County. It noted that Jackson County officials had spent a considerable amount of money and instituted several new programs in the last ten years. In addition, at the time of this opinion, the county was in the process of erecting a new jail. After noting these facts, the court made rulings in the following areas.

VISITATION. The Court noted that convicted criminals do not have a constitutional right to visitation except for legal counsel, whereas pretrial detainees rights are limited in that they must yield, where necessary, to the needs of institutional security. In the Fifth Circuit, the courts have held that a pretrial detainee also does not have constitutional right to contact visitation. At the jail, visitation was officially limited to a brief period on Sundays, although jail officials often allowed visitation at other than regular hours. However, there had been a serious smuggling problem at the jail. When the officials ordered that visitors be searched before being allowed visitation to prevent smuggling, the inmates rioted, causing $30,000 damage. The appellate court upheld the lower court's ruling that the existing visitation regulations were constitutionally adequate. The court specifically pointed out that depriving inmates of contact visitation was unconstitutional.

OVERCROWDING. Although there had been a serious overcrowding problem at the jail, the construction of the new jail eliminated any further problem. The court ruled, however, that overcrowding at the old jail was prohibited.

MAIL. The court clearly spelled out the rights of inmates with regard to mail:

> [P]rison officials may constitutionally censor incoming and outgoing general correspondence. No numerical limitations may be placed upon prison correspondence, but jail officials may employ a 'negative mail list' to eliminate any prisoner correspondence with those on the outside who affirmatively indicate that they do not wish to receive correspondence from a particular prisoner. Officials may not require prior approval of the names of individuals with whom prisoners may correspond. Finally, letters which concern plans for violations of prison rules or which contain a graphic presentation of sexual behavior in violation of the law may be withheld.
>
> Outgoing mail to licensed attorneys, courts, and court officials must be sent unopened, and incoming mail from such sources may be opened only in the presence of the inmate recipient, if considered necessary to determine authenticity or to inspect for contraband. Prisoners may be required to submit the names of attorneys reasonably in advance of proposed mailings so that officials can ascertain whether the named attorney is licensed. Prisoners have the same general rights as to media mail.

CLASSIFICATION. The court noted that the Constitution does not require that a classification plan be put into effect, although a court may order such a plan to protect inmates from homosexual attacks, violence and contagious diseases. The court ruled that the policies in existence under the Mississippi Code were adequate to protect the inmate.

SECURITY. While noting that an inmate is to be protected from assaults from other inmates, the court also stated that relief could be provided only where there was a showing of deliberate indifference to the inmates' security and protection. Here, there was no such showing, and the court refused to issue injunctive relief. (Jackson County Jail, Pascagoula, Mississippi)

1980

U.S. District Court
PUBLICATIONS

Brown v. Hilton, 492 F.Supp. 771 (D. N.J. 1980). The seizure of literature on the making of bombs and weapons from an inmate does not violate the first amendment. (New Jersey State Prison, Trenton)

U.S. District Court
SEGREGATION

Bukhari v. Hutto, 487 F.Supp. 1162 (E.D. Vir. 1980). While placement in segregation based upon the political beliefs of an individual would violate the first amendment, placement in segregation of an individual who is a member of an organization advocating escape, who although a model prisoner, has already escaped once, and whose closest associates have recently escaped from other institutions is a reasonable security measure. Such placement in segregation does not require a Wolff type hearing, either before or after, but the individual does have a due process base right to have any erroneous information in the file which is considered in making the decision. (Virginia Correctional Center for Women, Goodland)

U.S. District Court
PROTECTION
SEPARATION

Campbell v. Bergeron, 486 F.Supp. 1246 (M.D. La. 1980), aff'd, 654 F.2d 719 (5th Cir., 1981). Jail inmates have a right of personal safety when incarcerated. However, there is nothing inherent in a failure to separate sentenced and pretrial inmates which violates this right. (West Baton Rouge Parish Jail, Louisiana)

U.S. District Court
TELEPHONE CALLS

Rodriguez v. Blaedow, 497 F.Supp. 558 (E.D. Wisc. 1980). Security considerations permit the institution to monitor all telephone calls and justify a requirement that all calls be made in English. (Correctional Institution, Waupun, Wisconsin)

U.S. District Court
SEARCHES

Sims v. Brierton, 500 F.Supp. 813 (N.D. Ill. 1980). Requiring inmates to submit to a body cavity search in order to consult with an attorney or to have a deposition taken violates the right of access to the courts. There are no security considerations demonstrated in this context which would support such a requirement. (Stateville Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
HATS

St. Claire v. Cuyler, 634 F.2d 109 (3rd Cir. 1980). Rejecting the lower court's reasoning, the Third Circuit Court of Appeals has upheld regulations of the Graterford, Pennsylvania prison, preventing inmates from wearing hats even for religious purposes and from attending religious services while in segregation. The lower court ruled against the prison, holding that while the prison officials imposing the rules were seeking to protect substantial security interests, they had not chosen the "least restrictive alternative" for doing so. Prison officials argued that hats would provide an additional place for the concealment of weapons or contraband. They also stated that some prison cliques use head gear as a means of identification. According to the prison officials, group identification can cause security problems if separate groups exhibit hostility toward each other. The ban on attendance at religious services by prisoners in segregation was based upon the prison's inability to mobilize the manpower to move the prisoners to and from services. The appeals court first noted that convicted prisoners do not forfeit all their constitutional protections. The court stated, however, that first amendment freedoms may be curtailed when prison officials reasonably believe that exercise of such freedoms would be likely to result in disruption to the prisoner's order and stability. The court then held that the showing of a substantial security interest, without more, was sufficient to shift the burden of proof to the plaintiff. Were the plaintiff to then prevail, it would be necessary to show that the prison's security concerns were unreasonable or its response exaggerated. The court found that no such showing was made here and thus reversed the lower court. The district court's "least restrictive alternative requirement," the higher court said, is not necessary. (Pennsylvania Prison, Graterford, Pennsylvania)

U.S. Appeals Court
USE OF FORCE

Williams v. Kelly, 624 F.2d 695 (5th Cir. 1980), cert. denied, 451 U.S. 1019 (1980). Mother of prisoner, whose death was apparently caused when jailers applied choke hold to him, brought wrongful death action against the jailers resting on statute authorizing a civil action for deprivation of rights. The United States District Court for the Northern District of Georgia entered judgment in favor of the jailers and the prisoner's mother appealed. The court of appeals held that the district court's findings that jailers applied fatal choke hold to prisoner in order to protect their own safety and in a good faith effort to maintain order or discipline were not clearly erroneous and therefore their conduct was not constitutionally tortious. (Atlanta Police Station, Holding Room)

1981

U.S. District Court
BOOKS
CONTRABAND

Howard v. Cronk, 526 F.Supp. 1227 (S.D. N.Y. 1981). The prisoner's constitutional right to visit with his legal counsel was not violated by the prison policy of not allowing prisoners to bring books into a legal visit. That rule was reasonable in light of the security problem posed by books as a vehicle for smuggling contraband into the prison, and it could not be said that the policy unjustifiably obstructed the prisoner's access to his attorney. (Green Haven Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
SECURITY
PRACTICES

Lareau v. Manson, 651 F.2d 96 (2nd Cir. 1981). Adopting most of the findings of the District Court, the United States of Appeals for the Second Circuit has ordered major reforms in the Hartford Community Correctional Center (HCCC), dealing generally with overcrowding. The constitutional standard for the legality of conditions of confinement is different for pretrial detainees and for convicted inmates. For pretrial detainees, the test is whether the conditions amount to punishment without due process in violation of the fourteenth amendment. With respect to convicted inmates, the criterion is whether the punishment is cruel and unusual as defined under the eighth amendment.

Reviewing the numerous findings of the district court, the appellate court looked to the supreme court case of Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. 520. Viewing overcrowding at the HCCC as related to pretrial detainees, the court cited the following standard of whether such conditions amount to punishment: "It must be shown that the overcrowding subjects a detainee over an extended period to genuine privation and hardship not reasonably related to a legitimate governmental objective."

Based upon this standard the court found that double-bunking in cells originally designed for one person, compounded by overcrowded dayrooms, imposed unconstitutional punishment on pretrial detainees in all cases except where such hardship was related to a legitimate governmental purpose. The court here found that these hardships promoted neither security nor the effective management of the institution.

Other conditions were even less acceptable. The use of a glass enclosed dayroom (dubbed the "fish tank") as a dormitory room housing numerous inmates on a full time basis was held to amount to punishment and was thus unconstitutional with regard to pretrial detainees. In addition, the placing of mattresses on the floors of cells to accommodate more inmates and the assignment of healthy inmates to medical cells (sometimes with mentally or physically ill cellmates) to alleviate overcrowding were held to constitute impermissible punishment.

The court further stated that the length of incarceration of pretrial detainees becomes relevant in such determination: "Conditions unacceptable for weeks or months might be tolerable for a few days." As such, the court indicated that while double-bunking and overloaded dayrooms might be tolerable, and thus constitutionally permissible for a few days, after 15 or so days, they would become unacceptable punishment. The use of the "fish tank" and floor mattresses, however, were held to constitute punishment regardless of the number of days imposed.

Viewing the conditions as they related to convicted persons, the court pointed out that it was to be guided by a wholly different standard. Here, in order to constitute a constitutional violation, the conditions had to be such as to amount to cruel and unusual punishment. Nevertheless, the court found the overcrowded conditions intolerable. Noting that the thirty to thirty-five square feet of living space per inmate fell far short of the standards promulgated by groups such as the Connecticut Department of Corrections, the American Correctional Association, the United Nations and the National Sheriffs' Association, and further noting that the dayroom at the HCCC offered the "relief of a noisy subway platform" the court held that double-bunking, with respect to convicted inmates, was unconstitutional except where inmates are confined no more than about thirty days.

As with the pretrial detainees, the court found that the constitutional rights of the convicted inmates were immediately violated by confinement in the "fish tank" and by policies requiring them to sleep on mattresses on the floors and to be assigned to medical holding cells for no reason other than to alleviate overcrowding.

Finally, the court ordered that all newly admitted inmates, with minor exceptions, be given a medical examination within forty-eight hours of admission. (Hartford Community Correctional Center, Connecticut)

U.S. Appeals Court
CLOTHES
FIRE SAFETY

Olgin v. Darnell, 664 F.2d 107 (1981). The restrictions and conditions placed on a pretrial detainee, particularly the removal of all his clothes but his underwear for one day, were not arbitrary and purposeless. Those steps were unreasonably related to the legitimate governmental objective of calming participants in the stabbing of a fellow prisoner, restoring order and protecting inmates from a fire hazard created by the pretrial detainee. (Midland County Jail, Texas)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEARCHES- CELL

Olsen v. Klecker, 642 F.2d 1115 (8th Cir. 1981). Conducting unannounced cell searches without any cause is a valid security procedure. (North Dakota State Penitentiary)

1982

U.S. Appeals Court
RELIGIOUS SERVICES

Rogers v. Scurr, 676 F.2d 1211 (8th Cir. 1982). Court finds that Muslim inmates' rights are not violated. Several muslim inmates of the Iowa State Penitentiary filed suit alleging that their religious freedom had been curtailed because they were denied entrance to the prayer chapel for a short time and later refused to leave a restricted area where they had started praying. They also challenged prison regulations allowing prayer caps and robes to be worn only in the chapel.

The lower court found no constitutional violation, but ordered changes in prison regulations in regard to religious practices. The court of appeals for the 8th Circuit, agreeing that no violations had occurred, also vacated all orders of the lower court, stating that the lower court had erred in ordering the changes where no constitutional violations had been found and noted that prison administrators should be accorded liberal discretions in running the prison. The appeals court found that all regulations were reasonably related to safety and security needs of the prison and that was evident from the record that prison administrators had exercised good faith in trying to accommodate the needs of the Muslim inmates' religious beliefs. (Iowa State Penitentiary)

U.S. Appeals Court
USE OF FORCE

Smith v. Iron County, 692 F.2d 685 (10th Cir. 1982). Use of mace on pretrial detainee is found reasonable. The court found that the use of mace did not violate any constitutional rights in this case. The plaintiff, awaiting disposition on a burglary charge, was found on the floor under his bunk making banging noises. The jailer warned the inmate that he would use mace if he was not given the object making the noise. Because the jailer was the only person on duty in the facility in Cedar City, Utah, and because he had reason to believe that a heavy metal object (six pound drain cover) might have been used to harm anyone near the inmate, the use of mace was reasonable. The court also noted that the jailer could not enter the cell without risking the escape of the plaintiff and his cell mate. (Iron County Jail, Utah)

1983

U.S. Appeals Court
RELIGIOUS ARTICLES

Childs v. Duckworth, 705 F.2d 915 (7th Cir. 1983). Denial of religious articles to practice satanic beliefs is proper. The Fifth Judicial Circuit Court of Appeals has ruled that denial of an inmate's request to practice his alleged Satanic religion was justified in the interest of prison security. Prison officials had found that the inmate was insincere in his professed belief since he never provided the information required to start an organization, never obtained a sponsor, and was secretive about his group's rituals. Without such information, the practice of the so-called religion presented a potential threat to institutional security since prison authorities had no way of knowing what would occur at the Satanic services. Prison officials properly denied the prisoner a podium from which to propagate his individual beliefs, candles and incense which were a fire hazard, and a crystal ball which could be used to physically harm someone. In addition, prison officials and the district court decided Satanism was not a religion, but rather a "nebulous, philosophic concept." (Indiana State Prison)

U.S. District Court
RELIGION

Karriem v. Barry, 32 Crim. L. Rptr. 2429 (D. D.C. 1983). Procedures for admitting a minister to an institution are upheld. The district court upheld institutional procedures which require a minister who desires to work in the institution to execute a form: disclosing his superior, if any; agreeing to obey any orders from his superior; agreeing to keep his superiors informed of his activities; and agreeing to refrain from any political activities, finding that the procedures do not violate either the free exercise or establishment clauses of the first amendment. (District of Columbia Jail)

U.S. District Court
VISITS

Keenum v. Amboyer, 558 F.Supp. 1321 (E.D. Mich. 1983). Short-term denial of visiting does not violate inmate rights. A federal district court has determined that an inmate at the Macomb County Jail suffered no violation of constitutional rights when authorities prevented a certain individual from visiting him for three weeks. The restriction was imposed after officials received a telephone call warning that the individual was going to assist the inmate in an escape attempt. The court noted that in the three week period the inmate received other visitors, and he was able to communicate with the restricted individual through correspondence. (Macomb County Jail, Michigan)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEARCHES
WINDOWS

Rutherford v. Pitchess, 710 F.2d 572 (9th Cir. 1983), rev'd, 104 S.Ct. 3227 (1984). Pretrial detainees class action suit brings changes. A class action suit was filed against the Los Angeles County central jail by pretrial detainees. The federal district court ordered twelve changes after a trial. Three of the changes were appealed by county officials.

The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals decided that: low risk detainees were to be allowed one contact visit per week; detainees would be allowed to be present during searches of their cells; and the replacement of transparent windows by concrete enclosures was justified. Subsequently the United States Supreme Court reversed on the first two issues. (Los Angeles County Central Jail)

1985

State Appeals Court
SECURITY PRACTICES

Dept. of Corrections v. Helton, 477 So.2d 14 (Fla. App. 1 Dist. 1985). When the Florida Department of Corrections dismissed a nurse for neglecting her duties, the Career Service Commission reduced it to a suspension without pay for four months. A state appellate court let the commission's ruling stand, over objections from a dissenting judge. He said the nurse should have been terminated because the offenses she committed were serious, in view that they occurred in a prison setting. She left syringes on a desk, which could be found and used as weapons by inmates. Secondly, she neglected to examine an inmate's head wounds, and she worked under the influence of medication without seeking authorization to do so. He said it was a gross abuse of discretion in ordering her continued employment against the wishes of prison officials. (Department of Corrections, Florida)

U.S. District Court
RELIGIOUS ARTICLES

Dettmer v. Landon, 617 F.Supp. 592 (D.C. Va. 1985). Since an inmate's practicing of a religion that was popular in northern Europe in the tenth and eleventh century was found to be a legitimate religion, prison officials were ordered to provide him with ceremonial materials. Against their objections, officials were ordered to supply the inmate with: 1) Sulfur, sea salt or uniodized salt; 2) Quartz clock with alarm; 3) Candles; 4) Incense; 5) A white robe without a hood. The prison has general custody of the items to be made available to the inmate at designated times. A robe without a hood was ordered because of the officials' assertion that the hood could promote an escape attempt. Prisoners who practiced more conventional religions such as Catholicism and Hinduism were allowed access to candles, incense and robes.
The plaintiff's religion, referred to as the Church of Wicca (more commonly called witchcraft) is practiced by an estimated 10,000 to 50,000 people in the United States. (Powhatan Correctional Center, State Farm, Virginia)

U.S. Appeals Court
SAFETY
FIRE

Hoptowit v. Spellman, 753 F.2d 779 (9th Cir. 1985). Inmates brought an action challenging conditions of confinement in a state prison system. On remand, 682 F.2d 1237, the United States District Court entered judgment finding conditions in violation of the eighth amendment and ordered relief; the state appealed. The court of appeals held that: (1) the change of administration, resulting in defendants named in the action either leaving office or changing positions, did not warrant reopening the record on remand; (2) inadequate lighting, vermin infestation, substandard fire prevention, and safety hazards in the prison violated minimum requirements of the eighth amendment; and (3) the order for relief was overbroad in requiring provision of adequate food and clothing where there were no findings of inadequate food and clothing.

The prisoners have a right not to be subjected to an unreasonable threat of injury or death by fire and need not wait until actual casualties occur in order to obtain relief from such conditions. Substandard fire prevention at the state prison which endangered inmates' lives violated the eighth amendment.

Persons involuntarily confined by the state have a constitutional right to safe conditions of confinement. Safety hazards found throughout the state prison's occupational areas, which were exacerbated by prison's inadequate lighting and which seriously threatened the safety and security of the inmates, created unconstitutional infliction of pain. (State Penitentiary, Washington)

U.S. District Court
FIRE SAFETY
STAFFING

Miles v. Bell, 621 F.Supp. 51 (D.C.Conn. 1985). The focus of this complaint was overcrowding, particularly in the housing unit, which once consisted of open dormitories. Pretrial detainees brought a class action suit primarily alleging that the overcrowded dorms increased the spread of disease among them and were psychologically harmful because of the stress, lack of control over their areas and lack of privacy.

For security reasons and for the safety of a correctional officer, he is not permitted to carry a key to the exterior doors in the housing units if he is working alone. The inmates claim this and staff shortages would prevent them from evacuating in case of a fire. The court found no violation, since the correctional officer does carry keys to exit doors that empty into adjoining units. A door in the laundry room that was supposed to be one hour fire resistant according to code, did not amount to a constitutional violation. Finally, the court found no violation in the unannounced entry into the dorms by female correctional officers, who occasionally see unclothed inmates.
(Federal Correctional Institution at Danbury, Connecticut)

U.S. Appeals Court
KEYS

Riley v. Jeffes, 777 F.2d 143 (3rd Cir. 1985). A Federal Appeals Court held that a Pennsylvania inmate may sue prison officials because he is in fear of attack. James Riley alleged in his suit that some inmates were given cell keys for most of the day and left unsupervised. He contended that the keys sometimes were used to open other inmates' cells, and that on one occasion his cell was opened, and he was robbed. He also contended that this key practice allowed other inmates easy access to his cell while he was asleep. As a result, he had lived in fear of robberies, assaults, threats, homosexual activities, fights and stabbings for the past six months. The court found that these allegations, if true, required Riley to live day in and day out with a real and persistent fear of personal injury and that prison officials were totally indifferent to his safety. The court held that an inmate's right to be protected from constant threat of violence and sexual assault from other inmates does not require that he wait until he actually is assaulted before obtaining relief. It is only necessary that inmates show a pervasive risk of harm from other prisoners, in order to prevail. (State Correctional Institution at Huntingdon, Pennsylvania)

State Supreme Court
USE OF FORCE

State v. Thornton, 38 CrL 2173 (Mont Sup. Ct. 10/31/85). Montana Supreme Court holds that physical restraint is not a necessary element in arrest and detention. A truck driver was told that he was under arrest by a police officer and secured his release by threatening the officer with violence. He was charged with escape and appealed to the Montana Supreme Court. The court upheld the charge, noting that "official detention" was defined as detention by a peace officer pursuant to arrest. The court noted that an arrest requires the existence of three elements: (1) authority to arrest, (2) assertion of that authority with intention to effect an arrest, and (3) restraint of the arrestee. The court explained that:

> ...the view that a physical restraint is a necessary element of an arrest is largely discredited in recent cases. We agree with this position. Furthermore, we assert that the standard for an arrest when there is not a physical restraint of the defendant is whether a reasonable person, innocent of any crime, would have felt free to walk away under the circumstances. This standard drops any technical requirements for an arrest and the concept of restraint, and instead looks upon all the facts and circumstances of each case.

As a result, the court ruled that a law enforcement officer need not exert actual physical restraint over an individual in order to arrest him for purposes of a state law prohibiting escape from official detention.

1986

U.S. Appeals Court
STAFFING

Alberti v. Klevenhagen, 790 F.2d 1220 (5th Cir. 1986). Appeals court upholds remedial measures of district court, finding levels of violence and sexual assault violated inmates' eighth amendment rights and ordering increased staffing. In a case initiated in 1972, the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit agreed with the sweeping corrective measures ordered by a federal district court. The original class action suit was brought under 42 U.S.C. Section 1983, alleging that the facilities and operations of the Harris County detention system violated inmate constitutional and statutory rights. In February, 1975, a consent judgment was entered in the district court, calling for upgrading of existing facilities, construction of a new central jail, and committing the county to provide sufficient and adequately trained guards and other staff to assure the security of inmates. In December, 1975, the county's compliance with the consent judgment was challenged. Following hearings, a broad remedial order was issued. The court ordered adequate training and pay increases for jail personnel and ordered that staffing be increased to provide one jailer for every twenty inmates. In 1978 the court reluctantly approved plans for a new central jail. The plaintiffs had argued against the planned use of multiple occupancy cells, and the court expressly conditioned occupancy of the new facility on the provision of adequate staff. In 1982 and 1983 the district court held hearings to determine if adequate staffing was provided for the newly-opened detention facility. The court ordered the county to prepare a plan which complied with Texas Commission on Jail Standards (TCJS) requirements of one officer to forty-five inmates, eventually approving such a plan. When the county failed to meet a June, 1983, deadline for full staffing, the plaintiffs filed a motion for contempt. The county was granted TCJS approval in October for an alternative poststaffing plan, which provided less staff than the previous "one to forty-five" plan. After extensive hearings in 1984, and the presentation of evidence and testimony on violence in the facilities, the court ordered the implementation of a staffing plan which was similar to one proposed by the plaintiffs' experts, calling for approximately the same number of staff as the original "one to forty-five" plan, but incorporating a different assignment scheme. On appeal, the county argued that the evidence presented in the 1984 hearings was not sufficient to support the district court finding of constitutional violations, and that the new staffing plan ordered by the court exceeded what should be required to remedy any such violations. The appeals court affirmed all aspects of the district court corrective orders, stating that "....it is more regrettable that after thirteen years conditions in the jails are still in contravention of constitutional standards. Despite the efforts of the parties and the court, inmates continue to be beaten, raped, abused, and assaulted. The district court has acted properly in fashioning new relief for an old malady." (Harris County Detention Facilities, Texas)

State Court
CONTRABAND

Dennison v. Osp, 715 P.2d 88 (Ore. 1986). An inmate petitioned for a judicial review of a finding of the superintendent of the state penitentiary that he had knowingly engaged in conduct which constituted a substantial step toward manufacturing a weapon. The court of appeals, 770 Or.App. 194, 712 P.2d 186, affirmed, and petition for review was allowed in part. The Supreme Court held that the inmate did not violate the administrative rule in question by drawing blueprints of handguns, absent evidence that necessary products or materials were accessible or available for the manufacturer of the weapon within the penitentiary. (State Penitentiary, Oregon)

U.S. District Court
STAFFING

Duran v. Anaya, 642 F.Supp. 510 (D.N.M. 1986). State prisoners sought a preliminary injunction to halt layoffs of staff and filling of staff vacancies. The district court held that New Mexico prison inmates were entitled to a preliminary injunction prohibiting implementation of proposed staff reductions with respect to medical care, mental health care, and security where there was no evidence that staffing reductions of the magnitude contemplated would permit the maintenance of minimal constitutional standards in those areas; however, the court would not prohibit staff reductions other than those relating to medical care, mental health care and security where there was no evidence that any such proposed reductions would adversely affect the minimal constitutional rights of prisoners.

A prisoner has a right to be reasonably protected from constant threats of violence and sexual assaults from other inmates, and failure to provide an adequate level of security staffing, which may significantly reduce the risk of such violence and assaults, constitutes deliberate indifference to legitimate safety needs of prisoners.

The state has a constitutional obligation to make available to prisoners a level of medical care that is reasonably designed to meet routine and emergency health care needs of prisoners, including medical treatment for inmates' physical ills, dental care and psychological or psychiatric care. Gross deficiencies in staffing establishes deliberate indifference to prisoners' health needs. A lack of financing is not a defense to a failure to satisfy minimum constitutional standards in prisons. (Department of Corrections, New Mexico)

State Appeals Court
SECURITY PRACTICES

Fields v. State Dept. of Corrections, 498 So.2d 174 (La.App. 1 Cir. 1986). A correctional officer who had been employed nearly ten years with the Louisiana State Penitentiary was terminated because he left his post without permission after twelve hours on duty to inquire as to why his replacement was late. He was scheduled to work from 4:45 a.m. to 4:45 p.m. When his relief guard didn't show up at 4:50 p.m., he left his post and went across to a connecting dormitory to use the telephone to call as to the whereabouts of his replacement.

The court ruled that the single incidence of misconduct of the guard with permanent status was significant enough to warrant dismissal because it endangered the safety of the public and/or the inmates themselves. Even though testimony showed that it was common practice for guards to use the nearby telephone, it was not officially approved to leave a post without permission. (State Penitentiary, Louisiana)

U.S. District Court
CROWDING
STAFF

Inmates of Occoquan v. Barry, 650 F.Supp. 619 (D.D.C. 1986). A class of inmates confined at state medium security facilities brought a federal civil rights action seeking declaratory and injunctive relief for deprivation under color of state law of fifth and eighth amendment rights. The district court held that overcrowding and systematically deficient conditions constituted cruel and unusual punishment justifying equitable relief.

Overcrowding and systematically deficient conditions at state medium security institutions constituted cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the eighth amendment justifying equitable relief of imposition of cap on a number of inmates at each facility and requirement of periodic reports indicating what steps were being taken to address deficiencies. The plaintiffs contend that an excessive inmate population, deficiencies in environmental health and safety, food services, and mental health care, alone or in combination, violate their rights guaranteed by the United States Constitution.

The classification of inmates is essential for the prison security. One critical function of classification is the efficient identification of violent, aggressive inmates and those in need of psychiatric care, so that they can be separated from the rest of the population. See, e.g., Palmigiano v. Garrahy, 443 F.Supp. 956 (D.R.I.1977). The classification system at Occoquan appears to be dangerously overtaxed by the crush of inmates in need of classification. Idleness among inmates results in a variety of problems, including heightened tension, frustration, and violence. The lack of adequate programs can also have an adverse impact on inmates' chances for parole. There was no disagreement among the expert penologists that inmates should be engaged in some productive enterprise, properly supervised. Nonetheless, enforced idleness presents a major problem at Occoquan. The correctional officers do not supervise properly the sleeping areas of the dormitories. Correctional officers do not make patrols on a frequent and regular basis, nor are officers stationed in the rear of each dormitory so as to facilitate supervision of the living area when inmates are present. (Lorton Correctional Complex, D. C.)

U.S. District Court
SEARCHES
TRANSFER

Jeffries v. Reed, 631 F.Supp. 1212 (E.D. Wash. 1986). A death row inmate challenged the constitutionality of his transfer to the intensive management unit of the prison and also challenged the conditions of his incarceration in that unit. On cross motions for summary judgment, the district court held that: (1) the transfer of an inmate to a unit on the grounds that he inherently imposed a security risk in light of his sentence did not deny the inmate due process; (2) inspection of the inmate's legal mail by staff of the unit did not violate the inmate's rights of free speech or equal protection; (3) digital rectal search which the inmate underwent prior to being transferred to the unit and strip and visual body-cavity searches he underwent each time he left his cell did not constitute unreasonable searches and seizures; (4) denial of contact with other inmates did not violate the first, sixth, or fourteenth amendments; and (5) the telephone schedule, permitting the inmate to place a collect call to his attorney at least three times per week between the hours of 8:00 a.m. and 4:00 p.m. did not deny the inmate adequate access to counsel and the courts. (Intensive Management Unit, State Prison, Washington)

U.S. District Court
FIRE SAFETY

McClung v. Camp County, Tex., 627 F.Supp. 528 (E.D. Tex. 1986). District court rules against all prisoner claims in conditions of confinement suit against jail. An inmate who had been incarcerated in a county jail brought action against the county and various county officials alleging that conditions in jail violated his constitutional rights. The federal district court held that: (1) evidence supported a finding that conditions placed on the inmate's physical exercise at the jail did not constitute a violation of inmate's constitutional rights; (2) evidence supported a finding that inmate's constitutional rights were not violated by alleged failure to provide clean bedding, clothing and toiletries; (3) evidence was sufficient to support a finding that jail fire safety conditions did not violate inmate's constitutional rights; and (4) administering insulin to a diabetic inmate three times daily rather than four times daily did not violate the inmate's rights.

Evidence that a fire in the jail which resulted in an inmate's hospitalization was started by another inmate and was not immediately reported was sufficient to support a finding that jail fire safety conditions did not violate the inmate's constitutional rights. (Camp County Jail, Texas)

U.S. District Court
CROWDING
PROTECTION

Morales Feliciano v. Romero Bercelo, 672 F.Supp. 591 (D. P.R. 1986). According to a federal court, prison overcrowding, inmate idleness, and the threat of violence among inmates, combined with the continuous frustrations of reasonable expectation produced by administrative incompetence, resulted in an ascertainable psychological deterioration in the Puerto Rican prison population. The psychological deterioration inflicted on inmates in the prison system was an unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain in violation of prisoners' Eighth Amendment protections against cruel and unusual punishment. Insofar as the Puerto Rican prison administration was under a statutory duty to provide rehabilitative programs through which inmates could earn time credits towards early release, unavailability of any form of useful work, study or even recreation, where none of the physical conditions of confinement met constitutional standards, combined with continuous frustrations of reasonable expectations produced by administrative incompetence, inflicted serious psychological harm on inmates, which was independently cognizable under the Eighth Amendment. When inmates' opportunities to study or work within prison were taken away by irregularities in the classification system or the prison administration's inability to provide a safe environment, inmates were deprived of liberty interest implicating a statutorily created expectation that imprisonment could be shortened by work and study. Inmates of Puerto Rican jails were denied due process as a result of inefficient, inexperienced, and often incompetent social-penal counseling system, which had a severe negative impact on inmates' opportunities to establish eligibility for parole and to actually be heard in a timely manner by a parole board. Commingling of pretrial detainees with convicted prisoners, in conjunction with finding that conditions which prevailed in all institutions at which pretrial detainees were housed violated the Eighth Amendment rights of convicted inmates, was a sufficient basis for holding that pretrial detainees were being punished prior to conviction and that, therefore, they were deprived of liberty without due process of law. (Commonwealth of Puerto Rico)

U.S. Appeals Court
SAFETY

Walker v. Rowe, 791 F.2d 507 (7th Cir. 1986), U.S. cert. denied in 107 S.Ct. 597. Appeals court rules that due process clause does not assure safe working conditions for public employees and reverses lower court awards. On July 22, 1978, inmates of the Pontiac Correctional Center, a maximum security prison, were being returned to their cells after exercise in the courtyard. The prisoners killed three guards, injured others, and set fire to part of the prison. Three of the injured guards and the estates of the three deceased guards filed suit against the director of the Illinois Department of Corrections, and the assistant warden of Operations at Pontiac, alleging that they deprived them of their constitutional right to a safe working environment.

The United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit ruled: "Because we conclude that the constitution is not a code of occupational safety, we reverse the judgment." The court explained that "due process" does not mean "due care"- the constitution is designed to protect people from the state, not to ensure that the state provide safety or comfort. A special relationship must exist before the state can be held liable for harm to a person. If the state had forced the men to be officers at the correctional center, it would be required not to be indifferent to their working conditions. But the guards enlisted voluntarily and were free to quit at any time. According to the court, "...the state must protect those it throws into the snake pits, but the state need not guarantee that volunteer snake charmers will not be bitten."

The plaintiffs had argued that the corrections officials had control of several conditions which contributed to the attacks, including: failure to maintain metal detectors in operating condition; failure to conduct enough shakedowns of inmate cells to find weapons; failure to "lock down" the prison although the officials knew or should have known that it was tense; failure to immediately issue shotguns to the tactical squad and order it to quell the disturbance. Although the court noted that the defendants had some level of control over these issues, their actions did not amount to constitutional violations.

Additional allegations which the court concluded were not directly within the control of the defendants included: design of the prison which created "dead spots" from guard towers; high staff turnover, vacancies and lack of sufficient staff; overcrowded conditions in the facility; the existence of prisoner gangs; the new phone system which had defects and was hard to use; the door and cage in the North Cell House were old and flimsy; and guards did not receive enough training in controlling the riots, and training which was provided was poor. (Pontiac Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. Supreme Court
USE OF FORCE

Whitley v. Albers, 106 S.Ct (1986). Supreme Court rules that use of lethal force to quell a prison disturbance does not violate constitutional rights. During a disturbance at the Oregon State Penitentiary a correctional officer was taken hostage and placed in a cell on the upper tier of a two tier cellblock. Attempting to free the hostage, prison officials devised a plan which called for a manager to enter the cellblock unarmed, followed by officers armed with shotguns. The officers were instructed to fire a warning shot, and to shoot low at any inmate who attempted to climb the cellblock stairs. After firing a warning shot, an officer shot a prisoner in the knee when he started up the stairs. The prisoner filed suit against prison officials alleging violation of his eighth and fourteenth amendment rights. The federal district court ruled for the defendants, finding their "use of deadly force was justified under the unique circumstances of this case." The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit reversed the lower court decision. The U.S. Supreme Court reversed the appeals court decision, finding the use of force to be justified in this case. The Court ruled that the infliction of pain in the course of a prison security measure is only an eighth amendment violation if it is "inflicted unnecessarily and wantonly." The Supreme Court found that the "deliberate indifference" standard for evaluating eighth amendment claims which was established in Estelle v. Gamble, 429 U.S. 427 (1976), is not sufficiently broad enough to be used to analyze deadly force claims associated with riot situations. Wantonness must consider if the force was applied as part of a good faith effort to maintain or restore discipline, or if it was applied maliciously or sadistically for the purpose of causing harm, as well as efforts made to temper the severity of the forceful response. (Oregon State Penitentiary)

1987

3. Appeals Court
RELIGIOUS ARTICLES

Allen v. Toombs, 827 F.2d 563 (9th Cir. 1987). On appeal, the lower court decision that upheld prison regulations was affirmed. Prison inmates of a Native American religion failed to establish that a state prison policy prohibiting inmate spiritual leaders from conducting a "Pipe Ceremony" for prisoners in segregation when no outside "Pipe Bearer" was available refused inmates access to ceremony in violation of their First Amendment rights. Inmates had presented no evidence that any inmate in segregation had been denied access to the ceremony because of the policy. According to the court, the use of an axe, red hot stones and a pitchfork was reason enough for prison officials to deny segregated inmates from attending a Native American "Sweat Lodge" ritual. The Court found that the "Sweat Lodge" Ceremony posed a high security risk for the prison community if inmates from segregation were allowed to attend. In addition, the Court found that there was no evidence that inmates from the segregation unit had been denied attendance of the "Pipe Ceremony." The prison can require that the "Pipe Bearer" be an outside person rather than an inmate. (Oregon State Penitentiary)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEGREGATION

Bailey v. Shillinger, 828 F.2d 651 (10th Cir. 1987). After his voluntary transfer to a prison in another state, a Wyoming state prisoner who was serving a sentence for first degree murder murdered another prisoner and was returned to the Wyoming State Prison. The warden assigned him to a maximum security unit without a formal hearing. The prisoner filed a civil rights lawsuit against the warden, alleging his due process rights had been violated. He also charged that he was subjected to cruel and unusual punishment by being deprived of exercise and fresh air. The appeals court concluded that, because of the danger the inmate presented to other inmates and staff, the court concluded the warden was correct in assigning the inmate to maximum security. As to the cruel and unusual treatment charge, the court concluded that the one hour per day of exercise and fresh air was "restrictive" but did not violate the Eighth Amendment. (Wyoming State Prison)

U.S. District Court
USE OF FORCE

Blair-El v. Tinsman, 666 F.Supp. 1218 (S.D.Ill. 1987). Use of mace which was sprayed on an inmate was upheld by the court because it was used to restore prison security and that it did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment. After the chemical was sprayed, the inmate was offered medical treatment which he refused. (Menard Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
RELIGIOUS GROUPS

Butler-Bay v. Frey, 811 F.2d 449 (8th Cir. 1987). Inmates filed a civil rights action alleging that they had been denied the free exercise of their religion. The appeals court found in favor of prison officials when it agreed that prison rules preventing inmates of the Moorish Science Temple of America from wearing fezes were reasonable because the headwear could be used to conceal contraband. The court also upheld the prison's requirements that a guard be present at meetings and that minutes and membership lists should be provided to prison officials. The court found that the practices and regulations were not discriminatory, and did not violate the inmates' constitutional rights. (Missouri Eastern Correctional Center)

U.S. District Court
USE OF FORCE

Collins v. Ward, 652 F. Supp. 500 (S.D.N.Y. 1987). Prison officers subdued a violent inmate who was armed with bottles and scissors with tear gas. Two inmates who were nearby filed a claim for using the tear gas without regard for their health and safety. The district court ruled that prison officials were reasonable in their use of tear gas because an effort had been made to open windows and ventilate the area where the chemical was to be thrown. The court found that using tear gas to regain control and free inmates was proper under emergency circumstances. According to the court, the fact that alternative methods, other than tear gas, were available to subdue riotous prisoners did not mean that use of tear gas constituted cruel and unusual punishment when prison officials otherwise acted in good faith and employed special precautions to minimize harmful effects of tear gas upon innocent bystanders. (Green Haven Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
RELIGION

Felix v. Rolan, 833 F.2d 517 (5th Cir. 1987). Religious freedom is not violated when it is required that a prisoner sign both a committed name and legal Muslim name when entering the library. The inmate plaintiff argued that he had his legal name changed for religious reasons and that use of the prior name was offensive to him. He also complained that he was denied the supplies he needed to file this and other lawsuits by the library supervisor. The appeals court found the complaint about lack of supplies unwarranted when evidence showed that the inmate had requested 100 sheets of paper a week, but was only granted 75. The court also found, since it aided in the identification of prisoners, that the required use of the inmates' committed name was a reasonable regulation adopted in the interests of order, security and administrative efficiency. (Ellis Unit of the Texas Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
LOCK-IN

Gabel v. Estelle, 677 F.Supp. 514 (S.D. Tex. 1987). Inmates suffered no denial of their constitutional rights when, as indicated in their civil rights lawsuit, they were furnished peanut butter sandwiches as the sole nourishment during a lockdown. Prison officials responded to a non-violent work strike of over 150 inmates by locking all striking inmates in their cells without notice or hearing. The court found that the lock-down was imposed upon all striking inmates without partiality and was the kind of action prison officials were entitled to take in response to a confrontation with an inmate. In addition, the court also found no constitutional violation on the mere basis of the inmates' "distaste" for peanut butter. It added that "the strike itself may have been the cause of the limited fare." (Wynne Unit, Texas Department of Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
STAFFING

Galloway v. State of Louisiana, 817 F.2d 1154 (5th Cir. 1987). A federal court order issued to correct eighth amendment violations for the benefit of the prisoners required at least three men to be assigned to each prison disciplinary unit. This alone could not serve as a basis for liability in a federal civil rights action for injuries sustained by a corrections officer. The officer could not recover due to his being the only guard working the particular disciplinary unit at the time of his injury because the order did not create constitutional rights, such as would entitle the officer to do so. (Washington Correctional Institute, Louisiana)

U.S. Appeals Court
RELIGIOUS GROUPS
RELIGIOUS SERVICES

Hadi v. Horn, 830 F.2d 779 (7th Cir. 1987). Muslim inmates' free exercise rights under the first amendment were not violated when prison officials cancelled Muslim religious services due to the fact that a Muslim chaplain was unable to be present. The inmates claimed that, when a Muslim chaplain was unable to attend, a Muslim inmate should be permitted to conduct services under the supervision of a non-Muslim chaplain. Prison officials felt that conflicts might arise because inmates lacked the requisite religious expertise to resolve issues that arose during religious meetings and they also indicated that security could be jeopardized by granting inmates positions of authority as religious leaders over other inmates. The officials also expressed concern that services led by inmates might be used for gang meetings and for dissemination of views interfering with order in the prison. (Pontiac Correctional Center)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEARCHES

Hay v. Waldron, 834 F.2d 481 (5th Cir. 1987). Administrative segregation inmates were subjected to body cavity strip searches each time they entered or left their cell. The policy required the inmate to fully disrobe in his cell and to reveal for visual inspection the various parts of his person where a weapon or contraband might be concealed. An inmate who was held in administrative segregation challenged this policy, filing a federal civil rights lawsuit. The appeals court found that this policy was constitutional and reasonably related to legitimate security objectives. The court held that strip searches must merely be reasonably related to legitimate security interests, and therefore rejected the inmate's endorsement of a "least restrictive means" or probable cause" standard for the constitutionality of strip searches. However, the appeals court ruled that the magistrate's finding that the prison had not discriminatorily applied its strip-search policy against the inmate and his witnesses for bringing a civil rights action against prison officials was premature and ordered further hearing on this matter. (Texas Department of Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
RELIGIOUS ARTICLES
VISITS

Higgins v. Burroughs, 834 F.2d 76 (3rd Cir. 1987). The United States Supreme Court recently vacated an order of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit. Higgins v. Burroughs, 816 F.2d 119 (3rd Cir.), vacated, 108 S.Ct. 54 (1987). The lower court had ruled that a state prison regulation prohibiting the wearing of rosary beads into a visiting area violated inmates' First Amendment religious freedom and was not a valid security measure, In light of O'Lone v. Estate of Shabazz, 107 S.Ct. 2400 (1987), in which the court said that prison regulations which are alleged to impinge upon constitutional rights are valid if "it is reasonably related to legitimate penological interests," the Supreme Court asked that the decision be reconsidered. On remand, the Third Circuit expressed its view that this standard should create "no difference in result," but remanded the case to the trial court for further proceedings. (Graterford State Correctional Institute, Pennsylvania)

U.S. Appeals Court
USE OF FORCE
DISTURBANCE

Holloway v. Lockhart, 813 F.2d 874 (8th Cir. 1987). A federal appeals court disagreed with a lower court and ruled that an inmate could bring a federal suit for being forced to inhale tear gas sprayed by guards to subdue fellow inmates. The inmate claimed that he, along with about 20 other inmates, was injured while they were sleeping when guards sprayed a barrage of the chemical at disruptive inmates. This caused the fellow inmates to be forced to inhale the substance causing them to choke, pass out, suffer temporary blindness and breathing problems. (Maximum Security Unit, Tucker, Arkansas)

U.S. District Court
PROTECTION
STAFFING

Hossie v. U.S., 682 F.Supp. 23 (M.D. Pa. 1987). A federal prisoner failed to prove that prison overcrowding or an insufficient number of guards proximately caused the injuries the prisoner sustained as a result of an altercation with fellow inmates. To support the prisoner's expert's conclusion that one more guard would have prevented the assault would have required the placement of a guard at the shower/bathroom at all times. This situation would make the government an insurer of a prisoner's safety, a standard that was not required. (United States Penitentiary, Lewisburg, Pennsylvania)

U.S. District Court
CONTRABAND

Jackson v. Elrod, 671 F.Supp. 1508 (N.D.Ill. 1987). A pretrial detainee challenged a policy of barring the receipt of all hardcover books and failing to notify detainees of the rejection of these books when mailed to them by filing a federal lawsuit. A federal district court ruled that a policy of prohibiting all hardcover books, regardless of content or source, could not meet a test of being reasonably related to a legitimate penological interest. The court noted that claims that hardcover books provided a security problem, in that they could be used to conceal contraband, had to be rejected because, as the court noted, there were no specific instances of such problems cited and contraband could be concealed in clothing or other items which inmates were allowed to receive. The court also ruled that the jail must notify inmates when books are received and rejected. The court felt this could be done by duplicating a notice that is sent to the books' senders indicating the rejection, and sending a copy to the inmates. While the court held that the jail's corrections head, security chief and division superintendents were properly liable for making and administering these policies, it ordered further proceedings on whether the sheriff was liable, since the policy differed from a written handbook sent out by his office. (Cook County Jail, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
MAIL
PUBLICATIONS

Murphy v. Missouri Department of Corrections, 814 F.2d 1252 (8th Cir. 1987). Inmates brought action against prison officials because they were not allowing them to receive mail and publications relating to Aryan Nations. Prison officials said they denied the prisoners access to this material because they were enforcing the policy on the basis that any support of white supremacy increased tension and racial unrest, and threatened prison security. The court ruled, however, that only those materials that advocate violence or "are so racially inflammatory as to be reasonably likely to cause violence at the prison" may be restricted in the mail. Therefore, the broader mail policy of the prison violated prisoner rights to free speech and to the free exercise of religion. As a result, the court told prison officials were then told they must open, read and review each piece of mail to determine if it advocates violence or is racially inflammatory. The court summarized that censorship of inmate mail must not only be justified by the legitimate need for prison security, but must also be no more restrictive than necessary to protect prison security. (Missouri Training Center for Men)

U.S. Appeals Court
USE OF FORCE

Pressly v. Gregory, 831 F.2d 514 (4th Cir. 1987). According to a federal court, a medical examination and a photograph taken of an inmate the day after an alleged assault were sufficient evidence to support the officers' version of the incident. The inmate plaintiff was being transferred from one prison to another when he resisted efforts to be handcuffed. He alleged that five officers fell on him "en masse" and beat him although he was offering only passive resistance. The court found that there was a need for the application of force since the inmate even admitted that it was applied against him only after he refused to cooperate and resisted efforts to be handcuffed. While the court noted that force justified at its inception may still cross the boundary of constitutionality if the level of coercion actually applied dramatically exceeds the amount needed to accomplish legitimate goals and causes unnecessary injury, it ruled here that the force inflicted by the officers here was not of such an impermissible degree. While the inmate alleged his injuries caused pain for weeks following the incident, a medical examination and a photograph of appellate taken the next day revealed no indication of any physical injury. (Mecklenburg County Jail, Boydton, Virginia)

U.S. District Court
HAIR LENGTH

Reed v. Faulkner, 653 F.Supp. 965 (N.D. Ind. 1987). An inmate who claimed to belong to a religion called Rastafarian which is a Jamaican sect that have their homeland in Africa, requested to wear his hair long. When an expert witness revealed that wearing long hair was more a matter of choice, rather than a mandate of the religion, the court also noted that the inmate did not wear his beard long which also was a practice of his religion. The court found reason to doubt the inmate's sincerity. Further, aside from the question of sincerity, the court found the prison rules were supported by a security concern because long hair can hide contraband. Also, health and sanitation concerns of lice and infection can be a problem in prisons, as well as the danger of long hair getting caught in machinery and cell doors. (Indiana State Prison)

State Appeals Court
SEARCHES-CELL
MAIL

Rochon v. Maggio, 517 So.2d 213 (La. App. 1 Cir. 1987). An inmate alleged that prison officials violated his constitutional right of access to court when they opened an envelope the prisoner had in his possession during a shakedown search. The prisoner had attempted to walk out of his cell with the envelope after being told not to bring anything with him, contending that the letter was "legal mail." The court found that the inspection of the envelope, even though no contraband was found, was justified by suspicious actions of the prisoner.

U.S. District Court
FACIAL HAIR

Ross v. Coughlin, 669 F.Supp. 1235 (S.D.N.Y. 1987). An orthodox Jewish inmate stated a claim against New York prison officials for violating his First Amendment right to freely exercise his religion by forcing him to cut his facial hair, according to a federal district court. The beard trimming regulation being challenged was not reasonably related to governmental interests in identifying and controlling contraband, inmate identification, or prison security. However, the court found that the inmate did not have a claim in connection with his being forced to shave his hair and beard for an initial identification photograph. (Downstate Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEGREGATION

Tyler v. Black, 811 F.2d 424 (8th Cir. 1987), cert. denied, 109 S.Ct. 1760. On appeal, a federal court held that: (1) the mass transfer of inmate to a segregation unit during a period of prison unrest did not violate due process, but (2) double celling of inmates in small cells with solid "boxcar" type doors was cruel and unusual punishment in violation of Eighth Amendment. The mass transfer of inmates to a segregation unit during a period of prison unrest did not violate due process, where inmates were given posttransfer hearings, the warden perceived move as a necessary emergency security measure, no punitive purpose was involved, and the transfers were purely temporary administrative segregations. However, double celling of inmates in segregation unit in small cells with solid "boxcar" type doors was cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the Eighth Amendment; inmates with history of assaultive behavior were placed in closed cells for up to 23 hours a day for a period of several months. (Missouri State Penitentiary, Special Management Facility)

U.S. District Court
TELEPHONE

U.S. v. Montgomery, 675 F.Supp. 164 (S.D.N.Y. 1987), cert. denied, 109 S.Ct. 846. The interception and taping of a telephone call made by a pretrial detainee from a correctional center did not violate Title III or the Fourth Amendment. The detainee's use of the telephone after ample notice of the interception system amounted to implied consent to the monitoring under Title III. Moreover, the monitoring of the conversation was a reasonable seizure, given the ample notice to the detainee of the monitoring. Monitoring and taping of pretrial detainee's telephone conversations did not violate his Fifth Amendment right to be free of restrictions amounting to punishment. The detention center's taping and monitoring system was related to legitimate governmental objective of institutional security, and could not be regarded as punishment in violation of Fifth Amendment. (Metropolitan Correctional Center, New York)

1988

U.S. District Court
STAFFING
CROWDING

Albro v. Onondaga County, N.Y., 677 F.Supp. 697 (N.D.N.Y. 1988). The alleged offender is afforded protection by a due process clause instead of the Eighth Amendment, which prevents holding a detainee under conditions that would be equal to punishment. A violation of due process was found to exist when crowded conditions were found at a pretrial detention facility, causing many detainees to sleep on cots in the walkways and creating a hazard to both detainees and staff. There was no operational compensation for overcrowding conditions such as adequate exercise time, vocational training, or free time in the dayroom or other open space. Detainees frequently spent only a free hour on a walkway or in "passive" recreation and were confined to their cells at least 23 hours a day. The court found correctional staff insufficient to safely respond to duties. Further, the court also concluded that inmates "have ready access to weapons through the dismantling of their cots." The capacity of the facility was capped by the court. Daily fines were levied on the county as an appropriate remedy for continuing overcrowding at the detention facility. Whenever the inmate population exceeded its capacity for four days or more the county was ordered to pay $1,000 per day if the population reached 213-217, and up to $10,000 daily if the population goes over 247. Even though the plaintiffs had withdrawn the motion for contempt, the court kept the power to punish violations that may have occurred, or might occur in the future. (Public Safety Building)

State Appeals Court
CONTRABAND

Brooks v. State, 529 So.2d 313 (Fla.App. 1 Dist. 1988). The defendant was convicted in the circuit court of possession of contraband by a prisoner, and he appealed. The district court of appeal, affirming the decision, found that the defendant, an inmate at a correctional institution, could be convicted for possession of contraband by a prisoner, even though he was not on the grounds of the correctional institution at the time he was observed in possession of marijuana. The court stated that the offense was aimed at punishing an inmate for possession of contraband anywhere, and therefore the observation of this prisoner as possessing contraband while off the prison grounds was a violation. (State Correctional Institution, Florida)

U.S. Appeals Court
USE OF FORCE
VISITS
SEARCHES

Bruscino v. Carlson, 854 F.2d 162 (7th Cir. 1988), cert. denied, 109 S.Ct. 3193. In a class action suit brought against the Marion Penitentiary in Illinois by inmates held in the Control Unit, the inmates claimed use of excessive force and other charges because they were subjected to rectal searches every time they left or re-entered the unit. The appeals court ruled that because inmates in the Control Unit require greater supervision than other prisoners, rectal searches can be legally performed on such inmates. Use of physical restraints during attorney visitation and limited out-of-cell time was also upheld by the federal district court. The court found that extraordinary security measures employed in a maximum security federal prison, such as limitation of time spent outside cells, denial of opportunities for socialization, handcuffing, shackling, spread-eagling and rectal searches were reasonable measures in view of the history of violence at the prison and the incorrigible character of the inmates and thus it did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment. Further, the court found that the transfer of prisoners to a maximum security federal prison did not result in incremental deprivation so great as to constitute actionable deprivation of natural liberty and thus require a hearing. (The United States Penitentiary in Marion, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
RELIGIOUS SERVICES
RELIGIOUS GROUPS

Cooper v. Tard, 855 F.2d 125 (3rd Cir. 1988) A federal appeals court upheld the constitutionality of a prison rule that prohibited a group of Muslim inmates from having unsupervised group worship in the prison yard. The court affirmed that prohibiting group activity without supervision does not violate the free exercise rights of inmates in this instance. The court agreed that the Muslim's group prayer, known as Du'a, established a leadership structure within the prison, and authorities had valid rational reason for not permitting inmates to establish structure within the prison. (Trenton State Prison, New Jersey)

U.S. Appeals Court
PROTECTION
SEPARATION

Cortes-Quinones v. Jimenez-Nettleship, 842 F.2d 556 (1st Cir. 1988), cert. denied, 109 S.Ct. 68. The death of a psychiatrically disturbed prisoner whose body was dismembered a few months after his transfer to a district jail was caused by the "deliberate indifference" of prison officials to his health or safety problems, according to a federal appeals court. The court ruled found that information about the prisoner's psychiatric history was, or should have been, in his prison files, and that prison officials who approved of the transfer should have known of the inmate's psychological problem and that there was evidence that the inmate should never have been in the general prison population. According to the court, it was unlikely that the inmate would have been killed if any of the officials had acted to segregate him from mentally sound prisoners at the jail. According to the appeals court, when prison officials intentionally place prisoners in dangerous circumstances, when they intentionally ignore prisoners' serious medical needs, or when they are deliberately indifferent either to a prisoner's health or safety, they violate the constitution. (Arecibo District Jail)

U.S. Appeals Court
DISTURBANCE

Cowans v. Wyrick, 862 F.2d 697 (8th Cir. 1988). A prison inmate brought an action against a guard alleging that the guard had inflicted cruel and unusual punishment upon the inmate in violation of the inmate's eighth amendment rights. The federal district court entered judgment on the jury verdict finding in favor of the inmate. Additionally, because the jury did not access any damages, the court, sua sponte, awarded nominal damages of $1 to the inmate. The guard appealed, and the Appeals Court found that the jury instruction which allowed the jury to find for the inmate without finding that the inmate had suffered any pain, misery, anguish, or similar harm, whether capable of estimation or not, was a reversible error. As a result, the case was reversed and remanded for a new trial. According to the court, the jury is required to award nominal damages to a prisoner bringing a civil rights suit once the jury finds cruel and unusual punishment has occurred if the jury has not been able to convert into dollars the injury and pain that the prisoner has suffered. However, if the jury finds that the prisoner has suffered no pain of any kind, then the question of damages, nominal or otherwise, does not arise. A claim of cruel and unusual punishment has not been established without a showing of some measure of pain. The court noted that reasonable measures undertaken to resolve a disturbance at a prison when the disturbance indisputably poses significant risks to the safety of inmates and prison staff do not rise to the level of cruel and unusual punishment. (Missouri State Penitentiary)

U.S. Appeals Court
GANGS

David K. v. Lane, 839 F.2d 1265 (7th Cir. 1988). White inmates at Illinois' Pontiac Correctional Center sued officials on the grounds that their failure to aggressively halt gang influence violated their right to equal protection. Inmates in protective custody are confined more hours each day and have less job opportunities. While 2 percent of the total inmate population is white, 40 percent of the white population is in protective custody compared to 9 percent of the black population and 13 percent of the hispanic population. The plaintiffs alleged that the proportion of white inmates in protective custody stems from officials' failure to discipline non-violent displays of gang membership. But the appeals court ruled that, even though a policy of punishing gang "activity," but not displays of "gang membership" results in an inordinately high number of white inmates needing protective custody, prison officials aren't guilty of discrimination. In ruling against the white inmates, the court found that they had presented no evidence that "a racially-based discriminatory purpose...has shaped the Pontiac administration's gang activity policy." However, even while finding that prison officials were not guilty of unlawful discrimination, the court criticized their policy suggesting that display of gang insignia or letting inmates control prison job assignments should not be permitted. The court ruled the prison officials to "take a firmer control and seek to ultimately eliminate gang affiliation by such reasonable methods as it may develop." The court also rejected the inmates' claim that Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 was violated. Title VI, 42 U.S.C. Sec. 2000d, prohibits discrimination in the use of federal funds. While the prison receives federal funds for forecasting models, there was no evidence that these funds directly benefited or related to the implementation of gang regulations and protective custody procedures. [Subsequent federal legislation may alter future courts' analysis of similar situations.] (Illinois' Pontiac Correctional Center)

U.S. Appeals Court
CLASSIFICATION
PROTECTION

Gardner v. Cato, 841 F.2d 105 (5th Cir. 1988). An inmate filed a civil rights lawsuit against the county jail and its personnel, after he had without notice or warning, gotten a dark liquid thrown in his face by his mentally unstable cellmate. The court found that placement of the prisoner in a cell with a mentally unstable inmate who had access to cleaning chemicals at best raised an issue of negligence by the defendants, a claim not seen as a violation of the Fourteenth Amendment in a civil rights action. Because he was given extensive medical treatment, the court found that it was "frivolous" to claim that the defendants displayed a deliberate indifference or disregard for the inmate's medical needs. (Guadalupe County Jail)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEPARATION
PROTECTION

Glick v. Henderson, 855 F.2d 536 (8th Cir. 1988). A civil rights suit was dismissed by a federal trial court alleging failure and refusal of various prison officials to protect inmates from exposure to AIDS, and the dismissal was upheld by the appeals court. The plaintiffs in this case claimed that at least five inmates in the facility have tested positive for the virus which causes AIDS. The inmates also argued that the prison neither tested inmates and personnel for exposure to the AIDS virus nor segregated all those who did test positive. The inmates felt that the combination of these factors, along with the existence of practicing homosexuals within the facility, placed them in immediate danger of contracting AIDS because of the daily interactions which take place among inmates and jail officials. Medical authorities testified that the inmates' complaint was based on "unsubstantiated fears and ignorance," which included allegations that they face a risk of contracting AIDS by: (1) coming into contact with the sweat of other inmates during work detail; (2) being subjected to bites from mosquitoes which have bitten other inmates; (3) being sneezed on by known homosexuals; (4) having food prepared by officials who are not tested for AIDS; and/or (5) the regular transfer of prisoners from cell to cell throughout the facility. The court found that these means are too remote to provide the proper basis for a grievance. These, along with other significant risks, which are not comprehended by medical science as creating a genuine concern for transmission of AIDS, were insufficient to entail court intervention. (Arkansas Department of Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
RELIGIOUS SERVICES
SAFETY REGULATIONS
SECURITY RESTRICTIONS

Mumin v. Phelps, 857 F.2d 1055 (5th Cir. 1988). Islamic prisoners at a state penitentiary brought an action challenging the refusal of prison officials to transport them from outcamps where they are held to the main prison facility for weekly congregational services. The U.S. District Court denied relief, and the inmates appealed. The appeals court affirmed and found that the refusal of the prison officials to transport the Muslim inmates from outcamps of the prison to the main prison facility for weekly congregational services required by the Islamic creed was a permissible limitation on the prisoners' exercise of their right to freedom of religion. The penitentiary asserted that it was without sufficient financial resources or adequate numbers of security personnel to safely transport the inmates for weekly services, the government objective was content neutral, and there was no showing of alternatives. The alleged peaceful and nonviolent characteristics of Muslim inmates did not preclude a finding that prison security was a legitimate concern for officials in denying the request of the Muslim inmates held at outcamps to be transported to the main prison for weekly religious services. (State Penitentiary, Angola, Louisiana)

U.S. Appeals Court
HAIR LENGTH

Pollock v. Marshall, 845 F.2d 656 (6th Cir. 1988), cert. denied, 109 S.Ct. 239, reh'g. denied, 109 S.Ct. 545. An inmate at a maximum security facility filed a civil rights action against the prison officials after being required to cut his hair. The inmate professed a belief in Lakota American Indians who believe hair is sacred and should not be cut. The court found the inmate's religious beliefs to be sincere, but they also found prison authorities had interests which were both legitimate and reasonably related to security and sanitation in limiting the length of prisoner's hair. (Southern Ohio Correctional Facility)

U.S. District Court
PROTECTION
SAFETY REGULATIONS
SECURITY PRACTICES
STAFFING

Thomas v. Benton County, Ark., 702 F.Supp. 737 (W.D. Ark. 1988). The parents of an arrestee who committed suicide in a county jail brought a civil rights action against the county. On June 22, 1983, the plaintiffs' decedent, their son, was incarcerated in the Benton County, Arkansas, jail. Late on the evening of that day he tore strips from his bedding and fashioned a "rope". He hung himself from a light fixture in his cell, also occupied at the time by two other inmates. These two individuals declined to come to his aid, because, as expressed by them at the trial, they did not want to become involved and perhaps be charged with a "murder rap." Instead of doing the obviously humanitarian thing of coming to his aid, they claimed that they began to bang on the cell bars and yell at the jailers that Thomas had hung himself. Although there was a dispute in the evidence about how long it took the jailers to respond, it is clear that several minutes elapsed before a jailor came to the scene. Upon arriving at the scene, the jailor saw Thomas hanging from the fixture but did not enter the cell to aid him because of a jail rule that prohibited jailers from entering occupied cells on felony row unless at least two jailers were present. The night of this occurrence, only two jailers, a male and female, were on duty. The female jailer also served in the capacity of despatcher, and another rule prohibited her from leaving the radio. The plaintiffs, his parents and personal representatives, claim that the existence of harmful conditions and practices and the lack of appropriate procedures in the operation of the Benton County Jail denied the decedent his constitutional right of due process. They sought damages from the defendant, Benton County, Arkansas, for pain and suffering, mental anguish, and the loss of their son's companionship. After a verdict was entered against the parents, the parents moved for a new trial. The district court, denying the motion, found that the jury finding that the county did not violate the civil rights of the arrestee and did not treat him with deliberate indifference was not against clear weight of evidence. (Benton County Jail, Arkansas)

U.S. Appeals Court
DISTURBANCE

Unwin v. Campbell, 863 F.2d 124 (1st Cir. 1988). A prison inmate sued state and local police officers seeking damages for injuries sustained during the quelling of a disturbance. Defendants moved for summary judgment on the grounds of qualified immunity. The U.S. District Court denied the motion as to certain defendants, and they appealed. The appeals court reversing in part and affirming in part, found that two of the defendants were entitled to qualified immunity, absent evidence that they had any contact with the defendant; but there were issues of fact, precluding summary judgment in favor of the remaining defendants, as to the magnitude of the disturbance in question.

Allegations of the complaint concerning the attempt to subdue a boisterous inmate did not support the inference of a prison disturbance of such magnitude that it indisputably posed significant risks to the safety of the inmates and prison staff, and thus to state an eighth amendment claim. An inmate not involved in the struggle, who was injured by police action, did not have to allege that the defendant policemen and state troopers acted maliciously and sadistically for the very purpose of causing harm. Allegations of the complaint to the effect that one or more of the state troopers or police officers seriously injured the prison inmate when they unjustifiably struck him several times while he was innocently standing in the dayroom observing an isolated struggle between two inmates, if true, would tend to show that the officers violated clearly established law and thus were not entitled to qualified immunity. When prison officials are responding to an outbreak of violence, they cannot be expected to measure nicely the precise amount of force necessary to restore order. Where the institutional security is not at stake, the officials' license to use force is more limited, and to establish an eighth amendment liability, an injured inmate need not prove malicious and sadistic intent, and liability will be imposed where the officials' actions involved wanton and unnecessary infliction of pain as determined by the need for the application of force, the relationship between the need and the amount of force used, and the extent of the injury inflicted. (Merrimack County House of Correction, Boscawen, New Hampshire)

1989

U.S. District Court
SECURITY PRACTICES
VISITS

Berrios-Berrios v. Thornburg, 716 F.Supp. 987 (E.D. Ky. 1989). A lawsuit was filed by a female inmate to challenge the refusal of prison officials to permit her to breast-feed her child. She moved for a preliminary injunction allowing her to breast-feed her child during normal visitation hours, to store breast milk in a refrigerator, and to compel the defendants to make arrangements for the delivery of the breast milk to the child's caretaker. The court found that the need for immediate resolution of the inmate's request to be allowed to breast-feed her child during normal visitation hours and to store the breast milk negated requirements to exhaust administrative remedies, and that the inmate was entitled to a preliminary injunction allowing her to breast-feed her child during regular visitation periods. A substantial threat existed that the absence of an injunction would irreparably injure the inmate's ability to breast-feed her child and the inmate and her child would unnecessarily be deprived of the beneficial effects of breast-feeding; the defendants failed to allege any harm. However, the court ruled that the inmate's interest in breast-feeding her child with milk stored in a refrigerator was outweighed by the government's compelling interest arising out of the need for security checks, the desire to avoid negligence claims, and the cost and burden of providing the refrigerators and a system for the storage and delivery of the milk to caretakers. (Federal Correctional Institution, Lexington, Kentucky)

U.S. Appeals Court
CLOTHING
DISTURBANCE
"LOCK-IN"
USE OF FORCE

Campbell v. Grammer, 889 F.2d 797 (8th Cir. 1989). Inmates brought an action against prison officials alleging that their constitutional and statutory rights were violated during a prison lockdown. The U.S. District Court entered a judgment in favor of the inmates and awarded attorneys' fees; the defendants appealed. The court of appeals found that the supervising lieutenant's failure to issue jumpsuits pursuant to his superiors' order after a shakedown did not rise to the level of cruel and unusual punishment. The lieutenant had been assigned to supervise the adjustment center for the first time on the day of the lockdown and thus, the failure to carry out his superiors' orders was due to misunderstanding, inexperience, oversight, inadvertence or recklessness.

Courts should ordinarily accord actions of prison officials much deference; courts should be especially reluctant to interpose their hindsight when challenged conduct occurred during a prison disturbance. When faced with the necessity of using force to quell a disturbance, prison officials are compelled to balance competing concerns of insuring safety of inmates and staff and of using the least confining or least dangerous measure to control those who threaten the safety of others. Given the fact that such decisions are necessarily made in haste and under pressure, measures taken will not be held to be an eighth amendment violation if imposed in a good faith effort to maintain or restore discipline and not maliciously and sadistically for the very purpose of causing harm. The court found however, that the inmates had been intentionally, rather than accidentally, sprayed with the high-powered firehoses, which resulted in an eighth amendment violation. As a result, they upheld awards to the inmates of $750, $100 and $50. (Nebraska State Penitentiary)

U.S. District Court
PROTECTION

C.H. v. Sullivan, 718 F.Supp. 726 (D. Minn. 1989). Prisoners who were serving sentences under a federal witness security program brought action against the Attorney General and his agents, challenging double celling. The district court found that double celling was not cruel and unusual punishment despite the concern that double celling might result in the discovery of their identities by other inmates and threaten their security. The court also found that the use of a seniority system to determine which prisoners were double celled did not violate due process. Depriving prisoners serving sentences under a federal witness security program of seniority, and with it a single cell, for the violation of prison regulations did not so infringe upon the prisoners' safety as to constitute a violation of the fifth amendment. The seniority method was reasonably related to valid prison objectives of discipline and relief of overcrowding. The prisoners being disciplined were advised of charges and the facts supporting the charges and they were given a reasonable opportunity to call witnesses and present documentary evidence in their defense and an investigation was conducted to ensure that incompatible prisoners were not housed together. The court is permitted to look at the challenged conditions of confinement alone or in combination to determine whether an eighth amendment violation has occurred; a particular prison policy may not directly be a violation, but may lead to conditions which do constitute punishment without a penological purpose. (Federal Correctional Institution, Sandstone, Minnesota)

U.S. Appeals Court
STAFFING
ESCAPE

de Jesus Benavides v. Santos, 883 F.2d 385 (5th Cir. 1989). Jail detention officers who were injured during the course of an attempted escape by jail inmates filed a federal civil rights action against the jail officials. The officers were unarmed and on duty when they were attacked. They claimed that the sheriff was aware of a persistent pattern of contraband smuggling in the jail, that the Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) had specifically warned the sheriff that a jailbreak was "imminent," and that the sheriff acted "callously and in utter disregard" for institutional security in failing to respond to these problems. They also complained that the commissioners and the judge had failed to provide sufficient funds to the jail to ensure its safe operation. The U.S. District Court dismissed the suit, and the plaintiffs appealed. The appeals court found that the local jail detention officers who were injured by jail inmates that were attempting to escape did not have a Section 1983 action against the government officials in charge of the jail for reckless or grossly negligent failure to prevent, adequately guard against, or protect those injured from an attempted escape and accompanying inmate violence, stating, "The issue presented is whether those who, in the course of their duties as local jail detention officers, are injured by jail inmates attempting to escape, have a second 1983 claim against the government officials in charge of the jail where the injury would not have occurred but for those officials' callous indifference or grossly negligent failure to prevent, or to adequately guard against, or to protect those injured from, the attempted escape and accompanying inmate violence." The claim fell squarely within traditional state tort law and did not give a rise to a constitutional claim. (Webb County Jail, Texas)

U.S. Appeals Court
FACIAL HAIR

Fromer v. Scully, 874 F.2d 69 (2nd Cir. 1989). An Orthodox Jewish inmate brought action for declaratory relief challenging a prison beard length regulation. The U.S. District Court found in favor of the inmate, and appeal was taken. The appeals court affirmed and certiorari was granted. The Supreme Court vacated and remanded. The court of appeals remanded without opinion. The U.S. District Court found that the regulation violated the free exercise clause, and appeal was taken. The appeals court, in reversing the original decision, found that a regulation forbidding inmates from wearing beards in excess of one inch in length did not violate the free exercise rights of an Orthodox Jew. According to the court, the Orthodox Jewish inmate who challenged the beard length regulation had the burden to demonstrate that correctional concerns were irrational. The Department of Correctional Services did not have to demonstrate a logical connection between the one-inch beard limitation and the interest of prison officials in identifying inmates for regulation to survive the inmate's free exercise challenge. A rational connection existed between the regulation limiting the inmates' beards to one inch in length and the ease of identification of the inmates' facial features and, thus, the beard length regulation did not violate a free exercise clause. The prison officials' concerns with being able to identify inmates' facial features did not require officials to choose between a regulation forbidding all beards or a rule permitting all beards. The regulation prohibiting beards in excess of one inch in length was a reasonable compromise for purposes of the free exercise clause. According to the appeals court, the district court failed to show proper deference to judgment of prison officials when the court found that the state regulation forbidding inmates from wearing beards more than one inch long violated the free exercise rights of Orthodox Jews; the district court's belief that there were few Orthodox Jews in prison, unsupported by record evidence, impermissibly placed the burden on prison officials. (New York State Prison)

U.S. Appeals Court
RELIGION

Garza v. Carlson, 877 F.2d 14 (8th Cir. 1989). A Jewish inmate brought a civil rights action against prison officials. The U.S. District Court denied relief and the inmate appealed. The appeals court found that the prison policy prohibiting an inmate from worship in a minyan while he was in administrative segregation was reasonably related to an institutional security concern, and the Jewish inmate's rights were not violated by the threat of receiving involuntary nourishment while he was engaged in a religious fast. The preservation of the prisoner's health is a legitimate objective, and prison officials may take reasonable steps to accomplish that goal. (United States Medical Center for Federal Prisoners, Springfield, Missouri)

U.S. Appeals Court
MAIL
PUBLICATIONS

Harper v. Wallingford, 877 F.2d 728 (9th Cir. 1989). An inmate brought a Section 1983 suit alleging that prison authorities had violated his first amendment rights by withholding mail. The U.S. District Court awarded summary judgment in favor of the defendants, and the inmate appealed. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that the inmate's first amendment rights were not violated when mail from an organization espousing consensual sexual relationships between adult males and juvenile males was withheld from him. Factors to be considered in determining the reasonableness of a challenged prison regulation include: whether the regulation has a logical connection to legitimate government interests invoked to justify it; whether alternative means of exercising the right on which the regulation impinges remain open to prison inmates; the impact that that accommodation of an asserted right will have on guards, other inmates, and prison resources; and the absence of ready alternatives that fully accommodate the prisoner's rights at de minimis cost to valid penological interests. The mail in question was from the North American Man/Boy Love Association ("NAMBLA") and consisted of a membership application and a copy of the organization's bulletin. The prison mail room employees refused to deliver the material to the plaintiff and notified the plaintiff of their intentions. Prison officials refused to deliver the materials to the plaintiff because they felt the material threatened prison security and therefore violated the Washington State Department of Corrections Policy Directive 450.020(6)(c). The plaintiff unsuccessfully appealed the decision through the prison grievance system. (Washington State Penitentiary)

U.S. Appeals Court
ESCAPE

Henry v. Perry, 866 F.2d 657 (3rd Cir. 1989). A prisoner brought a civil rights action against a prison guard arising out of the prison guard's use of deadly force in attempting to prevent the prisoner's escape. In his complaint, the plaintiff alleged that, while being returned to Pittsburgh from a track meet and upon arrival at Pittsburgh and believing the officers in charge of him including the defendant to be unarmed, he proceeded to effect an escape and that thereupon "Mr. Perry commenced to fire 5 or 6 shots at me without ordering me to stop or that he had a weapon and would shoot to kill." One of the shots wounded the plaintiff in the arm. He completed his escape but was subsequently recaptured. The U.S. District Court denied the prison guard's motion for summary judgment and the prison guard appealed. The court of appeals, reversing and remanding with directions, found that the prison guard was entitled to qualified immunity from liability. The appeals court stated that the use by prison guards of deadly force on an escapee may be cruel and unusual punishment within the meaning of the eighth amendment but where the escapee has committed crime involving the infliction of serious bodily harm, deadly force may be used as necessary to prevent an escape and if, where feasible, some warning has been given.

Using deadly force appeared to be the "only means of preventing his escape and even that did not actually do so." Where an escapee has committed a crime involving the infliction of serious bodily harm, the court stated, citing Tennessee v. Garner, 471 U.S.1 (1985), such as the murder committed by the prisoner, deadly force may be used if necessary to prevent escape, and if, where feasible, some warning if given. (State Correctional Institution, Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania)

U.S. Appeals Court
RELIGIOUS ARTICLES
RELIGION
SATANISM

McCorkle v. Johnson, 881 F.2d 993 (11th Cir. 1989). A state inmate brought a civil rights action challenging a prison policy that restricted inmate access to satanic materials. The U.S. District Court dismissed and the inmate appealed. The appeals court, affirming the lower court decision, found that the policy did not violate the inmate's first amendment rights. Even if Satanism was a religion entitled to first amendment protection and even if the state inmate was a sincere believer in Satanism, a prison policy restricting the access to satanic materials was justified by the prison officials' concern for institutional security and order, particularly in view of the fact that the inmate could practice Satanism without materials. The court found that the policy adopted was valid as reasonably related to a legitimate penological interest in institutional security and order and was an "informed and measured response to the violence inherent in Satan worship, and to the potential disorder that it might cause within the prison." (Holman Facility, Alabama)

U.S. District Court
PROTECTION
SECURITY
PRACTICES

Policano v. Koehler, 715 F.Supp. 598 (S.D.N.Y. 1989). An inmate claimed that another prisoner stole his cosmetics and, later on the same day, together with other prisoners, assaulted and robbed him of his watch and gold chain. Both incidents were perpetrated by inmates from another housing area who were not supposed to be in his housing area, according to prison regulations. The inmate sued prison officials, claiming that the incidents resulted from their negligence because the corrections officer on duty was reading a newspaper at the time the alleged acts occurred. The court dismissed the inmate's federal civil rights lawsuit, finding that mere negligent failure to provide adequate security does not state a claim for violation of constitutional rights. (Rikers Island House of Detention for Men, New York)

U.S. District Court
RELIGIOUS SERVICES

Ra Chaka v. Franzen, 727 F.Supp. 454 (N.D. Ill. 1989). A Muslim prison inmate sued state corrections department officials, alleging violations of civil rights when his request for prison-wide "Jumha" religious services was denied. In order to improve security, the prison had divided inmates into three units, based on personality types, and prison-wide services would have involved an undesirable mixing of personnel from different units, and services were available within units. The district court found that the granting of permission to hold such services did not render the prisoner's case moot as he also claimed monetary damages for past deprivation. State officials were not protected from individual liability by the eleventh amendment. A prohibition against services was warranted on prison security grounds; even if deprivation were deemed not valid, officials would not be personally liable and the equal protection rights of the inmate were not violated when they allegedly did not receive a proportionate share of the prison budget for their religious activities. The prison was merely required to provide a "reasonable opportunity" for them to practice their religion. (Stateville Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
ESCAPE

Robinson v. Estate of Williams, 721 F.Supp. 806 (S.D.Miss. 1989). The wife of a man who was killed by two escaped jail prisoners sued the county sheriff, alleging that it was negligence on his part or on the part of his agents, servants or employees that allowed them to escape, that security at the jail was dangerously inadequate and that it was negligent to fail to properly inform the public of the escape. The court noted that the sheriff in Mississippi is charged with the duty to safely keep his prisoners in the jail and to seek to prevent escape. However, as these duties are owed to the general public, rather than to any individual person, the court found that there could be no liability in the absence of a "special relationship" with the deceased man. The sheriff owed no duty of care to the deceased man or his spouse. (Clarke County Jail, Mississippi)

U.S. District Court
CLASSIFICATION
CROWDING
PRETRIAL DETAINEES
STAFFING

Ryan v. Burlington County, N.J., 708 F.Supp. 623 (D. N.J. 1989). A pretrial detainee who was rendered quadriplegic as a result of an attack by a county jail inmate brought a civil rights action against the county board of chosen freeholders, and various jail personnel. On the defendants' motion for summary judgment, the district court granted the motion in part and denied the motion in part. It found that the warden and the jail captain who advised and assisted the warden were not entitled to qualified immunity, but the corrections officers were entitled to qualified immunity. Members of the county board of chosen freeholders were not entitled to absolute legislative immunity because the board knew that the county jail was overcrowded, and the board also was aware that no inmate classification system separating known dangerous inmates from others was in place at the jail. Moreover, the board could not reasonably have believed that its refusal to supply the county jail with additional security personnel was lawful.

The warden of the county jail was not entitled to qualified immunity from the pretrial detainee's civil rights claim, insofar as it was based on overcrowding. The jury could conclude that the warden neglected to attempt available solutions to overcrowding at the jail. The court also stated that the warden and the jail captain who advised and assisted the warden in setting procedures governing daily administration were not entitled to qualified immunity from the pretrial detainee's civil rights claim arising from the inmate assault, insofar as it was based on the failure to institute a classification system separating pretrial detainees from dangerous inmates. Neither official took any action whatsoever in an attempt to establish such a system of classification. Sergeants in the county jail were entitled to qualified immunity, insofar as it was based on overcrowding and the failure to institute a classification system separating pretrial detainees from dangerous inmates, in view of their lack of authority to remedy overcrowding or to institute a classification system. (Burlington County Jail, New Jersey)

U.S. District Court
ESCAPE
USE OF FORCE

Ryan Robles v. Otero de Ramos, 729 F.Supp. 920 (D.Puerto Rico 1989). An inmate's father brought a Section 1983 action against a prison guard, administrator, and supervisors to recover for the shooting death of an escaping inmate. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion and found that using deadly force against a convicted, escaping inmate was not an unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain, did not violate the eighth amendment, and was within the guard's qualified immunity from Section 1983 liability. The guard tried to physically prevent the escape, and was prevented from doing so by the inmate's spear. He warned the inmate to desist, fired a warning shot, and fired the revolver after the inmate had jumped to the street outside the prison and started to run. The inmate's father failed to establish in the Section 1983 action that the training of guards and the use of firearms caused the death of the escaping inmate, that the policy on the use of deadly force deprived the inmate of constitutional rights, or that the administrator and supervisors were grossly negligent or deliberately indifferent. (Young Adults Institution, Miramar, Puerto Rico)

U.S. Appeals Court
ACCESS TO ATTORNEY
FACIAL HAIR
SAFETY REGULATIONS
SECURITY RESTRICTIONS

Solomon v. Zant, 888 F.2d 1579 (11th Cir. 1989). The widow of an inmate brought a civil rights action against a prison official who refused to permit the inmate to leave the death row cell block to see his attorney without first complying with shaving regulations. The U.S. District Court entered a judgment in favor of the widow, and the official appealed. The appeals court, reversing the lower court's decision, found that the shaving regulation was a legitimate security rule, and the enforcement of the rule did not violate the inmate's constitutional rights. The prison policy which prohibited any death sentenced inmate from leaving the cell block unless all shaving requirements were complied with was reasonably related to the government's legitimate interest in maintaining security in the penological institutions. Had the institution sought to impose some additional punishment, then it would have been necessary for him to be afforded a proper disciplinary hearing. However, refusing to allow him to leave the cellblock was simply part of the regulation. "After finding that institutions can require that inmates be clean shaven, it is reasonable to conclude that compliance with the policy will not result in a constitutional violation," said the court. (Federal Correctional Institution, Jackson, Georgia)

U.S. Supreme Court
PUBLICATIONS

Thornburgh v. Abbott, 109 S.Ct. 1874 (1989). Action was brought challenging the regulations governing the receipt of subscription publications by federal prison inmates. The Federal Bureau of Prisons regulations generally permit prisoners to receive publications from the "outside," but authorize wardens, pursuant to specified criteria, to reject an incoming publication if it is found "to be detrimental to the security, good order, or discipline of the institution or if it might facilitate criminal activity." Wardens may not reject a publication "solely because its content is religious, philosophical, political, social[,] sexual, or ... unpopular or repugnant," or establish an excluded list of publications, but must review each issue of a subscription separately. Respondents, a class of inmates and certain publishers, filed a suit in the district court, claiming that the regulations, both on their face and as applied to 46 specifically excluded publications, violated their first amendment rights under the standard set forth in Procunier v. Martinez, 416 U.S. 396, 94 S.Ct. 1800, 40 L.Ed.2d 224. The district court refrained from adopting the Martinez standard in favor of an approach more deferential to the judgment of prison authorities, and upheld the regulations without addressing the propriety of the 46 exclusions. The appeals court, however, utilized the Martinez standard, found the regulations wanting, and remanded the case for an individualized determination on the constitutionality of the 46 exclusions. The U.S. District Court upheld the regulations. The appeals court reversed. The Supreme Court, vacating and remanding, found that the proper inquiry was whether the regulations were reasonably related to legitimate penological interests, and the regulations were facially valid. According to the Court, regulations such as those at issue that affect the sending of publications to prisoners must be analyzed under the standard set forth in Turner v. Safley, 482 U.S. 78, 89, 107 S.Ct. 2254, 2262, 96 L.Ed.2d 64, and are therefore "valid if [they are] reasonably related to legitimate penological interests." It was found that the regulations at issue are facially valid under the Turner standard. (Federal Bureau of Prisons, District of Columbia)

1990

U.S. Appeals Court
ESCAPE

Baker v. Lyles, 904 F.2d 925 (4th Cir. 1990). An inmate brought a civil rights action against a warden and other corrections officials, claiming his due process rights were violated following a disciplinary proceeding which resulted in the inmate being convicted of possessing escape contraband and of associating with other inmates in an escape attempt. The U.S. District Court entered summary judgment in favor of the defendants and the inmate appealed. The appeals court found that the inmate's due process rights were not violated when the disciplinary board convicted him of possession of escape contraband based upon undocumented hearsay of an anonymous informant, under the applicable "some evidence" standard, in view of further evidence available at the time of the final decision by the warden that the inmate had previously escaped from prison, that abundant work had been done to attain escape through an exhaust fan in the prison's chapel, and that escape tools had been redeemed in prison. (Maryland Penitentiary)

U.S. Appeals Court
PROTECTION

Berry v. City of Muskogee, 900 F.2d 1489 (10th Cir. 1990). The widow of an inmate who was killed by fellow inmates brought a civil rights action against the city. In vacating and remanding the district court's decision, the appeals court stated that eighth amendment standards, rather than due process standards that are applicable to pretrial detainees, apply to incarcerated persons whose guilt has been adjudicated formally but who await sentencing. The safety and bodily integrity of a convicted prisoner implicates both the eighth amendment's prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment and the fourteenth amendment's substantive protection against state deprivation of life and liberty without due process of law. The city cannot absolutely guarantee the safety of its jailed prisoners, but it has a constitutional duty to take reasonable steps to protect the prisoners' safety and bodily integrity. A municipality is liable under Section 1983 if there is a direct causal connection between the municipality policies in question and the constitutional deprivation. (Muskogee City-Federal Jail, Oklahoma)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEARCHES
SECURITY
PRACTICES

Colon v. Schneider, 899 F.2d 660 (7th Cir. 1990). An inmate brought a Section 1983 action, alleging that a corrections official violated his rights under the due process clause of the fourteenth amendment when the official used chemical mace to compel him to submit to a strip search during the course of the inmate's transfer from one area of a correctional institution to another. The U.S. District Court issued an injunction prohibiting the official from using mace solely to compel strip searches incident to the transfer of inmates within the institution, and the official appealed. The inmate cross-appealed, arguing that he was entitled to one dollar in compensatory damages and that the district court erred in vacating the jury's award of punitive damages. The appeals court found that Wisconsin regulations governing the use of mace in prisons do not create a federally-protected liberty interest on behalf of inmates, and even if such regulations did create a liberty interest, the inmate failed to satisfy his burden that he was maced in the absence of constitutionally required procedural safeguards. The appeals court also found that, under the eleventh amendment, the district court lacked jurisdiction to adjudicate the claim which was nothing more than an allegation that the prison official violated state law, or to enjoin the official from engaging in the allegedly violative conduct. According to the court, in order for state regulations to create a constitutionally and protected liberty interest, the regulations must employ language of an unmistakably mandatory character, requiring that certain procedures "shall," "will," or "must" be employed, and that the challenged action will not occur absent specific substantive predicates. (Columbia Correctional Institution, Wisconsin)

U.S. Appeals Court
FACIAL HAIR
HAIR LENGTH

Dunavant v. Moore, 907 F.2d 77 (8th Cir. 1990). A prisoner brought a civil rights action claiming that a prison grooming policy violated his first amendment rights. Summary judgment for the defendants was granted by the U.S. District Court and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed the decision, finding that the prison grooming policy prohibiting inmate beards longer than two inches was based on legitimate penological objectives related to security because a long beard could make identification more difficult and help the prisoners hide contraband. The rule did not violate the free exercise rights of the inmate who was a member of the Church of Jesus Christ Christian/Aryan Nation and who believed, based on religious grounds, that he should not shave, cut or round the corners of his beard. (Farmington Correctional Center, Missouri)

U.S. Appeals Court
FACIAL HAIR

Friedman v. State of Arizona, 912 F.2d 328 (9th Cir. 1990), cert. denied, 111 S.Ct. 996. Two orthodox Jewish inmates filed a federal civil rights lawsuit against a state prison challenging a policy prohibiting beards, arguing it violated their First Amendment right to exercise their religion freely. The U.S. Court of Appeals upheld the prison policy against the inmate's challenge. It found that the prison had presented evidence that the policy was rationally related to legitimate security interests, including orderly conduct of day-to-day activities, identification of prisoners responsible for disturbances and apprehension of escapees by aiding rapid and accurate identification. In addition, allowing someone to have a beard was not a guarantee that the person would "maintain the beard in exactly the same style, length or color as he had in the photograph," and the identification problem thus becomes unmanageable. The court noted that the prison allowed the inmates participation in other religious activities and practices, provided Kosher food and access to a rabbi. (Arizona State Prison)

U.S. Appeals Court
SAFETY
SECURITY
RESTRICTIONS

Hatch v. Sharp, 919 F.2d 1266 (7th Cir. 1990), cert. denied, 111 S.Ct. 1693. An inmate who was denied permission to play the state lottery brought a Section 1983 action alleging violations of due process and equal protection rights. The U.S. District Court entered judgment in favor of the lottery and prison officials, and appeal was taken. The court of appeals found that the inmate's due process rights were not violated by the prohibition against playing the lottery. Prison officials were entitled to draw a line at what personal property inmates could possess or in what financial transactions they could engage in order to further legitimate security and safety concerns. (Nottoway Corr. Center, Virginia)

U.S. District Court
CLASSIFICATION
ESCAPE

Siddiqi v. Lane, 748 F.Supp. 637 (N.D. Ill. 1990). An inmate brought a Section 1983 action alleging a violation of equal protection. On the defendants' motion to dismiss, the district court found that the inmate, who attempted an escape, was not denied equal protection by his subsequent security classification as a high escape risk, absent a showing of intentional or purposeful discrimination in his security classification. (Illinois State Prison System)

U.S. Appeals Court
HAIR LENGTH
FACIAL HAIR

Swift v. Lewis, 901 F.2d 730 (9th Cir. 1990). Inmates appealed from a judgment of the U.S. District Court which dismissed a civil rights action challenging a grooming policy. The appeals court, reversing and remanding, found that the Department of Corrections did not show that particular interests behind the grooming policy justified treating the plaintiff inmates differently than members of other religious groups, and the complaint stated a cause of action for damages against another inmate who had allegedly excluded one of the plaintiff inmates from a religious group. Two prisoners claimed to be Christians who as part of their religion adhere to the "Vow of the Nazarite," which prohibits, among other things, one's cutting his hair and beard. They argued that the officials had discriminated against their religion by exempting certain religious groups, such as Sikhs and American Indians, from the policy, but not exempting them. The appeals court found that the state Department of Corrections did not show that the grooming policies were actually based on the need for quick inmate identification, the prevention of sanitary problems, reducing contact between prisoners and guards during body searches, and reducing homosexual attractiveness of inmates or that any of those interests justified treating one group of inmates who claimed a religious belief precluding them from cutting their hair differently than other religious groups who made such a claim and were not subjected to the grooming policy prohibition of long hair and beards. Prison officials are not required to prove that their policy is the least restrictive method of furthering relevant penological interests, even when it infringes on an inmate's practice of religion, but they must at least produce some evidence that their policy is based on legitimate penological justifications. (Arizona State Prison)

U.S. District Court
CONTRABAND
SEARCHES

U.S. v. Oakley, 731 F.Supp. 1363 (S.D.Ind. 1990). A prisoner moved to suppress a controlled substance contained in balloons recovered by a digital rectal examination and by the administration of laxatives. The district court found that the physician's digital probe of the prisoner's rectum to remove balloons containing a controlled substance could be performed without a warrant and complied with the fourth amendment, even though the prisoner claimed that he suffered from internal hemorrhoids, and even though the search was performed on a bed in a dry cell. An x-ray indicated what appeared to be four or five balloons in the lower abdomen. The balloons had been in the prisoner's digestive tract for over three weeks and contained a lethal dosage of dilaudid; and the fecal impaction posed an additional health risk. The physician removed two balloons in the search. (United States Penitentiary, Terre Haute, Indiana)

U.S. Appeals Court
PRETRIAL DETAINEE
USE OF FORCE
CLASSIFICATION

White v. Roper, 901 F.2d 1501 (9th Cir. 1990). A pretrial detainee filed a civil rights action against a jail sergeant and deputies for deliberate indifference to his personal safety and excessive use of force. The U.S. District Court granted summary judgment for the defendants, and the detainee appealed. The appeals court, affirming in part, reversing in part, and remanding, found that genuine issues of material fact existed on the deliberate indifference claim, but the detainee who alleged he suffered a cut wrist and bruises when the officers attempted to subdue him when he resisted being put into another inmate's cell failed to make a showing sufficient to establish use of force against him was excessive or brutal. Genuine issues of material fact existed as to whether an officer was deliberately indifferent to a pretrial detainee's personal safety or intended to punish the pretrial detainee by ordering him in a cell of another detainee who had a history of violent behavior, in spite of the plaintiff inmate's protests and threats by other inmate. (San Francisco County Jail, California)

U.S. District Court
ESCAPE
USE OF FORCE

Wright v. Whiddon, 747 F.Supp. 694 (M.D. Ga. 1990) reversed 951 F.2d 297. A civil rights action was brought to recover damages for the wrongful death of and deprivation of the constitutional rights of a pretrial detainee, who was fatally shot while attempting to escape, against a city police officer, a city police chief, the city, and the county sheriff. On the defendants' motions for summary judgment, the district court found that the Fourth Amendment, rather than the Eighth Amendment, provided the standard for analyzing a claim that the pretrial detainee who was fatally shot while attempting to escape was subjected to unconstitutional use of excess force. The pretrial detainee had the status of a presumptively innocent individual, so was more akin to suspect than a convicted prisoner, and the Fourth Amendment's objective reasonableness standard accordingly applied. It was also found that genuine issue of material fact existed as to whether a reasonable police officer could believe the pretrial detainee who was attempting an escape posed a serious threat, thus rendering lawful the officer's action in fatally shooting the detainee, so as to preclude summary judgment on the issue of whether the officer was entitled to qualified immunity with respect to constitutional claims asserted under the civil rights statute Section 1983. The county sheriff who ordered the city police officer to shoot the pretrial detainee who was attempting the escape was not liable for violation of the fatally wounded detainee's constitutional rights, although it was argued that the sheriff intentionally authorized the commission of the unlawful act which resulted in the death and violation of constitutional rights. The sheriff did not have authority to command the police officer, and the police officer did not act pursuant to any command from the sheriff, but in reliance on his own training and city policy, in deciding to draw his gun and fire at the detainee. The appeals court reversed the lower court ruling, finding that the officer was entitled to qualified immunity. (Turner County, Georgia)

1991

U.S. District Court
DISTURBANCE

Friends v. Moore, 776 F.Supp. 1382 (E.D. Mo. 1991). An inmate brought a Section 1983 action against various prison officials. The district court found that the conditions of the inmate's confinement in an outdoor rec area, wet and naked for a period of less than two hours, did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment. The prison officials placed the inmate in the rec area not for punishment but to restore order in the prison unit. The inmate was moved from his cell to the rec area to facilitate cleanup of the unit which he necessitated by setting off a sprinkler, and the duration of the confinement was relatively brief. (Potosi Correctional Center, Missouri)

U.S. District Court
PROTECTION
SAFETY

Haynes v. Michigan Dept. of Corrections, 760 F.Supp. 124 (E.D. Mich. 1991), affirmed, 945 F.2d 404. A prisoner who was stabbed by a prisoner in the adjoining cell brought a civil rights action against various prison officials. The U.S. District Court found that the inmate failed to make an Eighth Amendment claim for deliberate indifference against prison officials. The inmate claimed that officials ignored his report of a threat on his life, but the officials did not recall the inmate telling them about any threats, and the behavior of the officials and the inmate was inconsistent with the inmate's version of events. (State Prison for Southern Michigan)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEGREGATION

Johnson v. Boreani, 946 F.2d 67 (8th Cir. 1991). An inmate brought a civil rights action against prison officials, challenging his confinement in a strip cell on three different occasions. Following remand, the U.S. District Court entered summary judgment in favor of the officials and dismissed the inmate's claim for injunctive relief, and the inmate appealed. The court of appeals found that the prison officials did not violate the inmate's clearly established Eighth Amendment rights when they confined the inmate to a strip cell for control purposes, entitling them to qualified immunity. The officials could reasonably have believed that conditions in the strip cell did not subject the inmate to wanton infliction of pain or serious physical injury, in view of the short duration of confinement and absence of injury. Even if the inmate established that his Eighth Amendment rights were violated when he was placed in the strip cell, the inmate was not entitled to injunctive relief prohibiting the use of the strip cell for control purposes, absent evidence that such conduct was likely to recur unless enjoined. (Cummins Unit, Arkansas Department of Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
ESCAPE

Martucci v. Johnson, 944 F.2d 291 (6th Cir. 1991). A former pretrial detainee filed a Section 1983 action alleging various constitutional violations by sheriff's department officials in concert with a State Bureau of Investigation agent. The U.S. District Court entered summary judgment against the detainee, and he appealed. The court of appeals found that conditions imposed on the pretrial detainee during his segregated confinement were reasonably related to legitimate governmental objectives and aborting his escape and ensuring his presence at trial and, thus, the segregation did not amount to unconstitutional "punishment" and, consequently, his placement in segregated confinement did not, in and of itself, violate due process. In addition, the pretrial detainee was not denied procedural due process by lack of a hearing at which he could contest reasons for his confinement, as he was not subjected to "discipline" for violation of a prison rule and, thus, could derive no liberty interest from a regulatory provision requiring jailers to provide for disciplinary hearings in cases of alleged violations of prisoner conduct rules. It was also found that the jailers' decision to withhold both incoming and outgoing mail of the pretrial detainee who was believed to be planning an escape did not violate the detainee's First Amendment rights. Any size or type of package or envelope could have contained information relating to an escape scheme. Withholding mail destined for a prisoner believed to be planning an escape, the court noted, is "reasonably related" to the legitimate penological interest of maintaining institutional security, and the jailers were "lawfully motivated" to regulate, on a content-neutral basis, the prisoner's ability to correspond with people outside the jail as long as there existed reason to believe that an escape attempt was imminent. (Anderson County Jail, Tennessee)

State Court
ESCAPE

McQueen v. Williams, 587 So.2d 918 (Miss. 1991). A son of a man who was one of two men murdered by two convicts during a burglary that took place after the two convicts escaped from a county jail where they were being held because of overcrowded conditions, sued the county sheriff for the wrongful death of his father. He claimed that the failure to prevent the escape or "promptly and adequately" inform the public of the dangerousness of the offenders constituted negligence. The complaint, seeking $1.5 million in damages, claimed that the sheriff and his subordinates failed in a "ministerial duty" to keep the prisoners confined "by leaving the jail door unlocked" and thereby permitting an escape. The Mississippi Supreme Court upheld summary judgment for the defendant sheriff, noting that, under state law, the sheriff's duty to keep prisoners confined, if any, is discretionary in nature, requiring the sheriff's personal "deliberation, decision and individual judgment." The sheriff was entitled to qualified immunity from liability, in the absence of any evidence that the sheriff exceeded his authority or committed intentional wrongdoing. (Mississippi)

U.S. District Court
SECURITY PRACTICES
RELIGIOUS SERVICES

Phelps v. Dunn, 770 F.Supp. 346 (E.D. Ky. 1991). A prison inmate brought a civil rights action alleging that his constitutional rights were violated by a deputy's decision to bar him from taking a leadership role in chapel services because he was gay. The U.S. District Court found that the inmate's right to practice his religion was not violated by the deputy's decision. There was strong disagreement among other inmates as to whether gays should be allowed to participate in services, and the deputy's decision was reasonably related to penological interests of security and rehabilitation of inmates by providing religious programs for the inmate population as a whole. (Northpoint Training Center, Burgin, Kentucky)

U.S. Appeals Court
DISTURBANCE
SECURITY PRACTICES

Stewart v. McManus, 924 F.2d 138 (8th Cir. 1991). A prisoner brought a Section 1983 action asserting claims based on his disciplinary treatment by Iowa correctional authorities after he had been transferred from Kansas. The U.S. District Court found no Eighth Amendment violation occurred when the prisoner was placed in plastic hand cuffs following a cell house disturbance, particularly where the prisoner's alleged wrist injury was slight. The inmate was flex-cuffed in a good-faith effort to restore discipline after a prison riot and only after guards ran out of ordinary handcuffs. (Iowa State Penitentiary)

U.S. Appeals Court
HATS

Young v. Lane, 922 F.2d 370 (7th Cir. 1991). On appeal and cross appeal from an order of the U.S. District Court in Jewish inmates' federal civil rights action against state prison officials, the court of appeals found that the state prison's policy of allowing Jewish inmates to wear their yarmulkes only inside their cells and during religious services did not deprive the inmates of their right to free exercise of religion, as the prison had a strong institutional interest in limiting the effectiveness of gangs by restricting the variety of available headgear, and that the policy operated with neutrality toward the content of religious expression and did not deprive the inmates of all means thereof. (Dixon Correctional Center, Illinois)

1992

U.S. District Court
SEARCHES

Blanks v. Smith, 790 F.Supp. 192 (E.D. Wis. 1992). An inmate brought a civil rights action against prison officials challenging the number of searches conducted during a two week "general shakedown." He alleged that such searches were "excessive and unreasonable" because he had no contact with other prisoners or visitors during that time. The district court found that the inmate's allegations stated an arguable claim for relief under the Eighth Amendment. (Waupun Correctional Institution, Wisconsin)

U.S. District Court
RESTRAINTS

Cameron v. Tomes, 783 F.Supp. 1511 (D. Mass. 1992), modified, 990 F.2d 14. An involuntarily committed patient brought an action against the Commissioner of the Department of Mental Health and the administrator of a treatment center for the sexually dangerous, alleging that the defendants had violated his constitutional rights by failing to provide him with minimally adequate treatment. The court found that transporting the patient, who had had one leg amputated, in waist shackles and under armed guard was unnecessary and actually harmful to his treatment. (Massachusetts Treatment Center for the Sexually Dangerous)

U.S. District Court
FIRE

Lile v. Tippecanoe County Jail, 844 F.Supp. 1301 (N.D. Ind. 1992). It was found that a county jail official's refusal to open windows after an inmate started a fire in a cell block allegedly resulting in a detainee passing out was not intended to punish the detainee in violation of the Eighth Amendment. There was no medical evidence suggesting that the detainee suffered any injury resulting from the fire or the presence of smoke in the unit. The officials responded to and extinguished the fire, and there was no indication as to the length of time smoke was present or that any other inmates complained about the presence of smoke or suffered any discomfort or injury. (Tippecanoe County Jail, Indiana)

U.S. District Court
"LOCK IN"
SECURITY PRACTICES

Miller v. Campbell, 804 F.Supp. 159 (D. Kan. 1992). An inmate brought an action alleging cruel and unusual punishment during a lockdown. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion, finding that the medical care of the inmate was not cruel and unusual punishment, where there was a mere difference of opinion regarding the nature of care offered. In addition, the brief lockdown, the shutdown of water and electricity, and the suspension of telephone access was related to legitimate correctional goals in response to inmates' throwing water-soaked trash into the walkway and was not cruel and unusual punishment. The water was turned off to prevent flooding and was turned on at intervals to allow the use of toilets and sinks. The electricity was shutdown after inmates damaged light fixtures, and nothing indicated officials' deliberate indifference to dangerous conditions of confinement. The court noted that these deprivations were brief and were reasonably related to legitimate correctional goals. (Leavenworth County Jail, Kansas)

U.S. Appeals Court
FACIAL HAIR
HAIR LENGTH

Powell v. Estelle, 959 F.2d 22 (5th Cir. 1992). Prisoners brought civil rights actions alleging that the Texas Department of Criminal Justice's prohibition against long hair and beards violated their First Amendment right to exercise their religion freely. The U.S. District Court found no infringement on the prisoners' First Amendment rights, and the inmates appealed. The court of appeals found that the prohibition was rationally related to the achievement of the goal of advancing prison security by preventing the concealment of weapons and contraband in hair and beards, and evidence supported the district court's conclusion that the prohibition was rationally related to a security-related goal of identifying prisoners. Evidence was also sufficient to support the district court's conclusion that long hair and beards would have an adverse impact on the safety of prisoners working around industrial equipment and on the hygiene of the prison population as a whole. (Texas Department of Criminal Justice)

U.S. Appeals Court
HAIR

Scott v. Mississippi Dept. of Corrections, 961 F.2d 77 (5th Cir. 1992). Mississippi State Penitentiary inmates who were members of the Rastafari religion brought a suit alleging that a hair-grooming regulation was an unconstitutional violation of their free exercise of religion. The U.S. District Court entered summary judgment and the inmates appealed. The court of appeals found that the Mississippi Department of Corrections' hair-grooming regulation, which required short hair, did not violate the free exercise of religion rights of Rastafari inmates, even though religious beliefs included never cutting or combing one's hair, since the regulation was reasonably related to legitimate penological concerns of identification and security, other forms of expressing the inmate's religion remained open, and it was unlikely that penological interests could be equally well satisfied by other alternatives proposed by the inmates. (Mississippi State Penitentiary, Parchman, Mississippi)

U.S. Appeals Court
ESCAPE
TELEPHONE

U.S. v. Horr, 963 F.2d 1124 (8th Cir. 1992). A defendant was convicted in the U.S. District Court of conspiring to posses a firearm in prison and to escape, and attempting to possess a firearm in prison and to escape, and he appealed. The court of appeals found that the taped telephone conversations in which the prison inmate attempted to arrange an escape were admissible because the inmate, who was instructed at the prison orientation that inmate telephone calls were monitored and recorded, signed a form indicating that he was aware of the prison's telephone policy, and, thus, implied to the taping of his phone conversations. In addition, the defendant's allegations that he would have been labeled a prison "snitch" if he had reported to prison authorities that a fellow inmate had threatened to kill him if he did not come up with money to buy a gun to be used in an escape attempt was inadequate, without more, to demonstrate that the defendant had no reasonable opportunities to avoid the harm, as was required for a jury instruction on law of coercion or duress in prosecution of the inmate. (Federal Medical Center, Rochester, Minnesota)

U.S. Appeals Court
DISTURBANCE
SAFETY SECURITY PRACTICES
TRANSFER

Woodbridge v. Dahlberg, 954 F.2d 1231 (6th Cir. 1992). Prison inmates sued prison officials under Section 1983 alleging that the conduct of the officials following a prison protest demonstration violated their Fourth and Eighth Amendment rights. The U.S. District Court entered judgment on the jury verdict in favor of the prison officials, and the inmates appealed. The court of appeals found that the prison inmates' rights under the Fourth and Eighth Amendments were not violated by their detention in outdoor fenced areas in 40 degree temperatures, subsequent strip searches, and removal to another facility following the inmates' refusal to report to their cells as instructed, as the actions of the prison officials were necessary in view of the potentially dangerous situation. (Ohio State Reformatory)

1993

U.S. District Court
PROTECTION
SAFETY

Bragado v. City of Zion/Police Dept., 839 F.Supp. 551 (N.D.Ill. 1993). A suit was brought under the Section 1983 civil rights statute, the Illinois Survival Act, and the Illinois Wrongful Death Act seeking damages for the city's failure to personally inspect and prevent the suicide of a jail prisoner. After the jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, posttrial motions were made in which the plaintiff sought funeral expenses and the defendant sought judgment notwithstanding the verdict. The district court found that evidence supported a finding that jail officials acted with deliberate indifference to the prisoner's rights. Inadequate personal inspections of the prisoner were done despite the knowledge of the prisoner's suicidal tendencies. Audio and video monitoring were also insufficient. In addition, the on-duty officer knew of the prisoner's threat of suicide, as well as her intoxication and injuries to her wrists. The court also found that the jury's verdict awarding damages for the city's wrongful failure to prevent the prisoner's suicide, in the amount of $5,000 under the Illinois Survival Act and approximately $232,000 under the Illinois Wrongful Death Act as well as nominal damages for Section 1983 civil rights violation, was supported by evidence and was reasonable. (City of Zion Police Station, Zion, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
RESTRAINTS

Knox v. McGinnis, 998 F.2d 1405 (7th Cir. 1993). A prisoner brought a Section 1983 action against state corrections officials alleging that use of a "black box" restraining device while transporting segregation prisoners while outside the segregation unit violated the Eighth Amendment. The U.S. District Court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants, and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that the correctional officials were entitled to qualified immunity from claims for damages against them in their individual capacities. In addition, claims against the defendants in their official capacities were barred by the Eleventh Amendment. It was also found that the prisoner lacked standing to seek prospective injunctive relief against prison officials in their official capacities as the prisoner, who had been released from segregation and returned to the general prison population where he was no longer subject to use of the black box, did not make a reasonable showing that he would again be subject to alleged illegality. (Stateville Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
CONTRABAND
SEARCHES

Lasley v. Godinez, 833 F.Supp. 714 (N.D.Ill. 1993). Inmates who were found guilty of possessing dangerous contraband in violation of a prison rule brought a pro se Section 1983 suit alleging that their due process rights were violated. On the defendants' motions to dismiss, the district court found that the administrative directive of the Illinois Department of Corrections (DOC) whose purpose was to establish a procedure to insure that a written report was completed whenever an inmate living area was searched did not create a protectible liberty interest for inmates to have their cells searched before the cells were assigned to them. The directive contained no substantive rules which would give rise to an entitlement. The discovery of contraband in the inmates' cells during the course of the searches was sufficient evidence to find them guilty of violating the prison rule. (Stateville Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
RESTRAINTS SECURITY
PRACTICES

Moody v. Proctor, 986 F.2d 239 (8th Cir. 1993). An inmate who claimed that he was injured when, after undergoing medical treatment, prison guards lifted him into a prisoner transportation van while he was restrained with handcuffs and a "black box," filed a civil rights action against security guards, correctional officers and others. The U.S. District Court entered judgment for the defendants and the inmate appealed. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that the district court determination that correctional officers lacked discretion in using the "black box" restraining device while transporting the inmate was not clearly erroneous. Although the officers could request changes in transport procedures to ensure the prisoner's safety and well-being, all inmates traveling outside the institution were to be restrained using handcuffs and a black box. No changes to restraints could occur while a prisoner was en route. In addition, the use of the black box did not itself amount to cruel and unusual punishment. Although the black box caused discomfort, its use was penologically justified by security considerations. Although the inmate was injured as a result of the guards' handling of him while he was restrained by the black box, there was no evidence that the guards acted maliciously or sadistically or with deliberate indifference. (Nebraska State Penitentiary)

U.S. Appeals Court
DISTURBANCE
USE OF FORCE

Moore v. Holbrook, 2 F.3d 697 (6th Cir. 1993). A prisoner brought a Section 1983 action against prison guards for an alleged assault. The United States District Court dismissed the action, and appeal was taken. The appeals court, reversing and remanding, found that there were genuine issues of material fact, precluding summary judgment for the prison officials. The prisoner claimed he was assaulted by officials during a prison disturbance and there were doubts as to whether the disturbance was in progress at the time of the assault. If the assault occurred during the disturbance, the guards were permitted to use greater force than normally necessary to control the prisoner. (Southern Ohio Correctional Facility)

U.S. District Court
ESCAPE

Spaulding v. Collins, 867 F.Supp. 499 (S.D. Tex. 1993). An inmate filed a petition for a writ of habeas corpus complaining of discipline he received after he was found guilty of attempting to escape by originating and possessing a forged court order. The district court found that the inmate's exclusion from portions of the disciplinary hearing during which a correctional officer gave testimony did not violate his due process rights. The hearing officer found that it was necessary to exclude the inmate in order to preserve internal order and discipline and to maintain institutional security. The court also found that denying the inmate permission to cross-examine an informant was not a denial of confrontation and cross-examination rights. Revealing the identity of the informant could pose a high risk of reprisal within the prison and the right to call witnesses in prison disciplinary proceedings is limited. Evidence supported a finding of guilt for attempted escape. (Alfred D. Hughes Unit, Texas Department of Criminal Justice, Institutional Division)

U.S. Appeals Court
SECURITY
PRACTICES

Walters v. Grossheim, 990 F.2d 381 (8th Cir. 1993). A prison inmate brought a civil rights suit against prison officials, alleging that the officials' failure to comply with a judgment requiring the inmate to be returned to a less restrictive environment constituted a violation of his rights. The U.S. District Court awarded the inmate compensatory damages of $4 per day for the time the inmate spent in Level III custody after the entry of the state court judgment and before he was restored to Level IV, for a total of $276 in damages; the parties cross appealed. The court of appeals, affirming the decision, found that the prison officials did not have qualified immunity for their failure to comply with the judgment ordering them to return the inmate to a less restrictive environment, regardless of whether the officials disagreed with the order and thought it lacked proper legal foundation. The judgment could serve as a basis for the inmate's constitutionally protected liberty interests, thus the prison officials violated the inmate's due process rights when they failed to carry out the state court judgment. The prison inmate, who was the prevailing party, was entitled to an allowance of costs although he had not requested them in the trial court. (Iowa)

1994

U.S. District Court
SAFETY

Arnold v. South Carolina Dept. of Corrections, 843 F.Supp. 110 (D.S.C. 1994). A state prison inmate who was injured while using faulty kitchen equipment brought a Section 1983 claim against prison officials based on Eighth Amendment violations. Upon the prison officials' motion for summary judgment, the district court found that the inmate failed to establish that the officials violated the Eighth Amendment's prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment. The inmate offered no evidence that the officials acted with a requisite culpable state of mind in failing to repair the equipment. Also, the deprivation of rights was not sufficiently serious to satisfy the objective component of violation. The proper remedy for the inmate was to file for workers compensation benefits. The court found that even if the inmate had established that prison officials violated the Eighth Amendment's prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment by failing to repair the faulty steam pot, prison officials were entitled to qualified immunity from the suit because it had not been clearly established that the right to properly functioning prison equipment was of constitutional magnitude. (McCormick Correctional Institution, South Carolina)

U.S. District Court
PROTECTION

Barrett v. U.S., 845 F.Supp. 774 (D.Kan. 1994). An inmate's mother brought a Federal Tort Claims Act (FTCA) action against prison officials after the inmate was fatally stabbed at the federal penitentiary. The district court found that the failure of the prison officials to investigate a death threat against the inmate made by a religious group or to segregate the inmate from other prisoners was not the proximate cause of the inmate's stabbing death. The inmate's death was a result of a personal conflict with another inmate who was not a member of the religious group. In addition, the prison officials had no knowledge of that conflict and could not have been aware of that conflict even with reasonable diligence. (United States Penitentiary, Leavenworth, Kansas)

U.S. Appeals Court
ESCAPE
USE OF FORCE

Brothers v. Klevenhagen, 28 F.3d 452 (5th Cir. 1994). Family members of a pretrial detainee who was killed while attempting to escape from custody during transport from one holding cell to another, brought an action in state court against the county and its sheriff alleging excessive force and violation of Section 1983. The defendants removed the action to federal court and the parties cross-moved for summary judgment. The U.S. District Court granted summary judgment for the defendants and the plaintiffs appealed. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that the due process clause, rather than the Fourth Amendment, provided the constitutional standard for determining whether deputies used excessive force in their treatment of the detainee. The deputies' shooting and killing of the unarmed pretrial detainee who was escaping did not violate due process. The sheriff's department policy allowed deadly force only when immediately necessary to prevent escape and was designed in a good faith effort to maintain or restore discipline and not maliciously and sadistically for the purpose of causing harm. The deputies fired at the detainee only as a last resort to prevent an escape, and the detainee would have escaped if the deputies had not fired upon him. (Harris County Jail, Texas)

U.S. District Court
"LOCK-IN"
RELIGION

Campbell-El v. District of Columbia, 874 F.Supp. 403 (D.D.C. 1994). A prisoner claimed that enforcement of various prison security measures violated his rights under the Fifth and Eighth Amendment and under the Religious Freedom Restoration Act. The district court found that the confinement to maximum security and the enforcement of a lockdown policy, were reasonable in light of prison security concerns and did not violate either the Fifth Amendment due process or the Eighth Amendment cruel and unusual punishment clauses. This is particularly true where the prisoner was in maximum security at his own request for protective custody. The court also found that, to determine whether the prisoner's rights under the Religious Freedom Restoration Act (RFRA) had been violated, further discovery was required on the prisoner's claim that enforcement of the prohibition against gathering of more than 10 or 12 prisoners in a cellblock violated his religious freedom rights. There was insufficient evidence in the record to show whether the regulation was the least restrictive means for furthering compelling government interest in prison security. (Maximum Security Facility, Lorton, District of Columbia)

U.S. District Court
HAIR LENGTH
RELIGIOUS ARTICLES

Diaz v. Collins, 872 F.Supp. 353 (E.D.Tex. 1994). A Native American inmate brought a Section 1983 action complaining of alleged violations of his right to practice Native American religion. The district court found that a prison regulation requiring inmates to cut their hair did not violate the Religious Freedom Restoration Act, despite the Native American inmate's claim that his religion required that he grow his hair long. Security concerns were compelling governmental interests, and the regulations were the least restrictive means available to achieve these compelling interests. The prison's requirement that a medicine pouch sought by the inmate be sent through the unit warden's office and that the inmate allow visual inspection of it for contraband was reasonable within the prison environment and did not substantially burden the inmate's right to freely practice his religion. The prison policy of requiring that the inmate's medicine pouch be stored in the inmate's cell did not substantially burden the inmate's religious beliefs. The prison regulation governing religious headbands did not substantially burden the practice of the Native American religion, and was founded upon a compelling state interest to maintain security and minimize carrying of contraband within the prison. The regulation required that any headband be kept in the inmate's cell. The inmate was confined to his cell for 22 to 23 hours per day and could wear the headband during that time. (Texas Department of Criminal Justice, Institutional Division, Coffield Unit)

U.S. District Court
DISCRETION
RESTRAINTS
SECURITY
RESTRICTIONS
SEGREGATION

Harrison v. Dretke, 865 F.Supp. 385 (W.D.Tex. 1994). A prisoner brought a civil rights action against prison officials claiming that he was placed on restraint status and "container restriction" (not allowed to keep cups, plates or similar items in his cell) without due process of law. The U.S. District Court dismissed the action and the inmate appealed. The appeals court remanded. On remand, the district court found that prison officials did not violate the prisoner's protected liberty interest when they placed him on restraint status after he assaulted another inmate. The prisoner failed to show that there were any regulations that limited the officers' discretion in imposing the restraint status, and any freedom of movement inmates had beyond escort under restraint was an unregulated privilege extended by prison officials. In addition, the state prison officials satisfied due process requirements when they revoked the prisoner's container privileges. The prison's classification committee reviewed the prisoner's status a little more than three weeks after placing him on container restriction and decided to continue the restrictions. This review was one of the prisoner's regularly scheduled classification hearings which must be held every 90 days pursuant to segregation regulations. The inmate had a right to attend such hearings and to present evidence. (Alfred Hughes Unit, Texas Department of Criminal Justice, Institutional Division)

U.S. Appeals Court
PROTECTION
SAFETY

Horn by Parks v. Madison County Fiscal Court, 22 F.3d 653 (6th Cir. 1994) U.S. cert. denied 115 S.Ct. 199. A juvenile detainee, by his limited conservator, brought Section 1983 and negligence claims seeking damages for injuries sustained in an attempted suicide. The appeals court, affirming in part and reversing in part, found that any violation of the Juvenile Justice Act in temporarily lodging the juvenile in an adult jail was not the proximate cause of his attempted suicide because the juvenile was scrupulously shielded from deleterious influences associated with adult facilities. The court also found that the prison officials' failure to take special precautions to protect the juvenile detainee from suicide was not deliberate indifference to his serious medical needs, as required to establish a Fourteenth Amendment violation. Juvenile detainees were not, as a class, particularly vulnerable to suicide and entitled to special screening for suicidal tendencies. (Madison County Detention Center, Kentucky)

U.S. District Court
PROTECTION

Huffman v. Fiola, 850 F.Supp. 833 (N.D. Cal. 1994). A prisoner filed a federal civil rights complaint against prison officials and police officers and sought to proceed in forma pauperis. The district court found that the prisoner stated a cognizable claim against police officers who allegedly watched and refused to assist or prevent an alleged sexual assault of the prisoner in a booking cell. (Pacific Grove Police Department and Monterey County Sheriff's Department, California)

U.S. Appeals Court
PROTECTION
SEGREGATION

Robinson v. Cavanaugh, 20 F.3d 892 (8th Cir. 1994). An inmate brought an action for damages against prison officials for violating his due process rights by failing to protect him from an attack by another inmate. The U.S. District Court dismissed and the inmate appealed. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that the inmate's refusal to identify the inmate that he feared would attack him invalidated his failure to protect claim. Officials would not place the inmate in protective custody without knowing the identity of a potential assailant. (Missouri)

U.S. District Court
PROTECTION
SAFETY
SEGREGATION

Schwartz v. County of Montgomery, 843 F.Supp. 962 (E.D.Pa. 1994) affirmed 37 F.3d 1488. An inmate brought claims under Section 1983 and Pennsylvania law against a county correctional facility and its employees. The district court found that the defendants were not deliberately indifferent to the inmate's constitutional rights by failing to ensure that the facility's policies and procedures governing inmate classification and recreation were followed. Even though failure to follow policies and procedures resulted in the attempted strangulation of the inmate by a prisoner who was known to be extremely dangerous and who should have not been allowed to leave his cell unescorted, the policies and procedures did not cause the harm suffered by the inmate. According to the court, failure to communicate and follow policies and procedures did not rise above the level of negligence. Under Pennsylvania law, the defendants could not be held liable on the intentional tort theory for the attack, and the defendants were immune from negligence claims. (Montgomery County Correctional Facility, Eagleville, Pennsylvania)

U.S. Appeals Court
DISCRETION
SECURITY
PRACTICES

Sims v. Mashburn, 25 F.3d 980 (11th Cir. 1994). A prisoner brought a Section 1983 action against state prison officials, alleging that his Eighth Amendment rights were violated in connection with the stripping of his cell. The U.S. District Court entered judgment for the prisoner and the officials appealed. The court of appeals, reversing the decision, found that the alleged failure of a prison guard to monitor the prisoner after his cell was stripped, which allegedly caused the prisoner to be subject to a penalty for a period longer than necessary to achieve penal objectives, did not inflict cruel and unusual punishment upon the prisoner in violation of his Eighth Amendment rights. The official was allowed deference in determining when the penal objective had been reached, and his conduct had been in compliance with policies that were in place at the institution; consequently he could not be characterized as malicious or sadistic as needed for an Eighth Amendment violation. (St. Clair Correctional Facility, Alabama)

U.S. District Court
SECURITY PRACTICES
TELEPHONE
VISITS

Taifa v. Bayh, 846 F.Supp. 723 (N.D.Ind. 1994). Prisoners brought a class action suit challenging conditions of confinement at a prison operated by the Indiana Department of Corrections. The district court approved a settlement agreement involving assignment and transfer of prisoners, along with improvement of various prison conditions at the Maximum Control Complex (MCC). The state agreed only to assign prisoners to MCC under specified conditions and to transfer prisoners out of MCC after a specified period of time, subject to certain conditions, and agreed to alter MCC conditions in many areas. The agreement also provided for expanded visitation and telephone privileges. (Maximum Control Complex, Indiana Department of Corrections, Westville, Indiana)

U.S. Appeals Court
STAFFING

Taylor v. Freeman, 34 F.3d 266 (4th Cir. 1994). State prison inmates filed an action alleging that overcrowding and understaffing exposed inmates to an unconstitutionally unacceptable risk of physical violence. On the inmates' motion for a preliminary injunction, the U.S. District Court issued a mandatory preliminary injunction ordering prison officials to reduce the total inmate population by 30 percent of operating capacity in two months, in addition to ordering officials to take other remedial actions. The defendants appealed. The appeals court found that, in issuing the mandatory preliminary injunction, the district court exceeded the limited remedial authority vested in federal courts to direct the way in which state prison officials meet the dictates of the Eighth Amendment. The court's assumption of extensive managerial control over the prison was premised upon conclusory findings regarding the inmates' allegations that overcrowding and understaffing exposed the inmates to an unacceptable risk of physical violence. (North Carolina's Morrison Youth Institution)

U.S. District Court
FIRE SAFETY

Women Prisoners v. District of Columbia, 877 F.Supp. 634 (D.D.C. 1994). A class action was brought on behalf of female prisoners in the District of Columbia. The district court found that the living conditions for the women prisoners violated contemporary standards of decency and violated the Eighth Amendment. The dormitories were open and crowded and could not contain fire within any one room. There was only one unlocked fire exit, no fire alarm system, no sprinkler system, and no regularly conducted fire drills. (District of Columbia Correctional System- the Lorton Minimum Security Annex, the Correctional Treatment Facility, the Central Detention Facility)

1995

U.S. District Court
RELIGIOUS GROUPS

Abdul Jabbar-Al Samad v. Horn, 913 F.Supp. 373 (E.D.Pa. 1995). Muslim inmates brought a civil rights suit against prison officials challenging a rule which prohibited inmates from leading religious groups. The district court denied the defendants' motion to dismiss, finding that the inmates stated claims for violation of their civil rights. The court found that the inmates had stated a claim under § 1980 and the First Amendment by alleging that the prison rule violated a tenet of Islam that requires Muslims to choose their religious leaders from within their congregation. The court also found that the inmates stated a claim under the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment because civic and religious prison groups were similarly situated and that it was not established that one group was fundamentally more dangerous than the other. (SCI-Graterford, Pennsylvania)

U.S. Appeals Court
ESCAPE
RESTRAINTS

Davidson v. Riley, 45 F.3d 625 (2nd Cir. 1995). An inmate filed a civil rights action against prison officials claiming that he did not receive a fair trial when he was made to appear and try his case while restrained by handcuffs and leg irons. The U.S. District Court dismissed the action and the inmate appealed. The appeals court found that the district court had the discretion to order physical restraints if necessary to maintain safety or security, but could impose no greater restraints than were needed to minimize the resulting prejudice to the inmate's fundamental due process right to a fair trial. The district court abused its discretion by delegating to the inmate's guards the decision whether security concerns outweighed the inmate's due process right to appear without shackles or manacles, by failing to conduct an evidentiary hearing on whether the inmate presented an escape risk, and by failing to minimize the prejudice in having the inmate shackled while he appeared before the jury. The errors could not be deemed harmless where the restraints affected the credibility of the inmate and his witnesses and where the evidence against him was not overwhelming. (New York State Department of Correctional Services)

U.S. District Court
GANGS

Madrid v. Gomez, 889 F.Supp. 1146 (N.D.Cal. 1995). Inmates brought a class action suit challenging conditions of confinement at a new high-security prison complex in California. The district court found for the plaintiffs in the majority of issues presented, ordered injunctive relief and appointed a special master to direct a remedial plan tailored to correct specific constitutional violations. In the beginning of its lengthy opinion, the court noted that this "...is not a case about inadequate or deteriorating physical conditions...rather, plaintiffs contend that behind the newly-minted walls and shiny equipment lies a prison that is coldly indifferent to the limited, but basic and elemental, rights that incarcerated persons--including the 'worst of the worst'--retain under...our Constitution." The court held that the fact that a prison may be new does not excuse its obligation to operate it in a constitutionally acceptable manner. The court held that prison inmates established prison officials' deliberate indifference to the use of excessive force by showing that they knew that unnecessary and grossly excessive force was being employed against inmates on a frequent basis and that these practices posed a substantial risk of harm to inmates. According to the court, officials consciously disregarded the risk of harm, choosing instead to tolerate and even encourage abuses of force by deliberately ignoring them when they occurred, tacitly accepting a code of silence, and failing to implement adequate systems to control and regulate the use of force. The court found that officials had an affirmative management strategy to permit the use of excessive force for the purpose of punishment and deterrence.

The court found the delivery of physical and mental health services to be constitutionally inadequate and that evidence demonstrated that officials knew that they were subjecting the inmate population to a substantial risk of serious harm, thus violating the Eighth Amendment. The court held that staffing levels were insufficient, training and supervision of medical staff was almost nonexistent and screening for communicable diseases was poorly implemented. Inmates often experienced significant delays in receiving treatment, there were no protocols or training programs for dealing with emergencies or trauma, there was no effective procedure for managing chronic illness, medical recordkeeping was deficient, and there were no programs of substance to ensure that quality care was provided.

According to the court, although conditions of confinement in the security housing unit did not violate the Eighth Amendment for all inmates, they did violate constitutional standards when imposed on certain inmates, including those who were at a particularly high risk for suffering very serious or severe injury to their mental health. The court found that conditions involved extreme social isolation and reduced environmental stimulation. The court held that prison officials had an actual subjective knowledge that conditions of isolation presented a substantial excessive risk of harm for mentally ill and other vulnerable inmates, and that the officials acted wantonly in violation of the Eighth Amendment.

The court ruled that the psychological pain that results from idleness in segregation is not sufficient to implicate the Eighth Amendment, particularly where exclusion from prison programs is not without some penological justification.

The court found that double-celling and inmate assaults did not rise to the level of an Eighth Amendment violation in the absence of evidence that the overall total number of cell fights over a three-year period was significantly more than would be expected for a facility of the prison's size and security designation.

The court upheld the prison's efforts to identify and separate gang members, finding that inmate's were not entitled to a hearing before a special services unit officer prior to being transferred to a segregated housing unit because of gang membership. The inmates were given an opportunity to present their views to the institutional gang investigator (IGI) and the IGI was the critical decision-maker in the process. Also, although some inmates who were transferred for gang membership may not have affirmatively engaged in gang activity while confined, the court held that evidence showed that gang members join gangs "for life," justifying their placement in security housing. (Pelican Bay State Prison, California)

U.S. District Court
FIRE SAFETY

Masonoff v. DuBois, 899 F.Supp. 782 (D.Mass. 1995). Prison inmates filed a class action suit against prison officials alleging that conditions of confinement violated their rights under the Eighth Amendment. The district court granted summary judgment, in part, for the inmates. The court denied summary judgment for the prison officials with regard to fire safety issues raised by the inmates. Inmates alleged fire hazards caused by the lack of a functioning sprinkler system and the lack of automatic locks on cell doors, which are required by a state building code. Prison officials responded that the facility had implemented a rigorous fire safety program which mitigated any dangers imposed by these deficiencies. The court noted that while it may look to state codes in its effort to determine society's standard of decency, such standards do not necessarily reflect constitutional minima. (Southeast Correctional Center, Massachusetts)

U.S. District Court
HAIR
SEARCHES
SEGREGATION

May v. Baldwin, 895 F.Supp. 1398 (D.Or. 1995). An inmate brought an action against prison officials alleging violation of his civil rights. The district court held that a prison requirement that he undo his dreadlocks in order to facilitate a hair search did not violate the Religious Freedom Restoration Act (RFRA) or any clearly established First Amendment right, even though the requirement did substantially burden the inmate's rights to exercise his Rastafarian religion. The court found that the prison's requirement that any inmate who was leaving or returning to the facility loosen their hair was the least restrictive means of furthering the prison's valid security interests. The court also found that confining the inmate to his cell for less than 24 hours to undo his braids in preparation for his transfer from the facility on the following day did not violate the inmate's rights. The court also found that requiring inmates in administrative segregation to submit to visual and body cavity searches when leaving their cells does not violate the Fourth Amendment. The court found that sanctioning an inmate who refuses to comply with valid prison regulations to one week in a disciplinary segregation unit with no outdoor recreation privileges is not unreasonable or arbitrary for the purposes of an Eighth Amendment claim. (Eastern Oregon Correctional Institution)

U.S. District Court
RESTRAINTS

McKinney v. Compton, 888 F.Supp. 75 (W.D.Tenn. 1995). An inmate filed a civil rights suit against prison officials alleging deliberate indifference to his serious medical needs and use of excessive force. The district court found that prison officials did not inflict cruel and unusual punishment in connection with the inmate's eye injury, and that a corrections officer could not be held liable for attempting to handcuff the inmate. However, the court found that the inmate's allegations that a prison official poked him in the eye and injured him after he was already restrained were sufficient to state an Eighth Amendment claim. (West Tennessee High Security Facility)

U.S. District Court
FIRE SAFETY

Nettles v. Griffith, 883 F.Supp. 136 (E.D. Tex. 1995). A prisoner who was placed in administrative segregation without a hearing and was injured when he exited his cell after it was set on fire, brought a Section 1983 action against the county sheriff and other officials. The district court found that the assignment of the prisoner to administrative segregation in a section of the jail designed primarily for the mentally imbalanced did not violate the Eighth Amendment's prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment. Although the prisoner was injured when exiting his cell after it was set on fire by other prisoners, no jail official perceived that the prisoner was subject to a serious risk of harm from fire, since fires were ubiquitous in the jail and had not previously caused serious injuries. (Jefferson County Detention Center, Beaumont, Texas)

U.S. Appeals Court
CONTRABAND
VISITS

Rodriguez v. Phillips, 66 F.3d 470 (2nd Cir. 1995). A former inmate and his mother filed a § 1983 action against prison officials. The district court denied summary judgment for the defendants and they appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded in part, and dismissed in part. The appeals court found that prison officials' belief that the inmate's three-day administrative confinement, without the opportunity to be heard, was reasonable. The court noted that the officials perceived a threat to security and safety following a report that the inmate's mother had passed contraband into the prison, and that they needed time to search the public spaces of the cell block and interview an informer. The court held that a substantive due process right to be free from excessive force from a state act in a nonseizure, nonprisoner context was not clearly established at the time that a prison officer used excessive force on the inmate's mother. Just before a visit to her son, the mother had apparently leaned against or touched the fence surrounding the prison, pausing before she continued to the visitors reception area. An officer radioed a report to officers inside the facility that he had seen the mother pass a small brown package through the fence to an unidentified inmate. Inside the prison the mother was questioned by officers about the incident and she was told she would not be allowed to visit her son that day. While she was waiting at the bus stop corrections officers seized her and brought her back for further questioning, police were contacted and she was arrested. Unable to make bail she was held overnight and she was released without explanation the next day. Two weeks later she arrived to visit her son and she was not allowed to, although her visiting rights had not been formally suspended. She alleged that an officer screamed at her, put both hands on her shoulders and propelled her toward the building entrance and threw her against the front door. (Mid-Orange Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
PRETRIAL DETAINEES
PROTECTION
SECURITY PRACTICES

Stone-El v. Sheahan, 914 F.Supp. 202 (N.D.Ill. 1995). A pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 civil rights action against a sheriff, executive director of the county department of corrections, and the superintendent of the county jail. The detainee alleged that various conditions of his confinement violated his right to due process. The district court granted the defendants' motion to dismiss. The court found that the defendants had not personally caused the conditions at the jail, nor could they limit the number of pretrial detainees assigned there or appropriate funds to improve conditions. The court also found that the detainee failed to allege conditions of confinement serious enough to violate the objective component of a due process claim. The detainee had asserted that he had slept on the floor without a mattress, that the jail was noisy, that the jail lacked showers, that he was not able to maintain his personal hygiene, that ventilation was poor, and that inadequate security permitted gangs to intimidate him. The detainee also alleged a lack of exercise opportunities, but the court found that even dramatic restrictions on outdoor exercise do not violate due process as long as detainees have ample opportunities to participate in indoor activity. The court noted that the detainee failed to allege any harm caused by the poor ventilation or any adverse health effects from the alleged lack of exercise. (Cook County Jail, Illinois)

1996

U.S. District Court
SECURITY PRACTICES
STAFFING

Baker v. Lehman, 932 F.Supp. 666 (E.D.Pa. 1996). A prisoner sued prison officials alleging they were deliberately indifferent to his Eighth Amendment right to personal safety by failing to protect him from an attack by another inmate. The district court granted summary judgment for the officials, finding that the prisoner did not show that the officials knew of any facts from which an inference of substantial risk of serious harm might be drawn. The court found that given the previous absence of violence in the prison clothing shop, the prisoner did not show that security measures in the clothing shop posed a substantial risk of harm. The prisoner alleged that lack of screening of prisoner-workers on the basis of prior crimes, the provision of only one guard for 150 inmates, and the availability of scissors created a substantial risk of serious harm in the shop. (State Correctional Institution at Graterford, Pennsylvania).

U.S. Appeals Court
"LOCK-IN"
SAFETY

Eason v. Thaler, 73 F.3d 1322 (5th Cir. 1996). A Muslim prisoner brought a § 1983 suit against five correctional officials alleging violations of his constitutional rights during a prison lockdown. The district court granted summary judgment for the officials and the appeals court affirmed the lower court decision. The prisoner was one of many ordered into lockdown status for nearly 26 days following a potentially explosive disturbance in a recreation yard. During the lockdown the prisoner was only allowed to leave his cell for showers; meals, library books, medical assistance and all other necessities and services were brought to inmates' cells. The court found that the prisoner was not entitled to notice or an opportunity to be heard before being placed in lockdown. The court ruled that the prisoner's right to practice his religion was not violated by the inclusion of pork in some of the meals served during the lockdown since prison officials had no reason to know that the prisoner was affiliated with the Muslim faith. The prisoner was not denied his constitutional right of access to courts by the prison's failure to provide him with every legal book he requested during the lockdown; the prisoner was not prejudiced in any litigation as a result of the alleged denial of access to the law library and he was only delayed in filing a § 1983 lawsuit which he filed after the lockdown ended without missing any deadlines. Prison officials were not deliberately indifferent to the health and safety of the prisoner when they permitted a gas leak to occur and did not evacuate prisoners from their cells; officials turned on exhaust fans to draw gas fumes out of prisoners' cells. Prison officials did not violate the prisoner's due process rights by including him in lockdown because the prisoner's segregation from the general population was instituted to protect the security and integrity of the prison unit and to protect prisoners from each other. (Smith Unit, Texas Department of Criminal Justice-Institutional Division)

U.S. District Court
RESTRAINTS

Fitts v. Witkowski, 920 F.Supp. 679 (D.S.C. 1996). An inmate sued corrections officials alleging violation of his Eighth Amendment rights by the use of four-point restraints. The district court held that a previous consent decree established a liberty interest in freedom from the use of four-point restraints except under procedures established by the decree and that there was an issue of fact as to whether the defendants complied with the decree. The court noted that this case did not involve a disturbance that threatened prison security so as to make pre-deprivation protections impossible. The court found that prison officials were entitled to qualified immunity for due process and Eighth Amendment claims because the existence of the decree did not clearly establish that the inmate had a liberty interest against the use of four-point restraints. (Perry Correctional Institution, South Carolina)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEGREGATION
RESTRAINTS
VISITS

Hosna v. Groose, 80 F.3d 298 (8th Cir. 1996). Inmates who were housed in an administrative segregation unit for their own safety brought a civil rights action against prison officials, seeking damages and injunctive relief for alleged equal protection violations. The district court granted partial injunctive relief. The appeals court reversed the lower court's grant of injunctive relief, finding that limiting the type of property in administrative segregation cells, restricting inmates' access to prison resources, and requiring that they be handcuffed while out of their cells did not violate equal protection. Prison officials had argued that their policies were designed to reduce the possibility of danger by or to administrative segregation inmates. Inmates were only allowed out of their cells for three hours of recreation per week. When they were out of the cells, inmates were handcuffed and escorted by guards. The inmates were not allowed to attend classes, religious services, or group recreational activities, nor could they work or visit the law library. Inmates were not allowed telephone access for personal calls, their visitation privileges were more restrictive, and they were provided with less opportunity to purchase items through the canteen. (Jefferson City Correctional Center, Missouri)

U.S. District Court
PUBLICATIONS

Packett v. Clarke, 910 F.Supp. 469 (D.Neb. 1996). An inmate sued correctional officials and staff alleging violations of his First Amendment rights and of the civil rights statute. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants, finding that their policy regarding distribution of material designated as contraband was reasonably related to legitimate penological interests. The inmate had sought to obtain a catalog which contained illustrations depicting weapons concealed in everyday items and offering items such as lock picks for sale. Prison officials refused to deliver the catalog to the inmate under their policy of prohibiting incoming mail deemed to be a threat to the safety, security or good order of the facility. An alternative proposed by the inmate--restricting orders from the catalog and confining inmates to a limited area in which the catalog could be read--would not prevent the risk of disorder from prisoners who might be inspired to create weapons concealed in everyday items and was not reasonable with regard to cost, according to the district court. (Lincoln Correctional Center, Nebraska)

U.S. Appeals Court
GANGS

Pichardo v. Kinker, 73 F.3d 612 (5th Cir. 1996). A state prison inmate brought a civil rights action against prison officials alleging his confinement in administrative segregation violated his due process rights. The district court dismissed the case as frivolous and the inmate appealed. The appeals court ruled that placing the inmate in administrative segregation because of his gang affiliation did not deprive him of a constitutionally cognizable liberty interest. (Coffield Unit, Texas Department of Criminal Justice)

U.S. Appeals Court
TELEPHONE

Pope v. Hightower, 101 F.3d 1382 (11th Cir. 1996). An inmate brought an action against prison officials challenging prison telephone restrictions that required inmates to designate no more than ten individuals on telephone calling lists, with the option of changing the lists every six months. The district court rendered a verdict for the inmate and the officials appealed. The appeals court reversed, finding that the calling list requirement did not violate the inmate's First Amendment right to communicate with family and friends. The court found that a rational connection existed between the restriction and a legitimate governmental interest in reducing criminal activity and harassment of judges and jurors. The court noted that the inmate had alternative means of exercising his First Amendment right because he could receive visitors and correspond with virtually anyone he wished. (Donaldson Correctional Facility, Alabama)

U.S. Appeals Court
FIRE SAFETY

Standish v. Bommel, 82 F.3d 190 (8th Cir. 1996). A former inmate brought a § 1983 action against prison officials challenging his conditions of confinement. The district court entered judgment against the inmate and he appealed. The appeals court affirmed the lower court decision, finding that the former inmate was not subjected to unconstitional conditions of confinement. The inmate alleged that unsafe conditions at the prison included the lack of smoke detectors in the housing unit, lack of water sprinklers, inadequate ventilation, and insufficient emergency procedures. The court found that these conditions did not violate the inmate's rights where the only recent fires were started when inmates set fire to mattresses or bedding and neither the former inmate or anyone else had been injured by smoke inhalation or fire. The court noted that prison officials had taken action to address fire hazards, such as prohibiting smoking. The court also found that the former inmate's rights were not violated when his housing unit leaked in bad weather, even though it forced him to move his mattress to the floor to stay dry. (Jefferson City Correctional Facility, Missouri)

U.S. Appeals Court
DISTURBANCE
USE OF FORCE
RESTRAINTS

Williams v. Benjamin, 77 F.3d 756 (4th Cir, 1996). An inmate filed a civil rights action claiming that correctional officers violated his constitutional rights when they sprayed him with mace, confined him for eight hours in four-point restraints on a bare metal bed frame, refused to allow him to wash off the mace, and denied medical care and the use of a toilet. The district court granted summary judgment to the prison officials and the appeals court affirmed in part and reversed and remanded in part. The appeals court found that the correctional officers' decision to use some force to quell a disturbance was justifiable after inmates threw water at an officer and refused to obey a command to desist. The court ruled that the initial application of mace was not cruel and unusual punishment, but that summary judgment was precluded for the claims that the use of restraints and related actions violated the Eighth Amendment. The court noted that four-point restraints can be used on a limited basis, as a last resort, without violating the Eighth Amendment when other forms of prison discipline have failed, and that the initial application of four-point restraints was justified. But the officers offered no evidence to dispute the inmate's affidavit that his long confinement without being able to wash off the mace caused "immense" pain and that the inmate pleaded with them for water to wash off the mace. According to the court, after the immediacy of the disturbance was at an end the unnecessary infliction of continued pain through a prolonged period of time would support the inference that the officers were acting to punish, rather than to quell a disturbance. (Lieber Correctional Institution, South Carolina)

1997

U.S. Appeals Court
CONTACT VISITS

Bazzetta v. McGinnis, 124 F.3d 774 (6th Cir. 1997). Prisoners brought a class action civil rights suit challenging prison regulations that limited contact visits for certain classes of prisoners. The district court denied the prisoners' motion for preliminary injunctive relief and the prisoners appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the regulations were reasonably related to legitimate penological interests and did not violate the Eighth Amendment. The corrections department grades its prisoners on the basis of their dangerous propensities, from grade I (lowest risk) to grade VI (highest risk). Regulations prohibit contact visits for grades V and VI, with rare exceptions. The regulations included restrictions on contact visits by children, members of the general public and former prisoners. (Michigan Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
RESTRAINTS
PRETRIAL DETAINEES

Casaburro v. Giuliani, 986 F.Supp. 176 (S.D.N.Y. 1997). A pretrial detainee alleged that he was subjected to cruel and unusual punishment because he was handcuffed in a holding cell for over 7 hours. According to the detainee, he was placed in a holding cage "that had no seats, no water, poor ventilation." He had notified officers that he was under a chiropractor's care for back problems but was allegedly tightly handcuffed behind his back anyway. After he complained he was re-handcuffed to a hook approximately 12 inches off of the floor. After complaining about this he was allegedly cuffed to the front of the cell in a standing position. The district court found that the detainee stated a § 1983 claim against officers, the police department and the city. (City of New York)

U.S. District Court
RESTRAINTS

Dawes v. Coughlin, 964 F.Supp. 652 (N.D.N.Y. 1997). A prisoner brought a § 1983 action alleging that corrections officers had used excessive force against him, failed to provide medical treatment, and improperly issued deprivation and restraint orders. The district court held that the officers did not use excessive force against the prisoner during a struggle initiated by the prisoner which resulted in an officer closing a feeder box door on the prisoner's fingers. The court also upheld the use of force against the prisoner following his refusal to obey an order, although the prisoner sustained a cut over his left eye and a swollen lip and right eye as a result of the force used against him. The court found that a prison nurse's failure to X-ray the prisoner's ribs for nearly two months following an incident in which he was injured was not denial of medical care in violation of the Eighth Amendment because the prisoner's needs were not sufficiently serious to rise to the level of a constitutional violation. The court found that the prisoner's due process rights were not violated by deprivation orders or restraining orders because the deprivation order was reviewed daily and the restraining orders were not continued for more than seven days without review. The orders, which limited the prisoner's recreation to one hour at a time in full restraints, did not violate the Eighth Amendment because safety and security purposes required the restraints and the prisoner was still able to move around the recreation area. (Eastern Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
RESTRAINTS

Haslar v. Megerman, 104 F.3d 178 (8th Cir. 1997). A county detainee brought a § 1983 action after a guard refused to loosen or remove shackles from his swollen leg while he was being treated in an outside hospital. The district court dismissed the complaint and the detainee appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that keeping the detainee shackled while receiving treatment at an outside facility did not display indifference to the medical needs of the detainee, nor did it constitute punishment in violation of the detainee's Fourteenth Amendment rights. According to the court, the shackling was necessary to prevent the detainee from overpowering the single guard who was watching him, and there were safeguards against applying the shackles so as to cause pain and other medical problems. (Jackson County Detention Center, Missouri)

U.S. District Court
FIRE SAFETY
EARTHQUAKES

Jones v. City and County of San Francisco, 976 F.Supp. 896 (N.D.Cal. 1997). Pretrial detainees brought a class action against the City and County of San Francisco and various city officials challenging the constitutionality of their conditions of confinement at a jail. The district court granted various summary judgment motions filed by the plaintiffs and the defendants, enjoining future overcrowding based on past unconstitutional overcrowding. The court found due process violations based on the defendants' inadequate response to fire safety risks at the jail, excessive risks of harm from earthquakes, physical defects in the jail's water, plumbing and sewage systems, excessive noise levels, and poor lighting.

The court found that the detainees were not provided with reasonable safety from fire because the defendants failed to install door assemblies or additional sprinklers and had not responded reasonably to fire safety risks at the jail.

The detainees were exposed to excessive risks of harm from earthquakes in violation of their due process rights, where the jail lay a quarter mile from the San Andreas fault and faced a 50% chance of experiencing a high magnitude earthquake over the next 50 years. The jail appeared structurally unable to withstand substantial seismic activity and had a malfunctioning bar locking system and inadequate staffing that further augmented risk by potentially leaving inmates trapped in their cells during and after an earthquake. The court rejected the government's contention that more than 30 public buildings in the area had the same seismic rating as the jail. The court noted that the public's alleged tolerance of risk associated with entering a poorly-constructed library or museum for an hour did not equate to tolerance for spending 100 days continuously trapped in such a facility.

The court found deliberate indifference to the risk of earthquakes despite the defendants' contention that it would cost more than $33 million to upgrade the jail and efforts to gain voter approval for funding for a new facility had failed. The court noted that the city could have attempted other funding methods and did have some funds allocated for seismic repairs but diverted that money to other projects.

Despite some efforts to reduce noise in the jail, the detainees established a constitutional violation in noise levels which ranged between 73 and 96 decibels, exceeding acceptable levels, and caused increased risk of psychological harm and safety concerns due to officers' inability to hear calls for help. The extent to which noise continued to exceed maximum standards suggested that previous noise reduction efforts were merely cosmetic and that far more could be done. (San Francisco Jail No. 3, California)

U.S. District Court
RESTRAINTS
SECURITY PRACTICES

Price v. Dixon, 961 F. Supp. 894 (E.D.N.C. 1997). An inmate sued prison officials alleging violation of his Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment rights when he was placed in four-point restraints for 28 hours. The court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants, finding that they did not violate any clearly established rights of the inmate and were entitled to qualified immunity. The court upheld the limited use of mace to subdue the inmate who was disruptive and who was throwing urine on prison officers. The inmate had incurred more than 100 rule violations since he was admitted to the facility, and on one occasion the inmate even broke through steel handcuffs that were applied to restrain him. The court held that denying the inmate the opportunity to wash after being sprayed with mace did not violate any clearly establish right of the inmate. The inmate was afforded bathroom breaks and was not totally without access to any source of water. He was checked every 15 minutes and was released for regular meal times. The inmate was also evaluated by medical personnel. (Central Prison, Raleigh, North Carolina)

U.S. Appeals Court
PROTECTION
SECURITY PRACTICES

Rich v. Bruce, 129 F.3d 336 (4th Cir. 1997). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against a prison officer, alleging violation of his Eighth Amendment rights in connection with an attack by another inmate. The district court entered judgment for the inmate, awarding him $40,000 in compensatory damages and more than $20,000 in attorneys' fees. But the appeals court reversed, ruling that findings did not support the conclusion that the officer acted with deliberate indifference to a substantial risk of harm to the inmate. According to the appeals court, the officer's violation of prison rules regarding movement of the inmate did not support the conclusion that the officer acted with deliberate indifference. The plaintiff inmate was assigned to disciplinary segregation in Maryland's "Supermax" correctional facility due to his behavior. While the plaintiff was in an outside recreation area, the officer released another inmate from his cell for a period in the "day room" in front of the cells. This inmate was highly dangerous and a warning had been issued by the prison that he should be considered the enemy of all inmates. This inmate had also stabbed the plaintiff several months earlier and was considered to be the plaintiff's enemy in particular. While moving the plaintiff back to his cell the officer violated standard operating procedures and as a result the other inmate had the opportunity to attack the plaintiff with a shank. The plaintiff required hospitalization and surgery and has permanent scars as a result.

The officer, apparently frightened, filed a report that falsely stated that he had complied with certain security regulations that he had in fact broken. He later admitted that he had broken several regulations, including those that: (1) required no more than one inmate to be out of his cell for recreation at any given time; (2) required two officers to participate in taking an inmate out of his cell; (3) required inmates being given recreation in the dayroom to wear handcuffs; and (4) required that prisoners' clothes and persons be carefully searched before they leave their cells. (Maryland Correctional Adjustment Center)

U.S. District Court
SEARCHES-CELL
CONTRABAND

Robinson v. Ridge, 996 F.Supp. 447 (E.D.Pa. 1997). A prisoner sued state officials and employees alleging violation of his rights as the result of a random prison-wide security search. The district court held that the prisoner's right to free access to courts was not violated by the seizure of his legal materials, absent actual injury. The court also held that the seizure of the prisoner's religious materials in the course of a random security search, no matter how harmful the seizure might have been to the prisoner's religious practices, did not violate the Free Exercise Clause if it was reasonably related to the prison's legitimate penological interests. The prisoner's cell was searched as part of a prison-wide search during a declared state of emergency. During the search, the prisoner's personal property, including legal documents and articles of his Islamic faith, were thrown on the floor and swept into the trash. The prisoner asked for a receipt and was refused. He filed a grievance and was denied relief, but was subsequently offered $50, which he rejected. (SCI Graterford, Pennsylvania)

U.S. Appeals Court
PUBLICATIONS

Shabazz v. Parsons, 127 F.3d 1246 (10th Cir. 1997). A prison inmate sued prison officials under § 1983 alleging that the officials violated his First Amendment right to free exercise of religion by denying him access to issues of a magazine. The prison had determined that the issues would create a danger of violence by advocating racial, religious or national hatred. The district court entered judgment for the officials and the appeals court affirmed, holding that the officials had a rational basis for denying the inmate access to entire issues of the magazine, rather than merely redacting the offending portions. The officials offered evidence showing that the costs to implement redacting procedures for the magazine "Muhammad Speaks" would be prohibitive. (Oklahoma)

U.S. District Court
PUBLICATIONS

Winburn v. Bologna, 979 F.Supp. 531 (W.D.Mich. 1997). A prison inmate brought a pro se action under § 1983 alleging that the application of a prison mail regulation to bar his receipt of materials that advocated racial supremecy violated the First and Fourteenth Amendments and the Religious Freedom Restoration Act (RFRA). The district court granted summary judgment for the officials, finding that the application of the regulation did not violate the inmate's First Amendment free exercise rights or RFRA, and that the officials were entitled to qualified immunity in any event. The mail regulation barred inmates from receiving materials advocating racial supremecy or ethnic purity or attacking a racial or ethnic group. The court found that the regulation was reasonable and that there was no easy alternative to barring the materials. (Chippewa Correctional Facility, Michigan)

U.S. District Court
FIRE SAFETY

Women Prisoners of Corrections v. Dist. of Columbia, 968 F.Supp. 744 (D.D.C. 1997) In an ongoing class action suit brought on behalf of female inmates in the District of Columbia, the District appealed a corrective order and its subsequent modification. The appeals court vacated in part and remanded. On remand, the district court required the District to remedy environmental health problems at its correctional facility for women, including repairing or replacing roofs of dormitories, conducting a vermin eradication program, replacing torn mattresses and pillows, providing adequate prisoner-controlled lighting, and installing a drainage system to prevent hazardous accumulations of water. The court required the District to install and maintain a manual fire alarm system and fire detection system in the women's facility, and to ensure that all bed linens, blankets and curtains or draperies were fire-retardant. (District of Columbia)

1998

U.S. Appeals Court
RESTRICTIONS
WORK

Abu-Jamal v. Price, 154 F.3d 128 (3rd Cir. 1998). A state inmate brought a § 1983 action challenging a prison rule that prohibited inmates from carrying on a business or profession. The inmate moved for a preliminary injunction which the district court granted in part. The appeals court affirmed in part and reversed in part, remanding with instructions. The appeals court held that the inmate showed that the rule, which was enforced against him to restrict his writings, was not reasonably related to any legitimate interests and that the inmate faced irreparable harm as the result of the prison's investigation and enforcement of the rule. The court found that the inmate was likely to show that the rule was enforced due to the content of his writings, and that his writings did not affect the allocation of prison resources, other inmates, or orderly prison administration. But the appeals court found that the district court's injunction against enforcement of visitation rules was not warranted on the grounds that they were imposed in retaliation for the inmate's writings, and that the corrections department did not violate the inmate's access to the courts by imposing stricter visitation rules. The court found that the department had a valid, content-neutral reason for applying stricter visitation rules to the inmate's visitors, given evidence that the inmate's legal visitation privileges were being abused so that he could receive more than the permitted number of social visits. The department required verification that legal visitors were credentialed or employed by the inmate's attorney. (State Correctional Institution at Greene, Pennsylvania)

U.S. District Court
VISITS

Africa v. Vaughan, 998 F.Supp. 552 (E.D.Pa. 1998). A prison inmate who was denied visitation with a woman who, along with the inmate, was a member of an activist group, and who the inmate claimed was his wife, brought a § 1983 action. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants, finding that the inmate failed to show that he and the woman were married for the purposes of Pennsylvania law; therefore, the denial of visitation did not violate equal protection. The court found that no statutory marriage existed, where the inmate had not obtained a marriage license, and there was no evidence that they had entered into an agreement sufficient to create a common law marriage. (S.C.I. Graterford, Pennsylvania)

U.S. District Court
TELEPHONE

Arney v. Simmons, 26 F.Supp.2d 1288 (D.Kan. 1998). Inmates brought a § 1983 action alleging constitutional violations in a system for providing telephone access to inmates. Prison restrictions on inmates' telephone access included a 10-person telephone call list that could be modified at 120-day intervals, monitoring of telephone calls, a prohibition on international calls from inmate telephones, and a prohibition on the inclusion of public officials on call lists. The court held that these restrictions did not violate inmates' rights to freedom of speech or freedom of association because the restrictions were content-neutral and unrelated to the purpose of suppressing expressions, inmates had significant alternative means to communicate through prison visitation and correspondence, alternatives to the restrictions would have an impact on prison resources, and there were no obvious, easy alternatives to the restrictions. The court held that the telephone system did not violate inmates' right of access to courts by permitting the monitoring or recording of attorney/client telephone conversations. (Lansing Correctional Facility, Kansas)

U.S. District Court
SEARCHES
TRANSFER

Aziz Zarif Shabazz v. Pico, 994 F.Supp. 460 (S.D.N.Y. 1998). A prison inmate brought a § 1983 action against prison officials and employees alleging violation of his constitutional rights. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants. The court held that the inmate failed to allege facts sufficient to support a conspiracy claim or that officials had acted in retaliation for the inmate's exercise of protected rights. The court concluded that kicking of the inmate inside his ankles and feet while performing a pat frisk, while not to be condoned, was a de minimis use of force and did not violate the Eighth Amendment. The court noted that at one time the inmate admitted that he had sustained no physical injuries. The court held that the pat frisk and strip frisk searches performed on the inmate were permissible and did not violate the provisions of a consent decree. The court found that performing a strip frisk on the prison inmate prior to his transfer to another facility did not violate his right of free exercise of religion, notwithstanding the inmate's religious objections to the requirement that he remove his clothing. According to the court, alleged verbal taunts, no matter how inappropriate, unprofessional or reprehensible they might seem, did not support a claim of cruel and unusual punishment absent any injury. Any psychological or emotional scars to the inmate were found to be de minimis and did not support a claim of cruel and unusual punishment. (Green Haven Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
SAFETY

Barney v. Pulsipher, 143 F.3d 1299 (10th Cir. 1998). Two female former inmates who were sexually assaulted by a jailer each brought a § 1983 action against jailer, county, sheriff and county commissioners based on their assault and other conditions of confinement. The actions were consolidated and all defendants except the jailer were granted summary judgment by the district court. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the county was not liable on the grounds of failure to train or inadequate hiring. The court held that the inmates did not show that the training received by the jailer was deficient and that even if it was, the sexual assault of the inmates was not plainly the obvious consequence of a deficient training program. The court noted that the sheriff should not have been expected to conclude that the jailer was highly likely to inflict sexual assault on female inmates if he was hired as a correctional officer. The court found that the sheriff and commissioners did not violate the inmates' rights by permitting the jailer to be the sole guard on duty in the county jail. The court noted that permitting a single officer to be on duty when a second jailer was sick or on vacation did not impose liability on the county, where there were no previous incidents of sexual harassment or assault of female inmates that would have given notice to the county that its one-jailer policy would result in injuries. The court also noted that the sheriff acknowledged problems with crowding and inadequate monitoring, and its inability to house female inmates for extended periods of time. The county contracted out female inmates to neighboring jails that had better facilities and limited confinement of female inmates to 24-36 hours whenever possible. According to the appeals court the inmates failed to establish an equal protection claim. The court also found that the sheriff and commissioners did not act with deliberate indifference to the female inmates' health and safety with regard to conditions of confinement. The inmates' allegations regarding a filthy cell, inadequate lighting and ventilation, lack of enclosure around a shower, unappetizing food, and lack of access to recreational facilities, did not rise to the level of a constitutional violation given that the inmates were confined for only 48 hours. (Box Elder County Jail, Utah)

U.S. District Court
VISITS

Blair v. Loomis, 1 F.Supp.2d 769 (N.D.Ohio 1998). An inmate and his wife, a former correctional officer, sued prison officials challenging their denial of visitation. The district court denied the plaintiffs' motion for a temporary restraining order and temporary injunction. The court held that regulations governing visitation in Ohio prisons did not create a protectable liberty interest in a right to visitation. The court found that the public interest in a safe and orderly prison system outweighed the interest of the prisoner and his wife in maintaining their family relationship and the prisoner's interest in building a relationship that would help him to lead a law-abiding life upon his release. The court found that it was reasonable for Ohio law to consider present or former correctional officers to be security risks, and to exclude them from visitation for that reason, based upon their training in security procedures and their knowledge of facility operations. The prisoner and his wife were married while the prisoner was incarcerated, and the wife admitted to falsifying information on her visitor application to conceal the fact that she had been a corrections officer. (Grafton Correctional Institution, Ohio)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEGREGATION
RESTRAINTS

Buckley v. Rogerson, 133 F.3d 1125 (8th Cir. 1998). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against a warden and state corrections department medical director challenging the use of restraints and segregation in a psychiatric hospital. The district court denied the medical director's motion for summary judgment and he appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the director should have known that the prisoner had a right to medical approval of segregation and the use of restraints. The district court had found that correctional policies allowed facility staff to develop "treatment plans" to address the prisoner's mental illness but rather than assigning its staff doctors to the case the facility entrusted responsibility for implementing and administering many of the prisoner's treatment plans to correctional officers who had no medical training. Part of the prisoner's "treatment" involved stripping him of his clothes and placing him in a Spartan "quiet" or "segregation" cell. He was placed in these conditions without a blanket, bed or mattress on at least 17 occasions. The prisoner was also placed in restraints so that he could hardly move. (Iowa Medical and Classification Center)

U.S. Appeals Court
DRUG/ALCOHOL

Byrd v. Hasty, 142 F.3d 1395 (11th Cir. 1998). An inmate sought habeas corpus relief after the federal Bureau of Prisons (BOP) denied him a sentence reduction based on his completion of a drug treatment program. The district court denied relief and the inmate appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded, finding that the BOP could not rely on the inmate's firearm sentence enhancement to deny his application for a sentence reduction. The appeals court held that the BOP exceeded its authority when it categorically excluded from eligibility those inmates who were convicted of nonviolent offenses who received sentencing enhancements for possession of a firearm. (Federal Prison Camp at Pensacola, Florida)

U.S. District Court
STAFFING

Essex County Jail Annex Inmates v. Treffinger, 18 F.Supp.2d 445 (D.N.J. 1998). Inmates filed a motion to hold county corrections defendants in civil contempt for noncompliance with a consent decree addressing unconstitutional conditions of confinement. The district court held that monetary sanctions for civil contempt were not appropriate in light of the county's efforts to attain full compliance by investing over $200 million in new facilities and improving existing ones. The court concluded that contempt sanctions would be counterproductive and would impede the county's efforts to build a new jail. The court held that it could not consider whether a classification plan satisfied the consent decree until an independent analysis was conducted. The court noted that the Special Master reported that staffing was inadequate, and as a result inmates and staff are exposed to danger and other problems. The court adopted the Master's recommendation that an independent, professional staffing analysis be conducted to address staff training, coverage and operations. The Master also reported that there was an insufficient supply of personal hygiene items, and the court ordered the defendants to comply with the consent order's terms by issuing adequate amounts of personal hygiene items, including toilet paper, soap, shampoo, toothpaste, toothbrush, comb, mirror, individual razors and shaving cream or powder. (Essex County Jail and Essex County Jail Annex, New Jersey)

U.S. Appeals Court
HAIR
BEARDS
GROOMING

Hines v. South Carolina Dept. Of Corrections, 148 F.3d 353 (4th Cir. 1998). One hundred South Carolina inmates challenged the constitutionality of a prison grooming policy that required all male inmates to keep their hair short and their faces shaven. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the rule did not violate inmates' right to free exercise of religion, despite its incidental effect on the religious practices of some inmates. According to the court, the policy was neutral and the generally applicable rule was implemented to maintain order in prisons, which was reasonably related to legitimate penological interests. (South Carolina Department of Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
SECURITY
RESTRICTIONS

In Re Wilkinson, 137 F.3d 911 (6th Cir. 1998). Corrections officials challenged a district court order permitting an inmate to attend a pretrial deposition which was being conducted as a part of a civil rights action brought by the inmate. The appeals court granted a writ of mandamus which directed the district court to vacate its order. The appeals court held that the corrections officials adequately justified their general policy against allowing an inmate from being present at depositions in civil litigation brought by the inmate, noting that the inmate bore the burden of showing a specialized need for his attendance at the deposition. Corrections officials had cited five reasons for their policy: (1) maintaining staff authority; (2) preventing aggrandizement of inmates; (3) avoiding unnecessary tension; (4) protecting staff morale; and (5) preserving limited resources. (Lorain Correctional Institution, Ohio)

U.S. District Court
DISTURBANCE
RESTRAINTS

Jackson v. U.S., 24 F.Supp.2d 823 (W.D.Tenn. 1998). A former inmate brought an action under the Federal Tort Claims Act (FTCA) seeking damages for injuries he suffered in a prison riot. The district court found that the statute of limitations barred the inmate's Eighth Amendment claims. The court denied summary judgment for the defendants, finding it was precluded by genuine issues of material fact regarding the reasonableness of the actions of prison employees in treating the inmate and in locking down inmates during a fire. The inmate suffered a collapsed lung in a fire in housing units that were burning out of control during a prison riot. Prison officials locked down inmates in the housing units, and the court ordered further inquiry into whether delays were caused by negligence on the part of staff. The inmate alleged that a prison officer gave keys to another prisoner to release him during the fire, but he was never released and subsequently inhaled carbon monoxide and suffered a collapsed lung. The court also allowed further proceedings to determine if a federal prison physician exercised a reasonable degree of skill, possessed by others in the medical profession, in treatment the inmate, who was brought to the prison's front gate for evacuation to a local hospital. (Federal Corr. Institution, Memphis, Tennessee)

U.S. District Court
FREE EXPRESSION
ITEMS PERMITTED

Leitzsey v. Coombe, 998 F.Supp. 282 (W.D.N.Y. 1998). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against prison officials after he was disciplined for violating a prison rule that prohibited possession of materials pertaining to unauthorized organizations. The district court held that the prison rule did not violate the inmate's free speech or free exercise rights, and that the rule was not unconstitutionally vague. According to the court, it was reasonable and essential for prison officials to prohibit inmate participation in, and possession of, materials relating to organizations that foster disorder and threaten the security of the institution. (Attica Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEARCHES

Peckham v. Wisconsin Dept. Of Corrections, 141 F.3d 694 (7th Cir. 1998). A state prisoner brought an action against corrections officials challenging the constitutionality of strip searches. The district court dismissed the suit and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the strip searches violated neither the Fourth Amendment nor the Eighth Amendment. According to the court, strip searches of a state prisoner upon his arrival at a facility, return to the facility after medical appointments or court proceedings, and upon a general search of his cell block, did not violate the Fourth Amendment. The court held that as long as the searches were performed for legitimate, identifiable purposes, and not for harassment or punishment, they did not violate the Eighth Amendment. (Taycheedah Correctional Institution, Outagamie County Jail, Wisconsin)

U.S. District Court
FACIAL HAIR
RELIGIOUS ARTICLES

Sutton v. Stewart, 22 F.Supp.2d 1097 (D.Ariz. 1998). A state prisoner sued prison officials alleging denial of his rights to free exercise of religion under the First Amendment and the Religious Freedom Restoration Act (RFRA), denial of his equal protection rights, and obstruction of his mail. The district court granted summary judgment for the officials. The court held that regulations that barred the inmate's possession of scented oils that he wanted for use in a prayer ritual did not violate his free exercise rights because they were reasonable in light of the oil's flammable nature and because possession by only Muslim inmates would pose safety and security threats. The court found that a regulation that limited where the prisoner could wear a kufi prayer cap was reasonable and did not violate his right to free exercise of religion. The regulation restricted wearing of the cap to his cell, designated living areas and during religious ceremonies, and was found reasonable by the court because the cap provided a potential symbol of group affiliation that threatened prison security. The court also found that a prohibition on inmate beards did not violate the inmate's rights because beards obscured inmates' identities and thereby presented a security risk. According to the court, failing to provide clergy of the inmate's faith did not violate equal protection; the inmate had requested that clergy representing the Sahih variant of the Muslim faith, which was not found to be a mainstream religion that would be in demand by other faiths. The court ruled that officials were not liable to the inmate for obstruction of mail due to a ten-month delay in processing a brochure sent to the inmate by his mother. According to the court, it was reasonable for officials to deny the inmate access to a vendor with which he was not permitted to transact, and the brochure was distinguishable from magazines other inmates received because it was exclusively devoted to the advertisement of unauthorized items. (Ariz. State Prison Complex-Winslow)

U.S. District Court
SEXUALLY ORIENTED MATERIALS

Waterman v. Verniero, 12 F.Supp.2d 364 and 12 F.Supp.2d 378 (D.N.J. 1998). Convicted sex offenders housed at a diagnostic and treatment facility sought a preliminary injunction preventing enforcement of a statute that barred prisoners in the facility from possessing sexually oriented materials. The district court granted the injunction, finding that the offenders were likely to succeed on the merits of their allegations that the statute was overbroad, vague, and violated the First Amendment. The court noted that depiction of sexually oriented had been permitted at the facility for over 20 years with no documented harm. The court later ordered a permanent injunction finding that the statute was overbroad and was not rationally related to rehabilitation. (New Jersey Adult Diagnostic and Treatment Center)

U.S. District Court
RELIGION

Withrow v. Bartlett, 15 F.Supp.2d 292 (W.D.N.Y. 1998). A Muslim inmate brought a § 1983 action claiming that a prison superintendent and correctional officers violated his First Amendment rights by disciplining him for participating in a group demonstrative prayer in a recreation yard. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants, finding that prohibiting group demonstrative prayer in a prison recreational yard did not violate the inmate's right to free exercise of religion. The court found that a group demonstrative prayer in a highly populated prison yard posed the risk of disturbing other inmates with chanting and movements, and that the prohibition was rationally related to a legitimate penological interest in maintaining security. According to the court, the inmate had the option of engaging in nondemonstrative prayer in the yard or returning to his cell for prayer. (Wende Correctional Facility, New York)

1999

U.S. District Court
SAFETY

Baumann v. Walsh, 36 F.Supp.2d 508 (N.D.N.Y. 1999). An inmate who was injured by falling off a top bunk and then reinjured by falling off a shelf at his prison job sued prison officials under § 1983. The district court dismissed all defendants from the case except the inmate's shop supervisor. The court held that the inmate had an objectively serious medical need and that a substantial risk of harm existed with respect to the inmate's working conditions because he was made to climb along shelves and stand on boxes to retrieve material from the top shelves of a storage room. The court denied summary judgment for the shop supervisor, citing material issues of fact to be resolved regarding the supervisor's notice of unsafe work conditions and whether a ladder was available for use by the inmate. (Franklin Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
RELIGION

Chatin v. Coombe, 186 F.3d 82 (2nd Cir. 1999). A state inmate who was disciplined for engaging in individual prayer in a prison recreation yard brought a § 1983 action against prison officials alleging violation of his constitutional rights. After a bench trial the district court held that the rule under which the inmate was punished was unconstitutionally vague, and enjoined its enforcement under similar circumstances. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the inmate's prayer could not be viewed as a "religious service" or "religious speech" as intended by a rule barring unauthorized services or speeches. The court found that the inmate was not afforded adequate notice that individual, silent, demonstrative prayer was prohibited outside the cell or other designated areas. The court held that the rule failed to provide sufficiently explicit standards for those who applied it. (Green Haven Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
RESTRAINTS
SECURITY PRACTICES

Drummer v. Luttrell, 75 F.Supp.2d 796 (W.D.Tenn. 1999). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against corrections officials alleging that a disciplinary action violated her due process and Eighth Amendment rights. The district court held that strip-searching and handcuffing the inmate during a unit search did not constitute a due process violation because the action did not impose an atypical and significant hardship on her. The inmate had been strip-searched during a shakedown of her dormitory. After squatting and coughing twice the inmate refused a direct order to do so again and was disciplined. She then left a shower area dressed in nothing but her panties and two male officers were called for assistance. (Shelby County Correctional Center, Tennessee)

U.S. Appeals Court
RESTRAINTS

Hartsfield v. Vidor, 199 F.3d 305 (6th Cir. 1999). A state prison inmate brought a § 1983 action alleging that he was unconstitutionally restrained. The district court dismissed the action and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part and remanded, finding that the officials' alleged act of keeping the inmate in hard restraints for two eight-hour periods after he damaged his cell did not amount to cruel and unusual punishment. The inmate alleged that during his periods in the restraints he was denied food, access to fresh water and the use of a toilet. The inmate had been placed in top-of-bed restraints for a total of eighteen hours. (Ionia Corrections Facility, Michigan)

U.S. Appeals Court
RESTRAINTS

Key v. McKinney, 176 F.3d 1083 (8th Cir. 1999). An inmate who had been restrained in handcuffs and leg shackles for 24 hours for throwing water in a correctional officer sued state prison officials under § 1983 claiming violation of his Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment rights. The district entered judgment for the defendants and the appeals court affirmed. According to the appeals court, the inmate did not suffer a serious deprivation of life's necessities and prison officials' conduct was not wanton. Although the shackles made it more difficult for the inmate to sleep and relieve himself, he was not deprived of bedding, food or bathroom facilities and he was checked by a nurse and guard at regular intervals. The record also contained references to the handcuffs being loosened and medical conditions being considered. The court also held that the inmate did not have any due process right to notice and an opportunity to be heard before being restrained, noting that the inmate had no liberty interest in not being restrained. The restraints were applied under a new policy implemented in response to inmate disturbances. Under the policy, inmates caught spitting, throwing objects, or starting a fire were to be placed in restraints for 24 hours. Inmates were given notice of the new policy. (Anamosa State Penitentiary, Iowa)

U.S. District Court
RESTRAINTS

Pendergrass v. Hodge, 53 F.Supp.2d 838 (E.D.Va. 1999). A prisoner brought a § 1983 action against prison officials challenging their policy on the use of restraints. The court held that placing a prisoner who had been assigned to restrictive housing in full restraints when he moved about the prison did not constitute a serious deprivation of a basic human need under the Eighth Amendment. (Riverside Regional Jail, Virginia)

U.S. District Court
WHEELCHAIR

Schmidt v. Odell, 64 F.Supp.2d 1014 (D.Kan. 1999). A former county jail inmate, a double amputee without legs from a point below his knees, brought a civil rights action against jail officials asserting claims under the Eighth Amendment. The district court denied summary judgment for the defendants, finding that it was precluded on all claims. The court held that refusal to provide the inmate with a wheelchair while confined in the county jail did not violate the Eighth Amendment since jail exits, entrances and hallways were too narrow to accommodate wheelchairs and there were legitimate safety concerns about placing a wheelchair among the jail's general population. The court also found that deficiencies such as plumbing problems, overcrowding, inadequate exercise areas, and other defects during the inmate's confinement in the county jail did not rise to the level of cruel and unusual punishment; there were opportunities to exercise in dayrooms, plumbing problems and other allegedly unsanitary conditions did not pose a serious threat to the health, safety or well-being of the inmate, and overcrowding did not result in denial of the minimal measures of life's necessities. But the court denied summary judgment for jail officials on the issue of whether they were deliberately indifferent to the basic needs of the inmate while he was confined at the jail. The court noted that the ability of the inmate to move himself about in the jail, to use the toilet, to use the shower, to obtain his meals, and to obtain suitable recreation and exercise, were a basic need that jail officials were obligated to help provide under the Eighth Amendment. The court also noted that the fact that the inmate was able to use most of the jail services did not preclude his Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) or Rehabilitation Act claims against jail officials. (Cowley County Jail, Kansas)

U.S. Appeals Court
RELIGIOUS ARTICLES
RELIGIOUS GROUPS

Spies v. Voinovich, 173 F.3d 398 (6th Cir. 1999). A Zen Buddhist inmate sued prison officials alleging that various prison regulations violated his First Amendment free exercise rights. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the prison officials. The appeals court affirmed with regard to all of the inmate's First Amendment claims. The appeals court held that a prison regulation that required five documented members of a faith to be interested in forming a faith group before such a group could be formed did not violate the inmate's free exercise rights. The court also held that a prohibition against the inmate possessing certain religious articles in his cell did not violate his free exercise rights. The court noted that a small statue of Buddha, an altar cloth, a wooden fish, a picture of Buddha, and incense could be fashioned into weapons or could be used to cover up illegal activities. The court upheld the prison's prohibition against inmate-led groups and the prison's refusal to use the inmate's religious name. (North Central Correctional Institution, Ohio)

U.S. Appeals Court
CONTRABAND

U.S. v. Allen, 190 F.3d 1208 (11th Cir. 1999). A federal inmate was convicted in federal district court of possessing a prohibited object and he appealed. The appeals court vacated the district court decision and remanded with instructions. The appeals court held that under the statute that makes it unlawful for a federal inmate to possess a "prohibited object" and which defines a "prohibited object" to include an object that is intended to be used as a weapon, the intent to use the object as a weapon is an element of the offense and not merely a sentencing factor. The inmate worked as a quality assurance inspector at an on-site UNICOR (federal prison industries) mattress factory. One morning he was observed to be acting suspiciously in his conversation with another inmate and he was searched. The search produced three nine-inch tufter needles and a wooden dowel with a hole bored into one in and a rope wrapped around the other end. The needles appeared to have been broken off from one of the sewing machines. The needles fit into the wooden dowel and when assembled could be used as a shank or ice-pick tool or weapon with a lanyard. The inmate did not contest that he possessed these objects but told his supervisor that he had intended to give them to his supervisors privately rather than in view of other inmates. (United States Penitentiary, Atlanta, Georgia)

U.S. District Court
TELEPHONE CALLS

U.S. v. Peoples, 71 F.Supp.2d 967 (W.D.Mo. 1999). A defendant who was charged with killing a witness to prevent testimony moved to suppress recordings of telephone conversations and in-person meetings that he had with a prisoner. The district court denied the motion, finding that the recordings did not violate the Fourth Amendment rights of the defendant. According to the court, a visitor of a prisoner did not have a reasonable expectation of privacy in conversations with the prisoner, or in telephone calls involving the prisoner. The recordings were made as part of a neral recording program undertaken to maintain prison safety by reducing the flow of contraband into the prison. (Corrections Corporation of America facility, Leavenworth, Kansas)

U.S. District Court
FIRE
FIRE SAFETY

White v. Cooper, 55 F.Supp.2d 848 (N.D.Ill. 1999). An inmate at a state prison brought an action against prison officials and a construction company to recover damages for injuries he incurred in a fire. The district court dismissed the construction company from the suit finding that the company was not a "state actor" for the purposes of § 1983. The court found that the inmate stated a claim against prison officials by alleging that they failed to assist him for an unreasonable time during a prison fire. According to the court, the allegation that state correctional officials knew the inmate faced severe and substantial risk from fire because of inoperative fire safety and prevention equipment, and failed to ensure that the system was operational, stated an Eighth Amendment claim. In addition to their disregard of non-operational fire safety and prevention systems, officials also allegedly failed to free the inmate from his burning cell. (Joliet Correctional Center, Illinois)

2000

U.S. District Court
CONTRABAND
SEARCHES- CELL

Ballance v. Virginia, 130 F.Supp.2d 754 (W.D.Va. 2000). A state prison inmate who was convicted of sexual crimes involving juveniles brought a § 1983 action against corrections officials alleging wrongful confiscation of photographs of children from his cell. The district court held that the confiscation complied with the First Amendment even though only a small percentage of photographs were of seminude children. The court noted that state officials provided minimum procedural safeguards, including notice of confiscation, provision of avenues for protest, and review of the prisoner's allegation of a First Amendment violation by someone who was not involved with the confiscation. The court found that the confiscation of all photographs served to further the prison's interests in both rehabilitation and institutional security because the possible discovery of the cache of photos by other prisoners created a potential for disturbance. According to the court, a prisoner has no Fourth Amendment right to be free from unreasonable searches of his cell because he has no expectation of privacy in his cell. (Wallens Ridge State Prison, Virginia)

U.S. District Court
CONTRABAND
SEARCHES- CELL

Ballance v. Young, 130 F.Supp.2d 762 (W.D.Va. 2000). A state prisoner brought a pro se federal civil rights suit against prison officials, arising out of their seizure of several items of his personal property. The district court held that the prisoner had no reasonable expectation of privacy in his cell that would make seizure of a letter from his cell a Fourth Amendment violation that could be addressed in a § 1983 suit. The court found that the decision by officials to confiscate the prisoner's scrapbook and clippings, in accordance with a prison regulation that prohibited such items, was reasonable in light of security concerns that the metal parts of scrapbooks could be used as weapons and that razors and other contraband could be hidden in the clippings or scrapbooks, and in light of the time-consuming or extreme nature of other alternatives, such as x-raying cells. The court noted that the officials did not need reasonable suspicion to search prisoner cells as part of their policy of performing random searches. The court also held that the prisoner was afforded sufficient post-deprivation remedies to satisfy any due process concerns arising from the seizure of an attorney's letter that contained hair samples and, allegedly, two money orders, where the inmate did receive notice of a disciplinary hearing held under the prison regulation forbidding abuse of mail. (Wallens Ridge State Prison, Virginia)

U.S. District Court
SEARCHES- CELL

Barstow v. Kennebec County Jail, 115 F.Supp.2d 3 (D.Me. 2000). A county jail inmate brought an action against a sheriff, detective, county commissioners and county, alleging claims under § 1983. The district court granted summary judgment, in part, for the defendants. The court held that the search of the inmate's jail cell did not violate his Fourth Amendment rights or his due process rights. The court found that the detective had probable cause to search the jail cell for evidence that the inmate had committed the crime of terrorizing because his cell mate had informed potential victims and the detective about the inmate's possible retaliatory plans. According to the court, the Fourth Amendment does not require government officials to secure a search warrant prior to searching a prison cell. (Kennebec County Jail, Maine)

U.S. District Court
RESTRAINTS

Bowman v. City of Middletown, 91 F.Supp.2d 644 (S.D.N.Y. 2000). An arrestee who was held for 19 days on suspicion of murder brought a § 1983 action alleging false arrest, malicious prosecution and civil rights violations while confined. The district court held that denial of commissary privileges for five days was not a due process violation, especially since the only deprivation suffered was the inability to order cigarettes, which was the sole item the detainee desired from the commissary. The court found that the jail superintendent was entitled to qualified immunity from liability for his decision to have the pretrial detainee shackled when outside of his cell based on the wording of the note that the detainee had sent to the superintendent complaining of his loss of commissary privileges, because the right to complain to prison administrators was not clearly established. The note asked "[who] do you think you are" and promised "I will see you or whomever in court." (Orange County Jail, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
RESTRAINTS

Fuentes v. Wagner, 206 F.3d 335 (3rd Cir. 2000). An inmate who had been detained in a county prison while awaiting sentencing sued corrections officers and prison officials under § 1983 for the alleged use of excessive force. A district court jury returned a verdict in favor of the defendants and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that whether the inmate was placed in a restraint chair to stop his disruptive behavior and maintain prison order or for purposes of punishment was a jury question and that placement of the inmate in a restraint chair for eight hours did not violate substantive due process under the Eighth Amendment. The court noted that the inmate was not kept in the chair any longer than was authorized, his physical condition was checked every fifteen minutes and he was released every two hours for ten minutes to allow stretching, exercise, and use of the toilet. He was examined by a nurse at the end of the eight-hour period. According to the court, an inmate awaiting sentencing had the same status under the Constitution as a pretrial detainee and the Due Process Clause protected him from the use of excessive force amounting to punishment. (Berks County Prison, Pennsylvania)

U.S. District Court
FACIAL HAIR
HAIR LENGTH

Jackson v. District of Columbia, 89 F.Supp.2d 48 (D.D.C. 2000). Federal prisoners and District of Columbia prisoners who were serving their sentences in facilities operated by the Virginia Department of Corrections challenged the Department's grooming policy. The district court held that the policy, which required male prisoners to be clean-shaven and to keep their head hair short, did not violate the Religious Freedom Restoration Act (RFRA) nor the Free Exercise Clause of the First Amendment, even though it substantially burdened the prisoners' sincerely held beliefs. The court found the policy to be the least restrictive means to address the Department's compelling interests in prison security, gang elimination, inmate identification, and health and sanitation. (Virginia Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
RESTRAINTS
USE OF FORCE

Jackson v. Johnson, 118 F.Supp.2d 278 (N.D.N.Y. 2000). Representatives of a juvenile who was incarcerated in a youth center sought damages for injuries sustained by the juvenile when he was subjected to a physical restraint technique (PRT). The district court dismissed the defendants' motions for summary judgment, finding that there were fact issues as to whether aides applied excessive force in violation of the juvenile's substantive due process rights. The court held that the Eighth Amendment did not apply to incarcerated juveniles, but rather that the appropriate constitutional standard for evaluating the treatment of an adjudicated juvenile delinquent is the substantive due process guarantee of the Fourteenth Amendment. The court denied qualified immunity for a nurse at the center, holding that it was not objectively reasonable for her to conclude that the juvenile was faking injury in view of his unresponsiveness and general physical condition. A 220-pound aide had initiated a PRT on the 145-pound juvenile and was assisted by a 250-pound coworker. The PRT was applied for approximately ten minutes before the officer of the day arrived at the scene, by which time the juvenile had become unresponsive, clammy, was gasping for breath and was salivating. The PRT continued to be applied for another twenty minutes, under the supervision of the officer of the day, until the juvenile was rendered unconscious. The facility nurse was summoned and no attempts were made to revive the juvenile before the nurse arrived. After some treatment in the infirmary the juvenile was returned to his housing unit. Later, the juvenile had physical difficulty while in the cafeteria which prompted another round of PRT for more than twenty minutes. When the juvenile did not respond to attempts to resuscitate him, he was transported to a hospital where he remained in a comatose state for two months. The juvenile suffers from serious and permanent physical and mental injuries as the result of the use of force. (Louis Gossett Jr. Residential Center, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
RESTRAINTS PRETRIAL
DETAINEES

May v. Sheahan, 226 F.3d 876 (7th Cir. 2000). A pretrial detainee who suffered from Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome (AIDS) and was hospitalized brought an action against a county and county officials. The district court denied summary judgment for the sheriff on qualified immunity grounds and the sheriff appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the detainee stated an equal protection claim by alleging that the sheriff, for no legitimate reason, treated hospitalized detainees differently from jail detainees by shackling them to their beds and not taking them to court on their assigned court dates. The appeals court found that the allegation that the sheriff's restrictive policies caused the detainee to miss scheduled court appearances and impeded access to his attorney stated a claim for violation of his right of access to court. The appeals court found that the allegation that the sheriff implemented a policy that required him to be shackled to his bed around the clock, despite his weakened state and despite being watched by armed guards, was sufficient to state a substantive due process claim. (Cook County Jail, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
GANGS
SEPARATION

Miller v. Shelby County, 93 F.Supp.2d 892 (W.D.Tenn. 2000). A county jail inmate brought a § 1983 action against a county alleging injuries suffered in an attack by fellow inmates were the result of the jail's practice of permitting inmates of different security levels to take recreation together. The district court entered judgment for the plaintiff, finding that the jail's recreation policy posed a substantial risk of harm and that jail officials showed deliberate indifference to the risk posed by the policy. The court noted that whether the policy was official or not, it was pervasive enough to be considered a de facto policy. The jail policy allowed inmates of different security levels to take recreation together, including gang members who were allowed to mix with protective-custody inmates. The inmate had been attacked by gang members and the court found that jail officials had both general and specific knowledge of threats against the inmate by gang members yet took no affirmative steps to protect the inmate, including the "readily available step of ending [the] mixed-recreation practice." The inmate suffered permanent impairment to his shoulder. The district court awarded $40,000 to the inmate. (Shelby County Corr'l Ctr., Tennessee)

U.S. District Court
FIRE SAFETY

Oladipupo v. Austin, 104 F.Supp.2d 643 (W.D.La. 2000). A detainee of the Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS) who was awaiting removal from the United States brought a § 1983 action against parish jail officials challenging the constitutionality of his conditions of confinement. The district court found that the fact that INS detainees held at the parish jail had fewer privileges than INS detainees held at a federal detention center did not violate the Equal Protection Clause. The court also found that housing INS detainees with convicted prisoners did not violate the Due Process Clause. The court denied summary judgment for the officials on the allegation that the housing unit at the jail had serious sewage problems that created unsanitary conditions. The court also denied summary judgment to the officials on the allegation that the jail had an inadequate number of emergency exits. (Avoyelles Parish Jail, Louisiana)

U.S. District Court
ESCAPE
SEARCHES

Richards v. Southeast Alabama Youth Ser. Diversion, 105 F.Supp.2d 1268 (M.D.Ala. 2000). The mother of a detainee who had committed suicide while in custody brought a civil rights action against city and county officials. The district court denied Eleventh Amendment immunity to the city defendants and denied summary judgment for the defendants on a deliberate indifference claim. The district court held that summary judgment was precluded by issues of material fact as to whether the actions of the police officer who transported the detainee to a privately-owned facility rose above the level of mere negligence and constituted deliberate indifference, and whether his actions were the proximate cause of the detainee's death. Despite his knowledge of the detainee's suicidal tendencies, the officer failed to search the detainee for weapons, failed to handcuff the detainee, and failed to inform the subsequent custodians of the detainee's suicidal proclivities. The court also found fact issues as to whether the actions or inactions of juvenile probation officers rose above the level of mere negligence and constituted deliberate indifference, and whether the detainee was in the custody of the officers at the time he escaped from the detention facility and committed suicide with a gun he had surreptitiously brought into the facility. The detainee had been taken to a privately-operated "diversion center" and was left alone in an intake room where he produced a gun, fled the center, walked into a wooded area and fatally shot himself. (Southeast Alabama Youth Services Diversion Center)

U.S. District Court
CLASSIFICATION
ESCAPE

Rivera Borrero v. Rivera Correa, 93 F.Supp.2d 122 (D.Puerto Rico 2000). An inmate brought a pro se § 1983 action against Puerto Rico corrections officials alleging that he had been unjustifiably kept in maximum security custody for more than three years before being reclassified to medium security. The inmate also sought to compel his reclassification to minimum security custodial status. The district court dismissed the case, finding that the inmate's three years in maximum security custody status was not arbitrary because the inmate had been charged with escape. Commenting on the case, Judge Casellas opened by stating "This case is a good example of the thicket of claims and arguments that can flourish from a pro se prisoner's understandable effort to save his complaint from doom." (Servicios Correccionales de Puerto Rico, Guayama Facility)

U.S. District Court
SEGREGATION

Valentin v. Murphy, 95 F.Supp.2d 99 (D.Conn. 2000). A pretrial detainee who was a former law enforcement officer charged with drug crimes, challenged his pretrial conditions of confinement in a state prison. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants, finding that placement of the detainee in a segregation unit of a special prison was not "punishment" subject to due process. The court noted that the placement was for the detainee's own protection based on his status as an ex-law enforcement officer and that his conditions were better overall than those imposed on other inmates in the segregation unit. (Special Management Unit at the Walker Reception Center, Connecticut)

U.S. Appeals Court
RESTRAINTS

Williams v. Department of Corrections, 208 F.3d 681 (8th Cir. 2000). An inmate brought a civil rights action against the Iowa Department of Corrections and other defendants alleging that they had retaliated against him for participating in a hearing by placing leg irons on him too tightly.

The district court dismissed the action and the inmate appealed. The appeals court held that the inmate stated a retaliation claim against two correctional officers alleging that they placed leg shackles too tightly on the inmate and refused to loosen or remove the shackles after he complained. The inmate suffered intense pain, swelling and bruises. (Anamosa State Penitentiary, Iowa)

U.S. District Court
RESTRAINTS

Williams v. Goord, 111 F.Supp.2d 280 (S.D.N.Y. 2000). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against corrections officials alleging constitutional violations. The district court held that the conditions and duration of the prisoner's 75-day confinement in a Special Housing Unit (SHU) did not violate the prisoner's due process rights because they did not pose atypical or significant hardships. The conditions of the SHU included limited exercise times that were conducted in "cages" and limitations on the number of showers per week. The district court held that the fact that a prison employee issued a purportedly false misconduct report against the prisoner three days after he filed a grievance against the employee was insufficient to establish the prisoner's retaliation claim. But the district court denied summary judgment for the defendants on the issue of whether the officials knew that keeping the prisoner in mechanical restraints during his exercise period violated the Eighth Amendment. The court also held that there were genuine issues of material fact regarding whether placing the prisoner in mechanical restraints during his one-hour exercise period caused him "physical injury" as required by the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA) to prevail on his Eighth Amendment claim. (Sullivan Correctional Facility, New York)

2001

U.S. Appeals Court
PRETRIAL DETAINEES
RESTRAINTS

Benjamin v. Fraser, 264 F.3d 175 (2nd Cir. 2001). A city corrections department moved for immediate termination of consent decrees requiring judicial supervision over restrictive housing, inmate correspondence, and law libraries at city jails, pursuant to the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA). The district court vacated the decrees and pretrial detainees appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. On remand the district court granted the motion in part and denied it in part and the city appealed. The appeals affirmed. The appeals court held that the detainees were not required to show actual injury when they challenged regulations which allegedly adversely affected their Sixth Amendment right to counsel by impeding attorney visitation. The appeals court concluded that there was a continuing need for prospective relief with respect to the detainees' right to counsel, and the relief granted by the district court satisfied the requirements of PLRA. The court found that detainees were experiencing unjustified delays during attorney visitation. The district court required procedures to be established to ensure that attorney visits commenced within a specified time period following arrival at the jail, and the city was instructed to ensure the availability of an adequate number of visiting rooms that provide the requisite degree of privacy. The appeals court held that the restraints used when moving certain detainees within, or outside, the jail, had a "severe and deleterious effect" on the detainees given that such restraints were often painful and could result in injury. The appeals court agreed with the district court that detainees were entitled to reasonable after-the-fact procedural protections to ensure that such restrictions were terminated reasonably soon if they were not justified. These procedures include a hearing, written decision, timely review of appeal from placement in special restraint status, and the opportunity to seek further review based on good cause. (New York City Department of Correction)

U.S. Appeals Court
SECURITY PRACTICES

Curley v. Perry, 246 F.3d 1278 (10th Cir. 2001). A state inmate brought a pro se civil rights action seeking to restrict inmate-to-inmate correspondence in the state's prison system. The district court dismissed the complaint and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the inmate failed to state an Eighth Amendment claim. The inmate had claimed that prison officials created unconstitutional conditions of confinement by failing to prevent or monitor inmate-to-inmate correspondence, which was allegedly used by inmates to plan violence against other inmates. The court noted that the inmate had been placed in administrative segregation for his own safety, precluding a showing of requisite deliberate indifference to the inmate's health and safety. The inmate alleged that he had been targeted by members of the "Security Threat Group," a group of state inmates who take retaliatory actions against other inmates. (Central New Mexico Correctional Facility)

U.S. District Court
MEDIA ACCESS

Entertainment Network, Inc. v. Lappin, 134 F.Supp.2d 1002 (S.D.Ind. 2001). An Internet content provider sued a penitentiary warden and other government officials seeking declaratory and injunctive relief. The plaintiff wanted to broadcast the execution of the defendant who had been convicted of the bombing of the federal building in Oklahoma City, live over the Internet. The district court entered judgment for the defendants. The court found that the challenged prison regulation was not subject to strict scrutiny and was reasonably related to legitimate penological interests. The challenged regulation prohibited photographic, audio and visual recording devices at federal executions. The court noted that the First Amendment right of the press to gather news and information is not without limits, and that the press has no constitutional right of access to prisons or their inmates beyond that afforded to the general public. According to the court, the plaintiff was not being discriminated against because of the medium or means by which it sought to broadcast the execution, although the regulation allowed written or verbal accounts of executions. (United States Penitentiary, Terre Haute, Indiana)

U.S. Appeals Court
RIOT

Jeffers v. Gomez, 267 F.3d 895 (9th Cir. 2001). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against prison officials after being shot during a prison riot The district court denied the officials' motion for summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds and they appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded, finding that the officials were qualifiedly immune from civil rights liability and were not deliberately indifferent. The court noted that prison officials had investigated rumors of impending inmate violence before the riot and there was no evidence that they should have done anything differently once the threat materialized. According to the court, a prison warden complied with a statewide housing practice and he had no affirmative duty to change the policy. The inmate had been shot in the neck during the disturbance. (California State Prison, Sacramento)

U.S. District Court
VISITS

Glaspy v. Malicoat, 134 F.Supp.2d 890 (W.D.Mich. 2001). A prison visitor sued a corrections officer, alleging that the officer violated his constitutional rights when the officer refused the visitor's request to use the bathroom during a visit to an inmate. The district court held that the officer violated the visitor's substantive due process rights by refusing to permit him to use the restroom, and awarded $5,000 in compensatory damages and $5,000 in punitive damages. The 69-year-old visitor and the inmate he was visiting had informed the officer several times that the visitor was in pain and that he needed urgently to use the restroom. The officer, who laughed at the visitor's situation, was found to have been deliberately indifferent to the visitor's due process rights. The court noted that the visitor suffered pain and discomfort for a period of time, as well as extreme humiliation when he urinated in his pants in front of others, and inconvenience in having to deal with his wet pants at the facility and on the way home. (Newberry Corr'l Facility, Mich.)

U.S. Appeals Court
RESTRAINTS

Hawkins v. Comparet-Cassani, 251 F.3d 1230 (9th Cir. 2001). A convicted prisoner who had a "stun belt" placed on him, and activated, when he appeared in court for sentencing, brought a § 1983 action. The district court certified a class action and granted a preliminary injunction. The appeals court reversed in part and remanded. The appeals court held that the class of all persons in the custody of the county sheriff was improperly certified since the convicted prisoner could not serve as a representative for those prisoners who had not yet been convicted. The appeals court also found the district court injunction against the use of the belt was overbroad because it did not allow for use of the belt to protect courtroom security, such as restricting violence or preventing escape. But the court noted that even at sentencing, where a defendant's guilt is no longer in dispute, shackling is inherently prejudicial and detracts from the dignity and decorum of the proceeding, and impedes the defendant's ability to communicate with his counsel. (Los Angeles County, California)

U.S. Appeals Court
USE OF FORCE
DISTURBANCE

Jeffers v. Gomez, 240 F.3d 845 (9th Cir. 2001). An inmate who was shot by a correctional officer during a prison disturbance brought a civil rights action to recover for alleged violations of his constitutional rights. The district court denied summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds for the defendants. The appeals court reversed and remanded, finding that officers were qualifiedly immune from liability to the inmate. The court noted that the shot that one of the officers fired was aimed at an inmate who was attacking the plaintiff with a knife but accidentally hit the plaintiff in the neck. (California State Prison at Sacramento)

U.S. Appeals Court
RESTRAINTS

Kostrzewa v. City of Troy, 247 F.3d 633 (6th Cir. 2001). An arrestee sued a city and police officers asserting claims for use of excessive force. The district court dismissed the case but the appeals court reversed and remanded. The appeals court held that the allegations supported a claim for use of excessive force and that the officers were not entitled to qualified immunity. The appeals court found that the city's handcuff policy, that required all detainees to wear handcuffs, supported a § 1983 claim of the arrestee who allegedly suffered pain and injury from being restrained with handcuffs that were too small for his wrists, despite being arrested for a non-violent misdemeanant offense.

U.S. Appeals Court
GANGS

Mayoral v. Sheahan, 245 F.3d 934 (7th Cir. 2001). A pretrial detainee who was severely injured in a gang-instigated jailhouse riot brought a civil rights suit against a county sheriff and jail officers, alleging they were deliberately indifferent to his safety. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants and the detainee appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part and remanded. The appeals court held that the failure of the jail to segregate inmates by gang affiliation was not a constitutional violation, given the high number of gang members housed in the jail and the burden that would be placed on administrators by such a policy. The court found that summary judgment was precluded by fact issues as to whether the detainee had asked an officer for protective custody and was ignored, and whether an officer delayed in summoning help when fighting broke out. (Cook County Jail, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
EMERGENCY DRILL
FIRE SAFETY

Ostrander v. Horn, 145 F.Supp.2d 614 (M.D.Pa. 2001). An inmate filed a § 1983 action concerning his forced participation in an emergency preparedness drill. The district court held that the action taken by correctional officers in conjunction with a drill did not rise to the level of a constitutional violation. The officers had handcuffed the prisoner, removed him from his cell, forcefully taken him to a temporary holding cell for a short period of time, and strip-searched him before he was returned to his cell. According to the court, any inconvenience caused to the inmate by the emergency preparedness and fire evacuation drill was offset by the need of prison officials and emergency response team officers to secure the safety and security of the institution. (State Correctional Institution, Frackville, Pennsylvania)

U.S. Appeals Court
CLOTHING

Thornton v. Phillips County, Arkansas, 240 F.3d 728 (8th Cir. 2001). A jail inmate brought a § 1983 suit against a county, police officers and paramedics based on his treatment after he was injured in a fall that was allegedly caused by a jail jumpsuit that was too long. The district court dismissed the action, and the appeals court affirmed the district court finding that the allegations, including assertions that paramedics tried to put him on a stretcher while his foot was caught between stairs, alleged no more than mere negligence. (Phillips County Jail, Arkansas)

U.S. District Court
"LOCK-IN"
LOCK DOWN

Waring v. Meachum, 175 F.Supp.2d 230 (D.Conn. 2001). Inmates brought several class actions against prison administrators and correctional officers alleging constitutional violations during a lockdown. The actions were consolidated and the district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court held that where a genuine emergency exists, officials may be more restrictive than they otherwise may be, and certain services may be suspended temporarily without violating the Eighth Amendment. The lockdown was precipitated by a series of prisoner assaults on staff and other prisoners. According to the court, the provision of cold food is not, by itself, an Eighth Amendment violation as long as it is nutritionally adequate and is prepared and served under conditions that do not present an immediate danger to the health and well-being of the inmates who consume it. The prisoners had been served primarily sandwiches for lunch and dinner, and cold cereal for breakfast, during an eight-day lockdown. The court noted that the diet was without fruits and vegetables, but that it was imposed for only a short period. According to the court, any failure to provide religious diets during the course of the eight-day lockdown did not violate the Eighth Amendment absent evidence of deliberate indifference. The court noted that one inmate's first meal was confiscated but future meals were delivered, often in an untimely manner, and that a second inmate missed two meals during the lockdown. The court held that a delay in delivering a medically-prescribed diet for six days during the lockdown did not violate the Eighth Amendment.The court found that refusal to allow prisoners to shower during the eight-day lockdown did not rise to the level of an Eighth Amendment violation, nor was failure to provide prisoners with changes of clothing during the lockdown. (Connecticut Corr'l Institution at Somers)

U.S. District Court
EXERCISE

Williams v. Goord, 142 F.Supp.2d 416 (S.D.N.Y. 2001). An inmate who was confined in segregation brought a § 1983 suit alleging constitutional violations and seeking declaratory relief, compensatory damages and punitive damages. The district court denied summary judgment for the defendants, finding that whether handcuff and waist chain restraints may have prevented the inmate from engaging in "meaningful exercise" for 28 days was a fact issue that needed to be resolved. The district court noted that a prisoner may be denied out-of-cell exercise under what is termed a "safety exception," but that a blanket policy denying such prisoners any opportunity for out-of-cell exercise could not be justified. The court found that lower ranking prison officers, who had no input into the development and implementation of restraint policies and believed they were following lawful orders, were entitled to qualified immunity. (Sullivan Corr'l Facility, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
SECURITY
RESTRICTIONS
SEPARATION

Yousef v. Reno, 254 F.3d 1214 (10th Cir. 2001). An inmate who had been convicted of conspiracy to blow up aircraft and for participation in the World Trade Center bombing, was placed under "special administrative measures" (SAM) by the federal Bureau of Prisons to protect himself and prison personnel. Under these measures his access to mail, telephone calls, and visitors was limited, as were his privileges to carry religious materials, and opportunities for recreation and exercise time. The inmate brought a Bivens action challenging his conditions of confinement. The district court dismissed the claims and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed and remanded, finding that the Bureau of Prisons had the discretionary power to implement the measures against the inmate. (F.C.I. Administrative Maximum, Florence, Colorado)

2002

U.S. District Court
RELIGIOUS SERVICES
GANGS

Allah v. Al-Hafeez, 208 F.Supp.2d 520 (E.D.Pa. 2002). A prisoner brought a civil rights action against prison officials. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court held that the prisoner's two-month exclusion from religious services did not violate his First Amendment rights, in light of security and economic concerns. The prisoner had challenged a prison chaplain about the chaplain's teaching and the two had a disagreement, resulting in his exclusion from services for two months. The court also found no First Amendment violation in the prison's failure to hire a minister, or appoint a prisoner as a minister, for an additional Nation of Islam faith group, because of security and economic concerns. The court found that a prison regulation that prohibited group calisthenics in the prison yard was reasonably related to ensuring security and avoiding gang activity. Although the court found that there were genuine issues of material fact concerning the potential violation of the prisoner's free exercise rights when officials failed to provide entirely appropriate meals during Ramadan, the court concluded that the officials were entitled to qualified immunity because they did not know at the time that their conduct violated the prisoner's constitutional rights. The officials had attempted to observe Ramadan meal restrictions, but failed by including beans in the menu. (State Correctional Institution at Frackville, Pennsylvania)

U.S. District Court
MAIL

Ashker v. California Dept. of Corrections, 224 F.Supp.2d 1253 (N.D.Cal. 2002). State prisoners brought a § 1983 action challenging a prison requirement that books received from vendors have a special shipping label attached, alleging violation of their First Amendment rights. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the prisoners and held that injunctive relief was warranted. The court held that the policy unduly burdened the prisoners' First Amendment rights, noting that the policy was not applied to non-book packages. The court also noted that the goal of reducing opportunities for contraband smuggling could be met by comparing a generic package label with an invoice inside a package, and that the prison was already searching all mail for contraband. (Security Housing Unit, Pelican Bay State Prison, California)

U.S. Appeals Court
MEDIA ACCESS

California First Amendment Coalition v. Woodford, 299 F.3d 868 (9th Cir. 2002). Nonprofit organizations, whose members included journalists who attended and reported on state executions, brought an action against state prison officials, challenging a regulation that barred public viewing of lethal injection procedures prior to the actual administration of the injection. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the plaintiffs. The appeals court reversed and remanded. On remand, the district court entered a judgment that permanently enjoined prison officials from preventing uninterrupted viewing of executions, from the moment the condemned entered the execution chamber through the time the condemned was declared dead. The state again appealed and the appeals court affirmed, finding that the public has a First Amendment right to view executions and that the prison regulation impermissibly restricted this right. (San Quentin State Prison, California)

U.S. Appeals Court
DISTURBANCE
USE OF FORCE

Combs v. Wilkinson, 315 F.3d 548 (6th Cir. 2002). Death row inmates sued several state corrections supervisors and officers under § 1983, alleging that they used excessive force in quelling a disturbance in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The district court granted the defendants' motions for summary judgment and dismissal, and the inmates appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, and reversed and remanded in part. The appeals court held that an individual officer's use of mace was not malicious or sadistic. The court found that summary judgment was precluded by fact questions as to whether the commander of a special response team adequately briefed the team members, and failed to control the use of chemical agents in the extraction of inmates. The court held that the commander was not liable under § 1983 for failing to admonish team members when he overheard them discussing particular inmates that they wanted to "beat," absent any showing that the commander encouraged or directly participated in the use of excessive force. The court found that the inmates were not entitled to an injunction requiring corrections officers to wear name tags or other identification and to videotape cell extractions, even though their failure to do so was a violation of state corrections policies and regulations. (Mansfield Corr'l Institution, Ohio)

U.S. District Court
FIRE SAFETY

Derby Industries, Inc. v. Chestnut Ridge Foam, 202 F.Supp.2d 818 (N.D.Ind. 2002). A manufacturer of a mattress intended for use in prisons sued a competitor for false advertising. The district court denied the plaintiff's request for a preliminary injunction, finding that a video tape was neither false nor misleading, and that the plaintiff manufacturer was not being irreparably harmed. The court found that the video advertisement, which depicted a flammability test for its and a competitor's products, was not literally false, noting that the test was a general procedure which could be per-formed in several ways. The plaintiff identified only one customer who was confused, and their con-fusion was not substantial enough for the manufacturer to lose business. (Derby Industries, Indiana)

U.S. Appeals Court
SECURITY PRACTICES

Fraise v. Terhune, 283 F.3d 506 (3rd Cir. 2002). State inmates brought a § 1983 action against corrections officials challenging their classification and treatment as members of a "Security Threat Group" (STG). The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the officials and the inmates appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the STG policy did not violate the inmates' free exercise or equal protection rights, and that the transfer of the inmates to a STG management unit did not deprive them of a protected liberty interest. According to the court, the inmates' free exercise rights were not violated by the STG policies and practices because the officials had a legitimate and neutral objective in maintaining order and security in the prison system, and the officials had adequate grounds to conclude that the inmates were "core members" of an STG. The court noted that the inmates had alternative means available to practice their religion, which they call the Five Percent Nation. The inmates were recognized leaders of the Five Percent Nation and had taken documented roles in the group's activities. The appeals court found no violation of the inmates' equal protection rights because the inmate group had demonstrated a greater propensity for violence, and religion did not play any role in the decision to treat the group as an STG. The inmates were not deprived of a protected liberty interest by their transfer to the STG Management Unit because they were not subjected to a longer period of confinement and the transfer did not impose any atypical or significant hardships on them. (New Jersey Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
MAIL

Hall v. Johnson, 224 F.Supp.2d 1058 (E.D.Va. 2002). A state prison inmate sued a state corrections department under § 1983 claiming that a policy that limited incoming mail to one ounce per envelope violated his First Amendment rights. The district court entered judgment for the defendant. The court found that the regulation served a legitimate penological interest in reducing avenues for smuggling contraband into the facility, that the aggregate amount of mail an inmate could receive was not affected, and that there would be an adverse negative ripple effect on prison security if the ban were to be lifted. The court noted that no viable alternatives had been put forward by the plaintiff. (Red Onion State Prison, Virginia)

U.S. District Court
LOCKDOWN

In Re Bayside Prison Litigation, 190 F.Supp.2d 755 (D.N.J. 2002). State prison inmates brought a § 1983 action against prison officials alleging numerous alleged constitutional violations. The district denied the defendants' motion to dismiss as it pertained to those inmates who alleged that the § 1983 actions were racially motivated, and noted that there was no available remedy for the inmates to exhaust before filing suit. According to the court, the grievance procedures described in the state prison's inmate handbook were not sufficiently clear, expeditious, or respected by prison officials to constitute an "available administrative remedy" for the purposes of the requirements of the Prison Litigation Reform At (PLRA). Noting frustration with the litigation, which "is, incredibly, still in its initial phases almost four-and-a-half years after the first complaint was filed," the court addressed "this latest, and presumably last Motion to Dismiss." The plaintiffs, hundreds of inmates at a state correctional facility, alleged that following a fatal stabbing of a corrections officer, a lockdown was ordered, during which they suffered "a panoply of injuries at the hands of the Defendants." (Bayside State Correctional Facility, New Jersey)

U.S. Appeals Court
VISITS
SEARCHES
SECURITY
PRACTICES

Jordan Ex Rel. Johnson v. Taylor, 310 F.3d 1068 (8th Cir. 2002). An action was brought on behalf of an eight-year-old prison visitor who was subjected to a partial strip search without reasonable suspicion. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendant, a correctional officer, and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the encounter did not constitute a partial strip "search" for which reasonable suspicion was required, where the visitor and the grandmother who had brought the girl were told that they could leave at any time. The eight-year-old girl triggered the metal detector that was used to screen potential prison visitors. All concerned agreed that the metal detector was probably triggered by the buttons on the girl's overalls. The girl removed her overalls in a bathroom while a female officer watched, which the court found to be consensual. (Pine Bluff Unit, Arkansas Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
MAIL

Oliver v. Powell, 250 F.Supp.2d 593 (E.D.Va. 2002). A prisoner brought a civil rights action alleging various constitutional violations. The prisoner and the defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants on all of the prisoner's claims. The court upheld the prison policy of opening and reading inmates' incoming general correspondence, finding it was content neutral and that it was reasonably related to legitimate penological interests in maintaining security and discipline and in suppressing contraband. The court also upheld the prison regulation that limited the size and weight of incoming general correspondence, to one envelope and one ounce, finding that it did not violate the prisoner's First Amendment rights. The court noted that the regulation was a reasonable response to the need to expedite mail processing time, preventing a strain on prison resources, and that no ready alternatives were presented. The court approved of the prison regulation that authorized personnel to open, examine, and censor any outgoing prisoner mail upon reasonable suspicion of illegal activity, noting that the regulation was narrowly drawn to reach only material that might pose a security risk to inmates, officials, and the institution. (Southampton Corr'l Center, Virginia)

U.S. Appeals Court
CONFIDENTIAL
INFORMATION

Peate v. McCann, 294 F.3d 879 (7th Cir. 2002). A state prisoner brought a civil rights against a corrections officer, alleging Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment violations in connection with a prison fight. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the prisoner. The appeals court reversed and remanded, finding that genuine issues of material fact precluded summary judgment as to whether the officer acted with deliberate indifference toward the safety and health of the inmate. The appeals court also held that the prisoner was not entitled to information contained in a prison investigation file. The prisoner had been attacked twice by a fellow prisoner, and blamed the officer for failing to break up the second fight. (Miami Corr'l Facility, Indiana)

U.S. Appeals Court
GANGS

Rogers v. Morris, 34 Fed.Appx. 481 (7th Cir. 2002). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action alleging that prison regulations violated his First Amendment rights. The district court granted summary judgment to the defendants and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that prison regulations banning pornography and material that teaches or advocates behavior consistent with a gang did not violate the prisoner's First Amendment rights. Under the regulation, prison officials had withheld various magazines devoted to hip-hop music and culture, and certain "internet materials" sent to him by mail. (Wisconsin)

U.S. Appeals Court
PUBLICATIONS

Sorrels v. McKee, 290 F.3d 965 (9th Cir. 2002). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against prison officials, alleging that enforcement of a prison policy that prohibits a prisoner from receiving publications as a gift violated his First Amendment and due process rights. The district court granted summary judgment for the prison officials and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the officials were entitled to qualified immunity because the unconstitutionality of the ban on gift publications had not been established at the time of their actions. In an earlier decision (Crofton v. Roe, 170 F.3d 957), the appeals court had found the policy unconstitutional and the state corrections department changed the policy. (Airway Heights Corrections Center, Washington)

U.S. Appeals Court
TRANSPORTATION
RESTRAINTS

Thielman v. Leean, 282 F.3d 478 (7th Cir. 2002). An inmate housed in a medium-security treatment facility for sexually violent persons brought a § 1983 action seeking declaratory and injunctive relief, alleging that the facility's inmate transport policy violated his rights to procedural due process and equal protection under the Fourteenth Amendment. The district court dismissed the case and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the inmate had no state-created liberty interest in being free from restraint during transportation, even if the state's statutes gave the inmate a right to the least restrictive conditions of confinement during transport. According to the court, subjecting sexually violent persons to full restraints during transport to and from the medium-security facility, while not subjecting mental health or other patients to such full restraints, did not violate the inmate's equal protection rights. The inmate had a medical condition that required him to be transported from the facility for outside medical treatment an average of three times per month. The transport policy stated, in part, that "Inmates shall be placed in full and double-locked restraints, chain-belt type waist restraints with attached handcuffs, security Blackbox, and leg restraints." (Wisconsin Resource Center)

U.S. Appeals Court
RIOT
USE OF FORCE

Torres-Viera v. Laboy-Alvarado, 311 F.3d 105 (1st Cir. 2002). A prisoner who was injured by a tear gas canister fired by a prison officials during a disturbance, brought a § 1983 action alleging violation of his Eighth Amendment rights. The district court dismissed the action and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the force was applied in a good faith effort to restore order, and was not malicious or sadistic. (Bayamon Correctional Institution, Puerto Rico)

U.S. Appeals Court
USE OF FORCE

Treats v. Morgan, 308 F.3d 868 (8th Cir. 2002). A state prisoner sued corrections officials under § 1983 alleging his Eighth Amendment rights were violated when he was sprayed with pepper spray and thrown to the floor. The district court denied the defendants' motion for summary judgment and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether it was reasonable for the officer to use of pepper spray and force against the prisoner who failed to obey commands, but who had not jeopardized any person's safety or threatened prison security. The prisoner alleged that he was sprayed in the face without any warning by an officer, and then thrown to the floor and handcuffed by a lieutenant. (North Center Unit, Arkansas Department of Correction)

U.S. Appeals Court
SECURITY
PRACTICES

U.S. v. Durham, 287 F.3d 1297 (11th Cir. 2002). A defendant challenged the use of an electric "stun belt" on him during his trial; his motion was denied by the district court. The defendant was subsequently convicted and appealed. The appeals court vacated and remanded, finding that the district court had abused its discretion by failing to make findings sufficient to justify the use of the stun belt during the trial. According to the court, physical restraints upon a criminal defendant at trial should be used as rarely as possible because their use tends to erode the presumption of innocence that is an integral part of a fair trial. The court held that use of the belt may have had an adverse impact on the defendant's ability to follow the proceedings and to take an active interest in the presentation of his case. The appeals court held that the novelty of the technology employed in the stun belt will likely cause the need for factual findings about the operation of the device, addressing issues such as the criteria for triggering the belt and potential for accidental discharge, to assess the need for its use as compared to less restrictive methods of restraint. The appeals court noted that the district court did not, on the record, consider any less restrictive alternatives to prevent escape and to ensure courtroom safety. The defendant had attempted to escape from a jail and had managed to slip out of a set of leg irons using a key he had concealed on his person. The defendant's attorney argued that the defendant would be "more concerned about receiving such a jolt than he is about thinking about the testimony and giving me aid and assistance in the defense of this case." The court suggested that a stun belt poses "a far more substantial risk of interfering with a defendant's Sixth amendment right to confer with counsel than do leg shackles. The fear of receiving a painful and humiliating shock for any gesture that could be perceived as threatening likely chills a defendant's inclination to make any movements during the trial-- including those movements necessary for effective communication with counsel." The appeals court also found that "stun belts have the potential to be highly detrimental to the dignified administration of criminal justice... If activated, the device poses a serious threat to the dignity and decorum of the courtroom." (U.S. District Court for the Northern District of Florida)

U.S. District Court
SECURITY RESTRIC-TIONS
SEGREGATION

U.S. v. Flores, 214 F.Supp.2d 1193 (D.Utah 2002). A prisoner who was indicted for alleged Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act (RICO) violations, filed a writ of habeas corpus challenging restrictions placed on his conditions of confinement. The district court denied the petition. The court held that the secure confinement of the prisoner was justified and that restrictions placed upon his confinement were warranted because the prisoner was a flight risk, and a danger to others. The court upheld restrictions on the prisoner's mail that required mail to be read for threats, conspiracy, or obstruction of justice efforts, because members of the prisoner's gang outside the prison could act on his instructions. The court also upheld that the limitation of one visitor per day and telephone restrictions. The court clarified that the prisoner's right of access to counsel included investigators or other special assistants working for the prisoner's attorney. (Utah State Prison)

U.S. Appeals Court
RESTRAINTS

Williams v. City of Las Vegas, 34 Fed.Appx. 297 (9th Cir. 2002). An arrestee brought a suit against a city and correctional officer alleging the use of excessive force. The district court granted summary judgment to the defendants and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the officer's use of force and restraints when the arrestee refused to cooperate during the booking process was not excessive under either the Eighth Amendment standard for prisoners, nor the Fourteenth Amendment standard for pretrial detainees. The court noted that all of the officer's conduct associated with this claim had been videotaped from three different positions by surveillance camer-as. According to the court, the use of waist and leg restraints on the inmate in his jail cell did not violate the Eighth Amendment, where the inmate had refused to stand still during a frisk search and displayed erratic and seemingly uncooperative behavior. (Las Vegas Dept. of Detention, Nevada)

U.S. District Court
TRANSPORTATION
RESTRAINTS

Williams-El v. McLemore, 213 F.Supp.2d 783 (E.D.Mich. 2002). A prisoner brought a civil rights action seeking monetary and equitable relief. The district court denied the defendants' summary judgment motion, in part. The court held that summary judgment was barred by genuine issues of material fact as to: whether officials were deliberately indifferent to the prisoner's protection from harm and the sufficiency of their actions to protect the prisoner from fellow inmates; and whether the inmate was disabled in the context of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA). The prisoner had a congenital deformity known as Kasabach Merritt Syndrome which caused his right hand to be severely curled inward at the wrist and caused pain when his extremities were improperly positioned. The prisoner alleged that prison officials failed to provide him with large handcuffs, rather than standard handcuffs, for transportation. The prisoner had also asked prison authorities for protection from other inmates, but was stabbed in the back five times while in a prison yard. (Standish Maximum Security Facility, and Josephine McCallum Facility, Michigan)

2003

U.S. Appeals Court
BOOKS
PUBLICATIONS
MAIL

Ashker v. California Dept. of Corrections, 350 F.3d 917 (9th Cir. 2003). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action challenging a prison policy that requires books and magazines mailed to a prison to have approved vendor labels affixed to them. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the prisoner and issued a permanent injunction against the defendants. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the policy was not rationally related to the prison's asserted interest in security and order, and therefore violated the prisoner's First Amendment rights. The court noted that the prison already required that books be sent directly from approved vendors, allowing officials to reduce contraband smuggling by checking address labels and invoices, and that the prison was still searching all mail for contraband. The court also noted that the policy was not applied to non-book packages. (Security Housing Unit, Pelican Bay State Prison, California)

U.S. District Court
RESTRAINTS
USE OF FORCE

Bane v. Virginia Dept. of Corrections, 267 F.Supp.2d 514 (W.D.Va. 2003). An inmate brought action against a state corrections department and prison officials, stemming from injuries allegedly suffered while being handcuffed. The district court denied motions to dismiss and for summary judgment. The court found that the inmate properly stated a prima facie claim under the Rehabilitation Act by alleging that he suffered from a chronically unstable right shoulder and that he had been issued a "cuff-front" pass by the corrections department medical personnel. The pass required prison personnel to cuff the inmate with his hands in front to accommodate his injury, but prison officers failed to heed the cuff pass and handcuffed the inmate's arms behind his back. The court noted that acceptance of federal funds by the state corrections department was a waiver of its sovereign immunity from liability under the federal Rehabilitation Act. The court ordered further proceedings to determine if officers destroyed a posted medical order pertaining to the inmate, whether another officer stood by as an officer handcuffed the inmate in a manner contrary to the posted medical order, and whether the officers maliciously intended to cause harm to the inmate. (Wallens Ridge State Prison, Virginia)

U.S. District Court
FIRE SAFETY

Boyd v. Anderson, 265 F.Supp.2d 952 (N.D.Ind. 2003). Prisoners filed a complaint in state court, alleging that state corrections officials had violated their federally-protected rights while they were confined in a state prison. The case was removed to federal court, where some of the claims were dismissed. The court noted that the Eight Amendment deliberate indifference standard applies to prison conditions affecting fire safety, although not all unsafe conditions constitute punishment under the Eighth Amendment. (Indiana State Prison)

U.S. Appeals Court
STAFFING

Cagle v. Sutherland, 334 F.3d 980 (11th Cir. 2003). The personal representative of the estate of a pretrial detainee who hung himself in his cell brought a § 1983 action, alleging that officials failed to prevent his suicide. The district court denied summary judgment in favor of the defendants and they appealed. The appeals court vacated and remanded. The appeals court held that the county's violation of a consent decree that arose out of a voluntary settlement of a prior jail conditions lawsuit, did not establish a violation of the pretrial detainee's constitutional rights actionable under § 1983. The consent decree required the county to provide a second nighttime jailer to staff the jail during the hours that the detainee committed suicide, but the court noted that the prior lawsuit was not concerned with the risk of prisoner suicides. According to the court, the county's failure to fund the second jailer did not rise to the level of deliberate indifference to the strong likelihood that a suicide would result. (Winston County Jail, Alabama)

U.S. Appeals Court
PRETRIAL DETAINEE
TRANSFER
TELEPHONE

Cavalieri v. Shepard, 321 F.3d 616 (7th Cir. 2003). The mother of a pretrial detainee who attempted suicide brought a § 1983 action against a police officer, alleging deliberate indifference to the detainee's risk of attempting suicide. The district court denied summary judgment for the officer and the officer appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that summary judgment was precluded by an issue of fact as to whether the officer was aware that the detainee was on the verge of trying to commit suicide and whether the officer was deliberately indifferent to the detainee's safety. The court noted that the detainee's right to be free from deliberate indifference to the risk that he would attempt suicide was clearly established. The detainee was transferred to a county facility after a brief period of detention in a city jail. When he was admitted to the county facility he was not placed on suicide watch, but he did ask to speak to a mental health advisor. He was assigned to a holding cell that contained a telephone with a strong metal cord. When the police officer called the county facility to complain about calls from the inmate, county employees found the detainee unconscious, hanging from the wire telephone cord. The detainee remained in a vegetative state after his unsuccessful suicide attempt. (Champaign County Correctional Facility, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
SECURITY PRACTICES

Glenn v. Berndt, 289 F.Supp.2d 1120 (N.D.Cal. 2003). A state inmate brought a pro se § 1983 action alleging that officers let two inmates assault him when he was returning to his cell after a lockdown. The inmate alleged that officers stood by and watched him fight with one of the inmates. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants. The court held that the accidental opening of two cells, allowing inmates to be released, could not be characterized as the wanton infliction of unnecessary pain in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The officers allegedly waited for other officers to arrive before opening a door into the area in which the fight was occurring. The court held that a reasonable officer could have believed that it was lawful to wait to enter the area until another officer, who was inside the block, exhausted his efforts to control the situation with a gas gun and pepper spray. (Pelican Bay State Prison, California)

U.S. Appeals Court
ITEMS PERMITTED

Kimberlin v. U.S. Dept. of Justice, 318 F.3d 228 (D.C.Cir. 2003). Prison inmates brought an action against the federal Bureau of Prisons (BOP) alleging that the BOP's ban on electric or electronic musical instruments, except those used in connection with religious activities, violated their constitutional rights to free expression and equal protection. The district court held that the policy did not violate the First Amendment, but entered summary judgment in favor of the inmates on their equal protection claim. The inmates appealed and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the BOP reasonably interpreted a statute that banned the use of appropriated funds for the "use or possession" of electric or electronic musical instruments, as a prohibition against the possession of such instruments. The court noted that even if the inmates' rights of free expression were implicated by the BOP regulation, it did not impermissibly infringe on those rights because it was reasonably related to the legitimate interest in conserving correctional funds, and inmates have access to alternatives such as voice and acoustic instruments. (Federal Correctional Institution at Cumberland, Maryland)

U.S. District Court
PROTECTION
RELIGIOUS SERVICES
SEGREGATION

Lewis v. Washington, 265 F.Supp.2d 939 (N.D.Ill. 2003). State inmates filed a class action under § 1983 alleging that prison officials violated their constitutional rights while they were in protective custody. The district court granted summary judgment for the officials, in part. The court held that officials were entitled to qualified immunity because it was not clearly established that inmates in temporary protective custody after they appealed denial of their requests for permanent protective custody, had First Amendment rights to communal religious services, and Fourteenth Amendment rights to programs and services equivalent to those offered to other inmates. (Stateville Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
RESTRAINTS

Myers v. Milbert, 281 F.Supp.2d 859 (N.D.W.Va. 2003). A state prisoner brought a pro se action against corrections officers, alleging that they violated his rights by inappropriately restraining him for 20 hours on a stretcher, and feeding him a "nutra-loaf" diet for three days. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the officers, finding that the prisoner did not suffer from a serious medical condition as a result of being restrained, and that the disciplinary nutra-loaf diet did not violate the prisoner's Eighth Amendment rights. The court noted that the inmate had assaulted a corrections officer and kicked a door. After being placed on the restraint stretcher, called a "stokes basket," the inmate's handcuffs were loosened and he was given numerous bathroom breaks, medications, and food and liquids. (Northern Regional Jail and Correctional Facility, West Virginia)

U.S. District Court
SEARCHES
SEGREGATION

Skundor v. McBride, 280 F.Supp.2d 524 (S.D.W.Va. 2003). An inmate brought claims against corrections officials, challenging visual body cavity searches. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court held that the prison practice of performing visual body cavity searches when dangerous, sequestered prisoners left a recreation area, was rationally related to the legitimate penological objective of staff safety and did not violate the prisoners' Fourth Amendment rights. The court noted that there was a potential for the exchange of weapons in the recreation area, and that prisoner privacy was addressed by using only male staff to perform the searches, and positioning the staff between the inmate and anyone else who might view him. According to the court, the searches were an efficient way to steadily process the large number of inmates seeking recreation, and there were no readily available alternatives to the recreation yard searches. (Mount Olive Correctional Center, West Virginia)

U.S. Appeals Court
TELEPHONE

U.S. v. Gangi, 57 Fed.Appx. 809 (10th Cir. 2003) [unpublished]. A defendant who was convicted for bank fraud challenged the taping of his jail telephone calls. The appeals court held that it was not objectively reasonable for the detainee to have any expectation of privacy in his outgoing calls from jail, and that the detainee impliedly consented to the taping of his calls from jail. The court noted that the detainee was cognizant of detention settings, which permitted a strong inference that he fully understood the fact that jail telephones were monitored. According to the court, the detainee was a "keen observer of detail" and was presumed to have seen signs above other telephones that provided notice of telephone monitoring. The court held that the Fourth Amendment is not triggered by the routine taping of outgoing jail calls. (Uinta County Detention Center, Wyoming)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEX OFFENDER

West v. Schwebke, 333 F.3d 745 (7th Cir. 2003). Civilly committed sex offenders brought a § 1983 action against employees of a state treatment facility, alleging that therapeutic seclusion as practiced at the facility violated their due process rights. The district court denied summary judgment for some of the employees and they appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the offenders were entitled, as a matter of due process, to the exercise of professional judgment as to the needs of residents and that due process requires that the conditions and duration of involuntary civil confinement bear some reasonable relation to the purpose for which the persons are committed. The court found that summary judgment was precluded by fact issues as to whether employees' use of seclusion against the offenders, for at least 20 days and as much as 82 consecutive days in one case, could be justified on either security or treatment grounds. The court noted that civil detention institutions may employ both incapacitation and deterrence to reduce violence within their walls, but if mental limitations render a detainee insensible to punishment, the only appropriate goal would be incapacitation. (Wisconsin Resource Center, Sand Ridge Secure Treatment Center)

U.S. District Court
SEARCHES

Wood v. Hancock County, 245 F.Supp.2d 231 (D.Me. 2003). A misdemeanor arrestee brought a civil rights action against a county and county officials, alleging he was subjected to unconstitutional strip searches while in jail. The district court denied the defendants' motions for judgment on the pleadings or for summary judgment. The court held that the arrestee stated a claim, precluding judgment on the pleadings. The court found that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of fact as to whether the jail policy of strip searching misdemeanor arrestees after contact visits was reasonable, and whether the jail had a custom of conducting strip searches upon admission. The court noted that further proceedings were needed to determine if it was a "custom" to strip search misdemeanor arrestees without reasonable suspicion that an arrestee harbored contraband or weapons, and that evidence suggested that officers did not comply with recording requirements for strip searches. (Hancock County Jail, Maine)

2004

U.S. District Court
CONTRABAND
SEARCHES

Allegheny County Prison Emp. v. County of Allegh., 315 F.Supp.2d 728 (W.D.Pa. 2004). Employees at a county jail brought a suit challenging its employee search policy, which involved random pat-down searches by same sex employees of all areas of the searched employee's body. including the abdomen and groin, as well as the removal of outer clothing, shoes and belts. The employees moved for a preliminary injunction. The district court denied the motion, finding that the employees failed to demonstrate the likelihood of success on their Fourth Amendment or equal protection claims. The court noted that the county had a strong government interest in controlling the flow of contraband into prisons, and that employees had a diminished expectation of privacy because they worked in a correctional facility. The search policy was uniformly applied to all employees and visitors who had contact with inmates. (Allegheny County Prison, Pennsylvania)

U.S. Appeals Court
CLASSIFICATION
SUPER MAX
SECURITY RESTRIC-TIONS

Austin v. Wilkinson, 372 F.3d 346 (6th Cir. 2004). State inmates housed at a supermaximum security prison facility brought a class action against corrections officials under § 1983, alleging violations of their procedural due process rights. The district court ruled that officials had violated the inmates' due process right and granted injunctive relief. The court ordered the adoption of a revised version of placement regulations and the officials appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part and remanded. The appeals court held that state inmates enjoyed a due process protected liberty interest in not being placed at a supermaximum facility, but that the district court did not have the power to order state officials to modify their predicates. The appeals court upheld the procedural modifications made by the district court to the state's placement and retention policies, which included increased notice requirements and changes to the administrative appellate procedure. The court noted past erroneous and haphazard placements at the facility, and the availability of administrative segregation to ensure the state's interest in safety. The appeals court found that the proper comparison was within the state's prison system, not between other supermaximum facilities in other states. The court held that confinement at the supermaximum facility imposed an atypical and significant hardship, given the extreme isolation visited upon inmates, lack of outdoor recreation, limitations on personal property rights and access to telephone and counsel, and ineligibility for parole. (Ohio State Penitentiary. Youngstown)

U.S. Appeals Court
MAIL

Bahrampour v. Lampert, 356 F.3d 969 (9th Cir. 2004). A state prisoner sued prison officials under § 1983, challenging a prison regulation that prohibited prisoners from receiving certain types of publications. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the prison officials and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, vacated and remanded in part. The appeals court held that the state regulation that prohibited prisoners from receiving sexually explicit materials, and a regulation that prohibited the receipt of "role playing" materials, were related to legitimate penological interests and were not vague or overly broad. The regulations were found to be neutral because they targeted the effect of certain types of materials. The court found that a body-building magazine received by the prisoner contained prohibited sexually explicit material, including an advertisement for a video depicting "Painful Erotic Domination." According to the court, the role-playing prohibition was intended to prevent prisoners from placing themselves in fantasy roles that reduced accountability and substituted raw power for legitimate authority. The court noted that such games often contained dice, which were prohibited gambling paraphernalia. The appeals court found that state prison officials were entitled to qualified immunity on the prisoner's claim that a regulation prohibiting materials by bulk mail was unconstitutional. Although an appeals court established that the prohibition of commercial bulk mail was unconstitutional, the officials could not be expected to have known this at the time of the incidents. Officials had rejected the inmate's receipt of a Green Lantern comic book because it was delivered by bulk mail. (Snake River Correctional Institution, Oregon)

U.S. Appeals Court
TRANSPORTATION

Brown v. Missouri Dept. of Corrections, 353 F.3d 1038 (8th Cir. 2004). A state inmate brought a § 1983 action, alleging that officials were liable for injuries he received in an accident while en route to a correctional facility, for denying post-accident care, and for providing inadequate care. The district court dismissed the action and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The court held that the inmate had sufficiently alleged § 1983 claims for deliberate indifference to his safety and deliberate indifference to his medical needs. The inmate alleged that he asked officials to fasten his seatbelt and they refused, and that he was unable to do it himself because he was shackled. The inmate also alleged that he asked correctional officers of three occasions to let him see medical staff, claiming he was having severe complications from the accident, including difficulty seeing and standing and shaky legs, but his requests were ignored. (Jefferson City Correctional Center, Missouri)

U.S. District Court
CLASSIFICATION
SEPARATION

Carmichael v. Richards, 307 F.Supp.2d 1014 (S.D.Ind. 2004). A county jail prisoner who was injured by his cellmate brought a § 1983 action against a sheriff in his individual and official capacities, claiming that the sheriff failed to take reasonable measures to ensure his physical safety, and did not provide necessary medical care. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court held that the sheriff could not be held individually liable for failing to ensure the physical safety of a medium security inmate who was injured by a maximum security inmate, absent evidence that the sheriff knew of a substantial risk that the inmate would be harmed, or evidence of a causal link between the policy of mixing of medium and maximum security prisoners and the increased risk of violence. The court also found that the sheriff was not liable in his official capacity. The jail had three types of cell classifications: maximum, medium and minimum security. Inmates are classified by the shift leader who is on duty at the time an inmate arrives at the jail. (Johnson County Jail, Indiana)

U.S. Appeals Court
USE OF FORCE
RESTRAINTS

Guerra v. Drake, 371 F.3d 404 (8th Cir. 2004). A pretrial detainee brought civil rights claims seeking damages from correctional officers, alleging they used excessive force and left him in a "restraint" chair for prolonged periods. The district court entered judgment against a Captain for $1,500 on the restraint chair claim and against another officer for $500 on the excessive force claim. The district court refused to award punitive damages and the detainee appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the district court's refusal to award punitive damages was not an abuse of discretion. The inmate had alleged that during his first six days of detention he was subjected to unprovoked beatings and was placed in a "torture chair" for long periods. (Benton County Detention Center, Arkansas)

U.S. Appeals Court
FIRE SAFETY

Hadix v. Johnson, 367 F.3d 513 (6th Cir. 2004). State inmates filed a class action under § 1983 alleging that their conditions of confinement violated their constitutional rights. Their claims were settled by a consent decree. The district court denied prison officials' motion to terminate the consent decree and issued an injunction ordering the departmentalization of facilities as a fire safety remedy. The officials appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The appeals court held that the consent decree encompassed the cell blocks in question but that the district court judge abused his discretion when he found that current conditions violated the Eighth Amendment, because the court incorporated its principal findings from two years earlier, despite the fact that a number of issues had since been resolved. The appeals court also noted that the district court did not state the standard it was applying to find that conditions relating to fire safety and fire prevention were inadequate, and failed to identify the point at which certain fire safety deficiencies ceased being mere deficiencies and instead became constitutional violations. (State Prison of Southern Michigan, Central Complex)

U.S. Appeals Court
SAFETY

Hall v. Bennett, 379 F.3d 462 (7th Cir. 2004). An inmate brought a § 1983 claim against prison supervisors alleging deliberate indifference following an incident in which the inmate received a severe electrical shock while working as an electrician at the prison. The district court granted summary judgment for the supervisors and the inmate appealed. The appeals court vacated and remanded. The appeals court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the supervisors knew that the inmate could suffer a severe shock as a consequence of working on a live wire without protective gloves. (Correctional Industrial Facility, Pendleton, Indiana)

U.S. Appeals Court
STAFFING

McDowell v. Brown, 392 F.3d 1283 (11th Cir. 2004). A former inmate of a county jail brought a § 1983 Eighth Amendment action against a county, alleging improper failure to treat his emergency medical condition. The inmate also asserted negligence claims against the jail's health services subcontractor and against a nurse employed by the subcontractor. The district court dismissed the claims against the subcontractor and nurse and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the county jail's staffing problems, allegedly resulting from the county board's custom of inadequate budgeting for the sheriff's office and jail, did not satisfy the "custom or policy" requirement of the inmate's § 1983 action. The inmate alleged that the county failed to transport him to a hospital during a medical emergency. The court noted that the jail had a policy to call an ambulance to transport inmates with emergency medical needs if jail personnel were unable to do so. The inmate's transport to the hospital emergency room was delayed by nearly twelve hours as jail staff accomplished other transports. By the time the inmate arrived at the hospital he was experiencing paralysis in his legs. (Dekalb County Jail, Georgia, and Wexford Health Sources, Inc.)

U.S. Appeals Court
WHEELCHAIR

Miller v. King, 384 F.3d 1248 (11th Cir. 2004). A paraplegic state prisoner brought a § 1983 action alleging Eighth Amendment and Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) violations. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants on most of the claims, and following a jury trial entered judgment for a disciplinary hearing officer on the remaining claims. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part and remanded. The appeals court held that fact issues, as to whether the prisoner was afforded basic levels of humane care and hygiene, precluded summary judgment on the prisoner's § 1983 claims for monetary damages and injunctive relief under the Eighth Amendment. According to the court, the prisoner was "disabled" within the meaning of ADA and had standing to seek injunctive relief against a prison warden. The prisoner was due to remain in isolation for over eight years as the result of more than 180 disciplinary reports. Able-bodied inmates in disciplinary isolation are housed in less stringent units than the building in which the prisoner was housed. Because of the small cell size in his unit, prison policy calls for beds to removed daily so that wheelchair-bound inmates have some minimal area within with to move around in their cells. The prisoner alleged that there was no room in his cell, making him immobile and restrained for long periods of time, and that prison staff failed to remove the bed from his cell daily. The prisoner also alleged that the showers in the housing unit are not wheelchair-accessible. (Georgia State Prison)

U.S. Appeals Court
SAFETY

Reynolds v. Powell, 370 F.3d 1028 (10th Cir. 2004). A state inmate brought a pro se § 1983 action alleging that he was subjected to cruel and unusual punishment by being exposed to a hazardous condition in the prison shower area. The district court entered summary judgment in favor of the defendants and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the alleged slippery floors resulting from a standing water problem in the prison shower area did not rise to the level of a condition that posed a substantial risk of serious harm, even though the inmate was on crutches and had warned officials that he was at a heightened risk of falling. (Uinta IV Maximum Security Facility, Utah)

U.S. District Court
STAFFING

Thompson v. Spears, 336 F.Supp.2d 1224 (S.D.Fla. 2004). A prisoner brought an action against a county and a jail official, alleging deliberate indifference to his safety, negligent supervision, and negligent infliction of emotional distress. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court held that a lack of monitoring devices in jail cells did not pose an objectively substantial risk of harm to the inmate, particularly in light of the fact the state Model Jail Standards did not require cameras. The court found that the inmate presented no evidence that the officer posts were located so far that officers could not hear calls for help. The court held that the county was not liable under § 1983, even if jail officers did not actually follow the county policy of making hourly walk-throughs to monitor cells, where there was no evidence that the county had officially sanctioned or ordered the officers to disregard the county policy. The prisoner had been temporarily transferred from a state prison to the county jail in order to be involved in a family court matter. The inmate, who was from Jacksonville, Florida, alleged that he was severely beaten by other inmates for over two hours, after the Miami Dolphins beat the Jacksonville Jaguars in a football game. (Pretrial Detention Center, Miami-Dade County, Florida)

U.S. Appeals Court
ESCAPE

U.S. v. Sack, 379 F.3d 1177 (10th Cir. 2004). A defendant who had been ordered to reside in a halfway house following his arrest but failed to return after a day of work, pled guilty to escape. The inmate appealed and the appeals court held that the defendant was in custody, within the meaning of the escape statute, while he was ordered to reside in the halfway house. (La Pasada Halfway House, New Mexico)

U.S. District Court
RESTRAINTS

Watson v. Riggle, 315 F.Supp,2d 963 (N.D.Ind. 2004). A state prison inmate brought a pro se § 1983 Eighth Amendment action against corrections officers, alleging use of excessive force in connection with the removal of handcuffs. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the officers, finding that the officers who restrained the inmate's wrists in order to remove the handcuffs following the inmate's refusal to allow the removal, used reasonable force, given the inmate's argumentative nature and minimal injuries. The court noted that the inmate's argumentative nature could have led to a greater disturbance, and that a medical examination found only a cut on one hand and swelling in the wrist, with the full range of motion, and no further treatment was required. (Miami Correctional Facility, Indiana)

U.S. District Court
"LOCK-IN"

Wrinkles v. Davis, 311 F.Supp.2d 735 (N.D.Ind. 2004). Death row inmates at a state prison brought a § 1983 action in state court, alleging that a 79-day lockdown of the death row area violated their constitutional rights. The lockdown had been implemented after a death row inmate was killed during recreation, apparently by other death row inmates. The court held that ceasing, for security reasons, allowing religious volunteers into the death row unit for group religious services and for spiritual discussions during the lockdown did not violate the inmates' First Amendment right to practice their religion. The court also found no violation for the alleged denial of inmates' access to telephones for 55 days, to hygiene services for 65 days, to hot meals for 30 days, and to exercise equipment. According to the court, suspending all personal visits to death row inmates for the first 54 days of the lockdown did not violate the inmates' First Amendment rights, where visitation privileges were a matter subject to the discretion of prison officials. (Indiana State Prison)

2005

U.S. District Court
TRANSPORTATION
WHEELCHAIR

Allah v. Goord, 405 F.Supp.2d 265 (S.D.N.Y. 2005). A state inmate who used a wheelchair brought a pro se action alleging failure of corrections officials to safely transport him to and from outside medical providers. The district court granted the defendant's motions for dismissal in part, and denied in part. The court held that the inmate's allegations with respect to the state corrections department were sufficient to establish a violation of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA). According to the court, corrections officials were not entitled to qualified immunity from liability under § 1983 for injures sustained while being transported in an unsafe van, where their conduct amounted to more than an ordinary lack of due care for the prisoner's safety. The court held that their decision to place the inmate back in a wheelchair after he fell once demonstrated complete disregard for his safety. The inmate alleged that he suffered a "serious injury (to) his head, neck and back" when he fell to the floor of the van in question and suffered "unnecessary pain and discomfort, permanent disability, and mental distress." The van driver allegedly speeded and then stopped short on more than one occasion, and other wheelchair-using inmates had been injured in the same manner during transport. (Green Haven Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
FIRE SAFETY
PUBLICATIONS

Banks v. Beard, 399 F.3d 134 (3rd Cir. 2005). A state inmate brought a free speech challenge to a state corrections policy on behalf of himself and other similarly situated inmates. The policy restricted access to newspapers, magazines, and photographs by inmates who are placed in a prison's long-term segregation unit. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the state and the inmate appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded, finding that a valid, rational connection did not exist between the policy and a stated rehabilitation objective, nor prison security concerns. The court noted that confinement in the unit was not based on a specific rule infraction or for a specific duration, and that an inmate could remain in the unit under the publication ban indefinitely. According to the court, there was no evidence that inmates misused periodicals or photographs in ways described by corrections officials, such as to fuel fires or as crude weapons. There was no evidence regarding the effect of the ban on the frequency of fires, and inmates were permitted to possess other items that could be used for the purposes that were supposedly targeted by the policy. The court noted that inmates had no alternative means to exercise their First Amendment right of access to a reasonable amount of newspapers, magazines and photographs. The court described alternative policies, such as establishing reading periods in which periodicals could be delivered to inmates' cells and later collected, establishing a limit on the number of photographs that an inmate could have in his cell at one time, or escorting inmates to a secure mini-law library to read periodicals of their choosing. The policy bans all newspapers and magazines from a publisher or prison library, or from any source, unless the publication is religious or legal in nature. (State Correctional Institution at Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania)

U.S. Appeals Court
VISITS

Bazzetta v. McGinnis, 423 F.3d 557 (6th Cir. 2005). A class of state prisoners challenged restrictions on visitation. The district court entered judgment for the plaintiffs and the appeals court affirmed. The U.S. Supreme Court reversed and remanded. On remand, the district court declined to dissolve its injunctive order of compliance and the state corrections department appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded, finding that the department regulation that restricted visitation did not, on its face, violate procedural due process. The court noted that prisoners do not have a protected liberty interest in visitation. The regulation indefinitely precluded visitation from persons other than attorneys or clergy for prisoner with two or more substance abuse violations. The appeals court opened its decision by stating "This case marks another chapter in a ten-year controversy between incarcerated felons, their visitors, and the Michigan Department of Corrections." (Michigan Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
DISTRIBURANCE
PRETRIAL DETAINEE
RESTRAINTS
USE OF FORCE

Birdine v. Gray, 375 F.Supp.2d 874 (D.Neb. 2005). A pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against jail employees claiming violation of his right to be free of punishment and his right to privacy. The district court dismissed the complaint. The court held that the detainee did not have a privacy right that would allow him to cover the window of his cell with towels, noting that the cell contained a privacy wall which allowed for partial privacy while using the toilet. The court found that the inmate's privacy rights were not violated when he was moved from one cell to another, naked. The inmate had removed all of his clothes and refused to put them back, and jail staff moved him unclothed to a cell closer to their station where he could be constantly watched. The court found no violation when the inmate was placed in a restraint chair because he was confined as a last resort when all other restraint options proved ineffective. According to the court, the detainee was monitored, the chair was not used to punish, and the detainee was offered the opportunity to be released in return for acting appropriately. The court found no due process violation when a stun gun was applied to the detainee two times, after he engaged in violent actions as jail officers attempt to settle him into a cell to which he was being transferred. The court found that the detainee's conduct was an immediate threat to institutional safety, security and efficiency. (Lancaster County Jail, Nebraska)

U.S. Appeals Court
BOOKS
RELIGION

Borzych v. Frank, 439 F.3d 388 (7th Cir. 2006). An inmate sued state prison officials under § 1983 and the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA), challenging a ban on books the inmate deemed necessary for the practice of his Odinist religion. The district court entered summary judgment for the officials and the inmate appealed. The appeals court held that, even if the state substantially burdened the inmate's religious exercise by banning books he deemed necessary to practice his Odinist religion, the ban on such books was the least restrictive means to promote a compelling state interest in safety, and thus did not violate the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA). The court noted that the books promoted violence to exalt the status of whites and demean other races, and that redaction of offensive material was not a realistic option. According to the court, a state prison procedure that prohibited activities and literature that advocate racial or ethnic supremacy or purity was not overbroad, in violation of free speech guarantees or RLUIPA, where the overbreadth of the regulation was not substantial in relation to its proper applications. Officials had refused to allow the inmate to possess the books Creed of Iron, Temple of Wotan, and The NPKA Book of Blotar, which he said were necessary to practice his religion. The inmate identified his religion as Odinism (or Odinic Rite), which like Asatru and Wotanism entails the worship of Norse gods. The inmate maintained that the books were religious texts. The officials conceded that Odinism is a religion. (Wisconsin Department of Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
USE OF FORCE

Bozeman v. Orum, 422 F.3d 1265 (11th Cir. 2005). The representative of the estate of a pretrial detainee who had died during a struggle with county correctional officers brought a § 1983 suit alleging use of excessive force and deliberate indifference to medical needs. The district court granted summary judgment for several defendants but denied summary judgment for corrections officers. The officers appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the officers' alleged conduct in subduing the detainee was actionable as excessive force and that the officers were not entitled to qualified immunity. The court also held that the officers' alleged conduct following the struggle-- waiting 14 minutes before summoning medical assistance even though the detainee appeared lifeless-- was actionable as deliberate indifference and the officers were not entitled to qualified immunity. The court noted that the law defining excessive force was clearly established at the time of the incident, and the officers should have known that continuing to apply force to the unruly detainee after he had given up his struggle was not acceptable. (Montgomery County Detention Facility, Alabama)

U.S. District Court
PROTECTION

Collins v. County of Kern, 390 F.Supp.2d 964 (E.D.Cal. 2005). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against a county and a sheriff's department, stemming from an attack by other inmates while he was incarcerated. A fight had erupted in a jail housing unit between Black and Hispanic inmates and the inmate was injured. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court held that inmate failed to establish that department officials knew of and disregarded a risk of attack when they moved the inmate to another jail unit. At the time of the move, the inmate did not inform anyone of safety concerns or segregation issues due to a purported gang affiliation. The court found that officials took prompt action to stop the fight, secure the area, and ensure prompt medical treatment for the inmate. The court noted that a "prison official need not believe to [a] moral certainty that one inmate intends to attack another at [a] given place at time certain before he is obligated to prevent such an assault." According to the court, before being required to take action, an official must have more than a mere suspicion that an attack will occur. (Lerdo Pre-Trial Facility, Kern County, California)

U.S. District Court
CONTRABAND
SEARCHES

Fraternal Order of Police/Dept. v. Washington, 394 F.Supp.2d 7 (D.D.C. 2005). A police labor committee and correctional officers in leadership positions with the committee sued a corrections department, challenging the constitutionality of searches of their lockers and automobiles during a shakedown of the detention facility. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court held that the checkpoint seizure of correctional officers' cars at the entrance to a jail's parking lot were not unconstitutional, where the officers were requested to sign consent forms to have their vehicles searched or to park elsewhere. The court noted that the jail was a maximum-security facility and keeping contraband out of the jail was an imperative, and the purpose of the checkpoint was to afford an opportunity to inform officers of the activity, present consent forms, and search the vehicles of who consented. The court held that the searches of cars were not unconstitutional under the Fourth Amendment where the officers consented to the searches by signing consent forms that stated in clear and unambiguous language that the officers could deny the search at any time. According to the court, searches of correctional officers' lockers were not unreasonable under the Fourth Amendment, where the searches were conducted in the early morning hours by correctional officers of the same gender as the officers whose lockers were being searched, and the lockers were provided by the corrections department for the convenience of correctional officers. The court noted that the assigned officer and Director of the department had keys to each locker, and that locker assignments could be changed without notice by the Director. Prison regulations clearly stated that a condition of employment was that all personnel submit to a search of their person, or automobile, or place of assignment on government property, when such a search was required by department officials. (Central Detention Facility, District of Columbia)

U.S. Appeals Court
GANGS

Harbin-Bey v. Rutter, 420 F.3d 571 (6th Cir. 2005). A state prisoner filed a pro se § 1983 action alleging that his designation as a member of a security threat group without a hearing violated his constitutional rights. The district court dismissed the case and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the prisoner's designation without a hearing did not violate equal protection due process, or the prisoner's right of access to the courts. Although the designation caused the prisoner to be excluded from community placement and placed on visitor restrictions, the court found that his designation was not based on his religious beliefs but rather was due to his gang affiliation. The court upheld the state's policy directive regarding classification of inmates as security threat group members, finding it was rationally related to the legitimate state interest of maintaining order in the prison. According to the court, identifying, reclassifying and separating prisoners who are members of groups that engage in the planning or commitment of unlawful acts or acts of misconduct "targets a core threat to the safety of both prison inmates and officials." The court held that the alleged censorship of the prisoner's periodicals did not violate the inmate's First Amendment rights. The prison policy prohibited prisoners from receiving mail depicting gang symbols or signs and required that the magazine be accepted or rejected as a whole. The court noted that the inmate's contention that officials should go through each magazine and remove all prohibited material would be unduly burdensome. The inmate's subscription was ultimately terminated by the publisher, and the prison rejected only a single issue. (Alger Maximum Security Facility, Michigan)

U.S. Appeals Court
LOCKDOWN
SEARCHES- CELL

Hart v. Sheahan, 396 F.3d 887 (7th Cir. 2005). Female pretrial detainees brought an action against a county and jail superintendent alleging deprivation of liberty without due process. The district court dismissed the case and the detainees appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded, finding that the detainees stated a claim upon which relief could be granted. The detainees alleged that during monthly lockdown searches of the jail, they were confined for 48 to 50 hours at a time to their cells, where they were not under observation or within hailing distance of correctional officers. The detainees alleged that serious injuries resulted from their inability to get the officers' attention during a crisis. The court noted that an alternative procedure was available to the jail that would allow inmates in each locked tier to be released from their cells after that tier was searched, resulting in shorter lockdown periods. (Cook County Jail, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEARCHES
PRETRIAL DETAINEE

Hicks v. Moore, 422 F.3d 1246 (11th Cir. 2005). A former pretrial detainee brought an action challenging strip search practices at a county jail. The district court denied immunity for the defendants and they appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The court held that the mere fact that a detainee was to be placed in the jail's general population did not justify a strip search, but that reasonable suspicion existed for the plaintiff's strip search because he had been charged with a family violence battery offense. The court noted that battery is a crime of violence that would permit the inference that the detainee might be concealing weapons or contraband. (Habersham County Jail, Georgia)

U.S. District Court
FIRE SAFETY
CONTRABAND

Howard v. Snyder, 389 F.Supp.2d 589 (D.Del. 2005). A state prison inmate brought a § 1983 action against corrections officials, alleging that legal papers were missing from a box of personal effects that were seized from his cell as contraband, when the box was returned. The inmate alleged that his access to court was hindered. The district court granted summary judgment to the officials, finding that the "two box rule" under which the materials were confiscated, served legitimate penological interests. According to the court, the regulation promoted fire safety and limited the access to contraband. The court noted that the inmate had continual access to the prison's law library and that he could have obtained approval for an extra box. (Delaware Correctional Center)

U.S. District Court
SAFETY

Littlejohn v. Moody, 381 F.Supp.2d 507 (E.D.Va. 2005). A federal prisoner brought a pro se action against prison officials, seeking injunctive relief and monetary damages. The inmate alleged violation of his constitutional rights when he was shocked by an electrical surge because a buffing machine that he was using did not have a ground-prong in its plug. The district court granted the defendants' motion to dismiss. The court held that one official did not know of a substantial risk of harm at the time the prisoner was shocked because he had sent the buffer to be repaired when it had shocked prisoners in the past, and he reasonably assumed that the machine was safe when it returned. Although the court found that allegations supported a deliberate indifference claim against a prison safety manager and electrical shop foreman, the court granted them qualified immunity because the right to be protected from a significant risk of injury was not clearly established at the time of the incident. (Federal Bureau of Prisons, Virginia)

U.S. District Court
RELIGIOUS SERVICES
SEARCHES

McRoy v. Cook County Dept. of Corrections, 366 F.Supp.2d 662 (N.D.Ill. 2005). A Muslim inmate at a county correctional facility brought a civil rights action under § 1983, alleging that his opportunities to practice his faith were restricted in violation of the Free Exercise Clause of the First Amendment. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court held that the inmate's free exercise rights were not violated by the cancellation of Muslim services during lockdowns, staff shortages, and when no volunteer imams were available to preside over services. The court noted that inmates should not be granted authority as religious leaders over other inmates, and cancellation of services when volunteer imams were not available was warranted. The court found that the policy of limiting the number of Muslim services to three each week did not violate the inmate's free exercise rights, nor was a policy that limited the number of inmates who could attend Muslim services at the same time. The court also found no violation in the policy of strip-searching inmates when they were leaving or returning to an inmate area, noting that the inmate could choose not to attend a service because of the policy and could pray in his cell or common area instead. The court upheld the facility's decision not to create a Muslim-only living unit. The court noted that the inmate was permitted to pray in his cell using religious materials he was allowed to keep there, as well as being allowed to pray in the common area of his living unit. (Cook County Department of Corrections, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
BOOKS
FIRE SAFETY

Neal v. Lewis, 414 F.3d 1244 (10th Cir. 2005). A Shiite Muslim prisoner filed a pro se action seeking injunctive relief and damages under § 1983, alleging that prison officials violated his civil rights by interfering with his religious observance. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the officials did not violate the prisoner's First Amendment rights by enforcing a prison regulation that limited the number of books that could be kept in a cell. The court also found no violation of the prisoner's due process or equal protection rights. The regulation limited prisoners to the possession of twelve books, plus one dictionary, one thesaurus, and the primary religious text for their declared religion. The court noted that nothing prevented the prisoner from stocking his cell with twelve religious texts. According to the court, the regulation was applied equally to all inmates, and it promoted legitimate administrative and penological objectives including fire safety, institutional security, control of the source and flow of property in prison, and the effective establishment of a behavior-incentive program. The court noted that the prisoner failed to choose any of the options available to him. (El Dorado Correctional Facility, Kansas)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEARCHES
VISITS

Neumeyer v. Beard, 421 F.3d 210 (3rd Cir. 2005). Prison visitors filed a § 1983 action seeking a declaration that the prison's practice of subjecting visitors' vehicles to random searches violated their constitutional rights. The district court entered summary judgment in favor of the defendants and the visitors appealed. The appeals court affirmed, holding that the prison's practice of engaging in suspicionless searches of prison visitors' vehicles was valid under the special needs doctrine. According to the court, the relatively minor inconvenience of the searches, balanced against the prison officials' special need to maintain the security and safety of the prison, rose beyond their general need to enforce the law. The court noted that some inmates have outside work details and may have access to the vehicles. The prison had posted large signs at all entranceways to the prison and immediately in front of the visitors' parking lot that stated "...all persons, vehicles and personal property entering or brought on these grounds are subject to search..." Visitors are asked to sign a Consent to Search Vehicle form before a search is conducted and if they refuse they are denied entry into the prison and are asked to leave the premises. (State Correctional Institution at Huntingdon, Pennsylvania)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEGREGATION

Peoples v. CCA Detention Centers, 422 F.3d 1090 (10th Cir. 2005). A pretrial detainee who was housed at a detention center operated by a private contractor under a contract with the United States Marshals Service brought actions against the contractor and its employees, alleging Fifth and Eighth Amendment violations. The district court dismissed the action and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the employees did not punish the pretrial detainee in violation of his due process rights when they placed him in segregation upon his arrival at the center and kept him in segregation for approximately 13 months without a hearing. The detainee was first placed in segregation because the center lacked bed space in the general population, and he remained in segregation due to his plot to escape from his previous pretrial detention facility. According to the court, the detention center has a legitimate interest in segregating individual inmates from the general population for nonpunitive reasons, including threats to the safety and security of the institution. (Corrections Corporation of America, Leavenworth, Kansas)

U.S. District Court
RESTRAINTS

Perez Olivo v. Gonzalez, 384 F.Supp.2d 536 (D.Puerto Rico 2005). An inmate brought a Bivens action against correctional officers, stemming from the alleged use of restraints on him during an escorted medical trip. The district court dismissed the case. The court held that the use of restraints did not violate the inmate's clearly established rights and that the leg irons, as placed, did not violate the inmate's rights. According to the court, the officers exercised their best correctional judgment in applying the leg iron restraints and did not deliberately inflict pain. The court found that the agency's alleged failure to respond in a timely manner to the inmate's complaints did not violate due process. The inmate alleged that he was submitted to unnecessary punishment and discomfort for three hours, resulting in bruised ankles and pain for a period of eight days. (Federal Bureau of Prisons, Metropolitan Detention Center, Guaynabo, Puerto Rico)

U.S. District Court
TELEPHONE CALLS
VISITS

U.S. v. Ali, 396 F.Supp.2d 703 (E.D.Va. 2005). A pretrial detainee who was charged with terrorism-related offenses filed a motion for relief from conditions of confinement. The district court denied the motion, finding that the measures imposed did not violate due process. The court also found that judicial relief was not available because the detainee did not exhaust available administrative remedies, even though the detainee completed an inmate request form seeking permission to receive regular phone calls to his family and lawyers, and visits from his family. According to the court, the detainee did not pursue succeeding options available to him when his request was denied. The court held that the "Special Administrative Measures" (SAM) imposed on the detainee at the request of the Attorney General did not violate the detainee's due process rights, where the SAMs were imposed to further the legitimate and compelling purpose of preventing future terrorist acts. The measures prevented the detainee from receiving regular phone calls from his family and lawyers, and from receiving visits from his family. According to the court, there was no alternative means to prevent the detainee from communicating with his confederates, and the special accommodations sought by the detainee would have imposed unreasonable burdens on prison and law enforcement personnel. The court noted that the measures did not restrict the detainee's ability to help prepare his own defense. (Alexandria Detention Center, Virginia)

U.S. Appeals Court
HAIR LENGTH

Warsoldier v. Woodford, 418 F.3d 989 (9th Cir. 2005). A Native American inmate sued state corrections officials challenging a prison hair grooming policy that required male inmates to maintain hair no longer than three inches, alleging it violated his rights under the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA). The district court denied the inmate's request for a preliminary injunction and the inmate appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded, finding that the policy imposed a substantial burden on the inmate's religious practice and that the policy was not the least restrictive alternative to achieve the state's interest in prison security. The court noted that the inmate was not physically forced to cut his hair, but that he was subjected to punishments including confinement to his cell, imposition of additional duty hours, and reclassification into a less desirable work group. The court also noted that the state failed to explain why its women's prisons did not adhere to an equally strict grooming policy. The court concluded that the inmate faced the possibility of irreparable injury absent the issuance of an injunction and the balance of hardships favored the inmate. (Adelanto Community Correctional Facility, California)

U.S. Appeals Court
GANGS
TRANSFER

Westefer v. Snyder, 422 F.3d 570 (7th Cir. 2005). State prisoners brought a § 1983 action challenging their transfers to a higher-security prison. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants and the prisoners appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The court held that the prisoners' suit challenging transfers to a high security prison was not subject to dismissal for failure to exhaust administrative remedies as required by the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA), where the transfer review process was not available to prisoners in disciplinary segregation, and the prisoners' grievances were sufficient to alert the prison that the transfer decisions were being challenged. The court held that the alleged change in a prison policy that required transferring gang members to a high security facility did not constitute an ex post facto violation. The court ruled that the prisoners stated a claim for denial of due process, where the conditions at the high security prison were arguably different enough to give the prisoners a liberty interest in not being transferred there, and there was a dispute as to whether the state provided sufficient pre- and post-transfer opportunities for the prisoners to challenge the propriety of the transfers. The court held that the transfers did not violate the gang members' First Amendment associational rights, noting that prisoners had no right to associate with gangs. (Tamms Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
TRANSPORTATION

Young v. Hightower, 395 F.Supp.2d 583 (E.D.Mich. 2005). A state prison inmate brought a pro se civil rights action against prison officials, alleging they were deliberately indifferent to his safety when they refused to buckle his seatbelt when he was transported in chains in a prison van and when the vehicle was then involved in a collision that resulted in injuries to the inmate. The district court held that the inmate had satisfied the exhaustion requirement of the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA) even though he did not return a document requested in response to his completed step III grievance form. The court found that prison policy did not require specific documents to be filed with the step III form and the request for documents suggested that the request was procedural rather than substantive. According to the court, when an inmate takes the prison grievance procedure to its last step, the PLRA exhaustion requirement has been satisfied if the state forgoes an opportunity to decide matters internally. (Chippewa Correctional Facility, Michigan)

2006

U.S. District Court
TRANSPORTATION
RESTRAINTS

Anderson-Bey v. District of Columbia, 466 F.Supp.2d 51 (D.D.C. 2006). Prisoners transported between out-of-state correctional facilities brought a civil rights action against the District of Columbia and corrections officers, alleging common law torts and violation of their constitutional rights under First and Eighth Amendments. The prisoners had been transported in two groups, with trips lasting between 10 and 15 hours. The defendants brought motions to dismiss or for summary judgment which the court denied with regard to the District of Columbia. The court held that: (1) a fact issue existed as to whether the restraints used on prisoners during the prolonged transport caused greater pain than was necessary to ensure they were securely restrained; (2) a fact issue existed as to whether the officers acted with deliberate indifference to the prisoners' health or safety in the transport of the prisoners; (3) a causal nexus existed between the protected speech of the prisoners in bringing the civil lawsuit against the corrections officers and subsequent alleged retaliation by the officers during the transport of prisoners; (4) a fact issue existed as to whether the officers attempted to chill the prisoners' participation in the pending civil lawsuit against the officers; and (5) a fact issue existed as to whether conditions imposed on the prisoners during the transport were justified by valid penological needs. The court found that the denial of food during a bus ride that lasted between 10 and 15 hours was insufficiently serious to state a stand-alone cruel and unusual punishment civil rights claim under the Eighth Amendment. The court also found that the denial of bathroom breaks during the 10 to 15 hour bus trip, did not, without more, constitute cruel and unusual punishment under the Eighth Amendment. The court stated that the extremely uncomfortable and painful shackles applied for the numerous hours during transports, exacerbated by taunting, threats, and denial of food, water, medicine, and toilets, was outrageous conduct under District of Columbia law, precluding summary judgment on the prisoners' intentional infliction of emotional distress claim against the corrections officers. (District of Columbia)

U.S. District Court
SUPERMAX
TRANSFER

Austin v. Wilkinson, 502 F.Supp.2d 675 (N.D.Ohio 2006). A state inmate filed a § 1983 action alleging that the procedure for transferring him to a super maximum security prison violated due process. The inmate moved to compel the state to reduce his security placement level. The district court granted the motion. The court held that the process used by the state to increase the inmate's security placement level after he killed his cellmate violated due process, even though the prison's rules infraction board found insufficient evidence that the inmate acted solely in self-defense, where the prison's classification committee recommended that the inmate's security placement remain unchanged, the inmate was not given notice of the warden's decision to override the committee's recommendation or opportunity to argue his position and submit evidence, the inmate was not given a hearing on administrative appeal, the board's finding was subject to review by the committee, and the inmate was transferred to a super maximum security prison before the review process was complete. According to the court, due process required that the warden and the state's administrative appeals board provide adequate reasoned statements to justify their decisions to override the prison's classification committee's recommendation that the inmate's security placement remain unchanged after he killed his cellmate. The court held that the state prison system was required to provide an individualized review of the security risk presented by an inmate following his transfer to a super maximum security prison, and thus the state's use of a boilerplate checklist violated the inmate's due process rights, where the inmate received no meaningful review of his situation or of the events leading to his transfer. (Ohio State Penitentiary)

U.S. District Court
SUPERMAX
TRANSFER

Austin v. Wilkinson, 502 F.Supp.2d 660 (N.D.Ohio 2006). State inmates in a super maximum security prison facility brought a class action against corrections officials under § 1983 alleging that procedures for transferring them to, and retaining them at, the prison violated due process. The district court ruled that the procedures denied due process and ordered modifications. Prison officials appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part and remanded. Certiorari was granted. The United States Supreme Court affirmed in part, reversed in part and remanded. On remand, the inmates moved for an order extending the court's jurisdiction over due process issues for one year, and the officials' moved to terminate prospective relief. The district court granted the inmates' motion and denied the officials' motion. (Ohio State Penitentiary)

U.S. District Court
FIRE SAFETY

Duquin v. Dean, 423 F.Supp.2d 411 (S.D.N.Y. 2006). A deaf inmate filed an action alleging that prison officials violated his rights under the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), Rehabilitation Act, and a consent decree by failing to provide qualified sign language interpreters, effective visual fire alarms, use of closed-captioned television sets, and access to text telephones (TTY). Officials moved for summary judgment, which the district court granted in their favor. The court held that the officials at the high-security facility complied with the provision of a consent decree requiring them to provide visual fire alarms for hearing-impaired inmates, even if the facility was not always equipped with visual alarms, where corrections officers were responsible for unlocking each cell door and ensuring that inmates evacuate in emergency situations. The court held that the deputy supervisor for programs at the facility was not subject to civil contempt for her failure to fully comply with the provision of consent decree requiring the facility to provide access to text telephones (TTY) for hearing-impaired inmates in a manner equivalent to hearing inmates' access to telephone service, even though certain areas within the facility provided only limited access to TTY, and other areas lacked TTY altogether. The court noted that the deputy warden made diligent efforts to comply with the decree, prison staff responded to the inmate's complaints with temporary accommodations and permanent improvements, and repairs to broken equipment were made promptly. The court found that the denial of the inmate's request to purchase a thirteen-inch color television for his cell did not subject the deputy supervisor for programs to civil contempt for failing to fully comply with the provision of a consent decree requiring the facility to provide closed-captioned television for hearing-impaired inmates, despite the inmate's contention that a closed-caption decoder would not work on commissary televisions. The court noted that the facility policy barred color televisions in cells and that suppliers confirmed that there was no technological barrier to installing decoders in televisions that were available from the commissary. (Wende Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
FIRE SAFETY

Figueroa v. Dean, 425 F.Supp.2d 448 (S.D.N.Y. 2006). A state prisoner who was born deaf brought an action against a superintendent of programs at a prison, alleging failure to provide interpreters, visual fire alarms, access to text telephone, and a television with closed-captioned device in contempt of a consent order in class action in which the court entered a decree awarding declaratory relief to prohibit disability discrimination against hearing impaired prisoners by state prison officials. The superintendent moved for summary judgment and the district court granted the motion. The court held that the exhaustion requirement of Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA) did not apply to an action seeking exclusively to enforce a consent order. The court found that the superintendent was not in contempt of the consent order, noting that sign language interpreters were provided at educational and vocational programs and at medical and counseling appointments for hearing-impaired inmates as required by consent decree, the prison was equipped with visual fire alarms that met the requirements of the decree, and diligent efforts were being made to comply with the consent decree regarding access to text telephones. (Wende Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEGREGATION

Freeman v. Berge, 441 F.3d 543 (7th Cir. 2006). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against prison officials, alleging cruel and unusual punishment. After a jury returned a verdict in favor of the inmate, the district court granted judgment as a matter of law for the defendants, and the inmate appealed. The court of appeals affirmed. The court held that the prison's feeding rule requiring that, when meals were delivered to an inmate's cell, the inmate had to be wearing trousers or gym shorts, was a reasonable condition to the receipt of food in light of security issues and respect for female security officers' privacy. The court found that prison officials' withholding of food from the inmate when he refused to put on trousers or shorts did not constitute the use of food deprivation as punishment, for the purposes of the Eighth Amendment prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment. The court found that prison officials' withholding of food from the inmate when he wore a sock on his head when meals were delivered to his cell was a reasonable condition to the receipt of the food, in light of security issues presented by the possibility that a sock could be used as a weapon if something was inside it. According to the court, withholding of food from the inmate when he refused to remove the sock from his head did not constitute the use of food deprivation as punishment. Inmates in the Supermax are fed their three meals a day in their cells. The prison's feeding rule requires that the prisoner stand in the middle of his cell, with the lights on, when the meal is delivered and that he be wearing trousers or gym shorts. If the inmate does not comply with the rule, the meal is not served to him. The inmate wanted to eat in his underwear, so on a number of occasions over a two-and-a-half-year period he refused to put on pants or gym shorts and as a result was not served. Because he skipped so many meals he lost 45 pounds. (Wisconsin Maximum Security Facility, "Supermax")

U.S. Appeals Court
RESTRAINTS

Hanks v. Prachar, 457 F.3d 774 (8th Cir. 2006). A former county jail detainee brought a § 1983 action against county jail officials, alleging violation of his due process rights in connection with the use of restraints and confinement, requesting damages and injunctive relief. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the officials and the former detainee appealed. The appeals court affirmed the grant of summary judgment on the claims for injunctive relief, reversed the grant of summary judgment on the claims for damages, and remanded for further proceedings. The court held that the detainee's claim for injunctive relief was rendered moot by detainee's release from jail. The court found that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the detainee was restrained in shackles and chains or confined in a padded unit for the purpose punishment, or for valid reasons related to legitimate goals. The detainee alleged he was placed in four-point restraints, chained to a wall in a "rubber room," forced to shower in waist chains and shackles, and denied hearings before being punished. The detainee was 17 years old when he was admitted to the jail. (St. Louis County Jail, Minnesota)

U.S. District Court
EXERCISE
LOCK DOWN
RIOT

Hayes v. Garcia, 461 F.Supp.2d 1198 (S.D.Cal. 2006). A state prisoner brought a pro se § 1983 action against a warden, alleging that he was denied outdoor exercise in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The warden moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion, holding that the denial of outdoor exercise was not the result of the warden's deliberate indifference, and thus did not violate the defendant's Eighth Amendment rights, in that restrictions on exercise were instituted for the primary purpose of preventing further race-based attacks, injuries, and homicides. The prisoner was denied outdoor exercise for a period of just over nine months following racial tension, rioting, and other racial violence in the prison. (Calipatria State Prison, California)

U.S. District Court
LOCKDOWN

Hurd v. Garcia, 454 F.Supp.2d 1032 (S.D.Cal. 2006). A state inmate filed a § 1983 action alleging that conditions of his confinement during a lock down violated his constitutional rights. The court held that suspension of outdoor exercise at the state prison for 150 days was not motivated by prison officials' deliberate indifference or malicious and sadistic intent to harm or punish the inmate, and thus did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment in violation of Eighth Amendment. The court noted that the entire unit was locked down as the result of a riot between African-American and Caucasian inmates, and restrictions on outdoor exercise were instituted for the primary purpose of preventing further race-based attacks, injuries, and homicides. (Calipatria State Prison, California)

U.S. Appeals Court
MAIL

Jones v. Brown, 461 F.3d 353 (3d Cir. 2006). State prisoners brought an action against prison officials, claiming that a policy of opening and inspecting their legal mail outside of their presence violated their First Amendment rights. The district court granted judgment for the prisoners and the officials appealed. Another district court on similar claims granted judgment for the officials and the prisoners in that case also appealed. The cases were consolidated on appeal. The court entered judgment for the prisoner, finding that the policy of opening legal mail outside the presence of the addressee prisoner impinged upon the prisoner's right to freedom of speech under the First Amendment, and that the legal mail policy was not reasonably related to the prison's legitimate penological interest in protecting the health and safety of prisoners and staff. The court held that reasonable prison administrators would not have realized that they were violating the prisoners' First Amendment free speech rights by opening prisoners' legal mail outside of the prisoners' presence, entitling them to qualified immunity. The court noted that although the administrators maintained the policy after three relatively uneventful years had passed after the September 11 terrorist attacks and subsequent anthrax concerns, the policy was reasonable when it was established. (New Jersey Department of Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
MAIL
GANGS

Koutnik v. Brown, 456 F.3d 777 (7th Cir. 2006). A state prisoner brought a pro se § 1983 action, challenging the confiscation of his outgoing letter, which contained a swastika and a reference to the Ku Klux Klan. The prisoner alleged violations of his First Amendment free speech rights, and his due process rights. The district court dismissed the due process claim, and granted summary judgment in favor of defendants on remaining claim. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the prison regulation, prohibiting prisoners from possessing symbolism that could be associated with any inmate group not approved by the warden, was not impermissibly vague, for the purpose of determining whether the regulation was facially violative of the prisoner's First Amendment free speech rights. According to the court, although the regulation gave some discretion and flexibility to prison officials, the prison setting required it to ensure order and safety. The appeals court deferred to state prison officials' assessment of whether a swastika and a reference to the Ku Klux Klan in the prisoner's outgoing letter were gang-related symbols, for the purpose of the prisoner's claim that seizure of the letter by prison officials violated his First Amendment right to free speech, where knowledge of gang symbolism was acquired primarily through interaction with and observation of prisoners, and the symbolism was constantly changing. According to the court, the confiscation of the prisoner's outgoing letter furthered the substantial governmental interest in prisoner rehabilitation, and thus, it did not violate the prisoner's First Amendment free speech rights. The court noted that the letter was an attempt to express the prisoner's affiliation with racially intolerant groups, which thwarted the state's goals of encouraging the prisoner to live crime-free when released from custody, and fostering the prisoner's ability to resolve conflicts without violence. (Wisconsin Secure Program Facility)

U.S. District Court
CELL SEARCH
GANGS

Navarro v. Adams, 419 F.Supp.2d 1196 (C.D.Cal. 2006). A state prisoner filed a pro se petition for a writ of habeas corpus, challenging his state court conviction and his sentence for first degree murder. The district court held that a deputy sheriff's search of his cell and seizure of attorney-client privileged documents did not warrant federal habeas relief because it did not substantially prejudice the prisoner's Sixth Amendment right to counsel. The court noted that the prisoner's cell was searched to locate evidence regarding gang activity and threats to witnesses, not to interfere with his relationship with his defense counsel, and the information seized was turned over to the trial court for an in-camera review without being viewed by any member of the prosecution team. (California)

U.S. District Court
SEARCHES- CELL
PUBLICATIONS

Pepper v. Carroll, 423 F.Supp.2d 442 (D.Del. 2006). A state inmate filed a § 1983 action alleging that prison officials violated his constitutional rights. The court granted the officials' motion for summary judgment. The court found that the officials' decision to "shake down" the inmate's cell was not in retaliation for his having filed a civil rights action, and thus did not violate the inmate's First Amendment right to access courts, where shakedowns were routine, and the inmate was thought to have prohibited materials in his cell. The court also held that the officials did not violate the inmate's First Amendment free speech rights by refusing the word puzzles sent by the inmate's family through regular mail and by disallowing catalogs for magazines or books, where there was no allegation that the inmate had been denied actual magazines or books, and word puzzles were not permitted under prison regulations. According to the court, the prison officials' denials of several privileges while the inmate was voluntarily housed in a security housing unit, including extra visits, reading material, exercise, television, cleaning tools, boiling water, ice, razors, and additional writing utensils, were not a sufficiently serious deprivation to support the inmate's claim that the denials constituted cruel and unusual punishment under the Eighth Amendment. (Delaware Correctional Center)

U.S. Appeals Court
SECURITY PRACTICES
STAFFING

Pinkston v. Madry, 440 F.3d 879 (7th Cir. 2006). A state inmate brought § 1983 action against two correctional officers, alleging that they violated his Eighth Amendment rights in allowing another prisoner to assault him and thereafter refusing to assist him in receiving adequate medical care. The district court granted the officers' motion for judgment on partial findings and the inmate appealed. The court of appeals held that the inmate did not show that the two correctional officers failed to protect him by allowing a fight between the inmate and another prisoner, given the testimony of three witnesses that a correctional officer, acting alone, could not have operated a locking mechanism so as to open the inmate's cell door, thereby allowing the fight to occur. The court noted an absence of evidence that bolstered the inmate's contention that an officer could have opened the cell door by himself, and an absence of evidence that another officer was present who could have assisted the first officer in opening the cell door. (Indiana Department of Corrections Maximum Control Complex, Westville, Indiana)

U.S. District Court
TRANSPORTATION

Roe v. Crawford, 439 F.Supp.2d 942 (W.D. Mo. 2006). An inmate brought a class action against corrections officials, challenging a policy prohibiting transportation of pregnant inmates off-site to provide abortion care for non-therapeutic abortions. The district court held that the policy violated inmates' Due Process rights and the policy violated the Eighth Amendment. The court noted that inmates who chose to terminate a pregnancy and had to be transported outside of the prison for that purpose posed no greater security risk than any other inmate requiring outside medical attention. The court held that a Missouri law prohibiting the use of State funds to assist with an abortion did not encompass transport to the location where the procedure was to take place, there was no alternative way for an inmate to obtain a non-therapeutic abortion, and abortion out counts had no measurable impact on the ongoing prison need to schedule and reschedule medical appointments. (Women's Eastern Reception, Diagnostic and Correctional Center, Missouri)

U.S. District Court
RELIGIOUS ARTICLES

Sample v. Lappin, 424 F.Supp.2d 187 (D.D.C. 2006). An inmate brought suit for declaratory and injunctive relief, claiming that a denial of his request for wine violated the Religious Freedom Restoration Act (RFRA) and the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA), and that the Bureau of Prisons' (BOP) Director failed to train, supervise, and promulgate policies requiring his subordinates to comply with RFRA and RLUIPA. The defense moved to dismiss, and the parties cross-moved for summary judgment. The district court held that genuine issues of material fact existed as to whether an outright ban on an inmate's consumption of wine was the least restrictive means of furthering the government's compelling interest in controlling intoxicants. The inmate described himself as "an observant Jew" who "practiced Judaism before his incarceration and continues his practice of Judaism while confined," and who "sincerely believes that he must drink at least 3.5 ounces of red wine (a reviit) while saying Kiddush, a prayer sanctifying the Sabbath, during Friday night and Saturday shabbos services." The court found that the inmate exhausted his administrative remedies, as required by the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA), with respect to his request for wine, regardless of whether he asked that a rabbi, a chaplain, or a Bureau of Prisons (BOP) staff member administer the wine to him. According to the court, the inmate's obligation to exhaust his administrative remedies did not require that he posit every conceivable alternative means by which to achieve his goal, which was the unburdened exercise of his sincere religious belief. (Federal Correctional Institution, Beaumont, Texas)

U.S. Appeals Court SECURITY PRACTICES	Scarver v. Litscher, 434 F.3d 972 (7th Cir. 2006). A state prisoner brought a civil rights action against officials at a "supermax" prison, alleging that his conditions of confinement had aggravated his mental illness. The district court granted summary judgment for the officials and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the officials did not unconstitutionally subject the prisoner to cruel and unusual punishment, absent evidence that they knew that the conditions were making his mental illness worse. According to the court, prison authorities must be given considerable latitude in the design of measures for controlling homicidal maniacs without exacerbating their manias beyond what is necessary for security. The prisoner alleged that the heat in the cells in the Summer interacted with the his antipsychotic drugs and caused him extreme discomfort, and that the constant illumination of the cells also disturbs psychotics. The prisoner alleged that the low level of noise, without audiotapes, a radio, or any source of sound, prevented him from stilling the voices in his head. (Wisconsin Secure Program Facility)
U.S. Appeals Court SEARCHES- CELLS	Serna v. Colorado Dept. of Corrections, 455 F.3d 1146 (10th Cir. 2006). A prisoner brought excessive force and inadequate medical care claims against various officers and officials. A state prison director moved for summary judgment on the ground of qualified immunity. The district court denied summary judgment and director appealed. The court of appeals reversed and remanded. The court held that: (1) the director's authorizing the use of a special team was not personal involvement that could form the basis for supervisory liability; (2) the director's receipt of periodic reports about the team's progress was not direct participation that could give rise to liability; (3) the director's conduct did not constitute failure to supervise; and (4) the director was not deliberately indifferent to the rights of inmates. The director had, at a warden's request, authorized a special team to conduct cell invasions to find a loaded gun. (Colorado Territorial Corrections Facility)
U.S. Appeals Court SEGREGATION PROTECTION	Smith v. Cummings, 445 F.3d 1254 (10th Cir. 2006). A prisoner brought civil rights claims and state law claims against a former prison officer and prison officials. The district court entered judgment against the prison officer and summary judgment in favor of the other defendants. The appeals court affirmed in part and remanded in part. The court held that prison officials did not violate the Eighth Amendment by failing to clear an area through which segregated inmates passed, of all inmates from the regular population, when escorting segregated inmates to and from the protective housing unit, absent a showing of conditions posing a serious risk of harm or evidence of deliberate indifference. The court noted that no segregated inmate was ever assaulted on these occasions, other precautions were taken by the officials, and the officials acted promptly in response to the inmate's particular safety concerns once alerted. (Lansing Correctional Facility, Kansas)
U.S. District Court PUBLICATIONS	Smith v. Miller, 423 F.Supp.2d 859 (N.D.Ind. 2006). A state inmate filed a § 1983 action challenging prison officials' decision to confiscate his anarchist materials. The officials moved for summary judgment. The district court held that fact issues remained as to whether mere possession of anarchist literature presented a clear and present danger to prison security. The court opened its opinion by stating: "The issue of anarchism has raised its ugly face again, this time in a prison context…The question here focuses on whether or not prison officials at the Indiana State Prison are authorized to confiscate anarchist materials from inmates incarcerated there…While the question presented here is a very close one, and it may be one on which the prison authorities will later prevail….there needs to be a more extensive factual record." The court noted that if a trial were to be held, the court would attempt to appoint counsel for the plaintiff and make every effort to keep the case as narrowly confined as possible. According to the court, "Although it is a close case, there is enough here, if only barely enough, to keep the courthouse doors open for this claim which necessarily involves overruling and denying the defendants' motion." (Indiana State Prison)
U.S. District Court GANGS	Stewart v. Alameida, 418 F.Supp.2d 1154 (N.D.Cal. 2006). A state prison inmate brought a § 1983 action against California corrections officials alleging violation of his First and Fourteenth Amendment associational and due process rights, claiming that his validation as a gang associate kept him in a secure housing unit. Officials moved for summary judgment and the district court granted the motion. The court held that state regulations providing for gang validation based on association bore a rational relation to a penological interest in institutional security and that the full accommodation of inmate's associational rights would seriously hinder security and compromise safety. According to the court, an interview after he was gang-validated afforded the inmate an adequate procedural remedy consistent with due process. The court found that any of three photographs of the inmate posing with inmates, some of whom were validated gang associates and one of whom was a validated gang member, supported the inmate's gang validation consistent with due process. (San Quentin Adjustment Center, California)
U.S. District Court EVACUATION	Tate v. Gusman, 459 F.Supp.2d 519 (E.D.La. 2006). A pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against a sheriff, arising from conditions of confinement following a hurricane. The district court held that the detainee failed to state a nonfrivolous claim upon which relief could be granted and dismissed the action. The detainee alleged that the manner and timing of his evacuation from a flooded prison system medical unit following a hurricane constituted cruel and unusual punishment, but the court found that the detainee did not allege that the sheriff personally acted with deliberate indifference to the detainee's safety. The court noted that the detainee did not allege that he suffered any physical injury as a result of any of the conditions or lack of medical attention. (Orleans Parish Prison, Louisiana)

U.S. Appeals Court
TELEPHONE CALLS

U.S. v. Morin, 437 F.3d 777 (8th Cir. 2006). A defendant was convicted in district court and he appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that recordings of the defendant's jailhouse telephone calls were admissible for sentencing purposes. The court found that the defendant impliedly consented to the warrantless tape-recording of his jailhouse telephone calls, and thus, the recordings were admissible for sentencing purposes. The defendant had been given a prisoners' handbook that informed him that his jailhouse calls would be monitored, and there were signs above the phones in the prison informing him of that fact. (North Dakota)

U.S. Appeals Court
PUBLICATIONS
BOOKS
ITEMS PERMITTED

Wardell v. Duncan, 470 F.3d 954 (10th Cir. 2006). A state prisoner brought a pro se § 1983 action against prison officials, alleging that a prison policy that required prisoners to purchase all hobby materials, legal materials, books, and magazines from their prison accounts, and prohibiting gifts to prisoners of such materials from unauthorized sources, violated his due process rights, his right of access to the courts, and his First Amendment rights. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the officials. The prisoner appealed. According to the court, the confiscation of documents mailed to the prisoner which were purchased by a person who was a visitor of another inmate, did not violate the prisoner's First Amendment rights, where the ban was content neutral, it was rationally related to the penological interest of preventing bartering, extortion, possession of contraband, and other criminal activity by prisoners, the prisoner was still able to purchase the same materials himself using funds from his prison account, and he had access to the same materials in the prison law library. The court noted that permitting such third-party gifts and then trying to control the resultant security problems through reactive efforts of prison officers would impose an undue burden on prison staff and resources. The court held that the inmate's proposed accommodation, allowing third party gifts if third parties provided relevant information, such as the source, amount, and manner of payment, would entail data collection, processing, and substantial staff resources. The suit was prompted by prison officials' interception of three parcels mailed to plaintiff. The first contained books from a "Mystery Guild" book club; the other two contained legal documents from the Colorado State Archives and the Library of Congress which had been purchased for the plaintiff by a third party who was listed as another inmate's visitor and, thus, fell within a Colorado Department of Corrections (CDOC) prohibition on gifts from unauthorized sources. The court also held that denial of the prisoner's access to courts claim that challenged the prison policy restricting receipt of his legal mail, was warranted, absent a showing that the prisoner's failure to receive his legal mail actually frustrated, impeded, or hindered his efforts to pursue a legal claim. (Fremont Correctional Facility, Colorado)

U.S. District Court
STAFFING
PROTECTION

Wilson v. Maricopa County, 484 F.Supp.2d 1015 (D.Ariz. 2006). Survivors of an inmate who had died after being assaulted by other inmates while they were held in a jail known as "Tent City," brought a § 1983 action against a sheriff, alleging Eight Amendment violations. Following denial of the survivors' motion for summary judgment and denial of the sheriff's motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity, and following appeal by the sheriff, the sheriff moved to stay the litigation and the survivors moved to certify the appeal as frivolous. The district court granted the survivors' motion, finding that the sheriff's appeal was frivolous. The court held that, for purposes of qualified immunity, the law was clearly established in July 2003 that the sheriff's alleged conduct of housing inmates in tents without adequate staffing, while being deliberately indifferent to the danger of inmate-on-inmate assaults, would violate the Eighth Amendment. The survivors presented evidence that the sheriff had for many years been aware that the conditions at Tent City were likely to create a substantial risk of serious harm to inmates. The conditions include a lack of security inherent in the use of tents, inadequate staffing, officers abandoning their posts and making off-yard shift changes, intentionally harsh inmate living conditions, and a lack of officer training. The survivors' asserted that these problems were known to the sheriff through a variety of sources, including consultant reports, concerns expressed by a county risk manager, and a prior state court case in which the county and sheriff were held liable under § 1983 for an inmate assault at Tent City. The state court case affirmed a jury verdict against the sheriff and held that the lack of supervision and security measures at Tent City supported the jury's finding of deliberate indifference. (Maricopa County jail known as "Tent City," Arizona)

2007

U.S. Appeals Court
SAFETY

Ambrose v. Young, 474 F.3d 1070 (8th Cir. 2007). The personal representative for the estate of a state prisoner who was electrocuted while on a prison work detail brought a § 1983 action against state corrections officials. The district court denied the officials' motion for summary judgment and they appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part and reversed in part. The court held that: (1) the deliberate indifference standard applied; (2) the corrections officer in charge of the prisoner's work crew was deliberately indifferent to the serious risk of the prisoner's electrocution; (3) the corrections officer was not entitled to qualified immunity; (4) the supervisory official for the DOC was not deliberately indifferent; and (5) the warden was not deliberately indifferent to the lack of training of the corrections officer in charge of the work crew. The court noted that the prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment applies to the conditions of confinement, and that prison work assignments fall under the ambit of conditions of confinement. According to the court, the Eighth Amendment forbids knowingly compelling an inmate to perform labor that is beyond an inmate's strength, dangerous to his or her life or health, or unduly painful, and requires supervisors to supervise and train subordinates to prevent the deprivation of the inmate's constitutional rights. The prisoner was on an Emergency Response Team (ERT) when he was killed. ERTs are comprised of minimum-security inmates from South Dakota's four state penitentiaries. The ERTs are dispatched to natural disaster clean-up sites, where they assist in removing downed trees and other debris. The inmates are required to comply with correctional officers' orders and conduct themselves appropriately. The only training the inmate received was watching a chainsaw safety training video. The court held that qualified immunity will be defeated in a § 1983 claim if a government official knew or reasonably should have known that the action he took within his sphere of official responsibility would violate the constitutional rights of the plaintiff, or if he took the action with the malicious intention to cause a deprivation of constitutional rights or other injury. It is enough that the official acted or failed to act despite his knowledge of a substantial risk of serious harm. The court found that the corrections officer had the opportunity to deliberate and think before the electrocution incident occurred. The prisoner was electrocuted by a downed power line and the officer knew that the dangling, live power line created a substantial risk of harm, and despite the risk, the officer told the prisoner and other inmates to stomp out a non-threatening fire within arms reach of the line. The court held that the corrections officer was not entitled to qualified immunity for his deliberately indifferent conduct, in ordering the prisoner and other inmates to stomp out a fire near a dangling live power line, where the law was clearly established at the time of the electrocution incident that knowingly compelling a prisoner to perform labor that was dangerous to his life or health violated the Eighth Amendment. Although a supervisory official knew about the downed power line, and allegedly failed to call 911 emergency services and did not tell the prisoners to stay away from it, any failure to call 911 did not contribute to the electrocution incident. Everyone present knew that the power line was dangerous, and the official was not near the power line when another supervisory official ordered the prisoner and other inmates to stomp out a fire that was near the line. According to the court, a state prison warden was not deliberately indifferent to an alleged lack of training of the corrections officers because previous accidents involving the prison work crew resulted in only minor injuries, it was not the prison's policy to have prisoners go near live power lines, and there was no showing that the corrections officer in charge would not have ordered prisoner and other inmates to put out the fire near the downed power line if he had any additional training. (South Dakota Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
SAFETY

Graham v. Poole, 476 F.Supp.2d 257 (W.D.N.Y. 2007). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against prison officials. The officials moved to dismiss and the district court granted the motion. The court held that the prisoner's allegations that he slipped and fell as he was leaving the shower due to the failure of prison employees to provide non-slip mats on the floor in and near the shower amounted to nothing more than negligence, and thus was insufficient to state an Eighth Amendment claim against the employees. The court found that the prisoner failed to allege that a prison superintendent was personally involved in any alleged Eighth Amendment violation, as required to state a § 1983 claim against the superintendent. The prisoner alleged that following his accident, the superintendent instituted a policy providing an additional towel to each cell to be utilized for a bath mat, but did not allege that the superintendent was aware of any hazardous condition prior to prisoner's accident. (Five Points Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
GANGS
PUBLICATIONS

Greybuffalo v. Kingston, 581 F.Supp.2d 1034 (W.D.Wis. 2007). A state inmate brought a § 1983 action for declaratory and injunctive relief, challenging, on First Amendment grounds, prison officials' actions in confiscating two documents as "gang literature" and disciplining him for possessing the documents. One document was a publication of the "American Indian Movement" (AIM). The other was a code of conduct for a prisoner group that was created to enable "self-protection of Native Americans." The court held that interpreting the prison regulation to prohibit inmates from possessing literature of any group that had not been sanctioned by prison officials was an exaggerated response to legitimate security interests that violated the First Amendment. The court found that the history of the civil rights organization referenced in the seized document did not permit the reasonable conclusion that the inmate's possession of the document implicated a legitimate interest in preventing gang activity or prison security. The court ordered the expungement from prison records of the finding that the inmate's possession of the document violated prison rules. The court held that officials could reasonably conclude that the inmate's possession of a code of conduct for a prisoner group that was created to enable "self-protection" of Native American prisoners could lead to future security problems and that the officials did not violate the inmate's free speech rights when it prohibited and disciplined the inmate for possessing the code of conduct. (Waupun Correctional Institution, Wisconsin)

U.S. District Court
SAFETY

Heredia v. Doe, 473 F.Supp.2d 462 (S.D.N.Y. 2007). An inmate filed a § 1983 action against county jail officials alleging that he slipped and fell at a jail, and was denied proper medical treatment. The officials moved to dismiss the complaint and the district court granted the motion. The court held that the inmate's claim that he injured his back when he slipped and fell at the county jail was nothing more than a claim for negligence, for which there was no cause of action under § 1983. The inmate alleged he slipped and fell while walking to his cell and in the process injured his back "to the point it swelled up and was in a lot of pain." The court also found that officials were not deliberately indifferent to the inmate's medical needs, despite a one-day delay in providing treatment, where the jail medical department took X-rays and provided pain medication. (Sullivan Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
CONTRABAND
PUBLICATIONS

Jones v. Salt Lake County, 503 F.3d 1147 (10th Cir. 2007). County jail prisoners and a legal publication for prisoners filed § 1983 suits against county jails, county officials, and a state Department of Corrections (DOC), challenging the constitutionality of mail regulations in the jails and state prisons. The district court dismissed the actions and the plaintiffs appealed. The two actions were consolidated for appeal. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The court held that: (1) a jail regulation banning prisoners' receipt of technical and sexually explicit publications did not violate the First Amendment; (2) the jail regulation barring prisoners from ordering books from the outside did not violate the First Amendment; and (3) the prison's refusal to accept legal publications did not amount to a violation of prisoners' First Amendment or due process rights where the refusal to accept the magazines was not based on any prison policy, but was due to a prison mailroom personnel's negligence. The court remanded the case to the district court to conduct a four-part Turner analysis of the validity of the county jail's ban on prisoners' receipt of all catalogs. The court held that the regulation banning ordering books from outside was reasonably related to the jail's legitimate penological goal of security, as it prevented contraband from being smuggled into the jail, and that prisoners had access to thousands of paperbacks through the jail library, prisoners could request permission to order books directly from a publisher, prisoners could also obtain paperback books donated to them through a program at local bookstore, prisoners had access to other reading materials such as newspapers and certain magazines. The court noted that allowing prisoners to have unrestricted access to books from all outside sources would significantly impact jail resources. (Utah State Prison, Salt Lake County Jail and San Juan County Jail, Utah)

U.S. District Court
CELL CAPACITY
CONTRABAND
GANGS
SEARCHES-CELL
STAFFING

Jurado Sanchez v. Pereira, 525 F.Supp.2d 248 (D.Puerto Rico 2007). A prisoner's next of kin brought a civil rights action under § 1983 against prison officials, seeking to recover damages for the prisoner's death while he was incarcerated, and alleging constitutional rights violations, as well as state law claims of negligence. The officials moved for summary judgment on the cause of action under § 1983. The district court denied the motion, finding that summary judgment was precluded by the existence of genuine issues of material fact on the failure to protect claim and as to whether the officials had qualified immunity. According to the court, genuine issues of material fact existed as to whether there were enough guards at the prison when the prisoner was killed by another inmate, and whether officials were mandated to perform weekly or monthly searches of cells, which could have prevented the accumulation of weapons used in the incident in which the prisoner was killed. Bayamon 308, an intake center, was considered minimum security with some limitations. The inmate capacity at Bayamon 308 is 144. Although the capacity was not exceeded, some cells, despite being originally built for one inmate, housed two inmates. According to the court, Bayamon 308 does not comply with the 55 square footage minimum requirements for each cell in a continuing federal consent order. Therefore, the individual cell gates are left continuously open, like an open dormitory. At the time of the incident officials did not take gang affiliation into consideration when segregating prisoners. The prisoner did not identify himself as a gang member, nor inform officials that he feared for his life. The facility was under court order to follow a staffing plan that stated the minimum amount of staff, the optimum amount, the fixed positions and the movable positions, pursuant to a lawsuit. Fixed positions, such as control units, cannot be changed under any circumstances, but the movable positions may be modified depending on necessity due to the type of inmate at the facility. The plaintiffs alleged that the defendants did not comply with the staffing plan, while the defendants insisted that they did comply. (Bayamon 308 Facility, Puerto Rico)

U.S. Appeals Court
HAIR LENGTH

Longoria v. Dretke, 507 F.3d 898 (5th Cir. 2007). A prisoner brought a pro se action against prison officials, claiming his right to exercise his religion was denied when they denied him permission to grow his hair. The district court dismissed the action and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the prison's grooming policy did not violate the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA) and did not violate equal protection. The court noted that even if the grooming policy created a substantial burden on the prisoner's religious exercise, the policy served the prison's compelling interest in maintaining order and safety in the prison, since long hair facilitated the transfer of contraband and weapons and long hair could allow escaped prisoners to more easily alter their appearance. The court held that the policy was the least restrictive means to achieve that interest. According to the court, although female prisoners were not subject to the same grooming policy, the policy applied to all prisoners incarcerated in the male prison, and the application of different grooming regulations to male and female inmates did not implicate equal protection concerns. (Robertson Unit, Texas Department of Criminal Justice-Institutional Division)

U.S. District Court
PUBLICATIONS

Moses v. Dennehy, 523 F.Supp.2d 57 (D.Mass. 2007). Prison inmates sued a department of corrections, claiming that a regulation banning possession of sexually explicit materials violated their First Amendment rights. The department moved for summary judgment. The district court entered judgment for the department. The court held that there was a rational relationship between the regulation banning inmates' possession of sexually explicit materials and a legitimate interest in prison security. According to the court, the regulation satisfied the First Amendment requirement that alternative means of expression be provided because inmates were afforded an opportunity to receive materials on a wide range of subjects, other than those involving sexuality or nudity, and there was even an exception allowing for nude images having medical, educational, or anthropological content. According to the court, the possibility of harm to other inmates supported the validity of the regulation. The court concluded that the administration of the regulation did not violate the First Amendment, where publications known always to feature sexually explicit materials were banned outright, and others were banned following prison staff inspection of individual issues. (Massachusetts Department of Correction)

U.S. District Court
CONTRACT SERVICES DELIBERATE INDIFFERENCE
MALPRACTICE

Primus v. Lee, 517 F.Supp.2d 755 (D.S.C. 2007.) A prisoner brought a pro se medical malpractice action against a prison surgeon, prison physician, and the director of the state Department of Corrections. The defendants moved to dismiss, and the prisoner moved for leave to amend. The district court dismissed the action without prejudice and granted the plaintiff's motion to amend. The court held that the allegations did not state an Eighth Amendment claim for deliberate indifference, and that the prisoner's proposed amendment would not be futile. According to the court, the allegations that a prison surgeon negligently performed surgery, which resulted in the unwanted removal of the prisoner's testicle, did not state a § 1983 claim for deliberate indifference to the prisoner's serious medical needs under the Eighth Amendment. The prisoner's proposed amendment, alleging that the surgeon contracted with the state corrections department to provide surgical treatment, and that the surgeon unnecessarily and maliciously removed the prisoner's testicle in retaliation for the prisoner's lack of cooperation, could state a § 1983 claim for deliberate indifference under the Eighth Amendment. The court noted that when a physician cooperates with the state and assumes the state's constitutional obligation to provide medical care to its prisoners, he or she acts "under color of state law," for purpose of a § 1983 action. (Lee Correctional Institution, South Carolina)

U.S. Appeals Court
GANGS
PROTECTION
TRANSFER

Rodriguez v. Secretary for Dept. of Corrections, 508 F.3d 611 (11th Cir. 2007). A Florida prisoner brought a § 1983 suit against two prison officials, alleging that they violated his Eighth Amendment right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment. The prisoner was assaulted by a fellow prisoner hours after his release from administrative segregation and reentry into the general prison population. The prisoner had asked to be transferred to another institution or to be placed in protective custody. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the chief of prison security, and judgment as a matter of law in favor of an assistant warden, and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court vacated and remanded. The court held summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact existed as to whether the defendants had subjective knowledge that the prisoner faced a substantial risk of serious harm from his former gang members. The court ruled that it was a jury question as to whether the prison security chief's actions "caused" the Eighth Amendment violation. There was evidence that the prisoner told the security chief that he was a former gang member who decided to renounce his membership, that gang members had threatened to kill him when he returned to the compound in retaliation for his renunciation, and that the prison compound was heavily populated with gang members. (Everglades Correctional Institution, Florida)

U.S. District Court
CLOTHING
RELIGIOUS ARTICLES

Singh v. Goord, 520 F.Supp.2d 487 (S.D.N.Y. 2007). An inmate who professed a belief in the Sikh faith brought an action against various officials of the New York State Department of Correctional Services (DOCS) under the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA), the Free Exercise Clause of the First Amendment, the New York State Constitution, and various other constitutional provisions. The DOCS moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the inmate failed to exhaust administrative remedies, as required under the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA), with respect to his free exercise clause claim regarding his right to wear a Kacchera, which was a religious undergarment. The court found that summary judgment for the defendants was precluded by an issue of fact as to whether the inmate received the decision of the Superintendent, but failed to appeal it.

The court also found that the inmate sincerely believed that he was required to possess a second Kanga, which was a Sikh religious comb, and therefore the prison's policy of limiting the inmate to a single Kanga placed a substantial burden on his religious beliefs under RLUIPA. Summary judgment was denied because of fact issues regarding the security risk posed by the Kara, which was a steel bracelet worn by Sikhs, and whether there was a compelling governmental interest to allow the Sikh inmate to only wear the Kara for 30 minutes at a time during meals. The court held that the inmate established a First Amendment free exercise claim with respect to his free exercise clause claim regarding his right to use a reading lamp at night for prayer purposes. The court concluded that the DOCS speculation that the beliefs of the inmate might not be sincere and could instead be "partly" motivated by his resistance to the prison environment was insufficient to defeat the inmate's motion for summary judgment on his free exercise clause claim. According to the court, given that the Sikh inmate would be unable to tie his turban in one of the traditional ways, in a manner sufficient to cover his head using a cloth that was merely 30 inches by 36 inches, the inmate established that the prison's policy regarding cloth length substantially burdened his religious beliefs. The court also found that because the inmate was required to shower with his turban, and to wash his turban every day, the limitation of two turbans was a substantial burden on the inmate's religious practice. The inmate also challenged several other prison policies that involved his hair, separate storage of his religious materials, and other restrictions. (Fishkill Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
RELIGION

Smith v. Allen, 502 F.3d 1255 (11th Cir. 2007). An inmate brought a civil rights action against prison officials to recover for alleged violation of his free exercise rights under the First Amendment and under the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA), based on prison officials' denial of requests for religious accommodations allegedly associated with his practice of Odinism. The district court granted the officials' motion for summary judgment, and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the term "appropriate relief," as used in section of RLUIPA creating a private cause of action in favor of prison inmates whose free exercise rights are violated, and further providing that, if the inmate successfully sues, then he/she may "obtain appropriate relief," is broad enough to include monetary damages, but the provision could not be construed as creating a private right of action against individual prison officials in their personal capacity for award of monetary damages. The court found that the inmate's practice of Odinism constituted a "religious exercise" for purposes of the RLUIPA, but decisions by the prison officials did not substantially burden the inmate's free exercise rights. Prison officials provided the inmate with a secure location in which to practice the rites of his religion and did not allow him to observe these rites in general prison area. They denied his request for a small fire pit and instead provided only a candle to represent "pine fire of purification." (Religious Activities Review Committee of the Alabama Department of Corrections, Limestone Correctional Facility, Alabama)

U.S. District Court
BOOKS
RELIGION

Wares v. Simmons, 524 F.Supp.2d 1313 (D.Kan. 2007). A prisoner brought suit pursuant to § 1983, claiming violations of the Fifth Amendment and the free exercise clause of the First Amendment, arising from the prison defendants' prohibition on his possession of certain religious texts. The court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court held that the prisoner's exercise of his religion was not substantially burdened by prison regulations preventing him from possessing a Psalm book (which he had in another form) and a book of teachings by a particular rabbi, and therefore his rights under the free exercise clause of the First Amendment were not violated. According to the court, by virtue of the other religious materials and items that the prisoner was permitted to possess and ceremonies that he was permitted to engage in, his religious conduct or expression was not significantly inhibited or constrained, he remained able to express adherence to his faith, and he had a reasonable opportunity to exercise his sincerely-held religious beliefs. The court found that even if the prisoner's exercise of his religion was substantially burdened by the prison regulations, prison administrators did not violate the prisoner's First Amendment rights since they identified legitimate penological interests in security, safety, rehabilitation, and sound correctional management that justified the impinging conduct, and alternative means of achieving the prisoner's right to freely exercise his religion were available. (Hutchinson Correctional Facility, Kansas)

U.S. Appeals Court
BOOKS
RELIGION

Washington v. Klem, 497 F.3d 272 (3rd Cir. 2007). A prisoner filed a pro se action against a Department of Corrections (DOC), pursuant to § 1983 and the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA), alleging the DOC's policy of only allowing ten books in a prisoner's cell violated his religious exercise. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the DOC and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The court held that the policy "substantially burdened" the prisoner's religious exercise under RLUIPA, since the prisoner could not practice his religion in the absence of reading 4 books per day about Africa and African people and then proselytizing about what he had read. The court noted that the DOC allowed only one weekly visit to the prison library which precluded the prisoner from reading 4 books daily, or 28 books per week, that the DOC provided no evidence that the prisoner could freely trade books located inside the prison, and that the DOC forced the indigent prisoner to have outsiders continuously mail books to him which severely inhibited his ability to read 4 new books daily. The court found that the valid interests of the DOC in the safety and health of prisoners and DOC employees were not furthered by the DOC's policy of limiting the prisoner to 10 books in his cell, as required to uphold the policy against the prisoner's claim that the policy violated RLUIPA by substantially burdening his religious exercise. The court concluded that the book limitation policy did not decrease the likelihood of fire or hiding places for contraband in a cell, given the DOC's permission for the prisoner to have magazines and newspapers in addition to the 10 books. The court also held that the policy was not the least restrictive means of achieving the DOC's valid interests in safety and health, as required to uphold the policy against the prisoner's challenge, given the DOC's other policies allowing the prisoner to have 4 storage boxes of personal property in his cell and permitting more than 10 books if approved for educational purposes. According to the court, the least restrictive means would have been to allow the prisoner to choose what property he could keep in his storage units, as long as the property did not violate a prison policy for an independently legitimate reason. (State Correctional Institution-Retreat, Pennsylvania)

U.S. District Court
CLASSIFICATION
SAFETY
SEGREGATION

Basciano v. Lindsay, 530 F.Supp.2d 435 (E.D.N.Y. 2008). A pretrial detainee petitioned for a writ of habeas corpus seeking an order lifting special administrative measures governing his confinement and releasing him from a special housing unit back into the general prison population. The district court denied the petition. The court held that the restrictive conditions of pretrial confinement which removed the detainee from the general prison population, did not amount to punishment without due process. The court noted that there was substantial evidence of the detainee's dangerousness, a rational connection between the conditions and a legitimate purpose of protecting potential victims, and the existence of an alternative means for the detainee to exercise his right to communicate with others and with counsel. (Metropolitan Detention Center, Brooklyn, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
SAFETY
TRANSPORTATION

Brown v. Fortner, 518 F.3d 552 (8th Cir. 2008). A former inmate brought a § 1983 action against correction officers alleging deliberate indifference by failing to provide safe transportation. The district court denied the officers' claims of qualified immunity and denied their motions for summary judgment. The officers appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part and remanded. The court held that evidence that a correction officer transporting inmates as part of a convoy refused to fasten the inmate's seatbelt knowing that he could not do so himself because of his shackles, and drove recklessly while ignoring requests to slow down, was sufficient for a reasonable jury to conclude that the officer manifested deliberate indifference for the inmate's safety in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The court found that another correction officer who was driving a vehicle as part of the convoy who drove too fast and followed the lead vehicle too closely did not act with deliberate indifference for the safety of the inmate passenger in the lead vehicle, even though the officer's driving proximately caused a multiple vehicle rear-end accident which resulted in the inmate's injuries, absent evidence that the officer was asked to slow down and refused, or that the officer knew that the inmate had been denied a seatbelt. (Missouri Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
SEARCHES

Bullock v. Sheahan, 568 F.Supp.2d 965 (N.D.Ill. 2008). Two county inmates who were ordered released after being found not guilty of the charges against them brought an action individually and on behalf of a class against a county sheriff and county, challenging the constitutionality of a policy under which male inmates, in the custody of the Cook County Department of Corrections (CCDC), were subjected to strip searches upon returning to CCDC after being ordered released. The district court held that male inmates in the custody of CCDC who were potentially discharged were similarly situated to female potential discharges, as supported the male inmates' claim that the county's policy of strip searching all male discharges and not all female discharges violated the Equal Protection Clause. The court noted that the two groups of inmates were housed within the same facility, there were varying security classifications within each group that corresponded to each other, statistics concerning inmate violence clearly indicated that it took place among female as well as male inmates, and the county's primary justification for distinguishing between male and female discharges, namely, its alleged inability to hold them in a receiving, classification, and diagnosis center (RCDC) while their records were reviewed, was a logistical rather than a security concern. The court found that the county's blanket strip search policy for male discharged inmates was not substantially related to the achievement of important governmental objectives--jail safety and security--and thus the policy deprived male discharges of their constitutional right to equal protection. The court noted that female discharges were just as capable of importing contraband into the jail as their male counterparts. (Cook County Dept. of Corrections, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
CONTRABAND
VISITS

Carter v. Federal Bureau of Prisons, 579 F.Supp.2d 798 (W.D.Tex. 2008). A prison visitor filed an action against the federal Bureau of Prisons (BOP) and the United States Department of Justice under the Federal Tort Claims Act (FTCA) claiming wrongful denial of inmate visitation. The district court dismissed the case for lack of subject matter jurisdiction. The court held that the United States had to be named as a defendant in an action under the Federal Tort Claims Act (FTCA) and that the plaintiff visitor had to provide grounds for relief under Texas law in order to recover. The plaintiff had traveled from Illinois to the Greater El Paso area “for the purpose of visiting her husband,” who at the time was a prisoner at the BOP’s Federal Satellite Low La Tuna facility. She alleged that upon arriving at La Tuna, a BOP agent selected her for contraband testing pursuant to a mandate from the Director and testing was accomplished using a device called the Ion Spectrometer. The test was positive and the plaintiff was denied visitation with her husband. (Low La Tuna Facility, Federal Bureau of Prisons, Texas)

U.S. District Court
CONTRABAND
SEARCHES

Collins v. Knox County, 569 F.Supp.2d 269 (D.Me. 2008). A female arrestee brought a § 1983 action against a county, sheriff, and corrections officers, alleging an unconstitutional policy and/or custom and practice of conducting a strip search and visual body cavity search of every person taken into custody at the jail. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants. The court held that the county did not have an unconstitutional strip search policy or custom at the county jail, and that the sheriff did not acquiesce to a policy or practice of unconstitutional strip searches. The court found that there was no evidence of an unconstitutional policy and/or custom and practice of conducting a strip search and visual body cavity search of every person taken into custody at the county jail, as required for the arrestee to establish a § 1983 claim against the county. The court found that the strip search of the female arrestee upon her admission to jail after self-surrendering on an outstanding felony arrest warrant was reasonable under the Fourth Amendment. The court found that the search was based on a drug charge in her inmate file, the fact that she made a planned admission to jail which provided the opportunity to conceal contraband, and that she was going to be housed overnight at the jail, which had a problem with contraband. The search was performed by a female officer in the changing area of the shower stall adjacent to the booking area, which was mostly shielded from view by a plastic curtain. (Knox County Jail, Maine)

U.S. District Court
LOCK DOWN
SEARCHES
TRANSPORTATION
VISITS

Davis v. Peters, 566 F.Supp.2d 790 (N.D.Ill. 2008). A detainee who was civilly committed pursuant to the Sexually Violent Persons Commitment Act sued the current and former facility directors of the Illinois Department of Human Services' (DHS) Treatment and Detention Facility (TDF), where the detainee was housed, as well as two former DHS Secretaries, and the current DHS Secretary. The detainee claimed that the conditions of his confinement violated his constitutional rights to equal protection and substantive due process. After a bench trial, the district court held that: (1) the practice of searching the detainee prior to his visits with guests and attorneys violated his substantive due process rights; (2) the practice of using a “black-box” restraint system on all of the detainee's trips to and from court over a 15-month period violated his substantive due process rights; and (3) the detainee would be awarded compensatory damages in the amount of $30 for each hour he wore the black box in violation of his rights. The court found that a 21-day lockdown following an attempt at organized resistance by a large number of detainees at the facility, shortly after the breakout of several incidents of violence, was not outside the bounds of professional judgment for the purposes of a substantive due process claim asserted by the detainee. The court noted that strip searches of a detainee prior to his court appearances and upon his return to the institution did not violate substantive due process, where detainees were far more likely to engage in successful escapes if they could carry concealed items during their travel to court, and searches upon their return were closely connected with the goal of keeping contraband out of the facility. The court held that the practice of conducting strip searches of the detainee prior to his visits with guests and attorneys was not within the bounds of professional judgment, and thus, violated the detainee's substantive due process rights, where the only motivation for such searches appeared to be a concern that a detainee would bring a weapon into the meeting, and most weapons should have been detectable through a pat-down search. (Treatment and Detention Facility, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
FACIAL HAIR
HAIR LENGTH
RELIGION

Fegans v. Norris, 537 F.3d 897 (8th Cir. 2008). A state inmate sued prison officials, alleging that they violated the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA), as well as his free exercise and equal protection rights, by enforcing a grooming policy and denying him Kosher meals. The district court entered judgment for the inmate with respect to the Kosher meals, but entered judgment for the prison officials with respect to the grooming policy. The inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the prison policy prohibiting male inmates from wearing hair below their collar, which prevented the inmate, who followed the Assemblies of Yahweh, from leaving his hair untrimmed, did not violate RLUIPA. Prison officials gave examples of inmates using hair to conceal contraband and to change their appearance after escaping, and, although the officials allowed shoulder-length hair in the women's barracks, the women were housed in a single unit and thus had less opportunity to obtain and transport contraband. The court also found that the policy did not violate the inmate's free exercise rights. According to the court, the policy did not violate the inmate's equal protection rights, inasmuch as differences in security risks between male and female inmates was a valid reason for differing hair-length rules for men and women, and the policy was reasonably related to the state's legitimate, penological interests of safety and security.

The court noted that the district court's finding that the corrections department director's expert testimony that male inmates presented greater security risks than female inmates was credible, and was not clearly erroneous. The court found that a policy that generally prohibits inmates from wearing beards, which prevented the inmate from refraining from "rounding the corners" of his beard, did not violate RLUIPA, even though inmates with medical conditions were allowed to have a quarter-inch beard. The court ruled that safety and security concerns constituted a compelling penological interest, and the prohibition was the least restrictive means available to further that interest. The court found that the beard policy did not violate the inmate's free exercise or equal protection rights. The appeals court held that the district court did not abuse its discretion in awarding nominal damages, as limited by PLRA, of $1,500 for the prison officials' constitutional violation of failing to provide Kosher meals, which amounted to $1.44 for each constitutional violation. The court also held that the district court did not abuse its discretion in declining to award punitive damages for the prison officials' constitutional violation of failing to provide Kosher meals. The district court accurately stated the legal standard for the award of punitive damages, but found that prison officials did not act with malice, and that punitive damages were not warranted to deter future unlawful conduct, because the officials already had instituted a policy for providing Kosher meals. (East Arkansas Regional Unit of the Arkansas Department of Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
RELIGIOUS ARTICLES
RELIGIOUS SERVICES
SAFETY
STAFFING

Fowler v. Crawford, 534 F.3d 931 (8th Cir. 2008). A state prisoner brought an action against prison officials, alleging that the officials' refusal to grant him access to a sweat lodge in which to practice his Native American faith violated the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA). The district court granted summary judgment to the prison officials. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the prohibition on the sweat lodge on the grounds of a maximum-security prison was in furtherance of a compelling governmental interest, and that the ban was the least restrictive means by which to further that compelling interest. The court noted that serious safety and security concerns arose due to the burning of embers and hot coals, blunt instruments such as split wood and large scalding rocks, sharper objects such as shovels and deer antlers, and an enclosed area inaccessible to outside view, and the sweat lodge would have drained prison security's manpower over the 6 to 7 hour duration of the ceremony. The court noted that even though another prison within the state had previously operated a sweat lodge, ordering every prison to do so would result in a requirement that every institution within the jurisdiction accommodate inmates of the Native American faith, which would discourage officials from accommodating other religious practices, knowing that all institutions would likely have to accommodate the same practices. Prison officials had suggested alternatives to, and sought a compromise with, the prisoner to no avail, offering him an outdoor area where he could smoke a ceremonial pipe and practice other aspects of his faith in open view. The prisoner rejected anything short of a sweat lodge with a minimum of 17 times per year. (Jefferson City Correctional Center, Missouri)

U.S. Appeals Court
RELIGIOUS SERVICES

Greene v. Solano County Jail, 513 F.3d 982 (9th Cir. 2008). A former prisoner sued a county jail official asserting statutory and constitutional challenges to the county jail's policy of prohibiting maximum security prisoners from participating in group worship. The district court entered summary judgment for the official and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court reversed in part, vacated in part, and remanded. The court held that the religious exercise at issue in the prisoner's suit under the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA) was engaging in group worship, not practicing his religion as a whole. Therefore, even if the ban on group worship did not place a substantial burden on the prisoner's practice of Christianity, such fact would not ensure that ban was in compliance with RLUIPA. According to the court, the jail's policy of prohibiting the maximum security prisoner from attending group religious worship services substantially burdened the prisoner's ability to exercise his religion as required for the ban to violate RLUIPA. The court found that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the jail's policy was the least restrictive means of maintaining security. (Solano County Jail, Claybank Facility, California)

U.S. Appeals Court
CLASSIFICATION
GANGS

Howard v. Waide, 534 F.3d 1227 (10th Cir. 2008). An inmate brought claims against several Colorado Department of Corrections (CDOC) employees and a grievance officer pursuant to § 1983, alleging deliberate indifference in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The district court granted the grievance officer's motion to dismiss and granted the other defendants' motions for summary judgment, and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The court held that the inmate established an objective substantial risk of serious harm, as required for his Eighth Amendment deliberate indifference claim, by alleging that he had previously been targeted by a notorious prison gang because of his build and sexual orientation, that he was threatened, sexually assaulted, and prostituted against his will by members of this gang, and was later transferred to a different facility for his own safety, and, that after arriving at the new facility, he was identified by a member of the same prison gang who had assaulted him in the past and was housed in a less-restrictive area of the prison where it was easier for gang members to assault him. The court found that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the corrections' employees had subjective knowledge of a significant risk of substantial harm to the inmate. The court also found that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the employees responded to the known risk to the inmate by a prison gang in a reasonable manner. (Sterling Correctional Facility, Colorado)

U.S. District Court
HAIR LENGTH
RELIGION

Johnson v. Collins, 564 F.Supp.2d 759 (N.D.Ohio 2008). A state prisoner brought a civil rights suit against a prison warden and others, seeking injunctive relief against the enforcement of a prison policy that banned the wearing of shoulder-length dreadlocks. The district court denied the warden's motion for judgment on the pleadings. The court held that the possibility that the prisoner could show that the warden, by adhering to a prison policy that prohibited the wearing of shoulder-length dreadlocks for security reasons, was continuing to violate the prisoner's federal rights under the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA) by substantially burdening the exercise of his Rastafarian religion, precluding the Eleventh Amendment from barring the suit seeking injunctive relief against the warden in his official capacity. The court found that the warden was not entitled to qualified immunity as a government official performing discretionary functions on the claim that he substantially burdened the prisoner's rights under RLUIPA to practice his Rastafarian religion. The court held that the prisoner's suit for injunctive relief against ongoing enforcement of the prison policy banning the wearing of shoulder-length dreadlocks was not mooted by his transfer to another prison within the same state system, nor did a change in the prison grooming code to allow for religious-based exemptions. (Madison Correctional Institution, Toledo Correctional Institution, Mansfield Correctional Institution, Lebanon Correctional Institution, Ohio)

U.S. District Court
PUBLICATIONS

Johnson v. Raemisch, 557 F.Supp.2d 964 (W.D.Wis. 2008). An inmate sued prison officials under § 1983, contending that their censorship of a newsletter violated his First Amendment right to free speech. The district court held that the challenged censorship was not logically connected to a legitimate penological interest and therefore violated the inmate's First Amendment rights. The court found that many of the proffered reasons for the censorship suggested that it was the critical nature of the newsletter that prompted the decision, rather than any true interest in security or rehabilitation. According to the court, to the extent that there was a true concern for security or rehabilitation, censorship of the newsletter, which did not advocate violence or any other unlawful activity, was an exaggerated response to those concerns. The court held that the appropriate injunctive relief for a violation of the inmate's First Amendment rights in the officials' blocking the inmate's subscription to a newsletter addressing prisoner rights issues was to provide the inmate with a copy of the newsletter. (Waupun Correctional Institution, Wisconsin)

U.S. District Court
SEARCHES

Jones v. Murphy, 567 F.Supp.2d 787 (D.Md. 2008). A male arrestee brought a class action, alleging that a booking facility's policy of frisking female arrestees while searching male arrestees down to their underwear violated the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The district court granted summary judgment for the arrestee, finding that the booking facility's gender-differentiated search policy was not reasonably related to a legitimate penological interest in preventing arrestees from bringing weapons into the booking facility, and thus violated the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The court noted that the additional staff needed to more thoroughly search female arrestees was not overly burdensome, and searching all arrestees to their last layer of clothing was a readily available constitutional alternative. (Baltimore City Central Booking, Maryland)

U.S. District Court
CONTRABAND
VISITS

King v. Caruso, 542 F.Supp.2d 703 (E.D. Mich. 2008). The wife of a state prison inmate brought suit against prison officials alleging violation of her First Amendment rights, her Equal Protection rights, and her Fourteenth Amendment due process rights when her visitation rights were withdrawn for attempting to smuggle a cell phone into an institution. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants. The court held that termination of the spouse's visitation rights did not violate her First Amendment right to freedom of association nor did it infringe upon any liberty interest for purposes of procedural or substantive due process. The court noted that a hearing on the cutoff of visitor's rights could be conducted by a division of the Department of Corrections and that hearing procedures did not deny the spouse procedural due process with respect to any liberty interest she might possess. The court found that the termination was reasonably related to penological interests and did not violate equal protection. (Chippewa Correctional Facility, Michigan)

U.S. Appeals Court
GANGS
PROTECTION
SEPARATION

Klebanowski v. Sheahan, 540 F.3d 633 (7th Cir. 2008). A detainee who was being held for trial brought a § 1983 action against a sheriff, a jail and its officers, alleging deliberate indifference to risks of housing gang members with non-gang members, which caused attacks on the detainee by gang members. The detainee had suffered two attacks at the hands of his fellow prisoners. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion and the detainee appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the allegation by the detainee that his attack by gang members was brought on by the jail's policy of housing gang members with non-gang members, allowing them weapons, and periodically leaving them unattended, did not sufficiently establish an unconstitutional policy, for purposes of establishing deliberate indifference in violation of due process in his § 1983 action. According to the court, the detainee submitted no evidence showing an express endorsement of the claimed policies, that any policymaker caused the circumstances of which he complained, or any evidence to establish the existence of a widespread practice by the jail. The court found that jail officers were not deliberately indifferent to the detainee in violation of due process by not taking steps to protect the detainee from attack by gang members. The court held that the detainee's statements to officers prior to the attack, that he was afraid for his life, were not sufficient to alert the officers to a specific threat as he did not provide specific identities of those who had threatened him, did not tell officers he had actually been threatened with future violence, nor that the attack had been inflicted due to his non-gang status. (Cook County Jail, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
CLOTHING
RELIGIOUS ARTICLES

Lewis v. Ollison, 571 F.Supp.2d 1162 (C.D.Cal. 2008). A state prisoner filed a § 1983 action against prison officials, alleging violation of the First Amendment and the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA). The court held that a temporary shower policy of escorting prisoners from their cells to the shower room and back wearing only boxer shorts and shower shoes, which was adopted by the prison due to security concerns, created at most an inconvenience, but not a significant interference with the Islamic religious clothing requirement. The clothing requirement directs Muslim men to exercise modesty by covering their "awrah," which is a portion of the body from the navel to the knee, from others' gaze. The court found that the policy did not violate RLUIPA, since Muslims did not have to shower every day to practice their religion and the prisoner could have cleansed himself in his cell sink. The court also found that the policy was reasonably related to a legitimate penological interest in maintaining prison safety and security. The court held that the rights of the Muslim prisoner under RLUIPA to practice his religion of Islam had not been subjected to a substantial burden by the policy that limited the prisoner to the possession of no more than 12 ounces of scented oil in his cell, and limited him to buying no more than 8 ounces of scented oil per purchase order. According to the court, the rule had been drafted after consultation with a Muslim imam and permitted prisoners to be in the possession of religious prayer oil that served their religious purposes for many weeks, if not many months. (Ironwood State Prison, California)

U.S. Appeals Court
RELIGIOUS SERVICES
STAFFING

Mayfield v. Texas Dept. of Criminal Justice, 529 F.3d 599 (5th Cir. 2008). A state prisoner, who practiced the Odinist/Asatru faith, brought claims pursuant to § 1983 against a state criminal justice department and prison officials, alleging First Amendment violations, as well as violations of the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA). The district court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment, and appeal was taken. The appeals court affirmed in part, vacated in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The court held that the claims brought by the prisoner pursuant to the § 1983 action alleging First Amendment violations and pursuant to RLUIPA seeking declaratory relief as well as a permanent injunction against prison officials in their official capacity were not barred by sovereign immunity. The court found that the prisoner's claims for compensatory damages against prison officials in their official capacity on claims brought pursuant to § 1983 alleging First Amendment violations and RLUIPA violations were barred by the provision of the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA) prohibiting actions for mental or emotional injury suffered while in custody without a prior showing of physical injury. According to the court, a state criminal justice department's regulation of not allowing an Odinist group to assemble for religious services in the absence of an outside volunteer was reasonably related to a legitimate penological interest, for the purposes of determining whether the regulation encroached on the prisoner's First Amendment right to free exercise. The court noted that officials asserted justifications for the volunteer requirement that involved prison security concerns, as well as staff and space limitations. The court held that summary judgment for the state was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to the neutrality of the prison's enforcement of the policy of not allowing religious groups to assemble for religious services in the absence of an outside volunteer. The court also found that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether rune literature was banned from the prison library, as to whether the prison's policy of not allowing the Odinist group to assemble for religious services in the absence of an outside volunteer imposed a substantial burden on the prisoner's religious exercise, and as to whether the prison's policy of preventing the possession of runestones substantially burdened the prisoner's religious exercise. (Texas Department of Criminal Justice, Hughes Unit)

U.S. District Court
EXERCISE

Norwood v. Woodford, 583 F.Supp.2d 1200 (S.D.Cal. 2008). A state inmate filed an action alleging that prison officials deprived him of outdoor exercise, in violation of the Eighth Amendment, and retaliated against him for asserting his right to be free from harm, in violation of the First Amendment. The officials moved to dismiss the complaint. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the allegation that the inmate was deprived of outdoor exercise for 39 days was sufficient to satisfy the objective component of his Eighth Amendment claim. According to the court, the issue of whether state prison officials acted with deliberate indifference when they denied the inmate any outdoor exercise for a 39-day period during an alleged emergency lockdown situation involved fact questions that could not be resolved on a motion to dismiss. The court noted that it was clearly established at the time of the deprivation that state prison officials' denial of outdoor exercise for inmates for an extended period of time could constitute an Eighth Amendment violation, and thus the officials were not entitled to qualified immunity from liability. (Calipatria State Prison, California)

U.S. District Court
RELIGIOUS SERVICES

Pugh v. Goord, 571 F.Supp.2d 477 (S.D.N.Y. 2008). State prisoners sued prison officials, alleging violations of their constitutional and statutory rights to free exercise of Shi'a Islam and to be free from the establishment of Sunni Islam. Following remand from the appeals court, the plaintiffs moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motions in part and denied in part. The court held that one prisoner's claim for injunctive relief qualified for a "capable of repetition, yet evading review" exception, and therefore was not rendered moot by his transfer to another facility. The court noted that the corrections department had the ability to freely transfer the prisoner between facilities prior to the full litigation of his claims, and there was a reasonable expectation that the prisoner would be subject to the same action again, given that the department's policies were applicable to all of its prison facilities. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the corrections department's regulations relating to Shi'ite prisoners, which failed to provide for Friday prayer services independent of Sunni participation, were reasonably related to legitimate penological interests. The court also held that genuine issues of material fact existed as to whether the corrections department was able to accommodate Shi'ite prisoners so as not to violate their rights under the Establishment Clause at de minimis cost. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the Shi'ite prisoners' religious beliefs were substantially burdened by attendance at a Sunni-led, Sunni-dominated Friday Jumah service, and/or use of a Zohr prayer as a substitute for attending Jumah services. According to the court, summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether a prison policy denying Shi'ite prisoners Friday prayer services independent of Sunni participation was the least restrictive means of furthering a compelling government interest, precluding summary judgment in the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA). The court held that the state did not waive immunity under the Eleventh Amendment as to money damages by accepting federal funds pursuant RLUIPA. The court found that Shi'ite prisoners' right to a reasonable opportunity to worship by way of separate Jumah services for Shi'ites and Sunnis was clearly established, for the purposes of determining whether prison officials were qualifiedly immune from the prisoners' free exercise claim. (New York State Department of Correctional Services, Mid-Orange Correctional Facility and Fishkill Correctional Facility)

U.S. District Court
EXERCISE
SEARCHES

Sanchez Rodriguez v. Departamento de Correccion y Rehabilitacion, 537 F.Supp.2d 295 (D.Puerto Rico 2008). An inmate filed a § 1983 action alleging that Puerto Rico prison officials denied him his constitutional right to enjoy daily recreational time outside of his cell because he refused to submit to visual body cavity searches. After dismissal of his complaint, the inmate filed a motion for reconsideration. The district court denied the motion. The court held that the searches did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment. According to the court, the requirement that inmates submit to visual body cavity searches in order to leave their cells for recreation was needed to preserve internal order and institutional security, and thus did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the Eighth Amendment. (Maximum Security Prison, Ponce, Puerto Rico)

U.S. District Court
FIRE SAFETY

Shine v. Hofman, 548 F.Supp.2d 112 (D.Vt. 2008). A federal pretrial detainee in the custody of the Vermont Department of Corrections brought a pro se action, alleging violation of his constitutional rights. The district court dismissed in part. The court found that allegations by the detainee that state officials failed to provide adequate fire sprinklers or access to fire extinguishers stated a claim for violation of the detainee's due process rights. The court held that the detainee's allegations that he was subjected to segregation, and that the conditions of segregation included a small cell with no windows and no opportunity to interact with other human beings, did not state a claim for violation of the due process clause. The court noted that prisons may impose restrictions on pretrial detainees so long as those restrictions are related to a non-punitive governmental purpose. (Vermont Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
RELIGIOUS ARTICLES
RELIGIOUS SERVICES

Sisney v. Reisch, 533 F.Supp.2d 952 (D.S.D. 2008). A state inmate brought an action under § 1983 and the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA), alleging corrections officials refused to make various accommodations for his practice of the Jewish religion. The district court held that the State of South Dakota, by accepting Federal prison funding, waived its Eleventh Amendment immunity in claims for monetary damages under RLUIPA. The court found that the officials' denial of the inmate's request for a permanent space for Jewish inmates' religious services did not impose a substantial burden on his exercise of the inmate's religion. The court noted that the inmate admitted that Jewish inmates had sufficient space for their services and that lack of a permanently designated room for their services did not prevent him from practicing his religion.

The court also found that summary judgment was precluded by fact issues as to whether officials' denial of the inmate's request, that Jewish inmates be given additional time to conduct group Torah, Kabalistic and language studies, was the least restrictive means of furthering any legitimate penological interest. The court found that officials' denial of the inmate's request to possess and use a lightbulb diffuser and to use oils and burn herbs in his cell appeared to be the least restrictive means for furthering a compelling governmental interest, where diffusers posed a serious fire hazard, other inmates and staff might be allergic to the fumes or find the aroma offensive, and they could be used to conceal prohibited activities such as smoking. (South Dakota State Penitentiary)

U.S. District Court
SEARCHES

Streeter v. Sheriff of Cook County, 576 F.Supp.2d 913 (N.D.Ill. 2008). Current or former pretrial detainees filed a class action under § 1983 against a county sheriff and the county, challenging a strip search policy at the county jail, alleging it violated their Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment rights. The district court denied summary judgment for the defendants. The court held that the detainees stated a claim for violation of their Fourth Amendment rights in connection with group strip searches that were allegedly conducted in an unreasonably intrusive manner and went on longer than penologically necessary. The court also found that the detainees stated a claim for violation of their rights under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment in connection with group strip searches that were allegedly conducted in a manner intended to humiliate and embarrass the detainees, and that went on longer than necessary. (Cook County Jail, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
CONFIDENTIAL
INFORMATION
SEX OFFENDER

Swift v. Tweddell, 582 F.Supp.2d 437 (W.D.N.Y. 2008). An inmate brought a pro se § 1983 action against a sheriff, deputies, and jail employees. The district court denied the defendants' motion for summary judgment. The court found that the jail employees were not deliberately indifferent to the inmate's serious medical needs, in violation of the Eighth Amendment, in connection with a delay in prescribing the inmate's "mental health" medications. The court noted that on the day that the inmate submitted a request for mental health clinic services, the jail nurse referred the request to the county Mental Health Department (MHD) pursuant to standard practice at the jail, but because the inmate did not appear to be an emergency case and because he made no further requests for mental health services, he was not seen by a psychiatrist from MHD for more than two months. He was prescribed Prozac but did not, according to the court, suffer serious adverse effects as a result of the temporary gap between his request for mental health care and his psychiatric examination. The court found that jail officials did not act with deliberate indifference to the inmate's safety, in violation of the Eighth Amendment, in connection with a corrections officer's alleged disclosure to other inmates that the inmate had been charged with rape. The court noted that following the disclosure, the inmate spoke with a captain who agreed to, and did remove another inmate who had allegedly taunted him about the rape charge from the inmate's housing unit. The inmate was not harmed, or placed in imminent danger, as a result of the disclosure. According to the court, disclosure to other inmates that the inmate had been charged with rape did not violate any of the inmate's privacy rights, since the information was not privileged or otherwise protected, and the inmate was also a sentenced offender under the authority of the New York State Department of Correctional Services. (Steuben County Jail, New York)

U.S. District Court
LIGHTING

Walker v. Woodford, 593 F.Supp.2d 1140 (S.D.Cal. 2008). A state prisoner filed a civil rights action against a prison and its personnel alleging that prison officials violated his Eighth Amendment rights by refusing to turn off the lights in their cells. The defendants filed a motion for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The court held that the prisoner had to present evidence showing that the prison's 24-hour illumination policy was the cause of his insomnia or related problems before the prison could be required to explain why legitimate penological interests justified it. According to the court, the prisoner's testimony did not establish that the illumination caused the unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain, or that prison personnel were deliberately indifferent to his serious medical needs in not modifying the illumination policy. The court found that prison officials were not plainly incompetent in requiring low-level lighting in prison cells 24 hours per day for security purposes. (Calipatria State Prison, California)

U.S. District Court
CONTRABAND
SAFETY

Warren v. Goord, 579 F.Supp.2d 488 (S.D.N.Y. 2008). An inmate brought a § 1983 suit against corrections officials for failure to protect him from harm from other prisoners, in violation of his Eighth Amendment rights. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants. The court held that the officials' failure to install metal detectors at the entrance to a recreation yard where an inmate was assaulted by other prisoners would not support the imposition of § 1983 liability on the inmate's Eighth Amendment claim, absent evidence that the officials did not take reasonable measures to address the risk that prisoners would carry weapons into the yard or that the presence of metal detectors would have significantly alleviated the risk. The court noted that other security measures were in place to address the dangers of attacks in the yards, including random frisks and metal detector screenings, more extensive screenings when alerted to specific dangers, and placement of prison officers in the yard during exercise periods. (Green Haven Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
SECURITY PRACTICES

Washpon v. Parr, 561 F.Supp.2d 394 (S.D.N.Y. 2008). An arrestee brought an action under § 1983 against court officers alleging false arrest, illegal search, malicious prosecution, denial of equal protection, excessive force, and violation of free speech. The district court granted summary judgment for the officers in part and denied in part. The court held that any restrictions on the arrestee's speech inside the courthouse were reasonable under the First Amendment in light of her admitted failure to pass through security or to comply with officers' orders to leave the building, absent evidence that government regulation of speech inside the courthouse amounted to viewpoint discrimination. At one point during the incident the arrestee allegedly “proceeded to speak in a loud manner, using profanity.” (Bronx County Criminal Court, New York)

U.S. District Court
CONTRABAND
SEARCHES

Williams v. Fitch, 550 F.Supp.2d 413 (W.D.N.Y. 2008). A state inmate filed a § 1983 action alleging that corrections officers sexually abused him. The district court dismissed the case. The court held that the officers did not violate the inmate's Eighth Amendment rights by searching and handling his penis on three occasions while searching for contraband. The court noted that X-rays showed the presence of a metal object in the foreskin of the inmate's penis, and the searches were undertaken in a private location, without undue physical intrusion, humiliation, or physical injury. (Attica Correctional Facility, New York)

2009

U.S. District Court
RESTRAINTS
SECURITY PRACTICES
SEGREGATION

Bowers v. Pollard, 602 F.Supp.2d 977 (E.D.Wis. 2009). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against correctional facility officials, challenging the conditions of his confinement. The court held that the correctional facility's enforcement of a behavior action plan that regularly denied the inmate a sleeping mattress, occasionally required him to wear only a segregation smock or paper gown, and subjected him to frequent restraint did not deny the inmate the minimal civilized measure of life's necessities and was targeted at his misconduct, and thus the plan did not violate the inmate's Eighth Amendment rights. The court noted that the inmate's cell was heated to 73 degrees, he was generally provided some form of dress, he was granted access to hygiene items, and he was only denied a mattress and other possessions after he used them to perpetrate self-abusive behavior, covered his cell with excrement and blood, and injured facility staff. The court held that the state Department of Corrections' regulations governing procedures for placing an inmate on observational status to ensure his safety and the safety of others, and the procedures for utilizing restraints for inmate safety were sufficient to protect the inmate's liberty interest in avoiding an erroneous determination that his behavior required such measures. The procedures governing observational status required the inmate to be orally informed of the reasons for placement on the status and prohibited placement for more than 15 days without an evidentiary hearing. The procedures governing restraints prohibited restraining an inmate for more than a 12-hour period. (Green Bay Correctional Institution, Wisconsin)

U.S. District Court
SEARCHES
SECURITY PRACTICES

Bullock v. Dart, 599 F.Supp.2d 947 (N.D.Ill. 2009). Inmates filed a § 1983 action challenging the constitutionality a county's policies of performing blanket strip searches on male, but not female, inmates returning to county jail from court hearings at which charges against them were dismissed, and of providing privacy screens for female discharges but not male discharges. After entry of summary judgment in the inmates' favor, the defendants moved for reconsideration. The district court granted the motion in part. The court held that male inmates were similarly situated to female potential discharges. The court found that fact issues remained as to whether the county's policies were justified, and whether security considerations prevented the county from segregating inmates against whom charges had been dismissed before they returned to their divisions. The defendants asserted that the much greater number of male inmates in county custody and the differences in the nature and frequency of dangerous incidents in each population justified the policy. The court held that the county's policy and practice of segregating female possible discharges from the remainder of female court returns, such that female actual returns could elect to avoid strip searches, but not segregating male possible discharges in a similar manner, was not gender-neutral on its face, for the purposes of the Equal Protection Clause. (Cook County Department of Corrections, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
ITEMS PERMITTED
SEARCHES-CELL
TELEPHONE

Cox v. Ashcroft, 603 F.Supp.2d 1261 (E.D.Cal. 2009). A prisoner brought a § 1983 action against the United States Attorney General, several federal prosecutors, and the owner and employees of a privately-owned federal facility in which the prisoner was incarcerated, alleging constitutional violations arising from his arrest, prosecution, and incarceration. The district court dismissed the action. The court held that the prisoner did not have any Fourth Amendment rights to privacy in his cell, and thus did not suffer any constitutional injury as a result of the search of his cell and the confiscation of another inmate's legal materials. The court found that the prisoner lacked standing to bring a claim against the warden of a privately-owned federal prison facility, alleging that paying the prisoner at a rate below minimum wage violated the Fair Labor Standards Act (FLSA). The court noted that prisoners were not "employees" within the meaning of FLSA. (Taft Corr. Institution, Wackenhut Corrections Corporation, California)

U.S. District Court
SAFETY REGULATIONS
SECURITY PRACTICES
STAFFING

Estate of Gaither ex rel. Gaither v. District of Columbia, 655 F.Supp.2d 69 (D.D.C. 2009). The personal representative of the estate of a prisoner, who was killed while incarcerated, brought a § 1983 action against the District of Columbia and several individual officials and jail employees, alleging negligence, deliberate and reckless indifference to allegedly dangerous conditions at a jail, and wrongful death. The district court granted summary judgment in part and denied in part. The court found that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to: (1) whether the District of Columbia's inmate and detainee classification policies, procedures, and practices were inadequate; (2) whether the District of Columbia's jail staffing policies, procedures, and practices were inadequate; (3) whether the security policies, procedures, and practices were inadequate; (4) whether the District of Columbia adequately trained Department of Corrections officials; and (5) whether officials provided adequate supervision of inmates. (District of Columbia Central Detention Facility)

U.S. District Court
RELIGIOUS SERVICES
SEARCHES

Forde v. Zickefoose, 612 F.Supp.2d 171 (D.Conn. 2009). A federal prisoner petitioned for a writ of habeas corpus, alleging that she was being denied freedom of religious expression, in violation of the First and Fourth Amendments and the Religious Freedom Restoration Act (RFRA). The district court granted the government's motion for summary judgment in part and denied in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by issues of fact as to: (1) whether the prisoner's exercise of her religion was substantially burdened by the prison's non-emergency cross-gender pat-down search policy; (2) whether the prisoner's exercise of her religion was substantially burdened by the prison's policy of requiring her to carry an identification photograph that showed her without a hijab to cover her head; and, (3) whether the prisoner's exercise of her religion was substantially burdened by the prison's failure to provide an imam during Ramadan. The court held that the prison's non-emergency cross-gender pat-down search policy did not violate the prisoner's limited right, under the Fourth Amendment, to bodily privacy. According to the court, although the prisoner made a sufficient showing of a subjective expectation of privacy, the expectation would not be considered reasonable by society, since the prison had a legitimate penological interest in security and in providing equal employment opportunities to both male and female staff, and no available further accommodation was reasonable under the circumstances. (Federal Correctional Institution, Danbury, Connecticut)

U.S. Appeals Court
MEDIA ACCESS

Hammer v. Ashcroft, 570 F.3d 798 (7th Cir. 2009). A federal prisoner who was formerly on death row and was housed in a special confinement unit, filed a pro se lawsuit against various officials of the Bureau of Prisons (BOP), alleging that they violated his First Amendment and equal protection rights by enforcing a policy that prevented prisoners in a special confinement unit from giving face-to-face interviews with the media. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the BOP policy that prevented prisoners in special confinement units at maximum security prisons from giving face-to-face or video interviews with the media did not violate the equal protection clause. According to the court, although the BOP did not prevent such media interviews with other prisoners in a less secure confinement, the policy was rationally related to the BOP's need for greater security in situations involving prisoners in special confinement units in maximum security prisons, since media attention could increase tensions among prisoners, leading to an increased risk of violence among the more violent prisoners. The court found that the BOP did not violate the prisoner's free speech rights where the policy was rationally related to the prison's need for greater security in situations involving prisoners in special confinement units in maximum security prisons, since media attention could increase tensions among prisoners, glamorize violence, and promote celebrity, leading to an increased risk of violence. The court noted that the BOP did allow correspondence from prisoners in special confinement units to media representatives, prisoners were free to file lawsuits, and correspondence sent to courts and attorneys by prisoners could not be censored. ("Special Confinement Unit," U.S. Penitentiary, Terre Haute, Indiana)

U.S. Appeals Court
RELIGIOUS SERVICES
SECURITY PRACTICES

Jova v. Smith, 582 F.3d 410 (2nd Cir. 2009). Prisoners brought a pro se action against prison officials alleging violation of their rights under the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA). The district court granted summary judgment in favor of officials. The prisoners appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, vacated in part, and remanded. The appeals court held that the prison's restrictions on the prisoners' practice of the Tulukeesh religion, which limited the practice to the privacy of the prisoner's cell and keeping a holy book with the prison chaplain from whom the prisoners' could seek permission to read it, served prison officials' compelling security and administrative interests, for the purposes of the prisoners' action alleging violation of their rights under RLUIPA. The court held that prison officials' restrictions which allowed a prisoner to serve as a facilitator of meetings only if the religion was known outside of the prison and prohibited the prisoners' demand to spar and receive professional martial arts training, was the least restrictive means of furthering their compelling interests of safety and institutional security, for the purposes of prisoners' action alleging violation of their rights under RLUIPA. According to the court, the restriction struck a delicate balance between allowing prisoners to participate in congregational activities while ensuring the meetings did not serve as proxies for gang recruitment and organization, while furthering the officials' compelling interests in safety and institutional security. (Shawangunk Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
CONTRABAND
MAIL
TELEPHONE CALLS

Loret v. Selsky, 595 F.Supp.2d 231 (W.D.N.Y. 2009). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against state correctional officials and employees, alleging procedural due process violations in connection with a prison disciplinary action. The district court granted summary judgment to the defendants in part and denied in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether there were legitimate security reasons for the correctional facility officials' denial of the inmate's request for a recording or transcript of the telephone conversation between him and his son. The conversation formed part of the basis for disciplinary charges against the inmate for conspiracy to smuggle contraband into the facility and for telephone abuse. A package addressed to the inmate had been opened by corrections employees, and was found to contain a quantity of marijuana and some small bottles of liquor. The package was later identified as having been sent to the plaintiff by his adult son. The court held that the superintendent of the correctional facility was not liable in his individual capacity to the inmate under § 1983 for any due process violations in connection with disciplinary proceedings against the inmate, absent a showing that the superintendent was personally involved in the alleged constitutional deprivation. (Wyoming Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
SEARCHES
TRANSFER

Miller v. Washington County, 650 F.Supp.2d 1113 (D.Or. 2009). Inmates brought a class action against county and sheriff, alleging that the county's policy of strip searching inmates was unconstitutional. The parties cross-moved for summary judgment, and the inmates additionally moved for class certification. The district court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact existed as to whether the county's blanket policy of strip searching all individuals transported from another correctional or detention facility was justified by the need for institutional security. The court denied class certification, finding that the county's strip search policy regarding arrestees did not present common questions of law or fact. The court stayed the action, noting that the appellate court was reviewing a city's strip search policy at the time. (Washington County Jail, Oregon)

U.S. District Court
EXERCISE
LOCK DOWN
RIOT

Norwood v. Woodford, 661 F.Supp.2d 1148 (S.D.Cal. 2009). A state inmate brought a § 1983 action against prison officials alleging violation of his Eighth Amendment rights when he was denied outdoor exercise for five weeks. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants. The court held that the inmate's denial of outdoor exercise for a period of five consecutive weeks during a lockdown at the prison supported the objective component of an Eighth Amendment claim for cruel and unusual punishment, but failed to meet the subjective component since the officials did not act with deliberate indifference to his needs. The court noted that the lockdown was instituted after an inmate's death in a prison riot involving the attempted murder of prison staff. According to the court, even though the inmate was transferred to the facility after the riot and was not a participant, the lockdown of all prisoners was necessary to ensure immediate and long-lasting safety to inmates and staff. (California State Prison, Corcoran)

U.S. District Court
LOCKS

Rodriguez-Borton v. Pereira-Castillo, 593 F.Supp.2d 399 (D.Puerto Rico 2009). Relatives of a deceased pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against prison officials, requesting damages for constitutional violations culminating in the detainee's death. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants in part and denied in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by fact issues as to the lack of adequate inmate supervision and malfunctioning cell locks and cell lights. The court also found an issue of material fact as to whether the Administrator of the Puerto Rico Administration of Corrections (AOC) failed to act with regard to security risks, including malfunctioning door locks, in the annex within which the pretrial detainee was found hanged.

The court also found a genuine issue of material fact as to the prison annex superintendent's failure to remedy supervision problems in housing units where he knew inmates were able to and did move freely in and out of their cells due to malfunctioning door locks. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to a correctional officer's failure to patrol the living area of the annex within which the pretrial detainee was found hanged while he knew inmates were able to freely move around. The court denied qualified immunity to the defendants because it was clearly established at the time of the alleged inaction, and a reasonable prison official working in the system would have known that a lack of supervision, combined with the knowledge that cell locks did not function, would create an obvious and undeniable security risk. (Administration of Corrections of the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, and Annex 246)

U.S. Appeals Court
CONTRABAND
SEARCHES

Sanchez v. Pereira-Castillo, 590 F.3d 31 (1st Cir. 2009). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 claims against correctional officials, a prison warden, a prison's correctional officer, and a physician, and medical battery and medical malpractice claims against the physician, relating to strip searches, x-rays, rectal examinations, and exploratory surgery to detect and recover suspected contraband. The district court dismissed the suit and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, vacated in part and remanded. The appeals court held that the digital rectal examinations were not unreasonable where the procedures were the direct culmination of a series of searches that began when a metal detector used to scan the prisoner's person gave a positive reading, the prisoner had two normal bowel movements before the searches were conducted, a physician examined him upon arrival at the hospital and found him to be asymptomatic, and several lab tests were found to be "within normal limits." The court noted that the searches were carried out by medical professionals in the relatively private, sanitary environment of a hospital, upon suspicion that the prisoner had contraband, namely a cell phone, in his rectum, and with no abusive or humiliating conduct on the part of the law enforcement officers or the doctors.

But the court found that the exploratory surgery of the abdomen of the prisoner was unreasonable where the surgery required total anesthesia, surgical invasion of the abdominal cavity, and two days of recovery in the hospital. The court noted that the surgery was conducted despite several indications of the absence of contraband, including the results of two monitored bowel movements and two rectal examinations. According to the court, an x-ray, as a much less invasive procedure, could have confirmed the results.

The court held that the prisoner's signed consent form for the exploratory surgery of his abdomen did not preclude the prisoner's claim that he was deprived of his Fourth Amendment rights, where the prisoner was pressured and intimidated into signing the consent, had been under constant surveillance for more than a day prior to the surgery, had been forced to submit to searches, x-rays, and invasive rectal examinations prior to his signing the consent form, and had twice been forced to excrete on a floor in the presence of prison personnel.

The court held that the prisoner's allegations against correctional officers were sufficient to allege that the officers caused the hospital's forced exploratory surgery on the prisoner, as required to state a § 1983 claim against the officers. The prisoner alleged that the officers were directly involved in all phases of the search for contraband and in the ultimate decision to transport the prisoner to the hospital for a rectal examination or a medical procedure to remove the foreign object purportedly lodged in the prisoner's rectum.

According to the court, the prisoner's allegation that correctional officers exerted pressure on hospital physicians that examined the prisoner was sufficient to allege the state compulsion necessary to state a claim of § 1983 liability against a surgeon. The court found that correctional officers' conduct, in forcing the prisoner to undergo an invasive abdominal surgery, was a violation of a clearly established constitutional right, such that the officers were not entitled to qualified immunity from § 1983 liability. (Bayamón 501 Unit of the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico Administration of Corrections, and Río Piedras Medical Center)

U.S. District Court
SEPARATION
TRANSFER

Savage v. Judge, 644 F.Supp.2d 550 (E.D.Pa. 2009). Prison inmates brought a civil rights action against prison officials for allegedly violating their civil rights in connection with reassignment of the inmates to different cells and assaults allegedly committed upon them. Inmates not only asserted unlawful retaliation claims, but claimed that officials exercised excessive force in violation of their Eighth Amendment rights and unlawfully conspired to violate their rights. The officials moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether prison officials, in separating the cellmates from each other and in transferring one to another facility, were retaliating against the cellmates for their pursuit of grievances, or were taking necessary action to prevent the cellmates from engaging in homosexual activity in a cell. The court also found a genuine issue of material fact as to how an inmate sustained an injury to his face while he was being transferred to another cell. (Graterford L-Unit- RHU, Pennsylvania Department of Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
CONTRABAND
SEARCHES

Serna v. Goodno, 567 F.3d 944 (8th Cir. 2009). A patient of a state mental hospital, involuntarily civilly committed as a sexually dangerous person pursuant to a Minnesota sex offender program, brought a § 1983 action against a program official and against the head of the state's Department of Human Services. The patient alleged that visual body-cavity searches performed on all patients as part of a contraband investigation violated his Fourth Amendment rights. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants, and the patient appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that visual body-cavity searches performed on all patients of a state mental hospital, as part of a contraband investigation following the discovery of a cell-phone case in a common area, did not infringe upon the Fourth Amendment rights of the patient involuntarily civilly committed to the facility as a sexually dangerous person. According to the court, even though facility-wide searches may have constituted a disproportionate reaction, cell phones presented a security threat in the context of sexually violent persons, there was a history of patients' use of phones to commit crimes, and the searches were conducted in a private bathroom with no extraneous personnel present and in a professional manner with same-sex teams of two. (Minnesota Sex Offender Program, Moose Lake,)

U.S. Appeals Court
RELIGIOUS ARTICLES

Singson v. Norris, 553 F.3d 660 (8th Cir. 2009). A prisoner brought an action against a state department of corrections, alleging its policy prohibiting in-cell use of tarot cards violated the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA). The prisoner was a follower of Wiccan and asserted that tarot cards were part of his religious practices. Following a trial, the district court ruled in favor of the department of corrections. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the policy did not violate RLUIPA, where the potential effect of in-cell use of tarot cards on the guards and allocation of prison resources outweighed the restrictions felt by any interested inmate-users. (Arkansas Department of Correction)

U.S. Appeals Court
RELIGIOUS SERVICES
SECURITY PRACTICES

Sossamon v. Lone Star State of Texas, 560 F.3d 316 (5th Cir. 2009). A prison inmate brought a civil rights action challenging prison officials' refusal to allow him to participate in religious services while he was on cell restriction, and refusal to make a chapel available for religious services due to security concerns allegedly presented by holding such services in the chapel. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants and the inmate appealed. The appeals court dismissed as moot in part, reversed in part, affirmed in part and remanded. The court held that the state-wide cessation, in all correctional facilities in Texas, of the policy of preventing general-population prisoners on cell restriction from attending religious services had the effect of mooting the civil rights claim. The court found that the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA) did not create an individual-capacity cause of action in favor of the prison inmate against prison officials who had denied him access to a prison chapel. According to the court, RLUIPA did not provide clear notice that, by accepting federal funds, the state was waiving its sovereign immunity from liability for such monetary damages. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact on the inmate's claims for injunctive relief challenging the denial of access to a chapel. The inmate alleged that his exercise of religion was substantially burdened because he could not use the prison chapel where he could kneel in front of an alter in view of a cross, and due to his being able to attend religious services only at other locations in the prison that were not specifically designed for Christian worship. (Robertson Unit of the Texas Department of Criminal Justice, Correctional Institutions Division)

U.S. Appeals Court
ACCESS TO ATTORNEY
SECURITY
RESTRICTIONS

U.S. v. Mikhel, 552 F.3d 961 (9th Cir. 2009). An alien inmate convicted of capital offenses moved to allow attorney-client access without special administrative measures (SAM) restrictions that allegedly violated the Due Process Clause and Sixth Amendment right to effective assistance of appellate counsel. The appeals court held that modification of the SAM was warranted to permit the attorney to use a translator in a meeting with the inmate, and modification of the SAM was warranted to allow the attorney's investigators to disseminate the inmate's communications. The court also found that modification of the SAM was warranted to allow the attorney's investigator to meet with the inmate. The court found that the SAM was an exaggerated response to the prison's legitimate security interests and unacceptably burdened the inmate's due process and Sixth Amendment rights. (Central District, California)

U.S. Appeals Court
RESTRAINTS

Vallario v. Vandehey, 554 F.3d 1259 (10th Cir. 2009). County jail inmates sued a county sheriff and a county's administrator of jail operations in their official capacities, alleging disregard of risks to inmates from restraint chairs and other devices, and the denial of access to psychiatric care for indigent inmates. The district court granted the inmates' motion for class certification and the defendants petitioned for interlocutory appeal. The appeals court granted the petition and remanded the case. The court held that the district court abused its discretion by misconstruing the complaint as alleging that denial of adequate mental health treatment affected all inmates, and abused its discretion by refraining from any consideration whatsoever of the action's merits. (Garfield County Jail, Colorado)

2010

U.S. District Court
MAIL
SECURITY
RESTRICTIONS

Akers v. Watts, 740 F.Supp.2d 83 (D.D.C. 2010). A federal inmate brought a civil rights action against various officials, employees, and agents of the Federal Bureau of Prisons (BOP), Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI), United States Attorney's Office for the District of Kansas, and the United States Marshals Service (USMS) in their individual capacities, alleging, among other things, that the defendants conspired to violate his constitutional rights by restricting his communications with persons outside the prison. The district court granted the federal defendants motion to dismiss. The court held that it did not have personal jurisdiction in the federal inmate's civil rights action against the Bureau of Prisons (BOP) officials, employees, and agents, a Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) agent, a Kansas Assistant United States Attorney (AUSA), or the United States marshals, where the complaint made no allegations that such defendants had any personal connection with District of Columbia other than their federal employment, and the mere fact that the defendants were federal government employees, affiliated with agencies that were headquartered or maintained offices in the District of Columbia, was insufficient to render them subject to suit in their individual capacities. The court held that restrictions imposed upon, and the Bureau of Prisons (BOP) interferences with, the correspondence of federal inmate, who had initiated fraudulent schemes from prison on more than one occasion and used the mail in furtherance of his efforts, served a legitimate penological interest by limiting the inmate's ability to manipulate or swindle others, and thus did not violate the inmate's First Amendment rights. The court noted that the inmate had no reasonable expectation of privacy in his non-legal mail, and therefore restrictions placed upon the inmate's correspondence following his repeated efforts to initiate new fraudulent schemes while incarcerated did not violate the Fourth Amendment. (Admin. Max., Florence, Colorado, Fed. Bureau of Prisons)

U.S. District Court
LOCK DOWN
PRETRIAL DETAINEES
USE OF FORCE

Castro v. Melchor, 760 F.Supp.2d 970(D.Hawai'I 2010). A female pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against correctional facility officials and medical staff, alleging the defendants were deliberately indifferent to his serious medical needs resulting in the delivery of a stillborn child. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the correctional facility's medical staff subjectively knew the pretrial detainee's complaints of vaginal bleeding presented a serious medical need. The court held that the staff's failure to ensure the detainee received an ultrasound and consultation was no more than gross negligence, and the medical staff did not deny, delay, or intentionally interfere with the pretrial detainee's medical treatment. According to the court, summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the correctional facility officials' actions and inactions in training the facility's medical staff resulted in the alleged deprivation of the pretrial detainee's right to medical treatment and whether the officials consciously disregarded serious health risks by failing to apply the women's lock-down policies. Following a verbal exchange with a guard, two officers physically forced the detainee to the ground from a standing position. While she was lying on the ground on her stomach, the officers restrained her by holding their body weights against her back and legs and placing her in handcuffs. The detainee was approximately seven months pregnant at the time. (Oahu Community Correctional Center, Hawai'i)

U.S. District Court
LOCK DOWN
RELIGIOUS SERVICES

Chappell v. Helder, 696 F.Supp.2d 1021 (W.D.Ark. 2010). An inmate brought a § 1983 suit claiming that religious presentations in a dayroom during lockout times contravened the Free Exercise Clause of the Constitution. The court held that the presentations contravened the inmate's rights under the Free Exercise Clause. The court noted that although he was not told to sit and listen, nor was he forced to participate, there was a forced inculcation in the fact that he was unable to remove himself to a place where he did not have to hear the presentations. The court found that allowing only the "Holy Bible" to be possessed by inmates during a morning lockout violated the inmate's rights under the Establishment Clause, but the inmate's right of meaningful access to the courts was not violated. (Washington County Detention Center, Arkansas)

U.S. Appeals Court
EXPOSURE TO CHEMICALS
CLEANING SUPPLIES

Christian v. Wagner, 623 F.3d 608 (8th Cir. 2010). A pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against jail officials and employees, alleging a due process violation arising out of his exposure to a cleaning solvent. After a jury found in favor of the defendants, the district court denied the detainee's motion for a new trial or judgment as a matter of law. The detainee appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the jury could reasonably find that the detainee failed to show that a physician or other medical personnel had diagnosed him with a serious medical need while incarcerated, as would support a finding that such need was objectively serious. The court noted that medical personnel who examined the detainee found no objective evidence supporting a diagnosis, and the record did not contain a medical order to jail employees. The court also held that evidence supported the finding that the detainee's need for medical attention was not so obvious that a layperson must have recognized it, as would support a finding that such need was objectively serious. According to the court, the detainee's testimony that he informed jail employees that he coughed up blood and experienced difficulty breathing was corroborated only by his mother, whereas several jail employees testified they did not observe the detainee suffering adverse reactions to cleaning solutions and had no recollection of his complaining of a medical problem. (Johnson County Jail, Iowa)

U.S. District Court
BOOKS
RELIGIOUS SERVICES

Ciempa v. Jones, 745 F.Supp.2d 1171 (N.D.Okla. 2010). An inmate brought claims against state prison officials under § 1983 for alleged violations of the First, Fourth, and Fourteenth Amendments and the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA). The officials moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that prison officials did not violate the inmate's First Amendment right to free exercise of religion, RLUIPA, the inmate's due process rights, or equal protection, by denying him access to particular issues of a religious publication based on guidelines prohibiting publications that advocate terrorism, criminal behavior, racial, religious, or national hatred. According to the court, the guidelines were reasonably related to the legitimate penological goal of maintaining order and security, individual review of incoming publications was a rational means of achieving that goal and did not deprive the inmate of all means of exercising his religion, and allowing such materials would have a significant negative impact on other inmates and guards.

The court also found no violation from the officials' denial of access to a book containing instructions for scaling walls, traveling under or over barbed wire, and combat techniques, since preventing the book was the least restrictive means of ensuring that the inmate did not receive information that would facilitate violence or escape.

But the court held that the officials failed to meet their burden to show that prohibiting a book about the warrior ethos and the history of stoicism in the military was the least restrictive means of achieving a compelling interest, as required for summary judgment on the inmate's RLUIPA claim. The court found that prison officials did not violate the inmate's First Amendment rights by denying him meeting space and time in a prison chapel to conduct religious classes or meetings, based on a state-wide policy of denying meeting space and time to the religious group due to the racial and hate filled nature of the materials and doctrine of the group. But the court found that the officials failed to meet their burden to show that banning the religious group from the chapel was the least restrictive means of achieving a compelling interest, as required for summary judgment on the inmate's RLUIPA claim.

According to the court, prison officials' failure to provide the inmate with a Halal diet did not violate his rights under First Amendment or RLUIPA, where the inmate failed to establish that such failure imposed a substantial burden on his religious exercise, since the inmate stated that his religious needs could be satisfied by the provision of a Kosher diet. (Dick Conner Correctional Center, Jess Dunn Correctional Center, Oklahoma)

U.S. District Court
BOOKS

Couch v. Jabe, 737 F.Supp.2d 561 (W.D.Va. 2010). An inmate, proceeding pro se, brought a § 1983 action claiming that prison officials violated his First and Fourteenth Amendment rights when they applied a Virginia Department of Corrections (VDOC) regulation to exclude the books Ulysses and Lady Chatterley's Lover from the prison library and prevented him from ordering those books from a private, approved vendor. The parties cross-moved for summary judgment. The district granted the inmate's motion, finding that the regulation violated the First Amendment, and that injunctive relief was warranted. The court held that the regulation was not reasonably related to legitimate penological interests, and thus, was overbroad, in violation of the First Amendment. The court noted that legitimate government interests in security, discipline, good order and offender rehabilitation were not rationally related to the regulation, which forbid all "explicit ... descriptions of sexual acts" including "sexual acts in violation of state or federal law," and encompassed much of the world's finest literature, but did not extend to "soft core" pornography. According to the court, while the inmate had no right to a general purpose reading library under the First Amendment, where the Virginia Department of Corrections (VDOC) decided to provide a general literary library to offenders, VDOC officials were constrained by the First Amendment in how they regulated the library. The court concluded that the appropriate remedy following a determination that the First Amendment was violated by a prison regulation, which excluded the books Ulysses and Lady Chatterley's Lover from a prison library, was injunctive relief against the enforcement and application of the regulation. (Augusta Correctional Center, Virginia)

U.S. District Court
ESCAPE
SECURITY PRACTICES

Dean v. Walker, 743 F.Supp.2d 605 (S.D.Miss. 2010). Motorists injured when a squad car commandeered by an escapee collided with their vehicle brought a § 1983 action in state court against a county sheriff and deputy sheriffs, in their individual and official capacities, the county, and others, asserting various claims under federal and state law. The case was removed to federal court where the court granted in part and denied in part the defendants' motion for summary judgment. The defendants moved to alter or amend. The court denied the motion. The court held that the "public duty" doctrine did not relieve the county of tort liability to the motorists under the Mississippi Tort Claims Act (MTCA). The court found that the county sheriff and deputy sheriffs who were in vehicular pursuit of the escaped jail inmate when the escapee's vehicle crashed into the motorists' vehicle owed a duty to the motorists as fellow drivers, separate and apart from their general duties to the public as police officers, and thus the "public duty" doctrine did not relieve the county of tort liability in the motorists' claims under the Mississippi Tort Claims Act (MTCA). (Jefferson–Franklin Correctional Facility, Mississippi)

U.S. District Court
DISTURBANCE
SEX OFFENDER
USE OF FORCE

Enriquez v. Kearney, 694 F.Supp.2d 1282 (S.D.Fla. 2010). A civil detainee brought a pro se civil rights action against correctional facility officers and physicians, asserting claims for excessive force. The officers and physicians moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The court held that officers did not use excessive force against the civil detainee in violation of his due process rights by spraying him with pepper spray, handcuffing him, and escorting him from a detention unit in restraints, where the detainee did not sustain any serious injury, and the decision to use pepper spray was only made after officers attempted for more than one hour to verbally convince the detainee to cooperate and leave the unit where his interaction with officers was causing a disturbance. The court noted that there was no indication that the force was imposed as punishment rather than in a good faith effort to further the need to maintain order and security on a unit where numerous sexually violent predators (SVPs) were held. (Florida Civil Commitment Center, Arcadia, Florida)

U.S. Appeals Court
PUBLICATIONS

Farid v. Ellen, 593 F.3d 233 (2nd Cir. 2010). A state prisoner brought suit against correctional officials under § 1983, alleging that he was deprived of rights protected by the First Amendment when he was disciplined by prison officials for possessing and distributing a booklet of which he was the principal author. The district court granted in part and denied in part the parties' summary judgment motions. The parties appealed and cross-appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part and vacated and remanded in part. The court held that the prison disciplinary rule prohibiting contraband was unconstitutionally vague as applied to the state prisoner. The prisoner was disciplined for possessing and distributing a brochure that violated an inmate group's internal bylaws by not having been approved by the group's staff advisor. The court noted that the bylaws did not indicate that violation of the group's bylaws constituted a violation of the prison contraband rule, thus exposing the prisoner to far greater penalties than the group could have imposed, and prison rules conferred almost complete enforcement discretion on prison officials. According to the court, the prisoner's right to not be punished under prison rules for violation of an inmate group's internal bylaws was clearly established, weighing against the prison officials' claim of qualified immunity in the § 1983 action. The court noted that the essence of constitutional prohibitions on vagueness was that the rules must give notice of conduct that they, rather than another set of rules, prohibit and must constrain discretion of officials who apply them. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether state prison officials actually intended to punish the prisoner under the prison's contraband rule or for violating an internal bylaw of an inmate group. (Woodbourne Correctional Facility, Clinton Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
RELIGION
SEARCHES
STAFFING

Forde v. Baird, 720 F.Supp.2d 170 (D.Conn. 2010). A federal inmate petitioned for a writ of habeas corpus, alleging that she was being denied freedom of religious expression, in violation of the First Amendment and the Religious Freedom Restoration Act (RFRA). The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants, in part, and denied in part. The court held that the Muslim inmate's right to free exercise of religion was substantially burdened, as required to support her claim under RFRA, by a prison policy allowing for non-emergency pat searches of female inmates by male guards, despite prison officials' claim that the inmate's belief was not accurate. The court found that the choice offered the inmate, of violating her understanding of the precepts of Islam, or refusing a search and risking punishment, constituted a substantial burden. The court found that the prison's interest in maintaining safety and security of the female prison through the use of cross-gender pat searches was not compelling, as required to justify a substantial burden on the inmate's right of free exercise of religion under RFRA, where the prison's arguments regarding how and why the cross-gender pat searches promoted safety and security at the prison were actually related to the staffing of the facility, not to its safety and security. According to the court, the prison's interest in avoiding staffing and employment issues at the female prison through the use of cross-gender pat searches was not compelling, as required to justify a substantial burden on the inmate's right of free exercise of religion under RFRA. The court noted that even if the prison's interests in maintaining safety and security and avoiding staffing and employment issues were compelling, cross-gender pat searches were not the least restrictive means of addressing these interests, as required to justify the substantial burden on an inmate's right of free exercise of religion under RFRA, absent evidence that the prison considered and rejected less restrictive practices to cross-gender pat searches. (Federal Correctional Institution in Danbury, Connecticut)

U.S. District Court
DISTURBANCE
RELIGIOUS SERVICES
SECURITY
RESTRICTIONS

Gordon v. Caruso, 720 F.Supp.2d 896 (W.D.Mich. 2010). An inmate sued corrections officials under § 1983 and the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA), claiming that they violated his rights by preventing him from engaging in group worship services with other adherents of his faith. Following denial of a defense motion for summary judgment, officials moved for reconsideration. The appeals court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether prison officials' ban on Asatru group worship was the least restrictive means of furthering their interest in maintaining prison security. The court found that prison officials who banned Asatru group worship had a rational basis for treating members of the Asatru faith differently from other groups that promoted racist and supremacist teachings, based on a demonstrated connection between the practice of Asatru and violence and racial conflict in the prison setting, and thus, there was no violation of the inmate's equal protection rights. The court noted that the other groups that were allowed to engage in group activity were not shown to present similar security concerns. (Michigan Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
RELIGIOUS SERVICES

Green v. Tudor, 685 F.Supp.2d 678 (W.D.Mich. 2010). A state inmate brought a § 1983 action against four employees at a prison for claims arising from his access to a prison law library and the adequacy of the prison's food service. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The court held that the inmate failed to exhaust administrative remedies prior to bringing his claim against an assistant librarian alleging denial of access to courts through a denied “call-out” request. The court found that the assistant librarian did not engage in retaliatory conduct against the inmate and did not deny the inmate equal protection. The court held that the assistant food service director did not coerce the inmate, an Orthodox Muslim, into participating in Jewish religious practices, and did not take any actions establishing a state religion, so as to violate the Establishment Clause of the First Amendment. The court held that the alleged denial by the prison's assistant food service director of adequate advance notice of meal substitutions, hot meals during non-daylight hours during a religious holiday, and adequate nutritional calories to the Muslim inmate was rationally related to legitimate governmental and penological interests of prison security and fiscal budgetary discipline, and thus the denials did not violate the inmate's First Amendment free exercise rights. The court noted that the inmate retained alternative means for practicing his Muslim faith, and granting requests for specialized diets would be expensive and would divert resources from other penological goals. (Muskegon Correctional Facility, Michigan)

U.S. District Court
RESTRAINTS
SAFETY

Gruenberg v. Gempeler, 740 F.Supp.2d 1018 (E.D.Wis. 2010). A prisoner, proceeding pro se, filed a § 1983 action against various prison officials, guards and medical staff, alleging violations of the Eighth Amendment. The district court granted the defendants’ motion for summary judgment. The court held that the prisoner did not have a clearly established right to not be continually restrained without clothing or cover in a cell following his ingestion of a handcuff key, a master key for belt restraints and one of the keys used for opening cell doors, and therefore, prison officials were entitled to qualified immunity in the prisoner's § 1983 action alleging violations of the Eighth Amendment. According to the court, continuous restraint of the prisoner without clothing or cover in a cell did not violate the prisoner's Fourteenth Amendment due process rights, where the prisoner was not restrained for a disciplinary reason, but to ensure prison staff was able to regain possession of a handcuff key, a master key for belt restraints and one of the keys used for opening cell doors following the prisoner's ingestion of them. (Waupun Correctional Institution, Wisconsin)

U.S. District Court
CONTRABAND
SEARCHES
USE OF FORCE

Hanson v. U.S., 712 F.Supp.2d 321 (D.N.J. 2010). An inmate brought a Federal Tort Claims Act (FTCA) action, alleging that a Bureau of Prisons (BOP) officer slammed his head on the floor and choked him in an attempt to force the inmate to spit out contraband that the inmate was attempting to swallow. The government filed a motion for summary judgment and the district court denied the motion. The court held, for the purposes of the inmate's FTCA claim, under New Jersey law the BOP officers employed unreasonable force while attempting to search the inmate for contraband. According to the court, summary judgment was precluded by material issues of fact regarding whether the BOP officers used reasonable force in holding and searching the inmate. (Federal Correctional Facility in Fort Dix, New Jersey)

U.S. District Court
SAFETY
TRANSFER

Hartry v. County of Suffolk, 755 F.Supp.2d 422 (E.D.N.Y.2010). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against a sergeant and a county, alleging failure to protect him from harm and deliberate indifference to his health and safety. The district court denied the defendants’ motion for summary judgment. The court held that the inmate's transfer from one county prison to another county prison deprived him of a meaningful opportunity to pursue his administrative remedies following an attack by another inmate, and therefore, his failure to exhaust administrative remedies prior to bringing his § 1983 action against the sergeant and the county was excused. The court noted that the inmate handbook permitted an inmate five days to file a grievance, and the inmate was transferred within two days of the attack. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the inmate faced a real and significant threat of harm from other inmates, and whether the prison sergeant was aware of a substantial risk of harm to the inmate from other inmates. The court also found a genuine issue of material fact as to whether moving an inmate only in response to a direct threat, within or outside of the jail, was a reasonable protective measure. (Suffolk County Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
RELIGIOUS ARTICLES
SATANISM

Indreland v. Yellowstone County Bd. of Comr's, 693 F.Supp.2d 1230 (D.Mont. 2010). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against a county board of commissioners and prison officials, alleging, among other things, that the defendants' actions, including denying him access to satanic materials and holding him in maximum security, interfered with his free exercise of religion in violation of First Amendment and Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA). The court held that prison officials' denial of access to his satanic medallion did not interfere with his free exercise of religion in violation of First Amendment and RLUIPA, where the officials had a legitimate penological interest in denying the prisoner a chain that the officials believed could be used to strangle another inmate. According to the court, prison officials segregated the prisoner because he was involved in fights with other inmates, and not solely on account of his alleged satanic religion, and thus the prisoner's segregation did not interfere with his free exercise of religion in violation of First Amendment and RLUIPA. The court held that the county detention facility was not required under the First Amendment or RLUIPA to purchase religious materials for the prisoner at its own expense. But the court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the prison chaplain was working in conjunction with prison staff to deny the prisoner, who claimed to practice satanism, his free exercise of religion, and therefore, whether the chaplain was state actor. (Yellowstone County Detention Facility, Montana)

U.S. District Court
DISTURBANCE
USE OF FORCE

Johnson v. Roberts, 721 F.Supp.2d 1017 (D.Kan. 2010). A former county jail inmate brought an action against a deputy, sheriff, and county board of commissioners, alleging use of excessive force when the deputy used a stun gun on the inmate. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court held that the use of a stun gun to subdue the county jail inmate was reasonable and did not violate the inmate's Eighth Amendment rights. The court noted that the inmate had placed a towel in front of a security camera in violation of a jail rule, and when deputies responded to the inmate's cell to confiscate the towel and the inmate's property box, the inmate refused to hand over the box and either dropped or threw the box to the floor and refused an order to pick it up, placing the deputy in the position of bending down to retrieve the box from directly in front of the noncompliant inmate. The court found that the use of a stun gun was not a clearly established violation of the Eighth Amendment at the time of the incident and thus the deputy, sheriff, and county board of commissioners were entitled to qualified immunity. The court noted that the deputy used the stun gun to ensure the inmate's compliance with orders and not to punish the inmate. (Miami County Jail, Kansas)

U.S. District Court
MAIL
RELIGIOUS ARTICLES
USE OF FORCE

Kendrick v. Faust, 682 F.Supp.2d 932 (E.D. Ark. 2010). A female state prison inmate brought a § 1983 action against employees of the Arkansas Department of Correction (ADC), alleging various violations of her constitutional rights. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the inmate failed to allege that she sustained an actual injury or that an Arkansas Department of Correction (ADC) official denied her the opportunity to review her mail prior to its being confiscated, as required to support a claim that the official violated the inmate's constitutional right of access to the courts and her First Amendment right to send and receive mail. The court found that an ADC employee's use of force against the inmate was justified by the inmate's disruptive behavior during the search of her cell and thus did not give rise to the ADC employee's liability on an excessive force claim. The inmate alleged that the ADC employee grabbed her by the arm, dragged her from her cell, and threw her into the shower. The court note that there was no medical evidence that the ADC employee's use of handcuffs caused any permanent injury to the inmate as required to support a claim that the employee used excessive force against the inmate. The court found that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether there was a legitimate penological interest for the alleged destruction of the prison inmate's bible, precluding summary judgment as to whether ADC employees violated the inmate's right to freedom of religion by destroying her bible. (Arkansas Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
SEARCHES
VISITS

Mashburn v. Yamhill County, 698 F.Supp.2d 1233 (D.Or. 2010). A class action was brought on behalf of juvenile detainees against a county and officials, challenging strip-search procedures at a juvenile detention facility. The parties cross-moved for summary judgment. The court held that the scope of an admission strip-search policy applied to juvenile detainees was excessive in relation to the government's legitimate interests, in contravention of the Fourth Amendment. According to the court, notwithstanding the county's general obligation to care for and protect juveniles, the searches were highly intrusive, the county made no effort to mitigate the scope and intensity of the searches, and less intrusive alternatives existed. The court found that county officials failed to establish a reasonable relationship between their legitimate interests and post-contact visit strip-searches performed on juvenile detainees, as required under the Fourth Amendment. The court noted that the searches occurred irrespective of whether there was an individualized suspicion that a juvenile had acquired contraband, and most contact visits occurred between juveniles and counsel or therapists. (Yamhill County Juvenile Detention Center, Oregon)

U.S. Appeals Court
EXERCISE
LOCK DOWN

Norwood v. Vance, 591 F.3d 1062 (9th Cir. 2010). A state inmate brought a § 1983 action, alleging that corrections officials violated the Eighth Amendment by depriving him of outdoor exercise. The district court denied the officials' motion for summary judgment and, following a jury award of nominal and punitive damages, made an award of attorney's fees. The officials appealed. The appeals court reversed and vacated the award of attorney's fees. The appeals court held that the district court erred in failing to include in jury instructions requested language regarding the deference due to correction officials' decisions, and that the error was prejudicial. According to the court, failure to give additional guidance on deference rendered the instruction incomplete and misleading, and jurors might well have reached a different conclusion if properly instructed. The court held that correction officials were entitled to qualified immunity in the inmate's § 1983 action alleging that his Eighth Amendment rights were violated by restrictions placed on his outdoor exercise during prison lockdowns. According to the court, given the extraordinary violence gripping the prison, it would not have been clear to a reasonable official that denying outdoor exercise was unlawful, particularly since officials had a duty to keep inmates safe and their judgments as to how to do that were entitled to wide-ranging deference. The court noted that while exercise is one of the basic human necessities protected by the Eighth Amendment, a temporary denial of outdoor exercise with no medical effects is not a substantial deprivation. (California State Prison, Sacramento, California)

U.S. Appeals Court
CONTRABAND
SEARCHES

Nunez v. Duncan, 591 F.3d 1217 (9th Cir. 2010). A federal inmate brought a pro se Bivens action against prison officials, alleging he was subjected to a random strip search in violation of his First, Fourth, and Eighth Amendment rights. The district court entered summary judgment for the officials, and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the strip search of the inmate pursuant to a policy authorizing strip searches of inmates returning from outside work detail was reasonably related to a legitimate penological interest in controlling contraband within the prison, and did not violate the inmate's Fourth Amendment rights. (Fed.Prison Camp, Sheridan, Oregon)

U.S. Appeals Court
VIDEO SURVEILLANCE

Pourmoghani-Esfahani v. Gee, 625 F.3d 1313 (11th Cir. 2010). A female pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against a deputy sheriff, alleging excessive force and deliberate indifference to his serious medical needs. The district court denied the deputy's motion for summary judgment and the deputy appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The court held that the deputy sheriff was not qualifiedly immune from the pretrial detainee's § 1983 excessive force claim, since the deputy's alleged actions, including slamming the detainee's head to the floor seven to eight times while she was restrained, if proven, were obviously beyond what the Constitution would allow under the circumstances. The appeals court accepted the depiction of events from closed-circuit television cameras placed throughout jail, rather than crediting the detainee's account of the altercation, where the video obviously contradicted the detainee's version of the facts. But the court noted that video failed to convey spoken words or tone and sometimes failed to provide unobstructed views of the events, and the court credited the detainee's version where no obviously contradictory video evidence was available. (Hillsborough Co. Jail, Florida)

U.S. Appeals Court
CLASSIFICATION
EXERCISE
LOCK DOWN

Richardson v. Runnels, 594 F.3d 666 (9th Cir. 2010). An African-American state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against a prison warden and correctional officers, among others, alleging that he was subjected to racial discrimination during prison lockdowns, and that the defendants were deliberately indifferent to his need to exercise, in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The district court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part and reversed in part. The district court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether reasonable men and women could differ regarding the necessity of state prison officials' racial classification in response to prison disturbances that were believed to have been perpetrated or planned by prisoners who were African-American, and whether the officials' lockdown of all African-American prisoners in the unit containing high-risk prisoners following disturbances was narrowly tailored to further a compelling government interest. The court also found that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether state prison officials were deliberately indifferent to the need for exercise of a prisoner who was subjected to prison lockdowns. (High Desert State Prison, California)

U.S. Appeals Court
PUBLICATIONS
SAFETY REGULATIONS

Singer v. Raemisch, 593 F.3d 529 (7th Cir. 2010). An inmate, whose books, magazines and manuscript about the fantasy role-playing game Dungeons and Dragons were confiscated by prison officials under a prison's policy banning fantasy games, filed a § 1983 action alleging violation of his First Amendment right to free speech. The district court granted the defendants summary judgment. The inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that despite the inmate's contention that a fantasy role-playing game had never incited prison violence or motivated devotees to form stereotypical street or prison gangs in the past, prison officials were rational in their belief that, if left unchecked, fantasy role-playing games could lead to gang behavior among inmates and undermine prison security in the future. The court also found that, despite the inmate's contention that fantasy role-playing games had a positive rehabilitative effect on prisoners, prison officials were rational in their belief that fantasy role-playing games could impede inmates' rehabilitation, lead to escapist tendencies or result in more dire consequences, and thus the prison ban on fantasy role-playing games did not violate the inmate's First Amendment free speech rights. The court noted that officials were concerned about potential inmate obsession with escape, both figurative and literal and based the ban on the possibility that games could foster inmates' obsession with escaping from both real life and the correctional environment, placing legitimate penological goals of prison security and inmate rehabilitation in peril.

According to the court, the prison policy prohibiting possession of fantasy role-playing game manuals, strategy guides, character novellas, and other related materials was rationally related to the goal of preventing susceptible inmates from embarking upon a dangerous escapist path, and thus confiscation of the inmate's role-playing books, magazines and manuscript did not violate his First Amendment free speech rights. The court found that prison officials' ban on fantasy role-playing games and publications met the requirement that inmates have alternative means of exercising a restricted right, under the Turner test for reviewing the reasonableness of prison regulations impacting constitutional rights, since the inmate whose fantasy role-playing game materials were confiscated could express himself by writing another work of fiction, could possess other reading materials, or could engage with other inmates in allowable games. (Waupun Correctional Institution, Wisconsin)

U.S. Appeals Court
EVACUATION

Spotts v. U.S., 613 F.3d 559 (5th Cir. 2010). High-security inmates at a federal prison, who were not evacuated in the aftermath of damage to the prison and the surrounding area caused by a hurricane, brought an action against the United States under the Federal Tort Claims Act (FTCA). The district court dismissed on jurisdictional grounds as barred by the "discretionary function" exception to the FTCA. The inmates appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the decision on the part of a regional director of the Bureau of Prisons (BOP), not to evacuate high-security inmates from the prison when damage caused by the hurricane deprived the facility of electricity and potable water for an extended period of time, was the type of policy decision protected by the "discretionary function" exception to the FTCA. (Federal Correctional Complex, United States Penitentiary, Beaumont, Texas)

U.S. District Court
SEGREGATION
TRANSFER
USE OF FORCE

Tafari v. McCarthy, 714 F.Supp.2d 317 (N.D.N.Y. 2010). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against employees of the New York State Department of Correctional Services (DOCS), alleging, among other things, that the employees violated his constitutional rights by subjecting him to excessive force, destroying his personal property, denying him medical care, and subjecting him to inhumane conditions of confinement. The employees moved for summary judgment, and the prisoner moved to file a second amended complaint and to appoint counsel. The court held that a state prison correctional officer's alleged throwing of urine and feces on the prisoner to wake him up, while certainly repulsive, was de minimis use of force, and was not sufficiently severe to be considered repugnant to the conscience of mankind, and thus the officer's conduct did not violate the Eighth Amendment. The court found that officers who were present in the prisoner's cell when another officer allegedly threw urine and feces on the prisoner lacked a reasonable opportunity to stop the alleged violation, given the brief and unexpected nature of the incident, and thus the officers present in the cell could not be held liable for failing to intervene.

The court found that even if a correctional officers' captain failed to thoroughly investigate the alleged incident in which one officer threw urine and feces on the prisoner to wake him up, such failure to investigate did not violate the prisoner's due process rights, since the prisoner did not have due process right to a thorough investigation of his grievances. According to the court, one incident in which state correctional officers allegedly interfered with the prisoner's outgoing legal mail did not create a cognizable claim under § 1983 for violation of the prisoner's First and Fourteenth Amendment rights, absent a showing that the prisoner suffered any actual injury, that his access to courts was chilled, or that his ability to legally represent himself was impaired. The court held that there was no evidence that the state prisoner suffered any physical injury as result of an alleged incident in which a correctional officer spit chewing tobacco in his face, as required to maintain an Eighth Amendment claim based on denial of medical care.

The court found that, even if a state prisoner's right to file prison grievances was protected by the First Amendment, a restriction limiting the prisoner's filing of grievances to two per week did not violate the prisoner's constitutional rights, since the prisoner was abusing the grievance program. The court noted that the prisoner filed an exorbitant amount of grievances, including 115 in a two-month period, most of which were deemed frivolous.

The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether state correctional officers used excessive force against the prisoner in the course of his transport to a different facility. The court held that state correctional officers were not entitled to qualified immunity from the prisoner's § 1983 excessive force claim arising from his alleged beating by officers during his transfer to a different facility, where a reasonable juror could have concluded that the officers knew or should have known that their conduct violated the prisoner's Eighth Amendment rights, and it was clearly established that prison official's use of force against an inmate for reasons that did not serve penological purpose violated the inmate's constitutional rights. The inmate allegedly suffered injuries, including bruises and superficial lacerations on his body, which the court found did not constitute a serious medical condition. The court held that state prison officials' alleged retaliatory act of leaving the lights on in the prisoner's cell in a special housing unit (SHU) 24 hours per day did not amount to cruel and unusual treatment, in violation of the Eighth Amendment. According to the court, the prisoner failed to demonstrate a causal connection between his conduct and the adverse action of leaving the lights on 24 hours per day, since the illumination policy applied to all inmates in SHU, not just the prisoner, and constant illumination was related to a legitimate penological interest in protecting both guards and inmates in SHU. (New York State Department of Correctional Services, Eastern New York Correctional Facility)

U.S. Appeals Court
EXERCISE
SEGREGATION

Thomas v. Ponder, 611 F.3d 1144 (9th Cir. 2010). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against prison officials, alleging violations of the Eighth Amendment. The district court granted the officials' motion for summary judgment and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The court held that the prison officials knew that a serious risk of harm existed for the prisoner, who was denied exercise for nearly 14 months, as required for the prisoner's § 1983 action. According to the court, officials made and reviewed a decision to keep the prisoner confined without out-of-cell exercise, and the prisoner submitted repeated written and oral complaints. The court found that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether prison officials acted reasonably in confining the prisoner for nearly 14 months. The court noted that officials may be more restrictive than they otherwise may be if a genuine emergency exists, and certain services may be suspended temporarily, but the court found that even where security concerns might justify a limitation on permitting a prisoner to mingle with the general prison population, such concerns do not explain why other exercise arrangements are not made. (Salinas Valley State Prison, California)

U.S. District Court
SAFETY
SEARCHES

U.S. v. Ghailani, 751 F.Supp.2d 508 (S.D.N.Y. 2010). A defendant, an alleged member of Al Qaeda charged with conspiring to kill Americans abroad, moved for an order directing the Bureau of Prisons (BOP) to cease from employing visual inspection of his rectal area when entering or leaving a correctional center for court appearances. The district court denied the motion, finding that the search policy was justified by a legitimate governmental interest in protecting the safety of prison and court personnel and other inmates. The court noted that the policy was adopted at the national level in recognition of the substantial danger that inmates will secrete weapons or other contraband in body cavities, that the government made a credible showing that ready alternatives were not available to protect this important security interest, and that the defendant's Sixth Amendment rights would be protected adequately by existing procedures. (Metropolitan Correctional Center, Manhattan, New York)

U.S. District Court
CLOTHING
SECURITY
RESTRICTIONS

Williams v. Ozmint, 726 F.Supp.2d 589 (D.S.C. 2010). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against correctional facility officials, alleging violations of the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments. The officials filed a motion for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The court held that sanctions imposed upon an inmate who committed sexual misconduct offenses while imprisoned, including wearing a pink jumpsuit for 90 days and eating meals earlier, were rationally related to penological interests, and therefore, did not violate equal protection. According to the court: (1) the jumpsuit provided visual identification to officials, especially female officers; (2) that the inmate had a recent history of sexual misconduct; (3) activity and movement restrictions lessened the risk of the inmate committing another offense that could result in transmission of blood-borne pathogens; and (4) the jumpsuit served as disincentive to engage in the conduct in the first instance. The court found that the requirement that an inmate who committed sexual misconduct offenses while imprisoned wear a pink jumpsuit did not create an objectively intolerable risk of harm in violation of the Eighth Amendment, where the policy was not applied maliciously and sadistically, and absent an imminent and substantial risk of serious harm. (Ridgeland Corr'l Inst., South Carolina)

U.S. District Court
RELIGIOUS SERVICES
SEGREGATION
EXERCISE

Young v. Ericksen, 758 F.Supp.2d 777 (E.D.Wis. 2010). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action claiming correctional officers and staff violated his constitutional rights by refusing to allow him to exercise outside his cell for almost an entire year and that they violated the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Person Act (RLUIPA) by refusing to allow him to attend religious services and meet with an Imam. The district court denied the defendants' motion for summary judgment. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether prison officials fairly denied the state prisoner out-of-cell exercise. According to the court, for the purposes of the prison officials' claim of qualified immunity from the state prisoner's § 1983 claim, it was clearly established that denying a prisoner out-of-cell exercise for almost an entire year without legitimate penological concerns would constitute a violation of the prisoner's Eighth Amendment rights. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether denying the state prisoner, who was on protective confinement (PC) status, the opportunity to attend public worship services was reasonably related to the prison's interest in protecting the prisoner and maintaining overall security. (Green Bay Correctional Institution, Wisconsin)

2011

U.S. Appeals Court
USE OF FORCE VIDEO
SURVEILLANCE

Alspaugh v. McConnell, 643 F.3d 162 (6th Cir. 2011). A state prisoner filed a civil rights action alleging excessive force and deliberate indifference against numerous state and private defendants. The district court granted summary judgment against the prisoner. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part and reversed in part. The appeals court held that the prisoner's request for a videotape of a fight was of the nature that it would have changed legal and factual deficiencies of his civil rights action alleging excessive force, and thus the prisoner was entitled to production of it, since the videotape would have shown how much force had been used in subduing the prisoner. But the court held that the prisoner who was alleging excessive force and deliberate indifference was not entitled to the production of his medical records before considering the state's motion for summary judgment, where the state and private defendants produced enough evidence to demonstrate that medical personnel were not deliberately indifferent to his medical needs. (Ionia Maximum Security Correctional Facility, Michigan)

U.S. District Court
CLASSIFICATION
SECURITY
RESTRICTIONS
TELEPHONE CALLS

Aref v. Holder, 774 F.Supp.2d 147 (D.D.C. 2011). A group of prisoners who were, or who had been, incarcerated in communication management units (CMU) at federal correctional institutions (FCI) designed to monitor high-risk prisoners filed suit against the United States Attorney General, the federal Bureau of Prisons (BOP), and BOP officials, alleging that CMU incarceration violated the First, Fifth, and Eighth Amendments. Four additional prisoners moved to intervene and the defendants moved to dismiss. The district court denied the motion to intervene, and granted the motion to dismiss in part and denied in part. The court held that even though a federal prisoner who had been convicted of solicitation of bank robbery was no longer housed in the federal prison's communication management unit (CMU), he had standing under Article III to pursue constitutional claims against the Bureau of Prisons (BOP) for alleged violations since there was a realistic threat that he might be redesignated to a CMU. The court noted that the prisoner had originally been placed in CMU because of the nature of his underlying conviction and because of his alleged efforts to radicalize other inmates, and these reasons for placing him in CMU remained.

The court found that the restrictions a federal prison put on prisoners housed within a communication management unit (CMU), which included that all communications be conducted in English, that visits were monitored and subject to recording, that each prisoner received only eight visitation hours per month, and that prisoners' telephone calls were limited and subjected to monitoring, did not violate the prisoners' alleged First Amendment right to family integrity, since the restrictions were rationally related to a legitimate penological interest. The court noted that prisoners assigned to the unit typically had offenses related to international or domestic terrorism or had misused approved communication methods while incarcerated. The court found that prisoners confined to a communication management unit (CMU), stated a procedural due process claim against the Bureau of Prisons (BOP) by alleging that the requirements imposed on CMU prisoners were significantly different than those imposed on prisoners in the general population, and that there was a significant risk that procedures used by the BOP to review whether prisoners should initially be placed within CMU or should continue to be incarcerated there had resulted in erroneous deprivation of their liberty interests. The court noted that CMU prisoners were allowed only eight hours of non-contact visitation per month and two 15 minute telephone calls per week, while the general population at a prison was not subjected to a cap on visitation and had 300 minutes of telephone time per month. The court also noted that the administrative review of CMU status, conducted by officials in Washington, D.C., rather than at a unit itself, was allegedly so vague and generic as to render it illusory. The court held that the conditions of confinement experienced by prisoners housed within a communication management unit (CMU), did not deprive the prisoners of the "minimum civilized measure of life's necessities" required to state an Eighth Amendment claim against the Bureau of Prisons (BOP), since the deprivation did not involve the basics of food, shelter, health care or personal security.

The court found that a federal prisoner stated a First Amendment retaliation claim against the Bureau of Prisons (BOP) by alleging: (1) that he was "an outspoken and litigious prisoner;" (2) that he had written books about improper prison conditions and filed grievances and complaints on his own behalf; (3) that his prison record contained "no serious disciplinary infractions" and "one minor communications-related infraction" from 1997; (4) that prison staff told him he would be "sent east" if he continued filing complaints; and (5) that he filed a complaint about that alleged threat and he was then transferred to a high-risk inmate monitoring communication management unit (CMU) at a federal correctional institution. (Communication Management Units at Federal Correctional Institutions in Terre Haute, Indiana and Marion, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
GANGS
CLASSIFICATION
SEPARATION

Baker v. Kernan, 795 F.Supp.2d 992 (E.D.Cal. 2011.) A state inmate filed a § 1983 action against a prison official alleging that a policy of separating members of rival prison gangs denied him equal protection, due process, and the right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment. The official moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The court held that the state's policy of separating members of rival prison gangs did not deny the inmate due process or violate his right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment, where the program was a rational response to a legitimate security concern, and it preserved the inmate's ability to exercise regularly outside, be considered for a job, use the facilities off the main yard, meet with a prison chaplain, and see visitors. The court also found that the state's classification of prisoners by their gang affiliation did not violate the inmate's equal protection rights, even if members of a larger gang fared slightly better in some aspects of confinement, where the classification was not based on race. The court noted that there was a long history of gang members immediately attacking members of rival gangs, and the policy of identifying and separating members of rival gangs advanced safety and order by preventing them from violently attacking each other. (California State Prison, Sacramento)

U.S. District Court
SAFETY
USE OF FORCE

Bridgewater v. Taylor, 832 F.Supp.2d 337 (S.D.N.Y. 2011). A New York state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against prison officials and correctional officers, alleging excessive force, failure to protect, and failure to supervise and properly train in violation of the Eighth Amendment. After the prisoner's motion for summary judgment against an officer was preliminarily denied, the prisoner moved for reconsideration and the former prison superintendent and another officer moved to dismiss. The district court denied the motion for reconsideration and granted the motion to dismiss. The court held that the prisoner did not properly serve the complaint on the officer or superintendent and that the prisoner failed to state a failure to protect claim against the officer. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the correctional officer acted with malice or wantonness toward the prisoner necessary to constitute an Eighth Amendment violation, or whether he was applying force in a good–faith effort to maintain discipline. The court also found that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the correctional officer's use of physical force against the prisoner was more than de minimus. (Sing Sing Correctional Facility New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
CONTRABAND
GANGS
VISITS

Bustos v. A & E Television Networks, 646 F.3d 762 (10th Cir. 2011). An inmate brought an action against a television network, alleging defamation. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the network and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the television network's statement in a broadcast that the inmate was a member of the Aryan Brotherhood prison gang was not materially false, and therefore, was not actionable for defamation under Colorado law, where the inmate engaged in recreation yard conversations with gang members, engaged in a drug smuggling conspiracy with the gang in which he would receive drug filled balloons from a visitor and distribute them to the gang, and the inmate sent a handwritten apology to the gang leader apologizing after the conspiracy failed and referred to leader repeatedly as “bro.” (Supermax, Florence, Colorado)

U.S. District Court
LOCKS

Byron v. Dart, 825 F.Supp.2d 958 (N.D.Ill. 2011). A pretrial detainee who was stabbed in the head by an unknown inmate who opened the detainee's cell door from outside without a key brought a § 1983 action against the county sheriff, jail administrators, and a corrections officer, alleging that the defendants failed to protect him in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. The officials moved to dismiss for failure to state a claim. The district court denied the motion. The court held that the detainee's allegations in his complaint stated a “sufficiently serious injury” as required for a Fourteenth Amendment failure to protect claim against the prison administrators. The court also found that the detainee's allegations in his complaint were sufficient to state a “deliberate indifference” element of the detainee's Fourteenth Amendment failure to protect claim against prison administrators. The detainee alleged that the problem of malfunctioning cell doors was “pervasive,” “well-documented,” and “expressly noted by prison officials in the past,” that work orders to repair cell doors were never executed, and that he complained about his door, but it was never repaired. According to the court, the detainee became aware, from his own observations and in speaking with other detainees, that numerous cells were “in a state of disrepair and/or had malfunctioned,” and that specifically, the doors of the cells could be “popped” open by detainees from the outside without a key. (Cook County Jail, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
ESCAPE
SECURITY PRACTICES

Dean v. Walker, 764 F.Supp.2d 824 (S.D.Miss. 2011). Vehicular accident victims brought an action against a county, sheriff and deputies, stemming from a head-on collision with an escaped inmate whom the defendants were chasing. The district court granted the defendants’ motion for summary judgment. The court held that the accident victims failed to establish a pattern of unconstitutional conduct by county, as required to maintain a claim for municipal liability under § 1983. The court noted that the victims introduced no evidence at all with respect to other police pursuits in the county or other instances where inmates were not made to wear handcuffs. According to the court, the victims failed to establish that the sheriff acted with an intent to harm, unrelated to his pursuit of the inmate, as required to maintain a substantive due process claim. The court noted that the sheriff's pulling in front of the inmate in an attempt to stop him, even if reckless, was consistent with the sheriff's legitimate interest in apprehending the inmate. (Jefferson–Franklin Correctional Facility, Mississippi)

U.S. Appeals Court
STAFFING
SAFETY

Fields v. Abbott, 652 F.3d 886 (8th Cir. 2011). A female jailer brought a § 1983 action against a county, sheriff, county commissioners, and several other defendants, alleging violations of her substantive due process rights. The district court denied the sheriff's and commissioners' motion for summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity and the defendants appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded, finding that the defendants' failure to act was not deliberate indifference as to the safety of the jailer. According to the court, the sheriff's and county commissioners' awareness of potentially dangerous conditions in the jail, including that the jail was understaffed and that the drunk tank had an interior-mounted door handle, and failure to take action regarding those conditions, which resulted in the jailer being attacked and taken hostage by two inmates, was not deliberate indifference as to the safety of the jailer, as would violate the jailer's Fourteenth Amendment substantive due process rights on a state created danger theory. The court found that the defendants’ failure to act was at most gross negligence, rather than deliberate indifference, and the jailer was aware of the conditions as she had been injured previously due to the handle and staffing issue, such that she could take these issues into account in interacting with inmates. (Miller County Jail, Missouri)

U.S. Appeals Court
PUBLICATIONS

Hrdlicka v. Reniff, 631 F.3d 1044 (9th Cir. 2011). A publisher and his criminal justice publication brought two suits claiming that their First Amendment rights were being violated by the mail policies at two county jails in California that refused to distribute unsolicited copies of the publication to inmates. The district court granted summary judgment to the defendants, and the plaintiffs appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the jails were justified in refusing to distribute unsolicited copies of the publication to inmates. According to the court, the facts to be considered included the degree to which allowing distribution of the publication would produce additional clutter in cells or otherwise adversely affect jail security, the extent to which the jails would be forced to expend additional resources to deliver the publication, and whether the publisher could effectively reach inmates by delivery only upon request. (Sacramento County, Butte County, California)

U.S. District Court
MAIL
SECURITY PRACTICES

Hughbanks v. Dooley, 788 F.Supp.2d 988 (D.S.D. 2011.) A prisoner brought a § 1983 action alleging that the state Department of Corrections' correspondence policy prohibiting the delivery of bulk-rate mail was unconstitutional. The prisoner moved for preliminary injunctive relief and asked the court to invalidate portions of the policy. The district court denied the motion. The court found that the prisoner's mere allegation that his First Amendment rights were violated by the prison's denial of bulk-rate mail established the threat of irreparable harm, in determining whether to grant the prisoner a preliminary injunction seeking to invalidate the prison's bulk-rate mail policy, but the balance of hardships favored the prison in determining whether to grant the prisoner's request. The court noted that the bulk-rate mail policy was a state policy, and suspension of the policy for all inmates in the state would compromise the safety and security of every institution in the state. The court found that the policy was rationally-related to the prison's penological purpose of maintaining security and order, that prisoners could review catalogs in a prison property office and could pre-pay postage on any catalog to have it mailed first or second class, that the challenged policy was statewide and any accommodation would have a significant effect on state inmates and prison staff, and the policy was not an exaggerated response to security and other concerns. Similarly, the court found that the prisoner's allegation that his Fourteenth Amendment due process rights were being violated by the prison's failure to notify him when prohibited bulk-rate mail was not delivered established the threat of irreparable harm, in determining whether to grant the prisoner a preliminary injunction requiring the prison to notify the intended recipient and sender when bulk-rate correspondence was confiscated. The court again found that the balance of hardships favored the prison, where the prison would have to expend substantial prison resources to implement the requested policy, and the current policy was implemented to preserve a prison resource. (Mike Durfee State Prison, South Dakota)

U.S. Appeals Court
FACIAL HAIR
RELIGION
SECURITY PRACTICES

Kuperman v. Wrenn, 645 F.3d 69 (1st Cir. 2011). A Jewish former state inmate brought a § 1983 action against prison officials, alleging a prison regulation prohibiting inmates from growing facial hair longer than one quarter of an inch violated his First Amendment exercise of religion rights, as well as Fourteenth Amendment equal protection and the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Person Act (RLUIPA). The district court granted summary judgment for the officials and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the regulation was reasonably related to the penological interests of prison safety and security and did not prohibit the inmate from alternative means of exercising his rights. The court found that accommodating the inmate's desire to grow a beard would adversely impact prison resources and that there was no ready alternative to the prison regulation. According to the court, the regulation did not violate the inmate's Fourteenth Amendment equal protection rights, and the regulation furthered the compelling government interest of prison safety and security in the least restrictive means of doing so. (New Hampshire State Prison)

U.S. District Court
TRANSFER
RESTRAINTS
USE OF FORCE

Maraj v. Massachusetts, 836 F.Supp.2d 17 (D.Mass. 2011). The mother of a deceased inmate brought an action, as administratrix of the inmate's estate, against the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, a county sheriff's department, a county sheriff, and corrections officers, alleging that the defendants violated the inmate's Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment rights. She also brought common law claims of wrongful death, negligence, and assault and battery. The defendants moved to dismiss for failure to state claim. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the Commonwealth, in enacting legislation effectuating the assumption of county sheriff's department by the Commonwealth, did not waive sovereign immunity as to § 1983 claims filed against the Commonwealth, the department, and corrections officers in their official capacities after the transfer took effect.

The court found that the correction officers who were no longer participating in the transfer of the inmate at the time inmate first resisted and the officers who took the first responsive measure by "double locking" the inmate's handcuffs were not subject to liability in their individual capacities as to the § 1983 substantive due process claim brought by inmate's mother arising from the inmate's death following the transfer.

According to the court, corrections officers who applied physical force to the resisting inmate during the transfer of the inmate, or were present when the inmate was unresponsive and requiring medical attention, were subject to liability, in their individual capacities, as to the § 1983 substantive due process claim brought by the inmate's mother. The court held that the county sheriff and corrections officers who participated in the transfer of the inmate, who died following the transfer, were immune from negligence and wrongful death claims brought by the inmate's mother under the Massachusetts Tort Claims Act (MTCA) provision which categorically protected public employees acting within the scope of their employment from liability for "personal injury or death" caused by their individual negligence. But the court found that the mother properly alleged that county corrections officers' contact with the inmate amounted to excessive force, and that a supervisor instructed the use of excessive force, as required to state a claim for assault and battery, under Massachusetts law, against the officers. (South Bay House of Correction, Suffolk County, Massachusetts)

U.S. Appeals Court
CLASSIFICATION
WORK

Milligan v. Archuleta, 659 F.3d 1294 (10th Cir. 2011). A state inmate filed a § 1983 action alleging that prison officials took away his prison employment in retaliation for his grievance regarding his designation as a potential escape risk, and in violation of his equal protection rights. The district court dismissed the complaint on its own motion and the inmate appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The appeals court held that the district court erred in dismissing the equal protection claim, even though the complaint was deficient because it did not plead facts sufficient to show that the inmate's classification as an escape risk lacked a rational basis or a reasonable relation to a legitimate penological interest. According to the court, amendment of the complaint would not necessarily be futile, and the claim was not based on an indisputably meritless legal theory. The court noted that the fact that the state inmate did not have a constitutional right to employment did not foreclose his retaliation claim against the prison official arising from loss of his prison job after he filed a grievance. (Colorado Territorial Correctional Facility)

U.S. District Court
PUBLICATIONS
RELIGION
VISITS
WORK

Murphy v. Lockhart, 826 F.Supp.2d 1016 (E.D.Mich. 2011). An inmate at a maximum correctional facility in Michigan brought a § 1983 action against various Michigan Department of Corrections (MDOC) employees alleging that his placement in long-term and/or indefinite segregation was unconstitutional, that he was prohibited from communicating with his friends and family, and that his ability to practice his Christian religion was being hampered in violation of his First Amendment rights. The inmate also alleged that the MDOC's mail policy was unconstitutional. The defendants moved for summary judgment and for a protective order. The court held that the prisoner's statements in a published magazine article discussing an escape attempt were protected speech, and that a fact issue precluded summary judgment on the retaliation claims against the other facility's warden, resident unit manager, and assistant resident unit supervisor stemming from the prisoner's participation in that article. The Esquire Magazine article discussed security flaws at the correctional facility, detailing the prisoners' escape plan and revealing which prison staff he manipulated and how he obtained and built necessary tools to dig a tunnel. The court noted that the prisoner's statements were not directed to fellow inmates, and rather he spoke on issues relating to prison security and was critical of the conduct of Michigan Department of Corrections personnel, which resulted in his near-successful prison break. The court found that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact, as to whether the defendants' proffered legitimate grounds for removing the prisoner from his coveted administrative segregation work assignment as a porter/painter/laundry worker--discovery that he possessed contraband--were a pretext to retaliate for his protected speech in the published magazine article. The court found that the alleged violation of the prisoner's right to free exercise of his religion from the rejection of a claimed religious publication, Codex Magica, was justified by the prison's legitimate penological interest in limiting prisoners' access to books that included instructions on how to write in code. According to the court, because the prison had a valid penological interest in restricting access to the publication, which contained instructions on how to write in code, the prisoner mail regulation used to censor that book could not be unconstitutional as applied on the ground that it prevented the prisoner's access to that publication. (Ionia Maximum Correctional Facility, Kinross Correctional Facility, Standish Correctional Facility, Michigan)

U.S. Appeals Court
EXERCISE
RIOT
LOCK DOWN
SECURITY PRACTICES

Noble v. Adams, 646 F.3d 1138 (9th Cir. 2011). A state inmate brought a § 1983 action against prison officials who were responsible for a post-riot lockdown of a prison, alleging that the lockdown resulted in denial of his Eighth Amendment right to outdoor exercise. The district court denied the officials' motion for summary judgment and subsequently denied the officials' motion for reconsideration. The officials appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded with instructions. The appeals court held that the state prison officials were entitled to qualified immunity from the inmate's § 1983 claim that the post-riot lockdown of prison resulted in denial of his Eighth Amendment right to outdoor exercise because it was not clearly established at the time of the lockdown, nor was it established yet, precisely how or when a prison facility housing problem inmates must return to its normal operations, including outdoor exercise, during and after a state of emergency called in response to a major riot. (Corcoran State Prison, California)

U.S. Appeals Court
MAIL

Perry v. Secretary, Florida Dept. of Corrections, 664 F.3d 1359 (11th Cir. 2011). An individual who operated two pen pal services that solicited pen pals for prisoners, as well as another pen pal service, brought a civil rights action challenging the constitutionality of a Florida Department of Corrections (FDOC) rule prohibiting inmates from soliciting pen pals. The district court granted the FDOC's motion for summary judgment and the plaintiffs appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the plaintiffs, whose interests as publishers in accessing prisoners had been harmed, had standing to bring their claims, but that the FDOC rule at issue was rationally related to a legitimate penological interest. The court found that the plaintiffs had a liberty interest in accessing inmates and they were afforded constitutionally required due process. The court noted that the U.S. Supreme Court's decision in Procunier v. Martinez set forth a three-part test to decide whether there are proper procedural safeguards for inmate correspondence of a personal nature: (1) the inmate must receive notice of the rejection of a letter written by or addressed to him, (2) the author of the letter must be given reasonable opportunity to protest that decision, and (3) complaints must be referred to a prison official other than the person who originally disapproved the correspondence. (Florida Department of Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
RESTRAINTS
SAFETY
TRANSPORTATION

Reynolds v. Dormire, 636 F.3d 976 (8th Cir. 2011). A state prisoner filed a pro se § 1983 action against a prison warden and correctional officers (COs), asserting Eighth Amendment claims arising from refusal to remove the prisoner's restraints on a day-long journey to a medical appointment, and from his alleged injuries from falling five feet into a sally port pit designed to facilitate visual inspections of vehicle undercarriages at an entryway into the prison. The district court dismissed the complaint for failure to state a claim. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The appeals court held that the prisoner's complaint was devoid of any allegation suggesting that correctional officers acted with deliberate indifference to the prisoner's safety in restraining him throughout the day, as required to support an Eighth Amendment claim in his § 1983 action, since the complaint merely alleged that the officers refused to remove the prisoner's restraints. But the court held that the prisoner's complaint sufficiently alleged claims of deliberate indifference to his safety in violation of the Eighth Amendment by two correctional officers, but not the other three officers who were simply on duty in the vicinity of the prisoner's accident in which he fell five feet into a sally port pit. According to the court, the complaint sufficiently pleaded that the two officers were aware of a substantial risk to the prisoner's safety but recklessly disregarded that risk. The prisoner alleged that one officer parked the prison van about three feet from edge of the pit, that the prisoner was obliged to back out of the van, using a stool to descend from the vehicle, with his legs shackled and his arms secured by a black box restraint, that the second officer supervising the prisoner's exit started backing away rather than assisting the prisoner, and that officers knew about the hazard because another prisoner had fallen into the same pit on the same day. (Northeast Correctional Center, Missouri)

U.S. Appeals Court
SECURITY PRACTICES
PROTECTION

Shields v. Dart, 664 F.3d 178 (7th Cir. 2011). A pretrial detainee brought a pro se § 1983 action against prison officials who allegedly were deliberately indifferent in failing to protect him from an attack by other inmates at a county jail. The prison officials moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion and the detainee appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the officials were unaware of a substantial risk of serious injury to the pretrial detainee, and thus the officials were not deliberately indifferent in failing to protect the detainee from the attack. According to the court, a corrections officer on duty during the two inmates' attack did not act with deliberate indifference by failing to enter a day room where the attack was occurring. The officer verbally commanded the inmates to stop the attack. The officer was alone, intervened by promptly calling for back-up and monitoring the fight from a secure area until other officers arrived, and was not required to put herself in significant jeopardy by attempting to break up fight herself. (Cook County Jail, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
WORK
PROTECTION
SAFETY

Smith v. Peters, 631 F.3d 418 (7th Cir, 2011). A state prisoner brought an action against prison employees, alleging that the employees violated the Eighth Amendment by forcing him to work at hard labor in dangerous conditions, and violated the First Amendment by penlizing him for questioning the propriety of the work assignment and preparing to sue. The district court dismissed the complaint. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The court held that the prisoner stated a claim against prison employees for violating his Eighth Amendment right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment by forcing him to work at hard labor in dangerous conditions. The prisoner alleged that he was assigned to uproot tree stumps in cold weather, without being given any protective gear, that he developed blisters from handling heavy tools in the cold without gloves, and that he was subjected to the risk of getting hit by the blades of the tools because they slipped from their handles as prisoners hacked away without proper training. The court found that the prisoner stated a claim against prison employees for violating his First Amendment right to free speech, by alleging that the employees penalized him for questioning the propriety of his work assignment and preparing to sue. (Branchville Correctional Facility, Indiana)

U.S. Appeals Court
CONTRABAND

U.S. v. Franco, 632 F.3d 880 (5th Cir. 2011). An inmate in a privately owned and operated county jail, who had paid a corrections officer to bring contraband into a county correctional facility, was convicted after a district court jury trial of aiding and abetting in the bribery of a public official. The defendant appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that it was constitutional to apply the federal bribery statute to the defendant, even though he used his own money, and not federal funds, to pay the corrections officer. The officer had been paid a total of $425 over a period of time to bring peanut butter, tuna fish, and other small food items, a cell phone, enchiladas and a box containing marijuana. (Ector County Correctional Center, Texas)

U.S. Appeals Court
PUBLICATIONS

Van den Bosch v. Raemisch, 658 F.3d 778 (7th Cir. 2011). The publisher of a newsletter about the Wisconsin state prison system and a pro se state prisoner who wrote an article for that newsletter brought separate actions challenging a regulation imposed by the Wisconsin Department of Corrections (DOC) on distribution of incoming prisoner mail. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the DOC officials. The plaintiffs appealed and the actions were consolidated for appeal. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the officials' decision to bar distribution of the newsletter to prisoners did not violate the First Amendment and the officials' refusal to deliver copies of the article that the state prisoner had written to the newsletter did not violate the prisoner's First Amendment rights. The court noted that one newsletter article described the Wisconsin parole commission as totalitarian and abusers of prisoners, and another urged its readers to employ any and all tactics to bring about change in prison life, so that it was reasonable for the officials to perceive the newsletter articles as posing a potential threat to rehabilitation and security. (Wisconsin Department of Corrections, Green Bay Correctional Institution)

2012

U.S. Appeals Court
PUBLICATIONS
SECURITY PRACTICES

Al-Owhali v. Holder, 687 F.3d 1236 (10th Cir. 2012). A federal inmate brought a suit against the Attorney General, the Director of the Federal Bureau of Prisons (BOP), a prison warden, and the FBI, alleging that several special administrative measures imposed upon him violated his First and Fifth Amendment rights. The inmate had been convicted of several terrorism-related offenses stemming from the 1998 bombing of the United States embassy in Nairobi, Kenya. The district court dismissed the complaint and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that: (1) the inmate failed to address whether the ban on his communications with his nieces and nephews was supported by a rational penal interest; (2) the measure preventing the inmate's subscription to two Arabic–language newspapers fell within the warden's broad discretion to limit incoming information, and was rationally related to a penal interest to prevent the inmate from acting upon contemporary information or receiving coded messages; and (3) the inmate offered only a vague allegation regarding the measure that purportedly barred him from obtaining a book authored by former President Jimmy Carter, where the inmate offered no factual context to show that the measure was unrelated to any legitimate penal interest, and instead merely implied the existence of a secret list of banned publications. (United States Penitentiary, Administrative Maximum, Florence, Colorado)

U.S. Appeals Court
CONTRABAND
SAFETY
SECURITY RESTRICTIONS
TELEPHONE CALLS

Beaulieu v. Ludeman, 690 F.3d 1017 (8th Cir. 2012). Patients who were civilly committed to the Minnesota Sex Offender Program (MSOP) brought a § 1983 action against Minnesota Department of Human Services (DHS) officials and Minnesota Department of Corrections (DOC) officials, alleging that various MSOP policies and practices relating to the patients' conditions of confinement were unconstitutional. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants and the patients appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that: (1) the MSOP policy of performing unclothed body searches of patients was not unreasonable; (2) the policy of placing full restraints on patients during transport was not unreasonable; (3) officials were not liable for using excessive force in handcuffing patients; (4) the officials' seizure of televisions from the patients' rooms was not unreasonable; (5) the MSOP telephone-use policy did not violate the First Amendment; and (6) there was no evidence that officials were deliberately indifferent to the patients' health or safety. According to the court, the MSOP identified reasons for its policy requiring 13–inch clear-chassis televisions or 17– to 19–inch flat-screen televisions--that the shelves in patients' rooms could safely hold those televisions, and that a clear-chassis or flat-screen television would reduce contraband concealment. According to the court, those justifications implicated both patient safety and MSOP's interest in maintaining security and order at the institution and making certain no contraband reached patients. The court also found that the (MSOP) telephone-use policy did not violate the First Amendment free speech rights of patients who were civilly committed to MSOP. According to the court, the policy of monitoring patients' non-legal telephone calls and prohibiting incoming calls was reasonably related to MSOP's security interests in detecting and preventing crimes and maintaining a safe environment. The court upheld the 30-minute limit on the length of calls, finding it was reasonably related to the legitimate governmental interest of providing phone access to all patients, and that patients had viable alternatives by which they may exercise their First Amendment rights, including having visitors or sending or receiving mail, and patients had abused telephone privileges prior to implementation of the policy by engaging in criminal activity or other counter-therapeutic behavior by phone. (Minnesota Sex Offender Program)

U.S. District Court
HAIR LENGTH
RELIGION

Benning v. Georgia, 864 F.Supp.2d 1358 (M.D.Ga. 2012). A Jewish inmate brought an action against the State of Georgia, the Georgia Board of Corrections, the Georgia Department of Corrections (GDC), and its Commissioner, in his official capacity, alleging that the defendants violated the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA) by refusing to allow him to grow earlocks in accordance with his religious beliefs. The court held that: (1) the inmate's religious belief that he was forbidden from shaving his earlocks was sincerely held; (2) the inmate's religious beliefs were substantially burdened by the defendants' refusal to allow him to grow earlocks; (3) uniformity was not a compelling government interest justifying the defendants' refusal to allow the inmate to grow earlocks; and (4) the defendants failed to prove that banning earlocks completely was the least restrictive means of furthering compelling governmental interests. (Autry State Prison, Georgia)

U.S. District Court
RELIGIOUS ARTICLES

Davis v. Powell, 901 F.Supp.2d 1196 (S.D.Cal. 2012). A state prisoner who was a Muslim brought a pro se § 1983 action against a prison warden and other prison employees for claims arising out of the prison's ban on prayer oil. The court held that allegations that a prison warden issued an addendum to a Department Operations Manual (DOM) that implemented a policy that only orders for certain religious items would be counted under the quarterly package program was sufficient to state First Amendment retaliation claim against warden. The court noted that: (1) the policy made it more burdensome to obtain items required for the inmate to practice his religion or practice it as easily as inmates of different faiths; (2) that there existed a causal link between the policy and his faith; (3) that his required religious oil was banned approximately five months after the inmate appealed the policy; (4) that the policy would chill a person of ordinary firmness from practicing his religion, and (5) that a legitimate penological interest was not furthered by the policy. The court found that the inmate's allegation that a prison warden enacted a policy which considered special orders for religious packages to be counted as quarterly packages for inmates, because of its adverse effects on plaintiffs of a particular religion, stated an equal protection claim. According to the court, the articles listed in the policy were those ordered by only prisoners of that religion. The court held that the warden and officials were not entitled to qualified immunity from the inmate's claim alleging a violation of the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA), where a reasonable person in the position of the prison warden and related officials would believe that his or her conduct in enacting a policy banning the purchase and receipt of prayer oil by inmates for 14 months violated inmates' First Amendment right to freely exercise his or her religion and of the inmate's Equal Protection rights. (Calipatria State Prison, California)

U.S. District Court
CLASSIFICATIONS
GANGS
SECURITY PRACTICES

Facey v. Dickhaut, 892 F.Supp.2d 347 (D.Mass. 2012). A prisoner at a state correctional institution filed a pro se § 1983 action against the prison and officials alleging his Eighth Amendment right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment was violated when officials knowingly placed him in danger by assigning him to a housing unit where he was violently attacked by members of a rival gang. The defendants moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the complaint stated a claim against the deputy superintendent and an assistant for violation of the Eighth Amendment, by alleging that officials were aware of the feud between two rival prison gangs, that the prisoner was a known member of one of the gangs, that despite this knowledge officials had assigned the prisoner to a section of the prison where a rival gang was housed, and as a result he was violently attacked and sustained permanent injuries. The court found that the official who had instituted the gang housing policy could not be held personally liable, since he did not implement the policy, nor was he deliberately indifferent in supervising or training those who did. According to the court, state prison officials who had placed the prisoner known to be a gang member in danger by assigning him to a housing unit where he was violently attacked by members of a rival gang, were not entitled to qualified immunity in the prisoner's § 1983 suit. The court noted that clearly established law provided that the Eighth Amendment was violated if officials disregarded a known, substantial risk to an inmate's health or safety, and the officials had disregarded this risk, as well as violated a prison policy, by placing rival gang members in same housing unit. (Souza Baranowski Correctional Center, Mass.)

U.S. District Court
PRETRIAL DETAINEES
VIDEO
SURVEILLANCE

Ferencz v. Medlock, 905 F.Supp.2d 656 (W.D.Pa. 2012). A mother, as administrator for her son's estate, brought deliberate indifference claims under a wrongful death statute against prison employees, and the prison's medical services provider, following the death of her son when he was a pretrial detainee in a county prison. The employees and provider moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The district court held that under Pennsylvania law, the mother lacked standing to bring wrongful death and survival actions in her individual capacity against several prison employees for her son's death while he was in prison, where the wrongful death and survival statutes only permitted recovery by a personal representative, such as a mother in her action as administratrix of her son's estate, or as a person entitled to recover damages as a trustee ad litem. The court found that the mother's claims that a prison's medical services provider had a policy, practice, or custom that resulted in her son's death were sufficient to overcome the provider's motion to dismiss the mother's § 1983 action for the death of her son while he was in prison. Upon admission to the facility, the detainee had been evaluated and scored a 12 on a scale, which was to have triggered classification as suicidal (a score of 8 or more). The Classification Committee subsequently did not classify the detainee as suicidal as they were required to do under the jail classification policy, and no member of the Committee communicated to medical contractor staff or correctional officers responsible for monitoring the detainee that he was suicidal and going through drug withdrawal. At the time, the jail was equipped with an operational and working video surveillance system and there was a video camera in the detainee's cell. The video surveillance of the cell was broadcast on four different television monitors throughout the jail, all of which were working and manned by officers. Additionally, the work station thhhattt was located around the corner from the cell, approximately 20 feet away, was equipped with one of the four television monitors. The monitor was situated on the wall above the desk at the work station, such that it would be directly in front of the officer manning the station if he was sitting facing his desk.

The detainee attempted suicide by trying to hang himself with his bed sheet from the top of the cell bars, which took several minutes and was unsuccessful. After the attempt, however, the detainee left the bed sheet hanging from the top of his cell bars and started to pace in his cell in visible mental distress. This suicide attempt, as well as the hanging bedsheet were viewable from the nearby work station video surveillance monitor as well as the other three monitors throughout the jail. A few minutes later the detainee attempted to commit suicide a second time by hanging himself with his bed sheet from the top of his cell bars. This suicide attempt took several minutes, was unsuccessful, and was viewable from the work station video surveillance monitor as well as the other three monitors throughout the jail. A few minutes later, the detainee attempted to commit suicide a third time by hanging himself with his bed sheet. This time, he hung himself from his bed sheet for over twenty minutes, without being noticed by any of the four officers who were manning the four video surveillance monitors. In fact, one officer admitted he was asleep at his work station at the time. By the time another officer noticed the hanging, nearly 30 minutes had passed. The detainee was cut down and transported to a local hospital where he was subsequently pronounced dead due to asphyxiation by hanging. (Fayette County Prison, Pennsylvania, and PrimeCare Medical, Inc.)

U.S. District Court
PUBLICATIONS
RELIGION
SAFETY

Forter v. Geer, 868 F.Supp.2d 1091 (D.Or. 2012). A state inmate, who was a member of the Christian Identity Faith and proceeding pro se, brought a § 1983 action against department of corrections (DOC) employees, alleging violations of the First and Fourteenth Amendments, as well as the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA). The defendants filed a motion to dismiss and for summary judgment. The district court granted the motions. The court held that the inmate did not file grievances for most claims, even though such procedures were available to him, and he did not appeal those grievances that he did file, and therefore failed to exhaust his administrative remedies under the provisions of the Prison Litigation Reform Act of 1995.

The court held that withholding of a religious poster did not substantially burden the religious exercise of the inmate, who was a member of the Christian Identity Faith, as would violate the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA). The court also held that size restrictions which prevented the inmate from possessing the religious poster did not violate his First Amendment free exercise rights, where the regulations prevented any items, except subscription newspapers, over a certain size. According to the court, prison officials withholding of certain religious pamphlets from the mail of the inmate, was validly and rationally connected to a legitimate interest in ensuring order and safety, for the purposes of the inmate's § 1983 claim alleging that the withholding violated his First Amendment free exercise and Fourteenth Amendment equal protection rights. The court noted that the pamphlets contained racially inflammatory material and that the prison population was racially mixed. (Oregon Department of Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
HAIR LENGTH
RELIGIOUS GROUPS

Grayson v. Schuler, 666 F.3d 450 (7th Cir. 2012). A former state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against a correctional officer, alleging the forcible shearing of his dreadlocks violated the free exercise clause of the First Amendment. The defendant moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The former prisoner appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The appeals court held that while the prisoner's Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA) claim against the correctional officer in his official capacity was barred by the state's sovereign immunity, the officer was not entitled to qualified immunity. The court noted that the Act does not create a cause of action against state employees in their personal capacity. The court held that the taking of a Nazirite vow, which barred the cutting of hair, by the state prisoner who was a member of the orthodox African Hebrew Israelites of Jerusalem was religiously motivated, for purposes of the prisoner's claim that prison officials failed to accommodate his religious beliefs and thus violated the free exercise clause of the First Amendment. The court found that the officer was not entitled to quality immunity because there was no suggestion that the officer who ordered shearing of prisoner's dreadlocks due to a reasonable belief that the prisoner was insincere in his religious beliefs, or was a security threat. (Big Muddy Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
CLOTHING
KEYS
RESTRAINTS
SECURITY PRACTICES

Gruenberg v. Gempeler, 697 F.3d 573 (7th Cir. 2012). A state prisoner, proceeding pro se, filed a § 1983 action against various prison officials, guards, and medical staff, alleging violations of the Eighth Amendment. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that: (1) the prisoner did not have a clearly established right to not be continually restrained without clothing or cover in a cell for five days following his ingestion of a handcuff key, the master key for belt restraints, and the key used for opening cell doors, where restraint had been imposed to keep the prisoner from re-ingesting those keys; (2) the continuous restraint of the prisoner without clothing or cover in a cell for five days did not violate his Fourteenth Amendment due process rights; (3) the prisoner's Fourth Amendment and Fourteenth Amendment substantive due process claims were barred; and (4) the district court did not abuse its discretion by ruling that the prisoner was competent to advance his case and was not entitled to appointed counsel. (Waupun Correction Institution, Wisconsin)

U.S. District Court
CONTRABAND
EXERCISE
LOCK DOWN
RIOT
SECURITY PRACTICES

Hayes v. Dovey, 914 F.Supp.2d 1125 (S.D.Cal. 2012). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against a prison's former warden, chief deputy warden, and associate warden alleging they deprived him of outdoor exercise for approximately nine months in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The court held that prison officials did not act with deliberate indifference when they precluded outdoor exercise for nine months, and that prison officials were entitled to qualified immunity. Officials had stopped providing outdoor exercise for general population prisoners during a state of emergency at the facility following a major riot. During this time, the prisoner was allowed to work in a program office for approximately 30 hours per week. The court noted that the riot involved a concerted and organized attack on prison officials, the lockdown was imposed to investigate and prevent continued violence, and despite the lockdown and exercise restrictions there were many instances of violence, including two incidents of attempted murder on a peace officer, 20 incidents of battery on a peace officer or prison staff member, and 46 instances of inmates in possession of weapons or metal stock. According to the court, it was not clearly established at the time of the lockdown precisely how or when a prison that houses problem inmates must return to its normal operations, including outdoor exercise, during and after a state of emergency called in response to a major riot. (Calipatria State Prison, California)

U.S. District Court
RELIGIOUS SERVICES

Jones v. Hobbs, 864 F.Supp.2d 808 (E.D.Ark. 2012). A prisoner brought an action against various state department of correction (DOC) officials, alleging violations of the First and Fourteenth Amendments, as well as the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA). The defendants filed a motion for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to: (1) whether officials impeded the prisoner's efforts to secure a diet which comported with the dictates of his religion; (2) whether fiscal and security concerns were rationally connected to the denial of a religious diet; (3) whether the prisoner had a sufficient alternative means to practice his religion; (4) whether there was an alternative way to accommodate the prisoner's request for a vegan meal at de minimis cost to valid penological interests; and (5) whether the prisoner's right to a diet suiting his religious beliefs was clearly established. (Arkansas Department of Correction)

U.S. District Court
RELIGIOUS ARTICLES
RELIGIOUS SERVICES

Joseph v. Fischer, 900 F.Supp.2d 320 (W.D.N.Y. 2012). A state prisoner who observed the Nation of Gods and Earths (NGE) faith brought an action against correctional officials, alleging that the officials violated his right to practice his religion, denied his right of access to courts, and retaliated against him. The prisoner sought declaratory and injunctive relief, as well as money damages. The officials moved for judgment on the pleadings. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the issue of whether correctional officials' restrictions on NGE activities were adequately justified by legitimate security concerns, as required under the First Amendment and RLUIPA, could not be resolved on a motion for judgment on the pleadings, since it was not possible, based solely on the pleadings, to determine whether the actions of the officials had unjustifiably burdened the prisoner's religious exercise. The court held that individual correctional officials were qualifiedly immune from the prisoner's claim for damages based on the officials' preventing the prisoner from participating in such activities, where the rights of the prisoner, who observed the NGE faith, to hold study group classes, wear certain articles of clothing or emblems, and observe NGE holy days, were not clearly established First Amendment rights, given that department of corrections protocols did not specifically protect such religious activities. The court found that the prisoner's allegations, that he was denied access to courts due to a correctional official's confiscation or destruction of documents, failed to state a claim for denial of access to courts, where the allegations were conclusory, and the prisoner failed to show what prejudice he suffered as a result of the official's alleged actions. (Attica Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
RELIGIOUS ARTICLES
SAFETY REGULATIONS

McFaul v. Valenzuela, 684 F.3d 564 (5th Cir. 2012). A prisoner brought a pro se civil rights action against prison officials who had denied his request for a religious medallion to use in Celtic Druid ceremonies. The district court entered summary judgment in favor of the defendants and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the prison's prohibitions on nonconforming neo-Pagan medallions and medallions costing more than $25 did not violate the prisoner's First Amendment right to free exercise of religion, and the prisoner failed to meet his burden of showing that the prohibitions substantially burdened his ability to practice his religion, in violation of the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA). The appeals court also held that enforcement of the prohibitions against the prisoner did not violate equal protection. Officials had prevented the prisoner from having a black onyx pentagram for use in Celtic Druid ceremonies, and the court found that the prohibitions were reasonably related to penological interests, including safety, security, and discipline, did not discriminate against nontraditional religions, and did not prevent the prisoner from performing some religious rituals. The court noted that permitting prisoners to possess nonconforming medallions would have forced guards to determine whether the items were permitted religious medallions or contraband items. (Preston Smith Unit, Texas Department of Criminal Justice)

U.S. Appeals Court
RELIGION

Moussazadeh v. Texas Dept. of Criminal Justice, 703 F.3d 781 (5th Cir. 2012). A Jewish state prisoner brought an action against the Texas Department of Criminal Justice, alleging that the defendant denied his grievances and requests for kosher meals in violation of the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA) and the Texas Religious Freedom Restoration Act. The district court entered summary judgment for the defendant and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The court held that the state Jewish prisoner exhausted his administrative remedies with respect to his claim that a prison's failure to provide him with kosher meals violated RLUIPA, where the prisoner went through the state's entire grievance process before filing suit. The court found that sufficient evidence established that the prisoner's religious beliefs were sincere, as required to support a claim against state's department of criminal justice for violation of RLUIPA, where the prisoner stated that he was born and raised Jewish and had always kept a kosher household, the prisoner offered evidence that he requested kosher meals from the chaplain, kitchen staff, and the department, and while at another prison, he ate kosher meals provided to him from the dining hall. The court noted that the prisoner was harassed for his adherence to his religious beliefs and for his demands for kosher food, and that the department transferred the prisoner for a time so he could receive kosher food. The court held that the prisoner was denied a generally available benefit because of his religious beliefs, and thus, the state's department of criminal justice imposed a substantial burden on the prisoner's religious exercise under RLUIPA, where every prisoner in the department's custody received a nutritionally sufficient diet, every observant Jewish prisoner at the designated prison received a kosher diet free of charge, and the Jewish prisoner at issue was forced to pay for his kosher meals. The court found that there was no evidence of a compelling government interest in forcing the Jewish prisoner to pay for all of his kosher meals. The court also found that summary judgment was precluded by a general dispute of material fact as to whether the state's department of criminal justice employed the least restrictive means of minimizing costs and maintaining security by forcing the Jewish prisoner to pay for all of his kosher meals. (Eastham Unit of the Texas Department of Criminal Justice, Correctional Institutions Division)

U.S. District Court
RELIGIOUS ARTICLES

Native American Council of Tribes v. Weber, 897 F.Supp.2d 828 (D.S.D. 2012). A Native American organization and inmates brought an action against the Secretary of the South Dakota Department of Corrections, alleging the Department's policy banning all tobacco from its facilities violated the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA). The district court found that the inmates' use of tobacco was a religious exercise protected under RLUIPA, that the policy placed a substantial burden on the inmates' exercise of their religious beliefs, and the policy was not supported by a compelling governmental interest where there was little evidence that tobacco from the Native American religious ceremonies created a security or safety risk. According to the court, the Native American inmates' use of tobacco in pipes, tobacco ties, and prayer flags was a religious exercise protected under RLUIPA, notwithstanding the use of red willow bark instead of tobacco by other members of their tribe. The court noted that the inmates used tobacco prior to their incarceration as part of traditional healing and other religious ceremonies. (South Dakota Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
GANGS
RELIGIOUS ARTICLES
RELIGIOUS SERVICES

Panayoty v. Annucci, 898 F.Supp.2d 469 (N.D.N.Y. 2012). Inmates in a state prison who were affiliated with the religious group Nation of Gods and Earth filed a § 1983 action against prison officials seeking declarative and injunctive relief concerning constraints the prison placed on the practice of their religion, which allegedly violated the First Amendment and Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA), as well as the equal protection clause of Fourteenth Amendment. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court found that the inmates' practice of congregating with each other and wearing crowns, as part of their affiliation with the Nation of Gods and Earth group, was religious in the inmates' scheme of beliefs, and sincerely held, as required to demonstrate a prima facie showing of First Amendment free exercise and RLUIPA violations against the prison officials who had established protocols prohibiting such practices. The court noted that one inmate had a twelve-year history of the religious practice, dating back to before he was incarcerated, another inmate's practice extended back 25 years, and both expressed that the Nation of Gods and Earth religion had helped them draw closer to a life of righteousness and had shaped their character. The court held that there was no evidence that the inmates' practice of displaying the Nation of Gods and Earth's Universal Flag, symbols, and texts in their cells, as part of their affiliation with the group, was religious in the inmates' scheme of beliefs, and sincerely held, and the inmates failed to adequately assert First Amendment free exercise and RLUIPA violations against prison officials. Although the inmates asserted that the prison's prohibition of this practice required them to live under a shroud of secrecy, members of the group were required to register with the facility deputy superintendent for programs, so their practice was well known.

The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the prison prohibition on the practice of congregating with each other and wearing religious crowns was reasonably related to security concerns that the religion was affiliated with gang activity, and whether the measures were the least restrictive means of accomplishing security concerns. (New York State Department of Corrections and Community Supervision, Mid–Orange Correctional Facility, Riverview Correctional Facility)

U.S. District Court
MEDIA ACCESS

Philadelphia Inquirer v. Wetzel, 906 F.Supp.2d 362 (M.D.Pa. 2012). A newspaper brought an action against the secretary of a state department of corrections (DOC), alleging the First Amendment guaranteed the right to observe a prisoner's execution without obstructions. The newspaper moved for a preliminary injunction. The district court granted the motion. The court held that the historical practice in Pennsylvania indicated that the public and press traditionally enjoyed a right of access to executions and that permitting the press to view an entire execution without visual or auditory obstruction contributed to the proper functioning of the execution process. The court found that the state's significant interest in protecting the identities of employees taking part in lethal injections did not outweigh the newspaper's right of access to observe executions, and that the newspaper demonstrated that granting a preliminary injunction would not result in harm to the state. The court noted that "… allowing the press to report on the entire method of execution may promote a more informed discussion of the death penalty… and it may promote the public perception of fairness and transparency concerning the death penalty, which can only be achieved by permitting full public view of the execution…. Allowing the press to view the entire execution also provides significant community therapeutic value, as well as exposes the execution process to public scrutiny." (Pennsylvania Department of Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
BOOKS
SAFETY REGULATIONS
SECURITY RESTRICTIONS

Prison Legal News v. Livingston, 683 F.3d 201 (5th Cir. 2012). A non-profit publisher of a magazine about prisoners' rights filed a § 1983 suit claiming violation of the First Amendment and the Due Process Clause by the Texas Department of Criminal Justice's (TDCJ) book censorship policy and procedures, as applied to the publisher that was prohibited from distributing five books to prisoners. The district court granted the TDCJ summary judgment. The publisher appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the TDCJ book censorship policy that prohibited the publisher's distribution of two books graphically depicting prison rape was rationally related to a legitimate penological goal of protecting prisoners from a threat to safety and security by use of descriptions as templates to commit similar rapes, and thus, the policy as applied to the publisher's distribution of the two books to prisoners did not contravene the publisher's First Amendment right to free speech. According to the court, the TDCJ book censorship policy that prohibited the publisher's distribution of a book containing racial slurs and advocating overthrow of prisons by riot and revolt was rationally related to the legitimate penological goal of protecting the prison's safety and security from race riots, and thus, the policy as applied to the publisher's distribution of book to prisoners did not contravene the publisher's First Amendment right to free speech. The court also noted that the prison had a legitimate penological goal of protecting prisoners from the threat of violence due to the existence of race-based prison gangs and the prevalence of racial discord. The court found that the TDCJ book censorship policy that formerly prohibited the publisher's distribution of a book recounting sexual molestation of a young child was rationally related to the legitimate penological goal of protecting the prison from impairment of the rehabilitation of sex offenders and from disruptive outbursts by prisoners who were similarly victimized, and thus, the policy as applied to the publisher's distribution of the book to prisoners did not contravene the publisher's First Amendment right to free speech. The court noted that the TDCJ policy left prisoners and the publisher with ample alternatives for exercising their free speech rights by permitting prisoners to read the publisher's newsletter and the majority of books that the publisher distributed. (Prison Legal News, Texas Department of Criminal Justice)

U.S. District Court
SECURITY PRACTICES
DISCRETION

Sledge v. U.S., 883 F.Supp.2d 71 (D.D.C. 2012). A federal inmate's relatives brought an action under the Federal Tort Claims Act (FTCA) against the United States, alleging claims for personal injury and wrongful death based on the failure of Bureau of Prisons (BOP) employees to prevent or stop an attack on the inmate. The attack resulted in the inmate's hospitalization and death. The relatives also sought to recover for emotional distress that the inmate and his mother allegedly suffered when BOP employees denied bedside visitation between the mother and the inmate. Following dismissal of some of the claims, the United States moved to dismiss the remaining claims based on FTCA's discretionary function exception. The district court granted the motion. The court found that a correction officer's decision to position himself outside the housing unit, rather than in the sally port, to smoke a cigarette during a controlled move was discretionary, and thus the United States was immune from liability under the Federal Tort Claims Act's (FTCA) discretionary function exception. The court noted that the prison lacked mandatory guidelines that required correctional staff to follow a particular course of action regarding supervision of inmates during controlled moves, and the officer's decision implicated policy concerns, in that it required consideration of the risks posed by inmates moving throughout prison, and required safety and security calculations. The court held that the mother of the deceased federal inmate failed to state a claim for negligent infliction of emotional distress, under Missouri law, arising from the Bureau of Prisons' (BOP) denial of bedside visitation between the mother and inmate, absent allegations that the BOP should have realized that its failure to complete a visitation memorandum involved an unreasonable risk of causing distress, or facts necessary to demonstrate that the mother's emotional distress was "medically diagnosable" and was of sufficient severity as to be "medically significant."

The court found that the Bureau of Prisons' (BOP) alleged decision not to allow the mother of federal inmate, who was in coma after being severely beaten by a fellow inmate, to visit her son after the BOP allegedly failed to complete a visitation memorandum, was not so outrageous in character, and so extreme in degree, as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency, and to be regarded as atrocious, and utterly intolerable in civilized community, thus precluding the mother's intentional infliction of emotional distress claim under Missouri law. (Federal Correctional Institution, Allenwood, Pennsylvania)

U.S. District Court
RELIGIOUS GROUPS
RELIGIOUS SERVICES
SECURITY PRACTICES

Sweet v. Northern Neck Regional Jail, 857 F.Supp.2d 595 (E.D.Va. 2012). An inmate, proceeding in forma pauperis, brought a § 1983 action against a sergeant and a jail, alleging that a prohibition against speaking in Arabic during prayer violated his First Amendment rights. The district court dismissed the case. The court held that the jail policy requiring prayers or services be spoken in English when inmates from different housing units and classification levels congregated, but allowing prayers to be offered in Arabic within individual housing units, was reasonably related to legitimate penological interests of security and did not substantially burden inmates' right to free exercise of their First Amendment rights. The court noted that the jail was concerned about inmates plotting riots or escapes while congregating with other units, jail officers did not speak Arabic, and inmates could gather within their housing units and pray in Arabic. (Northern Neck Regional Jail, Virginia)

U.S. Appeals Court
BOOKS
GANGS

Toston v. Thurmer, 689 F.3d 828 (7th Cir. 2012). A state prison inmate brought a pro se civil rights complaint under § 1983 against prison officials, alleging that his rights of free speech and due process were violated when a disciplinary proceeding found him guilty of possession of gang literature and sentenced him to 90 days confinement in segregation. The inmate's due process claim was dismissed, and the district court granted summary judgment for officials on the free speech claim. The inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part and vacated in part. The appeals court held that the limitation of the state prison inmate's right of free speech, as a result of a disciplinary proceeding that found him guilty of possession of gang literature, was adequately justified by prison officials' legitimate concern that the inmate copied from a prison library book a ten-point program by the founder of a hate group's predecessor in order to show it to others that the inmate hoped to enlist in a prison gang, with the program to serve as the gang's charter. The court noted that a prison librarian's decision that on the whole a book is not gang literature does not preclude disciplinary proceedings against an inmate who copies incendiary passages from it. The inmate had purchased, with prison permission, "To Die for the People: The Writings of Huey P. Newton" the founder of the Black Panthers, and he had checked out two books from the prison library about the Black Panthers. The court vacated the district court decision regarding the alleged due process violation. The inmate alleged that his due process rights were violated because he had no notice that copying passages from prison library books or a book he had been allowed to purchase could subject him to a sentence of 90 days' confinement in segregation for possessing gang literature. The appeal court ordered the district court to determine whether a 90–day sentence to segregation was, or was not, a deprivation of liberty. (Waupun Correctional Institution, Wisconsin)

U.S. District Court
SECURITY PRACTICES
SEGREGATION
TRANSFER

U.S. v. Bout, 860 F.Supp.2d 303 (S.D.N.Y. 2012). A federal prisoner convicted of multiple conspiracies to kill United States nationals, kill officers and employees of the United States, acquire, transfer, and use anti-aircraft missiles, and provide material support to a designated foreign terrorist organization, who had been held in solitary confinement, moved to be transferred to the general prison population. The motion was construed as a habeas petition. The district court held that continued solitary confinement violated the prisoner's Eighth Amendment rights. According to the court, the decision of the federal Bureau of Prisons (BOP) to indefinitely hold the federal prisoner in solitary confinement was not rationally related to any legitimate penological objectives and thus violated the prisoner's Eighth Amendment rights. The court found that although the BOP argued that the prisoner's release from solitary confinement would pose a high security risk, there was no evidence that the prisoner had a direct affiliation with any member of a terrorist organization, or that he personally engaged in violent acts. The court concluded that the prisoner did not present an unusually high risk of escape or harm to others, any involvement that the prisoner had with the former Liberian dictator, Charles Taylor, occurred several years ago and was not the basis of his criminal conviction, and the prisoner's release into the general population would have minimal impact on guards, other inmates, and prison resources. (Special Housing Unit, Metropolitan Correctional Center, New York)

U.S. District Court
MAIL

U.S. v. Ligambi, 886 F.Supp.2d 492 (E.D.Pa. 2012). A detainee who was charged with various crimes, including racketeering, moved to suppress an outgoing prison letter seized by prison officials. The district court denied the motion. The court held that the defendant, who was in prison while charged with various crimes, including racketeering, did not have a reasonable expectation of privacy in his outgoing non-privileged mail. The court noted that prison regulations permitted officials to seize correspondence when it might contain information concerning criminal activities, it was established practice to inspect non-privileged mailings to promote discipline in the institution, and the defendant had a reputation for involvement with organized crime. (South Woods State Prison, Southern State Correctional Facility, New Jersey)

U.S. Appeals Court
ESCAPE

U.S. v. Tyerman, 701 F.3d 552 (8th Cir. 2012). A defendant was convicted in district court of being a felon in possession of a firearm and he appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. After a trial, the defendant was convicted in the district court of being a felon in possession of a firearm and ammunition, and possession of a stolen firearm. His motion for acquittal or new trial was denied and the defendant appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the government's passive conduct in receiving information regarding the location of the defendant's gun, from the defendant's counsel, did not violate the defendant's Sixth Amendment right-to-counsel. The court found that the defendant's conduct in creating handcuff keys and practicing the use of them constituted a substantial step, as an element of attempt, with respect to escaping from pretrial incarceration, for purposes of using attempted escape as the basis for a sentence enhancement for obstruction of justice. At sentencing, a U.S. Marshal testified that prison guards discovered two homemade handcuff keys in the defendant's cell. According to the Marshal, during the investigation, other inmates revealed the defendant's plans to escape from jail and his use of the law library (which lacked surveillance) to practice removing handcuffs. Finding the Marshal credible, the district court applied a two-level adjustment for obstruction of justice based on the attempted escape, sentencing the defendant 72 months' imprisonment. (U. S. District Court, Iowa)

U.S. Appeals Court
CLASSIFICATION
SECURITY PRACTICES
SUPERMAX
TRANSFER

Westefer v. Neal, 682 F.3d 679 (7th Cir. 2012). Past and present inmates in the custody of the Illinois Department of Corrections (IDOC), who had been incarcerated in a supermax prison, brought a § 1983 action against IDOC officials and employees, alleging that defendants violated their right to procedural due process by employing unconstitutionally inadequate procedures when assigning inmates to the supermax prison, and seeking injunctive and declaratory relief. The district court granted injunctive relief, and the defendants appealed. The appeals court vacated and remanded with instructions. The appeals court held that the scope and specificity of the district court's injunction exceeded what was required to remedy a due-process violation, contrary to the terms of the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA) and cautionary language from the Supreme Court about remedial flexibility and deference to prison administrators. The court held that the IDOC's ten–point plan should be used as a constitutional baseline, revising the challenged procedures and including a detailed transfer-review process. According to the court, this would eliminate the operational discretion and flexibility of prison administrators, far exceeding what due process required and violating the mandate of the PLRA. The court found that, under the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA), injunctive relief to remedy unconstitutional prison conditions must be narrowly drawn, extend no further than necessary to remedy the constitutional violation, and use the least intrusive means to correct the violation of the federal right. The court noted that informal due process, which is mandatory for inmates transferred to a supermax prison, requires some notice of the reasons for the inmate's placement and enough time to prepare adequately for the administrative review. The court found that, to satisfy due process regarding inmates transferred to a supermax prison, only a single prison official is needed as a neutral reviewer, not necessarily a committee, noting that informal due process requires only that the inmate be given an opportunity to present his views, not necessarily a full-blown hearing. Similarly, the informal due process does not necessarily require a written decision describing the reasons for an inmate's placement, or mandate an appeal procedure. (Closed Maximum Security Unit, Tamms Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
CONTRABAND
PRETRIAL DETAINEES
SAFETY REGULA TIONS
SECURITY PRACTICES

Wilkins v. District of Columbia, 879 F.Supp.2d 35 (D.D.C. 2012). A pretrial detainee in a District of Columbia jail who was stabbed by another inmate brought an action against the District. The district court entered judgment as a matter of law in favor of the District and the detainee moved for reconsideration. The district court granted the motion and ordered a new trial. The court held that the issue of whether the failure of District of Columbia jail personnel to follow national standards of care for inmate access to storage closets and monitoring of inmate movements was the proximate cause of the detainee's stabbing by a fellow inmate was for the jury, in the detainee's negligence action, under District of Columbia law. Another inmate who was being held at the D.C. Jail on charges of first-degree murder attacked the detainee. The inmate had received a pass to go to the jail's law library, unaccompanied. Apparently he did not arrive at the library but no one from the library called the inmate's housing unit to report that he had not arrived. An expert retained by the detainee asserted that failure to monitor inmate movements violated national standards for the operation of jails. En route to the jail mental health unit, the detainee saw the inmate enter a mop closet. The inmate, along with another inmate, approached the detainee and stabbed him nine times with a knife. During court proceedings there was testimony that the inmates had hidden contraband in the mop closets. The closets are supposed to be locked at all times, other than when the jail is being cleaned each afternoon. But there was evidence from which the jury could infer that all inmates except those who did not have jobs cleaning in the jail had access to them. According to the detainee's expert witness, keeping mop closets locked at times when the general inmate population is permitted to be in the vicinity of the closets is in accordance with national standards of care for the operation of detention facilities. According to the district court, "In sum, the circumstantial evidence of Mr. Foreman's [inmate who attacked the detainee] freedom of movement is enough to have allowed a jury to conclude that the District's negligence was a proximate cause of Mr. Wilkins's injury…". (District of Columbia Central Detention Facility)

U.S. District Court
PRETRIAL DETAINEES
SAFETY
TRANSPORTATION
WHEELCHAIR

Woods v. City of Utica, 902 F.Supp.2d 273 (N.D.N.Y. 2012). A wheelchair-using, paraplegic arrestee sued a city, police officer, a county, a former sheriff, and county corrections officers, bringing federal causes of action for violations of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), the Rehabilitation Act, and Fourteenth Amendment equal protection and due process. The arrestee alleged that he was lifted out of his wheelchair and placed on the floor of a sheriff's van, forcing him to maneuver himself onto a bench seat which caused his pants and underwear to fall, exposing his genitals, that he was not secured to the bench with a seatbelt, causing him to be thrown about the passenger compartment and suffer leg spasms during his ride to the jail, that he was forced to urinate into an empty soda bottle and handle his sterile catheter with his hands that were dirty from moving himself around the floor of the van, and that the county corrections officers stood by as he struggled to maneuver himself out of the van and into his wheelchair while other inmates watched. The city and county defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court held that: (1) the city did not fail to accommodate the arrestee's disability, for purposes of the ADA and Rehabilitation Act claims; (2) summary judgment was precluded by fact issues as to whether the arrestee was denied the benefit of safe and appropriate transportation by the county on the day of his arrest when he was moved from a police station to a county jail; (3) the county was entitled to summary judgment to the extent the arrestee's claims involved his transportation from the jail to court proceedings on two other dates; (4) fact issues existed as to whether the county defendants were deliberately indifferent to the paraplegic inmate's known medical need for suppositories every other day, in violation of due process, but they were not deliberately indifferent to his need for catheters and prescription pain medication; and (5) the county defendants were not entitled to qualified immunity. The court noted that while the county defendants disputed the arrestee's version of the facts, corrections officers all denied receiving any training regarding how to transport disabled inmates. (Utica Police Dept., Oneida Co. Corr'l. Facility, N.Y.)

U.S. District Court
SAFETY
REGULATIONS

Alvarado-David v. U.S., 972 F.Supp.2d 210 (D.Puerto Rico 2013). A prisoner brought an action against the United States under the Federal Tort Claims Act (FTCA), alleging he fell out of his bunk and hit a toilet bowl, breaking his frontal teeth and upper lip because the United States' failed to provide prisoners with ladders to climb to their bunks. The United States moved to dismiss for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction under the FTCA's discretionary function exception. The district court granted the motion. The court held that the decision by Bureau of Prisons (BOP) personnel not to provide ladders or other equipment for the prisoners to climb to their bunks fit within the discretionary function exception to the FTCA. The court noted that no rules or regulations governed the use of ladders or bunk beds in correctional facilities, and the decision not to provide ladders in correctional facilities for safety reasons, as ladders could be broken off and used as weapons or escape devices, was grounded in considerations of public policy. (Metropolitan Detention Center, Guaynabo, Puerto Rico)

U.S. District Court
SECURITY
RESTRICTIONS

Aref v. Holder, 953 F.Supp.2d 133 (D.D.C. 2013). Current and former prisoners brought an action against the Bureau of Prisons (BOP), BOP officials, and the Attorney General, claiming that their First and Fifth Amendment rights were violated when they were placed in Communications Management Units (CMUs), in which their ability to communicate with the outside world was seriously restricted. Following dismissal of all but the procedural due process and First Amendment retaliation claims, the defendants moved to dismiss the First Amendment claims. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that: (1) the prisoner's release from BOP custody rendered moot his official-capacity claims for equitable relief; (2) a second prisoner sufficiently alleged a First Amendment retaliation claim; but (3) the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA) barred the prisoners' individual-capacity claims against a BOP official for mental or emotional injury. (Federal Correctional Institutions in Terre Haute, Indiana, and Marion, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEARCHES
SEX OFFENDER
VIDEO
SURVEILLANCE

Arnzen v. Palmer, 713 F.3d 369 (8th Cir 2013). Patients at a state Civil Commitment Unit for Sex Offenders (CCUSO) brought a § 1983 complaint against CCUSO administrators, challenging placement of video cameras in CCUSO restrooms, and moved for a preliminary injunction to stop their use. The district court denied the motion as to cameras in "dormitory style restrooms" but granted an injunction ordering that cameras in "traditional style bathrooms" be pointed at a ceiling or covered with lens cap. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that CCUSO conducted a "search" by capturing images of patients while occupying single-user bathrooms, and that CCUSO did not conduct a reasonable search by capturing patients' images, thereby constituting a Fourth Amendment violation. The appeals court found that the district court did not abuse its discretion in issuing preliminary injunctive relief. The court noted that the patients had a reasonable expectation of privacy in a single-person bathroom when there was no immediate indication it was being used for purposes other than those ordinarily associated with bathroom facilities, and that involuntarily civilly committed persons retain the Fourth Amendment right to be free from unreasonable searches that is analogous to the right retained by pretrial detainees. According to the court, the facility did not conduct a reasonable search of its involuntarily committed patients by capturing images of patients while they occupied single-user bathrooms in a secure facility, thereby constituting a violation of Fourth Amendment, where the cameras did not provide administrators with immediate alerts concerning patient safety or prevent assaults or dangerous acts, and less intrusive methods were available for administrators to use to prevent illicit activities by patients. (Iowa Civil Commitment Unit for Sex Offenders)

U.S. Appeals Court
LOCKS
PRETRIAL DETAINEES
SAFETY

Baker v. RR Brink Locking Systems, Inc., 721 F.3d 716 (5th Cir. 2013). A pretrial detainee brought an action against the manufacturer of allegedly faulty locks on cell doors that permitted another inmate to enter the detainee's cell and assault and rape him. The manufacturer moved for summary judgment. The district court denied the motion and then denied reconsideration. The manufacturer moved for permission to file an appeal before the case had been adjudicated. The motion was granted in part. The appeals court affirmed, allowing the case to continue. (RR Brink, Harrison County Detention Center, Mississippi)

U.S. Appeals Court
CLASSIFICATION
GANGS

Castro v. Terhune, 712 F.3d 1304 (9th Cir. 2013). A state inmate brought an action challenging his validation as an "associate" of a recognized prison gang on due process grounds. The district court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment. The appeals court reversed and remanded. On remand, the district court again entered summary judgment for the defendants. The appeals court again reversed and remanded. Following a bench trial on remand, the district court granted the inmate prospective relief, requiring prison officials to determine whether an inmate was a gang associate under a new validation procedure. After officials validated the inmate as a "prison-gang associate" for a second time, the district granted the defendants' motion to terminate the case. The inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the California prison regulation relating to validation of inmates as prison gang affiliates was not facially vague. The court found that the district court erred by not evaluating whether "some evidence" supported the inmate's validation, but because the record contained "some evidence" that inmate was involved with a gang, remand was not warranted. (SHU at Pelican Bay State Prison, California)

U.S. Appeals Court
CONTACT VISITS
CONTRABAND
RESTRAINTS

Chappell v. Mandeville, 706 F.3d 1052 (9th Cir. 2013). A state prison inmate brought a § 1983 action against prison officials, alleging violations of the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments. The defendants moved for summary judgment on the ground of qualified immunity and the district court granted summary judgment as to some, but not all, of the claims. The defendants appealed. The appeals court reversed. The appeals court held that: (1) it was not clearly established that subjecting the prison inmate to a contraband watch violated the Eighth Amendment prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment, and thus prison officials were entitled to qualified immunity on the Eighth Amendment claim; (2) the contraband watch was not such an extreme change in conditions of confinement as to trigger due-process protection; and (3) it was not clearly established whether a state-created liberty interest existed with regard to the contraband watch, and thus officials were entitled to qualified immunity on the claim that the inmate's right to due process was violated because he was not provided with an opportunity to be heard by the official who ordered contraband watch. The inmate's fiancée had visited him, and when she entered the prison she was wearing a ponytail hairpiece. The next day the hairpiece was discovered in a trash can near the visiting room. Prison officials then searched the entire visiting area and found spandex undergarments in the women's bathroom. Both the hairpiece and the undergarments tested positive for cocaine residue. Prison staff conducted a search of the inmate's cell, during which they notified him that they believed that someone had introduced drugs through a hairpiece. The officials discovered three unlabelled bottles of what appeared to be eye drops in the inmate's cell. The liquid in the bottles tested positive for methamphetamine. The inmate was then placed on a contraband watch. The contraband watch conditions included 24-hour lighting, mattress deprivation, taping the inmate into two pairs of underwear and jumpsuits, placing him in a hot cell with no ventilation, chaining him to an iron bed, shackling him at the ankles and waist, and forcing him to eat "like a dog." (California State Prison, Sacramento)

U.S. District Court
CLOTHING
PRETRIAL DETAINEES
SEARCHES
USE OF FORCE

Clay v. Woodbury County, Iowa, 982 F.Supp.2d 904 (N.D.Iowa 2013). A female arrestee brought a § 1983 action against a city, an arresting officer, county, county sheriff, and jail officers, alleging, among other things, that jail officers "strip searched" her without reasonable suspicion and in unconstitutional manner, and did so in retaliation for her vociferous complaints about her detention and the search of her purse and cell phone. The defendants moved for summary judgment, and the arrestee moved to exclude expert testimony. The district court held that the expert's reference to an incorrect standard for the excessive force claim did not warrant excluding his opinions in their entirety, although portions of the expert's report were inadmissible.

The court found that the incident in which male and female county jail officers forcibly removed the female arrestee's under-wire bra and changed her into jail attire was not a "strip search" within the meaning of the Iowa law which defined a "strip search" as "having a person remove or arrange some or all of the person's clothing so as to permit an inspection of the genitalia, buttocks, female breasts or undergarments of that person or a physical probe by any body cavity," where there was no indication that the officers inspected the arrestee's private parts or physically probed any of her body cavities. The court also found that the arrestee whose clothing was forcibly removed in the presence of male and female county jail officers in a holding cell after the arrestee refused to answer questions during the booking process and to remove her clothing herself, was not subjected to a "strip search" requiring reasonable suspicion under the Fourth Amendment. According to the court, the officers did not violate the arrestee's privacy rights under the Fourth Amendment where the officers' reason for removing the arrestee's bra-- institutional safety-- was substantially justified, and the scope of the intrusion was relatively small. The court also found that the officers were entitled to qualified immunity from the female arrestee's § 1983 unlawful search claim, where the officers neither knew, nor reasonably should have known, that their actions would violate the arrestee's privacy rights.

The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the amount of force used by female county jail officers during the booking process to forcibly remove the female arrestee's under-wire bra and change her into jail attire after the arrestee refused to answer questions, became disruptive, and refused to remove her clothing herself, was reasonable. The officers allegedly threw the arrestee onto the cell bunk, causing her to bang her head against the bunk or cell wall. The court found that male county jail officers did not use excessive force, within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment, in restraining the female arrestee in a holding cell after the female officers had allegedly thrown the arrestee onto a cell bunk, causing her to bang her head against bunk or cell wall, in an effort to forcibly remove the arrestee's clothing and to change her into jail attire. (Woodbury County Jail, Iowa)

U.S. District Court
CROWDING

Coleman v. Brown, 922 F.Supp.2d 1004 (E.D.Cal. 2013). State prison inmates brought Eighth Amendment challenges to the adequacy of mental health care and medical health care provided to mentally ill inmates and the general prison population, respectively. The inmates moved to convene a three-judge panel of the district court to enter a population reduction order that was necessary to provide effective relief. The motions were granted and the cases were assigned to same panel, which ordered the state to reduce the prison population to 137.5% of its design capacity. The state moved to vacate or modify the population reduction order. The district court denied the motion. The three-judge panel of the district court held that: (1) the state's contention that prison crowding was reduced and no longer a barrier to providing inmates with care required by the Eighth Amendment did not provide the basis for a motion to vacate the order on the ground that changed circumstances made it inequitable to continue applying the order; (2) the state failed to establish that prison crowding was no longer a barrier to providing inmates with care required by the Eighth Amendment; and (3) the state failed to establish it had achieved a durable remedy to prison crowding. (Calif. Dept. of Rehabilitation and Corrections)

U.S. District Court
CROWDING

Coleman v. Brown, 960 F.Supp.2d 1057 (E.D.Cal. 2013). California prisoners with serious mental disorders brought a class action against a Governor, alleging that due to prison overcrowding, they received inadequate mental health care, in violation of the Eighth Amendment prohibition of cruel and unusual punishment. Separately, California prisoners with serious medical conditions brought a class action asserting constitutional claims similar to those in the other action. In the case concerning mental health care, the district court found Eighth Amendment violations and appointed a special master to oversee the development and implementation of a remedial plan. In the case concerning medical care, the State stipulated to a remedial injunction, and, after the State failed to comply with that injunction, the district court appointed a receiver to oversee remedial efforts. A three judge district court panel consolidated the two cases and the panel entered a remedial order requiring the State to reduce its prison population to 137.5 percent of design capacity within two years. The Governor appealed. The United States Supreme Court affirmed the population reduction order. The district court subsequently denied the defendants' motion to vacate or modify the population reduction order, and directed the defendants to comply with the population reduction order. The defendants' moved to stay the order directing compliance pending appeal to the United States Supreme Court. The district court denied the motion, finding that: (1) the State was not likely to succeed on the merits of the prisoners' lawsuit challenging prison conditions; (2) the State would not be irreparably injured absent a stay; (3) issuance of a stay would substantially injure the prisoners; and (4) the public interest favored denying the stay. (California)

U.S. Appeals Court
CONTRABAND
SEARCHES-CELL

Denny v. Schultz, 708 F.3d 140 (3rd Cir. 2013). A federal prisoner petitioned for a writ of habeas corpus challenging findings made by Disciplinary Hearing Officer (DHO) that he had possessed weapons in violation of a prison regulation and sanctioned him with forfeiture of 40 days of good time credit and the imposition of 60 days in disciplinary segregation. The district court dismissed the petition and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the DHO did not violate the federal prisoner's due process rights when it found that the prisoner had committed the prohibited act of "Possession of a Weapon," on the basis that two homemade shanks had been found in a cell that he shared with another prisoner. The court noted that, although those weapons may have belonged to his cellmate, all prisoners had an affirmative responsibility to keep their "area" free from contraband and the collective responsibility theory applied. (Federal Correctional Institution, Fairton, New Jersey)

U.S. Appeals Court
FIRE SAFETY
SAFETY REGULATIONS
ITEMS PERMITTED
SEARCHES- CELL

Devbrow v. Gallegos, 735 F.3d 584 (7th Cir. 2013). A prisoner brought a § 1983 claim against two prison officials, claiming that the officials denied him access to the courts by confiscating and then destroying his legal papers in retaliation for a prior lawsuit he filed. The district court granted the prison officials' motion for summary judgment, and denied the prisoner's motion for reconsideration. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the prisoner failed to authenticate a purported e-mail from a prison official to a law librarian supervisor, where there was no circumstantial evidence that supported the authenticity of the e-mail, and no evidence that the prisoner or anyone else saw the official actually compose or transmit the purported e-mail. The court held that the official's removal of the prisoner's excessive legal materials from his cell, to eliminate a fire hazard and to make it easier for officials to conduct searches and inventories of the prisoner's property during prison searches, was not retaliation for the prisoner's filing of a prior lawsuit. According to the court, the prisoner's speculation regarding the officials' motive could not overcome the officials' sworn statements on the motion for summary judgment. (Westville Correctional Facility, Indiana)

U.S. District Court
GANGS
PROTECTION
SAFETY

Dunn v. Killingsworth, 984 F.Supp.2d 811 (M.D.Tenn. 2013). A prisoner brought a § 1983 action against prison officials, alleging that the officials violated his Eighth Amendment rights by not providing him with adequate protection from gang-related violence. The district court conducted an initial review of the prisoner's complaint, pursuant to the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA). The court held that the prisoner's allegations: (1) that a gang member threatened his personal safety: (2) that the prisoner's family paid other inmates for the prisoner's personal safety; (3) that the prisoner repeatedly requested to be placed in protective custody; and (4) that prison officials denied such requests, were sufficient to state the serious deprivation prong of his claim for violation of his Eighth Amendment rights. The court also found that the prisoner's allegations that prison officials denied his requests for protection despite the stabbing of prisoners and a guard at the prison, and that prison officials failed to take any effective steps to provide better protection for all inmates, were sufficient to state a deliberate indifference prong of his claim for violation of his Eighth Amendment rights. (South Central Correctional Center, Tennessee)

U.S. District Court
CELL CAPACITY
CROWDING
PRETRIAL DETAINEE

Duran v. Merline, 923 F.Supp.2d 702 (D.N.J. 2013). A former pretrial detainee at a county detention facility brought a pro se § 1983 action against various facility officials and employees, the company which provided food and sanitation services to the facility, and the medical services provider, alleging various constitutional torts related to his pretrial detention. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motions in part and denied in part. The district court held that fact issues precluded summary judgment on: (1) the conditions of confinement claim against a former warden in his official capacity; (2) an interference with legal mail claim against a correctional officer that alleged that the facility deliberately withheld the detainee's legal mail during a two-week period; (3) a First Amendment retaliation claim based on interference with legal mail; and (4) a claim for inadequate medical care as to whether the detainee's Hepatitis C condition was a serious medical condition that required treatment and whether the provider denied such treatment because it was too costly. The detainee asserted that overcrowding at the county detention facility, which allegedly led to the detainee being forced to sleep and eat his meals next to open toilet, and led to inmate-on-inmate violence, contributed to his assault by another inmate. According to the court, the long-standing conditions of confinement whereby the county detention facility was overcrowded for at least 24 years and facility officials "triple-celled" inmates, allegedly leading to unsanitary conditions, amounted to a "custom" for the purposes of the former detainee's § 1983 Fourteenth Amendment conditions of confinement claim against a former warden in his official capacity. The court held that the food service provider's serving the detainee cold meals for a 45-day period while the kitchen in the county detention facility was being renovated, was not "punishment," as would support the inmate's § 1983 Fourteenth Amendment conditions of confinement claim against the provider, absent evidence that the food served to the detainee was spoiled or contaminated, that a significant portion of the detainee's diet consisted of such food, or that the food service caused more than a temporary discomfort. The court also held that the alleged actions of the food service provider in serving the detainee one food item when another ran out, failing to serve bread with the inmate's meal, serving the inmate leftovers from days before, serving juice in a dirty container on one occasion, serving milk after its expiration date, and serving meals on cracked trays that caused the detainee to contract food poisoning, did not amount to a substantial deprivation of food sufficient to amount to unconstitutional conditions of confinement, as would violate the inmate's due process rights. (Atlantic County Justice Facility, New Jersey)

U.S. District Court
CROWDING
PRETRIAL DETAINEES
SAFETY
SAFETY REGULATIONS

E.A.F.F. v. U.S., 955 F.Supp.2d 707 (W.D.Tex. 2013). Unaccompanied alien minors brought an action against Office of Refugee Resettlement (ORR) officials, alleging they were physically and sexually abused while they were in detention awaiting final adjudication of their immigration status. The officials moved for partial summary judgment. The district court granted the motions. The court noted that a person detained for deportation is equivalent to a pretrial detainee, and a pretrial detainee's constitutional claims are considered under the Due Process Clause. The court held that the officials could not be held liable for due process violations that occurred when the unaccompanied alien minors were physically and sexually abused as a result of alleged overcrowding at a detention facility, where they were being held while awaiting final adjudication of their immigration status, and where there was no evidence that the officials were responsible for decisions regarding the facility's capacity. According to the court, isolated incidents of physical and sexual abuse by staff members at the detention facility were insufficient to put the officials on notice of a substantial risk of future abuse, as required to hold the officials liable for deliberate indifference in failing to protect the minors' safety in violation of their due process rights. The court noted that other incidents of alleged abuse were investigated by the Texas Department of Family and Protective Services and did not result in any abuse findings. The court found that officials' failure to systematically interview minors concerning their abuse allegations did not amount to deliberate indifference to their safety in violation of their due process rights, where officials spoke to some of the minors during their monitoring visits, and clinicians were on-site and available to speak with the minors on a regular basis. The court held that the officials could not be held liable in their supervisory capacities on a theory of failure to train or supervise, for due process violations arising from alleged physical and sexual abuse by staff members at the detention facility, where staff members received training in behavior management and de-escalation techniques, officials responded to reports of abuse by recommending or providing further training, officials adopted safety policies designed to prevent abuse, and officials recommended that staff members work in pairs and they were unaware that staff members were working individually. (Nixon Facility, Away From Home, Inc., Texas)

U.S. Appeals Court
ITEMS PERMITTED

Earl v. Racine County Jail, 718 F.3d 689 (7th Cir. 2013). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against a county jail and various jail officers, asserting claims for denial of due process and deliberate indifference to his serious medical condition. The district court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment, and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the inmate's five days on suicide watch were neither long enough nor harsh enough to deprive him of a due-process-protected liberty interest, where: (1) the only changes to the inmate's meals were that trays upon which food was served were disposable foam rather than plastic; (2) eating utensils were quickly removed after each meal; (3) the inmate was not denied bedding but was given a mattress and a blanket; (4) the inmate was denied writing materials for only the first 48 hours; and (5) rather than being prohibited human contact, deputies were assigned to closely and personally monitor the inmate to ensure his safety. The court found that jail officers were not deliberately indifferent to the inmate's allergic reaction to suicide garments in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The court noted that after the inmate told an officer about his allergic reaction to a suicide gown, the officer called a nurse who immediately examined the inmate and gave him cream and medication, and the officers appropriately deferred to the nurse's medical decision that the inmate did not need different garments because there was no sign of rash or bumps on the inmate. (Racine County Jail, Wisconsin)

U.S. District Court
CLEANING SUPPLIES
SAFETY

Florio v. Canty, 954 F.Supp.2d 227 (S.D.N.Y. 2013). A prisoner, proceeding pro se, brought a § 1983 action against a warden and a corrections officer, alleging violations of the Eighth Amendment. The defendants moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion. The court held that the prisoner's exposure to human waste on two occasions, for a total of less than a few hours, did not give rise to a serious risk of substantial harm. The prisoner alleged that prison officials waited 10 to 30 minutes after two separate incidents of a toilet overflowing to release the prisoner from his cell and having the prisoner clean the cell with inadequate cleaning gear and without training, allegedly resulting in the prisoner developing a foot fungus. The court held that this was not deliberate indifference to a substantial risk to his health and safety, as would violate the Eighth Amendment. The court noted that officials acted to alleviate the unsanitary conditions, the overflow also occurred in approximately 20 other cells, and the prisoner was not prevented from bathing or washing his clothes after the incidents. (Anna M. Kross Center, Rikers Island, New York City Department of Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
TRANSPORTATION

Fluker v. County of Kankakee, 741 F.3d 787 (7th Cir. 2013). An inmate and his wife filed a § 1983 action against a county and the county sheriff's office to recover for injuries the inmate suffered when a correctional officer who was driving a jail transport vehicle was required to brake suddenly, causing the inmate to hurtle forward and hit his head on a metal divider. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants. The plaintiffs appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the district court had the ability, in the interests of judicial economy and finality, to address the merits of the suit once it determined that the inmate had not exhausted his remedies under the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA). (Kankakee County, Jerome Combs Detention Center, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
TRANSPORTATION

Fluker v. County of Kankakee, 945 F.Supp.2d 972 (C.D.Ill. 2013). An inmate and his wife filed a § 1983 action in state court against a county and the county sheriff's office to recover for injuries the inmate suffered when a correctional officer who was driving his prison transport vehicle was required to brake suddenly, causing the inmate to hurtle forward and hit his head on a metal divider. The case was removed to federal court. The district court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment. The court held that: (1) the officials' failure to fasten the inmate's seatbelt did not violate the Eighth Amendment; the official's alleged driving above the posted speed limit did not violate the Eighth Amendment; and the officials' failure to immediately call for an ambulance did not violate the Eighth Amendment. The court noted that the officials, who were not medically trained, called a supervisor for guidance within one minute of the accident, and were told to continue to the jail where a trained first responder immediately assessed the inmate and cleaned and bandaged a laceration on his head when the transport van arrived 7 to 10 minutes later. The inmate was transported to a hospital within 10 to 15 minutes of arriving at the jail. (Jerome Combs Detention Center, Kankakee County, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
FACIAL HAIR
RELIGION
SECURITY PRACTICES

Garner v. Kennedy, 713 F.3d 237 (5th Cir. 2013). A Muslim state prisoner brought an action against prison officials alleging the Texas Department of Criminal Justice's (TDCJ) policy of prohibiting prisoners from wearing beards for religious reasons violated the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA) and his constitutional rights. The district court granted summary judgment to the defendants, and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. On remand, and after a bench trial, the district court granted declaratory and injunctive relief in favor of the prisoner. The defendants appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that TDCJ's no-beard policy was not the least restrictive means of advancing the compelling government interest in controlling costs, and the no-beard policy was not the least restrictive means of advancing the compelling government interest in security. According to the court, although prison officials testified that there would be additional costs from allowing prisoners to wear quarter-inch beards for religious reasons due to the construction of barbershops, the purchase of barbering supplies, or the creation of new identification cards, almost all of that testimony was speculative, the officials admitted that no specific studies of costs had been done, and there was no evidence that TDCJ, which already imposed limits on hair length, would encounter greater or added difficulty if it enforced a one-quarter-inch as opposed to a clean-shaven rule. Although TDCJ presented evidence that allowing inmates to have beards hindered inmate identification, TDCJ allowed inmates to shave their heads, and there was testimony that shaved heads posed just as many identification problems as allowing prisoners to grow and shave beards. (Texas Department of Criminal Justice, McConnell Unit, Beeville, Texas)

U.S. Appeals Court
AUDIO COMMUNICATION

Goodman v. Kimbrough, 718 F.3d 1325 (11th Cir. 2013). The wife of a pretrial detainee who suffered from dementia and who was severely beaten by his cellmate filed a § 1983 action against jail officials in their individual capacities for alleged violation of the Due Process Clause by deliberate indifference to a substantial risk of harm to the detainee. The wife also asserted a supervisory liability claim against the sheriff in his official capacity and a state law claim for loss of support and consortium. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants. The wife appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that there was no evidence that jail officials were subjectively aware of a risk of serious harm to which the pretrial detainee was exposed from his severe beating by a cellmate, and that the officials deliberately disregarded that risk, as required to support the detainee's § 1983 claim of deliberate indifference in violation of the Due Process Clause. According to the court, the officers' failure to conduct cell checks and head counts and their deactivation of emergency call buttons constituted negligence but did not justify constitutional liability under § 1983. According to the court, jail officials' policy violations by failing to enter every cell in conducting head counts and in deactivating emergency call buttons did not constitute a custom so settled and permanent as to have the force of law. (Clayton County Jail, Georgia)

U.S. District Court
PUBLICATIONS
SECURITY PRACTICES

Gray v. Cannon, 974 F.Supp.2d 1150 (N.D.Ill. 2013). State inmates brought an action against prison officials, alleging that the officials' refusal to let them receive mail that included photographs depicting nudity and sexual activity violated the Free Speech Clause of the First Amendment, and that grievance procedures for challenging the refusals violated the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The district court granted the officials' motion for summary judgment. The court held that a state prison regulation preventing inmates from obtaining nude or sexually explicit photographs was reasonably related to legitimate penological interests, and thus did not violate the inmates' First Amendment rights. The court noted that: (1) the regulation was expressly aimed at protecting prison security; (2) the regulation permitted withholding reading materials only if it furthered interests in security, good order, or discipline, and there existed a valid and rational connection between the regulation and prison security; (3) the prison left open alternative means of exercising the restricted right by permitting inmates to receive a wide range of publications; (4) the restrictions fell within the broad limits of deference to prison officials regarding what was detrimental to security; and (5) the inmates did not point to an alternative that fully accommodated inmates' rights at a de minimus cost to valid penological interests. The court found that there was no evidence regarding how the state prison's grievance and appeal procedures operated, as required to support the inmates' claim that they were provided with insufficient opportunities to challenge prison's rejections of sexually explicit photographs and publications sent to them, in violation of due process. (Stateville Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
CHEMICAL AGENTS

Hannon v. Beard, 979 F.Supp.2d 136 (D.Mass. 2013). Twenty-seven state inmates filed a § 1983 action against the Massachusetts Department Of Correction (MDOC), UMass Correctional Health (UMCH), the governor, and prison officials, alleging violations of their right to be free of cruel and unusual punishment by exposing them to harmful environmental conditions, First Amendment rights by retaliating against them for filing grievances and law suits, fundamental right of access to courts, and due process and equal protection rights. The officials moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion, finding that the Eleventh Amendment barred claims against MDOC and UMCH, and that the inmates failed to state plausible Eighth Amendment claims and First Amendment retaliation claims. According to the court, the inmates' allegations that they were exposed to unsafe levels of toxins at a facility were not enough to show that the alleged deprivation was objectively serious, and thus were insufficient to state a plausible Eighth Amendment claim. The court noted that the inmates did not allege specific facts that would support a finding that environmental toxins were actually present, that the inmates were actually exposed to those substances, and that exposure caused injury. (UMass Correctional Health, and Massachusetts Dept. of Correction, Souza Baranowski Correctional Center)

U.S. Appeals Court
LOCKS
PRETRIAL DETAINEES
SAFETY
SECURITY PRACTICES

Junior v. Anderson, 724 F.3d 812 (7th Cir. 2013). A pretrial detainee brought a suit under § 1983 against a guard who allegedly failed to protect him from an attack by other inmates. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the guard, and the detainee appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The appeals court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the guard acted with a conscious disregard of a significant risk of violence to the detainee, when she noted that two cells in the corridor where she was posted were not securely locked, but only noted that this was a "security risk" in her log. The guard then let several of the inmates who were supposed to remain locked up out of their cells, let them congregate in a darkened corridor, and then left her post, so that no guard was present to observe more than 20 maximum-security prisoners milling about. The court found that the detainee was entitled to appointed counsel in his § 1983 suit against a prison guard. According to the court, although the case was not analytically complex, its sound resolution depended on evidence to which detainee in his distant lockup had no access, and the detainee needed to, but could not, depose the guard in order to explore the reason for her having left her post and other issues. (Cook County Jail, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
BOOKS
JEWELRY
RELIGIOUS ARTICLES
SAFETY
REGULATIONS
SECURITY PRACTICES

Kaufman v. Pugh, 733 F.3d 692 (7th Cir. 2013). A state prisoner brought an action against prison officials, challenging their refusal to permit a weekly atheist study group, their refusal to allow the prisoner to wear a "knowledge thought ring" that he regarded as a religious symbol, and their failure to make atheist books that he donated available in the prison library. The prisoner asserted claims under the Free Exercise Clause, the Establishment Clause, and the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA). The district court granted summary judgment to the prison officials. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, vacated in part, and remanded. The appeals court held that summary judgment was precluded by fact issue as to how many prisoners in the state prison would be interested in forming a weekly atheism study group.

The court found that refusal to allow the prisoner to wear a "knowledge thought ring" did not discriminate against atheism. The court noted that the prisoner conceded that the ring was an individualized symbol, thereby admitting that his inability to wear the ring did not impose a substantial burden on his ability to practice atheism. According to the court, the prison officials were entitled to draw a distinction between, on the one hand, religious emblems that were common to members of other umbrella religious groups, easy to recognize, and difficult to abuse as a gang symbol, and on the other hand, emblems that were unique to each prisoner and that posed a potential security risks.

According to the court, prison officials' refusal to allow the state prisoner to form a weekly atheism study group did not violate the prisoner's rights under the Free Exercise Clause or the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA), in the absence of evidence that the prisoner would be unable to practice atheism effectively without the benefit of a weekly study group. The court found that the alleged failure of state prison officials to make available in the prison library three used books on atheism that had been mailed to the prisoner, did not violate the prisoner's rights under the Free Exercise Clause and the RLUIPA, absent evidence of a substantial burden on the prisoner's ability to follow his atheistic beliefs. (Stanley Correctional Facility, Wisconsin)

U.S. District Court
STAFFING

Kelly v. Wengler, 979 F.Supp.2d 1104 (D.Idaho 2013). Prisoners brought a civil contempt action against a private prison contractor, alleging the contractor violated a settlement agreement that required it to comply with the staffing pattern specified in its contract with the Idaho Department of Correction. The district court found that the contractor was in civil contempt for violating the settlement agreement, that the contractor's non-compliance with staffing requirements were significant, and the contractor did not promptly take all reasonable steps to comply with settlement agreement. The court held that a two-year extension of the consent decree was a proper sanction for the contractor's civil contempt in willfully violating the settlement agreement, where the contractor's failure to comply with a key provision of the settlement agreement had lasted nearly as long as the duration of the agreement. According to the court, the use of an independent monitor to ensure the private prison contractor's compliance with the settlement agreement was an appropriate resolution, where such duty was most fairly handled by a monitor with a direct obligation to the district court and to the terms of the settlement agreement. The court noted that "…it is clear that there was a persistent failure to fill required mandatory positions, along with a pattern of CCA staff falsifying rosters to make it appear that all posts were filled." The state assumed operation of the facility in July 2014, changing the name to the Idaho State Correctional Center. (Corrections Corp. of America, Idaho Correctional Center)

U.S. Appeals Court
CONTRABAND
HAIR LENGTH
RELIGION
SAFETY REGULATIONS
SECURITY PRACTICES

Knight v. Thompson, 723 F.3d 1275 (11th Cir. 2013). Native American inmates brought an action against the Alabama Department of Corrections, challenging its short-hair policy under the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA). The district court entered judgment for the Department and the inmates appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the Department's short-hair policy for male inmates furthered compelling governmental interests in security, discipline, hygiene, and safety, as required to survive a challenge under RLUIPA by inmates who wished to wear their hair long in accordance with dictates of their Native American religion. The court noted that long hair was used to conceal weapons and contraband, it concealed inmates' fungus outbreaks, sores, cysts, and tumors, and it impeded the ability of prison staff to identify inmates. According to the court, allowing an exception for Native American inmates would not eliminate the Department's concerns, as inmates could manipulate searches of their own hair to conceal weapons, and it would do nothing to assuage the Department's concerns about hair-pulling during fights. The court held that the Department's short-hair policy, which applied to all male inmates without exception, did not discriminate on the basis of race or religion in violation of the Native American inmates' equal protection rights. (Alabama Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
BOOKS
CONTRABAND
PRETRIAL DETAINEES
RELIGIOUS ARTICLES
SAFETY REGULATIONS
SECURITY
RESTRICTIONS

Kramer v. Conway, 962 F.Supp.2d 1333 (N.D.Ga. 2013). A pretrial detainee at a county jail brought an action against the jail, the jail administrator, and a county sheriff, alleging that conditions of his confinement violated his right to practice his Orthodox Jewish faith, that the defendants violated his right to possess legal reference books, and that the defendants failed to accommodate his physical disabilities. The detainee moved for a preliminary and a permanent injunction and moved for leave to file a second amendment to his verified complaint. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court denied the motions in part and granted the motion in part. The court held that the pretrial detainee's allegation that the county jail denied him books needed to practice his Orthodox Jewish religious faith failed to establish a violation of the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA), absent evidence that the county jail received federal funds in connection with its policies limiting the number and type of books allowed in cells. The court held that the county jail's policy of limiting the number of religious books that the pretrial detainee, an Orthodox Jew, could keep in his cell, but providing him access to others that were not in his cell, was based on legitimate penological interests, and thus, did not violate the detainee's rights under the Free Exercise Clause. According to the court, a uniformly applied books-in-cell limitation was reasonable in a facility that housed 2,200 inmates, the limitation was applied in a neutral way and the expressive content of books was not considered, books in sufficient quantities could be used as weapons and presented fire and obstacle hazards, access to other books was made by exchanging out titles and by allowing the copying of parts or all of a text, and the detainee was not denied access to nine religious books he claimed were required in practicing his faith, but rather, argued only that access was required to be more convenient.

The court found that the jail's policy of prohibiting hard cover books in cells, including limiting religious texts to those that did not have hard covers, was based on legitimate penological interests, and thus, did not violate rights of the pretrial detainee, an Orthodox Jew, under the Free Exercise Clause. The court noted that evidence at hearing on the detainee's motion for injunctive relief showed that hardcover books posed safety and security risks because hard covers could be used to conceal contraband and because of their potential use as weapons, the policy was applied in a neutral way, and the expressive content of books was not considered. The court found that the jail's policy of limiting package mail to four pounds was based on legitimate penological interests, and thus, did not violate rights as applied to the pretrial detainee, an Orthodox Jew, under the Free Exercise Clause when the jail rejected one of detainee's packages that contained more than four pounds of books. The court noted that the jail received a large volume of mail and other items each day, all of which had to be searched for contraband and threats their contents could pose to the safety and security of inmates and jail officials, the policy was applied in a neutral way, and the expressive content of books was not considered. The court held that the jail's policy that limited the number and type of books allowed in a cell did not violate the pretrial detainee's Due Process rights, where there was no evidence that the policy was intended to punish the detainee, the jail's policies prohibiting hard cover books and limiting the number of books allowed in a cell were reasonably related to legitimate penological interests, and the jail gave the detainee substantial access to legal materials by increasing the time he was allowed in the library and liberally allowing him to copy legal materials to keep in his cell. The court held that the jail, the jail administrator, and the county sheriff's denial of a typewriter in the pretrial detainee's cell to accommodate his alleged handwriting disability did not violate the detainee's rights under Title II of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA). The court noted that the detainee was able to write by hand, although he stated he experienced pain when doing so. According to the court, if the detainee chose to avoid writing by hand he had substantial access to a typewriter in the jail's law library, there was no permanent harm from the handwriting he performed, there was no evidence the detainee was not able to adequately communicate with lawyers and jail officials without a typewriter in his cell, and the accommodation of an in-cell typewriter would impose an undue burden on jail personnel because metal and moving parts of typewriter could be used as weapons. (Gwinnett County Jail, Georgia)

U.S. Appeals Court
HAIR LENGTH
RELIGION

Lewis v. Sternes, 712 F.3d 1083 (7th Cir. 2013). A state prisoner brought an action against prison officials under § 1983 and the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA), alleging removal of his dreadlocks violated his religious rights and denied him equal protection. The district court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that there was no evidence that the prison did not need to regulate hair length or hairstyle, or that the need was not great enough to warrant interference with the inmate's religious observance. (Dixon Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
RESTRAINTS
USE OF FORCE

Maraj v. Massachusetts, 953 F.Supp.2d 325 (D.Mass. 2013). The estate of a deceased inmate brought a § 1983 excessive-force action against county corrections officers and others, alleging that they used excessive force and were deliberately indifferent to the inmate's medical needs, in violation of the Constitution. The district court partially granted the defendants' motions to dismiss and the defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The defendants allegedly caused the inmate's death by using an emergency restraint belt and delaying medical treatment, but a prison medical examiner determined that the inmate had a pre-existing heart condition that ultimately led to the inmate's cardiac arrest, and the manner of death could not be determined. (Suffolk County House of Correction, Massachusetts)

U.S. Appeals Court
CLOTHING
PUBLICATIONS
SEARCHES

Mays v. Springborn, 719 F.3d 631 (7th Cir. 2013). A former state prisoner brought an action against prison officials, asserting claims based on strip searches at prisons and alleging retaliation for his complaints about the searches, denial of his request for a dietary supplements which he considered to be religious necessities, inadequacy of his diet, failure to issue certain winter clothing items, and censorship of pages in a magazine mailed to him. The district granted summary judgment in favor of the officials on the claims about prison food and clothing and granted the officials judgment as a matter of law on the claims about strip searches, retaliation, and censorship. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, vacated the judgment with respect to the strip searches, and remanded. On remand, the district court entered judgment, upon a jury verdict, in favor of the officials as to the strip search claims, and the prisoner again appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The appeals court held that: (1) even if there was a valid penological reason for the strip searches conducted on a prisoner, the manner in which the searches were conducted was itself required to pass constitutional muster, and (2) a jury instruction requiring the prisoner to negate the possibility that strip searches would have occurred even if there had been no retaliatory motive was plain error. (Stateville Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
PUBLICATIONS

Prison Legal News v. Babeu, 933 F.Supp.2d 1188 (D.Ariz. 2013). A non-profit organization that produced and distributed a monthly journal and books to inmates brought an action against county jail officers and mailroom employees, alleging that the defendants violated its First Amendment and due process rights by failing to deliver its materials to its subscribers at the jail. The parties cross-moved for partial summary judgment. The court granted the motions in part, denied in part, and deferred in part. The court held that the jail's policy limiting incoming inmate correspondence to one-page and postcards did not violate the First Amendment, where there was an apparent commonsense connection between the jail's goal of reducing contraband and limiting the number of pages a particular piece of correspondence contained, and sufficient alternative avenues of communication remained open for publishers who wished to communicate with inmates at the jail. But the court held that the jail's failure to give the non-profit organization notice and the opportunity to appeal the jail's refusal to deliver its materials to inmates violated the organization's procedural due process rights. The court ruled that the blanket ban on newspapers and magazines violated clearly established law, and therefore neither the county jail mailroom employees nor their supervisors were entitled to qualified immunity from the § 1983 First Amendment claim arising from employees' failure to deliver the organization's materials to inmates. According to the court, the law was clear that blanket bans on newspapers and magazines in prisons violated the First Amendment, and it was objectively unreasonable for the employees to throw away mail, or refuse to deliver it, based upon a perceived blanket ban on newspapers and magazines. Because the county jail mailroom uniformly enforced the unconstitutional county policy and allowed books from only four publishers, the county was subject to liability for First Amendment violations in § 1983 action. The court held that there was no evidence that mailroom employees, their supervisors, or command staff at the county jail were motivated by evil motive or intent when they violated the non-profit publisher's First Amendment and due process rights by discarding publisher's materials without providing the publisher opportunity to contest or appeal the non-deliverability decision, or that those individuals' unconstitutional actions involved reckless or callous indifference to the publisher's federally protected rights, as would support an award of punitive damages against the individuals in the publisher's § 1983 action. (Pinal County Jail, Arizona)

U.S. District Court
PUBLICATIONS

Prison Legal News v. Columbia County, 942 F.Supp.2d 1068 (D.Or. 2013). A publisher filed a § 1983 action alleging that a county and its officials violated the First Amendment by rejecting dozens of its publications and letters mailed to inmates incarcerated in its jail and violated the Fourteenth Amendment by failing to provide it or the inmates with the notice of, and opportunity to, appeal the jail's rejection of its publications and letters. A bench trial was held, resulting in a judgment for the publisher. The court held that: (1) the policy prohibiting inmates from receiving mail that was not on a postcard violated the First Amendment; (2) the county had a policy of prohibiting inmates from receiving magazines; (3) the county failed to provide adequate notice of withholding of incoming mail by jail authorities; (4) entry of a permanent injunction prohibiting officials from enforcing the postcard-only policy was warranted; and (5) a permanent injunction prohibiting officials from enforcing the prohibition against magazines was not warranted. (Columbia County Jail, Oregon)

U.S. District Court
PROTECTION
SAFETY
SEGREGATION
USE OF FORCE

Randle v. Alexander, 960 F.Supp.2d 457 (S.D.N.Y. 2013). An African-American state inmate with a history of serious mental illness brought an action against officials of the New York State Department of Corrections and Community Supervision (DOCCS), correctional officers, and mental health personnel, alleging under § 1983 that the defendants were deliberately indifferent to his serious medical needs and that he was retaliated against, in violation of his First Amendment rights, among other claims. The defendants moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the correctional officers' alleged actions in forcing the inmate to fight a fellow inmate, and threatening to beat the inmate with a baton and engage in a joint cover-up if the two inmates did not "finish" their fight within a specified area of the prison, which ultimately resulted in the fellow inmate sustaining fatal injuries in the fight, had no legitimate penological purpose, and was far afield of the species of force employed to restore or maintain discipline. The court held that the alleged actions reflected indifference to inmate safety, if not malice toward the inmate, as supported the inmate's § 1983 Eighth Amendment failure to protect claim. According to the court, the alleged forced fight between the inmate and a fellow inmate, orchestrated, condoned, and covered up by correctional officers was an objectively serious violation of the inmate's Eighth Amendment right to reasonably safe conditions of confinement, and the intent evinced by such activity was, at the very least, one of indifference to inmate safety, supporting the inmate's § 1983 Eighth Amendment conditions of confinement claim against the officers.

The court held that the African-American state inmate's allegations in his complaint that a correctional officer arranged inmates in his company so that white inmates were close to officers' posts, whereas black inmates were placed further away, that white inmates were given superior jobs, that the officer's efforts in forcing a fight between the inmate and a fellow inmate were done purposefully for his amusement because both inmates were black, and that the officer's treatment of the inmate and other black inmates was motivated by his intent to discriminate on the basis of race and malicious intent to injure inmates, stated a § 1983 equal protection claim against the officer.

The court ruled that the correctional officers were not entitled to qualified immunity from the inmate's § 1983 Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment claims because inmates had a clearly established right to remain incarcerated in reasonably safe conditions, and it was objectively unreasonable to threaten inmates until they agreed to fight each other in front of prison officials. The court found that the inmate stated an Eighth Amendment inadequate medical care claim against mental health personnel. The inmate alleged that he had a history of serious mental illness, that his symptoms increased following a forced fight with a fellow inmate, that the inmate attempted suicide on three occasions, two of which required his hospitalization, that prison mental health personnel evidenced deliberate indifference to his medical needs, as they recklessly disregarded the risk the inmate faced as result of special housing unit (SHU) confinement, and that the inmate was confined to SHU despite a recommendation that he be placed in a less-restrictive location. (Green Haven Corr'l. Facility, Protective Custody Unit, N.Y. State Department of Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
TRANSPORTATION
RESTRAINTS
SAFETY

Rogers v. Boatright, 709 F.3d 403 (5th Cir. 2013). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against corrections officers and their supervisor, alleging that he was seriously injured when the prison van in which he was riding stopped abruptly, and that he was provided with inadequate and untimely medical care for his injuries. The district court dismissed the suit. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The appeals court held that the prisoner stated a non-frivolous claim that an officer acted with deliberate indifference to his safety in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The prisoner alleged that he sustained a serious injury while being transported in a prison van because a corrections officer operated the van recklessly and had to brake suddenly to avoid hitting another vehicle, that he was shackled in leg irons and handcuffs and was not provided with a seatbelt and thus could not protect himself when the prison van stopped abruptly, and that the officer had told another officer that other inmates similarly had been injured the prior week and during other incidents. A dissenting appeals judge asserted that "…there is no constitutional requirement that inmates be buckled with seatbelts during transportation. Nearly all courts have rejected such claims, because the use of seatbelts on shackled prisoners presents inevitable, non-trivial security concerns for other passengers and the guards." The appeals court held that the corrections officers transporting the prisoner to a hospital in a prison van did not show deliberate indifference to the prisoner's serious medical needs, in violation of the Eighth Amendment, when, after the prisoner was injured, the officers proceeded to the hospital, had the prisoner checked by a physician, but then failed to take the prisoner to the emergency room for treatment of his bleeding wounds as that physician had directed, but instead brought the prisoner to the prison's medical facility, where he was treated some five hours later. (Eastham Unit of the Texas Department of Criminal Justice, Correctional Institutions Division)

U.S. District Court
SAFETY REGULATIONS
SECURITY
RESTRICTIONS
SEGREGATION
TELEPHONE CALLS
VISITS
VIDEO
SURVEILLANCE

Royer v. Federal Bureau of Prisons, 933 F.Supp.2d 170 (D.D.C. 2013). A federal prisoner brought an action against Bureau of Prisoners (BOP), alleging classification as a "terrorist inmate" resulted in violations of the Privacy Act and the First and Fifth Amendments. The BOP moved for summary judgment and to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that BOP rules prohibiting contact visits and limiting noncontact visits and telephone time for federal inmates labeled as "terrorist inmates", more than other inmates, had a rational connection to a legitimate government interest, for the purpose of the inmate's action alleging the rules violated his First Amendment rights of speech and association. According to the court, the prison had an interest in monitoring the inmate's communications and the prison isolated inmates who could pose a threat to others or to the orderly operation of the institution. The court noted that the rules did not preclude the inmate from using alternative means to communicate with his family, where the inmate could send letters, the telephone was available to him, and he could send messages through others allowed to visit. The court found that the inmate's assertions that the prison already had multiple cameras and hypersensitive microphones, and that officers strip searched inmates before and after contact visits, did not establish ready alternatives to a prohibition on contact visits for the inmate and limits on phone usage and noncontact visits due to being labeled as a "terrorist inmate." The court noted that increasing the number of inmates subject to strip searches increased the cost of visitation, and microphones and cameras did not obviate all security concerns that arose from contact visits, such as covert notes or hand signals. The court held that the inmate's allegations that he was segregated from the prison's general population for over six years, that he was subject to restrictions on recreational, religious, and educational opportunities available to other inmates, that contact with his family was limited to one 15 minute phone call per week during business hours when his children were in school, and that he was limited to two 2-hour noncontact visits per month, were sufficient to plead harsh and atypical conditions, as required for his Fifth Amendment procedural due process claim. According to the court, the inmate's allegations that he was taken from his cell without warning, that he was only provided an administrative detention order that stated he was being moved due to his classification, that he was eventually told he was classified as a "terrorist inmate," that such classification imposed greater restrictions upon his confinement, and that he was never provided with a hearing, notice of criteria for release from conditions, or notice of a projected date for release from conditions were sufficient to plead denial of due process, as required for his claim alleging violations of the Fifth Amendment procedural due process. (Special Housing Units at FCI Allenwood and USP Lewisburg, CMU at FCI Terre Haute, SHU at FCI Greenville, Supermax facility at Florence, Colorado, and CMU at USP Marion)

U.S. Appeals Court
CLASSIFICATION
SEPARATION

Smith v. Sangamon County Sheriff's Dept., 715 F.3d 188 (7th Cir. 2013). A pretrial detainee filed suit under § 1983 against a sheriff's department to recover for injuries sustained when he was severely beaten by another inmate housed in a maximum-security cellblock. The district court entered summary judgment for the sheriff's department, and the detainee appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the detainee failed to establish that the security classification policy used by the sheriff's department to assign inmates to cellblocks within the jail was deliberately indifferent to inmate safety in violation of his due-process rights. The court noted that: (1) the detainee presented no evidence that the classification policy created a serious risk of physical harm to inmates, much less that the sheriff's department knew of it and did nothing; (2) the attack by the detainee's cellmate was not enough to establish that the policy itself systematically exposed inmates like the detainee to a serious risk of harm; and (3) it was unclear that a policy strictly segregating those accused of nonviolent crimes from those accused of violent crimes would do a better job of ensuring inmate safety than the multiple-factor classification system used by the sheriff's department. The detainee claimed that the Department's approach to classifying inmates for cellblock placement ignored serious risks to inmate safety because the security classification policy fails to separate "violent" from "nonviolent" inmates and thus fails to protect peaceful inmates from attacks by inmates with assaultive tendencies. The appeals court described the classification practices: "A classification officer interviews each new detainee and reviews a range of information, including the inmate's age, gender, gang affiliation, medical concerns, current charge, criminal history, behavioral and disciplinary history within the jail, and any holds due to parole violations. Pursuant to standards recommended by the American Correctional Association, the classification policy assigns point values within these categories, with higher point values corresponding to lower security risks." (Sangamon County Detention Facility, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
LOCK DOWN

Turley v. Rednour, 729 F.3d 645 (7th Cir. 2013). An Illinois prisoner serving a life sentence brought a § 1983 action against prison officials, alleging that the prisoner and other inmates classified as low-aggression offenders in the prisoner's cellhouse were subject to lockdowns for more than 50 percent of the days in a 33-month period. The district court dismissed the complaint at the screening stage for prisoner civil actions and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part and reversed in part. The appeals court held that the prisoner had exhausted his administrative remedies. The court found that frequent unit-wide prison lockdowns for substantial periods of time deprived him of exercise and caused him various health issues, such as irritable bowel syndrome, severe stress, headaches, and tinnitus, stated a claim for an Eighth Amendment violation. According to the court, the prisoner sufficiently alleged prison officials' deliberate indifference to physical and psychological injuries, as required to state a claim for an Eighth Amendment violation, based on excessive prison lockdowns. The court noted that the prisoner alleged that he had filed multiple grievances about prison conditions, including a grievance specifically challenging small cells, and that the prison was the subject of numerous past lawsuits, including one specifically ordering a remedial plan for overcrowding, small cells, and lack of adequate medical care and hygiene. (Menard Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
CONTRABAND
SAFETY
SECURITY PRACTICES

U.S. Dept. of Justice Federal Bureau of Prisons Federal Correctional Complex Coleman, Fla. v. Federal Labor Relations Authority 737 F.3d 779 (D.C.Cir. 2013). The Federal Bureau of Prisons (BOP) petitioned for review, and the BOP and the Federal Labor Relations Authority (FLRA) cross-applied for enforcement of FLRA's order stating that the BOP was required to bargain with a labor union over proposals relating to the BOP's use of metal detectors at a high security prison. The BOP moved to dismiss on the grounds of mootness. The appeals court denied the motion, granted a motion to vacate in part, and granted a motion to enforce, and remanded. The court held that the decision to use the federal prison's compound metal detectors to screen only those inmates suspected of carrying contraband did not render moot the FLRA decision stating that the BOP was required to bargain with the employee union over proposals relating to safety issues arising out of the prison's use of metal detectors, absent a showing that there was no reasonable expectation that the union's safety concerns would not recur. The court found that the FLRA's determination that the BOP was required, under the Federal Service Labor-Management Relations Act (FSLMRA), to bargain with the labor union over a proposal that prison management have inmates turn in all watches that did not clear the compound metal detector, treat such watches as contraband, and assure that watches sold in the prison store would not set off the metal detectors, in order to avoid bottlenecks of inmates at the entrance to the compound/detector area, was eminently reasonable and supported by the record. According to the court, the proposal was sufficiently tailored to target employees likely to be harmed by the installation of outdoor metal detectors, was intended to reduce nuisance alarms triggered by prohibited watches, thereby moving inmates through the compound-detector bottlenecks more quickly, and would not excessively interfere with the BOP's management rights.

The court found that the FLRA determination that the labor union's proposal requiring construction of a block and mortar officer's station near one of the prison's two metal detectors was non-negotiable as a whole under FSLMRA. (Federal Bureau of Prisons Federal Correctional Complex Coleman, Florida)

U.S. Appeals Court
CLEANING SUPPLIES
CROWDING
SAFETY

Walker v. Schult, 717 F.3d 119 (2nd Cir. 2013). An inmate, proceeding pro se and in forma pauperis, brought a § 1983 action against a warden and various other prison officials and employees, alleging violations of the Eighth Amendment. The district court granted the defendants' motion to dismiss. The inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, vacated in part, and remanded. The court held that the prisoner's allegations were sufficient to plead that he was deprived of the minimal civilized measure of life's necessities and was subjected to unreasonable health and safety risks, as required to state a § 1983 claims against prison officials for violations of the Eighth Amendment. The prisoner alleged that: (1) for approximately 28 months he was confined in a cell with five other men with inadequate space and ventilation; (2) the heat was stifling in the summer and it was freezing in the winter; (3) urine and feces splattered the floor; (4) there were insufficient cleaning supplies; (5) the mattress was too narrow for him to lie on flat; and (6) noisy and crowded conditions made sleep difficult and created a constant risk of violence. The court also found that the prisoner's allegations were sufficient to plead that prison officials knew of and disregarded excessive risks to his health and safety, as required to find that the officials were deliberately indifferent. The prisoner alleged that officials knew of overcrowding in his cell, that he spoke with some officials about the conditions, that officials were aware noise was loud and constant, that they were aware of temperature issues, that the prisoner informed officials that his bed was too narrow, that one official failed to issue cleaning supplies, and that conditions did not change despite his complaints. (Federal Correctional Institution, Ray Brook, New York)

2014

U.S. Appeals Court
EXPOSURE TO CHEMICALS

Cantley v. West Virginia Regional Jail and Correctional Facility Authority, 771 F.3d 201 (4th Cir. 2014). Two arrestees brought a § 1983 action for damages and declaratory and injunctive relief against a regional jail authority and three of its former or current executive directors, challenging the constitutionality of visual strip searches and delousing of the arrestees. The district court granted summary judgment to the defendants. An arrestee appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that: (1) the post-arraignment visual strip search of one arrestee did not violate the Fourth Amendment; (2) the pre-arraignment visual strip search of the other arrestee did not violate a clearly established right where the arrestee was strip-searched in a private room, and he was to be held until the next morning in a holding cell where he might interact with up to 15 other arrestees; (3) delousing of the arrestees did not violate a clearly established right; and (4) declaratory and injunctive relief would be premature. The court noted that the delousing was done in a private room with only one officer, who was of the same sex as the arrestees, and it did not entail the officer himself touching either arrestee. (West Virginia Regional Jail and Correctional Facility Authority)

U.S. Appeals Court
GANGS
SEX OFFENDER

Danser v. Stansberry, 772 F.3d 340 (4th Cir. 2014). A federal inmate who was attacked in a recreation cage brought a Bivens action alleging that officials were deliberately indifferent to his safety. The district court denied the officials' motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity. The officials appealed. The appeals court vacated and remanded with instructions. The court held that a corrections officer did not disregard an excessive risk to the safety of the inmate in violation of the Eighth Amendment when he placed the inmate, a convicted sex offender, in a recreation cage with a fellow inmate, a violent gang member, and left the recreation area unsupervised, during which time the gang member attacked the inmate. According to the court, the officer was not aware that the inmate was a sex offender or that he was required to check prison databases in which that information was contained, there were no orders issued requiring that the inmate and gang member be separated from each other, and the officer's dereliction of duty in leaving the recreation area did not constitute anything other than negligence. (Federal Correctional Institution, Butner, North Carolina)

U.S. District Court
VIDEO SURVEILLANCE

Dilworth v. Goldberg, 3 F.Supp.3d 198 (S.D.N.Y. 2014). In a county jail detainees' action against a county, the detainees moved for spoliation sanctions based on the county's alleged failure to preserve capital project plans that allegedly showed surveillance camera locations, and videos from a surveillance camera in the housing area where one detainee was allegedly beaten. “Spoliation” is the destruction or significant alteration of evidence, or the failure to preserve property for another's use as evidence in pending or reasonably foreseeable litigation. The district court denied the motion, finding that the detainees failed to show that the capital project plans existed, and failed to show that a surveillance camera in the housing area existed. The court noted that ambiguous statements made by a jail official that he was not sure if such plans existed but that they might indicate camera locations, and a speculative expert opinion stating that it was customary for a system installer to provide an “as built” floor plan detailing camera placement, were insufficient to show that such plans in fact existed for the jail. (Westchester County Department of Corrections, New York)

U.S. District Court
LOCKS
SECURITY PRCTICES

Freeland v. Ballard, 6 F.Supp.3d 683 (S.D.W.Va. 2014). A prisoner brought an action against prison officials, alleging the officials were deliberately indifferent to serious security breaches and failed to protect him from another inmate who escaped a segregation cell and attacked him with a piece of metal. The officials moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the prisoner's allegation that there was at least one prior incident when an inmate repeatedly beat on his door until it became unsecured and permitted the inmate to escape from the cell and assault another prisoner, did not give rise to a plausible claim that prison officials had actual knowledge of a substantial risk of harm to the prisoner and disregarded that risk in violation of the Eighth Amendment. But the court found that the prisoner's allegations, that an inmate escaped a segregation cell and attacked prisoner with a piece of metal but prison officials did nothing to intervene to stop the attack when they had the opportunity to do so, and that the officials were aware of prior incidents of inmates beating their doors open and attacking other inmates, were sufficient to state an Eighth Amendment claim. (Mount Olive Corr'l. Complex, W. V.)

U.S. Appeals Court
CLASSIFICATION
GANGS
SEGREGATION
TRANSFER

Griffin v. Gomez, 741 F.3d 10 (9th Cir. 2014). A state inmate filed a petition for a writ of habeas corpus challenging his placement in a security housing unit (SHU). After the writ was issued, the district court ordered the state to release the inmate from segregated housing conditions, and the state appealed. The appeals court vacated, reversed, and remanded. The appeals court held that the district court abused its discretion by finding that the state had violated its order issuing a writ of habeas corpus requiring the state to release the inmate from the facility's security housing unit (SHU). According to the court, the state subsequently placed the inmate in the facility's administrative segregation unit (ASU) and then in another facility's SHU. The court noted that the inmate had been released into federal custody before the order was issued, his placement in ASU after he was released from federal custody pending evaluation of his gang status was standard procedure, and the inmate was validated as an active gang member and placed in other SHU. According to the court, the district court improperly impeded state prison management. (Pelican Bay State Prison, California)

U.S. Appeals Court
PROTECTION
SAFETY
SECURITY PRACTICES
WEAPON

Harrison v. Culliver, 746 F.3d 1288 (11th Cir. 2014). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against prison officials, relating to an inmate-on-inmate assault with a box cutter, and asserting an Eighth Amendment violation based on deliberate indifference to a substantial risk of serious harm. The district court granted summary judgment to the prison officials and denied the prisoner's motion to proceed in forma pauperis. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that: (1) past incidents of inmate-on-inmate violence involving weapons did not constitute a substantial risk of serious harm; (2) the prison's policies for monitoring a back hallway in which the prisoner was attacked did not create a substantial risk of serious harm; (3) lack of oversight of the prison's hobby craft shop did not create a substantial risk of serious harm; and (4) prison officials were not deliberately indifferent with respect to oversight of the hobby shop. (W.C. Holman Correctional Facility, Alabama)

U.S. Appeals Court
ITEMS PERMITTED

Johnson v. Conner, 754 F.3d 918 (11th Cir. 2014). The mother and personal representative of a mentally ill inmate who committed suicide by hanging himself with bed sheet while in custody at a county jail filed suit against corrections personnel working at the jail at the time of the suicide, as well as various county entities. The mother alleged that jailers were responsible for administering her son's medication daily, and failed to do so, that her son had previously attempted to commit suicide with a bed sheet while incarcerated, and that the jailers failed to take appropriate precautions with her son following that suicide attempt. The district court denied immunity to the jailers and the jailers appealed. The appeals court certified questions to the Alabama Supreme Court, which the Supreme Court declined to answer. The appeals court held that the statute extending immunity to county jailers did not apply retroactively to conduct which occurred prior to its enactment. (Barbour County Jail, Alabama)

U.S. Appeals Court
LOCKS

Lakin v. Barnhart, 758 F.3d 66 (1st Cir. 2014). State inmates filed § 1983 actions alleging that prison officials acted with deliberate indifference to a substantial risk that inmates would use padlocks issued to them by the prison to assault fellow inmates, in violation of the Eighth Amendment and the Maine Civil Rights Act. The district court entered summary judgment in the officials' favor, and the inmates appealed. The appeals were consolidated, and the appeals court affirmed. The court held that the inmates did not face a substantial risk of being assaulted with padlocks by their fellow inmates, and thus the prison officials did not violate the Eighth Amendment by failing to discontinue the practice of providing padlocks to inmates to secure their personal items, where annual occurrences of padlock assaults at the prison had generally been few, both in absolute number and as a percentage of total inmate violence. (Maine State Prison)

U.S. District Court
LOCK DOWN

Little v. Municipal Corp., 51 F.Supp3d 473 (S.D.N.Y. 2014). State inmates brought a § 1983 action against a city and city department of correction officials, alleging Eighth Amendment and due process violations related to conditions of their confinement and incidents that occurred while they were confined. The defendants moved to dismiss for failure to state a claim. The district court granted the motion, finding that: (1) the inmates failed to state a municipal liability claim; (2) locking the inmates in cells that were flooding with sewage was not a sufficiently serious deprivation so as to violate the Eighth Amendment; (3) the inmates failed to state an Eighth Amendment claim based on the deprivation of laundry services; (4) the inmates failed to state that officials were deliberately indifferent to their conditions of confinement; (5) the inmates' administrative classification did not implicate their liberty interests protected by due process; and (6) cell searches did not rise to the level of an Eighth Amendment violation. The court noted that the cells flooded with sewage for up to eight-and-a-half hours, during which they periodically lacked outdoor recreation and food, was undeniably unpleasant, but it was not a significantly serious deprivation so as to violate the inmates' Eighth Amendment rights. According to the court, there was no constitutional right to outdoor recreation, and the inmates were not denied food entirely, but rather, were not allowed to eat during periods of lockdown. (N.Y. City Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
RESTRAINTS

Reid v. Donelan, 2 F.Supp.3d 38 (D.Mass. 2014). Following the grant of a detainee's individual petition for habeas corpus, and the grant of the detainee's motion for class certification, the detainee brought a class action against, among others, officials of Immigration & Customs Enforcement (ICE), challenging the detention of individuals who were held in immigration detention within the Commonwealth of Massachusetts for over six months and were not provided with an individualized bond hearing. The detainee also moved, on his own behalf, for a permanent injunction prohibiting the defendants from shackling him during immigration proceedings absent an individualized determination that such restraint was necessary. The defendants cross-moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the defendants' motion. The court held that an individual assessment is required before a detainee may be shackled during immigration proceedings, but that the individual assessment performed by ICE satisfied the detainee's procedural due process rights, such that an assessment by an independent Immigration Judge was unnecessary in the detainee's case. The court denied the motion for an injunction, finding that the detainee would not suffer irreparable harm absent a permanent injunction. The court noted that the detainee had an interest in preservation of his dignity, but ICE had safety concerns about his immigration proceedings, including the logistical issues of escorting the detainee through multiple floors and public hallways, and an Immigration Judge would be unlikely to overturn a decision by ICE to shackle the detainee, given the detainee's extensive criminal history. (Immigration and Customs Enforcement, Massachusetts)

U.S. Appeals Court
PRETRIAL DETAINEES
PROTECTION
SAFETY REGULATIONS
USE OF FORCE
RESTRAINTS

Shreve v. Franklin County, Ohio, 743 F.3d 126 (6th Cir. 2014). A detainee brought an action against a county, its sheriff, and sheriff's deputies, alleging that the deputies used excessive force against him when they subdued him with a stun gun while he was in custody. The district court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment. The detainee appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the sheriff's deputies did not act with deliberate indifference towards the detainee's federally protected rights when they subdued the detainee with a stun gun while he was in custody, and therefore the deputies did not use excessive force against the detainee under the Fourteenth Amendment. According to the court: (1) the deputies tried to handcuff the detainee several times before using the stun gun, showing that they sought to minimize the stun gun's use; (2) the deputies also warned the detainee that the stun gun would hurt and that he did not want to have the gun used on him, which showed that they were trying to avoid unnecessary harm; and (3) the deputies faced an ongoing danger with the detainee thrashing about on the cell floor with a loose handcuff, as the deputies had been trained never to lose control of an inmate with a loose handcuff because it could be used as a weapon. The court held that the incident, in which the detainee lunged towards a sheriff's deputy with his hands raised after a hospital examination, was a rapidly evolving, fluid, and dangerous predicament which precluded the luxury of a calm and reflective pre-response deliberation, and therefore the detainee was required to show that the deputy's actions involved force employed maliciously and sadistically for the very purpose of causing harm, rather than in a good faith effort to maintain or restore discipline, in order to establish the use of excessive force under the Fourteenth Amendment. The court noted that the detainee lunged toward the deputy after asking the deputy "Do you want a piece of me?" and the deputy explained that he had "no way of retreating" because of the cramped quarters and the detainee's position over him while standing on the hospital bed. (Franklin County Corrections Center II, Ohio)

U.S. District Court
RELIGIOUS GROUPS

Thompson v. Smeal, 54 F.Supp.3d 339 (M.D.Pa. 2014). A state prisoner brought a case against prison officials, alleging that denial of his request that Christian inmates be granted communal feasts on Christmas and Easter violated his religious and equal protection rights, and violated the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA). The district court granted the officials' motion for summary judgment and the inmate appealed. The appeals court vacated and remanded. On remand, the officials again moved for summary judgment, and the inmate moved for partial summary judgment. The district court denied the motions. The court held that summary judgment on the prisoner's First Amendment claim was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to: (1) whether the prison's policy of refusing to provide Christmas and Easter communal meals for Christians only, with a group prayer over the food, was legitimately and neutrally applied; (2) whether the prison's penological interests were served by allowing some religious meals and not others; and (3) whether there were alternative means of exercising the prisoner's right to free religious expression. According to the court, summary judgment on the RLUIPA claim was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether denying communal meals to Christian inmates at the state prison was the least restrictive means to achieve the prison's alleged compelling interests of security, space limitations, and food safety concerns. (State Correctional Institution in Camp Hill, Pennsylvania)

U.S. District Court
CLASSIFICATION
GANGS
PROTECTION

Thornton v. Jackson, 998 F.Supp.2d 1365 (N.D.Ga. 2014). An inmate and his wife brought a § 1983 action against various prison employees and officials, alleging violations of the Eighth Amendment, as well as negligence and intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED). The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The court held that the inmate, who was housed at the prison as a visiting-inmate while testifying against another member of the inmate's gang, was not incarcerated under conditions posing a substantial risk of harm, as required to establish the objective requirement for his § 1983 claim against various prison officials and employees. The inmate alleged violation of the Eighth Amendment after he was assaulted by three other inmates. The inmate claimed that his different color jumpsuit identified him as snitch and as a target for violence. The court noted that the prison's inmates did not have a history of attacking visiting inmates, the prison had an order requiring the inmate be kept separate from one other inmate, but did not require protective custody or isolation, the inmate did not have problems with anybody for seven days, and the inmate saw some other inmates talking and reported that he suspected that they were talking about him, but he did not hear what they were saying. (Fulton County Jail, Atlanta)

U.S. District Court
TRANSPORTATION

Torres v. Amato, 22 F.Supp.3d 166 (N.D.N.Y. 2014). The administrator of a pretrial detainee's estate brought a § 1983 action against corrections officers, a sheriff, government officials, and a county, alleging deliberate indifference to the serious risk of harm in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment and various state claims. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court denied the motion. The court held that: (1) disputes of material fact as to whether the door to a transport van was improperly latched or the officer was operating the van in a reckless manner precluded summary judgment on the deliberate indifference claim against the officers; (2) a dispute of material fact as to the personal involvement of government officials in the alleged conduct precluded summary judgment on deliberate indifference claim against the officials and the county; and (3) the defendants were not entitled to qualified immunity from the § 1983 claim. The court noted that the detainee's right to be free from deliberate indifference to a substantial risk of harm was clearly established at the time the detainee suffered fatal injuries after falling out of transport van driven by corrections officers, and thus, officers and government officials were not entitled to qualified immunity from the § 1983 claim of deliberate indifference to a substantial risk of harm in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. (Montgomery County Sheriff's Department, New York)

U.S. District Court
WHEELCHAIR
TRANSPORTATION

Turner v. Mull, 997 F.Supp.2d 985 (E.D.Mo. 2014). An inmate, who suffered from a demyelinating neurological disorder of unknown etiology, brought an action against a correctional officer, a warden, a transportation officer, and a health services administrator, alleging violations of the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments, the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), and the Rehabilitation Act. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The district court held that: (1) the prison's policy that inmates were not permitted to be transported in a handicapped-accessible van unless they appeared at the pickup area in a wheelchair did not violate the inmate's rights; (2) the warden failing to take action in response to letters by the inmate was not deliberate indifference; (3) a correctional officer and a transportation officer who did not transport the inmate in a handicapped-accessible van were not deliberately indifferent; (4) a supervisor was not deliberately indifferent; (5) the alleged exposure to urine and vomit during a van ride did not violate the Eighth Amendment; (6) the prison did not discriminate against inmate based on his disability by not transporting the inmate in a handicapped-accessible vehicle; and (7) the administrator did not discriminate against the inmate. (Eastern Reception Diagnostic Correctional Center, Missouri)

U.S. Appeals Court
ESCAPE

U.S. v. Batts, 758 F.3d 915 (8th Cir. 2014). A defendant pleaded guilty in the district court to escape of a prisoner in custody. He appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the prison camp from which the defendant walked away was not a non-secure facility, as required in order to make the defendant eligible for a sentence reduction on such basis at sentencing. (Federal Correctional Institution, Forrest City, Arkansas)

U.S. District Court
RELIGIOUS SERVICES
SECURITY PRACTICES

Walker v. Artus, 998 F.Supp.2d 18 N.D.N.Y. 2014). A Muslim inmate housed in a state prison special housing unit (SHU) brought a § 1983 action alleging that state prison officials deprived him of his rights in violation of the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA) and the Free Exercise Clause of the First Amendment. The officials moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The court held that denial of the inmate's requests to participate in congregate religious services by audio or video feed was reasonably related to legitimate security and cost concerns, and the inmate had adequate means to exercise his burdened right, including weekly visits from an Imam, and thus denial of the inmate's requests did not violate the inmate's free exercise rights under the First Amendment. The court also found that the officials' denial furthered compelling government interests of promoting prison security and managing costs, and the burden placed on the inmate was the least restrictive means necessary to serve those interests, and thus denial of inmate's requests did not violate RLUIPA. (Clinton Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
RELIGIOUS SERVICES
SECURITY PRACTICES
SEGREGATION
STAFFING

Yellowbear v. Lampert, 741 F.3d 48 (10th Cir. 2014). A state prisoner brought an action against individual prison officials, seeking prospective injunctive relief against them for violations of the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA). The district court granted summary judgment for the officials and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court vacated and remanded. The appeals court held that summary judgment was precluded by a factual issue as to whether preventing the state prisoner from exercising his sincerely held religious belief --using a sweat lodge -- served a compelling governmental interest, and that it was the least restrictive means of furthering that interest. The appeals court began its opinion by stating: "Andrew Yellowbear will probably spend the rest of his life in prison. Time he must serve for murdering his daughter. With that much lying behind and still before him, Mr. Yellowbear has found sustenance in his faith. No one doubts the sincerity of his religious beliefs or that they are the reason he seeks access to his prison's sweat lodge—a house of prayer and meditation the prison has supplied for those who share his Native American religious tradition. Yet the prison refuses to open the doors of that sweat lodge to Mr. Yellowbear alone, and so we have this litigation." The prison's sweat lodge is located in the general prison yard and Yellowbear was housed in a special protective unit because of threats against him, not because of any disciplinary infraction he had committed. Prison officials asserted that the cost of providing the necessary security to take the prisoner from the special protective unit to the sweat lodge and back was "unduly burdensome." (Wyoming Medium Correctional Institution)

2015

U.S. District Court
RELIGIOUS GROUPS

Ajala v. West, 106 F.Supp.3d 976 (W.D. Wisc. 2015). An inmate brought an action against prison officials for alleged violation of his rights under the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA), the Free Exercise Clause, the Establishment Clause, and the Equal Protection Clause. The inmate challenged a prison policy that allegedly prohibited the inmate from wearing a "kufi," a head covering worn by some Muslims, unless he was in his cell or participating in congregate services. The prison officials moved for summary judgment, and the inmate moved for an extension. The district court held that: (1) the policy imposed a substantial burden on the inmate's religious exercise; (2) the policy was not the least restrictive means of furthering the prison's interest of preventing prisoners from using a religious head covering as a potential gang identifier; (3) the policy was not the least restrictive means of furthering the prison's interest in preventing prisoners from hiding contraband; (4) the policy was not the least restrictive means of furthering the prison's interest in preventing prison violence; and (5) prison officials were entitled to qualified immunity from the inmate's constitutional claims. The court noted that the law was not clearly established that the inmate had a constitutional right to wear a kufi at all times. (Wisconsin Secure Program Facility)

U.S. District Court
CONTRABAND

Barouch v. United States Department of Justice, 87 F.Supp.3d 10 (D.C.D.C, 2015). A prisoner who was convicted of bribing a public official and conspiracy to commit bribery moved for acquittal. The district court denied the motion, finding that evidence was sufficient to establish that the prisoner induced a prison official to assist in smuggling contraband. According to the court, the prisoner found a lucrative business opportunity in the institution's ban on tobacco and cell phones. He paid a prison nurse to smuggle this contraband into the prison and to look the other way when it came to reporting his illegal possessions to other prison authorities. The prisoner and nurse were eventually caught and prosecuted. Following a two-day jury trial, the prisoner was convicted. (Federal Bureau of Prisons, United States Penitentiary–Lee County, Virginia)

U.S. District Court
ITEMS PERMITTED

Cavanagh v. Taranto, 95 F.Supp.3d 220 (D. Mass. 2015). A pretrial detainee's son brought an action under § 1983 against correctional officers who were on duty the day of the detainee's suicide, alleging the officers violated the detainee's due process rights. The officers moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The court held that the officers were not deliberately indifferent to the detainee's mental health history and safety, to her safety through inadequate cell checks, or to her safety by failing to remove a looped shoelace from her cell. The court noted that the detainee was not identified as a suicide risk, the officers did not have access to the detainee's medical records, the officers were not trained to make suicide assessments, and the detainee's risk of suicide was not so obvious that someone other than a professional could have recognized the risk. (Suffolk County House of Correction, Massachusetts)

U.S. Appeals Court
RESTRAINTS

Coley v. Lucas County, Ohio, 799 F.3d 530 (6th Cir. 2015). The administrator of a pretrial detainee's estate brought a state court action against a county, county sheriff, police officer and police sergeant, alleging § 1983 violations of the detainee's constitutional rights and various state law claims. The district court denied the defendants' motions to dismiss and denied individual defendants' requests for qualified immunity. The defendants appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that a police officer's act of shoving a fully restrained pretrial detainee in a jail booking area, causing the detainee to strike his head on the wall as he fell to the cement floor without any way to break his fall, constituted "gratuitous force" in violation of the detainee's Fourteenth Amendment right to be free from excessive force. The court noted that the detainee's state of being handcuffed, in a belly chain and leg irons, led to a reasonable inference that the officer's actions were a result of his frustration with the detainee's prior restraint behavior, since the detainee was not in any condition to cause a disruption that would have provoked the officer to use such force. The court held that the police officer was on notice that his actions were unconstitutional, and therefore he was not entitled to qualified immunity from liability under § 1983. According to the court, the officer's attempts to cover up the assault by filing false reports and lying to federal investigators following the death of the detainee led to a reasonable conclusion that the officer understood that his actions violated the detainees' clearly established right not to be gratuitously assaulted while fully restrained and subdued.

The court held that a police sergeant's continued use of a chokehold on the unresisting, fully-shackled pre-trial detainee, after hearing the detainee choke and gurgle, and when a fellow officer was urging him release his chokehold, was objectively unreasonable, in violation of the detainee's Fourteenth Amendment right to be free from excessive force. The court noted that the sergeant's subsequent acts of telling other officers to leave the medical cell after the detainee was rendered unconscious, failing to seek medical help, and refusing to mention the use of a chokehold in incident reports, led to the inference the that sergeant was aware he violated the law and sought to avoid liability. According to the court, the police sergeant was on notice that his actions were unconstitutional, and therefore, he was not entitled to qualified immunity under § 1983.

The court found that the county sheriff could be held personally liable under § 1983, based on his failure to train and supervise employees in the use of excessive force, the use of a chokehold and injuries derived therefrom, and to ensure that the medical needs of persons in the sheriff's custody were met. According to the court, evidence that the sheriff helped his employees cover up their unconstitutional actions by making false statements to federal officials about his knowledge of his employees' assault, chokehold, and deliberate failure to provide medical attention to the detainee demonstrated that the sheriff at least implicitly authorized, approved or knowingly acquiesced in the unconstitutional conduct of the offending employees. The court noted that under Ohio law, allegations by the estate of the pretrial detainee that the county sheriff had full knowledge of the assault but intentionally and deliberately made false statements to federal officials were sufficient to state a claim that the sheriff ratified the conduct of his officers and, thus, was potentially personally liable for his officers' actions. The court concluded that the officers' use of excessive force, failure to provide medical care, assault and battery, and wrongful death could be imputed to the sheriff in his official capacity since the sheriff's false statements to federal investigators were a position that was inconsistent to non-affirmance of the officers' actions. (Lucas County Jail, Ohio)

U.S. Appeals Court
RESTRAINTS
SECURITY PRACTICES

Cortez v. Skol, 776 F.3d 1046 (9th Cir. 2015). The mother of a state inmate who suffered severe brain damage, after he was attacked by two fellow prisoners while being escorted through an isolated prison passage by a corrections officer, brought an action alleging a § 1983 Eighth Amendment claim against the officer and a gross negligence claim against the state. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants and the mother appealed. The appeals court reversed, finding that summary judgment was precluded by issues of material fact as to whether the corrections officer exposed the high-security inmate to a substantial risk of serious injury when he: (1) escorted the inmate and two fellow high-security prisoners through the isolated prison passage by himself; (2) did not require the prisoners to wear leg restraints; and (3) failed to physically intervene once the prisoners attacked the inmate. The court also found fact issues as to whether the officer was subjectively aware of the risk involved in the escort and acted with deliberate indifference to the inmate's safety. The court held that the mother was not the prevailing party for purposes of awarding attorney's fees. (Morey Unit, Lewis Prison Complex, Arizona)

U.S. District Court
STAFFING
PROTECTION

Cotta v. County of Kings, 79 F.Supp.3d 1148 (E.D.Cal. 2015). An inmate's mother, individually and as representative of the inmate's estate, as well as the prisoner's two daughters, brought an action against a county, and county jail officials, alleging that inadequate safety at the jail violated the inmate's constitutional rights and ultimately led to his death when he was killed by a cellmate. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that: (1) the inmate's due process right to protection from violence was violated; (2) the jail's staffing policy on the night the inmate was murdered was not lacking, such that any need to remedy the staffing policy was not obvious; (3) an official's decision to house the inmate together with the cellmate was a ministerial determination that was not entitled to immunity; (4) an official did not breach her duty of care to protect the inmate from any foreseeable harm; and (5) summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the county's lack of a policy requiring its employees to report safety risks was the cause of the inmate's murder and whether the county's conduct shocked the conscience. (Kings County Jail, California)

U.S. District Court
PUBLICATIONS

Crime, Justice & America, Inc. v. Honea, 110 F.Supp.3d 1027 (E.D. Cal. 2015). The publisher of a magazine intended for newly arrested county jail detainees awaiting trial brought an action against a county alleging violation of the right to free speech protected under the First Amendment after the county barred general distribution of unsolicited paper products to detainees. After a bench trial, the district court held that: (1) the county jail's policy of limiting written publications was rationally related to legitimate a penological interest in preventing inmates from using paper to conduct illicit activity; (2) electronic touch-screen kiosks that displayed the publisher's magazine in the jail were sufficient alternative means; (3) the impact of accommodating the asserted right weighed in favor of the county policy; and (4) the policy was not an exaggerated response. The court found that a corrections officer's testimony regarding the nefarious uses of paper in county jails, including that he could not recall a time when the publisher's law-oriented magazine had been used by detainees for such purposes was not, without more, sufficient to refute the county's explanation that its policy limiting detainee's access to paper was rationally related to a legitimate penological interest. The court ruled that the publisher's proposal to provide two copies of the publisher's law-oriented magazine in the county jail law library, standing alone, was not a sufficient alternative means for the publisher to communicate the existence of the magazine to county jail detainees, where most inmates would likely have left the jail before they would receive it from the library. (Butte County Jail, California)

U.S. Appeals Court
RESTRAINTS
SECURITY PRACTICES

Davis v. Wessel, 792 F.3d 793 (7th Cir. 2015). A civil detainee brought a pro se action under § 1983 against security guards employed at civil detention facility for sexually violent persons, operated by the Illinois Department of Human Services. The detainee alleged violation of his rights under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The district court entered judgment on a jury verdict in favor of the detainee and the security guards appealed. The appeals court vacated and remanded. The court held that the issue of whether security guards employed at the civil detention facility refused to remove the detainee's handcuffs with the intent of humiliating him, by preventing him from using the restroom and forcing him to urinate on himself, was for a jury to decide. The court found that the security guards were not entitled to qualified immunity from the claim by the detainee under § 1983 alleging excessive use of restraints in violation of the Due Process Clause after the guards refused to remove the detainee's handcuffs because it was clearly established at the time the detainee requested to use the restroom, which had no windows, that keeping the handcuffs on was not rationally related to a legitimate non-punitive purpose absent an indication that the detainee was a security risk. (Illinois Department of Human Services, Rushville Treatment and Detention Facility)

U.S. District Court
GANGS
CLASSIFICATION
PROTECTION

Facey v. Dickhaut, 91 F.Supp.3d 12 (D.Mass. 2014). A prisoner at a state correctional institution filed a pro se § 1983 action against corrections officials, alleging that the officials knowingly placed him in danger by assigning him to a housing unit where he was violently attacked by members of a rival gang, in violation of his Eighth Amendment right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment. Both parties filed motions to strike, and the officers moved for summary judgment. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by issues of fact as to whether corrections officials knew that the prisoner faced a substantial risk of serious harm, and whether the officials violated clearly established rights (Souza–Baranowski Correctional, Massachusetts)

U.S. Appeals Court
LOCKDOWN

Harrington v. Scribner, 785 F.3d 1299 (9th Cir. 2015). An African-American inmate brought a § 1983 action against state prison officials, alleging that a race-based lockdown at the prison violated his equal protection rights, and that he suffered injuries related to shower restrictions in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The district court entered judgment on a jury verdict in favor of the officials. The inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The court noted that racial classifications in prisons are immediately suspect and subject to strict scrutiny, for equal protection purposes, which requires the government to prove that the measures are narrowly tailored to further a compelling government interest. The court found that the jury instructions erroneously diluted the narrow tailoring requirement for the strict scrutiny test that applied to the race-based Equal Protection claim. (California State Prison–Corcoran)

U.S. Appeals Court
GANGS

Hinojosa v. Davey, 803 F.3d 412 (9th Cir. 2015). A state prisoner petitioned for federal habeas relief, challenging a state statutory amendment modifying the credit-earning status of prison-gang members and associates in segregated housing, so that such prisoners could no longer earn any good-time credits that would reduce their sentences. The district court denied the petition and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded with instructions to the district court. The court held that the amendment disadvantaged the offenders it affected by increasing the punishment for their crimes, an element for an ex post facto violation. The court noted that even if a prisoner could easily opt out of his prison gang, a prisoner who continued doing what he was doing before the statute was amended would have his prison time effectively lengthened. (Special Housing Unit, Corcoran State Prison, California)

U.S. Appeals Court
VISITS

Jackson v. Humphrey, 776 F.3d 1232 (11th Cir. 2015). A wife brought an action under § 1983 against corrections officials, claiming that revocation of her visitation privileges with her incarcerated husband who was on a hunger strike violated the First Amendment. The district court granted summary judgment, based on qualified immunity, in favor of the officials, for their decision to terminate the wife's visitation privileges during the time of hunger strike. The court denied summary judgment to the officials for the period following the end of the hunger strike, ruling that the question of whether the officials continued to enjoy qualified immunity after the hunger strike ended was one for a jury. The officials appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded, finding that the officials were entitled to qualified immunity. According to the court, the officials' decision had been motivated by lawful considerations even though it had consequences in the future, where the husband had a considerable amount of influence over other prisoners and considered himself, and was viewed by others, to be the leader of the hunger strike. The court noted that evidence suggested that the wife had urged her husband to prolong that strike after the strike had ended, and the officials were legitimately concerned that the strike might spread, about the disruption caused by the strike, and about the security and safety of staff and inmates. (Georgia Department of Corrections, Georgia Diagnostic and Classification Prison Special Management Unit)

U.S. Appeals Court
CONTRABAND
CELL PHONE

Johnson v. American Towers, LLC, 781 F.3d 693 (4th Cir. 2015). Prison guard who was shot multiple times in his home at the direction of an inmate who ordered the attack using a contraband cellular telephone, together with his wife, brought a state-court action for negligence and loss of consortium against several wireless service providers and owners of cell phone towers, asserting that they were liable for the guard's injuries because they were aware that their services facilitated the illegal use of cell phones by inmates and yet failed to take steps to curb that use. Following removal to federal court and denial of the plaintiffs' motion to remand, the defendants filed a joint motion to dismiss. The district court granted the motion and the plaintiffs appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held the plaintiffs failed to allege sufficient facts to set forth a plausible claim for relief. The court noted that although the complaint contained a bare assertion that "an inmate at the prison using a cell phone ordered a co-conspirator outside of the prison to kill [the guard]," the plaintiffs failed to offer any further factual enhancement to support their claims, such as by identifying the wireless service provider that carried the alleged call or when the alleged call occurred, such that a wireless service provider would likely be unable to determine whether it carried the alleged call without more identifying information. (Lee Correctional Institution, South Carolina)

U.S. District Court
VISITS
SEARCHES

Knight v. Washington State Department of Corrections, 147 F.Supp.3d 1165 (W.D. Wash. 2015). A prison visitor who suffered from a seizure disorder, and was subjected to a strip search and pat-down searches, brought an action against the state Department of Corrections (DOC) and DOC officials, alleging that the searches violated the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA). The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion, finding that: (1)the strip search and pat-down searches did not violate ADA; (2) guards did not act with deliberate indifference in conducting a strip search; (3) the prison was not a place of public accommodation, under the Washington Law Against Discrimination, as to visitors participating in an extended family visitation program; (4) the guards' conduct was not sufficiently extreme to support an outrage claim; and (5) the guards' conduct did not support a claim for negligent infliction of emotional distress. According to the court, there was no showing that the guards proceeded in conscious disregard of a high probability of emotional distress when ordering the strip search, as the visitor suggested the strip search as an alternative to a pat search and the guards followed this suggestion, and all visitors were subjected to pat-down searches, which were justified on safety grounds. (Monroe Correctional Complex, Washington)

U.S. District Court
BOOKS

Minton v. Childers, 113 F.Supp.3d 796 (D. Md. 2015). A prisoner brought a § 1983 action against prison officials, seeking injunctive relief, along with nominal and punitive damages, after the officials barred his receipt of used books pursuant to prison directives. The officials and the prisoner both filed motions for summary judgment. The district court granted the officials' motion and denied the prisoner's motion. The court held that the prisoner failed to exhaust administrative remedies under Maryland law prior to filing the § 1983 action in federal court, in violation of the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA). The court found that a prison directive banning inmate possession of incoming used books not sent directly by a publisher was reasonably related to legitimate penological interests, as required by due process. The court noted that the prisoner was allowed to receive new books sent directly from a publisher, the ban was expressly aimed at advancing jail security and protecting the safety of jail personnel and other inmates, the ban was logically connected to those goals, to allow inmates to possess used books from stores or e-commerce companies could have had significant impact on the safety and security of prison personnel and other inmates. The court noted that the prisoner did not point to an alternative that fully accommodated his rights while at same time imposed de minimis cost to valid penological interests. (Eastern Correctional Institution, Maryland)

U.S. Appeals Court
CELL PHONE

Santiago-Lugo v. Warden, 785 F.3d 467 (11th Cir. 2015). A prisoner filed a habeas corpus petition, seeking relief on due process grounds for disciplinary sanctions he received for possession of a cellular telephone, which included revocation of his good time credits. The district court denied the prisoner's petition and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the prisoner was given sufficient notice of the charges against him, as required by due process. (Federal Correctional Complex at Coleman Medium Prison, Florida)

U.S. Appeals Court
RELIGIOUS ARTICLES

Schlemm v. Wall, 784 F.3d 362 (7th Cir. 2015). A prisoner, a Navajo Tribe member, brought an action under the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA) against the Wisconsin Department of Corrections, seeking an order requiring the state prison system to accommodate some of his religious practices. The district court granted the prison's summary judgment motion. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part and reversed in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the prisoner's inability to eat game meat for a religious feast substantially burdened his religious exercise, and as to whether the prisoner's inability to wear a multicolored headband while praying in his cell and during group religious ceremonies substantially burdened his religious exercise, and whether prison had a compelling justification for prohibiting multicolored headbands. (Wisconsin Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
SECURITY PRACTICES

Shepard v. Hansford County, 110 F.Supp.3d 696 (N.D. Tex. 2015). A husband brought an action against a county and a county jail employee under § 1983 alleging deliberate indifference to detainee health in violation of the right to provision of adequate medical treatment under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, following his wife's suicide while in the county jail. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that: (1) the jail employee was entitled to qualified immunity; (2) summary judgment was precluded by a fact issue as to whether the jail employee violated the detainee's rights, (3) the county had an adequate suicide risk prevention training policy, where employees were required to attend training to learn about suicide risk detection and prevention methods, and were required to read the county's policy on conducting face-to-face suicide checks with detainees; (4) the county adequately trained employees on cell entry; but (5) a fact issue existed as to whether the county had an unwritten policy of understaffing the jail, precluding summary judgment. The court noted that it was not clearly established at the time of the suicide that an employee was required to abandon other duties to ensure that suicide watch checks were completed, and it was not clearly established that the employee was prohibited from providing a detainee with a towel in a cell with "tie-off points," since the employee was not aware of any other suicides in that cell. According to the court, the jail cell entry policy prohibiting jail employees from entering a cell alone did not amount to training employees to be deliberately indifferent to the needs of detainees, and was not causally related to the detainee's death, and thus the county was not liable under § 1983 for deliberate indifference to detainee health. (Hansford Co. Jail, Texas)

U.S. District Court
RESTRAINTS
USE OF FORCE

Shuford v. Conway, 86 F.Supp.3d 1344 (N.D.Ga. 2015). Pretrial detainees brought a § 1983 action against a sheriff and other county jail officials and employees, alleging excessive force in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion, finding that the jail employees did not apply force maliciously and sadistically against any detainee. According to the court, in shooting the pretrial detainee with a non-lethal chemical agent projectile, taking him to the floor, and placing him in restraint chair, the employees did not apply force maliciously and sadistically. The court noted that the detainee had hit a wall and metal partition, creating a risk of self-harm, the restraints reduced or eliminated the detainee's ability to inflict harm against himself, and the detainee did not suffer serious or permanent injuries. (Gwinnett County Jail, Georgia)

U.S. Appeals Court
WHEELCHAIR
TRANSPORTATION

Turner v. Mull, 784 F.3d 485 (8th Cir. 2015). A state inmate filed a § 1983 action alleging that correctional officials violated his rights under the Eighth Amendment, Fourteenth Amendment, Title II of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), and Rehabilitation Act by failing to transport him in wheelchair-accessible van, exposing him to unsanitary conditions in the van, and retaliating against him for filing a complaint. The district court entered summary judgment in the officials' favor and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the officials were not deliberately indifferent to the inmate's serious medical needs when they precluded him from using a wheelchair-accessible van, even if the inmate was required to crawl into the van and to his seat. The court noted that the inmate was able to ambulate, stand, and sit with the use of leg braces and crutches, the inmate did not ask to use a readily available wheelchair, no physician ordered or issued a wheelchair for the inmate, and improperly using or standing on a lift was considered dangerous due to the possibility of a fall. According to the court, officials were not deliberately indifferent to the serious medical needs of the inmate in violation of Eighth Amendment when they required him to be transported and to crawl in an unsanitary van, where the inmate was exposed to unsanitary conditions on a single day for a combined maximum of approximately six hours. The court found that prison officials did not discriminate against the inmate on the basis of his disability, in violation of the Rehabilitation Act, when they refused to transport him in a wheelchair-accessible van, where the prison's wheelchair-users-only policy was rooted in concerns over undisputed safety hazards associated with people standing on or otherwise improperly using a lift, and the inmate did not use a wheelchair or obtain a physician's order to use a wheelchair-accessible van. (Eastern Reception Diagnostic Correctional Center, Missouri)

U.S. Appeals Court
ESCAPE

U.S. v. Goad, 788 F.3d 873 (8th Cir. 2015). After a federal district court denied a motion to dismiss an indictment, the defendant conditionally pled guilty to escape from custody. The defendant appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the defendant was in "custody" at a residential reentry center, such that his unauthorized departure from the center constituted an escape from custody. The court noted that a person may be in custody for the purposes of a statute prohibiting escape from custody, even though the physical restraints upon him are minimal and even though the custody may be deemed constructive, rather than actual. (Gerald R. Hinzman Residential Reentry Center, Iowa)

U.S. District Court
SEGREGATION
SECURITY RESTRICTIONS

U.S. v. Mohamed, 103 F.Supp.3d 281 (E.D.N.Y. 2015). A defendant who was indicted for murder of an internationally protected person and attempted murder of an internationally protected person, filed a motion to vacate or modify special administrative measures governing conditions of his pretrial detention. The district court denied the motion, finding that the measures were rationally connected to the legitimate government objective of preventing the detainee from coordinating violent attacks. The detainee had been placed in a special housing unit and limitations on communications between him and people inside or outside the prison were limited. The court noted that the detainee had admitted allegiance to terrorist organizations, had previously broken out of prison two times, one escape was allegedly coordinated between the defendant and a terrorist organization, and three prison guards had been killed during one escape. (Metropolitan Correctional Center, Manhattan, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
RESTRAINTS

U.S. v. Sanchez-Gomez, 798 F.3d 1204 (9th Cir. 2015). Defendants filed challenges to a federal district court policy, adopted upon the recommendation of the United States Marshals, to place defendants in full shackle restraints for all non-jury proceedings, with the exception of guilty pleas and sentencing hearings, unless a judge specifically requests the restraints be removed in a particular case. The district court denied the challenges. The defendants appealed. The appeals court vacated and remanded. The appeals court found that the defendants' challenges to the shackling policy were not rendered moot by the fact that they were no longer detained. The court held that there was no adequate justification of the necessity for the district court's generalized shackling policy. According to the court, although the Marshals recommended the policy after some security incidents, coupled with understaffing, created strains in the ability of the Marshals to provide adequate security for a newly opened, state-of-the-art courthouse, the government did not point to the causes or magnitude of the asserted increased security risk, nor did it try to demonstrate that other less restrictive measures, such as increased staffing, would not suffice. (Southern District of California, United States Marshals, San Diego Federal Courthouse)

U.S. District Court
ACCESS TO ATTORNEY
ITEMS PERMITTED
SECURITY PRACTICES

United States v. Rivera, 83 F.Supp.3d 1154 (D.Colo. 2015). A prisoner moved for a standing order directing the Bureau of Prisons (BOP) to permit counsel and a defense investigator to bring laptop computers into the facility during the remaining pendency of his criminal action. The district court denied the motion. The court held that the BOP reasonably refused to allow defense counsel and defense investigators to bring their laptop computers into the maximum security facility, and instead permitted them to download materials from their own computers onto the BOP's "clean" computer that did not store downloaded information. The court noted that the increased staff and equipment necessary to thoroughly inspect every laptop for weapons and other contraband to ensure the security of staff and inmates would be a burden. The court noted that counsel could print a hard copy of any materials that could not readily be downloaded onto a clean computer. (Administrative Maximum Facility Florence, and FCI Englewood, Federal Bureau of Prisons, Colorado)

U.S. Appeals Court
WHEELCHAIR
TRANSPORTATION

Wagoner v. Lemmon, 778 F.3d 586 (7th Cir. 2015). A paraplegic inmate filed a § 1983 action alleging that a state department of corrections and its commissioner failed to properly accommodate his disability, in violation of his constitutional rights, the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), and the Rehabilitation Act. The district court entered summary judgment in the defendants' favor and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court found that the officials did not violate the paraplegic inmate's rights under Title II of ADA or the Rehabilitation Act as a result of their failure to provide him with an adequate wheelchair backrest or a wheelchair-ready van, despite the inmate's allegation that he was inconvenienced with longer waits and humiliation, as when he had to crawl off a regular van because it did not accommodate his wheelchair. The court noted that the inmate did not assert that he was denied all access to some programs and activities, or that his access to others was severely limited, and the state provided the inmate with a new wheelchair before he filed his grievance about the backrest. (Indiana Dept. of Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
EXERCISE
WEAPON

Williams v. Hampton, 797 F.3d 276 (5th Cir. 2015). Inmates and parents of a deceased inmate, as wrongful death beneficiaries, brought a § 1983 action against a state correctional officer for the death of one inmate and the injuries of two other inmates arising out of an inmate-on-inmate attack. The district court entered judgment against the officer and she appealed. The appeals court reversed, finding that the corrections officer who was guarding a prison exercise yard was not deliberately indifferent to a substantial risk of inmate-on-inmate violence when she failed to ascertain if her single-shot, nonlethal block gun was loaded and later took two rubber bullets for the gun with her back into the prison building and did not give them to the officer who relieved her. According to the court, although three inmates were subsequently attacked by other inmates who escaped from their exercise pens, there was no evidence that the officer realized that the gun was unloaded, that she knew there was a risk that inmates could escape from the pens, or that a loaded block gun could have prevented the assaults. (State Penitentiary in Parchman, Mississippi)

SECTION 40: SANITATION

The following pages present summaries of court decisions which address this topic area. These summaries provide readers with highlights of each case, but are not intended to be a substitute for the review of the full case. The cases do not represent all court decisions which address this topic area, but rather offer a sampling of relevant holdings.

The decisions summarized below were current as of the date indicated on the title page of this edition of the Catalog. Prior to publication, the citation for each case was verified, and the case was researched in Shepard's Citations to determine if it had been altered upon appeal (reversed or modified). The Catalog is updated annually. An annual supplement provides replacement pages for cases in the prior edition which have changed, and adds new cases. Readers are encouraged to consult the Topic Index to identify related topics of interest. The text in the section entitled "How to Use The Catalog" at the beginning of the Catalog provides an overview which may also be helpful to some readers.

The case summaries which follow are organized by year, with the earliest case presented first. Within each year, cases are organized alphabetically by the name of the plaintiff. The left margin offers a quick reference, highlighting the type of court involved and identifying appropriate subtopics addressed by each case.

1970

U.S. District Court
BEDDING
KITCHEN

Hamilton v. Schiro, 338 F.Supp. 1016 (E.D. La. 1970). Fact that mattresses issued to inmates were not cleaned contributes to court's finding of constitutional violation. Unsanitary condition of jail kitchen contributes to court's finding of constitutional violation. (Orleans Parish Prison, Louisiana)

1971

U.S. District Court
HOT WATER
LAUNDRY

Jones v. Wittenberg, 330 F.Supp. 707 (N.D. Oh. 1971), aff'd, 456 F.2d 854 (6th Cir. 1972). There must be hot and cold water for bathing. Clean towels and washcloths, soap, toothbrush, toothpaste, and shaving gear shall be provided. Clean linens shall be provided regularly and clothing shall be laundered and exchanged weekly. Prisoners shall be dressed in jail clothing. (Lucas County Jail, Ohio)

1972

U.S. District Court
BEDDING
CLOTHING
LAUNDRY

Hamilton v. Landrieu, 351 F.Supp. 549 (E.D. La. 1972). Every existing mattress shall be disposed of and new mattresses procured, replaced annually, and linen shall be laundered at least once a week. Court ordered that all prisoners be clothed in prison uniforms so that inmates could be readily distinguished from employees and visitors. Each defendant not having a change of clothing would be provided one. (Orleans Parish Prison, Louisiana)

1973

U.S. District Court
KITCHEN

Goldsby v. Carnes, 365 F.Supp. 395 (W.D. Mo. 1973). A trained and experienced Food Service Manager with management skills must be hired and given direct authority over the kitchen operation. The county health department should periodically inspect kitchen facilities to insure that they meet ordinary standards. There must be a regular cleaning schedule for all kitchen equipment. (Jackson County Jail, Kansas City, Missouri)

U.S. District Court
CLOTHING
LAUNDRY

Inmates of Suffolk Co. Jail v. Eisenstadt, 360 F.Supp. 676 (D. Mass. 1973), aff'd, 494 F.2d 1196 (1st Cir. 1974). Detainees are to be given daily showers. Institutional clothing is to be given to all detainees who need it. Free laundry service must be given to detainees at least once a week. (Suffolk County Jail, Massachusetts)

U.S. District Court
BEDDING
LAUNDRY

Johnson v. Lark, 365 F.Supp. 289 (E.D. Mo. 1973). Clean mattress covers, blankets and towels will be provided upon admission and cleaned, washed or repaired at reasonable intervals. (St. Louis County Jail, Missouri)

1975

U.S. District Court
LAUNDRY
BEDDING

Campbell v. McGruder, 416 F.Supp. 100 (D. D.C. 1975). Clean clothing, clean towels, and clean bed linen are to be provided at least once a week. (D.C. Jail)

U.S. District Court
FOOD SERVICE

Padgett v. Stein, 406 F.Supp. 287 (M.D. Penn. 1975). Sanitary and nutritious meals contribute to the absence of cruel and unusual punishment. (York County Prison, Pennsylvania)

1976

U.S. District Court
CLOTHING
LAUNDRY
PLUMBING

Mitchell v. Untreiner, 421 F.Supp. 886 (N.D. Fla. 1976). Inmates without adequate clothing shall be furnished clothing within eight hours of booking and shall have available a daily change of clean clothes. Clean towels and washcloths shall be issued to inmates within eight hours of booking and shall be frequently laundered. Inmates shall not be housed in cells which do not have showers except isolation cells, and inmates in isolation cells or cells without working showers shall receive at least five showers a week. (Escambia County Jail, Pensacola, Florida)

U.S. District Court
CLOTHING
BEDDING

Tate v. Kassulke, 409 F.Supp. 651 (W.D. Ky. 1976). A committee should be designated to see that clean clothing and bedding are received once a week. (Jefferson County Jail, Kentucky)

1977

U.S. District Court
HOT WATER
TOILETS
SHOWERS
KITCHEN
FOOD SERVICE

Ahrens v. Thomas, 434 F.Supp. 873 (W.D. Mo. 1977), aff'd, 570 F.2d 288. Each cell shall contain a working toilet that flushes from the inside and a wash basin with hot and cold water. Showers shall be maintained in a safe and sanitary manner so that detainees may receive showers on a daily basis. All individuals involved in preparation, handling, or service of food shall meet minimum public health standards for restaurant employees. The jail kitchen shall be inspected monthly by the health department or another agency approved by the court. (Platte County Jail, Missouri)

U.S. District Court
SHOWERS

Anderson v. Redman, 429 F.Supp. 1105 (D. Del. 1977). Housing of inmates in converted common areas without adequate sanitary facilities violates state statutes and regulations requiring facilities to be sufficient for every inmate to bathe as often as necessary but at least three times a week. (Delaware Correctional Center)

U.S. District Court
SHOWERS
CLOTHING
BEDDING

Goldsby v. Carnes, 429 F.Supp. 370 (W.D. Mo. 1977). Each inmate will be afforded an opportunity to shower at least every other day. Standard bath size towels will be provided to each inmate, and each inmate without such will be furnished with soap, toothbrush, toothpaste, and shaving gear in sufficient quantity to allow adequate maintenance of personal hygiene. Sheets will be large enough to allow for shrinkage. Mattress covers or plastic coated mattresses will be provided. All new inmates will be provided with underwear and clothing. (Jackson County Jail, Kansas City, Missouri)

1978

U.S. Appeals Court
HOUSEKEEPING

Bijeol v. Nelson, 579 F.2d 423 (7th Cir. 1978). Pretrial detainees may be required to perform general housekeeping tasks. (Metro Correctional Center, Chicago)

U.S. District Court
SHOWERS
TOILETS
KITCHEN
COMMON AREAS

Burks v. Walsh, 461 F.Supp. 454 (W.D. Missouri, 1978). Actions were brought seeking injunctive and declaratory relief on behalf of inmates at the Missouri State Penitentiary. After a trial limited to the issues of overcrowding and unsanitary conditions, the district court held that: (1) triple celling inmates in 59.2-square-foot cells in the diagnostic center, in 65-square-foot cells in the administrative segregation unit, and in 66-square-foot cells in the adjustment unit, as well as double celling of inmates in 47.18-square-foot cells in the special treatment unit, constituted cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the eighth amendment, but (2) except in such instances, the conditions in the aggregate which presently existed at the State Penitentiary did not violate the cruel and unusual punishment clause of the eighth amendment.

In examining conditions of state penitentiary, the court's inquiry had to be limited to determining whether conditions at the penitentiary caused inmates to suffer deprivations of constitutional dimensions.

The eighth amendment's prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment is not limited to specific acts directed at selected individuals, but is equally pertinent to general conditions of confinement. Confinement itself can result in a finding of cruel and unusual punishment. However, only where confinement is characterized by conditions and practices so bad as to be shocking to the conscience of reasonably civilized people.

In determining whether conditions at the state penitentiary constituted cruel and unusual punishment, the district court had to be cautious not to place undue emphasis upon "design capacities" and minimum square footage mandates of other courts, nor were minimum square footage standards of various professional associations dispositive. Furthermore, in applying the "totality of circumstances" approach to Missouri Penitentiary conditions, the relaxed amicable atmosphere generated by the prison administration had to tip scales in favor of the state in areas of doubtful constitutionality.

In the aggregate, and with certain exceptions regarding overcrowding in certain units, all conditions presently existing at Missouri State Penitentiary, including but not limited to conditions and qualities of individual cells, showers, toilets, dining halls, kitchen, windows, temperature, noise level, canteen, recreational areas, laundry service, ventilation systems, visiting room, pest control program, prison industries and other activities, are not intolerable in light of the modern conscience, or shocking to the conscience of the court, and thus do not violate cruel and unusual punishment clause of the eighth amendment.

Double celling of penitentiary inmates in 65-square-foot cells in administrative segregation unit was not intolerable, inhumane, totally unreasonable or shocking to the court's conscience where common areas of unit were very clean and sanitary, individual cells were reasonably clean and sanitary, and the unit was utilized to punish those inmates who committed serious offenses while confined in penitentiary.

Double celling of state penitentiary inmates in diagnostic unit cells measuring 59.2 square feet for period of one to five weeks did not violate the eighth amendment, in spite of the fact that inmates were confined to their cells for greater portion of day than were inmates in general population, where they could leave their cells three times daily for meals, once a week to go to canteen, once a week to go to movies, and once a week for two hours of gym and where, in addition, much of their time was occupied by meetings with caseworkers, taking a battery of tests and physical examinations. (Missouri State Penitentiary)

1979

U.S. Appeals Court
CELLS
HOUSEKEEPING
RODENTS/PESTS
BEDDING

Jones v. Diamond, 594 F.2d 997 (5th Cir. 1979), cert. denied, 102 S.Ct. 27 (1980).
In this opinion, the U.S. Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals reviewed Mississippi District Court Judge William Cox's ruling on what the Fifth Circuit termed a "challenge to nearly every conceivable facet of the Jackson County Jail at Pascagoula, Mississippi." The court first noted that the conditions at the Jackson County Jail were not "uncivilized" or "barbaric and inhumane", as the court had found rulings on the conditions of other jails. A peculiar aspect of this case was that convicted felons were being held in the jail while the state penitentiary was being brought up to constitutional standards. Consequently, there were convicted felons, convicted misdemeanants and pretrial detainees in the jail. Accordingly, the court, in reviewing the conditions at the jail, applied different standards depending on whether the inmate was pretrial detainee or a convicted felon or misdemeanant. The court then reviewed the history of corrections in the State of Mississippi and specifically in Jackson County. It noted that Jackson County officials had spent a considerable amount of money and instituted several new programs in the last ten years. In addition, at the time of this opinion, the county was in the process of erecting a new jail. After noting these facts, the court made rulings in the following areas.

EXERCISE. The court ruled that an inmate did not have a constitutional right to outdoor exercise. The argument for the plaintiff was that outdoor exercise was essential to health. The court though, citing Estelle v. Gamble, 420 U.S. 97 (1976), stated that the constitution criterion in matters of physical health is that the jailer must not be deliberately indifferent to the serious needs of his prisoners. Here, there was no evidence presented of a medical nature that the inmates' health needs were adversely affected by the absence of outdoor exercise. Consequently, the court refused to order the jail officials to allow the inmate outdoor exercise.

SANITATION. At the Jackson County Jail, the prisoners were responsible for cleaning their own cells, and a trusty was to assume responsibility for cleaning the cells when the inmate was unable or unwilling to clean after himself. There was no evidence of rodents in the jail. The jail was sprayed for insects once a month to minimize the cockroach problem. Sheets and other bedding as well as clothes were cleaned regularly. Under these circumstances, the court found no constitutional violations regarding the sanitation of the Jackson County Jail.

1980

State Supreme Court
TOILETS
SINKS

Attorney General v. Sheriff of Worcester County, 413 N.E.2d 722 (Mass. 1980).
The Massachusetts Supreme Court ordered the Worcester County Jail to comply with Public Health regulations concerning sinks, toilets and beds. The jail contained seven isolation cells which did not have a toilet, sink or raised bed. After a public health official inspected these cells and found them to be in violation of health regulations, jail officials stated that they intended to correct the violations in six of the cells but would keep the seventh as it is for confinement of potentially suicidal inmates. The court determined that county jails are subject to health department inspections and that isolation units are not to be excluded from the scope of health regulations. The court then ruled that the evidence with respect to the danger of suicide fell short of requiring an exception to the regulations. The court stated that indestructible toilet and sink units are available and that such units could not be used by an inmate to injure himself or others. The court then ordered jail officials to install such units to achieve compliance with health code regulations. (Worcester County Jail, Massachusetts)

U.S. District Court
SHOWERS
CLOTHING
FOOD SERVICE

Griffin v. Smith, 493 F.Supp. 129 (W.D. N.Y. 1980). Allegations of fungus infested showers do not state a claim upon which relief can be granted. Allegations that inmates are limited to one change of socks, shorts and T-shirts per week do not state a claim upon which relief can be granted. Allegation of unsanitary food utensils and the provision to inmates in the Special Housing Unit of food portions smaller than provided to the general population state a claim upon which relief can be granted. (Attica Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
CELLS

Hutchings v. Corum, 501 F.Supp. 1276 (W.D. Mo. 1980). Class action is brought challenging the constitutionality of numerous conditions and practices at the county jail. The district court held that: (1) prison authorities' failure to immediately evacuate inmates from any sewage contaminated cell, pending thorough cleaning of cell, violated constitutional rights of inmates subject to that condition; (2) deficiencies in jail, including lack of fire escape, absence of windows, lack of necessary fire doors, and limited number of fire extinguishers amounted to constitutionally intolerable conditions. Prison conditions for an unconvicted person are to be judged against due process standards of the fifth and fourteenth amendments and conditions within the penal institution which are unconstitutional for the convicted person under eighth amendment review are likewise an abridgment of due process guarantees afforded unconvicted persons. The claim that financial restrictions have prevented improvements in jail conditions is not a defense to constitutional violations.

Although lights were left on all night in the county jail, and there was a high noise level at night, such were not per se unconstitutional conditions, since inmates could sleep during the day, and there was no indication that inmates had developed psychological or physiological problems. An entirely inadequate ventilation system at the county jail constituted a constitutionally intolerable living condition.

Deficiencies in the county jail, including lack of fire escapes, absence of windows, lack of necessary fire doors, and limited number of fire extinguishers amounted to constitutionally intolerable conditions. Failure of county jail authorities to provide each inmate one hour per day of exercise outside cells was a constitutionally intolerable condition. (Clay County Jail, Missouri)

U.S. District Court
TOILET
HOT WATER

Lightfoot v. Walker, 486 F.Supp. 504 (S.D. Ill. 1980). All cells are to have a working toilet and sink with hot and cold water. (Menard Correctional Center, Menard, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
KITCHEN
FOOD SERVICE

Nicholson v. Choctaw Co., Ala., 498 F.Supp. 295 (S.D. Ala. 1980). Meat served shall be butchered professionally and subject to inspection. Road-killed meat shall not be served. The food shall be nutritious. The public health regulations are to be followed, and there is to be regular inspection by the public health officials. All food handlers are to be checked for communicable diseases. (Choctaw County Jail, Alabama)

U.S. Appeals Court
KITCHEN

Ramos v. Lamm, 639 F.2d 559 (10th Cir. 1980), cert. denied, 450 U.S. 1041. While the state health code does not establish a constitutional minimum for the conditions of a kitchen, it is substantial evidence of what constitutes the humane conditions required by the eighth amendment. The record indicates that the conditions of the kitchen constitute a substantial hazard to the health of the inmates and that they, therefore, violate the eighth amendment. (State Penitentiary, Canon City, Colorado)

1981

U.S. District Court
PLUMBING

Heitman v. Gabriel, 524 F.Supp. 622 (W.D. Mo. 1981). Plumbing conditions are cited. In this case against the Buchanan County Jail, the United States District Court ordered that no inmate is to be assigned to a cell used as a communal toilet, and ordered the jail's plumbing to be cleaned and repaired. The court also found that the jail was overcrowded considering all of the conditions, particularly the plumbing and the lack of out-of-cellblock exercise. (Buchanan County Jail, Missouri)

U.S. Supreme Court
CROWDING
RODENTS/PESTS
FOOD SERVICE
SHOWERS

Rhodes v. Chapman, 101 S.Ct. 2392 (1981). In a remarkable 8 to 1 decision, the Supreme Court upheld double celling at the Southern Ohio Correctional Facility at Lucasville. The maximum security facility was built in the early 1970's with gymnasiums, workshops, school rooms, day room, two chapels, a hospital ward, a commissary, a barber shop and a library. Outdoors, there is a recreation field, visitation area and library. The physical plant itself is a topflight first-class facility. Each cell is sixty-three square feet in area and contains a bed or bunk bed measuring thirty-six by eighty inches, a cabinet nightstand, a wall-mounted sink with hot and cold water, a flushable toilet and a built-in radio. One wall of each cell is barred. Day rooms are open from 6:30 a.m. until 9:30 p.m., and inmates may pass between these rooms and their cells for a ten minute period each hour. At the time of the trial, the facility housed 2,300 inmates, two-thirds of whom were serving life or long-term sentences. Some 1,400 men were double celled.

Despite the favorable nature of the plant's design, the district court found that double celling constituted cruel and unusual punishment. The Supreme Court reversed, noting: "No static test can exist by which courts determine whether conditions of confinement are cruel and unusual, for the Eighth Amendment must draw its meaning from the evolving standards of decency that mark the progress of a maturing society." Applying those principles to this institution, the court found that the evidence did not support a conclusion that the eighth amendment was violated.

The majority said:

The double celling made necessary by the unanticipated increase in prison population did not lead to deprivations of essential food, medical care or sanitation. Nor did it increase violence among inmates or create other conditions intolerable for prison confinement. Although job and educational opportunities diminished marginally as a result of double celling, limited work hours and delay before receiving education do not inflict pain, much less unnecessary and wanton pain. Deprivations of this kind simply are not punishment.

The Court continued, "We would have to wrench the eighth amendment from its language and history to hold that delay of these desirable aids to rehabilitation violates the Constitution." Three justices, Brennen, Blackmun and Stevens, authored a concurring opinion. It attempted to list some of the things which would determine whether a facility has such poor conditions as to violate the eighth amendment. Those conditions are:

-Physical plant conditions: lighting, heat, plumbing, ventilation, living space, noise levels, and recreation space.

-Sanitation: control of vermin and insects, food preparation, medical facilities, lavatories and showers, clean places for eating, sleeping and working

-Safety: protection from violent, deranged or diseased inmates, fire protection and emergency evacuation.

-Staffing: trained and adequate guards and other staff, and avoidance of placing inmates in positions of authority over other inmates.

This majority of justices cautioned that sixty-three square feet of cell space is not enough for two men. Such conditions, they noted, are a clear signal to legislative officials that additional facilities must be constructed or inmate populations reduced by other means. The justices did state, however, that cramped facilities are not unconstitutional per se.

NOTE: This decision dealt with long-term convicted inmates, not short-term persons in county and city jails. In some circumstances, pretrial detainees who are still presumed innocent until convicted have greater rights, such as access to lawyers and courts. On the other hand, because of the short periods of confinement, a jail facility does not need as elaborate areas for recreation, libraries, exercise and other services, as required for the longer term population of prisons. (Southern Ohio Correctional Facility, Lucasville)

1982

State Court
BEDDING
CLOTHING

Hickson v. Kellison, 296 S.E.2d 855 (W.Vir. 1982). General conditions at the Pocahontas County Jail were found to violate constitutional standards by a federal district court, noting that the jail failed to provide the inmates with personal hygiene supplies, bedding and towels, and adequate clean clothing. The court stated that the legislature required counties to maintain jails at reasonable and acceptable standards. (Pocahontas County Jail, West Virginia)

U.S. District Court
TOILET
PLUMBING
BEDDING

Strachan v. Ashe, 548 F.Supp. 1193 (D. Mass. 1982). Isolation unit conditions are held unconstitutional. Alleging that conditions of an isolation unit in a county correctional facility in Massachusetts were unconstitutional, the plaintiff brought this Section 1983 action.

Although the plaintiff contended that the procedural aspects of the disciplinary proceedings which placed him in isolation, as well as the conditions of isolation were unconstitutional, the court focused on the conditions of the isolation cell. The cell was ten feet by ten feet with no toilet or running water. The plaintiff was permitted to leave his cell only fifteen minutes daily to exercise and to wash with cold water. His only bedding was a mattress on the floor. He was allowed only one blanket, a sheet and pillow. Food served to him was cold.

In discussing the lack of plumbing facilities, the court found that conditions of the isolation cell violated minimum state standards, which did not establish a constitutional violation per se, but lack of adequate plumbing facilities has previously been held to a violation of the eighth amendment.

The court held that because the defendant supervisors had actual notice of the prison conditions, the administrative negligence of not acting on those conditions rose to the level of deliberate indifference in this case. The defendants argued that they were entitled to "good faith immunity," that they could not have been expected to know that they were violating the constitutional rights of the plaintiff. The court rejected this argument, finding that the inmate clearly had a constitutional right to adequate and hygienic means of disposing of his bodily waste. (Hampden County House of Corrections, Massachusetts)

1983

State Court
TOILETS
PLUMBING
HOT WATER

Michaud v. Sheriff of Essex County, 458 N.E.2d 702 (Mass. 1983). Cells in several Massachusetts jails are not to be used until flushing toilets and hand-washing sinks with hot and cold running water are installed, according to a state court ruling. Existing toilet facilities in the cells consist of metal or plastic buckets without lids, shared by several inmates. Emptied only once daily, inmates are subject to continually smelling the odor of their wastes. The cells are not to be used until the ordered improvements are made. (Essex County Jail and House of Corrections, Lawrence, Massachusetts)

1985

U.S. Appeals Court
BEDDING
TOILETS
FOOD SERVICE

Goodson v. City of Atlanta, 763 F.2d 1381 (11th Cir. 1985). The plaintiff was held as a rape suspect in the Atlanta jail. A jury concluded that he was subjected to unconstitutional conditions of confinement (sanitation, toilet facilities, medical care, lack of bedding, lack of heating, roach infested food). The jury believed that the city of Atlanta and the jail administrator knew of these conditions and had even made public statements to the media that the jail was "unfit for human habitation". Concluding that the administrator had failed to properly train and supervise staff, they held him liable for $5,000 damages, and held the city liable for $45,000 compensatory damages. (Atlanta City Jail, Georgia)

U.S. Appeals Court
RODENTS/PESTS
PLUMBING

Hoptowit v. Spellman, 753 F.2d 779 (9th Cir. 1985). Inmates brought an action challenging conditions of confinement in a state prison system. On remand, 682 F.2d 1237, the United States District Court entered judgment finding conditions in violation of the eighth amendment and ordered relief; the state appealed. The court of appeals held that: (1) the change of administration, resulting in defendants named in the action either leaving office or changing positions, did not warrant reopening the record on remand; (2) inadequate lighting, vermin infestation, substandard fire prevention, and safety hazards in the prison violated minimum requirements of the eighth amendment; and (3) the order for relief was overbroad in requiring provision of adequate food and clothing where there were no findings of inadequate food and clothing.

Adequate lighting is one of the fundamental attributes of adequate shelter required by the eighth amendment. The evidence that the lighting at the state prison was so poor that it was inadequate for reading, caused eyestrain and fatigue and hindered attempts to insure that basic sanitation was maintained supported the district court's conclusion that the lighting violated the eighth amendment.

The plumbing at the state prison which was in such disrepair as to deprive inmates of basic elements of hygiene and which seriously threatened inmates' physical and mental well-being amounted to cruel and unusual punishment under the eighth amendment.

Vermin infestation at the state prison, considered in light of unsanitary conditions such as standing water, flooded toilets and sinks, and dank air, was unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain proscribed by the eighth amendment.

Lack of adequate ventilation and air flow which undermined the health of prison inmates and the sanitation of the prison violated the minimum requirement of the eighth amendment.

The failure to provide adequate cell cleaning supplies in light of overall squalor at the state prison violated the eighth amendment. (State Penitentiary, Washington)

U.S. District Court
CROWDING
PLUMBING
FOOD SERVICE

Miles v. Bell, 621 F.Supp. 51 (D.C. Conn. 1985). The focus of this complaint was overcrowding, particularly in the housing unit, which once consisted of open dormitories. Pretrial detainees brought a class action suit primarily alleging that the overcrowded dorms increased the spread of disease among them and were psychologically harmful because of the stress, lack of control over their areas and lack of privacy. Most of the plaintiff's proof on the issue was based on comparisons between illness rates in dormitories and other housing methods such as cubicles or single or double cells. Testimony did show higher levels of complaints and a higher level of illness among inmates housed in the open dorms. A doctor testified that the installation of cubicles could correct many of these problems. The court also found no constitutional violation in that the number of toilets and showers did not conform to the standards set by the American Correctional Association (ACA) and by the American Public Health Association (APHA). The ACA advised one toilet and shower facility for every eight inmates, and the APHA advised one toilet for every eight inmates and one shower for every fifteen inmates. The defendants provided one toilet for every ten to fifteen inmates, and one shower for every fourteen to twenty-four inmates, depending on the housing unit. These figures were nearly twice that advised. Still, the court found no violation absent a showing that waiting in line led to either physical or mental problems. Sanitary conditions were not challenged. Although there were certain violations of the health code in the food service in that maggots and weevils were occasionally found, the court found no constitutional violation. (Federal Correctional Institution at Danbury, Connecticut)

1986

U.S. District Court
PLUMBING

Jackson v. Gardner, 639 F.Supp. 1005 (E.D.Tenn. 1986). Inmates of a county jail brought a Section 1983 action challenging the constitutionality of conditions of confinement. After resolution of some of the conditions complained of, and stipulation as to others, the district court held that: (1) Prison conditions under which an average inmate was confined twenty-four hours a day in a physically dilapidated, insect infected, dimly lit, poorly ventilated area averaging under twenty square feet per inmate, without any available recreation or diversion other than some reading or letter writing, sharing a shower which might not have hot water with twelve to fourteen others, sharing a sink and toilet with three or four others, and possibly sleeping on an unsanitary floor, or within inches of a toilet, in clothing which may not have been recently washed, constituted cruel and unusual punishment; (2) In order for the county jail to provide constitutionally acceptable confinement, population at the main jail facility had to be reduced, regular out-of-cell recreation had to be provided, visitation increased, and fire escape plans had to be communicated to inmates and prominently displayed in corridors at all times. (Sullivan County Jail, Tennessee)

U.S. District Court
CLOTHING

McClung v. Camp County, Tex., 627 F.Supp. 528 (E.D. Tex. 1986). District court ules against all prisoner claims in conditions of confinement suit against jail. An inmate who had been incarcerated in a county jail brought action against the county and various county officials alleging that conditions in jail violated his constitutional rights. The federal district court held that: (1) evidence supported a finding that conditions placed on the inmate's physical exercise at the jail did not constitute a violation of inmate's constitutional rights; (2) evidence supported a finding that inmate's constitutional rights were not violated by alleged failure to provide clean bedding, clothing and toiletries; (3) evidence was sufficient to support a finding that jail fire safety conditions did not violate inmate's constitutional rights; and (4) administering insulin to a diabetic inmate three times daily rather than four times daily did not violate the inmate's rights. (Camp County Jail, Texas)

1987

U.S. District Court
PLUMBING
TOILETS

Nilsson v. Coughlin, 670 F.Supp. 1186 (S.D.N.Y. 1987). Inmates stated a claim under the Eighth Amendment for cruel and unusual punishment. The inmates alleged there was raw sewage in the cells, unsanitary dining facilities, a constant level of noise that was physically harmful, a lack of meaningful vocational, educational or recreational programs, and a host of other conditions. The federal court ruled that a fair inference could be drawn from the pro se complaint that the prison officials were grossly negligent in supervising or, alternatively, in promulgating policies, that caused unconstitutional conditions. (Sullivan Correctional Facility, New York)

1988

U.S. District Court
SHOWERS

Davenport v. DeRoberts, 844 F.2d 1310 (7th Cir. 1988), cert. denied, 109 S.Ct. 260. Inmates brought a class action suit against the prison alleging cruel and unusual punishment because they were allowed only one hour per week for exercise and one shower per week. The federal district court granted injunctive relief and allowed three showers per week and five hours out-of-cell exercise per week, except when there was an emergency or a lock down. The court awarded only nominal damages. The Department of Corrections' own medical director testified that four to seven hours outside the cell, and three showers, were the weekly minimum necessary to prevent serious adverse effects on the physical and mental health of inmates confined in what is a form of solitary confinement. The department also argued that each cell contained a wash basin in which the inmate could wash himself as often as he liked and that the cells were large enough for the inmate to engage in various sorts of exercise, including push-ups, sit-ups and running in place. The lower court noted that "we do not suggest that this is always and everywhere the constitutional minima. Much less may suffice when the period of incarceration is brief." However, on the issue of showers, the court noted that limiting the number of showers to one a week did not have a serious effect on the mental or physical well-being of the inmates and that "the deprivation merely of cultural amenities is not cruel and unusual punishment." The appeals court agreed, refusing to uphold an order for three showers per week. (Stateville Correctional Center)

U.S. District Court
CELLS
RODENTS/PESTS

Harris v. Fleming, 839 F.2d 1232 (7th Cir. 1988), affirmed, 993 F.2d 1549. An inmate filed a federal civil rights lawsuit against three prison officials, claiming he had been subjected to cruel and unusual punishment seeking $320,000 in compensatory and punitive damages. The inmate stated that the prison failed to supply him with toilet paper for five days, or with soap, toothpaste or a toothbrush for ten days and he was kept in a "filthy" roach-infested cell. He also complained that during 28 days in a segregation unit he was refused permission to exercise. Since the inmate suffered no physical harm, but merely some unpleasantness, the federal appeals court found that the defendants' temporary neglect of the prisoner was not intentional and that it did not reach unconstitutional proportions. While the court found that the circumstances of the case demonstrated some neglect and indifference on the prison's part, it concluded that the conditions were temporary and affected only one inmate. Although the inmate was deprived of "yard or recreation time," he could have "improvised temporarily with jogging in place, aerobics, or pushups." (Menard Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
HAIR LENGTH

Pollock v. Marshall, 845 F.2d 656 (6th Cir. 1988), cert. denied, 109 S.Ct. 239, reh'g. denied, 109 S.Ct. 545. An inmate at a maximum security facility filed a civil rights action against the prison officials after being required to cut his hair. The inmate professed a belief in Lakota American Indians who believe hair is sacred and should not be cut. The court found the inmate's religious beliefs to be sincere, but they also found prison authorities had interests which were both legitimate and reasonably related to security and sanitation in limiting the length of prisoner's hair. (Southern Ohio Corr. Facility)

1989

U.S. District Court
FOOD SERVICE
SEWERAGE

Fambro v. Fulton County, Ga, 713 F.Supp. 1426 (N.D. Ga. 1989). The matter regarding conditions at a county jail came before the court ex mero motu after the court received a monitor's tentative findings of fact. The district court found that the substandard delivery of medical care in the jail was unconstitutional because it denied sentenced prisoners and pretrial detainees access to adequate health care in violation of the eighth and fourteenth amendments. The medical system subjected inmates to unnecessary risk of contracting dangerous or fatal communicable diseases, required inmates to suffer unnecessary pain and discomfort without the help of medical science, and, under the system, whole classes of inmates who were dependent on pharmaceuticals were required to wait for up to three days to receive their medicine.

The court also found that the substandard sanitation in the jail was unconstitutional. Jails are constitutionally obligated to provide reasonably adequate sanitation for their inmates. This generally requires control of vermin and insects and clean places for eating, sleeping, and working and, additionally, concerns such areas as food preparation, medical facilities, lavatories, and showers. The substandard sanitation in the county jail endangered the health of sentenced prisoners and pretrial detainees, in violation of the eighth and fourteenth amendments. Food was being prepared in unsanitary surroundings and inmates were being required to live and sleep in and around seeping sewerage and in warm dark places which were not regularly and adequately cleaned, lit or ventilated.

The court stated: "At various times heretofore, in an effort to address persistent overcrowding, the court has authorized the sheriff in his discretion to release inmates under a prioritized release order and has imposed a fine of $100 per day for each inmate sleeping on the floor. Other efforts have been made the county in a timid sort of way to select inmates who might be eligible for release. None of these efforts have succeeded in bringing the population of the jail down." In light of the overcrowding, resulting in unconstitutional operation of the county jail, and failure of other means to reduce jail population, a release order was appropriate remedy. (Fulton County Jail, Georgia)

U.S. Appeals Court
CELLS
HOUSEKEEPING
LAUNDRY

Howard v. Adkison, 887 F.2d 134 (8th Cir. 1989). An inmate brought an action against the supervisory officers at the facility at which he was confined, alleging the violation of his eighth amendment rights. The U.S. District Court entered a judgment in favor of the inmate, and the defendants appealed. The appeals court affirmed and found that the evidence concerning filthy conditions in the inmate's cell was sufficient to support a finding that the inmate's eighth amendment rights were violated. According to the court, inmates are entitled to reasonably adequate sanitation, personal hygiene, and laundry privileges, particularly over a lengthy period. Evidence that the inmate was confined for two years in a cell covered with filth and human waste and was denied access to proper cleaning supplies or laundry service was sufficient to establish that his confinement was cruel and unusual punishment within the meaning of the eighth amendment. Evidence that the inmate complained about filthy conditions in his cell continuously over a two-year period but that supervisory officers failed to provide him with any relief was sufficient to hold officers liable for eighth amendment violations. The appeals court upheld an award of $500 actual damages, $1 nominal damages and $750 punitive damages against the special unit manager, and $1,000 punitive damages against the lieutenant. (Missouri DOC and Human Resources)

U.S. Appeals Court
SINKS
CELLS

Johnson v. Pelker, 891 F.2d 136 (7th Cir. 1989). An inmate brought a civil rights action challenging the conditions of his confinement. The U.S. District Court granted a summary judgment for the defendants, and appeal was taken. The appeals court found that neither an accidental dumping of water on the inmate, nor the denial of his request for dry bedding and clothing, deprived him of constitutional rights. The court also ruled that the inmate's allegation that he had been placed in a cell for three days without running water and in which feces had been smeared on walls, while his request for cleaning supplies and for the water to be turned on were ignored, stated a cause of action for the violation of the inmate's eighth amendment rights. (Menard Correctional Center, Illinois)

1990

U.S. District Court
PLUMBING
SEWERAGE

Buffington v. O'Leary, 748 F.Supp. 633 (N.D.Ill. 1990). A prisoner sued a prison official under Section 1983, alleging Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment deprivation. The U.S. District Court found that the prisoner stated a cause of action for constitutional deprivation by alleging that there was "rusted water" and "a scent of bad smelling pipes" in his cell, and that human waste backed up through the plumbing. While the defendant prison official contended that these conditions were no more than "an inconvenience or discomfort," the court found that it could not "with assurance determine that the conditions" in the housing unit met an "essential" or "minimum" standard of sanitation. (Stateville Correctional Center, Illinois)

State Appeals Court
BEDDING

Williams v. Kelone, 560 So.2d 915 (La.App. 1 Cir. 1990). A prisoner brought a tort action against employees of a prison for damages the prisoner allegedly sustained as a result of having to sleep with a soiled blanket. The district court dismissed the action, and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that the prisoner was not deprived of basic personal hygiene, and thus the prisoner was not deprived of a constitutional right to be free of cruel and unusual punishment. A prison's providing a prisoner, who was placed in administrative lockdown, with a blanket which was assigned to the cell, whether the blanket had been used by a previous prisoner or not, was not a deprivation of basic personal hygiene. The prisoners were given clean sheets upon entering administrative lockdown, and the sheets were cleaned weekly thereafter. The blankets were cleaned two to three times a year and were replaced if they became extremely soiled. In point of fact, there was no evidence showing that the prisoners were subject to cold temperatures which would constitutionally require that they be given any blanket at all. Under these conditions, the furnishing of a soiled blanket was not a deprivation of "basic personal hygiene" constituting cruel and unusual punishment. (State Penitentiary, Angola, Louisiana)

1991

U.S. Appeals Court
SEWERAGE

McCord v. Maggio, 927 F.2d 844 (5th Cir. 1991). A state prisoner brought a suit against a warden for alleged violation of Eighth Amendment rights arising from prison conditions. The U.S. District Court entered judgment in favor of the warden. The court of appeals, affirmed in part and reversed and remanded in part. On remand, relief was again denied, and the prisoner appealed. The court of appeals found that the prisoner's Eighth Amendment rights were violated by his repeatedly having to sleep and live in sewage and foul water, and remand was necessary for consideration of whether an "extraordinary circumstances" defense applied and whether causation and significant injury were shown. (Louisiana State Penitentiary)

U.S. Appeals Court
BEDDING
CLOTHING

Porth v. Farrier, 934 F.2d 154 (8th Cir. 1991). A reformatory inmate filed a civil rights action alleging a violation of his Eighth Amendment rights. The U.S. District Court entered judgment for the prison officials and the inmate appealed. The court of appeals found that confinement of the inmate in a strip cell without clothes, bedding, or a mattress for approximately 12 hours was not so inhumane, base or barbaric as to shock one's sensibilities even though the prison officials acted improperly. While clothing and bedding are basic necessities, the court stated, confinement without them can only be determined to be cruel and unusual punishment on the basis of the totality of the circumstances. Prison conditions which only result in discomfort do not amount to cruel and unusual punishment. (Iowa State Men's Reformatory)

U.S. District Court
PLUMBING
SEWERAGE

Thomas v. Jabe, 760 F.Supp. 120 (E.D. Mich. 1991). An inmate brought a civil rights action against prison officials. The officials moved for summary judgment. The district court found that genuine issue of material fact existed as to whether the inmate's Eighth Amendment rights were violated when he was forced to stay in a cell that was flooded with water and human waste. The defendants knew about a water leak and subsequent flooding well in advance of the inmate's placement in the quiet cell, and it should have been obvious it was unsuitable for occupation. (State Prison of Southern Michigan in Jackson)

1992

U.S. Appeals Court
SEWERAGE

Burton v. Armontrout, 975 F.2d 543 (8th Cir. 1992), appeals pending. Inmates brought an action against correctional officers to recover for cruel and unusual punishment for failing to warn inmates that hospital sewage was contaminated with the AIDS (Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome) virus and other infectious diseases. The U.S. District Court directed a verdict in favor of some officers, entered judgment on a jury verdict in favor of the remaining officers, and granted an injunction. Appeals were taken, and the appeals court found that the injunction requiring the county correctional center to provide adequate protective clothing and warnings to inmates of potential danger of working in contaminated waste was permissible despite a general verdict in favor of correctional officers on constitutional claims. The court found that evidence showed that despite the passage of three years and a greater awareness of dangers of AIDS, prison officials failed to provide adequate protective clothing. The court also found that the county inmates who were involved in the cleanup of the sewage were not subjected to "cruel and unusual punishment" when correctional officers failed to warn that sewage could be contaminated with the AIDS virus and other infectious diseases. (Jefferson County Correctional Center, Missouri)

U.S. Appeals Court
HOUSEKEEPING
RODENTS/PESTS

Jackson v. Duckworth, 955 F.2d 21 (7th Cir. 1992). An inmate brought a Section 1983 action against prison officials alleging that subhuman conditions at prison violated the Eighth Amendment's prohibition against infliction of cruel and unusual punishments. The U.S. District Court granted summary judgment for the prison officials, and the inmate appealed. The court of appeals found that genuine issues of material fact as to the ghastliness of the inmate's prison conditions and state of mind of the prison officials precluded summary judgment against the inmate in the action. The inmate's affidavit stated that he was forced to live with filth, rodents, inadequate heating, no toilet paper, and drinking water containing small black worms which turned into small black flies, and that officials visited his unit routinely, and observed the conditions described, but failed to take adequate corrective measures. (Indiana Prison System)

U.S. District Court
FOOD SERVICE

Miles v. Konvalenka, 791 F.Supp. 212 (N.D.Ill. 1992). A prison inmate brought a suit alleging deprivation of his constitutional rights. The district court dismissed the action with prejudice. The court found that the discovery of a dead mouse in a food tray of a fellow inmate did not violate the inmate's Eighth Amendment rights; the deprivation to the inmate was minimal at most and prison officials did not act with deliberate indifference. (Joliet Correctional Center, Joliet, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
HOT WATER
RODENTS/PESTS

Warren v. Stempson, 800 F.Supp. 991 (D.D.C. 1992). An inmate brought a Section 1983 action regarding his treatment and prison conditions. The inmate claimed that the adjustment segregation cell block into which he had been placed was plagued with rats, mice, roaches, spiders, flying bugs, insects, birds and lice, and that the shower water was usually cold. The court did not condone such conditions and believed that, if they exist, they were substandard, the court did not believe they rose to a level of cruel and unusual punishment under the Eighth Amendment. (District of Columbia)

U.S. Appeals Court
FOOD SERVICE
RODENTS/PESTS

Wishon v. Gammon, 978 F.2d 446 (8th Cir. 1992). An inmate brought an action under Section 1983 alleging Eighth Amendment violations and denial of equal protection. The U.S. District Court entered an order granting the prison officials' motion for summary judgment, and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed the decision. The inmate failed to establish that the infestation of his cell with insects and other vermin and the improper cleaning of his cell or the fact that he was allegedly routinely served cold food that was often contaminated with foreign objects violated his Eighth Amendment rights. There was evidence that the cells were sprayed for pests every month and would be sprayed more frequently on request by a prisoner, and that the inmate never used the opportunity provided to clean the cell himself. There was also no evidence that the food served was nutritionally inadequate or prepared in a manner presenting an immediate danger to the inmate's health, or that his health suffered because of the food. (Moberly Training Center for Men, Missouri)

1993

U.S. District Court
HOT WATER

Matthews v. Peters, 818 F.Supp. 224 (N.D.Ill. 1993). A prison inmate brought an action against employees of the Department of Corrections charging that defendants violated his constitutional rights by depriving him of hot water in his cell for a period of seven months while segregated. On the defendants' motion for judgment on pleadings, the district court found that the prison officials would not be relieved on qualified immunity grounds from having to defend the inmate's lawsuit in view of a showing of deliberate indifference by prison officials in the refusal to cure readily remediable conditions. (Stateville Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
SINKS

McNeal v. Ellerd, 823 F.Supp. 627 (E.D. Wis. 1993). Prisoners who were placed in a cell with a non-functional sink brought a Section 1983 action against prison employees seeking damages and declaratory and injunctive relief, and the prison employees moved to dismiss. The district court found that the prisoners failed to show a serious deprivation of basic human needs and thus were unable to establish a prima facie case that prison conditions violated the Eighth Amendment. The prisoners did not allege that generally unsanitary conditions existed, that the non-functional sink caused particular unsanitary conditions in the cell, or that they were deprived of potable water. (Racine Correctional Institution, Wisconsin)

U.S. District Court
SINKS
PLUMBING

Thomas v. Brown, 824 F.Supp. 160 (N.D. Ind. 1993). A state prisoner brought a civil rights action, claiming that he had been deprived of running water in a sink in his cell. The district court found that material issues of fact, precluding summary judgment on behalf of prison officials, existed as to whether the prisoner had been subjected to cruel and unusual punishment. There was dispute about whether the prisoner had notified authorities, and as to whether the officers had shown necessary deliberate indifference to his plight. However, the complaint did not state an equal protection claim. (Indiana State Prison)

U.S. District Court
RODENTS/PESTS

Walton v. Fairman, 836 F.Supp. 511 (N.D. Ill. 1993). Pretrial detainees brought a pro se Section 1983 action against corrections officials and a sheriff alleging that conditions of confinement violated their due process rights. The defendants moved to dismiss. The district court found the pretrial detainees sufficiently alleged facts in their civil rights complaint to show that conditions of confinement in the county jail violated their due process rights so as to survive a motion to dismiss. The detainees alleged that rats bit them and one claimed that a swarm of mice attacked him. The alleged bites and attacks took place in about a month and a half time span. The detainees alleged that they told officials about the large nest of rats and mice and that the officials did not exterminate or make any efforts to rid the jail of the vermin. (Cook County Jail, Illinois)

1994

U.S. Appeals Court
CELLS
HOUSEKEEPING

Whitnack v. Douglas County, 16 F.3d 954 (8th Cir. 1994). An inmate who had been convicted and was awaiting sentencing, and a pretrial detainee, brought a Section 1983 action against a county, the director of the county department of corrections, and correctional officers, alleging unconstitutional conditions of confinement. The U.S. District Court entered judgment for the inmate and detainee, and the correctional officers appealed. The appeals court, reversing and remanding, found that the filthy conditions of a cell did not constitute unconstitutionally cruel and unusual punishment respecting the inmate, and did not violate due process respecting the detainee, given the brevity of their confinement under such conditions. The intolerable conditions lasted not more than 24 hours before adequate cleaning supplies were made available which could make conditions tolerable. (Douglas County Correctional Center, Nebraska)

1995

U.S. District Court
HOUSEKEEPING
PESTS
PLUMBING
RODENTS

Geder v. Godinez, 875 F.Supp. 1334 (N.D. Ill. 1995). A prisoner brought a civil rights action against several prison officials alleging cruel and unusual conditions of confinement. On a motion by the defendants for summary judgment, the district court found that prison conditions, including the alleged presence of defective pipes, sinks and toilets, improperly cleaned showers, a broken intercom system, stained mattresses, accumulated dust and dirt, and infestation by roaches and rats, viewed separately or cumulatively, were insufficient to establish deprivation of human need sufficient to constitute a violation of the Eighth Amendment. No violation was shown absent a showing that prison officials knew of and consciously disregarded an excessive risk to inmates' health or safety. Prison conditions are not unconstitutional under the Eighth Amendment simply because they are restrictive or harsh. (Stateville Correctional Center, Joliet, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
RODENT/PESTS
TOILETS

Masonoff v. DuBois, 899 F.Supp. 782 (D.Mass. 1995). Prison inmates filed a class action suit against prison officials alleging that conditions of confinement violated their rights under the Eighth Amendment. The district court granted summary judgment, in part, for the inmates. The court found that the use of chemical toilets violated the Eighth Amendment rights of the inmates where the use and emptying of the toilets resulted in extremely unsanitary conditions, the toilets caused an unbearable stench, and prison inmates suffered numerous health problems caused by the use of toilets including nausea, burns, and rashes. The court also found that there were genuine issues of material fact as to whether prison officials acted with deliberate indifference regarding chemical toilets, precluding summary judgment. The court held that genuine issues of material fact precluded summary judgment on the allegation that pest or vermin infestation created inadequate sanitation in violation the Eighth Amendment. The court noted that infestation of vermin such as rats, mice, birds, and cockroaches in the prison is inconsistent with adequate levels of sanitation required by the Eighth Amendment. (Southeast Correctional Center, Massachusetts)

U.S. District Court
SHOWERS
HOUSEKEEPING

Summers v. Sheahan, 883 F.Supp. 1163 (N.D.Ill. 1995). An inmate filed a pro se suit against jail officials, seeking compensatory and punitive damages for alleged violations of his constitutional rights. The district court dismissed the action. The court held that the inmate's allegation that he contracted bronchitis because he did not receive his heart medicine failed to state an Eighth Amendment claim absent allegations that jail officials were aware of his condition or that they deliberately withheld his medication. The court also held that failure of the officials to authorize the inmate's overnight stay at a county hospital was not a violation of his rights because the inmate was placed in the jail hospital where he was observed overnight as recommended by the county physician. The inmate alleged he was forced to sleep on cold floors for approximately two months, but the court found this was an inevitable consequence of overcrowding rather than punishment and represented a "temporary inconvenience" rather than a violation of his rights; jail officials were also not liable for failing to deal with the overcrowding problems at the jail. The court found that the inmate's allegations of vermin-infested food rose to the level of a constitutional violation but jail officials were not shown to have been deliberately indifferent to the problem. The inmate's allegations that he was forced to stay in an unsanitary, germ- and bacteria-filled environment, and that showers were filthy and clogged, failed to state a claim for violation of the Eighth Amendment. (Cook County Jail, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
PLUMBING
RODENTS/PESTS
BEDDINGS
CELLS
FOOD SERVICE

Robinson v. Il. State Corr. Ctr. (Stateville), 890 F.Supp. 715 (N.D.Ill. 1995). A prison inmate housed in a segregation unit sued prison officials alleging violation of his civil rights in connection with his conditions of confinement. The district court dismissed several elements of his suit, but found that his complaint that inadequate heating and cooling posed a risk to his health was actionable under § 1983. However, the inmate did not claim that he suffered injuries as a result of unsanitary conditions in the segregation unit and the court found that these claims were not actionable. The inmate alleged that the toilet area was unsanitary, there were roaches and bed bugs, and there was a lack of weekly bedding supplies; the court held that while these allegations stated unpleasant conditions, they did not rise to the level of a constitutional violation. The court also held that allegations that the prison's food preparation area was unsanitary did not present an immediate danger to the health and well-being of the inmate and thus failed to state an actionable claim. (Stateville Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
BEDDING
RODENTS/PESTS
CLOTHING

Ware v. Fairman, 884 F.Supp. 1201 (N.D.Ill. 1995). An inmate brought a pro se § 1983 action against county officials seeking compensatory and punitive damages for alleged violations of his constitutional rights. The district court granted the defendants' motion to dismiss. The conditions that the inmate complained of--sleeping on the floor inside a cold cell for one week--although uncomfortable, were at most temporary and were therefore not serious enough to be considered cruel and unusual punishment. The court noted that nothing in the Constitution requires elevated beds for prisoners. The inmate's claims that he had not had a change of uniform or sheets from the time of his arrival, and that his tier was infested with roaches, water bugs, fruit flies and mice failed to state an Eighth Amendment claim absent an allegation and a factual basis supporting the inference that the defendants maintained the conditions to punish the inmate. The court also noted that failure of prison officials to keep vermin under control in a crowded jail does not violate the Constitution. (Cook County Department of Corrections, Illinois)

1996

U.S. Appeals Court
RODENTS/PESTS
BEDDING
HOUSEKEEPING

Antonelli v. Sheahan, 81 F.3d 1422 (7th Cir. 1996). A county jail resident filed a pro se § 1983 action against jail officials, alleging constitutional deprivations. The district court dismissed the suit and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed the lower court decisions regarding some conditions of confinement and issues, including floor-sleeping, theft of his property, lockdowns, denial of access to courts, and denial of opportunity to participate in rehabilitative programs to earn good-time credits. But the appeals court reversed the lower court by finding that several allegations were sufficient to state claims. The appeals court found that the inmate's allegations of deliberate indifference to prolonged pest infestation at the jail were sufficient to state a § 1983 claim. The inmate admitted that the jail had been sprayed twice by a pest control service during a 16-month period, but he alleged that cockroaches were everywhere and that roaches and mice crawled over him and constantly awakened him. He also stated a claim by alleging that he was denied protection from cold temperatures in the jail by the jail staff's failure to provide him with blankets. (Cook County Jail, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
TOILETS
PLUMBING

Smith v. Copeland, 87 F.3d 265 (8th Cir. 1996). A pretrial detainee brought a federal civil rights action against jail officials alleging the use of excessive force and challenging his conditions of confinement. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants on several issues and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the inmate's allegations that he was exposed to raw sewage for four days due to an overflowing toilet failed to state a constitutional claim based on conditions of confinement. The court found that having to endure the stench of his own feces and urine for four days amounted to a de minimis imposition on detainee's rights, and noted that the inmate did not dispute the assertion by jail officials that he was offered the opportunity to clean up the mess himself. (Cape Girardeau County Jail, Missouri)

U.S. Appeals Court
SHOWERS

Snipes v. Detella, 95 F.3d 586 (7th Cir. 1996). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against corrections officials alleging violation of his Eighth Amendment rights when his toenail was removed without local anesthetic, and complaining of unsanitary shower conditions. The district court entered summary judgment for the defendants and the appeals court affirmed. The court found that shower conditions, which allegedly required the inmate to shower in an inch or two of standing water giving rise to a fear of contracting a communicable disease, did not pose a risk of serious harm. (Danville Correctional Center, Illinois)

1997

U.S. Appeals Court
RODENTS/PESTS
CLOTHING
HOUSEKEEPING
SEWERAGE

Beverati v. Smith, 120 F.3d 500 (4th Cir. 1997). Inmates sued prison officials alleging that their confinement to administrative segregation violated their procedural and substantive due process rights. The district court granted summary judgment for the officials and the inmates appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that conditions in administrative segregation were not so atypical that exposure to them for six months imposed significant hardship in relation to the ordinary incidents of prison life. The alleged conditions included: cells infested with vermin; cells smeared with human feces and urine and flooded with water; unbearably hot temperatures; cold food in small portions; infrequent receipt of clean clothing, bedding and linen; inability to leave cells more than three or four times per week; denial of outside recreation; and denial of educational or religious services. (Maryland Penitentiary)

U.S. District Court
WATER

Gholson v. Murry, 953 F.Supp. 709 (E.D.Va. 1997). Inmates brought a § 1983 action against prison officials alleging violation of their constitutional rights. The district court granted summary judgment for the officials. The court held that officials did not violate the Eighth Amendment with respect to lead in the prison water system because the officials reviewed the situation and informed staff and inmates of the steps they needed to take to safeguard themselves from exposure. (Mecklenburg Correctional Center, Virginia)

U.S. District Court
CROWDING
HOT WATER
PLUMBING
RODENTS/PESTS
SEWERAGE
WATER

Jones v. City and County of San Francisco, 976 F.Supp. 896 (N.D.Cal. 1997). Pretrial detainees brought a class action against the City and County of San Francisco and various city officials challenging the constitutionality of their conditions of confinement at a jail. The district court granted various summary judgment motions filed by the plaintiffs and the defendants, enjoining future overcrowding based on past unconstitutional overcrowding. The court found due process violations based on the defendants' inadequate response to fire safety risks at the jail, excessive risks of harm from earthquakes, physical defects in the jail's water, plumbing and sewage systems, excessive noise levels, and poor lighting. The court found due process violations resulting from physical defects in the jail's water, plumbing and sewage system which created safety hazards. The jail's antiquated water supply system violated public health requirements and safe drinking water codes. Deteriorated sanitary fixtures such as unsealed floors, hot water pipes with deteriorated asbestos insulation, violated the detainees' rights as did sewage leaks from plumbing equipment. These conditions violated detainees' rights even though there was no evidence of any disease resulting from the deficiencies. The court found that although conditions relating to food preparation and storage remained inadequate, recent improvements including efforts to combat vermin infestation and allocating $100,000 to replace a floor and make other repairs shielded the defendants from liability for deliberate indifference. (San Francisco Jail No. 3, California)

U.S. District Court
FOOD SERVICE
RODENTS/PESTS

Tucker v. Rose, 955 F.Supp. 810 (N.D.Ohio 1997). Inmates brought a claim against a prison warden, food service supervisor, and food service manager alleging Eighth Amendment violations based on serving inmates food tainted by rodents. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants, finding that occasional rodent presence was not sufficiently serious for an Eighth Amendment claim. The court found that none of the defendants were deliberately indifferent to the situation, noting ongoing pest control measures at the facility including semi-monthly preventative measures and regular inspections. According to the court, rodents had been detected infrequently in the food service area, had never presented a significant problem at the prison food service area, and the food service supervisor did not observe any evidence of rodents in connection with an allegedly tainted bag of food. (Lorain Correctional Institution, Ohio)

1998

U.S. Appeals Court
CELLS
SHOWERS

Barney v. Pulsipher, 143 F.3d 1299 (10th Cir. 1998). Two female former inmates who were sexually assaulted by a jailer each brought a § 1983 action against jailer, county, sheriff and county commissioners based on their assault and other conditions of confinement. The actions were consolidated and all defendants except the jailer were granted summary judgment by the district court. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the sheriff and commissioners did not act with deliberate indifference to the female inmates' health and safety with regard to conditions of confinement. The inmates' allegations regarding a filthy cell, inadequate lighting and ventilation, lack of enclosure around a shower, unappetizing food, and lack of access to recreational facilities, did not rise to the level of a constitutional violation given that the inmates were confined for only 48 hours. (Box Elder County Jail, Utah)

U.S. Appeals Court
WATER

LaBounty v. Coughlin, 137 F.3d 68 (2nd Cir. 1998). An inmate sued prison officials under § 1983 alleging that he was subjected to unconstitutional conditions of confinement. The district court entered summary judgment for the officials and the inmate appealed. The appeals court vacated and remanded, finding that the inmate stated an Eighth Amendment deliberate indifference claim based on allegations that he was exposed to friable asbestos while incarcerated and that officials knowingly failed to protect him from such exposure. The court also vacated summary judgment on the inmate's tainted drinking water claim to allow the district court to determine whether officials responded properly to the inmate's request for production of documents. (Woodbourne Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
BEDDING
RODENTS/PESTS
HOUSEKEEPING

Simpson v. Horn, 25 F.Supp.2d 563 (E.D.Pa. 1998). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against a corrections commissioner and officials, alleging that conditions of confinement at an overcrowded facility violated his Eighth Amendment rights, and that a classification system for double-cell assignment violated the equal protection clause. The district court found that the alleged deficiencies in the facility were not cruel and unusual punishment, but that fact issues precluded summary judgment on the equal protection claim. The court found that housing two inmates in a cell designed for one inmate does not, per se, violate the Eighth Amendment proscription against cruel and unusual punishment, but it may if it results in deprivations of essential food, medical care, sanitation or other conditions intolerable for human confinements. The inmate had alleged that as the result of overcrowding, inmates were not provided with adequate furniture, cleaning supplies, laundry service, ventilation, bedding, clothing, seating, recreational equipment, or telephones. He also alleged that food was served cold 85% of the time and that the dining hall was not kept clean or free of vermin. (State Correctional Institution at Graterford, Pennsylvania)

1999

U.S. District Court
CROWDING
TOILETS
SHOWER

Harris v. Brewington-Carr, 49 F.Supp.2d 378 (D.Del. 1999). A pretrial detainee challenged his conditions of confinement and a district court judge refused to dismiss the case, finding that the detainee had sufficiently alleged violation of his due process rights. The pretrial detainee alleged that he was required to sleep on the floor for one week while being held in a booking and receiving area, that he had to sleep on the floor for three weeks before receiving a bed, that he was housed in a one man cell with two other men, that the open toilet in his cell was unsanitary and deprived him of his right to privacy, that there was a lack of showers and excessive noise, that he was housed with sentenced and unsentenced inmates, and that as a non-smoker he had to breathe cigarette smoke from other inmates. (Multi-Purpose Criminal Justice Facility, Delaware)

U.S. Appeals Court
TOILETS

Palmer v. Johnson, 193 F.3d 346 (5th Cir. 1999). A state inmate brought a § 1983 action for monetary and injunctive relief against correctional officials, alleging violation of his constitutional rights when he was forced to spend a night on a work field, along with other members of a work squad, without adequate bathroom facilities and shelter. The district court found a warden and assistant warden liable in their individual capacities, granted injunctive relief, and ordered claims for monetary damages to proceed to trial. The appeals court affirmed in part and remanded, finding that the inmate had demonstrated a violation of his clearly established Eighth Amendment rights and that the warden and assistant warden were not entitled to summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity. The inmate alleged that he and other members of his work crew were confined outdoors overnight without any shelter, jackets, blankets, or a source of heat while the temperature dropped and the wind blew, and without bathroom facilities for 49 inmates sharing a small bounded area. The warden allegedly ordered this "sleep-out" in response to the inmates' response to a lecture they had received from a sergeant after lunch. They were ordered to stop and sit in the field, even though some of them wanted to go to work. They were confined to an area measuring approximately twenty feet by thirty feet, bounded by poles and a string of lights. Correctional officers were ordered to shoot any inmate who attempted to leave the designated area. When the inmate asked permission to leave the area to urinate and defecate he was informed that he would be shot if he attempted to do so outside of the boundaries that had been set. The inmates were dressed in short sleeve shirts for a day of work in the field, but the temperature fell below fifty-nine degrees overnight and the inmates were forced to stay warm by huddling together. Both the warden and assistant warden were present during the evening of the "sleep-out" and the warden allegedly threatened another such event if the inmates refused to work. (Texas Department of Criminal Justice, Institutional Division)

U.S. Appeals Court
WATER

Robinson v. Page, 170 F.3d 747 (7th Cir. 1999). An inmate brought a civil rights action alleging that his Eighth Amendment rights were violated by prison officials' refusal to address the problem of lead in the prison's drinking water. The district court dismissed the case. The appeals court affirmed in part and vacated and remanded in part. The appeals court held that to the extent that the inmate sought relief for alleged physical consequences he had or would suffer as the result of lead in the water, the action was not barred by the federal statute (CRIPA) that restricted inmate suits for mental or emotional injury. The appeals court disagreed with the district court's decision that the inmate had not alleged an amount of lead in the water that currently made him ill. The appeals court remanded the case for further action regarding the possibility of future health problems that might be alleged. (Tamms Closed Maximum Security Facility, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
SHOWERS
WATER
HOUSEKEEPING

Roop v. Squadrito, 70 F.Supp.2d 868 (N.D.Ind. 1999). An inmate who was HIV-positive and incarcerated in a county jail on an outstanding arrest warrant brought a § 1983 claim and a claim under the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) against county officials. The district court denied summary judgment for the defendants. He was initially housed by himself in an old shower room, which had a working shower but no flushable toilet. After five days he was moved to a solitary cell located close to the jail's command module, where there was no toilet or shower in the cell. The court found that the fact that the inmate was required to sleep on a floor mattress for an extended period of time and was not provided with a bunk while detained in the jail was not a constitutional deprivation under the Eighth Amendment. The court also found no constitutional violation in the alleged lack of ability to exercise while in the county jail, since he could have done sit-ups or push-ups in his cell and was only in jail for 30 days. No violation was found regarding the inmate's complaint that he was not able to take showers more often while confined because the court held that the deprivation of "a mere cultural amenity" is not cruel and unusual punishment. The inmate's complaints about sanitation, including dirt on the floor of his cell, were not found to be a constitutional violation. However, the court found that the alleged deprivations and violations, when taken together, constituted a violation of his Eighth Amendment rights, precluding summary judgment for the jail officials. (Allen County Jail, Indiana)

2000

U.S. District Court
HAIR CUTTING

Deblasio v. Johnson, 128 F.Supp.2d 315 (E.D.Va. 2000). State prisoners brought a § 1983 action challenging a state corrections department's grooming regulation that required all male inmates' hair to be no more than one inch thick and precluded special styles such as braids or mohawks. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants, finding that the regulation did not violate the inmates' rights under the First or Fourth Amendments. The court also found that punishment for violations of the regulation, which included isolation and loss of recreation and visitation privileges, did not violate the Eight Amendment. The court held that even if the regulation had a disparate impact on inmates of a certain religion, it did not violate the equal protection clause. The court also found that the regulation did not violate the equal protection clause with regard to alleged gender discrimination, where the prison experience and data demonstrated that male inmates were more violent than female inmates, and therefore contraband hidden in the hair of male inmates posed a greater security threat. According to the court, failure to ensure that barbering equipment was sanitized between haircuts and that barbers were trained and checked or vaccinated for hepatitis, did not violate the Eight Amendment. The court also found no Eight Amendment violation in the refusal of officials to provide razors to inmates to facilitate compliance with the regulation, even though this resulted in inmates borrowing razors from other inmates, increasing the risk of hepatitis. (Virginia Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
SEWERAGE

Oladipupo v. Austin, 104 F.Supp.2d 643 (W.D.La. 2000). A detainee of the Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS) who was awaiting removal from the United States brought a § 1983 action against parish jail officials challenging the constitutionality of his conditions of confinement. The district court found that the fact that INS detainees held at the parish jail had fewer privileges than INS detainees held at a federal detention center did not violate the Equal Protection Clause. The court also found that housing INS detainees with convicted prisoners did not violate the Due Process Clause. The court denied summary judgment for the officials on the allegation that the housing unit at the jail had serious sewage problems that created unsanitary conditions. The court also denied summary judgment to the officials on the allegation that the jail had an inadequate number of emergency exits. (Avoyelles Parish Jail, Louisiana)

2001

U.S. District Court
CLOTHING
BEDDING
LAUNDRY

Brown v. McElroy, 160 F.Supp.2d 699 (S.D.N.Y. 2001). A prisoner brought an action against the Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS) and Public Health Service (PHS) alleging inadequate medical treatment and other complaints. The district court found that PHS officials were absolutely immune from liability on the claim of inadequate health care. The court found no constitutional violation from the alleged conditions of a cold room, no clean bed linens, toiletries, or clean clothing. (Buffalo Federal Detention Facility, Batavia, New York)

U.S. District Court
HOUSEKEEPING
PLUMBING
SEWERAGE

Caldwell v. District of Columbia, 201 F.Supp.2d 27 (D.D.C. 2001). An inmate filed a § 1983 action against the District of Columbia and several employees of its corrections department, alleging unconstitutional conditions of confinement and denial of medical care. A jury entered a verdict in favor of the inmate, on all claims, and awarded $174,178. The appeals court granted judgment for the defendants as a matter of law, in part, denied judgment for the defendants in part, and did not reduce the damage award. The court found that statements by the inmate's attorney during his closing argument, suggesting specific dollar amounts to be considered by the jury, did not warrant a new trial. The appeals court held that findings that conditions were unconstitutional were supported by evidence, as were findings that officials were deliberately indifferent to the inmate's serious medical needs. The appeals court held that the prisoner sufficiently alleged a "physical injury" for the purposes of PLRA, with allegations that excessive heat in his cell made him dizzy, dehydrated, and disoriented, gave him a severe rash, and that smoke from rolled toilet paper "wicks" and frequent use of mace gave him bronchial irritation and a runny nose. The inmate also alleged that the small bunk aggravated his arthritis. The appeals court held that the inmate's exposure to feces in his cell, foul water, filth, excessive heat, smoke, and mace, and the lack of outdoor exercise, resulted in a substantial risk of serious harm. (Max. Sec'y Facility, Lorton Corr'l Complex, District of Columbia)

U.S. District Court
TOILETS

Carlyle v. Aubrey, 189 F.Supp.2d 660 (W.D.Ky. 2001). A former prisoner brought a § 1983 action against a county jail alleging Eighth Amendment violations. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court held that the prisoner was not subjected to unconstitutional conditions of confinement, even though water service in his cell was broken, he was forced to sleep on the floor, and he was fed only a bologna sandwich. The prisoner had admitted that he was offered drinking water on at least two occasions and that officers brought in water to flush the toilet. The court noted that although forcing a prisoner to sleep on the floor for extended periods may amount to an Eighth Amendment violation, the temporary inconvenience of one night spent on the floor does not. (Jefferson County Jail, Kentucky)

U.S. Appeals Court
WATER

Carroll v. Detella, 255 F.3d 470 (7th Cir. 2001). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against state prison officials and state environmental protection officials, seeking damages and injunctive relief on the grounds that the drinking water at two state prisons was contaminated. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that alleged lead contamination in one prison, and radium contamination in another prison, did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment. According to the court, the lead contamination was caused by corrosion of the water pipes, but only when water was still in the pipes overnight, and the inmate had been told to let water run before drinking it in the morning. The environmental protection agency had found the level of radium in the water at the other prison was less than half of the maximum allowed in a revised standard. The court noted that failing to provide a maximally safe environment, one completely free from pollution or safety hazards, is not a violation of the Eighth Amendment. (Stateville and Menard Correctional Facilities, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
SHOWERS

Curry v. Kerik, 163 F.Supp.2d 232 (S.D.N.Y. 2001). A pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against corrections officials alleging violation of the due process clause arising out of dangerous conditions. The court held that the detainee stated a due process violation by alleging that he was exposed to an unsanitary and hazardous showering area for over nine months. The court found that the detainee's allegation that officials negligently appointed, trained and supervised employees and failed to enforce rules requiring facility inspections and addressing repair complaints were sufficient to show the personal involvement of the officials. The detainee alleged that he had alerted the officials to dangerous conditions on several occasions, and the conditions led to his injury when he fell in a shower, which stated a claim of deliberate indifference according to the court. The inmate alleged that the shower facility in his unit leaked, tiles were falling off the wall, and there were no shower curtains or floor mats. (North Infirmary Command, Correctional Facility, New York City Department of Correctional Services)

U.S. Appeals Court
TOILETS
SEWERAGE

Despain v. Uphoff, 264 F.3d 965 (10th Cir. 2001). A prison inmate brought a § 1983 action against prison officials alleging Eighth Amendment violations. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the officials and the inmate appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The appeals court held that flooding of the prison's administrative segregation unit was a significant deprivation, as required to support an Eighth Amendment claim, and that there was an issue of material fact as to whether there was an ongoing threat to safety during the flooding that would justify the inmate's exposure to human waste. Because the inmate's extended exposure to human waste as a result of flooding was a violation of clearly established law, the court found that an associate prison warden was not entitled to qualified immunity. The court also found that the inmate stated a claim of excessive use of force in his allegation that a corrections officer indiscriminately discharged pepper spray. (Wyoming State Penitentiary)

U.S. Appeals Court
PLUMBING
RODENTS/PESTS

Gaston v. Coughlin, 249 F.3d 156 (2nd Cir. 2001). A prisoner brought a § 1983 action alleging that his conditions of confinement violated the Eighth Amendment. The district court dismissed the action and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, vacated in part and remanded. The appeals court held that the prisoner's allegations regarding unsanitary conditions in his cell and exposure to below-freezing temperatures during winter due to unrepaired broken windows, were sufficient to state an Eighth Amendment claim. The prisoner alleged that mice were constantly entering his cell and that the area directly in front of his cell was filled with human feces, urine and sewage water for several days. (Auburn Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
CLOTHING
FOOD SERVICE
SEWERAGE
HOT WATER

Herman v. Holiday, 238 F.3d 660 (5th Cir. 2001). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against prison officials alleging constitutional violations, including unhealthful conditions and exposure to asbestos. The district court entered summary judgment for the officials and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the inmate was precluded from recovering for emotional or mental damages because he failed to allege a physical injury. The inmate alleged that he was subject to cold showers, cold food, unsanitary dishes, insect problems, lack of adequate clothing, and the presence of an open "cesspool" near his housing unit. (East Carroll Detention Center, Louisiana)

2002

U.S. District Court
FOOD SERVICES

Drake v. Velasco, 207 F.Supp.2d 809 (N.D.Ill. 2002). An inmate sued county corrections officials and a food service company under § 1983, alleging failure to provide him with sanitary meals. The district court denied the defendants' motion to dismiss. The court held that the inmate's allegations supported Fourteenth Amendment claims and a claim of deliberate indifference under § 1983. The court found that the inmate sufficiently alleged sufficient injury. The inmate alleged that the food service company's preparation was so unsanitary as to pose both an immediate risk to the inmate's health, and that the food served hindered his recovery from his ulcer, cirrhosis of the liver, and Hepatitis B and C. The inmate alleged that unsanitary conditions included serving meals on trays that contained spoiled food from previous meals, and inadequate supervision of employees that resulted in improper handling, preparation and sterilization of equipment. (Cook County Jail, Illinois, and Aramark Food Services)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEWERAGE
TOILETS

Frye v. Pettis County Sheriff Dept., 41 Fed.Appx. 906 (8th Cir. 2002). A pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against county officials, alleging unsafe and hazardous living conditions at a county jail. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the detainee failed to show that jail officials were deliberately indifferent to his health and safety because the toilet in his cell leaked both sewage and water. Jail staff frequently provided blankets or towels to absorb the water and a plumber had attempted to fix the toilet after the detainee slipped and fell. (Pettis County Jail, Missouri)

U.S. District Court
BEDDINGS
CELLS
TOILETS
SHOWERS

Liles v. Camden County Dept. of Corrections, 225 F.Supp.2d 450 (D.N.J. 2002). Former inmates brought an action against county officials alleging that conditions of confinement violated their Eighth Amendment rights. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants in part, and denied it in part. The court held that no evidence showed that prison mattresses, that were between two and two and one-half inches thick, caused the inmates' back injuries. The court found that the inmates' claims regarding inadequate bedding did not rise to the level required to support a claims of inadequate prison conditions, where the inmates received two sheets and one blanket, but no pillow. The court found that the inmates' claims that they received spoiled food on one occasion, and were served food on trays that smelled, did not rise to the level required to support a claims of inadequate prison conditions. The court held that evidence did not support the claim that shower conditions caused the inmates to break out in rashes. Although the inmates presented an expert report of a "forensic sanitarian," the court noted that the report concluded only that the poor condition of the shower and lack of sanitation "may result" in rashes. Inmates alleged that state laundry services did not adequately clean their laundry, causing them to hand-wash their clothing and dry and store their clothing in their cells. The court held that the inmates failed to show any practice or policy of the prison that caused rashes and infections. The court held that a 22-day lock-down that caused inconvenience and discomfort to the inmates did not violate the Eighth Amendment, although the inmates were allowed only 20 minutes daily outside their cells to shower, use the bathroom, exercise and make phone calls. The court noted that the lock-down went into effect because an inmate had tried to escape out of a prison roof and the roof had to be prepared. The court found that summary judgment was precluded by fact issues as to whether fighting that broke out as the result of prisoners urinating on each other constituted a threat to the health and safety of the inmates. The inmates alleged that violence among inmates broke out when urine splashed on inmates who slept on cell floors next to toilets, due to crowding. (Camden County Correctional Facility, New Jersey)

U.S. District Court
SANITATION

Ortiz v. Voinovich, 211 F.Supp.2d 917 (S.D.Ohio 2002). An inmate sued state officials alleging that she was sexually assaulted by a corrections officer and that she was subjected to cruel and unusual punishment in violation of her Eighth Amendment rights. The district granted summary judgment for the defendants in part, and denied it in part. The court found no evidence to support the claim that a prison investigator and warden had knowledge of inadequate conditions while the inmate was in segregation. The inmate alleged she was provided with inadequate heat, bedding, sanitation and access to medical treatment while segregated. (Ohio Reformatory for Women at Marysville)

U.S. District Court
BEDDING

Smith v. Board of County Com'rs. of County of Lyon, 216 F.Supp.2d 1209 (D.Kan. 2002). A prisoner brought state tort and federal Eighth Amendment claims against county officials arising out of a serious spinal chord injury he allegedly suffered in a fall, and for which he did not receive requested medical attention. The defendants moved for summary judgment and the district court granted the motions in part, and denied in part. The district court found no Eighth Amendment violation from the failure of jail staff to provide clean bedding and clothing to the inmate who suffered from incontinence, on four or five occasions. The court concluded that the inmate's complaint that officials failed to supervise jail staff to ensure compliance with procedures was "far too generic" to support an Eighth Amendment claim, and that he failed to show systemic and gross deficiencies in training jail personnel. The inmate was a trustee in the jail and alleged that he fell while working in the kitchen and sustained injuries. An officer noticed the inmate limping about a week after the alleged fall and immediately took the inmate to the jail medical room for evaluation.

The inmate also alleged that the jail failed to follow certain national standards, but according to the court, failed to show that the jail had any duty to follow those national standards. The officials asserted that the minimum legal standards for the operation of county jails are established in state law, rather than by national standards. (Lyon County Jail, Kansas)

2003

U.S. District Court
CELLS

Boyd v. Anderson, 265 F.Supp.2d 952 (N.D.Ind. 2003). Prisoners filed a complaint in state court, alleging that state corrections officials had violated their federally-protected rights while they were confined in a state prison. The case was removed to federal court, where some of the claims were dismissed. The court held that the prisoners' allegations that cells were very small and that they were denied out of cell recreation stated an Eighth Amendment claim. The court found that the prisoners stated an Eighth Amendment claim with their allegations that their cells were filthy and that they suffered from a total lack of sanitation and personal hygiene. The court held that the prisoners stated an Eighth Amendment claim with allegations that their cells were small and that they were denied out of cell recreation. (Indiana State Prison)

U.S. District Court
RODENTS/PESTS
SHOWERS

Govan v. Campbell, 289 F.Supp.2d 289 (N.D.N.Y. 2003). An inmate filed a pro se action alleging that county officials violated his Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment rights. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court held that the inmate's alleged conditions, consisting of unclean shower stalls with rust bubbles, cockroaches that crawled into his orifices while he slept, wild birds that were flying free through the facility, and an unsafe condition that resulted from the on-duty officer's inability to see directly into his cell at all times, did not rise to the level of a constitutional violation. The inmate also alleged that a correctional officer was sleeping while he was supposed to be supervising recreation in a gym. The court noted that the inmate did not assert how he was actually harmed by the conditions. (Albany County Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
TOILETS

Mitchell v. Newryder, 245 F.Supp.2d 200 (D.Me. 2003). A detainee brought a § 1983 action against a county jail officer, alleging permanent traumatization as a result of being made to sit in his feces for five hours after his repeated requests to use a toilet were denied by the officer. The district court denied the officer's motion to dismiss. The court found that the detainee sufficiently alleged that he was denied a minimum civilized measure of life's necessity and that the officer had a culpable state of mind. The court held that the detainee could not seek compensatory damages absent an actual physical injury. The court agreed to consider the detainee's request for injunctive relief, barring further interference with his rights by the officer. The detainee alleged that the officer refused to allow him to use a toilet and then refused to let him clean himself up for five hours after he defecated in his pants. According to the detainee, the officer displayed hostility towards him during his denial, using insulting and offensive language and expressions. The detainee had been placed in a cell without a toilet, mattress or blanket, upon his admission to the jail. He was not being punished for anything but he was purposefully being separated from other inmates. The detainee alleged that he was not intoxicated, nor did he act disrespectfully. (Aroostook County Jail, Maine)

U.S. District Court
TOILETS
CELLS

Porter v. Selsky, 287 F.Supp.2d 180 (W.D.N.Y. 2003). A prisoner brought a civil rights action alleging Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment violations. The court held that officials were not deliberately indifferent to conditions that posed a substantial risk of harm to the inmate, even though the inmate was subjected to other inmates who threw feces, set fires, and flooded cells with overflowing toilets. The court noted that the officials spent a great deal of time addressing those acts, cleaning and disinfecting the cells, moving inmates behind plexiglass shields, and punishing the violators. (Special Housing Unit, Wende Correctional Facility, New York)

2004

U.S. District Court
HOUSEKEEPING
CROWDING

Brown v. Mitchell, 327 F.Supp.2d 615 (E.D.Va. 2004). The administratrix of the estate of a jail inmate who contracted and died from bacterial meningitis while in jail brought a civil rights action. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants in part, and denied it in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by fact issues as to whether the city had a policy or custom of jail mismanagement, and whether any policy or custom caused the inmate's death. The court also found that there were fact issues as to whether the sheriff violated the Eighth Amendment regarding jail overcrowding. The court ordered further proceedings to determine if the city council was aware of the long history of overcrowding, poor ventilation and structural defects in the jail. The court found that the sheriff did not violate the Eighth Amendment by failing to maintain sanitation in the jail, because sanitation deficiencies were caused by overcrowding, not by her failure to perform. The sheriff was also not found liable for failure to train her staff, where she had an illness-recognition and response program in place which consisted of initial and follow-up training, combined with surprise inspections. The court noted that the guards' failure to respond to the obvious illness of the inmate could be attributed to their failure to apply their training, for which the sheriff was not responsible. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by material issues of fact as to whether the jail physician showed deliberate indifference when he ordered the inmate returned to overcrowded and ill-ventilated quarters, essentially without treatment. (Richmond City Jail, Virginia)

U.S. Appeals Court
RODENTS/PESTS

Gates v. Cook, 376 F.3d 323 (5th Cir. 2004). A death row prisoner brought a suit on behalf of himself and other prisoners confined to death row, alleging that certain conditions of confinement on death row violated the Eighth Amendment's prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment. The district court found that a number of conditions violated the Eighth Amendment and issued an injunction designed to alleviate the conditions. The defendants appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part and vacated in part. The court found an Eighth Amendment violation due to mosquito infestation coupled with insufficient screen gauge, which exacerbated the heat problems by deterring death row inmates from opening their windows to increase circulation. The court noted that pest infestation problems were linked to chronic sleep deprivation, which exacerbated the symptoms of mental illness. The court found a violation due to "ping-pong" toilets, and that corrections officials were deliberately indifferent to the risk of harm that these toilets presented to death row inmates. Experts established that a serious health hazard resulted when the feces of one inmate bubbled up in the neighboring cell, and that this was exacerbated when toilets overflowed. According to the court, the State Department of Health warned corrections officials every year for the past eleven years that the malfunctioning toilets were a critical public health problem that required immediate attention. (Mississippi Department of Corrections, Unit 32-C, State Penitentiary in Parchman)

U.S. District Court
TOILETS

Masonoff v. Dubois, 336 F.Supp.2d 54 (D.Mass. 2004). State inmates filed a class action under § 1983 alleging that conditions of their confinement violated their Eighth Amendment rights. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants in part, and denied it in part. The court held that the facility's superintendent and administrator were not entitled to qualified immunity because a prisoner's right to adequate and hygienic means to dispose of his bodily wastes was clearly established in 1991. The court noted that a state court had required prison officials to inspect toilets at least twice per month and issued specific directions regarding their inspection, cleaning and replacement. The officials allegedly did nothing to alleviate obvious sanitation problems associated with the cleaning and maintenance of the toilets. (Southeast Correctional Center, Massachusetts)

2005

U.S. District Court
WATER

Brown v. Williams, 399 F.Supp.2d 558 (D.Del. 2005). A detainee brought an in forma pauperis action against prison officials alleging unconstitutional conditions of confinement. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the officials. The court held that the detainee was not exposed to unreasonably high levels of contaminated water, although water from his cell sink was allegedly discolored, and the detainee fainted shortly after he drank the water. A sample of the water was taken to a laboratory for independent testing and it met or exceeded requisite standards. (Howard R. Young Correctional Institution, Delaware)

U.S. Appeals Court
CELLS
SINKS
TOILETS
WATER

Hearns v. Terhune, 413 F.3d 1036 (9th Cir. 2005). A state prison inmate brought a § 1983 action alleging violation of his Eighth Amendment rights related to an attack in prison, and inhumane conditions in a disciplinary segregation unit. The district court dismissed the action and the inmate appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The court held that the inmate's allegations stated a claim that conditions were sufficiently serious to form the basis for an Eighth Amendment violation. The inmate alleged that there was a lack of drinkable water in the prison yard, where temperatures exceeded one hundred degrees. The inmate also alleged that conditions in disciplinary segregation created serious health hazards, including toilets that did not work, sinks that were rusted, and stagnant pools of water that were infested with insects. (Calipatria State Prison, California)

U.S. Appeals Court
CELLS
TOILETS
WATER

Surprenant v. Rivas, 424 F.3d 5 (1st Cir. 2005). A pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against a county jail and jail personnel, alleging that he was falsely accused of an infraction, deprived of due process in disciplinary proceedings, and subjected to unconstitutional conditions of confinement. A jury found the defendants liable on three counts and the district court denied judgment as a matter of law for the defendants. The defendants appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held conditions of confinement were shown to be constitutionally deficient, where the detainee was placed in around-the-clock segregation with the exception of a five-minute shower break every third day, all hygiene items were withheld from him, he could only access water--including water to flush his toilet--at the discretion of individual officers, and was subjected daily to multiple strip searches that required him to place his unwashed hands into his mouth. (Hillsborough County Jail, New Hampshire)

2006

U.S. District Court
FOOD SERVICE

Carr v. Whittenburg, 462 F.Supp.2d 925 (S.D.Ill. 2006). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against prison officials, alleging retaliation for filing a prison grievance regarding food handling by the security staff and the inmate cell house workers. The court held that genuine issues of material fact as to the intent and motive of the prison officials precluded summary judgment. The grievance alleged that the Unit Superintendent allowed his security staff and the inmate cell house workers to act as food handlers in the absence of required medical staff approval and appropriate sanitation apparel, in violation of Illinois Department of Corrections policies. (Menard Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
CELLS

Keel v. Dovey, 459 F.Supp.2d 946 (C.D.Cal. 2006). A state inmate filed a § 1983 action alleging that prison officials violated her civil rights by placing her in administrative segregation pending the investigation of a disciplinary charge against her, and by conducting a disciplinary hearing that violated her procedural due process rights. Officials moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion.. The court held that the administrative segregation the inmate endured pending disciplinary investigation was not an atypical and significant hardship in relation to the ordinary incidents of prison life. According to the court, even if her cell was unsanitary, birds and mice were present in inmate cells, and she lost her prison job and her ability to participate in religious ceremonies, the inmate did not suffer forfeiture of time credits, she had non-contact visits of one hour in length, and there was no evidence regarding conditions of cells outside of administrative segregation. (California Institution for Women, Chino)

U.S. District Court
RODENTS/PESTS
CELLS

Murray v. Edwards County Sheriff's Dept., 453 F.Supp.2d 1280 (D.Kan. 2006). A former pretrial detainee at a county jail brought a § 1983 action against a county sheriff's department, sheriff, undersheriff, and county attorney, alleging various constitutional violations. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court held that alleged inadequate temperature-control and ventilation, the presence of insects, and a lack of cleaning at the county jail did not violate the due process rights of pretrial detainee, where jail cells were heated and cooled by air conditioning that was on the same ventilation system as the rest of the courthouse in which the jail was located, detainees had the ability to open cell windows and had fans to use in the Summer, detainees were allowed additional blankets in Winter, the jail and courthouse were treated for insects on a monthly basis, and cleaning materials were provided to detainees to use in their cells. (Edwards County Jail, Kansas)

U.S. District Court
CELLS
RODENTS/PESTS

Poole v. Taylor, 466 F.Supp.2d 578 (D.Del. 2006). A former pretrial detainee filed a § 1983 action alleging unconstitutional conditions of confinement, and that he was denied adequate medical care. The district court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment. The court held that the detainee's due process rights were not violated when he was required to sleep on a mattress on the floor for over six months in an overcrowded facility that experienced sporadic hot and cold temperatures and insect and rodent infestations. The court noted that the officials had issued numerous work orders for temperature repairs and pest control, the detainee was not denied access to toilet facilities, the officials determined that triple-celling pretrial detainees was a method to deal with their overcrowded facilities, and there was no evidence of intention on the officials' part to punish the detainee. (Multi-Purpose Criminal Justice Facility, Delaware)

2007

U.S. District Court
SHOWERS
BEDDING
RODENTS/PESTS

Banks v. York, 515 F.Supp.2d 89 (D.D.C. 2007). A detainee in a jail operated by the District of Columbia Department of Corrections (DOC), and in a correctional treatment facility operated by the District's private contractor, brought a § 1983 action against District employees and contractor's employees alleging negligent supervision under District of Columbia law, over-detention, deliberate indifference to serious medical needs, harsh living conditions in jail, and extradition to Virginia without a hearing. The district court granted the defendants' motion to dismiss in part and denied in part. According to the court, the alleged conditions from overcrowding at a District of Columbia jail-- showers infested with bacteria, standing water, various diseases and hundreds of unsanitary and defective mattresses, some of which contained roaches and other insects, did not constitute the deprivation of basic human needs, as required for jail overcrowding to constitute cruel and unusual punishment. (Central Detention Facility. D.C. and Correctional Treatment Facility operated by the Corrections Corporation of America)

U.S. District Court
WATER
SINKS

Desroche v. Strain, 507 F.Supp.2d 571 (E.D.La. 2007). A pre-trial detainee brought a pro se, in forma pauperis action against prison officials, alleging improper conditions of confinement, negligent medical treatment, invasion of privacy, and excessive force. The district court dismissed the action. The court held that the alleged conditions of the detainee's confinement, including being required to sleep on the floor of an overcrowded holding tank, being deprived of a mattress, and being provided with water only in a dirty sink, if proven, did not violate his Eighth Amendment or due process rights, given that he experienced such conditions for only ten days, and that use of sink did not cause him to suffer disease or other serious harm. (River Parish Correction Center, Louisiana)

U.S. Appeals Court
KITCHEN
FOOD SERVICE

George v. Smith, 507 F.3d 605 (7th Cir. 2007). A state prisoner sued prison officials under § 1983, alleging deprivations of his speech rights and deliberate indifference to his serious medical needs. The district court dismissed some of the claims and granted summary judgment for the defendants on the remaining claims. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the prisoner's allegation that his health was placed at risk by an allegedly malfunctioning dishwasher that left particles of food on his plate at dinner failed to state an Eighth Amendment claim. The court found that the prisoner's allegations that a prison employee had failed to provide a purported atlas that he had ordered, on security grounds, were insufficient to state a First Amendment violation where the prisoner did not provide a description, title or other identifying information for the book. The court held that the prisoner's allegation that the prison refused to allow him to speak to the public at large by placing advertisements in newspapers was insufficient to state a claim for violation of his First Amendment free speech rights where the prisoner did not provide the content of the advertisements. (Wisconsin)

U.S. Appeals Court
SHOWERS

Polanco v. Hopkins, 510 F.3d 152 (2nd Cir. 2007). A prisoner filed a pro se § 1983 action against several correctional employees claiming violations of his First, Eighth, and Fourteenth Amendments rights for his alleged exposure to mold in a gym shower and for unjust discipline. The district court denied the prisoner's motion to proceed in forma pauperis and granted the defendants' motion to dismiss. The prisoner appealed, and the appeals court dismissed the appeal. The appeals court held that the prisoner was not in imminent danger of a serious physical injury as required for in forma pauperis status under the exception to the three-strikes rule of the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA). The court found that the imminent danger exception does not violate equal protection and that the in forma pauperis statute is not overbroad. (Auburn Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
TOILETS
CELLS
SEWERAGE

Vinning-El v. Long, 482 F.3d 923 (7th Cir. 2007). A prisoner brought a § 1983 action against two prison officers, alleging that they violated his Eighth Amendment rights by subjecting him to inhumane conditions of confinement in a disciplinary-segregation unit. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the officers based on qualified immunity, and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded, finding that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the officers were deliberately indifferent to a serious condition. The prisoner alleged that, after a fight with his cellmate, he was stripped of his clothing and placed in a cell in the disciplinary-segregation unit where he was not permitted to take any personal property with him. The prisoner asserted that the floor of the cell was covered with water, the sink and toilet did not work, and the walls were smeared with blood and feces. He was allegedly forced to remain in the cell without a mattress, sheets, toilet paper, towels, shoes, soap, toothpaste, or any personal property, for six days. (Menard Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
SEWERAGE
TOILETS

Cockcroft v. Kirkland, 548 F.Supp.2d 767 (N.D.Cal. 2008). A state inmate brought a pro se § 1983 action against prison officials, alleging Eighth Amendment violations related to toilet and cleaning supply problems. The district court dismissed the action in part. The court held that the defendants were not entitled to qualified immunity from claims that they refused to give the inmate adequate supplies and tools to sanitize his toilet in response to a widespread backflushing toilet problem caused by a design defect, in which sewage would rise up in the toilet of a cell when the toilet in an adjoining cell was flushed. According to the court, the officials' conduct, as alleged, violated the prisoner's clearly established rights under the Eighth Amendment to a minimum level of cleanliness and sanitation. The court found that the official was not entitled to qualified immunity from the state prisoner's § 1983 claim that the official was deliberately indifferent to his safety. The court held that the prisoner's § 1983 claim that a prison official was deliberately indifferent to his safety, in violation of the Eighth Amendment, was not barred by the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA) provision that a prisoner may not bring an action for mental or emotional injury suffered while in custody without a prior showing of physical injury, even though the prisoner never suffered any physical injury as a result of the official's alleged acts. The prisoner alleged that the official disclosed to three other inmates that they had been placed on his enemy list at his request, and that this caused him to be considered an informant, which in turn caused him to place nine more inmates on his enemy list. (Pelican Bay State Prison, California)

U.S. District Court
HOUSEKEEPING
SHOWERS

Dolberry v. Levine, 567 F.Supp.2d 413 (W.D.N.Y. 2008). A prisoner brought a § 1983 action against prison officials asserting his constitutional rights were violated in a number of ways. Both parties moved for summary judgment. The court granted summary judgment for the defendants in part and denied in part. The court held that denial of showers and cleaning supplies for several weeks did not give rise to a violation under the Eighth Amendment. The court found that a skin rash suffered by the prisoner, allegedly due to the lack of showers, was a de minimis injury insufficient to satisfy the "physical injury" requirement for a prisoner bringing a civil action for a mental or emotional injury under the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA). (Wyoming Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
BEDDING
CROWDING

Hubbard v. Taylor, 538 F.3d 229 (3rd Cir. 2008). Pretrial detainees filed suit under § 1983, challenging conditions of their confinement on Fourteenth Amendment due process grounds. The district court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment and the detainees appealed. The appeals court vacated and remanded. On remand the district court granted the defendants' renewed motions for summary judgment and the detainees again appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that triple-celling of the pretrial detainees was rationally related to prison officials' legitimate governmental interest in trying to manage overcrowding conditions at the prison, for the purposes of the detainees' claim that triple-celling violated their Fourteenth Amendment due process right. The court found that requiring the detainees to sleep on a mattress on the floor of their cells for a period of three to seven months did not violate the detainees' Fourteenth Amendment due process rights. The court noted that although many pretrial detainees did spend a substantial amount of time on floor mattresses, they also had access to 3,900 square foot dayrooms, there was no evidence that the use of the floor mattresses resulted in disease or the splashing of human waste upon the detainees, and over $2.8 million dollars had been spent on capital improvements during the past five years to maintain or elevate the living conditions for prisoners. The court noted that even if the detainees' due process constitutional rights were violated by requiring them to sleep on mattresses on the floor, the law was not sufficiently clear so that a reasonable official would understand that what he was doing violated a constitutional right, entitling the prison officials to qualified immunity in the detainees' suit under § 1983 challenging conditions of their confinement. (Multi-Purpose Criminal Justice Facility, Delaware)

U.S. Appeals Court
RODENTS/PESTS
SANITATION

Sain v. Wood, 512 F.3d 886 (7th Cir. 2008). A civilly-committed sex offender brought a § 1983 action alleging that his conditions of confinement violated his Fourteenth Amendment due process rights. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of some defendants and denied a motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity for the clinical director of a detention facility. The clinical director appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The court found that the offender's alleged conditions of confinement did not amount to inhumane treatment in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. The conditions purportedly included unpleasant odors, lack of air conditioning, peeling paint and the presence of cockroaches which, according to the court, did not amount to inhumane treatment. The court noted that although the alleged conditions were unpleasant, they were not so objectively serious that they could establish a constitutional violation. (Joliet Treatment and Detention Facility, Illinois Department of Human Services)

U.S. District Court
SANITATION
TOILETS

Spotts v. U.S., 562 F.Supp.2d 46 (D.D.C. 2008). Federal inmates brought an action against the United States under the Federal Tort Claims Act (FTCA), alleging that Bureau of Prisons (BOP) officials acted negligently by failing to evacuate the prison prior to the landfall of a hurricane. The government moved to transfer venue and the district court transferred the venue to the Eastern District of Texas. The court noted that although the BOP resided in the District of Columbia, the decision to keep the prisoners at the prison before and during the hurricane was made by the BOP's Regional Director in Texas, and sufficient activities giving rise to the inmates' tort claims did not occur in the District of Columbia. The inmates alleged that the warden failed to respond to their concerns about the hurricane, that prison officers handed out plastic bags for the inmates to fill with human waste, that prison officials denied the inmates access to food and medical attention, and that prison staff discouraged the filing of tort claims. The inmates also alleged that BOP agents failed to properly supply the prison during the month that followed the hurricane, and that during that time inmates were forced to live in substandard conditions and suffered various physical and emotional injuries as a result. (United States Penitentiary in Beaumont, Texas)

U.S. District Court
BEDDING
HOUSEKEEPING
TOILETS

Wesolowski v. Kamas, 590 F.Supp.2d 431 (W.D.N.Y. 2008). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against correction officers and a superintendent, alleging that the defendants subjected him to cruel and unusual punishment and denied him equal protection of the law, in violation of his Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment rights. The district court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment. The court held that the prisoner's rights under the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments were not violated by a soiled mattress, the plexiglass shield over the front of his cell, another inmate's overflowed toilet, the use of a single slot to pass objects through a cell door, the denial of his preferred cleaning materials when other suitable materials were made available to him, or a single two-week period during which the plaintiff's cell was not cleaned. The court noted that the prisoner's complaints related principally to his personal preferences as to the cleanliness of his cell. Prison officials did not display deliberate indifference to the prisoner's complaints, but instead responded quickly and appropriately, in that the prisoner received a new mattress within two days of his request, and he was moved to a new cell without a plexiglass cover within five days of his complaint. (Southport Corr'l Facil., New York)

2009

U.S. District Court
SANITATION

Graves v. Arpaio, 633 F.Supp.2d 834 (D.Ariz. 2009). Pretrial detainees in a county jail system brought a class action against a county sheriff and a county board of supervisors, alleging violation of the detainees' civil rights. The parties entered into a consent decree which was superseded by an amended judgment entered by stipulation of the parties. The defendants moved to terminate the amended judgment. The district court entered a second amended judgment which ordered prospective relief for the pretrial detainees. The amended judgment provided relief regarding the following: population/housing limitations, dayroom access, natural light and windows, artificial lighting, temperature, noise, access to reading materials, access to religious services, mail, telephone privileges, clothes and towels, sanitation, safety, hygiene, toilet facilities, access to law library, medical care, dental care, psychiatric care, intake areas, mechanical restraints, segregation, outdoor recreation, inmate classification, visitation, food, visual observation by detention officers, training and screening of staff members, facilities for the handicapped, disciplinary policy and procedures, inmate grievance policy and procedures, reports and record keeping, security override, and dispute resolution. The detainees moved for attorney's fees and nontaxable costs. The district court held that the class of detainees was the prevailing party entitled to attorney's fees. (Maricopa County Sheriff and Maricopa County Board of Supervisors, Arizona)

U.S. District Court
SHOWERS

Gray v. Hernandez, 651 F.Supp.2d 1167 (S.D.Cal. 2009). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action, seeking damages and declaratory and injunctive relief, against an acting warden, captain, and two employees in a prison library. The prisoner alleged he was placed in administrative segregation pending the investigation of rule violation charges filed by the two employees, accusing him of attempting to extort money from them by offering to settle his potential suit against them. The district court held that the prisoner sufficiently alleged a chilling of his First Amendment right to file grievances and pursue civil rights litigation by alleging that his placement in administrative segregation caused him mental and financial harms. The court held that the prisoner's allegations that his placement in administrative segregation forced him to endure 24-hour lock-down, lack of medical treatment, only one shower every three days, and lack of exercise did not constitute an allegation of a dramatic departure from the standard conditions of confinement, as would invoke procedural due process protections. The court noted that an inmate does not have a liberty interest, for purposes of procedural due process, in being housed at a particular institution or in avoiding isolation or separation from the general prison population, unless the proposed transfer will subject the inmate to exceptionally more onerous living conditions, such as those experienced by inmates at a “Supermax” facility. (Mule Creek State Prison, High Desert State Prison, Donovan State Prison, California)

U.S. District Court
WATER

Jackson v. Goord, 664 F.Supp.2d 307 (S.D.N.Y. 2009). A state prisoner brought an action against correctional staff and officials, alleging that the defendants had violated his constitutional rights. After granting summary judgment for the defendants with respect to all of the prisoner's claims, except for his environmental claims, the defendants filed a supplemental motion for summary judgment on the environmental claims. The district court denied the motion. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to conditions in the prison auto body shop when the inmate worked there, the risk that the toxic materials in the shop created, and whether the inmate's alleged headaches, nosebleed, and nausea were related to his work at the auto body shop. The court also found that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the prisoner was exposed to asbestos for four to five hours a day over an extended period of time, and whether there was a risk to his health as a result of such exposure. According to the court, summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the prisoner was exposed to an unreasonable risk of serious harm from the prison's water quality or from exposure to cigarette smoke, and whether the prison defendants knew that the prisoner faced substantial risks of serious harm and disregarded those risks by failing to take reasonable measures to abate the risks. The court also found a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the prison superintendent knew of the allegedly ongoing constitutional violations and had the authority to correct the problems and failed to do so. (Green Haven Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
BEDDING
RODENTS/PESTS
WATER

Johnson v. Boyd, 676 F.Supp.2d 800 (E.D. Ark. 2009). A state prisoner filed a civil rights action against a detention center and its personnel alleging several violations. The defendants moved for summary judgment and the district court granted the motion in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether detention center personnel failed to protect the prisoner from an attack by another prisoner. The court held that a substantial risk of harm to the prisoner's health or safety did not result from the prisoner's detention, where, among other things, a professional exterminator routinely sprayed the facility for rodents and bugs, exposed wires from ceiling light fixtures that had been pulled down by inmates were not hazardous or were not located in cells where the prisoner had been confined, the ventilation system was operational and only temporarily malfunctioned when inmates put paper and other materials in vents, fresh water was located in coolers in pods and was brought to the prisoner's cell several times per day, and the prisoner had been provided with a concrete sleeping slab and extra blankets. (Crittenden County Detention Center, Arkansas)

2010

U.S. District Court
SEWERAGE
SHOWERS

Antonetti v. Skolnik, 748 F.Supp.2d 1201 (D.Nev. 2010). A prisoner, proceeding pro se, brought a § 1983 action against various prison officials, alleging various constitutional claims, including violations of the First, Fifth, Sixth, Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments. The district court dismissed in part. The court held that the prisoner's allegations were factually sufficient to state a colorable § 1983 claim that prison officials violated the Eighth Amendment by depriving him of needed medical care. The prisoner alleged that he was housed in segregation/isolation, leading to a mental health breakdown, and: (1) that he was seen by mental health professionals eight times over a five year period instead of every 90 days as required by administrative regulations; (2) that mental health professionals recommended he pursue art and music for his mental health but that prison officials denied him the materials; (3) and that the officials' actions resulted in the need to take anti-psychotic and anti-depression medications due to suffering from bouts of aggression, extreme depression, voices, paranoia, hallucinations, emotional breakdowns and distress, unreasonable fear, and systematic dehumanization. The court held that the prisoner's allegations were sufficient to state a colorable § 1983 claim that he was deprived of personal hygienic items and sanitary conditions in violation of the Eighth Amendment, where the prisoner alleged he was regularly deprived of toilet paper and soap, that he was only allowed to shower twice a week, that he was made to strip in dirty showers full of filth and insects, that the unit in which he resided was littered with food and urine and contained open sewers, and that he suffered illness as a result. The court found that the prisoner's allegations that the food he was provided lacked nutritional value and was of lesser quality than food provided to other inmates, that officers made trays of food from dirty food carts located next to inmate showers and that birds picked at the inmate's food while the carts were outside were factually sufficient to state a colorable § 1983 Eighth Amendment conditions of confinement claim. The court found that the prisoner's allegations were sufficient to state a colorable § 1983 Eighth Amendment claim for violation of his right to be free of cruel and unusual punishment where the prisoner alleged the exercise provided to him was to stand in a completely enclosed cage alone, in extreme heat or cold without water, shade, exercise equipment or urinals, and that as a result he suffered sunburns, cracked and bleeding lips and a lack of desire to exercise, resulting in a loss of physical and mental health. (High Desert State Prison, Nevada)

U.S. Appeals Court
COMMON AREAS
SANITATION

Duvall v. Dallas County, Tex., 631 F.3d 203 (5th Cir. 2010). A pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against a county for personal injuries stemming from a staph infection that he contracted while incarcerated in the county's jail. At the conclusion of a jury trial in the district court the detainee prevailed. The county appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that: (1) sufficient evidence supported the finding that the county's actions in allowing the infection were more than de minimis; (2) sufficient evidence existed to support the finding that the county had an unconstitutional custom or policy in allowing the infection to be present; and (3) sufficient evidence supported the finding that the detainee contracted the infection while in jail. The court noted that physicians testified that there was a "bizarrely high incidence" of the infection and that they were not aware of a jail with a higher percentage of the infection than the county's jail. According to the court, there was evidence that jail officials had long known of the extensive infection problem yet continued to house inmates in the face of the inadequately controlled staph contamination, and that the county was not willing to take the necessary steps to spend the money to take appropriate actions. The court noted that there was evidence that the jail had refused to install necessary hand washing and disinfecting stations and had failed to use alcohol-based sanitizers, which were the recommended means of hand disinfection. (Dallas County, Texas)

U.S. District Court
PLUMBING
RODENTS/PESTS

Mitchell v. Dodrill, 696 F.Supp.2d 454 (M.D.Pa. 2010). A federal prisoner initiated a Bivens-type action against the Bureau of Prisons (BOP) employees, making several complaints about various conditions of his former place of confinement. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants in part, and denied in part. The court held that, absent any evidence that the alleged conditions of the prisoner's cell caused harm to the prisoner, and that the Bureau of Prisons (BOP) defendants were deliberately indifferent to that harm, cell conditions did not violate the Eighth Amendment. The prisoner alleged that his cell was in poor condition, with poor welding and rust erosion present at the base of the walls, had inadequate plumbing, was infested with "cockroaches, spiders, worms, mice and other unknown insects," and lacked ventilation. The court held that double celling of the prisoner did not violate the Eighth Amendment where the prisoner did not allege that he was singled out for double-celling or that his health or life was endangered by the condition. The court noted that double celling inmates is not per se unconstitutional, and that considerations that are relevant in determining if double celling violates the Eighth Amendment include the length of confinement, the amount of time prisoners spend in their cells each day, sanitation, lighting, bedding, ventilation, noise, education and rehabilitation programs, opportunities for activities outside the cells, and the repair and functioning of basic physical facilities such as plumbing, ventilation, and showers. (Special Management Unit, United States Penitentiary, Lewisburg, Pennsylvania)

U.S. District Court
FOOD SERVICE
KITCHEN

Smith-Bey v. CCA/CTF, 703 F.Supp.2d 1 (D.D.C. 2010). A District of Columbia inmate brought a § 1983 action against a prison, the private corporation that ran the prison, and a food services company, alleging the prison's kitchen was so poorly maintained and infested with vermin that being forced to eat food prepared there amounted to cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The defendants moved to dismiss for failure to state a claim. The district court granted the motion. The court held that the two instances in which the inmate discovered cockroaches in his food, "while certainly unpleasant," did establish an Eighth Amendment violation. (Correctional Treatment Facility, Washington, D.C.)

2011

U.S. District Court
RODENTS/PESTS

Solomon v. Nassau County, 759 F.Supp.2d 251 (E.D.N.Y. 2011). A pretrial detainee brought an action against a county, jail, sheriff, and undersheriff, alleging that his civil rights were violated when he was bitten by a rodent in his jail cell. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that because the sheriff and undersheriff were not "personally involved" in any alleged failure to maintain a safe prison environment, they were not subject to § 1983 liability for the injury to the pretrial detainee who was bitten by a rodent in his jail cell. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the pretrial detainee was exposed to a substantial risk of contracting rabies or another dangerous disease from a rodent bite, and whether the county was aware of the substantial risk of serious harm. According to the court, although protection of inmates from harmful chemicals and the need to prevent inmates from using poisons, glue traps, or door sweeps as weapons were legitimate penological interests that supported the reasonableness of the jail's pest control plan, a genuine issue of fact existed as to whether the county was adequately complying with the plan, and whether the lack of compliance could have resulted in the alleged substantial risk of harm. (Nassau County Correctional Center, New York)

2012

U.S. Appeals Court
CLOTHING ISOLATION
RESTRAINTS

Gruenberg v. Gempeler, 697 F.3d 573 (7th Cir. 2012). A state prisoner, proceeding pro se, filed a § 1983 action against various prison officials, guards, and medical staff, alleging violations of the Eighth Amendment. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that: (1) the prisoner did not have a clearly established right to not be continually restrained without clothing or cover in a cell for five days following his ingestion of a handcuff key, the master key for belt restraints, and the key used for opening cell doors, where restraint had been imposed to keep the prisoner from re-ingesting those keys; (2) the continuous restraint of the prisoner without clothing or cover in a cell for five days did not violate his Fourteenth Amendment due process rights; (3) the prisoner's Fourth Amendment and Fourteenth Amendment substantive due process claims were barred; and (4) the district court did not abuse its discretion by ruling that the prisoner was competent to advance his case and was not entitled to appointed counsel. (Waupun Correction Institution, Wisconsin)

2013

U.S. District Court
HOUSEKEEPING
RODENTS/PESTS
SANITATION

Ames v. Randle, 933 F.Supp.2d 1028 (N.D.Ill. 2013). An inmate brought § 1983 Eighth Amendment claims against various employees of the Illinois Department of Corrections (IDOC) who allegedly were responsible for the conditions of the inmate's confinement. The defendants filed a motion to dismiss. The court denied the motion, finding that the inmate adequately pled that Illinois prison officials were deliberately indifferent, as required to state a § 1983 Eighth Amendment claim. According to the court, the inmate alleged that he repeatedly advised the official about the prison's detrimental living conditions and that the official did not make an effort to remedy the conditions, that he informed another official about the intolerable living conditions and that this official did not make an effort to remedy the conditions, and that he discussed the intolerable living conditions with other officials, each of whom also failed to make any efforts to remedy the living conditions. The inmate claimed that he was subjected to unsanitary conditions, a lack of ventilation, and continuous lighting that interfered with his sleep. He also alleged that his housing area had dried bodily fluids on the wall of his cell and a strong odor of ammonia from his uncleaned toilet, that there was pest infestation accompanied by filth and feces, and that there was a complete lack of basic cleaning supplies or even garbage bags. He also cited filthy soiled bedding, missing or dilapidated, and sometimes dangerously damaged cell furniture and fixtures, and badly peeling toxic paint. The inmate suffered from endocarditis, an infection of the lining of the heart, which he claimed was due to the conditions of his confinement, and from which his "numerous, almost constant, fungal infections" stemmed. (Stateville Correctional Center, Illinois Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
CROWDING

Coleman v. Brown, 922 F.Supp.2d 1004 (E.D.Cal. 2013). State prison inmates brought Eighth Amendment challenges to the adequacy of mental health care and medical health care provided to mentally ill inmates and the general prison population, respectively. The inmates moved to convene a three-judge panel of the district court to enter a population reduction order that was necessary to provide effective relief. The motions were granted and the cases were assigned to same panel, which ordered the state to reduce the prison population to 137.5% of its design capacity. The state moved to vacate or modify the population reduction order. The district court denied the motion. The three-judge panel of the district court held that: (1) the state's contention that prison crowding was reduced and no longer a barrier to providing inmates with care required by the Eighth Amendment did not provide the basis for a motion to vacate the order on the ground that changed circumstances made it inequitable to continue applying the order; (2) the state failed to establish that prison crowding was no longer a barrier to providing inmates with care required by the Eighth Amendment; and (3) the state failed to establish it had achieved a durable remedy to prison crowding. (California Department of Rehabilitation and Corrections)

U.S. District Court
BEDDING
CELLS
CROWDING
FOOD SERVICE
SANITATION

Duran v. Merline, 923 F.Supp.2d 702 (D.N.J. 2013). A former pretrial detainee at a county detention facility brought a pro se § 1983 action against various facility officials and employees, the company which provided food and sanitation services to the facility, and the medical services provider, alleging various constitutional torts related to his pretrial detention. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motions in part and denied in part. The district court held that fact issues precluded summary judgment on: (1) the conditions of confinement claim against a former warden in his official capacity; (2) an interference with legal mail claim against a correctional officer that alleged that the facility deliberately withheld the detainee's legal mail during a two-week period; (3) a First Amendment retaliation claim based on interference with legal mail; and (4) a claim for inadequate medical care as to whether the detainee's Hepatitis C condition was a serious medical condition that required treatment and whether the provider denied such treatment because it was too costly.

The detainee asserted that overcrowding at the county detention facility, which allegedly led to the detainee being forced to sleep and eat his meals next to open toilet, and led to inmate-on-inmate violence, contributed to his assault by another inmate. According to the court, the long-standing conditions of confinement whereby the county detention facility was overcrowded for at least 24 years and facility officials "triple-celled" inmates, allegedly leading to unsanitary conditions, amounted to a "custom" for the purposes of the former detainee's § 1983 Fourteenth Amendment conditions of confinement claim against a former warden in his official capacity.

The court held that the food service provider's serving the detainee cold meals for a 45-day period while the kitchen in the county detention facility was being renovated, was not "punishment," as would support the inmate's § 1983 Fourteenth Amendment conditions of confinement claim against the provider, absent evidence that the food served to the detainee was spoiled or contaminated, that a significant portion of the detainee's diet consisted of such food, or that the food service caused more than a temporary discomfort. The court also held that the alleged actions of the food service provider in serving the detainee one food item when another ran out, failing to serve bread with the inmate's meal, serving the inmate leftovers from days before, serving juice in a dirty container on one occasion, serving milk after its expiration date, and serving meals on cracked trays that caused the detainee to contract food poisoning, did not amount to a substantial deprivation of food sufficient to amount to unconstitutional conditions of confinement, as would violate the inmate's due process rights. (Atlantic County Justice Facility, New Jersey)

U.S. District Court
HOUSEKEEPING
SANITATION
TOILETS

Florio v. Canty, 954 F.Supp.2d 227 (S.D.N.Y. 2013). A prisoner, proceeding pro se, brought a § 1983 action against a warden and a corrections officer, alleging violations of the Eighth Amendment. The defendants moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion. The court held that the prisoner's exposure to human waste on two occasions, for a total of less than a few hours, did not give rise to a serious risk of substantial harm. The prisoner alleged that prison officials waited 10 to 30 minutes after two separate incidents of a toilet overflowing to release the prisoner from his cell and having the prisoner clean the cell with inadequate cleaning gear and without training, allegedly resulting in the prisoner developing a foot fungus. The court held that this was not deliberate indifference to a substantial risk to his health and safety, as would violate the Eighth Amendment. The court noted that officials acted to alleviate the unsanitary conditions, the overflow also occurred in approximately 20 other cells, and the prisoner was not prevented from bathing or washing his clothes after the incidents. (Anna M. Kross Center, Rikers Island, New York City Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
HOUSEKEEPING
TOILETS

Nelson v. District of Columbia, 928 F.Supp.2d 210 (D.D.C. 2013). A detainee brought a § 1983 claim against the District of Columbia arising from his stay in jail. The defendant moved to dismiss and the district court granted the motion. The court held that denial of one telephone call and access to stationery during the detainee's five-day stay in a "Safe Cell," which was located in the jail's infirmary, did not implicate his First Amendment right of free speech or right of access to courts. The court found that the detainee's alleged exposure to "dried urine on the toilet seat and floor" and garbage during his five-day stay, along with the denial of a shower, did not rise to the level of a Fifth Amendment due process violation. According to the court, placement of detainee in a Safe Cell was not motivated by a desire to punish the detainee, but rather by a nurse's desire to attend to the detainee's ailments after his "legs and back gave out" twice. The court noted that denial of the detainee's request to have the cell cleaned was for the non-punitive reason that the detainee would not be in the cell that long. (D.C. Jail, District of Columbia)

U.S. Appeals Court
BEDDING
CROWDING
HOUSEKEEPING

Walker v. Schult, 717 F.3d 119 (2nd Cir. 2013). An inmate, proceeding pro se and in forma pauperis, brought a § 1983 action against a warden and various other prison officials and employees, alleging violations of the Eighth Amendment. The district court granted the defendants' motion to dismiss. The inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, vacated in part, and remanded. The court held that the prisoner's allegations were sufficient to plead that he was deprived of the minimal civilized measure of life's necessities and was subjected to unreasonable health and safety risks, as required to state a § 1983 claims against prison officials for violations of the Eighth Amendment. The prisoner alleged that: (1) for approximately 28 months he was confined in a cell with five other men with inadequate space and ventilation; (2) the heat was stifling in the summer and it was freezing in the winter; (3) urine and feces splattered the floor; (4) there were insufficient cleaning supplies; (5) the mattress was too narrow for him to lie on flat; and (6) noisy and crowded conditions made sleep difficult and created a constant risk of violence. The court also found that the prisoner's allegations were sufficient to plead that prison officials knew of and disregarded excessive risks to his health and safety, as required to find that the officials were deliberately indifferent. The prisoner alleged that officials knew of overcrowding in his cell, that he spoke with some officials about the conditions, that officials were aware noise was loud and constant, that they were aware of temperature issues, that the prisoner informed officials that his bed was too narrow, that one official failed to issue cleaning supplies, and that conditions did not change despite his complaints. (Fed. Corr. Inst. Ray Brook, N.Y.)

U.S. District Court
HOUSEKEEPING
SEWERAGE

Washington v. Afify, 968 F.Supp.2d 532 (W.D.N.Y. 2013). A Muslim inmate, proceeding pro se, brought an action against the department of correctional services (DOCS) employees, alleging violations of the First, Eighth, and Fourteenth Amendments. The employees moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The district court held that: (1) ordering the inmate to clean up human waste did not violate the Eighth Amendment; (2) housing the inmate with a cellmate who allegedly exposed the inmate to pornographic images and prevented him from reciting his daily prayers with necessary humility and tranquility did not violate the inmate's First Amendment free exercise right; (3) the inmate's allegations that he was denied two religious breakfast meals and one evening meal during a Muslim holy month unless he signed up to work in the mess hall were insufficient to state a claim; (4) the Muslim inmate's allegations that he was singled out in being ordered to clean up feces, being transferred to a different cell, and transferred to new prison job were insufficient to state a claim for violations of Fourteenth Amendment equal protection. The court held that the inmate's allegations that he was charged with disobeying a direct order after he refused to clean feces, that he was found guilty by a biased hearing officer, and that the hearing officer called the inmate a "little monkey" and warned that there was "more retaliation on the way" were sufficient to state a § 1983 claim for violations of Fourteenth Amendment due process against the hearing officer. The court also found that the inmate's allegations that he filed a grievance against a prison employee, that the employee told the inmate he was "nuts" and that the inmate "was playing with the wrong one," and that the employee issued a false misbehavior report against the inmate the next day, were sufficient to state a § 1983 retaliation claim in violation of the First Amendment. (Southport Corr. Facility, N.Y.)

2014

U.S. District Court
FOOD SERVICE
RODENTS/PESTS
TOILETS
WATER

Cano v. City of New York, 44 F.Supp.3d 324 (E.D.N.Y. 2014). Pretrial detainees brought an action against a city and police officers, alleging that inhumane conditions at a detention facility violated due process. The city and the officers moved to dismiss. The district court denied the motion, finding that the detainees alleged objectively serious conditions that deprived them of basic human needs, that the officers and the city were deliberately indifferent to conditions at the facility, and that there was punitive intent. The detainees alleged that, over a 24-hour period, they were subjected to overcrowded cells, insects, rodents, extreme temperatures, unsanitary conditions, sleep deprivation, lack of adequate food and water, lack of access to bathroom facilities, and lack of protection from the conduct of other inmates. (Brooklyn Central Booking, New York)

U.S. District Court
WATER
TOILETS

Imhoff v. Temas, 67 F.Supp.3d 700 (W.D.Pa. 2014). A pretrial detainee brought an action against employees of a county correctional facility, alleging deliberate indifference to his serious medical need, violation of his rights under the Fourteenth Amendment with regard to conditions of his confinement, and excessive force in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The employees moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The detainee had initially been refused admission to the jail because he displayed signs of a drug overdose and he was admitted to a local hospital. After hospital personnel determined he was stable he was admitted to the jail. At one point in his confinement, the detainee acted out and banged his cell door with a plastic stool. This resulted in the retrieval of the stool by jail officers and, while he was held down by one officer, he was kicked in the face by another officer. When he yelled for help, an officer responded by choking the detainee and then spraying him with pepper spray, and he was not permitted to shower to remove the pepper spray for thirty minutes. The court found that the detainee's allegations against the employees in their individual capacities regarding the intentional denial of medical treatment, excessive use of force, and violation of his rights under Fourteenth Amendment with regard to conditions of his confinement were sufficient to set forth a plausible claim for punitive damages. The detainee alleged that he was denied basic human needs such as drinking water, access to a toilet and toilet paper, and toiletries such as soap and a toothbrush. (Washington County Correctional Facility, Pennsylvania)

U.S. District Court
TOILETS
SEWERAGE

Little v. Municipal Corp., 51 F.Supp3d 473 (S.D.N.Y. 2014). State inmates brought a § 1983 action against a city and city department of correction officials, alleging Eighth Amendment and due process violations related to conditions of their confinement and incidents that occurred while they were confined. The defendants moved to dismiss for failure to state a claim. The district court granted the motion, finding that: (1) the inmates failed to state a municipal liability claim; (2) locking the inmates in cells that were flooding with sewage was not a sufficiently serious deprivation so as to violate the Eighth Amendment; (3) the inmates failed to state an Eighth Amendment claim based on the deprivation of laundry services; (4) the inmates failed to state that officials were deliberately indifferent to their conditions of confinement; (5) the inmates' administrative classification did not implicate their liberty interests protected by due process; and (6) cell searches did not rise to the level of an Eighth Amendment violation. The court noted that the cells flooded with sewage for up to eight-and-a-half hours, during which they periodically lacked outdoor recreation and food, was undeniably unpleasant, but it was not a significantly serious deprivation so as to violate the inmates' Eighth Amendment rights. According to the court, there was no constitutional right to outdoor recreation, and the inmates were not denied food entirely, but rather, were not allowed to eat during periods of lock-down. (N.Y. City Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
PESTS/RODENTS

Sherley v. Thompson, 69 F.Supp.3d 656 (W.D.Ky. 2014). A state prisoner filed a pro se § 1983 action against the Commissioner of the Kentucky Department of Corrections (DOC), a prison warden, and other prison officials, alleging that his conditions of confinement violated his Eighth Amendment rights, that he was deprived of medical treatment in violation of the Eighth Amendment, and was subjected to race discrimination in violation of the Equal Protection Clause. The district court dismissed the case, in part. The court held that the prisoner stated claims against the warden and prison administrators for violation of his equal protection rights and his conditions of confinement. According to the court, the prisoner stated an Eighth Amendment claim against one prison nurse by alleging that the nurse failed to provide him with appropriate medical treatment for ant bites he sustained, due to his inability to pay for treatment. (Little Sandy Correctional Complex, Green River Correctional Complex, Kentucky)

2015

U.S. District Court
SEWERAGE
HOUSEKEEPING

Barnes v. County of Monroe, 85 F.Supp.3d 696 (W.D.N.Y. 2015). A state inmate brought a § 1983 action against a county, county officials, and correctional officers, alleging that the officers used excessive force against him and that he was subjected to unconstitutional conditions of confinement during his pretrial detention. The defendants moved for judgment on the pleadings. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the former pretrial detainee's allegation that a county correctional officer used excessive force when he responded to a fight between the detainee and fellow inmates, and jumped on the detainee's back, striking him in face and knocking out a tooth, and that the officer was not merely using force to maintain or restore discipline but that the entire incident was "premeditated," stated a § 1983 excessive force claim against officer under the Due Process Clause. According to the court, the former detainee's allegations that county correctional officers used excessive force when they pushed him face-first into a glass window, pushed him to the floor, kicked, stomped on and punched him, and used handcuffs to inflict pain, that as a result of the altercation, the inmate urinated and defecated on himself and experienced dizziness and a concussion, and that the force used on him was in response to his reaching for legal papers and attempting to steady himself, stated a § 1983 excessive force claim against the officers under the Due Process Clause. The court found that the former detainee's allegations that, after he was released from a special housing unit (SHU), county correctional officers placed him in a poorly ventilated cell where he was exposed to human excrement and bodily fluids over the course of multiple days, and that he was subjected to extreme conditions in the SHU by way of 24-hour lighting by the officers, stated a § 1983 conditions-of-confinement claim against the officers under the Due Process Clause. (Upstate Correctional Facility and Monroe County Jail, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
SHOWERS
HOUSEKEEPING

Brauner v. Coody, 793 F.3d 493 (5th Cir. 2015). A state prisoner, who was a paraplegic, brought an action against a prison medical director, assistant warden, and prison doctors, alleging deliberate indifference to his serious medical condition. The district court denied the parties' cross-motions for summary judgment. The defendants appealed. The appeals court reversed, finding that: (1) prison doctors were not deliberately indifferent to the prisoner's serious medical needs by failing to provide him with adequate pain management; (2) officials were not deliberately indifferent by subjecting the prisoner to unsanitary showers; and (3) doctors did not fail to provide adequate training and supervision regarding proper wound care, even if the prisoner's wound care by nurses and other subordinates was occasionally sporadic, where the doctors were active in managing it, and they regularly changed the prescribed frequency of the bandage changes based on the changing condition of the prisoner's wounds, and also prescribed antibiotic therapy regimens to assist with healing. The court noted that it was undisputed that the showers were cleaned twice per day with bleach, that the prisoner was given a disinfectant spray bottle for his personal use, and that the prisoner was permitted to enter the showers before the other prisoners so that he could clean himself without interference, and there was no showing that the prisoner was ever prohibited from using the showers. (R.E. Barrow Treatment Center, Louisiana)

U.S. District Court
RODENTS/PESTS
CROWDING

Cano v. City of New York, 119 F.Supp.3d 65 (E.D.N.Y. 2015). Pretrial detainees temporarily housed in a booking facility brought an action against a city and city officials under § 1983 alleging deliberate indifference to detainee health in violation of the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The defendants moved for summary judgment and the district court granted the motion. The court held that: (1) temporarily subjecting detainees to overcrowded jail cells was not deliberate indifference; (2) failure to provide sleeping equipment, such as beds, cots, pillows, blankets, or bedding was not deliberate indifference; (3) availability of only one toilet for 24 hours in each overcrowded holding cell was not deliberate indifference; (4) alleged failure to provide food and water was not deliberate indifference; (5) police officers were not subjectively aware of a risk to the detainees; (6) police officers did not act with punitive intent; (7) placement of pretrial detainees in jail cells with alleged rodent and insect infestations was not deliberate indifference; (8) placement of pretrial detainees in jail cells with alleged violent offenders that had limited police supervision, allegedly leading to fights, thefts, and bullying, was not deliberate indifference to detainee health; and (9) alleged exposure of pretrial detainees to extreme hot or cold temperature conditions in unventilated jail cells was not deliberate indifference to detainee health that would violate the right to provision of adequate medical treatment under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The court noted that the detainees were not kept in the cells for more than 24 hours, and were not harmed by the alleged overcrowding. (Brooklyn Central Booking, City of New York Police Department, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
WATER
CLOTHING
HYGIENE ITEMS

Chavarriaga v. New Jersey Dept. of Corrections, 806 F.3d 210 (3d Cir. 2015). A former prisoner brought a § 1983 action in state court against the New Jersey Department of Corrections (NJDOC), the former New Jersey Attorney General, the New Jersey Commissioner of Corrections, a correctional sergeant, and various other correctional officers. The prisoner alleged that the defendants violated her constitutional rights when they transferred her from one place of confinement to another where they denied her potable water, clothing, sanitary napkins, and subjected her to an unlawful body cavity search. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the Attorney General, Commissioner of Corrections, and correctional sergeant, and dismissed the remaining claims. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part and reversed in part and remanded. The appeals court held that: (1) allegations that correctional officers deprived the prisoner of potable water were sufficiently serious so as to reach level of an Eighth Amendment violation; and (2) allegations that she was denied her sanitary napkins and medication for migraine headaches and menstrual cramps were sufficiently serious so as to reach the level of an Eighth Amendment violation. The court noted that a state has broad authority to confine an inmate in any of its institutions, and thus, courts recognize that a state's authority to place inmates anywhere within the prison system is among a wide spectrum of discretionary actions that traditionally have been the business of prison administrators rather than of the federal courts. (Garrett House Residential Community Release Facility, Edna Mahan Correctional Facility, New Jersey)

U.S. District Court
BEDDING
CLOTHING
WATER
SHOWERS

Fant v. City of Ferguson, 107 F.Supp.3d 1016 (E.D. Mo. 2015). City residents brought a class action lawsuit against a city, asserting claims under § 1983 for violations of Fourth, Sixth, and Fourteenth Amendments based on allegations that they were repeatedly jailed by the city for being unable to pay fines owed from traffic tickets and other minor offenses. The residents alleged that pre-appearance detentions lasting days, weeks, and in one case, nearly two months, in allegedly poor conditions, based on alleged violations of a municipal code that did not warrant incarceration in the first instance, and which were alleged to have continued until an arbitrarily determined payment was made, violated their Due Process rights. The residents alleged that they were forced to sleep on the floor in dirty cells with blood, mucus, and feces, were denied basic hygiene and feminine hygiene products, were denied access to a shower, laundry, and clean undergarments for several days at a time, were denied medications, and were provided little or inadequate food and water. The plaintiffs sought a declaration that the city's policies and practices violated their constitutional rights, and sought a permanent injunction preventing the city from enforcing the policies and practices. The city moved to dismiss; the district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that: (1) allegations that residents were jailed for failure to pay fines without inquiry into their ability to pay and without any consideration of alternative measures of punishment were sufficient to state a claim that the city violated the residents' Due Process and Equal Protection rights; (2) the residents plausibly stated a claim that the city's failure to appoint counsel violated their Due Process rights; (3) allegations of pre-appearance detentions plausibly and conditions of confinement were sufficient to state a plausible claims for Due Process violations; and (4) the residents could not state an Equal Protection claim for being treated differently, with respect to fines, than civil judgment debtors. The court noted that the residents alleged they were not afforded counsel at initial hearings on traffic and other offenses, nor were they afforded counsel prior to their incarceration for failing to pay court-ordered fines for those offenses. (City of Ferguson, Mo.)

U.S. District Court
HOUSEKEEPING

Montoya v. Newman, 115 F.Supp.3d 1263 (D. Colo. 2015). A former county jail detainee brought a § 1983 action against a sheriff, jail detention officer, and jail medical staff member, and a physician, alleging deliberate indifference to his serious medical needs. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether a county jail detention officer was aware of the detainee's serious medical need and was deliberately indifferent to that need when he failed to arrange for the detainee to see a doctor for at least two days, despite knowing that the detainee was coughing up bloody phlegm, had trouble breathing, and was not eating. The officer was also allegedly told by two other detainees, as well as the detainee's sister, and the detainee himself, the detainee needed to see a doctor. The court found that evidence did not support the detainee's § 1983 municipal liability claim based on failure to abate unsanitary conditions and disease in the county jail, where there was no evidence that, prior to the detainee's incarceration in the county jail, the sheriff was aware of a mold or sanitation problem in the jail that presented a serious risk to the health of detainee or other inmates, that the sheriff was deliberately indifferent to those conditions, or that those conditions were a cause of the detainee's illness. (Huerfano County Jail, Colorado)

U.S. District Court
CELLS
HOUSEKEEPING
CLOTHING

Shorter v. Baca, 101 F.Supp.3d 876 (C.D. Cal. 2015). A pretrial detainee brought an action against a county, sheriff, and deputies, alleging under § 1983 that the defendants denied her medical care, subjected her to unsanitary living conditions, deprived her of food, clean clothes, and access to exercise, and conducted overly invasive searches. The detainee had been classified as mentally ill and housed in a mental health unit at the detention facility. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to what policies governed classification of pretrial detainees who were mentally ill. The court found that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether jail conditions imposed on the detainee, including permitting the detainee, who was incarcerated for 32 days, to shower only three times, only permitting the detainee outside of her cell for recreation on one occasion, failing to clean her cell, failing to provide the detainee with clean clothing, and depriving the detainee of food, amounted to punishment. (Century Regional Detention Facility, Los Angeles County, California)

U.S. Appeals Court
WATER
RODENTS/PESTS

Smith v. Dart, 803 F.3d 304 (7th Cir. 2015). A pretrial detainee brought action under § 1983 against a county alleging deliberate indifference to his health in violation of the right to the provision of adequate medical treatment under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, as well as failure to pay adequate wages under the Fair Labor Standards Act (FLSA) for his job in the jail's laundry room. The district court dismissed the case and the detainee appealed. The appeals court held that the detainee sufficiently alleged that the food he received was "well below nutritional value," as required to state a claim under § 1983 for deliberate indifference to his health in violation of the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The court held that the detainee failed to allege harm stemming from the presence of spider nests, cockroaches, and mice, and thus failed to state a claim under § 1983 for deliberate indifference to his health in violation of the right to provision of adequate medical treatment under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The court noted that the detainee did not allege that pests were present in his cell, or that pests had ever come into contact with his person or his property, or that he'd been bitten or stung or otherwise suffered physical or psychological harm, or that his property had been damaged. The court found that the detainee's claims that prison water contained cyanide, lead, and "alpha and beta radiation," if true, were sufficient to allege deprivation of drinkable water, as required to state a claim under § 1983 for deliberate indifference to his health in violation of the right to provision of adequate medical treatment under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. (Cook County Jail, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
HOUSEKEEPING

Turner v. Mull, 784 F.3d 485 (8th Cir. 2015). A state inmate filed a § 1983 action alleging that correctional officials violated his rights under the Eighth Amendment, Fourteenth Amendment, Title II of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), and Rehabilitation Act by failing to transport him in wheelchair-accessible van, exposing him to unsanitary conditions in the van, and retaliating against him for filing a complaint. The district court entered summary judgment in the officials' favor and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the officials were not deliberately indifferent to the inmate's serious medical needs when they precluded him from using a wheelchair-accessible van, even if the inmate was required to crawl into the van and to his seat. The court noted that the inmate was able to ambulate, stand, and sit with the use of leg braces and crutches, the inmate did not ask to use a readily available wheelchair, no physician ordered or issued a wheelchair for the inmate, and improperly using or standing on a lift was considered dangerous due to the possibility of a fall. According to the court, officials were not deliberately indifferent to the serious medical needs of the inmate in violation of Eighth Amendment when they required him to be transported and to crawl in an unsanitary van, where the inmate was exposed to unsanitary conditions on a single day for a combined maximum of approximately six hours. (Eastern Reception Diagnostic Correctional Center, Missouri)

U.S. Appeals Court
CELLS
SEWERAGE

Willey v. Kirkpatrick, 801 F.3d 51 (2d Cir. 2015). A state prisoner brought an action under § 1983 against a prison superintendent, a corrections sergeant, and corrections officers, alleging unsanitary conditions, theft of legal documents, harassment, malicious prosecution, and false imprisonment. The district court granted summary judgment to the defendants. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court vacated the district court's decision and remanded the case for further proceedings. The court held that remand was required for the district court to address issue in first instance of whether the prisoner had a right under the First, Fifth, Eighth, or Fourteenth Amendments to refuse to provide false information to a corrections officer. The court held that the prisoner stated a claim of unsanitary conditions of confinement against the defendants by alleging that while being kept naked, he had been exposed, at a minimum, to seven days of human waste in a shielded cell that would have "exponentially amplified the grotesquerie of odor" of the accumulating waste, which resulted in mental-health problems and attempted suicide. (Wende Correctional Facility, New York)

SECTION 41: SEARCHES

The following pages present summaries of court decisions which address this topic area. These summaries provide readers with highlights of each case, but are not intended to be a substitute for the review of the full case. The cases do not represent all court decisions which address this topic area, but rather offer a sampling of relevant holdings.

The decisions summarized below were current as of the date indicated on the title page of this edition of the Catalog. Prior to publication, the citation for each case was verified, and the case was researched in Shepard's Citations to determine if it had been altered upon appeal (reversed or modified). The Catalog is updated annually. An annual supplement provides replacement pages for cases in the prior edition which have changed, and adds new cases. Readers are encouraged to consult the Topic Index to identify related topics of interest. The text in the section entitled "How to Use The Catalog" at the beginning of the Catalog provides an overview which may also be helpful to some readers.

The case summaries which follow are organized by year, with the earliest case presented first. Within each year, cases are organized alphabetically by the name of the plaintiff. The left margin offers a quick reference, highlighting the type of court involved and identifying appropriate subtopics addressed by each case.

1960

U.S. Appeals Court

Charles v. United States, 278 F.2d 386 (9th Cir. 1960). All custodial searches are presumed reasonable unless they violate the dictates of reason either because of their number or their manner of perpetration. (Honolulu Police, Hawaii)

1971

U.S. Appeals Court
BLOOD TESTS
LAXATIVES

Anderson v. Nosser, 438 F.2d 183 (5th Cir. 1971); 456 F.2d 835 (5th Cir. 1972), cert. denied, 409 U.S. 848 (1971). Male arrestees/petitioners forced to strip and kept in such condition for up to thirty-six hours and female arrestees/petitioners were forced to go without clothing other than underwear leads to finding of constitutional violation. Detainees given large quantities of laxatives were forced to submit to blood tests for no legitimate reason leads to court's finding of constitutional violation. (Mississippi State Penitentiary, Parchman)

1972

U.S. Appeals Court
STRIP SEARCH

Christman v. Skinner, 468 F.2d 723 (2d Cir. 1972). Strip searches after every outside visit, if done in retaliation for starting a state claim against the jail, constitute denial of access to courts. (Monroe County Jail, New York)

U.S. District Court
"SHAKEDOWNS"

Hamilton v. Landrieu, 351 F.Supp. 549 (E.D. La. 1972). "Shakedowns" shall be conducted more frequently and systematically and shall not be intended to or conducted so as to harass inmates. (Orleans Parish Prison, Louisiana)

U.S. Appeals Court
STRIP SEARCH

McCray v. State of Maryland, 456 F.2d 1 (4th Cir. 1972). Strip searches are to be conducted with maximum courtesy, maximum respect for the person's dignity and minimum physical discomfort to the person being searched. (State Penitentiary, Maryland)

1973

U.S. Appeals Court
STRIP SEARCH

Daugherty v. Harris, 476 F.2d 292 (10th Cir. 1973), cert. denied, 414 U.S. 872. Strip searches of prisoners before or after visits are allowed. (Leavenworth Federal Penitentiary, Kansas)

1974

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCH
EMPLOYEE

Gettlemen v. Werner, 377 F.Supp. 445 (W.D. Penn. 1974). Strip search of former corrections employee is proper when he had recently been seen passing contraband to an inmate. (State Correctional Institute, Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania)

1975

U.S. District Court
"SHAKEDOWNS"
STRIP SEARCH
FRISK SEARCH

Giampetruzzi v. Malcolm, 406 F.Supp. 836 (S.D. N.Y. 1975). Closer surveillance of the cells of inmates in administrative segregation, such as cell inspection and shakedown does not violate the fourth amendment, equal protection, or due process. During shakedown, inmates must be permitted to watch the correctional officer search their cells. Strip searches after personal visits, while not doing so to the general population, does not violate the fourth amendment, due process, or equal protection. Frisks of inmates upon going to and from gym activities does not violate due process, equal protection, or the fourth amendment. (New York City House of Detention for Men)

1976

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCH
BODY CAVITY

Bell v. Manson, 427 F.Supp. 450 (D. Conn. 1976). Strip and rectal searching after court appearances is upheld. (Community Correctional Center, Bridgeport, Connecticut)

U.S. District Court
BODY CAVITY
SEARCH

Hodges v. Klein, 412 F.Supp. 898 (D. N.J. 1976). Unless the inmates in segregation are going to mix with the general population, there is no need for a body cavity search whenever an inmate enters or leaves segregation. (Trenton State Prison, New Jersey)

1977

U.S. District Court
LIVING AREAS

Goldsby v. Carnes, 429 F.Supp. 370 (W.D. Mo. 1977). All living units should be checked for contraband at least once a month. (Jackson County Jail, Kansas City, Missouri)

1978

U.S. Appeals Court
BODY CAVITY
SEARCH

Hurley v. Ward, 584 F.2d 609 (2nd Cir. 1978). A prohibition against anal and genital searches of the named plaintiff without a showing of probable cause is confirmed. (New York State Correctional System)

U.S. Appeals Court
STRIP SEARCH

United States v. York, 578 F.2d 1036 (5th Cir. 1978), cert. denied, 439 U.S 1005 (1978). For a strip search of a prisoner to be conducted the government must show reasonableness, not probable cause, that there is contraband on the individual. The more intrusive the search, the heavier the burden is on the government to prove reasonableness. (Federal Correctional Institution, Miami, Florida)

1979

U.S. Supreme Court
LIVING AREAS
BODY CAVITY
SEARCH
STRIP SEARCH

Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. 520 (1979). Pretrial detainees confined in the Metropolitan Correction Center (MCC) in New York City challenged virtually every facet of the institution's conditions and practices in a writ of habeas corpus, alleging such conditions and practices violate their constitutional rights.

MCC is a federally operated, short-term detention facility constructed in 1975; Eighty-five percent of all inmates are released within sixty days of admission. MCC was intended to include the most advanced and innovative features of modern design in detention facilities. The key design element of the facility is the "modular" or "unit" concept, whereby each floor housing inmates has one or two self-contained residential units, as opposed to the traditional cellblock jail construction. Within four months of the opening of the twelve-story, 450 inmate capacity facility, this action was initiated.

The U.S. District Court for the Southern District of N.Y. enjoined no less than twenty practices at the MCC on constitutional and statutory grounds, many of which were not appealed. See, United States Ex Rel Wolfish v. Levi, 439 F.Supp. 114 (S.D.N.Y.). The Second Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed the district court decision, See, Wolfish v. Levi, 573 F.2d 118 (2d Cir. 1978), and reasserted the "compelling-necessity" test as the standard for determining limitations on a detainee's freedom.

The U.S. Supreme Court granted certiorari "to consider the important constitutional questions raised by [recent prison decisions] and to resolve an apparent conflict among the circuits." 441 U.S. at 524: Do the publisher-only rule, the prohibition on receiving packages from outside sources, the search of living quarters, and the visual inspection of body cavities after contact visits constitute punishment in violation of the rights of pretrial detainees under the due process clause of the fifth amendment?

HELD: "Nor do we think that the four MCC security restrictions and practices...constitute 'punishment' in violation of the rights of pretrial detainees under the due process clause of the fifth amendment." 441 U.S. at 560, 561.

REASONING: a. [T]he determination whether these restrictions and practices constitute punishment in the constitutional sense depends on whether they are rationally related to a legitimate nonpunitive governmental purpose and whether they appear excessive in relation to that purpose. 441 U.S. at 561.

b. Ensuring security and order at the institution is a permissible nonpunitive objective, whether the facility houses pretrial detainees, convicted inmates, or both...[W]e think that these particular restrictions and practices were reasonable responses by MCC officials to legitimate security concerns. [Detainees] simply have not met their heavy burden of showing that these officials have exaggerated their response to the genuine security considerations that activated these restrictions and practices. 441 U.S. at 561, 662.

CLOSING COMMENTS OF MAJORITY OPINION: "[T]he inquiry of federal courts into prison management must be limited to the issue of whether a particular system violates any prohibition of the constitution, or in the case of a federal prison, a statute. The wide range of 'judgment calls' that meet constitutional and statutory requirements are confided to officials outside of the judicial branch of government." 441 U.S. at 562.

GENERAL NOTES: The Court saw this case, a challenge to virtually every aspect of the operation of a state of the art detention facility, as an opportunity to clarify the judiciary's role in the operation of prisons. The five-four decision indicates there was no general consensus as to what that role is, or how it should be applied. No less than three possible standards of review are contained in the majority and dissenting opinions: 1) A "rational basis", subjective test; 2) A balancing of interests test; 3) An objective standard of review.

Despite J. Rehnquist's statement that "our analysis does not turn on the particulars of the MCC concept or design," the majority's reasoning frequently looks to that concept or design for justification of its positions. 441 U.S. at 525. Clearly, the "double-bunking" holding should be interpreted as applicable only to facilities where:

a) Inmates are locked in their cells a maximum of eight hrs. a day and have access to a wide range of activities and programs; and

b) No inmate is detained longer than sixty days.

Situations other than these likely will not fall within the strict holding on this issue. (Metropolitan Correction Center, New York)

1980

U.S. District Court
CELL SEARCH
DAMAGE TO PROPERTY
BODY CAVITY SEARCH

Brown v. Hilton, 492 F.Supp. 771 (D. N.J. 1980). An inmate retains some residual fourth amendment rights including a right to protection against unreasonable searches. A search of the cell which leaves the cell in shambles and damages personal property is unreasonable. The use of anal inspections when moving an inmate to segregation is valid where the individual has been found to possess items which are a threat to institutional security. The Court notes that there are no routine anal inspections and seems to suggest that it might not approve such. (New Jersey State Prison, Trenton)

U.S. District Court
BODY CAVITY SEARCH

Massey v. Wilson, 484 F.Supp. 1332 (D. Colo. 1980). While body cavity searches are a valid security technique, when they are performed in an unreasonable place or manner, they become unconstitutional. (State Penitentiary, Colorado)

U.S. District Court
BODY CAVITY SEARCH

Sims v. Brierton, 500 F.Supp. 813 (N.D. Ill. 1980). Requiring inmates to submit to a body cavity search in order to consult with an attorney or to have a deposition taken violates the right of access to the courts. There are no security considerations demonstrated in this context which would support such a requirement. (Stateville Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
CELL SEARCH

Taylor v. Leidig, 484 F.Supp. 1330 (D. Colo. 1980). The conduct of a cell search in the absence of the inmate-occupant is valid. (Colorado State Penitentiary)

1981

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCH
BODY CAVITY SEARCH

Frazier v. Ward, 528 F.Supp. 80 (N.D. N.Y. 1981). The Supreme Court's decision in Bell v. Wolfish does not stand for the proposition that strip searches are per se constitutional, but rather, that body cavity searches are not per se unreasonable under the fourth amendment. Prison officials in New York were not entitled to relief from judgment which prohibited them from conducting visual body cavity searches upon inmates returning after contact visits. (Clinton Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
STRIP SEARCH

Logan v. Shealy, 660 F.2d 1007 (4th Cir. 1981), cert. denied, 102 S.Ct. 1435 (1981). The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit has held that the routine strip searching of jail detainees at the Arlington County (Virginia) jail violates the standards enunciated in Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. 520. The policy to strip search all persons held at the Detention Center for weapons or contraband regardless of their offense had been in effect since 1975 and was applied to Lucy Logan, an attorney who had been involved in a two car collision and had been taken to the station house for a breath analysis. She had been ordered released on her own recognizance but told she would have to wait at a detention center for four hours or until a responsible person came for her. (Arlington County Jail, Virginia)

U.S. Appeals Court
CELL SEARCH

Olsen v. Klecker, 642 F.2d 1115 (8th Cir. 1981). Conducting unannounced cell searches without any cause is a valid security procedure. (North Dakota State Penitentiary)

State Court
BODY CAVITY SEARCH

State v. Hartzog, 635 P.2d 694 (Sup. Ct. Wash. 1981). Body cavity search of inmates en route to court is approved. The plaintiff challenged the constitutionality of security procedures applied to all defendants who are penitentiary inmates who appear before the Walla Walla Superior Court. The courtroom security order requiring inmates to be searched at the prison prior to departure, and to be subjected to a skin and probe search upon arrival at the county jail did not require a body cavity search at the prison, and therefore did not result in two body cavity searches. The single search was upheld. (Washington State Penitentiary, Walla Walla, Washington)

State Court
BODY SEARCH
SAME-SEX SEARCH

Sterling v. Cupp, 625 P.2d 123 (Sup. Ct. Ore. 1981). The conduct of body searches by guards of the opposite sex constitutes a needless indignity and a degrading experience which violates the Oregon constitution. The court notes the long-standing rule that female inmates are only to be searched by female guards and suggests that the use of female guards to search male inmates would raise a serious equal protection problem. While pretermitting the question whether women have a right to be employed as guards in a male institution, the court seems to suggest that such employment may be required. (State Penitentiary, Oregon)

U.S. Appeals Court
STRIP SEARCH

Tikalsky v. City of Chicago, 687 F.2d 175 (Chicago, Ill. 1981). A federal jury awarded $30,000 in damages to Mary Ann Tikalsky, a former city of Chicago Clinical therapist, who was strip searched after being arrested for complaining about a parking ticket. The verdict was made against the city and Norman Schmiedeknecht, the police watch commander on duty when she was searched. Two other officers were found not guilty of the charge. Following the verdict, James O'Grady, former police superintendent for the city issued strict guidelines as to when strip searches could be made. The Illinois General Assembly has since passed legislation restricting such searches. (City of Chicago, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
BODY CAVITY SEARCH

U.S. v. Miller, 526 F.Supp. 691 (W.D. Okl. 1981). Prior notice that a federal prisoner might be subjected to a body cavity search is not required where prison officials have reason to believe that the prisoner is hiding or might be hiding contraband in a body cavity. Officials had overheard the prisoner's telephone conversation with his common-law wife in which smuggling of marijuana was discussed. After a visit from his wife, the prisoner was subjected to a body cavity search, which yielded marijuana. (Federal Correctional Institution, El Reno, Oklahoma)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEARCH OF PROSTHETIC

U.S. v. Sanders, 663 F.2d 1 (2nd Cir. 1981). The court determines that search of an artificial leg is not as great an intrusion as a body cavity search. A routine inquiry to the Treasury Enforcement Computer System indicated that the defendant was suspected of trafficking narcotics from South America and that he might conceal cocaine in an artificial leg. Having discovered that information, the customs officer also noted that the defendant was using a "Z" passport. Questioning of the defendant as to why he had a round trip ticket to Venezuela resulted in an incredible story. On those facts, the customs officer acted properly in taking the defendant to a hospital for removal of the artificial leg, in which drugs were found. (J.F.K. Airport)

U.S. District Court
PAT SEARCH

Waddell v. Brandon, 528 F.Supp. 1097 (W.D. Okl. 1981). The plaintiff's civil rights suit against the officer for injuries sustained during a pat down search is frivolous. Accordingly, the officer as the prevailing party was entitled to recover his reasonable attorney fees under 42 U.S.C.A. Section 1988. (Valley Brook, Oklahoma)

U.S. District Court
VISITOR SEARCH

Wool v. Hogan, 505 F.Supp. 928 (D. Vt. 1981). The United States District Court for Vermont dismissed Kirk Wool's 42 U.S.C. Section 1983 suit against the correctional facility. Wool had alleged that prison officials had interfered with his right to marriage and family relationships by requiring his visitors to submit to strip searches. The case arose after Wool began receiving weekly contact visits from his girl friend and their infant daughter. Three months after these visits began, prison officials began requiring the girl friend and the infant to submit to strip searches prior to contact visits with Wool. On a visit a few months later, the woman refused to be strip searched, and the two were denied visitation privileges. Wool's relationship with the two eventually deteriorated, and he subsequently filed suit claiming that the strip search policy had discouraged their visits. He also alleged that the officials' denial of his earlier request to marry had violated his fundamental rights under the fourteenth amendment.

In reviewing Wool's complaints, the district court noted that prison administrators are accorded wide ranging authority in the execution of policies that are needed to preserve internal order, discipline and security. The court then held that penal officials have an interest in restricting the flow of contraband into an institution, and that strip searching visitors suspected of carrying such contraband was not an exaggerated response. The court reasoned that the maintenance of a family relationship requires communication, compassion, and constancy, and the strip search policy did not hinder such goals. The court also rejected Wool's claim that the strip searches "chilled" his first amendment right of association. The court stated that while it is clear that free members of society have the right of physical association, such a right is significantly curtailed by a criminal conviction. The court then found that prison security justified any "chilling" effect on Wool's first amendment rights. In dealing with Wool's request to marry, the court determined that the fundamental nature of the right to marry arises from an individual's interest in being free from governmental interference in making important personal decisions. The court noted, however, that states have traditionally had a significant interest in the marriage relationship. In this regard the court ruled that Vermont prison officials had a specific interest in Wool's rehabilitation and concluded that the officials acted reasonably in denying his marriage request in light of those interests. (St. Albans Correctional Facility, Vermont)

1982

U.S. Appeals Court
STRIP SEARCH

DeMier v. Gondles, 676 F.2d 92 (4th Cir. 1982). Plaintiffs brought suit challenging the strip search policy of the Arlington County (Virginia) sheriff's office. The policy required mandatory strip search of all detainees without regard to severity of the offense or anticipated duration of stay at the County Detention Center. After the plaintiffs' arrests for minor offenses (playing a stereo too loud and writing obscene words on a traffic ticket), both were taken to the detention center, strip searched, and placed in holding rooms separate from the general inmate population for a short time and then released on bail. Suit was brought, and shortly thereafter, the Virginia state assembly passed legislation severely curtailing the circumstances under which strip searches could be conducted. The plaintiffs then voluntarily dismissed the action and were awarded attorney's fees under 42 U.S.C. Section 1988. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the 4th Circuit, in affirming the district court noted that "the plaintiffs' actions were the catalyst which caused a defendant to remedy his errant ways. (Arlington County Detention Facility, Virginia)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCH

Hunt v. Polk County, 551 F.Supp. 339 (S.D. Iowa 1982). Strip searches of prearraignment detainees charged with minor offenses are declared impermissible. A federal district court judge in Iowa found that no strip searches of prearraignment detainees charged with minor offenses would be permitted unless the offense is associated with weapons or contraband, or unless there is a basis for reasonable suspicion that the particular detainee is concealing a weapon or contraband.

Because these detainees are being held solely due to their inability to post cash bail, and because most are traffic violators, the court found that there was little reason to believe that a particular detainee would be concealing contraband or a weapon. (Polk County Jail, Iowa)

U.S. Appeals Court
VISITOR SEARCH

Hunter v. Auger, 672 F.2d 668 (1982). The Constitution mandates that a reasonable suspicion standard govern strip searches of visitors to penal institutions. That standard is flexible enough to afford the measure of fourth amendment protection without imposing an insuperable barrier to the exercise of all search and seizure powers. To justify the strip search for a particular visitor under the reasonable suspicion standard, prison officials must point to specific objective facts and rational inferences that they are entitled to draw from those facts in light of their experience. (Men's Penitentiary, Fort Madison, Iowa)

State Appeals Court
SEARCH OF PROPERTY

People v. Greenwald, 445 N.Y.S.2d 865 (App. Div. 1982). Search of prisoners' inventoried items is permissible without a search warrant. The Supreme Court, Appellate Division, of New York, has ruled that police personnel were allowed to examine an arrestee's belongings after they had been inventoried and locked away.

The plaintiff had been admitted consistent with normal booking procedures at which time his personal property including his wallet was sealed in an envelope and placed in the property room. Later, a search of his wallet revealed a piece of paper with the name, address, and telephone number of one of his victims. The court upheld the search and stated:

> It is now beyond doubt that under the fourth amendment an arresting officer may, without a warrant, search a person validly arrested. The fact of a lawful arrest, standing alone, authorized the search (Michigan v. Defillippo, 443 U.S. 31, 99 S.Ct. 2627; Gustafson v. Florida, 414 U.S. 260, 94 S.Ct. 488; United States v. Robinson, 414 U.S. 218, 94 S.Ct. 467). That there may be some time interval between the arrest and the subsequent taking of property for use as evidence does not change this principle, nor does the fact that 'the clothing or effects are immediately seized upon arrival at the jail, held under the defendant's name in the property room of the jail, and at a later time searched and taken for use at the subsequent criminal trial.' (United States v. Edwards, 415 U.S. 800, 94 S.Ct. 1234, 1239).

The court noted that a warrant would have been required if Greenwald had left his wallet at home.

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCH

Roscom v. City of Chicago, 550 F.Supp. 153 (N.D. Ill. 1982). Sheriff and jail director could be individually liable if they implemented a policy permitting unconstitutional strip searches. A woman arrested for writing dishonored checks has sued the sheriff, jail director, and various city defendants for conducting a visual strip search. Taken from a police station to a hospital when she complained of chest pains, she was subjected to a visual strip search upon her admission to the Cook County Jail.

The Court has held that even though the sheriff and jail director were not personally involved with the search, they could be individually liable if the policy which they implemented is found unconstitutional. (Cook County Jail)

U.S. Appeals Court
STRIP SEARCH

Salinas v. Breier, 695 F.2d 1073 (7th Cir. 1982), cert. denied, 104 S.Ct. 119. Police chief is not liable for failing to establish guidelines for strip searches. An appellate court has overturned the findings of a federal district court which held that a strip search was conducted by employees in a humiliating manner and that the chief was liable for failing to establish specific guidelines for the conduct of searches. The case was reversed by the appellate court which found that the police chief was not liable because the strip search was conducted based on probable cause that the arrestees possessed controlled substances. (Milwaukee Police Department)

U.S. Appeals Court
PAT SEARCH

Smith v. Fairman, 678 F.2d 52 (C.D. Ill. 1982), cert. denied, 103 S.Ct. 1879 (1982). The 7th Circuit Court of Appeals has held that a pat down search by a female prison guard of a male inmate is permissible so long as the search does not extend to the genital area. The plaintiff was an inmate in an Illinois correctional facility and was subjected to a frisk search which encompassed the head, neck, back, chest, stomach, waist, and the outside of his legs and thighs. Arguing that such a search by a member of the opposite sex was cruel and unusual punishment, he brought this action seeking $40,000 damages and an order to prohibit such searches.

In affirming the district court's ruling for the defendants, the court of appeals noted that any search may be humiliating and degrading, but recognized the clear necessity of searches in prisons and jails. The plaintiff did not argue that the type of search was itself illegal, but only that it was cruel and unusual punishment under the eighth amendment for a member of the opposite sex to conduct the search.

In an affidavit, the warden of the facility stated that the Department of Corrections was obligated to avoid sex discrimination in hiring under Title VII and could not only employ male guards, and that allowing inmate searches only by members of the same sex would prevent the department from fulfilling its obligation of hiring and utilizing people without regard to sex. The court recognized that some limitations do exist, (for example, surveillance by male guards of female inmates who were showering or sleeping) but held that because the inmate was fully clothed during the search, and the search did not extend to the genital or anal area, it was reasonable and did not violate his right of privacy or the eighth amendment's prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment. (Pontiac Correctional Center, Illinois)

1983

State Appeals Court
VISITOR SEARCH

Comm. v. Lapia, 457 A.2d 877 (Penn. App. 1983). Anonymous tip does not provide "reasonable suspicion" for strip search of visitor. The Superior Court of Pennsylvania determined that a strip search of a visitor was improper since it was conducted based only on an anonymous tip.

U.S. Appeals Court
BODY CAVITY SEARCH

Dufrin v. Spreen, 712 F.2d 1084 (6th Cir. 1983). Visual body cavity search of female arrestee is constitutional. The Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals found that the search of a detainee arrested for assaulting her stepdaughter was constitutional. The court reached the verdict because:

(1) the offense for which the detainee was arrested was a violent offense;
(2) the detainee would be coming into contact with the general jail population;
(3) the search was conducted in privacy, by a female officer, and was visual only; and
(4) there was no offensive behavior by the matron or anyone else associated with the search.

The court referred to several other cases which prohibited the strip searching of all detainees. (Oakland County Jail, Michigan)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCH

Giles v. Ackerman, 559 F.Supp. 226 (D. Ida. 1983), reh'g, 746 F.2d 614 (1984) cert. denied, 105 S.Ct. 2114 (1984). Strip search of female traffic offender upheld by district court, then overturned by Appeals Court. A women in Idaho filed suit against the Bonneville County sheriff's office after she was strip searched following arrest for failure to appear and pay parking tickets. Although the district court judge found the circumstances unusual and was sympathetic, he held that it was not unreasonable to search the woman after it became clear that she would not be released on bond prior to her hearing in court.

Finding that the policy requiring a strip search of every prisoner processed into the general population of the facility was reasonable, he held that it was not a violation of the fourteenth amendment. On appeal, the higher court reversed the initial decision, finding the practice violated the defendant's fourth amendment rights. On appeal to the United State Supreme Court (See: Ackerman v. Giles, 1985), the appeals court decision remained when certiorari was denied. (Bonneville County Jail, Idaho)

U.S. Appeals Court
STRIP SEARCH

Hodges v. Stanley, 712 F.2d 34 (2nd Cir. 1983). Second strip search is found unconstitutional by circuit court. An inmate who was strip searched two times in a short period was found to have a valid constitutional claim by the Second Circuit Court of Appeals, reversing the lower court's dismissal of the inmate's civil rights suit.

The inmate was strip searched prior to being admitted to administrative detention at the Metropolitan Correctional Center in New York, and was then subjected to a second strip search almost immediately. The lower court had dismissed the case, but the higher court disagreed, and noted that the inmate was under continuous escort between the first and second searches and that there had been no opportunity to obtain contraband. (Metropolitan Correctional Center, New York)

U.S. Supreme Court
SEARCH WARRANT
EVIDENCE

Illinois v. Gates, 103 S.Ct. 2317, ruling below 423 N.E.2d 887 (1983), reh'g denied, 104 S.Ct. 33. United States Supreme Court relaxes search standards. Gates' conviction on drug charges was reversed because the original source of information for the police was an anonymous informer. The Supreme Court had requested that both sides present to the court arguments relating to a "good faith exception" to the exclusionary rule. The Court eventually decided that it had no standing to make a determination. The Court ruled that the evidence seized based on a warrant which was secured in large part on the basis of the information provided anonymously had been wrongfully excluded.

Writing for the majority, Justice Rehnquist agreed that the credibility and reliability of an informant is highly relevant, as well as the facts on which the informer bases his conclusions, but noted that these factors should not be "entirely separate and independent requirements" which should be "rigidly exacted in every case."

Holding that the evidence in question was lawfully seized and should be admitted at trial, the Court advanced a "common sense, practical" approach to the probable cause question, taking into consideration the "totality of the circumstances." The Gates' case replaces Aguilar v. Texas, 378 U.S. 108 (1964) and Spinelli v. U.S., 393 U.S. 410 (1969), which had previously been the test for probable cause. (Bloomingdale Police Department, Illinois)

U.S. Supreme Court
SEARCH OF PROPERTY

Illinois v. Lafayette, 103 S.Ct. 2605 (1983). U.S. Supreme Court finds inventory search of inmate's property permissible at time of admission. The high court determined that police were allowed to routinely search the personal property of an arrestee at the police station during the admission process, prior to being detained.

The court found that the practical necessities of ensuring the security and safety of the detention facility and property, justified an inventory search as part of the standard process associated with incarceration.

The plaintiff in the case was arrested for disturbing the peace and was taken to a police station where his shoulder bag was searched without a warrant, and its contents were inventoried during the booking process. Subsequently, the plaintiff was charged with illegally possessing controlled substances. The lower court had suppressed the evidence because it viewed the search as invalid. The Supreme Court reversed that decision, concluding that since the search did not rest on probable cause, the absence of a warrant was immaterial to the reasonableness of the search. (Kankakee City Police Department, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
FRISK SEARCH
SAME-SEX SEARCH

Madyun v. Franzen, 704 F.2d 954 (7th Cir. 1983), cert. denied, 104 S.Ct. 493 (1983). Female officers are allowed to frisk male inmates. A Federal Court of Appeals has held that the State of Illinois may require male inmates, even those with religious objections, to submit to frisk searches by female officers.

The plaintiff claimed that his Islamic faith prevented any physical contact with a woman other than his wife or mother. He was sentenced to fifteen days in segregation for refusing to submit to a search. The court also held that the state may implement opposite sex searches of male prisoners without requiring the same of female prisoners.

The rationale for the decision was that the state's goal of providing equal opportunity for women could be obtained only if women can perform all essential tasks necessary to the security of the institution. (Pontiac Correctional Center, Illinois)

State Supreme Court
ATTORNEY SEARCH

Rhode Island Defense Attorneys' Association v. Dodd, 463 A.2d 1370 (1983). Rhode Island Supreme Court rules that attorney searches and refusal to allow briefcases in cell area are valid. In a case filed by the Rhode Island Defense Attorneys' Association, the court found that existing procedures did not violate any constitutional rights.

Attorneys are required to pass through a metal detector. If the device is activated, they are asked to remove metal items and to pass through again. A pat-down search is used only as a last resort.

Briefcases are inspected only for the purpose of discovering weapons or other lethal objects. Finally, the facility refuses to allow briefcases in the cell area, but permits attorneys to take files and papers into the cell block.

The court supported these practices, stating that "It is our opinion that these procedures, in light of the potential dangers confronting the state, are reasonable." (Rhode Island Department of Corrections)

Appeals Court
FRISK SEARCH
SAME-SEX SEARCH

Rivera v. Smith, 462 N.Y.S.2d 352 (App. 1983), aff'd, 472 S.2d 210 (1985). Muslim inmate may refuse frisk search by female guards. An appellate court in New York has ruled that generally inmates may refuse for religious reasons to submit to frisk searches by female guards, finding no reason why male guards could not be used to conduct routine searches. The court ruled that an officer of either sex must be allowed to conduct the search when contraband is suspected or in other emergency circumstances. (Attica Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCH

Roscom v. City of Chicago, 570 F.Supp. 1259 (N.D. Ill. 1983). Visual strip search of all pretrial detainees regardless of severity of crime is upheld by federal district court. Suit was brought against the City of Chicago by a woman who was detained for writing dishonored checks, alleging violation of her constitutional rights.

The plaintiff sued the sheriff of Cook County, the jail director of the Cook County Jail, and various city officials. Taken from a police station to a hospital when she complained of chest pains, she was subjected to a visual strip search upon her admission to the Cook County Jail.

The court had previously ruled that although the sheriff and jail director were not personally involved in the search, they could be individually liable if the policy which they implemented was found unconstitutional (550 F.Supp. 153).

The court held that the policy of conducting visual strip searches of all pretrial detainees during processing was a legitimate procedure to insure jail security. Probable cause is not needed for these searches, as the need for jail security outweighs the privacy interest of inmates.

In upholding the searching procedures, the court relied on Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. 520, 99 S.Ct. 1861 (1979). The opinion stated:

> Wolfish does not require a showing of probable cause for visual strip searches of pretrial detainees. None of the regularized and nondiscriminatory procedures is unreasonable as applied to all pretrial detainees. County's interest in the security of its Jail is legitimate. Its visual strip search policy of all pretrial detainees, carried out (1) by same sex personnel, (2) in a separate room, (3) without in any way touching the detainees, is reasonable under the balancing test of Wolfish. (441 U.S. at 560)

The court concluded that the plaintiff had not been unconstitutionally deprived of any of her rights. (Cook County Jail)

1984

U.S. Supreme Court
CELL SEARCH
DAMAGE TO PROPERTY

Block v. Rutherford, 104 S.Ct. 3227 (1984). U.S. Supreme Court reverses lower court rulings. Pretrial detainees in Los Angeles Central Jail will not have contact visits and will not be allowed to be present when cells are searched.

Pretrial detainees at the Los Angeles County Central Jail brought a class action in Federal District Court in 1975 against the County Sheriff and other officials, challenging the jail's policy of denying pretrial detainees contact visits with their spouses, relatives, children and friends, and the jail's practice of conducting random, irregular "shakedown" searches of cells while the detainees were away at meals, recreation, or other activities. The District Court concluded that the danger of permitting lower security risk inmates to have contact visits was not great enough to warrant deprivation of such contact and, with regard to cell searches, that allowing inmates to watch from a distance while their cells are searched would allay inmate concerns that their personal property would be unnecessarily confiscated or destroyed.

In a six to three decision, the Supreme Court relied upon its previous ruling in Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. 520, to uphold practices at the Los Angeles County Central Jail. Writing for the majority, Chief Justice Burger stated that " ...The principles articulated in Wolfish govern resolution of this case....We affirm that, 'proper deference to the informed discretion of prison authorities demands that they, and not the courts, make the difficult judgments which reconcile conflicting claims affecting the security of the institution, the welfare of the prison staff, and the property rights of the detainees.' 441 U.S. at 557. Accordingly, the judgment of the Court of Appeals is reversed."

Permitting Detainees to Observe Cell Searches. The appeal presented to the Supreme Court the issue of whether detainees are entitled to observe jail staff when their cells are being searched according to jail policies which require irregular or random "(shakedown)" searches. The majority found the method of conducting searches virtually identical to that presented in Wolfish, and found no reason to reconsider the prior support of that method in light of a fourth amendment challenge and a due process challenge. (Los Angeles County Central Jail)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCH

Cole v. Snow, 586 F. Supp. 655 (D. Mass. 1984) and 588 F. Supp. 1386 (D. Mass. 1984). Visitor Receives Over $175,000 for Unconstitutional Strip Searches; Sheriff Held Liable for Policies. A woman who was subjected to visual cavity searches on three occasions was awarded $150,000 as compensation and $27,040 for future medical expenses by a Federal Court in Massachusetts. The Court found that the Sheriff had instituted unconstitutional strip search policies, and that he was liable in his official and individual capacity. No punitive damages were awarded.

U.S. District Court
CELL SEARCH

Cook v. City of New York, 578 F.Supp. 179 (S.D. N.Y. 1984). Valid reason needed to search inmate cell, although search warrant not required. According to a federal district court in New York, corrections officials may enter an inmate's cell to search it without a warrant. However, they may not seize an item in the cell unless there is a legitimate institutional interest involved. In this case, facility staff entered the plaintiff's cell to search for a coat which they thought had been worn during a robbery. They seized an address book which was found during the search and not the coat (which was not found). The court found this a potential violation of fourth amendment rights. (Correctional Institution, Napanoch, New York)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCH

Kathriner v. City of Overland, Missouri, 602 F.Supp. 124 (E.D. Mo. 1984). The U.S. District Court held that strip searching a pretrial detainee without reason to believe she possessed contraband or weapons violated her constitutional rights. The plaintiff challenged the blanket policy of strip searching all prisoners, regardless of their length of detention. Corrections officials who conducted the search were granted good faith immunity because they adopted the strip search policy when Bell v. Wolfish was decided and had not been put on notice that their actions were unconstitutional. The court held the city liable for their violations. (Overland City Lockup, Missouri)

U.S. Appeals Court
STRIP SEARCH

Mary Beth G. v. City of Chicago, 723 F.2d 1263 (7th Cir. 1984). Female detainees are awarded damages for strip searches. Four women who were strip searched at a lockup while awaiting arrival of bail funds brought action against the city. The women were all arrested for misdemeanor charges. The court found the strip search policy which resulted in the searching of prisoners who were not inherently dangerous and were only detained briefly while awaiting bond was unreasonable under the fourth amendment. Also, equal protection was violated as similarly situated males were subjected to only hand searches. Each plaintiff was awarded between $25,000 and $35,000 in damages; attorney's fees were also awarded. (Chicago City Lockups)

U.S. Appeals Court
STRIP SEARCH

McKinley v. Trattles, 732 F. 2d 1320 (7th Cir. 1984). Officer To Pay $6,000 to Prisoner for Unnecessary Strip Search. The United States Court of Appeals has affirmed a lower court judgment against a correctional officer but reduced the amount of punitive damages from $15,000 to $6,000. The plaintiff, a prisoner, claimed that he had already been searched once before returning to his cell. He was then handcuffed and sprayed with mace in a forced attempt to subject him to a second search. The federal jury believed the plaintiff's version of the events.

U.S. District Court
CELL SEARCH

Nakao v. Rushen, 580 F.Supp. 718 (N.D. Cal. 1984), vacated 766 F.2d 410 (9th Cir. 1985). Search of inmate cell and seizure of letters found improper because no institutional purpose involved. A federal district court in California found that corrections officials acted improperly when they searched an inmate's cell for mail written by his wife. The wife was under investigation for improperly using letterheads and other materials when she was employed by a county social service department. Several letters from the inmate's wife were seized during the search and were forwarded to county officials. His wife was subsequently fired for misuse of supplies. Because the inmate was not suspected of misconduct and because the search was not justified in terms of facility security, the court found the search and seizure improper. On appeal, the circuit court of appeals found that the search did not violate the fourth amendment, and remanded the case to the lower court for consideration of the first amendment and state law. (San Quentin Prison, California)

U.S. Appeals Court
EMPLOYEE

Security and Law Enforcement Employees v. Carey, 737 F.2d 187 (2nd Cir. 1984). Warrantless strip search of guard not violation if there is a "reasonable suspicion." A federal appeals court has ruled that a prison guard has a diminished expectation of privacy while on the job, but that random searches without cause are not permissible. (Wallkill Correctional Facility, New York)

State Appeals Court
VISITOR SEARCH

State v. Balser, 460 So.2d 74 (La. App. 1984). Strip search of visitor upheld by Louisiana court. The mother of a prisoner was routinely pat searched prior to a visit and was ordered to return several items to her car. Upon her return, she was taken to a private room for an additional search (strip), which produced several bags of marijuana in her sock. She was subsequently tried and sentenced to six months of hard labor.

The appeals court upheld the searches because signs were posted stating that visitors were subject to personal searches, her prior knowledge of procedures from previous visits , and her initial written consent to submit to personal searches. (Louisiana State Penitentiary)

U.S. Appeals Court
BODY CAVITY
SEARCH

U.S. v. Caldwell, 750 F.2d 341 (5th Cir. 1984), cert. denied, 105 S.Ct. 1873 (1984). Appeals court approves cavity search of prisoner. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit has ruled that federal prison officials in a facility in Texarkana did not violate any major constitutional rights of a prisoner when they subjected him to a digital rectal search following a visit. The search was conducted based on a tip from an inmate informant which predicted that the prisoner would conceal narcotics in his rectum following a visit. After the visit the prisoner was taken to the facility hospital, but the search was not completed because the prisoner reacted violently. Following a day in a "dry" cell, marijuana was found in five balloons in the prisoner's excrement. The court found the procedure "practicable, as indicated by the type of contraband and the method of suspected introduction." (Federal Correctional Institution, Texarkana, Texas)

1985

U.S. Supreme Court
STRIP SEARCH

Ackerman v. Giles, 105 S.Ct. 2114 (1985). U.S. supreme court denies review of strip search case - appeals court ruling stands. An important indication of strip search guidelines was provided by the 1985 decision of the Court to deny certiorari for Ackerman v. Giles. Ruling:

> County policy of strip searching all persons admitted to county jail, regardless of severity of charges or whether officials have reasonable suspicion that arrestee is concealing contraband, and unsupported by any indication that strip searches effectively deter smuggling of contraband into jail, violates fourth amendment. A strip search of a person who was arrested for minor traffic offense and was described as cooperative and orderly violated fourth amendment in absence of individualized suspicion that she was carrying contraband or was in any way threatening jail security.

In denying review of the case, the decision of the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals, overturning the district court decision which had approved the practice, now stands throughout the circuit. 746 F.2d 614 (9th Cir. 1984). (Bonneville County Jail, Idaho)

U.S. Appeals Court
VISITOR SEARCH

Blackburn v. Snow, 771 F.2d 556 (1985). A woman was awarded $177,040 for violations of fourth amendment rights when repeatedly subjected to strip searches when visiting her brother. The sheriff imposed a rule requiring all visitors to submit to body cavity strip-searches, without any suspicion of carrying contraband or anything else. Merely because they were visiting, they were strip searched. The court ruled that the sheriff was not immune from damages, and that the county was liable for the policy as well. The plaintiff's returning to the prison for visits on future occasions where she was again strip searched did not imply consent to waive her constitutional rights, added the court. (Plymouth County Jail, Massachusetts)

State Supreme Court
VISITOR SEARCH

Commonwealth v. Dugger, 486 A.2d 382 (Pa. Sup. Ct., 1985). Search of visitors requires "reasonable," not probable cause, Penn. Supreme Court rules. Under a Pennsylvania statute governing prisoner visitor searches, the state supreme court has ruled that prison officials only need to reasonably suspect that contraband is being carried in order to search a visitor.

State Court
JUVENILE
PAT SEARCH

In re Terrence G., 37 CrL 2413 (N.Y. Sup. Ct. 1985). Pat search of juvenile detained as runaway upheld. A fifteen year old boy was detained by police in a New York subway station under the provisions of the state's runaway statute. A pat search was conducted, producing a pistol hidden in his pants. The plaintiff argued that the pistol could not be used as evidence because the search was inappropriate. The court disagreed, finding that the search was not a full custodial search, and that the officers had a duty to protect the youth and themselves under the statute.

U.S. Appeals Court
STRIP SEARCH

Joan W. v. City of Chicago, 771 F.2d 1020 (1985). Appealing to a jury to imagine themselves in a plaintiff's position is impermissible because it encourages them to depart from their neutral role. This is called the "Golden Rule." The plaintiff's counsel was therefore in violation when he asked the jury "How would you feel" if strip-searched, laughed at, and subjected to abusive language following an arrest for a traffic violation. Apparently, the counsel made the remarks after the defendants insisted to the jury that the plaintiff's emotional damages were insignificant since she didn't tell friends about the incident. Following all remarks, the judge gave the jury extensive guidance on how to assess damages and noted that the counsel was not unduly emotional in making the argument nor did the judge believe that the large damage award ($112,000) was due to the statement. Any errors that occurred did not require reversal, ruled the court. It added, however, that damages beyond $75,000 were excessive. (Chicago Police Department, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
STRIP SEARCH

Jones v. Edwards, 770 F.2d 739 (1st Cir. 1985). Strip Search of Arrestee Found Unconstitutional; Case Remanded to Determine Damages. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit concluded that a lower court erred in failing to grant the plaintiff's motion for judgment, remanding the case for determination of compensatory damages. The court declined to allow the award of punitive damages. The plaintiff was arrested for allowing his dog to run loose. During booking procedures, the uncooperative arrestee was subjected to a visual strip search. Guided by Bell v. Wolfish, the court concluded that the search violated the plaintiff's fourth amendment rights. The court noted that the plaintiff's offense was "hardly the sort of crime to inspire officers with the fear of introducing weapons or contraband into the holding cell." The officers did not have any reason to suspect the plaintiff was harboring contraband. While acknowledging the importance of security procedures, the court concluded that "..security cannot justify the blanket deprivation of rights of the kind incurred here." (Lincoln County Jail, Nebraska)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCH

John Does 1-100 v. Ninneman, 612 F.Supp. 1069 (D.C. Minn. 1985) and John Does 1 100 v. Boyd, Civil 2-84-378, (D.C. Minn. 1985). Strip searches of detainees arrested for minor offenses barred; individual defendants, but not county, given qualified immunity. Following the decisions of several circuits, the Federal District Court found that the county's practice of strip searching detainees arrested for minor offenses unrelated to drugs, weapons or predatory conduct to be unconstitutional under the fourth amendment. The county was held liable for the practice, but individual defendants were granted immunity because the law was not clearly established in this area. (Chicago County, Minnesota)

State Appeals Court
SEARCH OF PROPERTY

People v. Nagel, 38 CrL 2101 (Ill App. Ct. 4th Dist., October 1, 1985). Appeals court rules that police should not have conducted inventory search of detainee's locked briefcase. A police prisoner had more than enough cash to meet the 50 dollar bond set for the offense on which he had been arrested, but his locked briefcase was searched by police anyway. Although the Supreme Court has permitted inventory searches of prisoners' property as a valid exception to the fourth amendment's warrant requirements, the majority of the Illinois Appellate Court found that the search is permissible only if it is incident to the further incarceration of the prisoner. The state had argued that "incarceration" should be interpreted to mean any period of detention, no matter how short, including the booking process. The majority disagreed: "Incarceration must mean something more intrusive than simple detention for the purely administrative purpose of booking an individual who would otherwise be subject to immediate release on a non-substantial criminal charge. Simply put, the significant inquiry is whether there is a reasonable belief that the defendant will be subject to further incarceration. If he is, then the inventory search is legitimate... The focus must necessarily begin and end with an examination of the reasonableness of the police officer's necessarily ad hoc determination based on the facts and information available to the officer at the station house following arrest."

State Appeals Court
BODY CAVITY SEARCH

People v. West, 37 CrL 2359 (Cal Ct. App., 5th Dist, 7/23/85). Search of forty honor farm prisoners reasonable under Bell v. Wolfish. Officials received information that marijuana would be brought into the honor farm and decided to have medical staff conduct full body and cavity searches on all forty prisoners after they returned from work furloughs. A marijuana balloon was found in one prisoner's rectum. The court found that the four factors established in Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. 520 (1979), were properly balanced by officials in this instance. There was justification for the search, the scope of intrusion was appropriate, and the searches were conducted in a proper manner and location. (Stanislaus County Honor Farm)

U.S. District Court
URINE TEST

Peranzo v. Coughlin, 608 F.Supp. 1504 (D.C. NY 1985). Use of emit test (urine test for drugs) upheld. Prisoners in a state correctional facility filed a suit to stop officials from taking disciplinary actions against them based solely upon the unconfirmed results of the Syva Emit-st drug detection system. The state had adopted the system as a way to deal with the problem of narcotics in the facility. The federal judge found that the Emit testing apparatus was a purely mechanical device which required the operator to exercise no discretion, read no graphs and make no subjective interpretations. State officials had implemented a policy of making a second test (by a different individual if possible), whenever a positive result was obtained. According to the judge, the reliability of the test as the basis for imposing disciplinary sanctions was the critical issue in the case. Noting that other tests had been found sufficiently reliable to be used in criminal trials and having reviewed various studies which had been conducted on the Emit test, the court held that "the risk that double Emit testing will result in erroneous deprivation of inmates' liberty interest has not been shown to be so significant that additional testing procedures can be required... ." (N.Y. DOC)

State Appeals Court
STRIP SEARCH

Rankin v. Colman, 476 So.2d 234 (Fla.App. 5 Dist. 1985). The plaintiff filed a civil rights complaint seeking damages arising from a strip search which was conducted after her arrest for failure to produce her driver's license. The Circuit Court, Orange County, dismissed the complaint, and the plaintiff appealed. The District Court of Appeal held that: (1) a strip search and body cavity search of persons arrested for minor traffic offenses are prima facie unreasonable and an unwarranted intrusion on personal privacy of such persons, at least without some showing of justification by arresting authority, and (2) the complaint which alleged that the plaintiff was forced to undergo strip search procedure even though there was no reason to believe she had concealed contraband or weapons, and that policy, practice and procedure of conducting such searches was approved and authorized by sheriff was sufficient to state a cause of action under Section 1983. (Orange County Jail, Florida)

U.S. Appeals Court
VISITOR SEARCH

Thorne v. Jones, 765 F.2d 1270 (1rst Cir. 1985), cert. denied, 475 U.S. 1016. Strip search of prisoners' mother upheld, search of father not proper but no civil liability results. Prison officials required the mother of two prisoners, one of whom was known to be receiving drugs, to submit to a strip search as a condition of visiting her sons. The plaintiffs sued, alleging that the requirement infringed on their first amendment rights for association.

The U.S. Court of Appeals for the First Circuit held that the search requirement for the mother, who was suspected of supplying drugs, was constitutional because it was reasonably related to security concerns. The court noted that the Constitution affords convicted prisoners and their families no absolute right of visitation, and that any qualified right which may exist is derived from a source other than the first amendment.

The court held that the fourth amendment was infringed when the prisoners' father was required to submit to a strip search to visit his sons, because officials had no suspicion as to the father. Since the law on this point was not clear in late 1981 (when the search took place), the officials escaped civil liability according to the court. (Louisiana State Penitentiary)

U.S. Appeals Court
BODY CAVITY SEARCH

United States v. Smith, 774 F.2d 1005 (1985). The warden at the Federal Correctional Institution in El Reno, Okla., did not have sufficient evidence to authorize a rectal search, according to a federal appellate court. Jim Moore, a correctional counselor, received a tip from an inmate that Smith, a prisoner, might receive narcotics at his next contact visit with his wife. Moore passed this tip to Dennis Beasley, an investigative supervisor at El Reno, who then asked the warden to have Smith subjected to a rectal search after Smith's next contact visit with his wife. The warden agreed and the ensuing search disclosed that Smith was carrying 14 grams of marijuana in two vials.

The court noted that a digital or simple instrument search of an inmate's body cavity can only be conducted upon approval of the warden and only if the warden has a "reasonable belief" that the inmate is concealing contraband in or on his person. The court found no indication that the inmate who gave the tip was reliable. Neither the corrections supervisor, Beasley, who requested the search, nor the warden, who authorized the search, knew the identity of the tipster, much less his reliability. Jim Moore had merely passed on the tip with no additional information regarding the reliability of the informant. Accordingly, the court found the warden could not have been acting on "reasonable belief" that Smith was going to bring drugs in following his contact visit. (Federal Correctional Institution, El Reno, Oklahoma)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCH

Wagner v. Thomas, 608 F.Supp. 1095 (D.C. Tex. 1985). Strip searching prisoners in front of fellow prisoners upheld. A federal district court has upheld several practices of a Texas county jail. The Court agreed that strip searching prisoners in view of other prisoners was necessary to accomplish security interests in controlling contraband, where individual strip searches would present severe security risks and random searches would be rendered almost useless unless all inmates were removed from their cells at the same time before they could hide contraband. The court did not find the participation of female officers in the preliminary stages of these searches offensive because they could not have seen the prisoner's nude body during the actual search. (Dallas County Jail, Texas)

1986

U.S. District Court
BODY CAVITY

Jeffries v. Reed, 631 F.Supp. 1212 (E.D. Wash. 1986). A death row inmate challenged the constitutionality of his transfer to the intensive management unit of the prison and also challenged the conditions of his incarceration in that unit. On cross motions for summary judgment, the district court held that: (1) the transfer of an inmate to a unit on the grounds that he inherently imposed a security risk in light of his sentence did not deny the inmate due process; (2) inspection of the inmate's legal mail by staff of the unit did not violate the inmate's rights of free speech or equal protection; (3) digital rectal search which the inmate underwent prior to being transferred to the unit and strip and visual body-cavity searches he underwent each time he left his cell did not constitute unreasonable searches and seizures; (4) denial of contact with other inmates did not violate the first, sixth, or fourteenth amendments; and (5) the telephone schedule, permitting the inmate to place a collect call to his attorney at least three times per week between the hours of 8:00 a.m. and 4:00 p.m. did not deny the inmate adequate access to counsel and the courts. (Intensive Management Unit, State Prison, Washington)

State Appeals Court
DRUG TEST

King v. McMickens, 501 N.Y.S.2d 679 (A.D. 1 Dept. 1986). The refusal of a corrections officer suspected of illegal drug activities to provide a sample for an urinalysis upon order of the Department of Corrections investigators was established by sufficient evidence. Dismissing a corrections officer for refusing to submit a sample for a drug urinalysis did not violate the fourth amendment rights of the officer. The officer's reasonable expectation of privacy as a private citizen yielded to compelling governmental interests in insuring capable corrections officers when he became such an officer. Probable cause was not required to order a corrections officer to submit a sample for a drug urinalysis. The dismissal of a corrections officer for refusal to submit a sample for a drug urinalysis was not an excessive penalty, was not shocking to sense of fairness and was not disproportionate to the offense. (DOC, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
STRIP SEARCH

McRorie v. Shimoda, 795 F.2d 780 (9th Cir. 1986). A prison inmate brought a civil rights action based on allegations that a prison guard attempted to plunge a riot stick into his anus during a strip search after a shakedown. The United States District Court dismissed the suit for failure to state a claim on which relief could be granted, and the inmate appealed. The court of appeals held that: (1) the inmate's allegations, if proved, stated an eighth amendment violation; (2) if true, the prison guard's alleged conduct amounted to deprivation of the inmate's liberty interest which rose to the level of a substantive due process violation; and (3) the availability of state court relief did not bar federal relief under Section 1983 for alleged prison guard brutality which constituted a deprivation of substantive due process.

In determining whether a prison guard's conduct amounts to brutality and is therefore a liberty deprivation without due process, the court must look to such factors as a need for the application of force, the relationship between the need and amount of force that was used, the extent of the injury inflicted, and whether force was applied in a good faith effort to maintain or restore discipline or applied maliciously and sadistically for the very purpose of causing harm. (Oahu Community Correctional Center, Hawaii)

State Appeals Court
DRUG TEST

Pabon v. LeFevre, 508 N.Y.S.2d 95 (A.D. 3 Dept. 1986). A prison inmate brought an Article 78 proceeding seeking to review a determination by the Commissioner of Correctional Service that the inmate violated a disciplinary rule. The Supreme Court at Special Term transferred the proceeding. The Supreme Court held that the application to the inmate of a directive that an inmate unable to provide a urine specimen for drug testing within three hours shall be considered to have refused to submit a specimen was not improper, despite inmate's claim that he was taking cold medication, was nervous, and was unable to provide a specimen. (Clinton Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
DRUG TEST

Pella v. Adams, 638 F.Supp. 94 (D.Nev. 1986). The taking of a urinalysis sample from a Nevada prisoner did not constitute an unreasonable search. The discovery by a prison official of a green leafy substance and seeds in the prisoner's living area was sufficient to establish probable cause for the urinalysis which tested positive for the presence of marijuana. (Northern Nevada Correctional Center)

State Appeals Court
DRUG TEST

People v. Roth, 397 N.W.2d 196 (Mich.App. 1986). The defendant pled guilty to obtaining a controlled substance by fraud in the Osceola Circuit Court. The defendant appealed the addition of conditions of probation. The court of appeals held that: (1) submission to urinalysis testing was a lawful condition of probation, and (2) restriction of the defendant's right to travel was not unconstitutional. (Michigan)

State Appeals Court
EMPLOYEE

People v. Whitfield, 488 N.E.2d 1087 (Ill. App. 5 Dist. 1986). A state appeals court found that the practice of searching a guard's car and his clothing were legal actions because the guard was on department premises and he had signed a waiver of his constitutional rights in regard to such a search as a condition of his employment. There were also signs posted in the prison parking lot warning of such searches. The search did not exceed the scope of consent, since only his clothing was searched and the guard had given consent to have his car searched. (Menard Correctional Center)

U.S. District Court
OPPOSITE SEX

Smith v. Chrans, 629 F.Supp. 606 (C.D.Ill. 1986). Inmates' constitutional rights were not infringed by inadvertent and occasional sightings by female prison employees of the inmates in their cells or open shower and toilet facilities engaged in basic bodily functions. The intrusion into the prisoners' personal privacy was unwanted, but their rights were necessarily limited as a result of their incarceration. The policy required minimum unwanted intrusions by persons of the opposite sex and, in addition, avoided discrimination against women in job opportunities because of their gender. The need for institutional security and the right of institution administrators to search inmates may limit prisoner's expectation of privacy, but some shred of personal body integrity must remain. A prisoner cannot be subjected to maliciously motivated searches of his person or intentional harassment. (Pontiac Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCH

Smith v. Montgomery County, Md., 643 F.Supp. 435 (D.Md. 1986). An arrestee who was strip searched while temporarily detained at the county jail brought action against the county and several of its officials for certification of a retrospective damages class. The district court held that: (1) jail officials had probable cause to search temporary detainees arrested for felonies or misdemeanors involving weapons or contraband or with prior records of convictions or unresolved arrests for felonies or misdemeanors involving weapons or contraband, and (2) members of class whose fourth amendment rights were violated by jail's strip search policy were entitled to $200 nominal damages. Reasonable suspicion would exist to strip search all felony arrestees and all temporary detainees arrested for misdemeanor offenses that involved weapons or contraband, for purposes of determining the plaintiff class in an action against the county for conducting indiscriminate strip searches. Reasonable suspicion would also exist to strip search all temporary detainees with prior records of convictions, unresolved arrests for felony offenses, or for misdemeanors involving weapons or contraband. (Montgomery County Detention Center, Maryland)

U.S. Appeals Court
DRUG TEST

Spence v. Farrier, 807 F.2d 753 (8th Cir. 1986). Not only are EMIT brand urine test results good evidence in prison disciplinary hearings, but inmates have no right to present expert testimony in regard to EMIT reliability, according to a federal appellate court. Inmates at the Iowa State Penitentiary filed a suit against prison officials contending that use of EMIT test results without independent, confirmatory tests violated their due process rights, as did the refusal to allow them to run corroborative tests or to call testing personnel or expert witnesses to challenge EMIT results. The court noted that in a prison setting, due process requirements are satisfied if some evidence supports the decision of the prison disciplinary board. Since EMIT tests results are ninety-five percent accurate, they obviously provide some evidence of drug use, the court said. Thus, the use of the test with the confirmatory second EMIT test is sufficiently reliable to provide evidence of drug use.

The court also noted that to allow prisoners to present expert testimony in regard to EMIT reliability would seriously interfere with the institutional goal of drug deference and prompt resolution of drug related infractions. Although it is conceivable that an inmate could be unjustly disciplined as a result of EMIT tests, the margin of error is insignificant in light of institutional goals, according to the court. Therefore, Iowa need not implement all possible procedural safeguards against erroneous deprivations of liberty when utilizing results of scientific testing devices in disciplinary proceedings. (Iowa State Penitentiary)

U.S. Appeals Court
DRUG TEST

United States v. Williams, 787 F.2d 1182 (7th Cir. 1986). Assuming that the taking of a urine sample entails a search or seizure, a probation condition that required the probationer to submit to urinalysis at the direction of probation authorities was reasonable. Given the probationer's status as a repeat offender and his lengthy and substantial criminal record, authorities understandably did not view even his casual use of marijuana lightly. Even if the taking of a urine sample entails a search or seizure, imposition of condition of probation that the defendant undergo drug screening was permissible under the fourth amendment in view of prior urinalysis results. (Department of Corrections, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
STRIP SEARCH

Ward v. County of San Diego, 791 F.2d 1329 (9th Cir. 1986), cert. denied, 483 U.S. 1020. If no reasonable ground existed for a sheriff's blanket strip search policy, as applied to the plaintiff, the law in May of 1981 was sufficiently clear to subject the sheriff to liability for civil damages under Section 1983. The policy subjected the plaintiff and other minor offense arrestees to a strip search even before an own recognizance release determination was made. Prior to 1981, the court of appeals established that strip searches of arrestees for a minor offense are unconstitutional absent individualized suspicion that the arrestee is carrying or concealing contraband or is suffering from a communicable disease. (Los Colinas Womens Detention Facility, California)

U.S. Appeals Court
STRIP SEARCH
BODY CAVITY

Weber v. Dell, 804 F.2d 796 (2nd Cir. 1986), cert. denied, 483 U.S. 1020. The arrestee brought a civil rights action challenging the county jail policy authorizing strip-body cavity searches of arrestees, regardless of whether they were reasonably suspected of concealing contraband. The district court, 630 F.Supp. 255, granted summary judgment in favor of county and sheriff, and the arrestee appealed. The court of appeals held that: (1) the strip-body cavity search of an arrestee who had been arrested for misdemeanor offenses was unconstitutional, where jail authorities had no reasonable suspicion that the arrestee was concealing weapons or other contraband; (2) the county could be held liable for search because the highest ranking law enforcement official in the county, the sheriff, established the policy; and (3) the sheriff was not entitled to good faith immunity defense. The county was liable for damages caused by a policy providing for strip-body cavity searches of all arrestees, where sheriff, who was highest ranking law enforcement official in county, established such policy. The sheriff who promulgated unconstitutional jail policy authorizing strip-body cavity searches of arrestees, regardless of whether they were reasonably suspected of concealing contraband, was not entitled to good-faith immunity from Section 1983 claim brought by arrestee who was subjected to strip-body cavity search, considering that three circuit court decisions holding similar policies unconstitutional antedated the search in question, and thus law was clearly established at time of search. (Rochester Police Department, New York)

U.S. District Court
CELL SEARCH

Williams v. Kyler, 680 F.Supp. 172 (M.D. Pa. 1986). Due to the self-contradictory nature of its language, a Pennsylvania regulation governing the presence of inmates during cell searches was found not to create a substantive right. While the regulation contained an explicit disclaimer to the effect that it "[did] not create any rights in any person, " it also stated that an inmate "[had] a right to be present during an investigative search" and that inmates should be notified of their option to remain during searches. In the absence of a clear expression of intent to create a substantive right, the ambiguity was resolved against the creation of such a right. Prisoners do not possess any privacy right in their cells under the Fourth Amendment. (Pennsylvania State Prison)

1987

U.S. Appeals Court
STRIP SEARCH

Abshire v. Walls, 830 F.2d 1277 (4th Cir. 1987). $7,000 Award upheld in strip search case. A jury award of $7,000 in damages against three police officers who strip searched an arrestee without proper cause was upheld by a federal appeals court. Following his arrest by police in Baltimore, Maryland, for disorderly conduct, Thomas Abshire as taken to a police station and handcuffed to a railing. At trial, Abshire testified that he made numerous requests to use the telephone, all of which were denied. After Abshire became indignant, it was suggested by one of the officers that he be strip searched. Abshire was then unhandcuffed and escorted to a utility room, where he was forced to disrobe and subject himself to a strip search. Baltimore County strip search policy provides that arrestees should not be subjected to a strip search unless specific factors are present. Considering this testimony, the court of appeals found that there was a question as to the reasonableness of the search and the jury's resolution of that question was not clearly erroneous. Therefore, the award of $2,000 in compensatory damages and $5,000 in punitive damages against the three officers was upheld. However, the award of $4,000 in attorney's fees was found to be too small and the court of appeals ordered the district court to recalculate this award. (Towson Precinct #6 of the Baltimore County Police Department, Maryland)

U.S. District Court
USE OF FORCE
BODY CAVITY
SEARCH

Bruscino v. Carlson, 654 F.Supp. 609 (S.D. Ill. 1987). Action was brought by federal inmates complaining of use of excessive force, performance of rectal searches, amount of time they had to spend in their cell, transfer procedures and various other conditions that had existed at prison since "lockdown" began. On objections to magistrate's report and recommendation, the district court held that: (1) restraining control unit inmates during legal visits did not violate their right of access to the courts; (2) rectal searches at the prison did not constitute unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain within the meaning of the eighth amendment; (3) restraining federal inmates to beds for prolonged periods without checking them every thirty minutes violated federal regulations but because incidents were isolated, there was no policy or practice of abuse and thus no constitutional violation requiring injunctive relief; (4) "out of cell time" granted federal prisoners for exercise and recreation did not violate the eighth amendment where the inmates in disciplinary segregation and protective custody were allowed five hours exercise per week outside their cells, and the prisoners in control unit were permitted seven hours exercise per week, and general population inmates received eleven hours of exercise per week; and (5) inmates had no right to a due process hearing before placement at and/or transfer to a maximum security federal prison. Although control unit inmates at the prison were given a hearing before placement in that unit, there were distinct differences between conditions of confinement for general population and control unit. (Marion Penitentiary, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCH

Davis v. City of Camden, 657 F.Supp. 396 (D.N.J. 1987) A suit was filed against county officials by a woman who came to the police station to file a complaint against her neighbors was arrested and strip searched. Police officials found that the woman had several outstanding arrest warrants when they ran an identification check. She was arrested and sent to the Camden County Jail in New Jersey. At the jail a strip search was conducted by a female officer. The policy at the jail was to conduct a strip search on any person arrested who could not post bail. The court found that policy unconstitutional. The suit was filed against the sheriff and the matron who performed the search claiming the strip search was illegal. While the court did not hold the sheriff and matron liable, it did find the county liable because "We believe that a municipality should be held liable under Section 1983 when it officially adopts a policy that subsequently is declared unconstitutional, notwithstanding the fact that the policy was mandated by state law." The court reasoned that, for purposes of determining whether a particular strip search is justified, reasonable suspicion that a particular arrestee is concealing weapons or contraband can arise not only from specific circumstances relating to the arrestee or arrests, but also from the nature of the charged offense. (Camden County Jail, New Jersey)

U.S. Appeals Court
BODY CAVITY SEARCH
STRIP SEARCH

Hay v. Waldron, 834 F.2d 481 (5th Cir. 1987). Administrative segregation inmates were subjected to body cavity strip searches each time they entered or left their cell. The policy required the inmate to fully disrobe in his cell and to reveal for visual inspection the various parts of his person where a weapon or contraband might be concealed. An inmate who was held in administrative segregation challenged this policy, filing a federal civil rights lawsuit. The appeals court found that this policy was constitutional and reasonably related to legitimate security objectives. The court held that strip searches must merely be reasonably related to legitimate security interests, and therefore rejected the inmate's endorsement of a "least restrictive means" or probable cause" standard for the constitutionality of strip searches. However, the appeals court ruled that the magistrate's finding that the prison had not discriminatorily applied its strip-search policy against the inmate and his witnesses for bringing a civil rights action against prison officials was premature and ordered further hearing on this matter. (Texas Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
DAMAGE TO PROPERTY

Hikel v. King, 659 F.Supp. 337 (E.D.N.Y. 1987). A prisoner was taken to court to testify as a prosecution witness in a criminal trial, he took with him a document showing his conviction and sentence and another piece of paper with a summary of the testimony he planned to give. The inmate claimed that upon his return to the correctional facility he was searched and correctional officers then destroyed the two papers he had taken to court, as well as three photographs of his girlfriend. The federal district court did not find that the destruction of these documents could have impeded any suit that he could have brought. Therefore, the inmate's claim involved the deprivation of personal property rather than denial of access to the courts. As such, it was not actionable under federal civil rights law, since there was an adequate state remedy available. (Long Island Correctional Facility)

U.S. Appeals Court
STRIP SEARCH
DRUG/ALCOHOL TESTING

Ivey v. Wilson, 832 F.2d 950 (6th Cir. 1987). A federal appeals court found that alleged verbal abuse and harassment did not constitute punishment, let alone "cruel and unusual punishment," and that strip searches and testing for intoxicants were reasonable. The case was filed by an inmate who was charged with interfering with a correctional officer because he threatened to file a grievance when he was strip searched and subjected to a body cavity search. The inmate was also tested for alcohol and drug use because officers thought they smelled "home brew" on his breath. Since no evil motive, recklessness or callous disregard to the inmate's rights were shown, the appeals court reversed a punitive damage award from the lower court, but it upheld an award of $51 in damages against one defendant and $76 against three others. (Kentucky State Penitentiary)

U.S. District Court
BODY CAVITY SEARCH

Kennedy v. Los Angeles Police Dept., 667 F.Supp. 697 (D.C. Cal. 1987). The policy of the Los Angeles Police Department mandating a visual body cavity search for every pretrial detainee arrested on any felony charge is unconstitutional according to a federal district court. Some determination of reasonable suspicion is required for persons initially booked on felonies as well as those booked on misdemeanors. The classification by an offense alone is not sufficiently probative of the question of whether a particular arrestee is harboring contraband. The court ruled that body cavity searches of pretrial detainees cannot take place if they are arbitrary and purposeless. (Los Angeles Police Department)

State Appeals Court
URINE TEST
DRUG/ALCOHOL TESTING

Lahey v. Kelly, 524 N.Y.S.2d 30 (Ct. App. 1987). Following the determination that they had used illegal drugs, a number of inmates brought lawsuits to challenge the imposition of discipline. The New York Court of Appeals held that the results of an EMIT test, when confirmed with a second EMIT test or its equivalent, is sufficiently reliable to constitute substantial evidence to support a finding of a use of illegal drugs. While acknowledging that some courts had questioned the reliability of the test, it found these cases factually distinguishable since most involved a single unconfirmed test. It was also shown that a study of the New York State Department of Correctional Services' procedures for testing urine samples conducted by the American Association of Bioanalysts presented a 98.7 to 99.7 percent reliability for a confirmed test. (Attica Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
EMPLOYEE

McDonell v. Hunter, 809 F.2d 1320 (8th Cir. 1987). A class action suit was brought by departmental employees under 42 U.S.C. Section 1983 regarding the legality of guard searches for contraband conducted by Iowa Department of Corrections prison officials. The district court's order was modified in part and affirmed with specific standards for various kinds of searches set forth by the appeals court. The department claimed that the searches are necessary to control and provide institutional security by monitoring the existence of contraband it was stated that the employees' forth amendment right against unreasonable searches was balanced with the need for prison security. The appeals court set forth the following guidelines: (1) searches of employee vehicles parked within the institution's confines may be conducted without cause and randomly as long as the choice of vehicles that are searched is systematic and they are done with uniformity; (2) vehicles parked outside the confines can only be searched based on a reasonable suspicion unless it is shown that inmates have unsupervised access to them, in which case the vehicles can be searched without cause and at random; (3) employees who have regular contact with prisoners on a day to day basis in medium or maximum security prisons may be subject to urinalysis testing which is performed uniformly or by a systematic random selection (urinalysis testing outside the random procedure must be based on reasonable suspicion "based on specific objective facts and reasonable inferences drawn from those facts in light of experience that the employee has used a controlled substance within the twenty-four hour period prior to the required test."); (4) strip body cavity searches require the reasonable suspicion standard that demands individualized suspicion specifically directed to the person targeted for the search. Finally, the court found that employees cannot be forced to waive their constitutional rights as a condition of employment--"Advance consent of future unreasonable searches is not a reasonable condition of employment." The state may only use a consent form which is in conformity with the above criteria. (Iowa DOC)

Wash. Supreme Court
URINE TEST
DRUG/ALCOHOL TESTING

Petition of Johnston, 745 P.2d 864 (Wash. 1987). The Washington Supreme Court concluded that a single positive result to an "EMIT" urinalysis test, conducted to detect the presence of marijuana, was sufficient evidence of marijuana use to uphold, on due process grounds, a revocation of prisoners' good time credits or the imposition of mandatory segregation time. The Centers for Disease Control had determined that the test in question was 97-99 percent accurate. (Washington State DOC)

State Appeals Court
SHAKEDOWNS
CELL SEARCH
SEARCH OF PROPERTY

Rochon v. Maggio, 517 So.2d 213 (La. App. 1 Cir. 1987). An inmate alleged that prison officials violated his constitutional right of access to court when they opened an envelope the prisoner had in his possession during a shakedown search. The prisoner had attempted to walk out of his cell with the envelope after being told not to bring anything with him, contending that the letter was "legal mail." The court found that the inspection of the envelope, even though no contraband was found, was justified by suspicious actions of the prisoner. (Louisiana)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCH

Swart v. Scott County, Minn., 650 F.Supp. 888 (D. Minn. 1987). In a Section 1983 action challenging the constitutionality of the county sheriff's practice of strip searching detainees, both parties moved for attorney fees after the county had admitted that the search was unconstitutional, and the jury had returned a verdict stating that the detainee had sustained no damages. The district court held that: (1) the detainee was entitled to limited fee award, and (2) the county was not entitled to fee award. If the plaintiff's lawsuit was the catalyst that brought about voluntary compliance with applicable law by defendant, the plaintiff is prevailing party for purposes of award of attorney's fees, despite the fact that necessity of judicial relief has been mooted by defendant's voluntary compliance. (Scott County Jail, Minnesota)

U.S. District Court
BODY CAVITY SEARCH

Vaughn v. Ricketts, 663 F.Supp. 401 (D. Ariz. 1987). Prisoners brought action against prison officials to challenge legality of digital, rectal cavity searches. A federal district court held that: (1) prison officials needed reasonable grounds to conduct digital, body cavity searches of prisoners, and (2) the law governing cavity searches was clearly established when searches were conducted, and thus, officials did not enjoy qualified immunity from liability. According to the court, rectal cavity searches of prisoners must be reasonably conducted in order to withstand fourth amendment scrutiny. Prison officials had duty to conduct digital, rectal cavity searches of prisoners in a manner that was not brutal, offensive to human dignity, or shocking to conscience and had duty not to violate due process. (State Prison, Florence, Arizona)

1988

U.S. District Court
DRUG TESTING

Adkins v. Martin, 699 F. Supp. 1510 (W.D. Okl. 1988). An inmate filed a petition for a writ of habeas corpus, challenging the institutional urinalysis testing program that detected his alleged use of contraband drugs. The federal district court dismissed the writ of habeas corpus, ruling that the use of enzyme immunoassay testing of urine samples, in conjunction with other methods, was sufficiently reliable so that use of the test results as evidence in a prison disciplinary proceeding did not violate due process. The court also ruled that the fact that the incident report form arising out of the inmate's positive drug test indicated that the urine sample had been taken in the unit to which the inmate had been assigned, when in fact the specimen had been taken in the compound lieutenant's office, was a minor error and did not show errors or possibility of errors in the collection and safeguarding of the specimen. (Federal Correctional Institution, El Reno, Oklahoma)

U.S. District Court
URINE TEST
EMPLOYEE DRUG/ALCOHOL TESTING

American Federation of Gov. Emp. Council 33 v. Meese, 688 F.Supp. 547 (N.D.Cal. 1988). Prison employees' unions brought action against the Federal Bureau of Prisons, challenging the proposed program of mandatory drug testing. The district court issued a preliminary injunction. The program would have required all employees of the Federal Bureau of Prisons to have a urine test on two hours notice, even if there was no reasonable suspicion of drug use, wrongdoing, or negligence. According to the court, such a program would violate the Fourth Amendment. Arguments by prison officials that safety or security concerns justified the adoption of a lower standard than "reasonable suspicion" were not supported by the court, which found that Bureau of Prisons had presented no evidence indicating that drug-related safety problems exist or have existed--"The record contains not one instance of any safety problem resulting from employee drug use. Nor had the government shown any reason to anticipate that such problems are imminent." Although the Bureau cited thirteen instances in 1987 in which employees were involved in bringing drugs into institutions, the court ruled there was no evidence that those employees were drug users. Therefore, less intrusive procedures could be used to control such activities. The court also prohibited the use of drug screening for employees involved in on-the-job accidents or unsafe activities, without individual reasonable suspicion. (Pleasanton Federal Correctional Institution, California)

U.S. Appeals Court
BODY CAVITY SEARCH

Bruscino v. Carlson, 854 F.2d 162 (7th Cir. 1988), cert. denied, 109 S.Ct. 3193. In a class action suit brought against the Marion Penitentiary in Illinois by inmates held in the Control Unit, the inmates claimed use of excessive force and other charges because they were subjected to rectal searches every time they left or re-entered the unit. The appeals court ruled that because inmates in the Control Unit require greater supervision than other prisoners, rectal searches can be legally performed on such inmates. Use of physical restraints during attorney visitation and limited out-of-cell time was also upheld by the federal district court. The court found that extraordinary security measures employed in a maximum security federal prison, such as limitation of time spent outside cells, denial of opportunities for socialization, handcuffing, shackling, spread-eagling and rectal searches were reasonable measures in view of the history of violence at the prison and the incorrigible character of the inmates and thus it did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment. Further, the court found that the transfer of prisoners to a maximum security federal prison did not result in incremental deprivation so great as to constitute actionable deprivation of natural liberty and thus require a hearing. (The United States Penitentiary in Marion, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
BODY CAVITY SEARCH
EMPLOYEE

Kennedy v. Hardiman, 684 F.Supp. 540 (N.D. Ill. 1988). A county corrections official received a phone call from a man purporting to be an FBI agent informing him that a correctional officer would be transporting heroin into the facility on that date. When the officer arrived, a body cavity search was conducted by three investigators who found no heroin. The correctional officer sued corrections officials alleging violation of his fourth amendment rights. The federal district court held that there was nothing improper in the plaintiff naming several defendants in their official capacities, as this was an entirely appropriate way to allege municipal liability and there was no reason to limit the plaintiff to a single official capacity defendant. The court also denied summary judgment for the defendants, ruling that the jury must decide if the search was based on reasonable suspicion. Since the law regarding strip searches was clearly established and an anonymous tip would not provide "reasonable suspicion," prison officials were not be entitled to qualified immunity for the strip search. (Cook County Dept. of Corrections, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
BODY CAVITY SEARCH

Morgan v. Ward, 699 F.Supp. 1025 (N.D.N.Y. 1988). Individual inmates filed Section 1983 actions against various guards and prison officials for alleged deprivation of civil rights. The district court found that prison adjustment committee hearings, in which an inmate could have his disciplinary segregation period extended for up to unlimited successive 14-day periods, violated procedural due process. The committee did not give at least a 24-hour written notice of infractions to the inmate, did not provide written findings, and the inmates believed they could not call witnesses in the hearing. Also, while the placement of inmates' names over their cells in the disciplinary segregation unit may have made the inmates feel as if they were being treated like animals in a zoo, the inmates' incredible testimony concerning the guards' alleged writing of animal names on name tags and requiring the inmates to bark like a dog before showers were insufficient to support the inmates' cruel and unusual punishment claim. (Clinton Correctional Facility, Dannemora, New York)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCH
BODY CAVITY SEARCH

O'Brien v. Borough of Woodbury Heights, 679 F.Supp 429 (D. N.J. 1988). According to a federal district court, a municipality was liable under section 1983 for causing arrestees to be subjected to unconstitutional strip/body cavity searches at the county jail, where it had a policy of bringing arrestees to the county jail and was aware of the county jail's policy of conducting strip/body cavity searches on all arrestees. Two arrestees filed claims against the Borough, County, and other law enforcement officials alleging that they were unlawfully detained and strip/body cavity searches were performed on them even though there was no suspicion that either arrestee was concealing contraband. The federal court held that the county jail's rule of performing routine strip/body cavity searches on anyone arrested, regardless of the offense, was unconstitutional. The court also denied a qualified immunity claim by officers, stating that the law against such searches was clearly established at the time of arrest. (Gloucester County Jail, New Jersey)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCH

Polk v. Montgomery County, MD, 689 F.Supp. 556 (D. Md. 1988). A detainee brought a civil rights action against a county and matron for having been subjected to an unlawful visual strip search, seeking $2.7 million in damages. A jury awarded her $1. She appealed, seeking an additional $113,107 for attorney's fees, rejecting a $31,000 settlement offer by the county. Because the plaintiff had refused to join a class action suit, Smith v. Montgomery County, 643 F.Supp. 435 (D. Md. 1986) the court concluded that she was in search of a greater monetary award, ruling that such an award would be unjustified because of the nominal recovery and the opportunity which the plaintiff had to join a successful class action on identical issues. The court awarded her $4,651.86 in attorneys' fees. (Montgomery County Detention Center, Maryland)

U.S. District Court
DRUG/ALCOHOL TESTING
EMPLOYEE

Poole v. Stephens, 688 F.Supp. 149 (D. N.J. 1988). A federal district held that a state corrections officer training academy did not violate the constitutional rights of corrections officer recruits by requiring mandatory random drug testing. The recruits, the court said, were aware of the peculiar circumstances and demands of the occupation for which they were training and thus had reduced legitimate expectations of privacy. The court also found no violation of equal protection because the department of corrections required random drug testing of recruits but only tested corrections officers upon reasonable individualized suspicion. (New Jersey Department of Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
BODY CAVITY
STRIP SEARCH

Rickman v. Avaniti, 854 F.2d 327 (9th Cir. 1988). A prisoner brought a Section 1983 action against prison officials challenging the prison's visual strip search policy. The U.S. District Court granted summary judgment to the prison officials, and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court, affirming the lower court decision, found that the prison policy requiring prisoners in the administrative segregation unit to submit to visual strip and body cavity searches when leaving their cells was constitutional, and given the unit's security demands, the prisoner's cell was a reasonable place for conducting such searches. The court found limited intrusiveness based on the fact that the searches are visual and involve no touching. The court rejected the claim of an inmate that he had been deprived of his right to exercise time, sunlight, visits, free exercise of religion, medical treatment and access to the law library because he has refused to submit to body searches upon leaving his cell. (Arizona State Prison)

1989

U.S. Appeals Court
BLOOD TESTS

Dunn v. White, 880 F.2d 1188 (10th Cir. 1989), cert. denied, 110 S.Ct. 871. A prisoner filed a Section 1983 action against prison officials, alleging that officials assaulted him and threatened to place him in disciplinary segregation when he refused to submit to a blood test for AIDS (Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome). The U.S. District Court dismissed the complaint, and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court found that the nonconsensual AIDS test did not violate the prisoner's first amendment or fourth amendment rights. The prison had a substantial interest in pursuing a program to treat those infected with the disease and in taking steps to prevent further transmission, and that interest outweighed the prisoner's limited expectation of privacy. In addition, the court also stated that the prisoner was not entitled to a due process hearing before being threatened with disciplinary segregation because of his refusal to submit to the test. (Conner Correctional Center, Oklahoma)

U.S. Appeals Court
CELL SEARCH

Free v. U.S., 879 F.2d 1535 (7th Cir. 1989). A federal prisoner brought a federal tort claims action alleging that during a shakedown of his cell, prison guards either negligently or intentionally destroyed various items of personal hygiene, including toothpaste and baby powder, plus a tennis shoe. The parties consented to have the suit tried by a magistrate, who held a bench trial in the penitentiary and at its conclusion entered a judgment for the United States. The prisoner then sought permission to appeal in forma pauperis. The U.S. District Court denied the petition, and appeal was taken. The appeals court found that the federal prisoner who threatened to bring a tort-claim suit every time his cell was searched, apparently trying both to deter prison guards from searching his cell and to obtain replacement for lost, damaged, or worn out items of personal property at the government's expense, was abusing the judicial process in a classic sense of using courts to pursue ends other than vindication of claims believed to be meritorious. Thus, he was not entitled to in forma pauperis status in appeal of the magistrate's decision in favor of the government. The request for leave to appeal in forma pauperis was denied, and the appeal was dismissed. The court ruled that abusers of the judicial process are not entitled to sue and appeal without paying normal filing fees--indeed, they are not entitled to sue and appeal, and they are not merely not to be subsidized; they are to be sanctioned. (Federal Penitentiary, Marion, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
BODY-CAVITY
SEARCH

Kennedy v. Los Angeles Police Dept., 887 F.2d 920 (9th Cir. 1989). An arrestee brought a civil rights action against the police department and two of its officers. The U.S. District Court entered a judgment in favor of the arrestee, and the defendants appealed. The appeals court found that the police officers were not entitled to qualified immunity from the arrestee's civil rights suit where they lacked probable cause to arrest her for grand theft. The arresting of the plaintiff for grand theft without probable case constituted a reckless disregard for her right not to be arrested without probable cause and therefore justified the jury's award of punitive damages against the arresting officers. The city's blanket policy subjecting all felony arrestees to a visual body-cavity search was unconstitutional. The decision affirmed a jury award of $25,000 in damages against the City in a lawsuit brought by a female arrested for grand theft who was required to expose her vaginal and anal cavities during a strip search at a city jail. The text of the city's policy required a "skin search" of all arrestees booked into detention facilities on any felony offense or for a misdemeanor offense related to the use of narcotics. It also stated that "when there is probable cause to believe that an arrestee is concealing contraband or weapons inside a body cavity, a visual body-cavity search shall be conducted." In practice, however, the policy was applied to require "perfunctory body-cavity searches of all felony arrestees." The court remarked that the "intrusiveness of a body-cavity search cannot be overstated." The court found that the fact that an arrestee had committed a felony indicated little about the likelihood of the arrestee concealing drugs, weapons, or other contraband, the basis for the policy. In this case, the woman's arrest involved an "ordinary squabble between two roommates" and only became a felony because arresting officers making "an educated guess" decided that the missing items were valued in excess of $399. There was no reasonable suspicion that the woman was concealing contraband. Such reasonable suspicion may be based upon the nature of the offense, the arrestee's appearance and conduct, and the prior arrest record. A blanket policy of subjecting all felony arrestees to visual body cavity searches, the court held, did not meet constitutional scrutiny. (Van Nuys Jail, California)

U.S. District Court
URINE TEST
DRUG/ALCOHOL TESTING

Ramey v. Hawk, 730 F.Supp. 1366 (E.D.N.C. 1989). A prison inmate filed an action challenging as unconstitutional a disciplinary action wherein he was found to have failed to provide a urine sample, and petitioned for habeas corpus. On a motion for summary judgment, the district court, allowing the motion and granting the summary judgment, found that the urine testing program, on its face and as applied, did not constitute an unreasonable search and seizure, did not violate due process, and did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment. The Bureau of Prisons regulations providing for urine testing of prisoners to deter and detect drug use were reasonably related to legitimate penological interests and thus did not violate a prohibition against unreasonable searches and seizures, right to due process, or prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment. The policy allowed the inmate to drink eight ounces of water after being requested to produce a urine specimen, allowed two hours in which to produce the specimen, and gave an opportunity at the hearing to rebut the presumption of unwillingness arising from the failure to produce a specimen within two hours. (Federal Correctional Institution, Butner, North Carolina)

U.S. Appeals Court
BLOOD TEST
STRIP SEARCH
X-RAY

Thompson v. City of Los Angeles, 885 F.2d 1439 (9th Cir. 1989). An arrestee brought a civil rights action against the Board of Regents of the University of California whose police officer had arrested him for grand theft auto, and the county in whose jail the arrestee was detained. The U.S. District court dismissed the action as to the university regents and granted summary judgment for the county, and the arrestee appealed. The appeals court, affirming in part, reversing in part and remanding, found that the university was a state instrumentality for eleventh amendment purposes, so the board of regents was not a "person" subject to liability under the federal civil rights statute. Subjecting the grand theft auto arrestee at the county jail to a strip search, x-rays, and a blood test did not violate the arrestee's fourth or fourteenth amendment rights, for purposes of a civil rights action; but it would be presumed that the county maintained the "custom" of unconstitutional jail conditions in the form of a shortage of beds and could be held liable for the arrestee's injuries resulting from the alleged constitutional deprivation of failing to provide him with a bed or mattress for nights spent in the county jail, based on a prior court order regarding the same jail. (Los Angeles County Jail, California)

U.S. Appeals Court
DRUG TESTING
URINE TEST

Thompson v. Owens, 889 F.2d 500 (3rd Cir. 1989). A prisoner brought a civil class action alleging a deprivation of due process rights arising from the failure to prison officials to provide a complete chain of custody evidence regarding his urine sample at this misconduct hearing on drug violation charges. The U.S. District Court entered a judgment for the prison, and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that the prisoner's due process rights were not violated, as the urine test results, even with an incomplete chain of custody, constituted "some evidence" that the defendant had committed an offense and the due process clause did not require a higher standard of proof. The court noted, in rejecting the inmate's claim, that due process is satisfied in prison disciplinary proceedings as long as "some evidence" supports the decision of the hearing officer, citing Superintendent v. Hill, 472 U.S. 445, 105 S.Ct. 2768 (1985). Noting further that there was no allegation that the urine sample was tampered with, the court held that positive urinalysis results based on samples that officials claim to be the prisoner's constitute some evidence of his drug use. (State Correctional Institution, Rockview, Pennsylvania)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEARCH WARRANT
PROBATIONERS

U.S. v. Schoenrock, 868 F.2d 289 (8th Cir. 1989). Defendants appealed from an order of the U.S. District Court, revoking their probation and requiring them to resume serving prison sentences received for violating drug laws. The appeals court, affirming the decision of the lower court, found that the probation term that allowed the warrantless searches of the defendant's premises, vehicles and persons for the presence of alcoholic or controlled substances was reasonably related to rehabilitation and protection of the public and did not violate the Federal Probation Act. The term was designed to help prevent the defendants' future alcohol and substance abuse, and only one search was carried out after the defendant had aroused suspicions of probation officers. It was also found by the court that the probation officers' warrantless search of the defendants' residence for drugs and alcohol was not unreasonable under the fourth amendment. The term was imposed only after the district court carefully evaluated the defendant's particular needs and concluded that only a condition authorizing warrantless searches would suffice to ensure the compliance with other probation terms. Even if a probation term authorizing warrantless searches of the defendant's premises, vehicles and persons for drugs and alcohol was facially overbroad, the probation officers acted reasonably in applying terms and did not violate the Federal Probation Act. The probation officers did not search the residence until the defendant aroused their suspicions by diluting his urine sample, submitting positive samples, smuggling drugs into his work release center, failing to cooperate in his treatment programs, and visiting a liquor store. (Nebraska)

1990

U.S. Appeals Court
STRIP SEARCH

Colon v. Schneider, 899 F.2d 660 (7th Cir. 1990). An inmate brought a Section 1983 action, alleging that a corrections official violated his rights under the due process clause of the fourteenth amendment when the official used chemical mace to compel him to submit to a strip search during the course of the inmate's transfer from one area of a correctional institution to another. The U.S. District Court issued an injunction prohibiting the official from using mace solely to compel strip searches incident to the transfer of inmates within the institution, and the official appealed. The inmate cross-appealed, arguing that he was entitled to one dollar in compensatory damages and that the district court erred in vacating the jury's award of punitive damages. The appeals court found that Wisconsin regulations governing the use of mace in prisons do not create a federally-protected liberty interest on behalf of inmates, and even if such regulations did create a liberty interest, the inmate failed to satisfy his burden that he was maced in the absence of constitutionally required procedural safeguards. The appeals court also found that, under the eleventh amendment, the district court lacked jurisdiction to adjudicate the claim which was nothing more than an allegation that the prison official violated state law, or to enjoin the official from engaging in the allegedly violative conduct. According to the court, in order for state regulations to create a constitutionally and protected liberty interest, the regulations must employ language of an unmistakably mandatory character, requiring that certain procedures "shall," "will," or "must" be employed, and that the challenged action will not occur absent specific substantive predicates. (Columbia Correctional Institution, Wisconsin)

U.S. District Court
SAME-SEX SEARCH
STRIP SEARCH

DiLoreto v. Borough of Oaklyn, 744 F.Supp. 610 (D. N.J. 1990). A detainee who was subjected to a strip search brought a civil rights action against police officers. On cross motions for summary judgment, the district court found that a female officer's observation of the female detainee's urination, absent any particularized suspicion that the detainee might harm herself or be in possession of contraband, violated the detainee's civil rights. (Oaklyn Police Station, New Jersey)

U.S. District Court
BODY CAVITY
SEARCH

Geder v. Lane, 745 F.Supp. 538 (C.D. Ill. 1990). A prisoner sued prison officials, claiming a violation of his constitutional rights in connection with an involuntary visual body cavity search. The district court found that the inmate's Fourth Amendment rights were not violated when he was forced to submit to a visual search of his rectum by nonmedical personnel, for the presence of contraband, following his return from a court hearing. The court rejected his argument that the search had to be performed by "qualified medical personnel," since only a physical or intrusive body cavity search required such personnel, and the prison policy of conducting a visual search of the rectum of all prisoners who had been away from a secured area was not required to be modified so as to excuse examinations of prisoners who had been handcuffed and under escort the entire time. (Graham Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
BLOOD TESTS

Harris v. Thigpen, 727 F.Supp. 1564 (M.D. Ala. 1990), modified, 941 F.2d 1495. Inmates in the Alabama prison system, who were administratively segregated as Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome (AIDS) carriers, brought action against prison officials alleging that Alabama's testing of inmates for AIDS upon induction into, and before discharge from, the penal system violated the Constitution. The district court denied the relief requested and found that testing did not constitute an unreasonable search or seizure and did not violate the inmates' privacy rights.

According to the court, Alabama's testing of inmates for Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome (AIDS) upon induction into, and before discharge from, the state penal system did not constitute either an unreasonable search and seizure or a violation of the inmates' right to privacy. The regulations were reasonably related to prime considerations of penal confinement, safety and security, and there was no alternative method to protect the safety of other inmates and custodian officers and the security of the institution from the spread of disease.

The preponderance of evidence showed no violation of any rights of inmates who were AIDS carriers to medical or psychological or psychiatric care and no deliberate indifference to any serious medical or psychological need in the Alabama prison system. The prison system was not required to make available every drug or treatment that was being hailed as a possible cure for a disease considering the expense of the cure and the fact that Alabama was in a poor financial position to provide treatment.

Inmates, who were diagnosed as AIDS carriers, were not "otherwise qualified handicapped individuals" under the Rehabilitation Act and reasonable accommodations would not make inmates otherwise qualified since after reasonable accommodations, significant risk of transmission of the disease would still exist; therefore, conditions and practices to which seropositive prisoners were subjected did not constitute discrimination against them as handicapped individuals in violation of the Rehabilitation Act. On appeal the case was remanded for further consideration. (Alabama Prison)

U.S. District Court
BODY CAVITY SEARCH

Hill v. Koon, 732 F.Supp. 1076 (D.Nev. 1990), modified, 917 F.2d 589. Prisoners who had been subjected to digital anal body cavity searches brought a Section 1983 action against the associate warden of the prison, as well as other prison employees. The district court found that the first searches, which were conducted on both inmates, were done for valid penological reasons in a reasonable manner and were not unconstitutional. A subsequent search of one inmate was not done for legitimate penological reason or on a basis of reasonable cause, but the physician's assistants who conducted the searches were not liable, because the assistants acted pursuant to orders of the warden or his designee, and all circumstances known to assistants indicated it was appropriate for them to proceed with searches. There was a legitimate penological need for anal body cavity searches of inmates where smuggling of drugs into the prison was common. If a digital body cavity search of a prisoner is conducted in a reasonable manner, it will not constitute cruel and unusual punishment. Searches were conducted in a reasonable manner, in private, with appropriate hygiene, by trained physician's assistants in an infirmary at the prison, and during the conduct of searches there was no effort to humiliate or degrade the inmate being searched. The preponderance of evidence was that there was reasonable cause to believe that prison inmates had concealed drugs in their anal cavities after they had participated in regular inmate visitation; thus, the digital anal body cavity searches of inmates done in a reasonable manner were not unconstitutional.

The digital anal body cavity search of a prison inmate, who was believed to have received dilaudids, was not done for legitimate penological reason or on the basis of reasonable cause, and thus, the prisoner was entitled to recover from the associate warden $1,000 in general damages and $3,000 in punitive damages. There had been no previous search of his cell, and there was very little to indicate that the inmate was concealing drugs in his anal cavity on that day, though it was quite clear that he had received and had been using drugs. The physician's assistants who conducted the unconstitutional digital anal body cavity search on the prison inmate were not liable in the Section 1983 action by the inmate.

In an unpublished decision the appeals court affirmed in part and reversed in part the lower court decision. (Nevada State Prison)

U.S. District Court
DRUG TESTING

Holm v. Haines, 734 F.Supp. 366 (W.D.Wis. 1990). A prisoner sought leave to proceed in forma pauperis with respect to certain claims raised in his proposed complaint against various prison officials. The district court found that the court would give separate consideration to each claim raised in the pro se complaint, granting leave to proceed in forma pauperis only as to those claims for which there was an arguable basis in law or fact. The prisoner was entitled to proceed in forma pauperis with respect to his claim that it was improper for prison officials to find that the prisoner violated a prison rule prohibiting the use of marijuana based on findings of an Enzyme Multiple Immunoassay Technique test and the prisoner was not entitled to view a copy of the laboratory test results and that the tests were uncorroborated, and that lack of corroboration rendered tests so unreliable as to form an insufficient basis for the finding that the prisoner was guilty of a rule prohibiting the use of marijuana. (Waupun Correctional Institution, Waupun, Wisconsin)

U.S. District Court
OPPOSITE SEX
STRIP SEARCH

Merritt-Bey v. Salts, 747 F.Supp. 536 (E.D. Mo. 1990), affirmed, 938 F.2d 187. A black male inmate brought a Section 1983 action against correctional officers, alleging that a strip search violated his Fourth Amendment rights. On the defendants' motion for summary judgment, the U.S. District Court found that the inmate's Fourth Amendment rights were not violated when he was strip searched prior to being placed in administrative segregation after having committed two conduct violations, consisting of verbal assault of a correctional officer and carrying contraband, within a span of 15 minutes. According to the court, the search was reasonably related to prison objectives, including the prevention of introduction of weapons or other contraband into the institution. The presence of a female prison guard during the search did not present a constitutional violation; the fact that female correctional officers might be able to view strip searches of male prisoners did not render the search policy violative of the prisoners' privacy rights. There were legitimate penological interests in both "providing equal employment opportunities and the security interests in deploying available staff efficiently." Even assuming that the correctional officer stated, during the strip search of the inmate, "[s]o, it's not true what they say about all blacks anyway," there was no constitutional violation. The inmate alleged only a single, isolated remark, which on its face was not harassing, and does not comprise a constitutional violation. (Potosi Correctional Center, Missouri)

U.S. Appeals Court
X-RAY SEARCH

Nitcher v. Cline, 899 F.2d 1543 (8th Cir. 1990). An inmate brought in forma pauperis a civil rights complaint against prison officials arising out of the x-ray search of his abdomen. On remand from the court of appeals, the U.S. District Court adopted the magistrate's recommendation to dismiss the complaint as frivolous, and the inmate appealed. The appeals court found that the inmate stated a cognizable claim under the eighth and forth amendments sufficient to preclude the dismissal of the complaint as frivolous prior to service of process. A reasonable suspicion that the inmate is secreting contraband must support an involuntary x-ray search, and prison officials must also prove that less invasive means cannot detect contraband. The inmate alleged that the x-ray search of his abdomen was ordered without any medical reason, that officials failed to take his medical history, to get a doctor's order for x-ray, to have medical personnel perform or at least be present during x-ray, and that exposure to radiation could cause damage. The intentional, involuntary exposure of an inmate to a known risk of a significant health hazard can violate the eighth amendment. (Missouri State Penitentiary)

U.S. District Court
EMPLOYEE
STRIP SEARCH

Scoby v. Neal, 734 F.Supp. 837 (C.D.Ill. 1990). Employees at the department of corrections brought an action seeking declaratory judgment and injunctive relief from a prison rule allowing the strip search of employees. The district court, granting the motion for summary judgment, found that the strip search rule contained no probable cause or reasonable suspicion requirement and, thus, violated the fourth amendment. An administrative directive which authorized body searches upon probable cause did not contain similar limiting language for strip searches. The state's alteration of an unconstitutional strip search policy for prison employees did not correct the defect of the lack of probable cause requirement, and, thus, the eleventh amendment did not prohibit declaratory relief. (Danville Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
VISITOR SEARCH

Smith v. Maloney, 735 F.Supp. 39 (D.Mass. 1990). A visitor to an inmate at a state correctional institution brought a civil rights suit alleging that searches of her violated federal constitutional rights and Massachusetts law. The court ruled that a state regulation and prison visitor's liberty interests were violated by searching the visitor without her signature in a logbook consenting to the search. The state regulation provides that unless there is probable cause to search, a visitor to be searched more intrusively than a thorough pat down should be told that he may leave the institution rather than submit to a search, and that if the visitor agrees to the search, he shall record such consent by signing the logbook. (MCI- Cedar Junction, Massachusetts)

U.S. Appeals Court
OPPOSITE SEX

Timm v. Gunter, 917 F.2d 1093 (8th Cir. 1990), cert. denied, 111 S.Ct. 2807. Prisoners at an all-male Nebraska state penitentiary brought a class action alleging that allowing female guards to perform pat searches and see them nude or partially nude violated their right to privacy, and the female guards asserted equal employment claims. The U.S. District Court granted the prisoners partial relief, and the male prisoners and female guards appealed. The court of appeals found that allowing female guards to pat search male prisoners on the same basis as male guards was a reasonable regulation as applied at the Nebraska State Penitentiary, and so did not violate any privacy rights which the prisoners retained. The pat searches were performed in a professional manner that did not include instruction to deliberately search an inmates' genital and anal areas, the prisoners' privacy rights had to be balanced against legitimate equal employment rights of male and female guards and against internal security needs of the prison, and the administrators' decision that allowing pat searches on a sex-neutral basis was not an unreasonable regulation. (Nebraska State Penitentiary)

U.S. Appeals Court
URINE TEST

Tyler v. Barton, 901 F.2d 689 (8th Cir. 1990). A parolee brought an action against Nebraska correction facility officials claiming his constitutional rights suffered an invasion when, for drug testing purposes, the parole official and employees of a correctional center required the parolee to urinate in a bottle in the presence of a correction facility employee. The defendants moved for a summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds. The U.S. District Court denied the motion, and appeal was taken. The appeals court, reversing and remanding, found that a legitimate question existed as to whether the parolee possessed the right to be free from visual observation while furnishing a urine sample required as a condition of parole status, however, the correction facility officials did not violate any clearly established constitutional right in requiring the parolee to urinate in a bottle in the presence of a correction official and had qualified immunity from civil rights liability. (Omaha Correctional Center, Nebraska)

U.S. District Court
BODY CAVITY SEARCH
LAXATIVES

U.S. v. Oakley, 731 F.Supp. 1363 (S.D.Ind. 1990). A prisoner moved to suppress a controlled substance contained in balloons recovered by a digital rectal examination and by the administration of laxatives. The district court found that the physician's digital probe of the prisoner's rectum to remove balloons containing a controlled substance could be performed without a warrant and complied with the fourth amendment, even though the prisoner claimed that he suffered from internal hemorrhoids, and even though the search was performed on a bed in a dry cell. An x-ray indicated what appeared to be four or five balloons in the lower abdomen. The balloons had been in the prisoner's digestive tract for over three weeks and contained a lethal dosage of dilaudid; and the fecal impaction posed an additional health risk. The physician removed two balloons in the search. (U.S. Penitentiary, Terre Haute, Indiana)

U.S. Appeals Court
BLOOD TESTS

Walker v. Sumner, 917 F.2d 382 (9th Cir. 1990). A former state inmate brought a civil rights action against a state prison director and various prison officers and administrators, alleging that he was deprived of his constitutional rights when prison guards forced him to submit to a blood test, purportedly in connection with an Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome (AIDS) testing program, by threatening to shoot him with "taser" guns. The U.S. District Court, adopting a report and recommendation of the magistrate, granted a motion for summary judgment against the inmate, and the inmate appealed. The court of appeals, reversing and remanding, found that the prison officials' general protestations of concern for the welfare of state citizens and the prison community, without further explanation, were simply insufficient to render involuntary seizure of blood specimens, even from prison inmates, constitutionally reasonable, even assuming the mandatory AIDS testing was the purpose of the sampling. There was no showing that the testing was based on a legitimate penological objective or that the blood-testing policy was related to any such objective. (Nevada State Prison)

U.S. District Court
BODY CAVITY SEARCH

Wetmore v. Gardner, 735 F.Supp. 974 (E.D.Wash. 1990). A state prisoner brought a suit against prison officials, challenging the policy of subjecting all prisoners transferred to the intensive management unit to an involuntary digital rectal probe for possible contraband, without a showing of probable cause that the prisoners were carrying contraband. The prison authorities moved for judgment notwithstanding a jury verdict in favor of the prisoner. The district court denied the motion and found that the prison officials had a burden of establishing that their practice was reasonably related to a legitimate penological goal. The prisoner had met the initial burden of showing that the practice was a deprivation of rights reaching constitutional magnitude; and prison officials were not entitled to qualified immunity. The state prison officials were not entitled to introduce into evidence a display board showing photographs of objects which were recovered from within the confines of the penitentiary and were allegedly capable of being secreted in a prisoner's anal cavity. The probative value of evidence was outweighed by prejudicial effect, as there was no proof that any of such items had ever been recovered from a rectal search. (Washington State Penitentiary)

1991

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCH

Allen v. Board of Com'rs of County of Wyandotte, 773 F.Supp. 1442 (D.Kan. 1991). An arrestee, charged with a misdemeanor traffic offense, sued the county sheriff's department, the county sheriff, a sergeant, and deputies alleging that the defendants battered and falsely imprisoned her and subjected her to a strip search in violation of the federal constitution. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The U.S. District Court found that the strip search of the arrestee was unreasonable under the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments absent any showing of necessity to confine the arrestee with other prisoners, but the five hour detention was not unreasonable under the Fourth Amendment. The deputy who conducted the strip search was not entitled to qualified immunity because the strip search of traffic offenders without some level of suspicion that they were harboring drugs, contraband or a weapon was pre se unreasonable at the time of the plaintiff's arrest. The state law claims for battery, negligence per se, false and negligent imprisonment, and negligent training and supervision and adoption of policies fell within exceptions to the Kansas Tort Claims Act. (Wyandotte County Sheriff's Department, Kansas)

U.S. Appeals Court
VISITOR SEARCH

Cochrane v. Quattrocchi, 949 F.2d 11 (1st Cir. 1991). A prison visitor, who was required to submit to a strip search before she was permitted to visit her inmate father, brought an action for damages asserting civil rights violations and state law claims for battery, intentional infliction of emotional distress, false imprisonment, and assault. The U.S. District Court directed verdicts against the prison visitor at the conclusion of her case and she appealed. The court of appeals found that whether the prison visitor was subjected to a strip search before being permitted to visit her inmate father in retaliation for the father's naming a deputy and correctional officer as suppliers of cocaine on which he overdosed, rather than based upon any individualized suspicion whatsoever, presented a question for the jury, considering the absence of any evidence that the prison visitor ever violated any prison visitation rule or ever supplied the father with drugs, and the deputy's indefinite testimony as to the reliability of his confidential informant. It was also found that the prison visitor did not give a legally cognizable consent to the strip search before being permitted to visit her inmate father when she signed a consent form after being confronted with the constitutionally intolerable choice of being denied prison visitation access indefinitely or waiving her constitutional right to be free from an unreasonable search. (Rhode Island Adult Corrections Institute)

U.S. Appeals Court
BODY CAVITY SEARCH

Cookish v. Powell, 945 F.2d 441 (1st Cir. 1991). An inmate sued prison officials pursuant to Section 1983 alleging that a visual body cavity search conducted in the presence of female correctional officers violated his Fourth Amendment rights. The U.S. District Court denied the prison officials' motion for summary judgment on the basis of a qualified immunity defense, and the prison officials appealed. The court of appeals found that the prison officials' reasonable, although mistaken, conclusion that an emergency existed, permitting the search within visual range of prison guards of the opposite sex, did not subject the prison officials to personal liability. In this case, an emergency obviously existed during a disturbance and riot, and the court found that the defendants could have reasonably concluded that an emergency still existed in the immediate aftermath of the riot at which time the search took place. As long as this conclusion was reasonable, even if it were mistaken, the defendants should not be held liable. (New Hampshire State Prison)

U.S. Appeals Court
BODY CAVITY SEARCH EVIDENCE
VISITOR SEARCH

Daugherty v. Campbell, 935 F.2d 780 (6th Cir. 1991), cert. denied, 112 S.Ct. 939. A prison visitor who was subjected to a visual body search before being permitted to visit her husband brought a civil rights action. The U.S. District Court denied the warden's motion for summary judgment, and the warden appealed. The court of appeals found that the warden was not entitled to qualified immunity; at the time of the incident, the search of prison visitors without at least reasonable suspicion that they carried contraband violated clearly established law. In this case, there was no probable cause or reasonable suspicion that the visitor possessed contraband. (Turney Center Correctional Facility, Tennessee)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCH

Draper v. Walsh, 790 F.Supp. 1553 (W.D. Okl. 1991). A pretrial detainee who was subjected to a visual strip search in a county jail filed suit against the county sheriff. On the sheriff's motion for summary judgment, the district court found that the county's policy of subjected detainees arrested for traffic violations or other minor offenses to a visual strip search at the discretion of a police officer was unconstitutional on its face, making qualified immunity an unavailable defense. (Cleveland County Detention Center, Oklahoma)

U.S. District Court
BLOOD TESTS

Henry v. Ryan, 775 F.Supp. 247 (N.D. Ill. 1991). A detainee who was compelled by a grand jury subpoena to produce blood and saliva samples, even though he was not a suspect in a murder investigation, brought a Section 1983 action against the provider of medical services to inmates at the county jail, the provider's employees, sheriff's office employees, and the prosecutors in the State Attorney's Office. The defendants moved for dismissal. The district court found that a genuine issue of material fact, precluding summary judgment on qualified immunity to the private provider of medical services, and to the provider's employees, existed as to whether actions taken by the provider and its employees were pursuant to policy dictated by contractual terms and/or applicable state law. It was also found that a grand jury subpoena for physical evidence must be based on individualized suspicion. The sheriff's office employees and prosecutors in the State Attorney's Office were entitled to qualified immunity as to monetary claims asserted under Section 1983 by the detainee as the unlawfulness of their actions could not have been apparent at the time. (DuPage County, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
EX POST FACTO

Jones v. Murray, 763 F.Supp. 842 (W.D. Va. 1991), modified, 962 F.2d 302. A prisoner filed suit challenging the constitutionality of Virginia legislation which directs the Virginia Department of Corrections to take and store the blood of a convicted felon for subsequent DNA analysis. Prison officials moved for summary judgment. The U.S. District Court granted the motion, finding that the legislation did not violate the plaintiffs Fourth Amendment right. The court found that, to the extent that the DNA analysis reveals identification characteristics, the plaintiffs indicated no legitimate expectation of privacy; the state has a significant interest in deterring and detecting recidivist acts by convicted felons, and the search in extracting blood was minimal. The court also found that the Virginia legislation requiring convicted felons to provide blood samples for DNA testing did not violate the ex post facto clause, even though the prisoners convicted prior to the statute's effective date were required to provide the state with a blood sample prior to release from prison; the legislature did not intend to punish convicted felons for their past crimes through legislation, blood tests were not conducted so as to inflict any punishment upon prisoners, and the blood test requirement was not a condition for parole eligibility. On appeal, the court modified the lower court ruling, finding that the legislation violated the ex post facto clause to the extent that it could be enforced to modify mandatory parole. (Virginia Department of Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
VISITOR SEARCH

Long v. Norris, 929 F.2d 1111 (6th Cir. 1991), cert. denied, 112 S.Ct. 187. Inmates and former inmates brought a Section 1983 action against prison officials, challenging a policy which authorized strip and body cavity searches of visitors, regardless of probable cause. The U.S. District Court denied the officials' motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity, and appeal was taken. The court of appeals found that state prison regulations granting inmates visitation rights, which could not be removed without good cause, gave rise to a clearly established due process right which was violated by prison officials' policy of subjecting prison visitors to strip and body cavity searches regardless of probable cause. According to the court, caselaw "clearly established the contours of the prison visitor's right to be free from a visual body cavity search in the absence of reasonable suspicion that he or she is carrying contraband." (Morgan County Regional Correctional Facility, Tennessee)

U.S. Appeals Court
VISITOR SEARCH

Marriott By and Through Marriott v. Smith, 931 F.2d 517 (8th Cir. 1991). A plaintiff brought suit under Section 1983 against a sheriff, county jailers, and the county and its commissioners, alleging that her Fourth Amendment rights were violated when she was searched at the jail after she visited an inmate. The court of appeals found that the prison visitor exception to the Fourth Amendment search warrant requirement did not apply to the search of a visitor who had already finished a visit to the jail and was no longer in a position to smuggle contraband into jail, and the defendants were not entitled to qualified immunity, since nothing in prior cases suggested that a jail visitor's Fourth Amendment right not to be searched without a warrant could be abridged after visit and after danger of smuggling had passed. (Morgan County Jail, Missouri)

U.S. District Court
EMPLOYEE

Profitt v. District of Columbia, 790 F.Supp. 304 (D. D.C. 1991). A jail guard brought a Section 1983 action against the District of Columbia, claiming damages arising out of a strip search and visual bodily cavity search performed by prison officials to determine whether she was smuggling drugs into the jail. The U.S. District Court found that the search was reasonable; an anonymous telephone call had provided officials with the guard's name, place of employment, shift she would work that night and a specific quantity of cocaine she would be transporting. In any event the officials performing the search had qualified immunity as it was not clearly established at the time of the searches that reasonable suspicion was necessary. The guard did not state a cause of action for common-law claims of intentional infliction of emotional distress, assault and battery, or false imprisonment. The legal authority which the jail officials had to conduct the search was a valid defense, and the searches were conducted reasonably and in accordance with applicable regulations and could not be characterized as wanton, outrageous in the extreme, or calculated to cause serious mental distress. (District of Columbia Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCH
USE OF FORCE

Sanders v. Heitzkey, 757 F.Supp. 981 (E.D. Wis. 1991). An inmate sued corrections officials for alleged violations of civil rights which occurred during a visual strip search of the inmate. The officers moved for summary judgment. The U.S. District Court found that the officers who did not participate in the strip search could not be personally liable for money damages for the alleged civil rights violations which occurred during the search. It also found the inmate's constitutional rights were not violated when he was required to submit to the visual strip search, pursuant to prison policy, when he was about to be confined in a segregation unit following a disciplinary hearing, or when the corrections officers used physical force to compel him to submit to the remainder of the strip search after he became abusive and disruptive. (Green Bay Correctional Institution, Wisconsin)

U.S. Appeals Court
CELL SEARCH

Scher v. Engelke, 943 F.2d 921 (8th Cir. 1991), cert. denied, 112 S.Ct. 1516. An inmate filed a civil rights action seeking damages for cruel and unusual punishment based on retaliatory searches of his cell. The U.S. District Court awarded the prisoner $1 nominal damages and a jury verdict awarded the inmate $1,000 punitive damages. The guard appealed. The court of appeals found the retaliatory search of the inmate's cell, ten times in nineteen days, and leaving the cell in disarray after three of those searches, could amount to cruel and unusual punishment under the Eighth Amendment, even if there was no physical abuse, injury or pain. The pattern of the searches showed "calculated harassment unrelated to prison needs," particularly since the defendant officer testified that he had no reason to believe that the inmate had contraband in his cell when he conducted the cell searches. The guard was not entitled to qualified immunity; although no court had previously held cell searches to amount to an Eighth Amendment violation, the unlawfulness of the retaliatory conduct was apparent. (Missouri Eastern Correctional Center)

U.S. District Court
BODY CAVITY SEARCH

Terrovona v. Brown, 783 F.Supp. 1281 (W.D. Wash. 1991). An inmate brought a Section 1983 action challenging the constitutionality of a digital rectal probe search. On the defendants' motion for summary judgment, the U.S. District Court found that the prison officials adequately demonstrated a valid, rational connection between the digital rectal probe search policy prior to placement in a unit housing for particularly violent offenders, and a legitimate governmental interest in the safety and order of the institution. The inmate failed to demonstrate that the search was unreasonable under the Fourth Amendment or a wanton infliction of pain violating the Eighth Amendment. (Washington Corrections Center, Shelton, Washington)

U.S. Appeals Court
EVIDENCE
LAXATIVES
SEARCH WARRANT

U.S. v. Oakley, 944 F.2d 384 (7th Cir. 1991), cert. denied, 112 S.Ct. 1508. An inmate was convicted of possession of contraband in a federal prison by the U.S. District Court, and he appealed. The court of appeals found that probable cause existed quite apart from balloons of dilaudid removed from the inmate's rectal tract in a challenged warrantless search, for the issuance of a search warrant authorizing prison authorities to administer a laxative to the inmate. It was based on a tip that the inmate would be receiving 100 dilaudid pills from his girlfriend during an upcoming visit, on the inmate's suspicious activity during the visit in repeatedly moving his hand from the girlfriend's pocket to his mouth, on the inmate's lack of bowel movements during the 26 days following the visit when he was confined in a dry cell, and on an x-ray indicating the presence of balloon-shaped objects in the defendant's rectal tract causing blockage of the colon. (Federal Penitentiary, Terre Haute, Indiana)

U.S. District Court
USE OF FORCE

Valdez v. Farmon, 766 F.Supp. 1529 (E.D. Cal. 1991). A prison inmate brought a civil rights action alleging that a prison official used unnecessary and wanton force in connection with an ordered strip search. On motions for, inter alia, summary judgment, the district court found that the inmate's allegations that prison officials used excessive force against her, allegedly using an electronic stun gun in connection with threatening the inmate to comply with a strip search, were properly analyzed under the Eighth Amendment, rather than the Fourth Amendment, as all of the allegations concerning compensable injury were directed at the means by which the search was undertaken, not the propriety of the search itself. Furthermore, the inmate's allegation that prison officials use of force against her would not be analyzed under the Fourteenth Amendment due process clause as unjustified deprivation of liberty, as such analysis would have been redundant where the case was analyzed under the Eighth Amendment. (Northern California Women's Facility, Stockton, California)

U.S. Appeals Court
BODY CAVITY SEARCHES
QUALIFIED IMMUNITY

Vaughan v. Ricketts, 950 F.2d 1464 (9th Cir. 1991). Prisoners brought a civil rights action against prison officials challenging rectal searches conducted at prison. The U.S. District Court denied the officials' motion for summary judgment on the issue of qualified immunity, and appeal was taken. The court of appeals affirmed. At trial, the district court entered judgment in favor of the officials, and the prisoners appealed. The court of appeals found that the determination on prior appeal that no reasonable prison officer could have believed that rectal searches of inmates were conducted in a reasonable manner did not preclude a finding of qualified immunity at trial, where the inmates did not necessarily prove all of their allegations underlying their Fourth Amendment claim.

The evidence in the civil rights action created a jury question as to whether rectal searches of prisoners by prison officials were supported by reasonable cause, in determining whether the officials were protected by qualified immunity, despite evidence that prisoners resided in a wing of the prison in which explosives had not been found, as the discovery of explosives in another wing of the prison led officials to believe that explosives were spreading throughout the cell block population and could be in any prisoner's possession. Evidence also created a jury question as to whether the searches were carried out in a reasonable manner, for purposes of determining whether officials were entitled to qualified immunity. In addition, the court found that the jury verdict finding that the search of the prisoners by prison officials violated the Fourth Amendment but that officials were entitled to qualified immunity was not inconsistent. If the jury concluded that prison officials thought they had sufficient cause to search, but that the officials were mistaken in that belief, it could find both a Fourth Amendment violation and qualified immunity. (Arizona State Prison)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEARCH OF PROPERTY

Welch v. Spangler, 939 F.2d 570 (8th Cir. 1991). An inmate brought an action against prison officials alleging that the search of his legal papers by prison officials violated a policy governing such searches established in a consent decree in prior litigation. The U.S. District Court ordered the officials to pay a $500 contempt fine to the court, $10 in nominal damages to the inmate, and reasonable attorneys' fees, and the officials appealed. The court of appeals, affirming the decision, found that the prison officials' search of the inmate's legal materials outside of his presence in violation of policy governing such searches established in a consent decree promulgated in prior litigation was supported by evidence, and the prison officials' violation of the consent decree warranted a finding of contempt. The search warranted a payment of a $500 contempt fine as the fine imposed reflected concerns over future compliance, and not imposing a fine would be an invitation to ignore dictates of the consent decree. It was also found that the district court could properly assess nominal damages of $10 against prison officials for the search whether or not there was proof of actual injury or damages; the award of the nominal damages to the inmate personalized a remedy for the violation of the consent decree and substantially ensured that the inmate's legal papers would not be illegally interfered with in the future. (Iowa State Penitentiary)

1992

U.S. Appeals Court
EVIDENCE
VISITOR SEARCH

Boren v. Deland, 958 F.2d 987 (10th Cir. 1992). The wife of an inmate sued state prison officials under Section 1983 after officials strip-searched her prior to a visit with her husband to determine whether she was wearing inappropriate clothing in violation of the visiting room policy. The district court found that the search was based upon reasonable suspicion and that the wife had consented, and the wife appealed. The court of appeals, affirming the decision, found that the wife had a legitimate expectation of privacy when she entered prison to visit her husband, and the search was supported by reasonable individualized suspicion and did not violate the Fourth Amendment. On several occasions, prison visitors complained that the wife wore white denim jeans with a hole in the crotch and that she and her husband engaged in inappropriate sexual conduct during visiting hours. One of the officers involved in ordering the search had also previously observed the wife wearing the offending clothing. The wearing of such clothing during a visit violated Utah State Prison regulations, and the search was supported by reasonable individualized suspicion as a result of numerous people observing the violation. (Utah State Prison)

U.S. District Court
OPPOSITE SEX

Canedy v. Boardman, 801 F.Supp. 254 (W.D. Wis. 1992), reversed, 16 F.3d 183. A male prison inmate brought a Section 1983 civil rights suit alleging that a female prison guard's participation in a strip search and daily observations of male inmates violated the inmate's Fourth Amendment right to personal privacy. The district court found that the female prison guard's observation of male inmates during a strip search and in various stages of undress did not violate the male inmates' right of personal privacy. The institution had a responsibility to maintain security and to accommodate the rights of female employees to equal employment opportunities. The appeals court reversed the decision and ruled that the inmate was entitled to a reasonable accomodation to prevent unnecessary observations of his naked body by female guards. (Columbia Corr. Institution, Portage, Wisconsin)

U.S. District Court
SAME-SEX SEARCH
STRIP SEARCH

Cottrell v. Kaysville City, Utah, 801 F.Supp. 572 (D. Utah 1992), reversed, 994 F.2d 730. A motorist brought a civil rights action against a city, police officer, and employees of a county jail for violations of her constitutional rights after she was strip searched in jail. The district court found that the strip search of the female motorist in the county jail by female jail personnel did not violate her Fourth Amendment rights and that it was reasonable for a police officer to believe that the strip search was appropriate to detect whether drugs were concealed on the motorist's body, where her actions suggested that she was probably under the influence of drugs or alcohol, her breath did not smell of alcohol, and no drugs were found in her vehicle. The appeals court reversed the lower court decision, finding that further proceedings were required to determine if the search was reasonable. (Davis County Jail, Utah)

U.S. Appeals Court
BODY CAVITY SEARCHES

Covino v. Patrissi, 967 F.2d 73 (2nd Cir. 1992). A prison inmate brought an action challenging the constitutionality of random visual body cavity searches. The U.S. District Court denied the motion for a preliminary injunction, and the inmate appealed. The court of appeals found that the visual body cavity searches were related to legitimate penological interests and the inmate did not show that reasonable alternatives that would be fully effective. (Northwest State Correctional Facility, Vermont)

U.S. Appeals Court
OPPOSITE SEX PAT SEARCH

Jordan v. Gardner, 953 F.2d 1137 (9th Cir. 1992), affirmed, 986 F.2d 1521. Female inmates brought a suit challenging the constitutionality of a prison regulation which permitted cross gender pat searches. The U.S. District Court enjoined prison officials from implementing the policy and the prison officials appealed. The appeals court, reversing the decision, found that the regulation did not violate inmates' freedom of religion. The fact that female inmates had no alternative means of observing religious objections to searches did not require invalidation of the regulation permitting cross gender pat searches under the First Amendment given that inmates were able to follow other tenets of their religion and that the inmates failed to show alternatives to the prison policy. The court found that the prison regulation which permitted cross gender searches was reasonable and did not violate the Fourth Amendment, given that searches were conducted for security purposes, were brief in duration and conducted on fully clothed inmates, were conducted in a professional manner, and given that requiring same sex searches would displace officers throughout the prison. The regulation was adopted to meet the prison's internal security needs after careful consideration, prison guards were carefully trained to conduct searches in the least threatening manner, and brief pat searches did not violate evolving standards of decency. (Washington Corrections Center for Women, Washington)

U.S. Appeals Court
OPPOSITE SEX

Letcher v. Turner, 968 F.2d 508 (5th Cir. 1992). An inmate brought a Section 1983 action alleging that the presence of female guards during a strip search invaded his constitutional right to privacy. The U.S. District Court dismissed the case, and the inmate appealed. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that the presence of female guards during a strip search of a male inmate following a food throwing incident that involved eighteen or nineteen inmates did not violate a constitutional right of privacy. (Winn Correctional Center, Louisiana)

U.S. District Court
OPPOSITE SEX PAT SEARCH

Martin v. Swift, 781 F.Supp. 1250 (E.D. Mich. 1992). A female civil rights plaintiff brought a Section 1983 action against a city, an officer, and a police chief arising out of an alleged unconstitutional pat-down search by a male police officer. On the defendants' motions for summary judgment, the district court found that the plaintiff failed to state an actionable Section 1983 claim against the city based on a policy of allowing male police officers to conduct pat-down searches of females accused of misdemeanors as the complaint cited only a single incident of unconstitutional activity, and, thus, did not allege that the pat-down search was conducted pursuant to "policy" of the city. In addition, the plaintiff failed to state an actionable Section 1983 claim against the city police chief based on the fact that, as chief, he had failed to properly supervise and train police personnel and, thus, was responsible for the male police officer who conducted the pat-down search of the plaintiff in an allegedly unconstitutional manner. There were no allegations of a history of abuse during pat-down searches by city police officers or a history of abuse by the officer who conducted the search. However, a material issue of fact as to whether the male police officer conducted the pat-down search of the female misdemeanor suspect in an unconstitutional manner precluded granting summary judgment to the officer. When law enforcement officers act in an objectively reasonable manner, they will be entitled to qualified immunity, and the issue before the court was whether a reasonable officer would have acted similarly to the defendant officer during the pat-down search. (Royal Oak Police Department, Michigan)

U.S. District Court
CELL SEARCH
STRIP SEARCH

Proudfoot v. Williams, 803 F.Supp. 1048 (E.D. Pa. 1992). A prisoner brought a civil rights action against state corrections officers who conducted a search of his prison cell and opened his legal mail. The district court found that the corrections officer who opened the prisoner's legal mail during the search of the prisoner's cell and appeared to scan a letter to the prisoner's attorney violated the prisoner's constitutional right of access to the courts. However, the officer was entitled to a defense of qualified immunity; the officer did not act unreasonably in violation of a clearly defined legal duty, especially where the envelopes were oversized and contained enclosures likely to contain contraband. The court also found that the officers did not violate the prisoner's civil rights in ordering a strip search. Although the prisoner's cell had been searched three times in eight days, the officers were unaware of the two previous searches that may have justified the prisoner's perception of the search as harassment. (State Correctional Institution, Graterford, Pennsylvania)

U.S. District Court
CELL SEARCH
DRUG TEST

Rodriguez v. Coughlin, 795 F.Supp. 609 (W.D.N.Y. 1992). A prison inmate brought a civil rights action against prison officials seeking damages with respect to urinalysis testing and a search of his cell. On the defendants' motion for summary judgment, the district court found that the prison officials were entitled to qualified immunity with respect to the complaint that the urinalysis testing procedures violated the prisoner's Fourth Amendment rights against unreasonable searches and seizures. The Fourth Amendment status of urinalysis testing was not "clearly established" in 1988, when the prisoner was tested. In addition, the prison officials were entitled to qualified immunity on the prisoner's claims that the urinalysis testing program violated due process rights in that prisoner selection was not random, the prisoner was given no advance notice, and recordkeeping was inaccurate. No liberty interest was implicated where the prisoner was not disciplined in any manner after the urine tests, which were negative. Furthermore, the urinalysis testing of the prisoner, conducted in accordance with established guidelines, did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment. The court also found that the search of the prisoner's cell for contraband did not violate the prisoner's right of access to the courts and to his attorney although the original complaint in the instant civil rights case was missing after the search, where the inmate received an extra copy of the missing document a "week or so" after it was lost, and thus did not show harm. (Orleans Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
EMPLOYEE

Scoby v. Neal, 981 F.2d 286 (7th Cir. 1992). Correctional officers brought an action seeking declaratory judgment and injunctive relief from a prison rule allowing strip searches of employees. The U.S. District Court granted summary judgment for the defendants as to damages on qualified immunity grounds, and later issued another order, purportedly granting injunctive and declaratory relief finding the strip search rule which contained no probable cause or reasonable suspicion requirement to be unconstitutional. The prison officials appealed and the plaintiffs cross-appealed. On remand, the district court found that injunctive relief had become moot and that the defendants were entitled to qualified immunity as to liability for damages, and the officers appealed. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that the supervisory officers of the corrections center were entitled to qualified immunity as to claims by correction officers that their Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment rights were violated when they were subjected to strip searches, conducted in an effort to suppress narcotics being smuggled into prison. There was no clearly established right for correctional officers to be free of warrantless body cavity searches as of March 1987, when the incidents occurred. (Danville Correctional Center, Danville, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
VISITOR SEARCH

Smith v. Matthews, 793 F.Supp. 998 (D.Kan. 1992). A prison inmate and his wife and daughter brought a Bivens action against a warden of a prison seeking declaratory judgment, injunctive relief, and damages for alleged constitutional violations. Upon the defendants' motion to dismiss, or in the alternative, for summary judgment, the district court found that the warden did not act arbitrarily and capriciously in permanently restricting the wife's visitation. The wife refused to complete the first search by prison officials and the fact that she later consented to a second or further search, and the fact that no contraband was found, did not negate the potential consequences of her first refusal. In addition, reliable and confidential information of a drug smuggling scheme that included an inmate and his wife provided probable cause to issue a warrant for a body search of the inmate's wife during her attempt to visit the inmate. (United States Penitentiary, Leavenworth, Kansas)

U.S. District Court
BODY CAVITY SEARCHES

Zunker v. Bertrand, 798 F.Supp. 1365 (E.D. Wis. 1992). An inmate brought a Section 1983 action against a prison warden alleging that a policy regarding pre- and post-visitation visual body cavity searches violated the inmate's Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment rights. The district court found that visual body cavity searches conducted after contact visits in prisons as a means of preventing inmates' possession of weapons and contraband, even absent probable cause, were reasonable. In addition, the language of the prison regulation under which a strip search "may only" be conducted in a clean and private place did not establish the prisoner's liberty interest in having visual body cavity searches conducted in complete privacy which could form the basis of a Section 1983 claim for violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. Even if the searches violated provisions of prison regulations, as they were not conducted in a private place, the violation would not give rise to a constitutionally protected liberty interest. (Green Bay Correctional Institution, Wisconsin)

1993

U.S. District Court
BODY CAVITY SEARCH

Canell v. Beyers, 840 F.Supp. 1378 (D.Or. 1993). A prison inmate brought a suit against prison officials and a county, challenging body cavity searches allegedly conducted in full view of clerical workers, other inmates, or other bystanders. On a defense motion to dismiss for summary judgment on grounds of qualified immunity, the district court found that the prison officials were not entitled to qualified immunity from civil rights liability even if such viewings by clerical workers, other inmates, and other bystanders were inadvertent. There was evidence that screening was not always in place. The county, which jointly operated the prison facility, which assisted in its design and construction, and which had considerable input in its procedures and duty to implement its policies, was a proper defendant. (Oregon Department of Corrections Intake Center)

U.S. Appeals Court
STRIP SEARCHES

Chapman v. Nichols, 989 F.2d 393 (10th Cir. 1993). Detainees brought a civil rights action against a sheriff to recover damages after they were subjected to strip searches at a jail following arrest. The U.S. District Court denied the sheriff's motion for summary judgment on grounds of qualified immunity, and the sheriff appealed. The appeals court, affirming and remanding, found that it was clearly established law in late 1991 and early 1992 when the arrests took place, that a blanket policy of strip searches for detainees was unconstitutional, so that the sheriff was not entitled to qualified immunity. (Creek County Jail, Sapulpa, Oklahoma)

U.S. District Court
BLOOD TESTS

Ewell v. Murray, 813 F.Supp. 1180 (W.D. Va. 1993). Inmates filed a Section 1983 action challenging the constitutionality of a Virginia prison regulation under which any inmate who refused to provide a blood sample for DNA analysis would not earn good-conduct allowance credits. The district court found that the due process clause did not create a liberty interest in earning a certain number of good-time credits. The Virginia prison regulation was not ex post facto law, even if the regulation made inmates' original sentences more burdensome, because reasonable prison regulations and punishment for infractions were not additional punishment as long as inmates' mandatory release dates were not postponed. (Buckingham Correctional Center and Brunswick Correctional Center, Virginia)

U.S. Appeals Court
BODY CAVITY SEARCH

Hemphill v. Kincheloe, 987 F.2d 589 (9th Cir. 1993). A state inmate brought an action against prison officials challenging a policy of subjecting all prisoners transferred to a secure area to an involuntary digital rectal probe for possible contraband without a showing of probable cause. The U.S. District Court denied the officials qualified immunity and denied their motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict, and the officials appealed. The appeals court, reversing the decision, found that state prison officials were entitled to qualified immunity from liability in the Section 1983 action based on their implementation of the policy. Reasonable officials could have believed that their conduct was lawful at the time given that such a policy was permissible and sanctioned by federal regulations, and officials testified that they had researched the legality of the searches before implementing the policy. (Washington State Penitentiary)

U.S. Appeals Court
BODY SEARCH
OPPOSITE SEX

Jordan v. Gardner, 986 F.2d 1521 (9th Cir. 1993). Female inmates brought an action challenging the constitutionality of prison regulations permitting cross-gender clothed body searches. After granting rehearing en banc, the court of appeals found that the prison policy requiring male guards to conduct random, nonemergency, suspicionless clothed body searches of female prisoners was cruel and unusual punishment that violated the Eighth Amendment. It was noted that the policy inflicted "pain" for Eighth Amendment purposes, where many female inmates had been sexually abused prior to their incarceration, so that unwanted intimate touching by men was likely to cause psychological trauma. In addition, the cross-gender clothed body searches were "unnecessary" for Eighth Amendment purposes, where prison security was not dependent upon such searches, and the searches did not ensure equal employment opportunities for male guards. The determination that the searches violated the inmates' Eighth Amendment rights warranted a permanent injunction that prohibited nonemergency, suspicionless clothed body searches by male guards. (Washington Corrections Center for Women)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCH

Kidd v. Gowen, 829 F.Supp. 16 (D.N.H. 1993). An action was brought against a county concerning the strip search of an intoxicated protective custody detainee. The district court found that the facility's policy of strip-searching intoxicated protective custody detainees violated the Fourth Amendment because it permitted such searches without any individualized suspicion that a particular detainee might be secreting weapons or other contraband. The county offered no evidence showing that such detainees were more likely to secrete weapons or other contraband or that the threat of self-harm by such detainees was greater. (Strafford County House of Correction, New Hampshire)

U.S. District Court
DRUG TEST
URINE TEST

Laird v. McBride, 858 F.Supp. 822 (N.D. Ind. 1993). An inmate filed a habeas corpus petition alleging a violation of due process in proceedings before the Conduct Adjustment Board. The district court found that the state Department of Correction's random urinalysis program on its face was constitutional, where the program established requisite procedures for selection of inmates to be tested, instructions for obtaining samples, and instructions on the chain of custody. The inmate had notice of the program and thus the program did not violate the due process clause. The defendant said he did not receive a notice of the program because the posted memorandum was torn down. However, the memorandum was posted in all inmate dorms, the inmate was previously tested under the program before the test at issue, and all inmates were aware of the prohibition against using or possessing drugs in a penal institution. The court also found that the error in not following the chain of custody procedures of the program was harmless and the chain of custody comported with due process requirements. (Westville Correction Center, Indiana)

U.S. District Court
CONTRABAND
LIVING AREAS

Lasley v. Godinez, 833 F.Supp. 714 (N.D.Ill. 1993). Inmates who were found guilty of possessing dangerous contraband in violation of a prison rule brought a pro se Section 1983 suit alleging that their due process rights were violated. On the defendants' motions to dismiss, the district court found that the administrative directive of the Illinois Department of Corrections (DOC) whose purpose was to establish a procedure to insure that a written report was completed whenever an inmate living area was searched did not create a protectible liberty interest for inmates to have their cells searched before the cells were assigned to them. The directive contained no substantive rules which would give rise to an entitlement. The discovery of contraband in the inmates' cells during the course of the searches was sufficient evidence to find them guilty of violating the prison rule. (Stateville Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
BODY SEARCH
STRIP SEARCH

Newkirk v. Sheers, 834 F.Supp. 772 (E.D. Pa. 1993). Pretrial detainees brought a suit against a local government and prison officials in their official and individual capacities alleging violation of their constitutional rights. On cross motions for summary judgment, the district court found that individual county employees did not enjoy qualified immunity from strip and body search claims. The law concerning the unconstitutionality of these searches without particularized reasonable suspicion was so clearly established by the time of the detainees' arrests that no reasonable officer could have believed that such conduct was constitutional. In addition, the county could be held liable based on its adoption of a policy permitting such strip searches. (Schuylkill County Prison, Pennsylvania)

U.S. District Court
BLOOD TEST

Ryncarz v. Eikenberry, 824 F.Supp. 1493 (E.D. Wash. 1993). A prisoner sued various prison officials based on alleged violation of his constitutional rights resulting from being required to submit to a blood draw pursuant to a Washington statute requiring that blood be drawn from any inmate convicted of a sex offense or a violent offense, for purposes of DNA identification analysis. The district court found that the Washington statute did not violate the Fourth Amendment in light of its minimal intrusion and the state's interest in identification. In addition, reasonable officers would have believed their conduct in drawing blood was reasonable under the Eighth Amendment and they were thus entitled to qualified immunity. It was also found that, absent a showing that the inmate directly told officials he considered the blood draw to be contrary to his religious practices, officials were entitled to qualified immunity with respect to the prisoner's First Amendment claim. (Washington State Penitentiary)

U.S. District Court
VISITOR SEARCH

U.S. v. Spriggs, 827 F.Supp. 372 (E.D. Va. 1993) affirmed 30 F.3d 132. A defendant charged with narcotics distribution while visiting a prison moved to suppress drugs seized during a strip search. The district court denied the motion, finding that the visitor to the prison was warned that all visitors will be searched and consented to the search. He could not withdraw his consent after the search had commenced, and thus, the drugs recovered during the search could be suppressed. The warrantless strip search of the prison visitor was found reasonable. After consenting to a pat down of his upper body and thorough inspection of his mouth, the visitor balked at a pat down of his groin area. The visitor attempted to withdraw his consent, and asserted a suspect religious objection to the search. (Occoquan Facility, Lorton Reformatory, Lorton, Virginia)

1994

U.S. Appeals Court
PERSONAL PROPERTY

Aldape v. Lambert, 34 F.3d 619 (8th Cir. 1994). A state penitentiary inmate brought an action against a warden and correctional officers, alleging a violation of the Eighth Amendment and contempt of court. The U.S. District Court entered a judgment against one officer on the Eighth Amendment claim, and against all defendants on the contempt claim. The defendants appealed. The appeals court, affirming in part and reversing in part, found that the state penitentiary warden was in civil contempt of a prior consent decree governing searches of inmate legal papers. The warden had ordered correctional officers to search the legal papers of the inmate, who was suspected of possessing a knife, outside of the inmate's presence without the inmate's consent while the inmate was secured in a locked area. The consent decree provided that an inmate's legal papers would be searched outside an inmate's presence without an inmate's consent only in exigent circumstances. In this instance, any exigency ceased when the officer seized the legal files and placed the inmate in restraints. As the correctional officers were acting under a direct order of the warden, they were not found to be in civil contempt of the consent order. The court also found that evidence supported a jury finding that a correctional officer violated the inmate's Eighth Amendment rights when he handcuffed the inmate from behind. The inmate was under a medical order that should have precluded correctional officers from handcuffing him from behind and the inmate testified that he informed the officers of his condition. The court found that the officer intentionally inflicted pain for a significant period of time. (Iowa State Penitentiary)

U.S. District Court
BODY CAVITY SEARCH
QUALIFIED IMMUNITY

Castillo v. Gardner, 854 F.Supp. 725 (E.D. Wash. 1994). An inmate brought an action against a prison official and the governor seeking damages resulting from a policy permitting digital rectal probe searches of inmates. On a motion for summary judgment by the defendants, the district court found that the policy of conducting digital rectal probes without probable cause was not reasonably related to a legitimate penological goal and was therefore unconstitutional. The prison official and the governor were immune from the suit because a holding in an earlier case in which approximately 100 other inmates asserted identical claims directed that the court find immunity. (Washington State Penitentiary)

U.S. Appeals Court
STRIP SEARCH
VISITOR SEARCH

Daugherty v. Campbell, 33 F.3d 554 (6th Cir. 1994). A prison visitor brought a civil rights action against a warden in connection with the warden's authorization of a strip search of the visitor. The U.S. District Court entered judgment for the warden and the visitor appealed. The appeals court, reversing and remanding, found that, as a matter of law, where no independent objective information existed, uncorroborated information upon which the warden relied was insufficient to warrant the strip search, notwithstanding the warden's contention that since some information regarding the visitor's alleged smuggling of drugs into prison came from a reliable officer, they required no corroboration. The officer had simply relayed an anonymous tip to the warden, and letters received by the warden personally were either anonymous or had a fictitious name and provided no reliability. The court found that a generalized suspicion of smuggling activity does not justify a strip search of a visitor. Reasonable suspicion requires individualized suspicion, specifically directed toward a person targeted for a strip search, and exists only if information contained in an anonymous tip is linked to other objective facts known by correctional authorities. (Turney Center, Tennessee)

U.S. Appeals Court
BODY CAVITY SEARCH

Del Raine v. Williford, 32 F.3d 1024 (7th Cir. 1994). A prison inmate brought a civil rights action against prison employees. The U.S. District Court dismissed the action and the inmate appealed. The appeals court found that a digital rectal search of the inmate did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment, even though alternative technology for rectal searches existed. The court noted that there was no evidence of calculated harassment unrelated to prison needs and that rectal searches in prison were necessary, and thus psychological harm was unavoidable. The court found that the search was not conducted in an unnecessarily brutal, painful, and humiliating manner. (United States Penitentiary, Marion, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
BODY CAVITY SEARCH

Elliott v. Lynn, 38 F.3d 188 (5th Cir. 1994). A prisoner who was subjected to a visual body cavity search in the general presence of other inmates, guards and nonsearching officers brought a Section 1983 action against the Secretary of the Louisiana Department of Corrections, alleging that the search violated his Fourth Amendment rights. The U.S. District Court entered summary judgment for the Secretary and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that although the privacy of the prisoner was compromised, the search was constitutionally reasonable. An emergency situation created by an increasing number of murders justified the immediate search of inmates. Because the crisis required immediate action and because of the large number of inmates, the Secretary of the Louisiana Department of Corrections was justified in conducting strip searches in the most time-efficient place and manner available. This meant the searches were conducted on a collective rather than individual basis. Although the Secretary's airplane pilot and news media personnel could have observed the search from a walkway that opened into the room where the searches were conducted, the record did not show that they demonstrated any interest in viewing the searches. (Louisiana State Penitentiary)

U.S. District Court
QUALIFIED IMMUNITY
STRIP SEARCH

Kelly v. Foti, 870 F.Supp. 126 (E.D.La. 1994). A sheriff was sued by a female arrestee for civil rights violations that allegedly occurred when the arrestee was strip-searched. Both parties moved for summary judgment. The district court found that the sheriff, who was sued by the arrestee for alleged civil rights violations that occurred when the arrestee was strip-searched following an arrest for a minor traffic infraction, was not entitled to qualified immunity where subjecting the arrestee to a strip-search was not objectively reasonable, despite the arrestee's lack of a picture identification that would have enabled police to check her criminal history. The arrestee's appearance and conduct at the time of the arrest and thereafter did not provide reasonable suspicion that the arrestee had possible contraband. (New Orleans Police Department, Louisiana)

U.S. Appeals Court
URINE TEST

Lucero v. Gunter, 17 F.3d 1347 (10th Cir. 1994). An inmate who was subjected to disciplinary sanctions for refusing to undergo urinalysis testing brought a civil rights action against prison officials. The U.S. District Court dismissed the inmate's pro se complaint, and he appealed. The appeals court, affirming in part, reversing in part and remanding, found that the inmate's allegation that prison officials' request that he submit to urinalysis was an unreasonable search under the Fourth Amendment was sufficient to state a civil rights claim. However, the urine samples used by prison officials for drug testing constituted nontestimonial evidence and did not implicate the inmate's Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination. The inmate's Sixth Amendment right to counsel was not implicated when he was asked by prison officials to submit to urinalysis. (Limon Correctional Facility, Colorado)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEARCH OF PROPERTY
"SHAKEDOWNS"

Mahers v. Hedgepeth, 32 F.3d 1273 (8th Cir. 1994). Inmates brought a civil rights action for damages against a warden seeking to hold him in contempt of a consent decree arising from a search for contraband. The U.S. District Court dismissed the civil rights claim, but held the warden in contempt for allowing staff to violate the decree, and the warden appealed. The appeals court, reversing the decision, found that the district court improperly held the warden in contempt for conduct not prescribed within the consent decree. Although the warden's staff disobeyed the Iowa State Penitentiary compliance policy in failing to have an authorizing official make an exigent circumstances determination before conducting a shakedown search of cells, the consent decree did not incorporate the compliance policy. The district court made no finding regarding exigent circumstances to justify the search of the inmates' legal papers outside their presence in violation of the consent decree. (Iowa State Penitentiary)

U.S. District Court
DRUG TEST
STRIP SEARCH

Scaife v. Wilson, 861 F.Supp. 1027 (D.Kan. 1994). An inmate filed a civil rights complaint against prison officials. The district court found that random urine testing in a prison drug surveillance program did not impermissibly impact upon constitutionally protected interest or constitute cruel and unusual punishment, even where the testing procedure employed a strip search and continuous observation of inmates. (El Dorado Correctional Facility, El Dorado, Kansas)

U.S. Appeals Court
VISITOR SEARCH
QUALIFIED IMMUNITY

Spear v. Sowders, 33 F.3d 576 (6th Cir. 1994). A prison visitor sued prison officials under Section 1983 alleging that a strip search and search of her car when she visited an inmate violated the Fourth Amendment. The U.S. District Court granted summary judgment to prison officials on the basis of qualified immunity and the prison visitor appealed. The appeals court, reversing and remanding, found that law was clearly established at the time of the search that prison officials needed reasonable suspicion to search prison visitors. The prison officials did not have reasonable suspicion to search the prison visitor based upon a confidential informant's tip that the inmate was receiving drugs "every time an unrelated female visited." Therefore, the officials did not have qualified immunity in the action. Furthermore, the prison officials' search of the visitor's car violated the Fourth Amendment, and the prison officials were not immune. (Northpoint Training Center, Kentucky)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCH
VISITOR SEARCH

Varrone v. Bilotti, 867 F.Supp. 1145 (E.D.N.Y. 1994). The son of a prison inmate brought a Section 1983 action against a prison official after he was required to submit to a strip search before he was allowed to visit his father. The district court found that the son had a diminished expectation of privacy as a prison visitor. However, the son did not waive his Fourth Amendment rights by signing a consent form or because of a posted sign warning that a search may be required. The court found that the search was not warranted by a confidential informant's tip and a generalized suspicion of drug smuggling. Material issues of fact precluding summary judgment existed as to whether the search of the son was reasonable. The prison official was not entitled to summary judgment on the grounds of qualified immunity. Although the official did not participate in making the decision to subject the prison inmate's son to a strip search, the official actually performed the search in question. (Arthur Kill Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEARCH OF PROPERTY

Wycoff v. Hedgepeth, 34 F.3d 614 (8th Cir. 1994). An inmate brought an action against prison officials alleging that the search of his legal papers outside his presence was in contempt of an earlier consent decree. The U.S. District Court declined to find civil contempt and appeal was taken. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that the discovery of bomb-making instructions in the inmate's cell was an exigent circumstance required under the previous consent decree for search of an inmate's legal papers outside the inmate's presence. Prison officials reasonably concluded that the inmate may have concealed contraband in the papers. The shortage of prison staff justified the one-day delay following the seizure of papers before the search was conducted. The investigators who usually conducted the searches were out of prison, 17 staff members were sick or on vacation, and the emergency response team was providing security for court in session in the prison. (Iowa State Penitentiary)

1995

U.S. District Court
BODY SEARCHES
OPPOSITE SEX

Carl v. Angelone, 883 F.Supp. 1433 (D.Nev. 1995). Male and female correctional officers sued the Director of the Nevada Department of Prisons alleging that he intentionally discriminated against them on the basis of their gender by transferring male officers out of, and female officers to, women's correctional facilities. The Director had conceded that he made the transfers because he wanted female correctional officers at women's correctional facilities and therefore transferred the male officers out because they were men and transferred the female officers in because they were women. The district court denied the Director's motion to dismiss, ruling that he could not base his claim of qualified immunity or a bona fide occupational qualification (BFOQ) defense. The court held that allowing the Director to use the BFOQ defense would in essence reverse the burden of proof, requiring the plaintiffs to demonstrate that the defendant could not have reasonably believed that the BFOQ applied. The court ruled that the Director was not entitled to rely on an incorrect statement of the Nevada Attorney General's Office in establishing his affirmative defenses of BFOQ. According to the court, to be entitled to a BFOQ defense a prison must demonstrate why it cannot reasonably rearrange job responsibilities within the prison in order to minimize the clash between the privacy interests of inmates and the safety of prison employees on one hand, and the nondiscrimination requirement of Title VII on the other. The court noted that there is no per se rule making it illegal for male correctional officers to conduct routine or random body searches of female prisoners. (Nevada Department of Prisons)

U.S. District Court
PAT SEARCH
SAME-SEX SEARCH

Ellis v. Meade, 887 F.Supp. 324 (D.Me. 1995). A pretrial detainee filed a § 1983 action against a jail officer and jail administrator seeking compensation for alleged mistreatment while confined at the jail. The district court entered judgment for the defendants, finding that the male officer's comments to the detainee, "How are you doing little boy," and "How's the little guy doing," did not constitute sexual harassment. The court also held that the officer's patting of the detainee on the buttocks did not constitute a "search" for Fourth Amendment purposes and did not violate the detainee's right to privacy, nor did it constitute "punishment" in violation of the detainee's due process rights. The court found that the officer's actions of patting the detainee were immune from liability on an assault and battery claim and that the officer's observation of the detainee while naked did not violate the detainee's Fourth Amendment privacy rights. The court noted that the officer's purpose in patting the inmate was not to punish, but to placate the detainee, which was rationally connected to the officer's stated purpose and was not excessive. The court commented that while the officer's actions were possibly mistaken and ill-advised, they were not so egregious that they exceeded as a matter of law the scope of any discretion the officer could have possessed. (Penobscot County Jail, Maine)

U.S. Appeals Court
DRUG TEST
EMPLOYEE

Garrison v. Department of Justice, 72 F.3d 1566 (Fed. Cir. 1995). An employee of the Federal Bureau of Prisons was removed from his job after refusing to provide a urine sample for a drug test. Bureau officials had learned about alleged recent drug use from the employee's brother during a routine background check. The brother had stated that he had seen the employee buy and use marijuana recently and gave specific information about the frequency and location of his drug use and purchase transactions. The district court reviewed the Bureau's decision to remove the employee and found that the Bureau had no reason to question the reliability of the information on which they based their decision to require the employee to submit to a drug test. The court found that the employee's removal, following warnings that his refusal could result in removal, was warranted. (Federal Bureau of Prisons, Kansas City)

U.S. Appeals Court
BLOOD TESTS

Gilbert v. Peters, 55 F.3d 237 (7th Cir. 1995). Several offenders who were convicted for sex offenses challenged an Illinois statute that was enacted after they had been convicted, requiring all incarcerated sex offenders to submit blood specimens to the Department of State Police prior to final discharge, parole or release. The district court dismissed the action with prejudice and the appeals court affirmed, finding that the statute did not violate the ex post facto clause. The court held that the ex post facto clause does not prohibit every alteration of a prisoner's confinement that may work to his disadvantage, but that only measures which are both retroactive and punitive fall within the purview of the clause. The court held that any sanctions that might result from an inmate's refusal to comply with the statute would be disciplinary measures and would not violate the ex post facto clause. (Dixon Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
BODY CAVITY SEARCH

Hayes v. Marriott, 70 F.3d 1144 (10th Cir. 1995). A male prison inmate brought a § 1983 action against officials alleging violation of his Fourth, Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment rights during a body cavity search. The inmate alleged that the search was conducted in view of several female prison officials and staff. The district court dismissed the case and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded the case for further proceedings, finding summary judgment was precluded by material issues of fact concerning the reasonableness of the search. The inmate alleged that he was unnecessarily subjected to the search in the presence of over 100 people, including female secretaries and case managers from other buildings. The court noted that the prison officials' explanation of the search was not sworn, did not include affidavits based on personal knowledge and did not explain which female staff members were allowed to view the search and what their functions were. (Arkansas Valley Correctional Facility, Colorado)

U.S. Appeals Court
STRIP SEARCH

Kraushaar v. Flanigan, 45 F.3d 1040 (7th Cir. 1995). An arrestee brought a civil rights action against arresting officers, a jailer, and a county official, claiming that he was improperly subjected to a strip search following his arrest for driving under the influence (DUI). The U.S. District Court entered judgment in favor of the defendants and the arrestee appealed. The appeals court found that the arresting officer's belief that the arrestee had put "something down his pants" when he was arrested for driving under the influence, based on the arrestee's furtive hand movements, established probable cause for the strip search of the arrestee at the police station. An Illinois strip search statute that required written authorization and a written report in connection with a strip search, did not create constitutionally protected liberty interest. A county jailer did not commit assault under Illinois law when he instructed the arrestee to remove his pants and lower his underwear for a visual inspection, where the jailer was justified in conducting a strip search based on the arresting officer's belief that the arrestee had hidden something in his pants. The arrestee's testimony that the arresting officer unbuttoned the arrestee's pants at the scene of the traffic arrest, causing them to fall around his thighs and exposing his underwear, created a fact issue as to whether the arrestee was subjected to an impermissible strip search, requiring remand in the arrestee's civil rights action against the arresting officers, despite the arresting officers' testimony that the officer had merely stuck his thumb inside the arrestee's waistband as part of a pat-down search. (Tazewell County Jail, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
BLOOD TESTS

Kruger v. Erickson, 875 F.Supp. 583 (D.Minn. 1995). A state inmate petitioned for a writ of habeas corpus challenging the constitutionality of his having to provide a blood sample for deoxyribonucleic acid (DNA) analysis. The district court found that prison officials' taking of a blood sample from the state inmate for purposes of criminal investigation was properly done and did not offend the due process clause. Prison officials took blood from the inmate for DNA analysis pursuant to a Minnesota statute, procedures employed by the prison health services unit were performed according to medically acceptable protocols developed by the Minnesota Bureau of Criminal Apprehension (BCA), and a trained laboratory technician drew the blood. In addition, the withdrawing of the state inmate's blood did not amount to unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain prohibited by the Eighth Amendment. The withdrawal of the blood for DNA database was a search and seizure, but it was reasonable. The statute authorizing the test served a legitimate governmental interest of assisting investigation and prosecution of sex crimes, and a trained technician took the blood according to Minnesota BCA policy. The court also found that taking the state inmate's blood pursuant to Minnesota statute, which was not penal in nature, did not violate the ex post facto clause. (Minnesota Correctional Facility, Stillwater, Minnesota)

U.S. Appeals Court
DRUG TEST
URINE TEST

Lucero v. Gunter, 52 F.3d 874 (10th Cir. 1995). Dismissal of an inmate's pro se Section 1983 civil rights suit, alleging that Department of Corrections officials violated his Fourth Amendment rights when they requested the inmate to submit to a urinalysis, was remanded. On remand the U.S. District Court denied the inmate's motion for appointment of counsel and granted the defendants' motion to dismiss. The inmate appealed. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that the selection of the inmate for a urinalysis request was random, so as not to violate the Fourth Amendment or give rise to the Section 1983 claim by the inmate. Tested inmates were chosen by computer-guided selection procedures and shift commanders ensured that the selected inmates completed the tests. There was no evidence that the official who selected the inmate for testing was aware of the inmate's identity. In addition, the fact that the inmate's urinalysis request was made during the evening did not indicate that the request was not truly random or made for harassment purposes. The request was made during evening hours because the day shift manager was unable to complete all the testing during the day shift. (Limon Correctional Facility, Colorado)

U.S. District Court
DRUG TEST

McDiffett v. Stotts, 902 F.Supp. 1419 (D.Kan. 1995). A prison inmate filed a § 1983 action against prison authorities and the district court granted summary judgment for the defendants. The court held that the inmate's allegations with regard to urinalysis testing did not state a cognizable claim under § 1983. The testing was not conducted only to harass him, and although the testing was not random it did not violate the Fourth Amendment because one test was ordered because the inmate was suspected of smoking marijuana in his cell, and the other was ordered based on suspicion that the inmate possessed marijuana. The court noted that the Kansas regulation that allowed targeting of certain prison inmates for drug screening is reasonably related to the legitimate penological interest of keeping drugs out of a prison. The court also held that the Kansas statute that allows drivers tested for being under the influence of drugs or alcohol to have a second test by a physician of their choice has no bearing on drug screening of prison inmates. (El Dorado Correctional Facility, Kansas)

U.S. Appeals Court
CELL SEARCH

Mitchell v. Dupnik, 75 F.3d 517 (9th Cir. 1995). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against law enforcement and corrections officials. The district court entered judgments in favor of the inmate and the appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, vacated in part and remanded. The court found that a jail regulation on cell searches did not create a protected liberty interest in the inmate being present during a search of his legal papers and that inspection of legal papers is not a dramatic departure from conditions of confinement which might conceivable create a liberty interest. The court held that punitive damages should not have been awarded against a sheriff, jail corrections commander, and superintendent of discipline in their official capacity, as such an award was in reality an assessment of punitive damages against the county, which is immune from such damages. The district court had entered judgments awarding $1,550 in compensatory damages, and an additional $100,000 in punitive damages against the defendants in their official capacities. (Pima County Adult Detention Center, Arizona)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCH

Nowosad v. English, 903 F.Supp. 377 (E.D.N.Y. 1995). A plaintiff brought a § 1983 action against county officials and individuals involved with his arrest and prosecution. The district court found that the plaintiff stated an excessive force claim, where he alleged that during the course of his arrest he was pushed, his arm was painfully and roughly twisted, and he suffered such difficulties as a disabling knee injury, arm, shoulder, back and leg injuries causing pain. The court found that a strip search did not violate the Fourth Amendment, where the fact that the plaintiff was charged with menacing with a weapon provided an element of reasonable suspicion that another weapon was concealed. (Suffolk County Police Department, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
BLOOD TESTS

Rise v. State, 59 F.3d 1556 (9th Cir. 1995). Prisoners filed a § 1983 suit alleging that collection of blood samples for a DNA data bank violated their Fourth Amendment rights and was a prohibited ex post facto punishment. The district court dismissed the case the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the Oregon statute which required felons convicted of murder or specific sexual offenses to submit a blood sample for a DNA data bank was rationally related to the public's interest in preventing recidivism and in accurately identifying murderers and sex offenders. The court found that requiring a blood sample from felons, even if they were convicted before enactment of the statute, did not violate the ex post facto law because its purpose was not to punish convicted felons. The court also held that the felons' due process rights did not require a hearing before being required to submit a blood sample. The court noted that gathering genetic information for identification purposes from the blood of convicted murderers or sexual offenders does not constitute more than a minimal intrusion on their Fourth Amendment rights. (Oregon Department of Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
DOGS
STRIP SEARCH VEHICLE
VISITOR SEARCH

Romo v. Champion, 46 F.3d 1013 (10th Cir. 1995). Visitors to a prison brought a Section 1983 action alleging a violation of their constitutional rights by law enforcement officials in connection with stopping their vehicle at a roadblock, a canine sniff of their vehicle and their bodies, and a strip search of one of the visitors. The U.S. District Court granted summary judgment against the visitors and they appealed. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that the initial stop of the vehicle as it was attempting to enter the prison, in order to facilitate a drug-sensing dog's sweep of the car and its occupants, did not violate the Fourth Amendment. Public interest in keeping drugs out of prisons and maintaining prison security was substantial, the roadblock was reasonably tailored to achieve those objectives, and interference with the occupants' individual liberty was not significant. After the drug-sniffing dog alerted officers to one of the visitors, prison officials possessed at least reasonable suspicion that the visitor was concealing narcotics and ordering her to submit to a strip search before entering the prison was constitutional. (Dick Conner Correctional Center, Hominy, Oklahoma)

U.S. Appeals Court
STRIP SEARCH

Seltzer-Bey v. Delo, 66 F.3d 961 (8th Cir. 1995). A prison inmate filed a § 1983 action against prison officials. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants and the appeals court affirmed in part and reversed in part. The appeals court held that the inmate's claim that a corrections officer sexually assaulted him during daily strip searches stated a cause of action for violation of the Fourth Amendment prohibition against unreasonable searches and seizures. The inmate alleged that the officer made sexual comments about his penis and buttocks, rubbed his buttocks with a nightstick, and asked the inmate if it reminded him of something. (Potosi Correctional Center, Missouri)

U.S. District Court
DAMAGE TO PROPERTY

Smith v. O'Connor, 901 F.Supp. 644 (S.D.N.Y. 1995). A pro se inmate brought a civil rights action alleging that correctional officials destroyed his personal property, including his legal papers, during a search of his cell. The district court dismissed the case, finding that a directive that required correctional officials to refrain from destroying property did not create a property interest to which due process rights could be attached. The court also held that the inmate failed to show any prejudice resulting from the destruction of his legal papers and thus failed to state a claim that he was denied access to the courts. The court noted that state law provided a remedy for deprivation of property in its Court of Claims act, which permits an inmate to pursue a claim against the state. The inmate asserted that correctional officials stepped on his belongings and left his cell in disarray in violation of an agency directive, but the court held that failure to follow the state directive was not protected by federal law. (Sing Sing Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
VISITOR SEARCH AUTOMOBILE
BODY CAVITY SEARCH

Spear v. Sowders, 71 F.3d 626 (6th Cir. 1995). A prison visitor sued prison officials under § 1983 alleging that a strip search and a search of her car when she visited an inmate violated the Fourth Amendment. The district court granted summary judgment for the officials on the basis of qualified immunity. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part and remanded the case. The court found that information supplied by a confidential informant that an inmate "was receiving drugs every time a young unrelated female visitor visited" gave prison guards reasonable suspicion and justified a body cavity search of the visitor. The court noted that if prison officials had detained the visitor without probable cause and told her she would not be permitted to depart without submitting to a search, those circumstances would have violated her right to be free from being detained absent probable cause. Prison visitors can be subjected to some searches, such as a pat-down or metal detector sweep, merely as a condition of visitation absent any suspicion, and visitors seeking entry to a controlled environment acknowledge a lesser expectation of privacy. Prison officials may not search a visitor who objects without giving the visitor a chance to abort the visit and depart. A visitor does not consent to an invasive search simply by appearing at the prison for a visit even if he or she may consent to less invasive searches merely by entering the facility. However, the court found that fact questions existed about the exact scope of the search of the visitor's car or whether a sign was posted and visible notifying the visitor that her car would be searched, making summary judgment inappropriate with regard to that search. (Northpoint Training Center, Kentucky)

U.S. District Court
BODY CAVITY SEARCH
LAXATIVES
X-RAY

Cameron v. Hendricks, 942 F.Supp. 499 (D.Kan. 1996). An inmate who had been subjected to a rectal probe and who had been required to have a bowel movement in the presence of correctional officers and hospital staff brought a § 1983 action alleging violation of his right to be free from unreasonable searches and seizures. The district court granted summary judgment to the defendants. The court found that the officials did not violate the inmate's Fourth Amendment rights when they transported him to a local hospital and took X-rays, nor when they had a physician perform a rectal probe and give the inmate an enema when the x-ray revealed that the inmate had concealed a handcuff key in his rectum. (El Dorado Correctional Facility, Kansas)

U.S. Appeals Court
OPPOSITE SEX

Canedy v. Boardman, 91 F.3d 30 (7th Cir. 1996). A Muslim inmate filed a § 1983 action claiming that a female prison guard's participation in a strip search and daily observations of male inmates violated his right to privacy. The district court dismissed and the appeals court affirmed, finding that the defendants were entitled to qualified immunity against the inmate's First Amendment claims. The court noted that at the time of the events in question, it was not clear that a Muslim inmate's interest in observing religious nudity taboos outweighed a prison's interest in having guards observe prisoners at all times, and in providing equal employment opportunity to women. (Columbia Correctional Institution, Wisconsin)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCH

Dugas v. Jefferson County, 931 F.Supp. 1315 (E.D.Tex. 1996). A female arrestee brought a § 1983 action against a county and a sheriff's deputy claiming that a strip search ordered by the deputy following her arrest for a misdemeanor violated her Fourth Amendment rights. The district court denied the deputy's motion for summary judgment, finding that he was not entitled to a qualified immunity defense because it was clear at the time of the deputy's order that a strip search of a minor offense arrestee violated the Fourth Amendment. The court also found that the deputy was not shielded from civil liability for illegal acts simply because he was following orders. (Jefferson County Jail, Texas)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCH

Fernandez v. Rapone, 926 F.Supp. 255 (D.Mass. 1996). Inmates brought a civil rights action against prison officials alleging violation of their rights when they were subjected to strip searches following contact visits. The district court held that subjecting the inmates to searches in the presence of other prisoners in order to prevent the introduction of contraband was not unreasonable in violation of the Fourth Amendment nor did the searches violate substantive due process. The court noted that the searches were performed by male correctional officers out of view of visitors and other staff, and that the searches were reasonable in light of inmates' diminished expectation of privacy while confined. The court also found that alleged occasional degrading remarks made by prison officers during the searches did not violate substantive due process. (North Central Correctional Institution, Massachusetts)

U.S. District Court
PAT SEARCH
USE OF FORCE

Hill v. Blum, 916 F.Supp. 470 (E.D.Pa. 1996). A state inmate who was a Muslim brought a civil rights action against a prison guard who conducted a part-down search that allegedly included a brief (two seconds) touching of the inmate's genitals, which allegedly violated the inmate's moral, ethical and religious beliefs. The district court granted summary judgment for the guard, finding that the search did not violate the free exercise rights of the inmate nor the Fourth Amendment. The court also found that the search did not violate the inmate's due process rights and did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment. The court noted that pat-down searches were conducted routinely for security reasons and the guard's search was in accordance with prison regulations. The inmate also alleged that he was removed from his position in the prison kitchen as a result of retaliation for filing a grievance against the guard. The court found that the inmate was not subjected to retaliation, noting that the guard was not a member of the support team that decided to remove the inmate from his kitchen position. (State Correctional Facility, Frackville, Pennsylvania)

U.S. Appeals Court
STRIP SEARCH

Kelly v. Foti, 77 F.3d 819 (5th Cir. 1996). An arrestee filed a § 1983 action against police and jail officials asserting constitutional and tort claims. The district court denied the defendants' motion for summary judgment and they appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, dismissed in part, and remanded the case. The appeals court held that the conduct of the arrestee in making an illegal left turn and failing to present a driver's license did not create reasonable suspicion that she was hiding weapons or contraband so as to justify a strip search for the purposes of a police officer's claim of qualified immunity. The court found that the strip search was not objectively reasonable under the law at the time of the search, absent individualized suspicion. The court ruled that jail officials may strip search a person arrested for a minor offense and detained pending posting of bond only if they possess reasonable suspicion based on such factors as the nature of the offense, the arrestee's appearance and conduct, or a prior arrest record. The court noted that although the arrestee lacked photograph identification and failed to post bond within five hours, she readily identified herself, explained that she had left her driver's license in her hotel room, cooperated with police, and presented a purse full of other nonphoto identification. (City of New Orleans and Sheriff)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCHES

Richerson v. Lexington Fayette Urban County Government, 958 F.Supp. 299 (E.D.Ky. 1996). A pretrial detainee brought a civil rights action challenging a strip search that was conducted when he returned from a courtroom. The district court entered judgment for the defendants, finding that it was reasonable to have a policy of strip searching detainees, even those held for minor, nonviolent traffic offenses, upon their return from a courtroom to the general population of the detention center. According to the court, when pretrial detainees, including those charged with minor, nonviolent offenses, are kept in the detention center's general population prior to arraignment and are then put in a position where exposure to the general public presents a very real danger of contraband being passed, the policy of strip searching is justified and reasonable. (Fayette County Detention Center, Kentucky)

U.S. District Court
CELL SEARCH

Schenck v. Edwards, 921 F.Supp. 679 (E.D.Wash. 1996). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against state corrections officials in connection with discipline imposed for possession of another inmate's draft legal pleadings, and alleging that the search of his cell was illegal. The district court found that disciplining the inmate for mailing a draft legal pleading to another inmate did not violate the First Amendment. The court noted that a prison prohibition against inmates preparing legal documents for other inmates was reasonably related to the prison's interest in preventing inmate-to-inmate debt. The court also held that the search of his cell and inspection of legal documents outside his presence was constitutional and could not be the basis for a civil rights claim by the inmate. (Washington State Penitentiary)

U.S. Appeals Court
BLOOD TESTS

Schlicher v. (NFN) Peters, I and I, 103 F.3d 940 (10th Cir. 1996). Prison inmates challenged the constitutionality and execution of a Kansas statute that provided for collection of blood and saliva specimens from certain convicted felons for use by the State Bureau of Investigation. The district court denied the inmates declaratory and injunctive relief and the inmates appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the statute and its execution did not violate the Fourth Amendment prohibition against unreasonable search and seizure. (Kansas)

U.S. District Court
DNA

Shelton v. Gudmanson, 934 F.Supp. 1048 (W.D.Wis. 1996). An inmate convicted of first-degree sexual assault brought an action for monetary and injunctive relief under § 1983, challenging a state law that required him to provide a biological specimen to the state for inclusion in a deoxyribonucleic acid (DNA) data bank. The district court held that the DNA sampling to which the inmate was subjected was not an unreasonable search under the Fourth Amendment. The court found that even assuming that the nonconsensual swabbing of the inmate's cheek was a search, it was reasonable in light of the minimal nature of the intrusion, the inmate's limited privacy interest in his identifying information, and the public's considerable interest in preventing recidivism by sex offenders. (Oshkosh Correctional Institution, Wisconsin)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCH

Swain v. Spinney, 932 F.Supp. 25 (D.Mass. 1996) reversed in part 117 F.3d 1. A female arrestee brought a § 1983 action against a city and several of its police officials alleging that her rights were violated by a strip search conducted by a female officer. The court granted summary judgment for the defendants, finding that the search did not violate the arrestee's constitutional rights and that the defendants were entitled to qualified immunity. The court also found that the arrestee failed to show that the city was deliberately indifferent to the constitutional rights of its citizens. Before her arrest, an officer witnessed the arrestee try to discard concealed contraband (marijuana) and police legitimately discovered rolling papers in her pocketbook after her arrest. The strip search was conducted out of public view in front of only one person of the same sex, and the arrestee was never touched during the procedure. On appeal, qualified immunity was denied to the officials. (North Reading Police Station, Massachusetts)

U.S. Appeals Court
STRIP SEARCH
VISITOR SEARCH

Wood v. Clemons, 89 F.3d 922 (1st Cir. 1996). Prison visitors sued prison officials alleging that strip searches violated their Fourth Amendment rights. The district court entered summary judgment for the defendants on the basis of qualified immunity. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the superintendent acted reasonably, in light of information before him, that the visitors would be bringing drugs to the inmate, entitling him to qualified immunity. The court found that reasonable suspicion is the proper standard by which to gauge the constitutionality of prison-visitor strip searches. The court noted that reasonable suspicion is something stronger than a mere "hunch' but something weaker than probable cause and that reasonable suspicion can arise from something that is less reliable than that required to show probable cause. In this case, the superintendent had grown to trust an officer to provide him with reliable information and the superintendent also found a police detective, on whose report the officer's report was based, to be a reliable and trustworthy source of information. The superintendent had approved a strip search of a female inmate's teenaged children based on a tip which he erroneously believed to have been confirmed by two unconnected confidential informants. (Maine Correctional Center)

1997

U.S. District Court
OPPOSITE SEX
USE OF FORCE

Collins v. Scott, 961 F.Supp. 1009 (E.D.Tex. 1997). A male Muslim inmate sued prison officials alleging violation of the Religious Freedom Restoration Act (RFRA) and § 1983 arising from a strip search by a female officer. The district court dismissed the case, finding that ordering the inmate to submit to a strip search did not substantially burden his religious rights and was the least restrictive means of furthering a compelling government interest in maintaining security. The court found that prison officials did not use excessive force in conducting the strip search and that they were entitled to qualified immunity. The officials had shocked the inmate with an electronic capture shield and placed him in restraints when he refused to submit to a search. The court noted that the inmate was willing to be strip searched by a males in all cases, and by females in emergency or extraordinary circumstances, despite the teaching of the inmate's religion that he should not be naked in the presence of males or females. Prison officials usually accommodated the inmate's request to be strip searched by male staff. (Coffield Unit, Texas Department of Criminal Justice)

U.S. Appeals Court
STRIP SEARCH

Foote v. Spiegel, 118 F.3d 1416 (10th Cir. 1997). A motorist sued state highway patrol officers alleging she was illegally detained and subjected to a strip search. The district court denied the officers' motion for summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds and the officers and plaintiff appealed. The appeals court held that one of the troopers was not entitled to qualified immunity for the strip search because undisputed facts known to the trooper did not justify the strip search under clearly established law. The motorist had been arrested for driving under the influence and tested negative for alcohol on a breathalyzer. She was not placed in the general population of a detention facility, had no opportunity to hide anything beneath her clothing after her vehicle was stopped, and a thorough pat-down search of her lightweight summer clothing at the jail revealed no drugs. The county jail's policy of conducting strip searches of all persons arrested on drug charges had been held unconstitutional by a federal appeals court in 1993, but a jail officer testified that all persons arrested on drug charges were subjected to strip searches. (Davis County Jail, Utah)

U.S. District Court
URINE TEST

Harris v. Keane, 962 F.Supp. 397 (S.D.N.Y. 1997). A state prison inmate brought a § 1983 action against corrections officers and officials. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants, finding that the inmate's confinement in keeplock for a total of 23 days did not implicate a liberty interest for the purposes of a due process claim. The court also found that a corrections officer had probable cause to order a urinalysis test of the inmate where the officer had smelled marijuana from a gallery below him, and other corrections officers reported that the inmate was the only person on the gallery at that time. (Oneida Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCH
BODY CAVITY SEARCH
VISITOR SEARCH

Laughter v. Kay, 986 F.Supp. 1362 (D.Utah 1997). A pregnant prison visitor brought a § 1983 action against officers after she was subjected by the officers to manual body cavity searches along with her three-year-old son. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the plaintiff, finding that a manual body cavity search of a prison visitor must be justified by probable cause and the officers lacked probable cause. The court held that the prison-visitor exception to the prohibition against warrantless searches did not apply because the officers had no intention of allowing the visitor into the prison to visit, that no exigent circumstances existed, and that the visitor's consent to the searches did not validate them. The court denied qualified immunity to the officers. The court found that probable cause was not established by an affidavit relating information about one prisoner's alleged drug activities and the affiant's belief that the visitor would pass drugs to another prisoner, where the affidavit failed to connect the visitor or the prisoner she was visiting to the prisoner who had allegedly engaged in drug activity. The court also found that probable cause was not established by an uncorroborated note from a confidential prisoner-informant referring to a "thing" to be taken to the visitor's address, monitored telephone conversations in which prisoners made oblique references to the visitor, the discovery of syringes in the vehicle the visitor drove to the prison several days before the search, or an uncorroborated tip from one prison officer's mother. (Central Utah Correctional Facility)

U.S. District Court
CELL SEARCH
DAMAGE TO PROPERTY
LIVING AREAS

Robinson v. Ridge, 996 F.Supp. 447 (E.D.Pa. 1997). A prisoner sued state officials and employees alleging violation of his rights as the result of a random prison-wide security search. The district court held that the prisoner's right to free access to courts was not violated by the seizure of his legal materials, absent actual injury. The court also held that the seizure of the prisoner's religious materials in the course of a random security search, no matter how harmful the seizure might have been to the prisoner's religious practices, did not violate the Free Exercise Clause if it was reasonably related to the prison's legitimate penological interests. The prisoner's cell was searched as part of a prison-wide search during a declared state of emergency. During the search, the prisoner's personal property, including legal documents and articles of his Islamic faith, were thrown on the floor and swept into the trash. The prisoner asked for a receipt and was refused. He filed a grievance and was denied relief, but was subsequently offered $50, which he rejected. (SCI Graterford, Pennsylvania)

U.S. Appeals Court
OPPOSITE SEX

Somers v. Thurman, 109 F.3d 614 (9th Cir. 1997). A male inmate brought a civil rights against female guards and prison officials alleging that visual body cavity searches performed by the guards, and their watching while he was showering naked, violated his Fourth and Eighth Amendment rights. The district court denied the guards' motions for summary judgment and they appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded, finding that it was not clearly established in October 1993 that male inmates had a Fourth Amendment privacy interest which prohibited cross-gender searches. The court also held that the inmate failed to state a claim under the Eighth Amendment based on allegations that female guards pointed and joked while observing him showering or while conducting a body cavity search of him. According to the court, the inmate did not allege that the guards intended to humiliate him or that the searches occurred without any penological justification. The court noted that, while it does not approve, the exchange of verbal insults between inmates and guards is a constant, daily ritual observed in the nation's prisons. (Calif. State Prison-Los Angeles)

U.S. Appeals Court
STRIP SEARCH

Swain v. Spinney, 117 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 1997). A female arrestee brought a § 1983 action against police officials alleging that a female officer's strip search of her, under orders from a lieutenant, violated her federal and state rights. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants and the arrestee appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded, finding that issues of fact as to the basis for the search precluded summary judgment on the issues of reasonableness and qualified immunity. The appeals court affirmed the district court's finding that § 1983 liability was not established based on the city's alleged failure to properly train the police force as to its uniform policy on strip searches. According to the court, police officers were supplied with policy guidelines, and there was no evidence of any other incidents which would have put the city on notice that its approach was inadequate. The plaintiff was arrested for shoplifting and was suspected of having possessed a small baggie of marijuana. (North Reading Police Station, Massachusetts)

U.S. District Court
DRUG ISOLATION

Thomas v. Irvin, 981 F.Supp. 794 (W.D.N.Y. 1997). A prisoner brought a § 1983 action against prison officials alleging that their placement of him in drug watch isolation status for seven days violated the Eighth Amendment and his due process rights. The district court found that the state did not violate the inmate's due process rights, noting that the room in which he was confined was larger than an average cell at the prison and was equipped with all of the essential items necessary for proper rest and hygiene. The inmate was allowed to exercise and smoke cigarettes, and he received regular meals and daily medical attention. The officials had obtained credible information from a confidential informant that the inmate was in possession of narcotics after a visit. The prisoner had alleged that the isolation room had inadequate ventilation because two air vents in the room were covered as a security measure to prevent inmates from concealing contraband in the vents. (Wende Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
STRIP SEARCH
URINE TEST

Thompson v. Souza, 111 F.3d 694 (9th Cir. 1997). A prisoner sued prison officials for damages under § 1983 alleging that he was subjected to an improper strip search and urinalysis drug test. The officials moved for summary judgment and appealed when the district court denied their motion. The appeals court reversed and remanded with instructions, finding that the visual strip search of the prisoner's body cavities did not violate a clearly established Fourth Amendment right. The appeals court held that the search was not maliciously and sadistically conducted for the purpose of causing harm, and thus did not violate the prisoner's due process rights. The court also found that a nonrandom, compelled urinalysis test did not violate the prisoner's alleged privacy interests under the Fourth Amendment, especially considering that 16 of the 124 prisoners selected tested positive for drugs. The prisoner had complained that he was directed to run his fingers around his gums after manipulating his genitalia even though the prison guidelines suggested that genitalia inspection be the last step of a strip search. The prisoner also alleged that the search was conducted in view of other prisoners. The court found that the use of a bathroom as the location for the urinalysis test was not unreasonable, even though the floor was damp, the prisoner did not have shoes, and a prison official stood within eight inches of the prisoner's side continuously watching him urinate into a small plastic bottle. (California Men's Colony)

U.S. Appeals Court
PAROLEES

U.S. v. Cantley, 130 F.3d 1371 (10th Cir. 1997). A defendant who was a parolee appealed his conviction in federal court. The appeals court held that the prerequisites to a warrantless search of a parolee's residence pursuant to Oklahoma's probation and parole manual complied with the reasonableness requirement of the Fourth Amendment. The court noted that the prerequisites included reasonable grounds to believe that the parolee was keeping contraband on the property, that failure to search could result in an immediate threat to the public, employees and offenders, and that the search was not the result of a request for assistance from law enforcement officers who were unable to obtain a search warrant. (Oklahoma)

U.S. District Court
PAROLEES
SEARCH WARRANT

U.S. v. Carnes, 987 F.Supp. 551 (E.D.Mich. 1997). A parolee charged with possession of a firearm moved to suppress evidence. The district court held that officers had authority to conduct a warrantless search of the residence occupied by a parolee. According to the court, under Michigan law, warrantless administrative/regulatory searches in a parole or probation context need only be based on reasonable suspicion supported by articulable facts. The court found that the officer had reasonable grounds to believe that the parolee had violated his parole by residing at the residence, by failing to report to his parole officer, and by illegally entering his girlfriend's house and assaulting her. (Troy Police Department, Michigan)

U.S. Appeals Court
DRY CELL
CONTRABAND

U.S. v. Holloway, 128 F.3d 1254 (8th Cir. 1997). A defendant, an inmate in federal prison who was convicted of conspiracy to provide a controlled substance to an inmate in federal prison, appealed his conviction. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the inmate's incarceration in a dry cell was a proportionate response to the reasonable suspicion that the inmate was carrying contraband, and did not violate the Fourth Amendment. The dry cell incarceration involved placement in a cell with no running water until such time as the inmate defecated; balloons containing heroin were removed from his fecal matter. Prison officials had received information that the inmate intended to smuggle drugs into the prison. They observed a suspicious visit, noting activity consistent with a drug exchange, and took the inmate to a dry cell. (United States Penitentiary at Leavenworth, Kansas)

U.S. District Court
PAROLEE

U.S. v. Phillips, 977 F.Supp. 1418 (D.Colo. 1997). A defendant who was on parole moved to suppress evidence seized from his home. The district court held that the warrantless search of the defendant's residence based on a tip that the defendant was in possession of handguns and illegal drugs was valid because it was based on reasonable grounds to believe that a parole violation had occurred. The court recognized exceptions to warrant requirements in situations where special needs, such as the needs of a state parole system, make a warrant and probable cause requirement impractical. According to the court, the twin aims of rehabilitating parolees and protecting the public justify limiting a parolee's Fourth Amendment rights and expectations of privacy. The court noted that parolees do not enjoy the absolute liberty to which every citizen is entitled. (Colorado)

U.S. Appeals Court
STRIP SEARCH
VISITOR SEARCH

Varrone v. Bilotti, 123 F.3d 75 (2nd Cir. 1997). The son of a prison inmate brought a § 1983 action against prison officials arising from the requirement that the son submit to a strip search before he was allowed to visit his father. Summary judgment was denied to all parties and they appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded, finding that officials and their subordinates were entitled to qualified immunity. The court noted that the reasonable suspicion standard for the strip search of a visitor was clearly established at the time of the challenged search, and that the search was authorized based on reasonable suspicion. A corrections official had been provided with information by a narcotics bureau chief and other information which established reasonable suspicion to support the search, even if the corrections official did not personally investigate the reliability of the informant who provided the information to the bureau chief. (Arthur Kill Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCH

Williams v. Price, 25 F.Supp.2d 605 (W.D.Pa. 1997). Death row inmates challenged their conditions of confinement in a civil rights action. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the officials for most of the allegations. The court found that strip searches of inmates, including viewing of bodily cavities, before and after sessions with their attorneys, did not violate the inmates' Fourth Amendment rights. The court also found that the inmates were not denied equal protection because they were allowed only one hour of recreation per day, while inmates in another death row facility had two hours per day. The court held that the inmates' equal protection rights were not violated when they were denied access to recreational materials that were made available to inmates at other death row facilities, where there were more prisoners in their facility and contraband had been discovered. The court did not grant summary judgment to the defendants on the claim that failure to provide a soundproofed area for conversations between inmates and their attorneys violated the inmates' right to privacy. (State Correctional Institution at Greene, Pennsylvania)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCH

Wilson v. Shannon, 982 F.Supp. 337 (E.D.Pa. 1997). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against prison officials alleging violation of his rights in connection with strip searches and denial of exercise. The district court granted summary judgment for the officials, finding that denial of exercise for only eight days in response to disciplinary problems created by the inmate did not indicate deliberate indifference in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The court also held that alleged repeated strip searches of the inmate, both at the library and as the result of a security check of his cell, did not violate the Fourth Amendment because the inmate failed to show that the searches were conducted in an unreasonable manner, even if they were unnecessary. (SCI Frackville, Pennsylvania)

1998

U.S. District Court
USE OF FORCE

Adewale v. Whalen, 21 F.Supp.2d 1006 (D.Minn. 1998). An arrestee sued a police officer and the city that employed him under federal civil rights laws and state tort claims. The district court found that the officer was entitled to qualified immunity from liability for his decision to jail the arrestee, but found that genuine issues of material fact precluded summary judgment on the grounds of official immunity on allegations of assault, battery and false imprisonment. The court held that the officer's decision to detain the arrestee for a misdemeanor did not violate her federal rights and was objectively reasonable, given the arrestee's admission that she had been drinking and intended to drive. The court held that the arrestee failed to show that the city improperly trained its officers to arrest noncooperative persons for obstruction of legal process, based only on the decision of a deputy director of police that it was proper to arrest someone for refusing to open a security door for the police. The arrestee suffered a broken arm which she alleged was the result of excessive force used by the officer during a pat-down search. (City of Richfield Police Department, Minnesota)

U.S. District Court
PAT SEARCH
STRIP SEARCH

Aziz Zarif Shabazz v. Pico, 994 F.Supp. 460 (S.D.N.Y. 1998). A prison inmate brought a § 1983 action against prison officials and employees alleging violation of his constitutional rights. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants. The court held that the inmate failed to allege facts sufficient to support a conspiracy claim or that officials had acted in retaliation for the inmate's exercise of protected rights. The court concluded that kicking of the inmate inside his ankles and feet while performing a pat frisk, while not to be condoned, was a de minimis use of force and did not violate the Eighth Amendment. The court noted that at one time the inmate admitted that he had sustained no physical injuries. The court held that the pat frisk and strip frisk searches performed on the inmate were permissible and did not violate the provisions of a consent decree. The court found that performing a strip frisk on the prison inmate prior to his transfer to another facility did not violate his right of free exercise of religion, notwithstanding the inmate's religious objections to the requirement that he remove his clothing. According to the court, alleged verbal taunts, no matter how inappropriate, unprofessional or reprehensible they might seem, did not support a claim of cruel and unusual punishment absent any injury. Any psychological or emotional scars to the inmate were found to be de minimis and did not support a claim of cruel and unusual punishment. (Green Haven Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCH

Duffy v. County of Bucks, 7 F.Supp.2d 569 (E.D.Pa. 1998). An individual who had been arrested and detained over a weekend brought a § 1983 action against the probation officer who had sought the warrant under which he was arrested, and various county officials. The district court held that the arrest and detention of the probationer pursuant to a facially valid warrant did not violate his substantive due process rights, even though the individual had informed officials that the warrant was actually for a different person who had the same name. The court found that although the probationer failed to allege that strip searches to which he was subjected had been performed pursuant to a pattern or practice, his allegations regarding strip searches were sufficient to state a due process claim against officers of the facility. The individual was subjected to strip searches at least once daily for no apparent reason, even though he had no access to contraband or visitors. (Bucks County, Pennsylvania)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCHES

Foote v. Spiegel, 995 F.Supp. 1347 (D.Utah 1998). A detainee sued state and county officials alleging violation of her rights because she was strip searched. The district court denied summary judgment for the arresting officers and the case was affirmed in part, reversed in part, and dismissed in part on appeal. On remand, the district court held that there was not reasonable suspicion to strip search the detainee after a pat down search did not reveal contraband and the detainee was not being placed in the general jail population. The court found that suspicion that the detainee was under the influence of drugs or alcohol did not provide adequate justification for the search. The court found the county liable for failing to promulgate an adequate strip search policy that included reasonable suspicion of concealed contraband that would not be discovered through a rub search as a prerequisite to the strip search of a detainee who is not entering the general jail population. The court noted that flaws in the jail policy were known for a year prior to this incident and the county's refusal to change the policy exhibited deliberate indifference to the likelihood of future violations. (Davis County Jail, Utah)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCH

Hollimon v. DeTella, 6 F.Supp.2d 968 (N.D.Ill. 1998). A prisoner filed a civil rights action against corrections officials at an institution where he had previously been incarcerated, alleging that he was subjected to a strip search for the sole purpose of humiliation. The district court denied the defendants' motion to dismiss, finding that the prisoner's claim was not subject to dismissal for failure to exhaust available administrative remedies. The prisoner alleged that he was subjected to ribald comments during the strip search, and that to further humiliate him, it was done with female guards present. (Stateville Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
USE OF FORCE
PAT SEARCH

James v. Coughlin, 13 F.Supp.2d 403 (W.D.N.Y. 1998). A state inmate brought a § 1983 suit against corrections officials alleging constitutional violations in connection with a search. The district court granted summary judgment to the officials, finding that the curtailment of the inmate's First Amendment rights during a pat-frisk was justified. The inmate had failed to comply with pat-frisk procedures and was increasingly loud and boisterous and he was ordered to be quiet by a corrections officer. The court noted that the inmate had other means of expressing his dissatisfaction, such as the grievance procedure. The court found that the alleged conduct of a corrections officer in pushing his genital area against the inmate during the pat-frisk search, and wedging the inmate's pants into his buttocks, was a de minimus activity that did not implicate the Eighth Amendment. The court also found that the alleged conduct of a corrections officer in pushing the inmate back into his cell after the search did not involve the use of excessive force in violation of the Eighth Amendment. (Attica Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
CELL SEARCHES

Leitzsey v. Coombe, 998 F.Supp. 282 (W.D.N.Y. 1998). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against prison officials after he was disciplined for violating a prison rule that prohibited possession of materials pertaining to unauthorized organizations. The district court held that the prison rule did not violate the inmate's free speech or free exercise rights, and that the rule was not unconstitutionally vague. The court held that a search of the inmate's cell did not violate the Fourth Amendment, and that prisoners do not have a reasonable expectation of privacy within the confines of their cells. The court ruled that because New York law offered the inmate an adequate remedy on his claim that his constitutional rights were violated when the prison officials took his bag of documents and personal items and later destroyed them, he could not receive relief on that claim in federal court. (Attica Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCH

Magill v. Lee County, 990 F.Supp. 1382 (M.D.Ala. 1998). Pretrial detainees filed a civil rights action challenging a county's policy of conducting limited strip searches before detainees are placed in cells. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the county, finding that the policy was reasonable and did not violate the Fourth Amendment. According to the court, no heightened suspicion was necessary before jail officials could conduct limited strip searches because the dangers posed by the detainees to the jail were as high for one inmate as for another, no matter what crimes those inmates were charged with. The policy required removal of outer clothing only, and was found reasonable by the court given that small objects, such as pills, needles, or other contraband, could pose difficult and dangerous situations for jail administrators. The court noted that the searches were conducted by officers of the same sex as the detainee, and that pat-down searches or use of a metal detector would not find drugs or small objects. (Lee County Jail, Alabama)

U.S. Appeals Court
BLOOD TESTS
DRUG/ALCOHOL TESTING

Nelson v. City of Irvine, 143 F.3d 1196 (9th Cir. 1998). Two arrestees brought a § 1983 action on behalf of themselves and others similarly situated against city officials, alleging that they were coerced into submitting to blood tests to determine their alcohol levels following arrest for driving under the influence. The arrestees alleged that they were deprived of the option to take breath or urine tests instead. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants but the appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The appeals court held that arrestees who were forced to undergo blood tests after requesting or consenting to breath tests stated Fourth Amendment claims. According to the court, requiring the arrestees to submit to warrantless blood tests after they have consented to available breath or urine tests violates the Fourth Amendment warrant requirement. The court found that arrestees who consented to breath tests did not impliedly consent to blood tests. (City of Irvine, California)

U.S. Appeals Court
STRIP SEARCH

Peckham v. Wisconsin Dept. Of Corrections, 141 F.3d 694 (7th Cir. 1998). A state prisoner brought an action against corrections officials challenging the constitutionality of strip searches. The district court dismissed the suit and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the strip searches violated neither the Fourth Amendment nor the Eighth Amendment. According to the court, strip searches of a state prisoner upon his arrival at a facility, return to the facility after medical appointments or court proceedings, and upon a general search of his cell block, did not violate the Fourth Amendment. The court held that as long as the searches were performed for legitimate, identifiable purposes, and not for harassment or punishment, they did not violate the Eighth Amendment. (Taycheedah Correctional Institution, Outagamie County Jail, Wisconsin)

U.S. Supreme Court
PAROLEES

Pennsylvania Bd. of Probation v. Scott, 118 S.Ct. 2014 (1998). A parolee sought review of an administrative order of the Pennsylvania Board of Probation and Parole which denied his request for administrative relief from the Board's revocation decision. The U.S. Supreme Court held that parole boards are not required by federal law to exclude evidence that has been obtained in violation of the Fourth Amendment. According to the Court, the application of the exclusionary rule would both hinder the functioning of state parole systems and alter the traditionally flexible, administrative nature of parole revocation proceedings. The court noted that the social costs of using the exclusionary rule to allow the parolee to avoid the consequences of his violation are compounded by the fact that parolees, particularly those who have already committed parole violations, are more likely to commit future criminal offenses than are average citizens. The parolee was required to refrain from owning or possessing weapons as a condition of his parole. Parole officers entered his home and found firearms, a bow, and arrows. (Pennsylvania Board of Probation and Parole)

U.S. Appeals Court
DNA

Shaffer v. Saffle, 148 F.3d 1180 (10th Cir. 1998). A state prisoner brought a pro se § 1983 action challenging the constitutionality of a state statute that required him to provide a deoxyribonucleic acid (DNA) sample for the compilation of a DNA Offender Database. The district court dismissed the action and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the prisoner's rights against unreasonable searches and seizures and self-incrimination had not been violated. The appeals court also held that the prisoner's rights under the Free Exercise Clause and the Ex Post Facto clause had not been violated. The court noted that the statute was neutral and generally applicable, and was not applied to him differently because of his religious belief. The court also noted that the legislature expressed its intent that the statute apply retroactively. (Mack Alford Center, Oklahoma)

U.S. District Court
URINE TEST

Thomas v. McBride, 3 F.Supp.2d 989 (N.D.Ind. 1998). A state prison inmate petitioned for habeas corpus relief challenging the loss of this good time credits at a disciplinary hearing. The district court denied the petition, finding that a valid chain of custody for a urine sample was established so as to satisfy due process. The court found that the inmate's claims that prison officials did not follow a state Department of Corrections executive directive on how an inmate urine sample is to be collected was not cognizable in habeas corpus. According to the court, a laboratory report which listed several drug classes, each of which was marked "negative" except for cannabinoids (THC) which was marked "positive," was constitutionally sufficient for the purpose of reporting test results used in a prison disciplinary action. (Westville Correctional Facility, Indiana)

U.S. Appeals Court
PAROLEES

U.S. v. Jones, 152 F.3d 680 (7th Cir. 1998). A defendant appealed his conviction in district court. The appeals court affirmed, finding that a warrantless search of a parolee's residence on "reasonable grounds" that occurred while the parolee was in state custody did not violate the Fourth Amendment. The parole officer who sought approval for the search while the inmate was in custody knew that the parolee was suspected of selling drugs from a vehicle, reportedly possessed a firearm with which he had threatened his former girlfriend, and was arrested in a car in which crack cocaine had been found. (Wisconsin Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
CELL SEARCH

Zimmerman v. Hoard, 5 F.Supp.2d 633 (N.D. Ind. 1998). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action concerning events that occurred while he was a pretrial detainee at a county jail. The district court held that state directives and recommendations did not provide the basis for § 1983 claims. The inmate had alleged that the county officials failed to implement the Indiana Jail Standards and Rules and comply with the recommendations of the State Jail Inspector. The court held that the Fourth Amendment did not apply to cell searches. (Carroll County Jail, Indiana)

1999

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCH
OPPOSITE SEX

Carlin v. Manu, 72 F.Supp.2d 1177 (D.Or. 1999). Female state prison inmates challenged skin searches that were being observed by male correctional officers. The district court granted qualified immunity to the officers, noting this was not clearly identified as unlawful under existing law and that the observation was an isolated event caused by the emergency removal of the females to a male prison. The female facility was flooded and had to be evacuated, causing the female prisoners to be temporarily housed at a male facility. (Oregon Women's Correctional Center and Columbia River Correctional Institution, Oregon)

U.S. District Court
VISITOR SEARCHES

Chimurenga v. City of New York, 45 F.Supp.2d 337 (S.D.N.Y. 1999). A visitor to a juvenile detention facility filed at § 1983 and state law action against a city and corrections officials for false arrest, negligence and violation of her equal protection and due process rights following her arrest for allegedly attempting to smuggle contraband. The court granted summary judgment to the defendants in part and denied in part. The court held that the equal protection rights of the visitor were not violated and that an attorney did not have a liberty interest in access to a pass that would allow her to visit detainees in a juvenile detention facility, where there was no law or regulation that limited the discretion of the state corrections department to grant or deny a pass. But the court found that summary judgment was precluded by fact questions regarding whether correction officers planted a razor blade in a box brought by the visitor. (Adolescent Reception and Detention Center, Rikers Island, New York)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCH
USE OF FORCE

Drummer v. Luttrell, 75 F.Supp.2d 796 (W.D.Tenn. 1999). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against corrections officials alleging that a disciplinary action violated her due process and Eighth Amendment rights. The district court held that strip-searching and handcuffing the inmate during a unit search did not constitute a due process violation because the action did not impose an atypical and significant hardship on her. The inmate had been strip-searched during a shakedown of her dormitory. After squatting and coughing twice the inmate refused a direct order to do so again and was disciplined. She then left a shower area dressed in nothing but her panties and two male officers were called for assistance. (Shelby County Correctional Center, Tennessee)

U.S. Appeals Court
OPPOSITE SEX
STRIP SEARCH
BODY CAVITY
SEARCH

Moore v. Carwell, 168 F.3d 234 (5th Cir. 1999). An inmate brought an in forma pauperis § 1983 suit against prison officials alleging that his First, Fourth and Eighth Amendment rights were violated by alleged multiple strip and body cavity searches performed by a female officer. The district court dismissed the case as frivolous and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed and remanded in part. The appeals court held that the inmate's Fourth Amendment claim was not frivolous. According to the court, conducting strip and body cavity searches of a male prisoner by a female prison official, in the absence of an emergency or extraordinary circumstances and in the presence of male officers, would violate the inmate's Fourth Amendment right to be free from unreasonable searches and seizures. The inmate argued that his Baptist faith requires modesty and prohibits him from being viewed naked by a female other than his wife. (Beto I Unit, Texas Dept. of Criminal Justice)

U.S. Appeals Court
BLOOD TESTS

Roe v. Marcotte, 193 F.3d 72 (2nd Cir. 1999). Inmates challenged a statute requiring convicted sex offenders who were incarcerated as of the statute's effective date to submit a blood sample for analysis and inclusion in a DNA data bank. The district court dismissed the case and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the statute did not violate the Fourth Amendment's prohibition against unreasonable searches and did not violate the equal protection clause. (Connecticut Department of Correction)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCH

Shain v. Ellison, 53 F.Supp.2d 564 (E.D.N.Y. 1999). A detainee sued a county challenging its policy of strip searching all detainees regardless of the nature of the crime for which they were detained. The district court entered summary judgment in favor of the detainee, finding that the Fourth Amendment prohibited strip searches in the absence of reasonable suspicion that a detainee was concealing weapons or other contraband. The court held that the county's policy violated the Fourth Amendment and that a qualified immunity defense was not available as the unconstitutionality of the practice was known for years. (Nassau County Corr'l Center, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
PAROLEES

U.S. v. Payne, 181 F.3d 781 (6th Cir. 1999). After a parolee was convicted of possession of marijuana and being a felon in receipt of firearms, the parolee challenged a Kentucky policy that authorized a parole officer to conduct a warrantless search of his person and property upon reasonable suspicion. The appeals court held that the policy satisfied the requirements of the Fourth Amendment but that evidence obtained by a parole officer in violation of the Fourth Amendment must be suppressed in a subsequent criminal proceeding. The appeals court found that the parole officer lacked reasonable suspicion to search the parolee's truck and the property of his estranged wife. The parolee had been placed under the maximum level of parole supervision, which meant he was required to have two office visits and one home visit with his parole officer each month. The parolee had also signed a statement acknowledging that he was "subject to a search and seizure if my Probation and Parole Officer [has] reasonable suspicion to believe that I may have illegal contraband on my property or person." (Kentucky)

U.S. District Court
CELL SEARCH
SEARCH WARRANT

U.S. v. Rollack, 90 F.Supp.2d 263 (S.D.N.Y. 1999). A defendant moved to suppress evidence seized in prison mail and cell searches that occurred during his pretrial detention. The district court held that the defendant had a reasonable expectation of privacy in his prison mail when a search is performed or initiated by law enforcement officials other than those in charge of a prison and is unrelated to institutional security concerns. The court noted that a prisoner had a reasonable expectation to privacy in his mail as to searches that did not target concealed weapons, drugs or other items clearly related to security inside the prison. The court held that seizure of letters from his jail cell and mail was valid despite the overbreadth of warrants that authorized seizure. The court found that seizure of non-mail writings and photographs from the defendant's cell was invalid. (Charlotte-Mecklenburg County Central Jail, North Carolina)

2000

U.S. District Court
CELL SEARCH

Ballance v. Virginia, 130 F.Supp.2d 754 (W.D.Va. 2000). A state prison inmate who was convicted of sexual crimes involving juveniles brought a § 1983 action against corrections officials alleging wrongful confiscation of photographs of children from his cell. The district court held that the confiscation complied with the First Amendment even though only a small percentage of photographs were of seminude children. The court noted that state officials provided minimum procedural safeguards, including notice of confiscation, provision of avenues for protest, and review of the prisoner's allegation of a First Amendment violation by someone who was not involved with the confiscation. The court found that the confiscation of all photographs served to further the prison's interests in both rehabilitation and institutional security because the possible discovery of the cache of photos by other prisoners created a potential for disturbance. According to the court, a prisoner has no Fourth Amendment right to be free from unreasonable searches of his cell because he has no expectation of privacy in his cell. (Wallens Ridge State Prison, Virginia)

U.S. District Court
CELL SEARCH

Ballance v. Young, 130 F.Supp.2d 762 (W.D.Va. 2000). A state prisoner brought a pro se federal civil rights suit against prison officials, arising out of their seizure of several items of his personal property. The district court held that the prisoner had no reasonable expectation of privacy in his cell that would make seizure of a letter from his cell a Fourth Amendment violation that could be addressed in a § 1983 suit. The court found that the decision by officials to confiscate the prisoner's scrapbook and clippings, in accordance with a prison regulation that prohibited such items, was reasonable in light of security concerns that the metal parts of scrapbooks could be used as weapons and that razors and other contraband could be hidden in the clippings or scrapbooks, and in light of the time-consuming or extreme nature of other alternatives, such as x-raying cells. The court noted that the officials did not need reasonable suspicion to search prisoner cells as part of their policy of performing random searches. The court also held that the prisoner was afforded sufficient post-deprivation remedies to satisfy any due process concerns arising from the seizure of an attorney's letter that contained hair samples and, allegedly, two money orders, where the inmate did receive notice of a disciplinary hearing held under the prison regulation forbidding abuse of mail. (Wallens Ridge State Prison, Virginia)

U.S. District Court
CELL SEARCH

Barstow v. Kennebec County Jail, 115 F.Supp.2d 3 (D.Me. 2000). A county jail inmate brought an action against a sheriff, detective, county commissioners and county, alleging claims under § 1983. The district court granted summary judgment, in part, for the defendants. The court held that the search of the inmate's jail cell did not violate his Fourth Amendment rights or his due process rights. The court found that the detective had probable cause to search the jail cell for evidence that the inmate had committed the crime of terrorizing because his cell mate had informed potential victims and the detective about the inmate's possible retaliatory plans. According to the court, the Fourth Amendment does not require government officials to secure a search warrant prior to searching a prison cell. (Kennebec County Jail, Maine)

U.S. Appeals Court
VISITOR

Burgess v. Lowery, 201 F.3d 942 (7th Cir. 2000). Visitors who had been strip searched sued state prison officials under § 1983 seeking damages and injunctive relief. The district court denied the defendants' motion to dismiss and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the visitors' right not to be strip searched in the absence of reasonable suspicion that he or she was carrying contraband was clearly established. State prison regulations authorize strip searches of visitors only if the visitor consents and if there is reasonable suspicion that the visitor is carrying contraband. The visitors were the father and wife of inmates on death row and the court found that the state regulations applied indifferently to the visitors of death row inmates and to visitors of other inmates. (Illinois Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCH

Mason v. Village of Babylon, New York, 124 F.Supp.2d 807 (E.D.N.Y. 2000). An arrestee who was taken into custody based on a traffic warrant that was later determined to have been recalled, filed an action under § 1983 alleging false arrest and illegal search. The district court found that a no-contact partial strip search, incident to arrest violated the Fourth Amendment because neither the nature of the offense nor the circumstances of arrest raised any suspicion that would justify such an intrusion. The court noted that the unconstitutionality of a blanket strip-search policy had been well-established. The female arrestee was asked by a female arresting officer to lift her shirt, lower her pants, and rearrange her undergarments to dislodge any contraband that might be concealed. (Village of Babylon, Second Precinct, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
STRIP SEARCH

Miller v. Kennebec County, 219 F.3d 8 (1st Cir. 2000). An arrestee brought a § 1983 action against an arresting officer, town, counties and county sheriffs alleging Fourth Amendment violations and state law claims arising out of her arrest and detention. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants and the arrestee appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part and vacated and remanded in part. The appeals court held that the arresting officer was not entitled to qualified immunity because the warrant under which he brought the arrestee to jail explicitly directed that it was to be executed by bringing the defendant immediately before a sitting judge. The court also found that a fact question precluded summary judgment on the unreasonable strip search claim against the county where the arrestee was jailed. (Kennebec County and Knox County, Maine)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCH

Kelleher v. New York State Trooper Fearon, 90 F.Supp.2d 354 (S.D.N.Y. 2000). An arrestee brought a § 1983 action against a police officer, alleging that he was subjected to an unlawful strip search. The district court held that the issue of whether the officer had an objectively reasonable suspicion to strip search the arrestee was for the jury, but that the jury award of damages in the amount of $125,000 as compensation for emotional distress were excessive to the extent that they exceeded $25,000. According to the court, although the unlawful strip search in which the arrestee was touched by the officer was an "egregious intrusion" on the arrestee's person, there was no corroborating medical evidence concerning the arrestee's emotional distress. The officer had transported the arrestee to a state police barracks and conducted the strip search in a bathroom. (State Police Barracks in Brewster, New York)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCH

Roberts v. Rhode Island, 175 F.Supp.2d 176 (D.R.I. 2000). A detainee brought an action against corrections officials challenging the constitutionality of policies that require all males committed to the state prison to be subjected to a strip search and visual body cavity search. The district court held that the policies were constitutionally deficient as applied to the detainee, who was searched while detained pursuant to an outstanding body attachment issued by a state family court. The court noted that the policies contained no language concerning what factors might give rise to reasonable suspicion that would permit a constitutional search, and that the policies were universally applied to all pre-arraignment detainees without any prior determination that there is a reasonable suspicion that the detainee may be carrying weapons or contraband. The detainee was searched upon initial admission to the facility and was searched again before being transported to court for arraignment. (Intake Services Center at the Adult Correctional Institution, Rhode Island)

U.S. Appeals Court
STRIP SEARCH
OPPOSITE SEX

Skurstenis v. Jones, 236 F.3d 678 (11th Cir. 2000). A female detainee brought an action against a county sheriff and sheriff's department staff, alleging that a strip search of her pelvic region violated her Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment rights. The district court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment in part and denied it in part. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded in part. The appeals court held that the jail policy that required each inmate to be strip-searched by a same-sex jail staff member, before being placed in a cell or detention room, violated the Fourth Amendment. But the court found that the detainee's possession of a handgun at the time of her arrest provided the "reasonable suspicion" needed to permit her strip search. The detainee was taken to a bathroom and observed by a female officer, who instructed the detainee to disrobe but did not conduct a body cavity search. A second medically-related search took place in the infirmary, with no one other than the detainee and a male nurses assistant present. The search was conducted pursuant to a contract between the county and a hospital, and involved an examination of the detainee's cranial and pubic hair for lice. The court held that the search was reasonable in manner and scope and did not violate the Fourth Amendment. (Shelby County Jail, Alabama)

U.S. Appeals Court
PAROLEES

U.S. v. Hebert, 201 F.3d 1103 (9th Cir. 2000). An offender appealed after the district court revoked an offender's supervised release based on methamphetimine found in a warrantless "parole search" of the offender's apartment. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the exclusionary rule would not be applied in a federal supervised release revocation hearing, even in the officers conducting the search lacked reasonable suspicion that the offender was involved in criminal activity. (United States District Court, Southern District of California)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCH

Wilson v. Shelby County, Ala., 95 F.Supp.2d 1258 (N.D.Ala. 2000). A female arrestee who was strip searched before being placed in jail following her arrest on charges of driving under the influence sued county officials for damages. The district court denied the defendants' motion to dismiss, finding that the policy of strip searching all jail admittees, regardless of personal circumstances, violated the bodily privacy rights of the arrestee. The court held that the sheriff was not entitled to qualified immunity from suit. The arrestee was kept in an isolated cell with no opportunity to interact with the general population. The court noted that a strip search of an arrestee charged with a minor offense may be conducted only when there is a reasonable suspicion that the arrestee may be secreting drugs, weapons or other contraband on or in his or her body. The arrestee was an 18-year-old high school student who had been stopped at a drivers' license checkpoint and registered 0.08 percent blood alcohol. According to the arrestee, she was taken into a restroom by a female deputy and was ordered to strip, and then according to the arrestee "she checked my breasts and behind my ears and in my mouth and nose...and then she told me to squat and spread my butt apart and cough three times." (Shelby County Jail, Alabama)

2001

U.S. District Court
PAT SEARCH
CROSS GENDER

Colman v. Vasquez, 142 F.Supp.2d 226 (D.Conn. 2001). A female inmate placed in a special prison unit for victims of sexual abuse filed a § 1983 action against prison officials alleging that she was sexually abused by a male guard, and challenging the practice of having male guards conduct pat searches of female inmates. The district court denied the defendants' motions to dismiss, finding that fact issues remained. The court found that a male prison guard's repeated, involuntary, harassing and intimidating contact with a female inmate can constitute a substantial risk of harm under the Eighth Amendment, and that prison officials were required to investigate the female inmate's complaint that she had been sexually assaulted. (Federal Correctional Institution, Danbury, Connecticut)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCH

Doan v. Watson, 168 F.Supp.2d 932 (S.D.Ind. 2001). Former inmates filed a § 1983 suit against a former and current sheriff, individually and in their official capacities, alleging unconstitutional strip search policies. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the former inmates, finding that the jail policy of stripping inmates and requiring them to undergo a delousing procedure was an unreasonable search. According to the court, the policy authorized a blanket strip search without justification. The court noted that the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA) did not require the former inmates to produce evidence of physical injury to pursue their claims. The inmates had been arrested for misdemeanor offenses and were subjected to intake searches before entering the general jail population. (Floyd County Jail, Indiana)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCH

Gonzalez v. City of Schenectady, 141 F.Supp.2d 304 (N.D.N.Y. 2001). Male and female detainees sued a city claiming they were strip searched under an unconstitutional city policy. The district court held that the city policy of strip searching all detainees who were awaiting court action violated the Fourth Amendment. The court found that the police did not have reasonable suspicion to strip search a male detainee and a female detainee, who were charged with minor offenses. The court noted that the Fourth Amendment precludes strip or body cavity searches of arrestees charged with misdemeanors or other minor offenses unless officials have reasonable suspicion that the arrestee is concealing weapons or other contraband based on the crime charged, particular circumstances of the arrestee, or the circumstances of the arrest. (City of Schenectady, New York)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCH

Lee v. Perez, 175 F.Supp.2d 673 (S.D.N.Y. 2001). An arrestee brought an action against a correctional officer, alleging he had been unconstitutionally strip searched. The district court entered a jury verdict in favor of the officer and the arrestee moved for reconsideration. The district court granted the motion, finding that there was insufficient evidence to support the jury's conclusion that the officer relied on permissible factors in making his decision to perform a body cavity search on the arrestee. According to the court, the officer testified that he had not considered the nature of the two misdemeanors with which the arrestee had been charged and could not identify any characteristic of the arrestee that led to his conclusion that the arrestee might have been carrying contraband. The arrestee had spent the night in a police holding cell and was arraigned in court the next morning. Bail was set at $250 but the arrestee was not allowed to post bail at the police station using money that had been in his possession at the time of his arrest. He was transported to the local jail where he was processed in. The intake process included a "personal hygiene check/visual body search" which consisted of having the arrestee remove his clothes, followed by a visual inspection of his body. The officer contended that this hygiene check was not the same as a strip search because it did not require the inmate to open his mouth or bend over and spread his buttocks. (Orange County Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
EMPLOYEE

Leverette v. Bell, 247 F.3d 160 (4th Cir. 2001). An employee of a state correctional institution brought a § 1983 action against an associate warden, alleging that a visual body cavity search of her person violated her Fourth Amendment right against unreasonable search and seizures. The district court denied summary judgment in favor of the associate warden and she appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded, finding that the associate warden was acting within the scope of her authority and that the search was reasonable under the Fourth Amendment. The court noted that the search was conducted pursuant to a particularized and individualized tip that the employee would be bringing contraband into the prison in a tampon on a specific occasion, that the inmate-informant who had provided that information had relayed accurate drug-related tips in the past, and the search itself was conducted by female officials, in a private setting. (Wateree River Correctional Institution, South Carolina)

U.S. Appeals Court
STRIP SEARCH

Shain v. Ellison, 273 F.3d 56 (2nd Cir. 2001). A misdemeanor detainee in a local correctional facility sued a county and various individuals, challenging the policy of requiring strip searches of all detainees regardless of the nature of the crime for which they were detained. The district court granted summary judgment for the detainee and awarded $1 in nominal damages. The appeals court affirmed in part and remanded in part. The appeals court held that the county's strip search policy violated the Fourth Amendment and its illegality was clearly established in 1995, but the detainee was not entitled to a new trial on the question of damages. The court noted that the searching officer did not have reasonable suspicion to conduct the search of the detainee, and that even if other officers had information that may have justified the search, the information was not relayed to the searching officer. (Nassau County Correctional Center, New York)

U.S. Supreme Court
PROBATIONS

United States v. Knights, 121 S.Ct. 1955 (2001). A sheriff's deputy, acting with reasonable suspicion, searched a probationer's apartment and found evidence later used to indict him for conspiracy to commit arson, for possession of an unregistered destructive device, and for being a felon in possession of ammunition. A federal appeals court ruled that the evidence gathered in this manner had to be suppressed, even with reasonable suspicion, because the search was for an investigatory rather than probationary purpose. The U.S. Supreme Court unanimously reversed the appeals court, finding that a warrantless search in this case, supported by reasonable suspicion and authorized by a probation condition, satisfied the Fourth Amendment. According to the Court, the judge in the probationer's criminal case had "reasonably concluded" that the condition of submitting to searches would further the two primary goals of probation--rehabilitation and protecting society from future criminal violations. No more than a reasonable suspicion, the Court found, was required to search the probationer's house, and a warrant is unnecessary. (California)

U.S. District Court
PAROLEES

U.S. v. Replogle, 176 F.Supp.2d 960 (D.Neb. 2001). In a prosecution for drug possession, the defendant moved to suppress evidence found in his house. The district court denied the motion, finding that while the defendant had a legitimate expectation of privacy in his house and the search was not voluntary, the warrantless search was valid because it was conducted pursuant to a valid probation order. The court noted that the defendant's probation officer was authorized to conduct warrantless searches and the probation order stated that the probationer "shall consent" to such searches. The probation officer knew that the defendant had violated a condition of his probation and a judge had advised the officer that she could visit the probationer and conduct a search. (U.S. District Court, Nebraska)

U.S. Appeals Court
STRIP SEARCH

Wilson v. Jones, 251 F.3d 1340 (11th Cir. 2001). A female arrestee brought a civil rights action against a county sheriff challenging her strip search following her arrest for driving under the influence. The district court denied the sheriff's motion to dismiss. The appeals court reversed. The appeals court held that the strip search violated the arrestee's Fourth Amendment privacy rights, but that the sheriff was entitled to qualified immunity because the unconstitutionality of the county's blanket strip search policy was not clearly established at the time of the search. The arrestee had been strip searched by a female corrections officer before being placed in a cell with the general female population because the county did not have separate facilities to temporarily hold female detainees. (Shelby County Jail, Alabama)

2002

U.S. Appeals Court
CELL SEARCH

Carter v. McGrady, 292 F.3d 152 (3rd Cir. 2002). A state prison inmate brought a pro se § 1983 action against prison officials alleging he was unlawfully subjected to cell searches and disciplinary proceedings in retaliation for his jailhouse lawyering, in violation of the First Amendment. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the officials and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the disciplinary action taken by prison officials was reasonably related to legitimate penological interests, precluding the retaliation claim. The disciplinary action was taken in response to findings that the inmate had engaged in overt misconduct, including unauthorized use of a credit card, theft by deception, receiving stolen property, writing letters to inmates at other prisons, and storing paperwork in his cell in amounts that exceeded safety regulations. The inmate had not been assigned to the law library to provide assistance to inmates, but was being paid by inmates for helping them. At one point the inmate produced documents that he alleged proved he had been appointed by the federal courts as a paralegal to assist other inmates. (State Correctional Institute at Mahoney, Pennsylvania)

U.S. Appeals Court
STRIP SEARCH

Cuesta v. School Bd. of Miami-Dade County, Fla., 285 F.3d 962 (11th Cir. 2002). A high school student sued a school board and a county under § 1983 alleging she was subjected to an unconstitutional strip search. The district court entered summary judgment for the school board and county and the student appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that there was reasonable suspicion to strip search the student. The student had distributed, with eight other students, an anonymous pamphlet on school grounds that included an essay in which the author "wondered what would happen" if he shot the principal, teachers or other students. The students were arrested for hate crime violations and transported to juvenile and adult detention facilities, depending on their ages. The plaintiff student, who was over 18 years old, was booked and strip searched at an adult detention facility pursuant to a policy that required the search of all newly-arrested felons. (Turner Guildford Knight Correctional Facility, Metro-Dade County, Florida)

U.S. Appeals Court
STRIP SEARCH

Dye v. Lomen, 40 Fed.Appx. 993 (7th Cir. 2002). A state prisoner brought § 1983 claims against correctional employees, alleging they used excessive force against him during two entries into his cell, that they refused to provide him with toilet paper for several days, and that they strip-searched him in front of a female employee. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the correctional employees and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that correctional officials did not use excessive force when they physically and mechanically restrained the prisoner and used a stun gun against him during two cell entries. The appeals court found that the failure to provide the prisoner with toilet paper for several days did not violate the prisoner's rights, absent proof that the officials deprived him of toilet paper to unnecessarily and wantonly inflict pain upon the prisoner. The appeals court held that strip-searching the male prisoner in front of female employees did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment. (Kettle Moraine Correctional Institution, Wisconsin)

U.S. District Court
RETALIATION

Farid v. Goord, 200 F.Supp.2d 220 (W.D.N.Y. 2002). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against correctional officers and prison officials, alleging free speech and procedural due process violations under the First and Fourteenth Amendments. The district court granted summary judgment, in part, for the defendants. The court held that the inmate, who had circulated a petition, engaged in protected conduct even though the prison had a grievance process that could have been used. The petition concerned allegations that an officer failed to allow inmates adequate time to finish their breakfast. The court noted that no regulation barring petitions was in effect at the time. The court denied summary judgment on the issue of whether the inmate's right to petition the government and right to free speech were violated by officers when they determined, independent of the facility's media review committee, that a copy of the petition the inmate had sent to the prison superintendent was unauthorized, and that two satirical articles written by the prisoner, one of which was published by local news media, were detrimental to the order of the facility. The court denied qualified immunity to officers on the inmate's retaliation claim, finding that the inmate's right not to suffer retaliation for engaging in protected First Amendment activities was clearly established at the time of the alleged retaliation. The inmate alleged that the officers retaliated with searches of his cell and work area, and with disciplinary charges for authoring and possessing certain articles. (Attica Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
STRIP SEARCH
PRIVACY

Farmer v. Perrill, 288 F.3d 1254 (10th Cir. 2002). A female federal prisoner brought a civil rights action against prison officials, alleging Fourth Amendment violations arising from strip searches. The district court denied summary judgment for the officials and refused to dismiss the action. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the prisoner's right not to be subjected to a humiliating strip search in full view of several others was "clearly established" at the time of the search in question. The court held that summary judgment was precluded because genuine issues of material fact existed as to whether prison officials had a legitimate penological need to conduct the strip search of the prisoner in an open area and in view of inmates and staff. According to the court, while a prison inmate's right to privacy must yield to a prison's need to maintain security, "it does not vanish altogether." (Englewood Federal Correctional Facility, Colorado)

U.S. Appeals Court
CELL SEARCHES

Foster v. Lawson, 291 F.3d 1050 (8th Cir. 2002). A state prison inmate brought § 1983 action alleging that corrections officials violated his Fourth Amendment rights by searching his legal materials in his absence. The district court entered judgment for the officials and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the officials' removal of a locker box containing both legal and non-legal materials, in order to separate the materials, outside of the presence of the inmate, did not violate a consent decree that allowed inmates to be present for searches of legal materials. (Iowa)

U.S. District Court
CELL SEARCH
CONTRABAND

Giba v. Cook, 232 F.Supp.2d 1171 (D.Or. 2002). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action, alleging various constitutional violations. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants, finding that prison officials reasonably interpreted a rule proscribing the possession of legal materials belonging to another inmate as including both copies and originals of such materials. The court held that the prisoner was not denied access to the courts and that his First Amendment rights were not violated when prison staff seized contraband contained in a box clearly labeled "confidential- legal matters" while the prisoner was not present. The court noted that although a prison officer scanned the contents of the box, he only confiscated contraband. The prisoner alleged that he had been given permission by another inmate to use copies of his legal papers in his own lawsuit. (Two Rivers Correctional Institution, Oregon)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCH

Helton v. U.S., 191 F.Supp.2d 179 (D.D.C. 2002). Female arrestees brought an action under the Federal Tort Claims Act (FTCA) alleging that United States Marshals conducted unlawful searches and invasions of their privacy. The district court held that the alleged strip search of arrestees satisfied the elements of a tort intrusion upon seclusion. The court noted that the Fourth Amend-ment precludes police or prison officials from conducting a strip search of an individual arrested for misdemeanors or other minor offenses, unless there is reasonable suspicion that the individual is concealing contraband or weapons. The five women plaintiffs had been arrested for unlawful entry in connection with an "anti-fur" demonstration at a department store. According to their complaint, they were compelled "to remove clothing and submit to a strip and squat search" while six men arrested with them were not subjected to such searches. (United States Marshals Service)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCH

Loeber v. County Of Albany, 216 F.Supp.2d 20 (N.D.N.Y. 2002). An arrestee who was strip searched several times after being arrested brought an action under § 1983, alleging numerous constitutional violations and state law claims. The arrestee had been arrested pursuant to a contempt order that was later expunged. The district court held that the county jail's strip search policy was constitutional. The policy only called for strip searches upon admission to the jail where there was a reasonable suspicion that the arrestee possessed contraband, including the cigarettes and candy that the arrestee had in his possession. The court noted that the Fourth Amendment prohibits a blanket policy under which all misdemeanor or minor offense arrestees are strip-searched when admitted to a jail. The court found that a strip search could also be conducted based on the crime charged, the particular characteristics of an arrestee, and/or the circumstances of the arrest. The arrestee had been strip searched when he was admitted to a courthouse holding cell, again when he was admitted to the county jail, and once again when he was taken to a Special Housing Unit for possessing cigarettes and candy, which were considered to be contraband. (Albany County Penitentiary, New York)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCH

Murcia v. County of Orange, 185 F.Supp.2d 290 (S.D.N.Y. 2002). An arrestee who was, according to the court, "the unfortunate victim of mistaken identity" was arrested by city police officers who believed he was the same person named in a federal arrest warrant. The arrestee brought a § 1983 claim because he was subjected to one strip search at the city police department and three subsequent strip searches at a county correctional facility. The district court granted the arrestee's motion to amend his complaint, dropping false arrest claims but allowing the strip search claims to continue. The court noted that if the county sheriff's alleged policy of strip-searching every arriving prisoner existed, it was clearly unconstitutional and there could be no qualified immunity defense. (Orange County Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCH
BODY CAVITY SEARCH
PRETRIAL DETAINEE

Murcia v. County of Orange, 226 F.Supp.2d 489 (S.D.N.Y. 2002). A detainee filed a § 1983 action alleging that a county violated his constitutional rights by strip searching him, under a policy of strip searching all detainees upon arrival at the correctional facility. The district court granted qualified immunity for the county sheriff, finding that the detainee's right to be free from strip searches without reasonable suspicion was not clearly established at the time. The court noted that the county's policy of subjecting all new felony detainees to visual body cavity searches required further scrutiny, although such searches for misdemeanor detainees had been clearly established as unconstitutional in 1994. (Orange Co. Corr'l Facil., New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
CROSS GENDER
STRIP SEARCH
PAT SEARCH

Oliver v. Scott, 276 F.3d 736 (5th Cir. 2002). A male prisoner brought a civil rights suit against a prison warden, correctional officers, and private contractors who operated a state jail facility, alleging constitutional violations arising from cross-gender surveillance and strip searches, and the absence of partitions in male shower areas. The district court dismissed a portion of the complaint for failure to state a claim and entered summary judgment in favor of the defendants for the remaining issues. The prisoner appealed and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that any minimal right to bodily privacy possessed by the male prisoner did not preclude cross-gender surveillance and that such surveillance, in the absence of partitions in the male shower area, did not violate the prisoner's equal protection rights. The court noted that fundamental implied rights-—marriage, family procreation, and the right of bodily integrity—-do not include a right of prisoners to avoid surveillance by members of the opposite sex. According to the court, the existence of privacy partitions in female inmates' showers and the absence of male guard surveillance of female inmates did not violate the equal protection rights of the male prisoner because male prisoners were not similarly situated to female prisoners due to their conviction for more violent crimes, larger numbers, and higher incidence of violent gang activity and sexual predation. The court found that the prisoner's complaint did not identify a specific unconstitutional policy that correctional officers allegedly violated by engaging in cross-gender strip searches and monitoring of prisoners. (Dawson State Jail Facility, Texas)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCHES
JUVENILE

Reynolds v. City of Anchorage, 225 F.Supp.2d 754 (W.D.Ky. 2002). A juvenile filed a suit against a juvenile officer under § 1983, alleging that the officer and others violated her constitutional rights during a warrantless strip search of her and four other juveniles at a juvenile facility. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court held that at the time the juvenile was strip searched, it was not clearly established that a search warrant supported by probable cause was required to constitutionally strip search a minor suspected of possessing drugs in a juvenile home or detention center. Each girl had been searched one at a time, in her own room, with a female staff member present. (Bellewood Presbyterian Home for Children, Fayette County, Kentucky)

U.S. Appeals Court
DRUG TEST

Saulsberry v. Arpaio, 41 Fed.Appx. 953 (9th Cir. 2002). A detainee brought an action against a county sheriff alleging violation of his Fourth and Eighth Amendment rights. The district court entered judgment for the sheriff and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that a physician working for the sheriff's office ordered catheterization and drug screening for the detainee solely for medical purposes, not for any administrative or investigative reasons, and therefore the tests did not violate the Fourth Amendment. (Maricopa Co. Sheriff's Office, Arizona)

U.S. District Court
BODY CAVITY

Seaver v. Manduco, 178 F.Supp.2d 30 (D.Mass. 2002). State inmates filed a § 1983 action alleging that corrections officials harassed them because of their status as sex offenders, and conducted retaliatory visual body cavity searches. The district court dismissed the action, finding that injunctive relief was not warranted, the inmates' claims for money damages based on harassment were barred by the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA) and that officials were entitled to qualified immunity from liability for the searches. The court noted that the PLRA barred claims for mental or emotional injury without a showing of physical injury and that correctional officers had reasonable justification for conducting a visual body cavity search of the inmates where they were responding to a prison alarm because of what appeared to be a fight. The inmates alleged that staff members had posted a sign that stated "All sex offenders should be castrated" and that they were subjected to assaults from other prisoners as a result of the signs. (North Central Correctional Institution, Massachusetts)

U.S. District Court
SAME-SEX SEARCH
STRIP SEARCH

Turner v. Kight, 192 F.Supp.2d 391 (D.Md. 2002). A female detainee who was arrested on an outstanding warrant associated with a civil matter and detained at a jail brought an action against county and state officials. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants. The court held that arresting and booking officers were deliberately indifferent to the detainee's serious medical needs when they allegedly removed a neck brace and seized medication, ignoring her com-plaints of pain and muscle spasm. The detainee sometimes limped and walked with a cane, but the court found that the detainee's alleged pain did not rise to the level of a serious medical need. The court granted qualified immunity to the officers, finding that there was no indication that the officers actually knew of, and ignored, a serious need for medical care. The court also found that the officers were not deliberately indifferent by failing to dispense medication in response to the de-tainee's complaints of pain, where the officers were not permitted to dispense medication and they notified the detention facility's medical staff of a nonemergency situation, who did not respond dur-ing the six hours the detainee was confined. The court held that if a strip search was conducted by an officer of the same sex during the processing of the detainee, it did not rise to the level of a Fourth Amendment violation, where the search was conducted in private and there was no physical contact between the officer and the detainee. (Montgomery County Detention Ctr., Maryland)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCH

Turner v. Kight, 217 F.Supp.2d 680 (D.Md. 2002). A detainee who was arrested on an outstanding warrant brought a civil rights and state tort suit arising out of her arrest and the conditions of her detention. The district court held that the detainee was entitled to reconsideration of the court's determination that she was a "pretrial detainee" at the time of an allegedly unconstitutional strip search. The detainee claimed that she was a "temporary detainee" at the time of the search, which exempted her from a strip search according to county jail policy. (Montgomery County Detention Center, Maryland)

U.S. Appeals Court
PROBATIONERS
PAROLEES

U.S. v. Reyes, 283 F.3d 446 (2nd Cir. 2002). A federal offender who was serving a term of supervised release appealed denial of his motion to suppress evidence that was identified during a home visit by probation officers. The appeals court held that the offender had a severely diminished expectation of privacy, making it reasonable and lawful for probation officers to walk on to his driveway during a required home visit and to observe what they may see in plain view. The court noted that terms of the offender's supervised release mandated home visits "at any time." (U.S. District Court, Northern District of New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
PAROLEES

U.S. v. Tucker, 305 F.3d 1193 (10th Cir. 2002). A defendant convicted of possession of child pornography appealed his conviction, challenging a warrantless parole search. The district court held that the parole search was supported by reasonable suspicion and that seizure of the defendant's computer was justified under the plain-view doctrine. The court noted that probable cause is not required for a parole search that is conducted under a valid parole agreement and that the defendant had agreed to allow searches of his residence, diminishing his expectation of privacy. (Utah Department of Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
CELL SEARCH

Willis v. Artuz, 301 F.3d 65 (2nd Cir. 2002). A state prisoner sued prison officials, alleging violation of his Fourth Amendment rights as the result of a warrantless search of his cell. The district court dismissed the action and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the warrantless search, conducted at the request of police who were seeking evidence of an uncharged crime, did not violate the prisoner's right to be free of unreasonable searches, even though the search did not serve any purpose related to prison security, because the prisoner was a convicted offender, not a pretrial detainee. (Green Haven Corr'l Facility, New York)

2003

U.S. Appeals Court
STRIP SEARCH
OPPOSITE SEX
PRIVACY

Calhoun v. Detella, 319 F.3d 936 (7th Cir. 2003). A male state prisoner sued prison employees under § 1983, alleging that a strip search conducted in the presence of female officers violated his Eighth Amendment rights. The district court dismissed the case for failure to state a claim and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, and vacated and remanded in part. The appeals court held that the prisoner's allegations stated an Eighth Amendment claim. The prisoner alleged that he was strip searched in front of female officers, that the officers made explicit gestures during the search and forced him to perform sexually provocative acts, and that the female officers were invited spectators. The appeals court also held that the Civil Rights of Institutionalized Persons Act (CRIPA) that barred federal civil actions by prisoners for mental or emotional injuries without a showing of physical injury, did not foreclose an action for nominal or punitive damages for violations that did not involve a physical injury. (Stateville Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCH

Dodge v. County of Orange, 282 F.Supp.2d 41 (S.D.N.Y. 2003). A suit sought a permanent injunction against a county jail's policy of strip searching newly arrived pretrial detainees upon their initial admission. The district court held that the policy, in its initial form and in two subsequent revisions, violated the Fourth Amendment to the extent that it allowed a strip search without individualized reasonable suspicion that a detainee was carrying contraband. The court granted a permanent injunction against the unconstitutional aspects of the policy. The banned policy allowed strip searches for factors such as being a known gang member or having prior escape charges. (Orange County Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
DRUG TEST

Estate of Allen v. City of Rockford, 349 F.3d 1015 (7th Cir. 2003). A pretrial detainee sued a city and several police officers under § 1983, alleging due process violations stemming from unwanted medical treatment received at a hospital following her arrest for driving under the influence of drugs. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the officers owed the detainee a duty of care and safety during the time that the detainee was at the hospital, and that the officers' failure to intervene with the forcible medical treatment of the detainee did not violate her due process rights. The officers had taken the detainee to a hospital for the purpose of obtaining a urine sample. An emergency room physician stated that the detainee was not competent to make medical decisions regarding her health and might suffer a potentially life-threatening drug overdose if a drug screen was not conducted. The officers did not prevent the forcible extraction of blood and urine samples. (City of Rockford, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
DNA

Jimenez v. New Jersey, 245 F.Supp.2d 584 (D.N.J. 2003). An arrestee whose charges were subsequently dropped, brought a state court action alleging violation of his constitutional rights and various state court claims. The case was removed to the federal district court, where it was dismissed. The district court held that the arrestee had no due process right to pre-trial DNA testing, and therefore officers could not be held liable under § 1983. The arrestee had been held for 22 months, during which time he asked for DNA testing, asserting it would prove him innocent of the charges. (Atlantic County, New Jersey)

U.S. District Court
CELL SEARCH

Koger v. Snyder, 252 F.Supp.2d 723 (C.D.Ill. 2003). A state prisoner brought an action alleging violation of his rights in connection with the search and seizure of various documents in his cell, and his subsequent transfer to a different prison. The district court held that the search of the prisoner's cell and the seizure of documents did not violate the Fourth Amendment, where the search was undertaken when homemade weapons were found in another nearby cell, and other cells in the same area of the prison were searched. The court found that the prisoner's writings related to jail house lawyering were not entitled to any greater protections than other inmate-to-inmate communications. According to the court, the prisoner did not have a constitutionally protected right to remain in a particular prison and his lateral transfer to another prison, based on a warden's legitimate penological reasons, did not violate the prisoner's rights. The warden transferred the prisoner to send a message to the prison population that violation of the excess property rules would not be tolerated. (Danville Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
VISITOR SEARCHES
BODY CAVITY

Lynn v. O'Leary, 264 F.Supp.2d 306 (D.Md. 2003). An arrestee sued state prison officials, alleging that he was subjected to an unlawful arrest, excessive force, and an illegal cavity search. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants in part, and denied it in part. The court held that officials were not entitled to governmental official immunity, under state law, in light of allegations that the officials acted with malice or were grossly negligent when they allegedly searched the arrestee's cavities while he was attempting to visit his son, after the officials informed the arrestee that a drug dog had falsely alerted on him. The arrestee had arrived at a state prison with his wife, intending to visit his son who was an inmate. While he was waiting to be admitted to the visiting area, a search dog was brought into the area and canvassed the room on a long leash. The dog gave a positive alert for drugs and the arrestee was subjected to a pat down search and his visitor locker was searched. No drugs were found on his person or in his locker and he was told that the dog had made a false alert. But he was not allowed to visit, and waited in lobby while his wife visited their son. After the visit prison officials ordered the arrestee into a side room where his wife heard him scream in pain. He informed the officials that he suffered from a medical condition. He was informed that he was under arrest and that he would be subjected to a strip and body cavity search, and the arrestee demanded that a warrant be produced. His clothes were forcibly removed and no contraband was found. $2,000 was taken from his wallet and divided among the prison officials. His person was then searched, including a body cavity examination. While he was dressing after the search one officer jerked up the arrestee's left leg, causing him to fall off a chair and hit his head against a wall, and he was knocked unconscious. He was taken to a hospital where he was found to be suffering from a contusion to his brain, and injury to his back, shoulder and arm. He was permanently banned from visiting his son. (Maryland House of Corrections Annex, Jessup, Maryland)

U.S. District Court
BODY CAVITY

Omar v. Casterline, 288 F.Supp.2d 775 (W.D.La. 2003). A detainee brought a Bivens suit alleging that federal prison officials subjected him to an unconstitutional search and failed to accommodate his religious needs. The district court held that a body cavity search conducted upon the detainee's arrival at a federal institution did not violate the Fourth Amendment, even though a female officer was present and officers allegedly ridiculed the detainee during the search. The district court denied summary judgment for the defendants on the detainee's religious claims. The detainee alleged that he informed the facility chaplain about his dietary restrictions, was served pork, could not see a clock from his cell, and was misinformed about the starting date of Ramadan. (United States Penitentiary, Pollock, Louisiana)

U.S. District Court
DNA

Padgett v. Ferrero, 294 F.Supp.2d 1338 (N.D.Ga. 2003). Convicted felons brought an action for injunctive relief seeking to have a Georgia law requiring DNA sampling of all convicted felons declared unconstitutional. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court held that the DNA sampling law was not an unreasonable search and seizure, did not violate the convicted felons' privacy rights, did not violate the ex post facto clause, and did not violate due process. (George Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCH

Perkins v. Brown, 285 F.Supp.2d 279 (E.D.N.Y. 2003). An inmate brought a pro se § 1983 action alleging use of excessive force by corrections officers and failure to provide medical care. The district court held that the inmate would be treated as a pretrial detainee. The court granted summary judgment in favor of the officers. The court held that the officers did not use excessive force against the detainee when they forcibly undressed and searched him in a courthouse holding cell. The court found that the detainee's injuries were minor and noted that he was taken to the courthouse infirmary immediately after he was injured. (New York City Department of Correction, Brooklyn Criminal Courthouse)

U.S. District Court
BODY CAVITY
PRIVACY

Roland v. Murphy, 289 F.Supp.2d 321 (E.D.N.Y. 2003). A female county inmate sued corrections officers under § 1983 alleging that they improperly subjected her to a body cavity search. The district court denied the officers' motion for judgment on the pleadings, finding that the inmate had complied with the requirements of the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA) by informally exhausting administrative remedies. The court noted that the inmate had informed sheriff's department internal affairs staff and the district attorney's office about the allegedly illegal search, triggering investigations that recommended dismissal of her case. The inmate alleged that she was subjected to a body cavity search that was conducted in an inappropriate manner at an inappropriate location. The inmate admitted that officers discovered contraband during a search of her cell and that she had attempted to hide contraband pills in her underpants in the past. She did not contest the necessity for the search, but objected to the manner in which it was conducted. The inmate claimed that the search was conducted in her cell by four female officers, in full view of three male officers who observed her private parts and made related crude remarks. (Nassau County Correctional Center, New York)

U.S. District Court
BODY CAVITY

Skundor v. McBride, 280 F.Supp.2d 524 (S.D.W.Va. 2003). An inmate brought claims against corrections officials, challenging visual body cavity searches. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court held that the prison practice of performing visual body cavity searches when dangerous, sequestered prisoners left a recreation area, was rationally related to the legitimate penological objective of staff safety and did not violate the prisoners' Fourth Amendment rights. The court noted that there was a potential for the exchange of weapons in the recreation area, and that prisoner privacy was addressed by using only male staff to perform the searches, and positioning the staff between the inmate and anyone else who might view him. According to the court, the searches were an efficient way to steadily process the large number of inmates seeking recreation, and there were no readily available alternatives to the recreation yard searches. (Mount Olive Correctional Center, West Virginia)

U.S. Appeals Court
BODY CAVITY SEARCH
PRIVACY

Stewart v. Lyles, 66 Fed.Appx. 18 (7th Cir. 2003). [unpublished] A state inmate brought suit under § 1983 alleging that prison officers violated his constitutional rights by conducting a strip search in a public place, and then escalating the invasiveness of the search when he complained. The district court dismissed the complaint and recorded a "strike" against the inmate under the in forma pauperis statute. The inmate appealed and the appeals court vacated and remanded. The court held that the inmate stated a valid Eighth Amendment claim by alleging that the body cavity searches were not motivated by security or compliance concerns, but instead grew out of a malicious desire to harass him. The court also found that the inmate stated a retaliation claim under the First Amendment by alleging that officers singled him out for body cavity searches because he protested allegedly improper strip searches. (Stateville Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCH

Thomas v. City of Clanton, 285 F.Supp.2d 1275 (M.D.Ala. 2003). A detainee brought a § 1983 action alleging that he was subjected to an unconstitutional strip search, and that he had been subjected to sexual harassment while confined. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court held that the strip search violated the detainee's Fourth Amendment rights, but that officials were not liable for the unwarranted strip search conducted by an officer. The court also held that a single complaint of sexual misconduct against an officer did not put the police department on notice of the need for increased supervision of the officer. The detainee was a passenger in a car in which marijuana was found, but the driver's wife had told the arresting officer that the marijuana belonged to the driver. There was no reasonable suspicion that the detainee was concealing a weapon, but he was subjected to a strip search anyway. The detainee had been taken to the police station where he was never booked, but was subjected to a strip search that was conducted in a bathroom. The detainee was then taken to the officer's home where the officer discussed oral sex. The detainee fled from the officer's home. The court noted that the officer's violation of the detainee's rights was deliberate, and that no amount of training would have prevented the violation. The court also noted that the police chief had attempted to investigate an earlier complaint of sexual misconduct lodged against the officer. (City of Clanton, Alabama)

U.S. Appeals Court
PROBATIONERS

U.S. v. Brown, 346 F.3d 808 (8th Cir. 2003). A defendant appealed his conviction for possessing cocaine with the intent to distribute. The appeals court affirmed the conviction, finding that the search of the defendant's residence did not violate the Fourth Amendment. According to the court, a probation officer had reasonable suspicion that the defendant was subject to a probationary search condition and was violating the terms of his probation, so that the search of his residence conducted by the probation officer with the assistance of drug task force agents was appropriate. (Arkansas)

U.S. District Court
DNA

U.S. v. Stegman, 295 F.Supp.2d 542 (D.Md. 2003). The government filed a notice of violation of conditions of supervised release after an offender refused to comply with a probation officer's order to submit a blood specimen pursuant to the DNA Analysis Backlog Elimination Act. The offender moved to dismiss the case and the district court denied the motion. The court held that the application of the Act did not violate the Ex Post Facto Clause, did not violate the Fourth Amendment, did not violate the separation of powers doctrine, and did not violate the offender's double jeopardy rights. (Maryland)

U.S. Appeals Court
DNA

Velasquez v. Woods, 329 F.3d 420 (5th Cir. 2003). A prisoner brought a civil rights action challenging the collection of a DNA sample by prison officials, as part of registration for a DNA database pursuant to state law. The district court dismissed the complaint as frivolous and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the collection of the DNA sample from the prisoner did not violate the prisoner's Fourth Amendment rights. The court also held that officials did not violate the prisoner's due process rights by refusing to expunge false information from his prison record. (Texas)

U.S. District Court
DNA

Vore v. U.S. Dept. of Justice, 281 F.Supp.2d 1129 (D.Ariz. 2003). A federal prisoner who was forced to provide a DNA sample under the DNA Analysis Backlog Elimination Act of 2000, sought declaratory and injunctive relief, alleging that the Act violated his rights under the ex post facto clause and under the Fourth and Fifth Amendments. The district court held that non-consensual extraction of DNA from the prisoner was required under the Act, which did not violate the prisoner's Fifth Amendment self-incrimination rights, his Fifth Amendment due process rights, nor the ex post facto clause. (U.S. District Court, Arizona)

U.S. Appeals Court
STRIP SEARCH

Williams v. Kaufman County, 352 F.3d 994 (5th Cir. 2003). Detainees brought a § 1983 action against a sheriff and county, alleging violation of their civil rights during the execution of a search warrant at a night club. The district court entered judgment against the defendants and they appealed. The appeals court held that the strip searches of the detainees were unlawful, absent individualized suspicion or probable cause, and that the law on this matter was clearly established at the time of the searches. The court found that the prolonged detention of the detainees was unlawful, but that the law was not clearly established at the time of the detention and the district court had properly granted qualified immunity to the defendants on the unlawful detention claims. The court held that the detainees established the county's municipal liability for their strip search and detention, and that the district court did not err in imposing nominal damages of $100 per plaintiff. The searches and detention were conducted according to a sheriff department's unwritten policy for executing "hazardous" warrants, according to the court. The appeals court found that the record supported the district court's conclusion that the sheriff acted with reckless indifference toward the plaintiffs' constitutional rights, justifying an award of punitive damages, and held that punitive damage awards of $15,000 per plaintiff were not excessive. The plaintiffs had been held for three hours and were subjected to highly intrusive strip searches, and the sheriff kept the plaintiffs handcuffed after they had been searched and no weapons or contraband had been found. (Kaufman County, Texas)

U.S. District Court
PRETRIAL DETAINEE
STRIP SEARCH

Wood v. Hancock County, 245 F.Supp.2d 231 (D.Me. 2003). A misdemeanor arrestee brought a civil rights action against a county and county officials, alleging he was subjected to unconstitutional strip searches while in jail. The district court denied the defendants' motions for judgment on the pleadings or for summary judgment. The court held that the arrestee stated a claim, precluding judgment on the pleadings. The court found that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of fact as to whether the jail policy of strip searching misdemeanor arrestees after contact visits was reasonable, and whether the jail had a custom of conducting strip searches upon admission. The court noted that further proceedings were needed to determine if it was a "custom" to strip search misdemeanor arrestees without reasonable suspicion that an arrestee harbored contraband or weapons, and that evidence suggested that officers did not comply with recording requirements for strip searches. (Hancock County Jail, Maine)

U.S. Appeals Court
STRIP SEARCH
VISIT

Wood v. Hancock County Sheriff's Dept., 354 F.3d 57 (1st Cir. 2003). A jail inmate sought damages under § 1983, alleging he was unconstitutionally strip searched on three separate occasions by correctional officers. The district court entered judgment in favor of the defendants and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, vacated in part, and remanded for a partial new trial. The appeals court held that a jury instruction that incorrectly defined a strip search, improperly limited the jury's deliberations on the nature of the searches of the misdemeanor detainee. The court found the district court's use of the term "deliberate," when describing a strip search, unduly directed the jurors to the officers' subjective intent, and that other elements of the definition (scrutiny of the mouth and armpits) were not prerequisites for finding that a strip search took place. The court noted that an individual detained on a misdemeanor charge may only be strip searched as part of the booking process if officers have reasonable suspicion that he is either armed or carrying contraband. According to the court, a blanket policy of strip-searching inmates after contact visits is constitutional, except in atypical circumstances. (Hancock County Jail, Maine)

2004

U.S. District Court
EMPLOYEE
VISITOR

Allegheny County Prison Emp. v. County of Allegh., 315 F.Supp.2d 728 (W.D.Pa. 2004). Employees at a county jail brought a suit challenging its employee search policy, which involved random pat-down searches by same sex employees of all areas of the searched employee's body. including the abdomen and groin, as well as the removal of outer clothing, shoes and belts. The employees moved for a preliminary injunction. The district court denied the motion, finding that the employees failed to demonstrate the likelihood of success on their Fourth Amendment or equal protection claims. The court noted that the county had a strong government interest in controlling the flow of contraband into prisons, and that employees had a diminished expectation of privacy because they worked in a correctional facility. The search policy was uniformly applied to all employees and visitors who had contact with inmates. (Allegheny County Prison, Pennsylvania)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCH

George v. City of Wichita, 348 F.Supp.2d 1232 (D.Kan. 2004). An arrestee brought a § 1983 action against a city and a city detective alleging violations of his constitutional rights. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court held that the strip search to which the arrestee was subjected after being arrested for a violent felony and booked into jail, did not violate his Fourth Amendment or due process rights. There was no evidence that the arrestee was subjected to anything beyond a visual examination or that he was intrusively touched by jail officials as part of the search. The court noted that the search was apparently conducted in an appropriate room and in an appropriate manner, and that the facility had a legitimate interest in preventing detainees charged with violent felonies from bringing weapons or contraband into the facility. (Sedgwick County Detention Facility, Kansas)

U.S. Appeals Court
DNA

Green v. Berge, 354 F.3d 675 (7th Cir. 2004). State prison inmates brought a Fourth Amendment challenge to a state law requiring those who were convicted of felonies to furnish DNA samples for storage in a data bank. The district court dismissed the action and the inmates appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the state law comported with the Fourth Amendment's reasonable requirement under the "special needs" doctrine. The court noted that the inmates had no misunderstanding about the purpose of the samples or their potential use, and that the law was narrowly drawn and served an important state interest. (Wisconsin Supermax Penitentiary)

U.S. Appeals Court
DNA

Groceman v. U.S. Dept. of Justice, 354 F.3d 411 (5th Cir. 2004). Prisoners convicted of armed robberies sought to enjoin federal entities from collecting and retaining samples of their DNA under the provisions of the DNA Analysis Backlog Elimination Act. The district court dismissed the complaint for failure to state a claim and the prisoners appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that persons incarcerated after conviction retain no constitutional privacy interest against their correct identification. The court found the DNA Act to be reasonable under the Fourth Amendment. (United States District Court for the Northern District of Texas)

U.S. District Court
BODY SEARCH
PRIVACY

Lay v. Porker, 371 F.Supp.2d 1159 (C.D.Cal. 2004). A state prison inmate brought a pro se § 1983 Fourth Amendment action against a corrections officer, alleging that he had been subjected to an overly intrusive body search in the presence of a female officer. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the officer. The court held that the officer's alleged subjection of the inmate to a needlessly intrusive unclothed body cavity search in the presence of a female officer violated the Fourth Amendment, but the officer was entitled to qualified immunity because there was no clearly established right of inmates to be free from bodily exposure to officers of the opposite sex at the time of the search. (California Men's Colony)

U.S. Appeals Court
PRIVACY
STRIP SEARCHES

Mills v. City of Barbourville, 389 F.3d 568 (6th Cir. 2004). An arrestee brought a § 1983 action claiming that her constitutional rights were violated when a male jailer saw her bare chest during a search at the jail after her arrest. The district court dismissed some of the defendants and granted summary judgment in favor of the remaining defendants, and the arrestee appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The appeals court held that the fact that a male jail employee may have seen the arrestee's bare breasts accidentally as he was walking by while the arrestee was being searched, was not a Fourth Amendment violation in the absence of any evidence that either the normal search policy was unconstitutional or that the search was carried out in an unconstitutional manner. The court noted that the search was conducted by female jailers. (Knox County Jail, Kentucky)

U.S. Appeals Court
PAROLEES

Moore v. Vega, 371 F.3d 110 (2nd Cir. 2004). A homeowner brought a § 1983 action against state parole officers, alleging that the officers violated her Fourth Amendment right to be free from unreasonable searches when they entered her home without a warrant to search for an absconded parolee who they had been informed was residing there. The district court denied the officers' motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity and they appealed. The appeals court vacated and remanded with instructions. The appeals court held that the officers' warrantless entry into the homeowner's residence was unreasonable and violated the homeowner's rights, but the officers were entitled to qualified immunity because they were entitled under the "special needs" doctrine and state parole rules and regulations to search the home of a parolee without probable cause or a warrant. (Division of Parole, State of New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
STRIP SEARCH
JUVENILE

N.G. v. Connecticut, 382 F.3d 225 (2nd Cir. 2004). Parents of two female juveniles brought a suit under § 1983 for damages and injunctive relief, alleging that strip searches of the juveniles in juvenile detention facilities violated their Fourth Amendment rights. After a bench trial, the district court dismissed the complaint. The juveniles appealed. The appeals court vacated and remanded. The appeals court held that strip searches conducted on female juveniles after their transfer from one detention facility to another were unlawful because they were undertaken after the juveniles had been initially searched and had remained in custody. The court found that a strip search of a juvenile to determine whether the juvenile had taken a missing pencil required reasonable suspicion that the juvenile possessed the pencil. The court held that strip searches performed upon juveniles' initial admission to state detention facilities did not violate the Fourth Amendment because the state had an enhanced responsibility to take reasonable action to protect them from hazards resulting from the presence of contraband, even though they had not been convicted of any crime and were not confined awaiting trial on criminal charges. (Girls Detention Center, Connecticut)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCH
BODY CAVITY
SEARCH

Powell v. Cusimano, 326 F.Supp.2d 322 (D.Conn. 2004). A former state prisoner brought a civil rights action against eight employees of the state corrections department. The district court entered summary judgment in favor of the employees. The court held that a corrections department administrative directive requiring that a strip and visual body cavity search be conducted upon placement in a restrictive housing, protective custody or close custody unit, was reasonable on its face. The court also held that the strip search of the prisoner when he was placed in restrictive housing was reasonably conducted, where the search was not accompanied by verbal abuse and the number of officers present during the strip search was not excessive in light of the prisoner's prior resistance to the escort to segregation. (Walker Reception and Special Management Unit, Connecticut)

U.S. Appeals Court
STRIP SEARCH

Shain v. Ellison, 356 F.3d 211 (2nd Cir. 2004). A misdemeanor detainee in a county correctional facility challenged a blanket policy that required strip searches of all detainees, regardless of the nature of the crime for which they were detained. The detainee sought a declaration that the policy was unconstitutional, monetary damages, and injunctive relief. The district court entered judgment in favor of the detainee and awarded $1 in nominal damages. The parties appealed and the appeals court affirmed in part, and remanded on the issue of injunctive relief. On remand, the district court granted injunctive relief to the detainee and the defendants again appealed. The appeals court vacated and remanded, finding that the detainee lacked standing to seek prospective injunctive relief because he failed to show that he was likely to be rearrested or that he would be remanded to the county correctional facility overnight if he was rearrested. The court noted that the county had implemented a new policy that required reasonable suspicion that a detainee is concealing contraband to justify a search. (Nassau County Correctional Center, N.Y.)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCHES
JUVENILE

Smook v. Minnehaha County, 340 F.Supp.2d 1037 (D.S.D. 2004). Former detainees at a county juvenile detention center brought a § 1983 action challenging the center's policy of strip-searching all juveniles admitted to the facility, regardless of the seriousness of the charged offense or the existence of suspicion. The court granted partial summary judgment in favor of the detainees. The court held that the suspicionless strip-searches of all juveniles could not be based on the officials' state statutory duty to report child abuse or neglect, where the duty to report was not a duty to detect, and any interest the officials had in detecting abuse was outweighed by the detainees' privacy interests. According to the court, the strip-search of non-felony detainees violated their rights to freedom from unreasonable searches, even though the center had implemented a policy requiring a two-hour grace period before a search. The court found that the officials' legitimate security interest in preventing the introduction of weapons and contraband was outweighed by the severe privacy intrusion entailed by the searches, given the lack of evidence of more than minimal smuggling of weapons and contraband into the facility. The court found a Fourth Amendment violation when a female detainee who was arrested for a curfew violation was strip-searched, even though she was permitted to keep her bra and underwear on, because the offense was not normally associated with weapons or drugs, there was no suspicion that the detainee was carrying or concealing a weapon or contraband and there was no indication of a prior delinquency record. (Minnehaha County Juvenile Detention Center, South Dakota)

U.S. Appeals Court
STRIP SEARCH
URINE TEST

Whitman v. Nesic, 368 F.3d 931 (7th Cir. 2004). A prisoner brought suit under § 1983 alleging that a strip search to which he was subjected constituted cruel and unusual punishment under the Eighth Amendment. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court held that the strip search of the prisoner in conjunction with a random drug testing program did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment, in spite of the prisoner's assertions that he felt humiliated, particularly by the 20-minute period he remained naked in a bathroom stall until he could produce a urine sample. (Racine Correctional Institution, Wisconsin)

U.S. District Court
PAROLEES

Wilson v. City of Fountain Valley, 372 F.Supp.2d 1178 (C.D.Cal. 2004). A parolee brought an action under § 1983 alleging that a state parole agent and police officers violated his constitutional rights by searching his residence. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants in part. The court held that the parole agent and officers had a reasonable suspicion that the parolee, who was a registered sex offender, was engaged in criminal activity based on a female's complaint that he was stalking her, which was consistent with the parolee's prior pattern of conduct. (City of Fountain Valley, California)

2005

U.S. District Court
URINE TEST

Alicea v. Howell, 387 F.Supp.2d 227 (W.D.N.Y. 2005). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against prison personnel, alleging constitutional violations in connection with a prison disciplinary proceeding. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court held that the inmate's limited due process right to legal assistance was not violated, where he was provided with the assistance of a prison teacher and stated at a disciplinary hearing that he was satisfied with the assistance that he had received from her. The court concluded that the hearing officer was not biased against the inmate, and that there was some evidence to support the hearing officer's determination that the inmate was guilty of using drugs. The inmate had tested positive on a urinalysis test and corrections officers testified that the inmate had been given a clean, freshly-packaged sample jar. The court held that the due process clause did not require the hearing officer to call a facility physician to testify about whether it would have been possible for the inmate to produce urine containing a powdery substance. According to the court, the inmate never requested that a physician be called as a witness, and the officer who conducted the urinalysis testified that he sometimes received urine samples that were cloudy, and that substances causing the cloudiness would generally settle out after a while. (Orleans County Correctional Facility, New York State Department of Correctional Services)

U.S. District Court
PRETRIAL DETAINEE
STRIP SEARCH

Calvin v. Sheriff of Will County, 405 F.Supp.2d 933 (N.D.Ill. 2005). County inmates sued a sheriff under § 1983 alleging that a strip search policy violated the Fourth Amendment. The court granted summary judgment in favor of the inmates. The court held that the blanket policy of strip-searching persons arrested on failure-to-appear (FTA) warrants in misdemeanor traffic cases violated the Fourth Amendment. The court also found a Fourth Amendment violation in the blanket policy of strip-searching persons who were returned to jail for processing after being ordered released on traffic or misdemeanor charges, absent individualized suspicion or probable cause that a person was concealing contraband or weapons. The court noted that the searches were unconstitutional, even though arrestees had been given an opportunity to post bond before the searches, and notwithstanding that persons arrested on FTA warrants were intermingled with the general population. (Will County Adult Detention Facility, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
FRISK SEARCH

Conyers v. Abitz, 416 F.3d 580 (7th Cir. 2005). A state prison inmate brought a § 1983 action against prison officials, challenging a search imposed on him when he left a prison chapel. The inmate also claimed that prison officials hindered his observance of a religious fast, violating his right to religious exercise. The district court granted summary judgment for the officials on the ground that the inmate failed to his exhaust his claims. The inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, and vacated and remanded in part. The court held that any Fourth Amendment privacy interest that the inmate had in not being frisked upon leaving a prison chapel was insufficient to overcome the judicial deference generally afforded to prison officials when they are evaluating what is necessary to preserve institutional order and discipline. The court noted that the officials produced evidence that they had a legitimate security interest in frisking inmates as they left the prison chapel because the chapel was a hotbed of contraband exchanges. The court held that summary judgment was barred by fact issues as to whether prison officials had sufficient reasons to ignore the inmate's request to participate in a religious fast, which was made after an administrative deadline. The court found that the inmate's procedural shortcoming of failing to follow the prison's time deadlines for filing a grievance only amounts to a failure to exhaust administrative remedies, as required by the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA), if prison administrators specifically relied on that shortcoming. (Illinois)

U.S. District Court
PAT SEARCH

Davis v. Castleberry, 364 F.Supp.2d 319 (W.D.N.Y. 2005). An inmate brought a civil rights action against a corrections officer who allegedly touched his penis during a pat frisk, and prison employees who investigated and denied his grievance. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants. The court held that even assuming that the officer touched the inmate's penis during a pat frisk performed before the inmate entered a prison exercise yard, the conduct did not violate the Eighth Amendment because it was proper for the officer to have conducted the search and such a search could involve the genital area. The court noted that inmate grievance procedures are not even constitutionally required, and therefore an inmate's mere disagreement with the outcome of his grievance will not give rise to a constitutional claim. (Southport Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
DNA

Doe v. Moore, 410 F.3d 1337 (11th Cir. 2005). Florida sex offenders filed a class action challenging the constitutionality of Florida's sex offender registration and notification scheme and its DNA collection statute. The district court dismissed the action and the offenders appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the registration and notification scheme did not violate the offenders' substantive due process rights or the Equal Protection Clause. The court found that the Sex Offender Act did not unreasonably burden the offenders' right to travel. The court also held that the DNA collection statute did not give rise to substantive due process rights. (State of Florida)

U.S. District Court
EMPLOYEE
VEHICLE

Fraternal Order of Police/Dept. v. Washington, 394 F.Supp.2d 7 (D.D.C. 2005). A police labor committee and correctional officers in leadership positions with the committee sued a corrections department, challenging the constitutionality of searches of their lockers and automobiles during a shakedown of the detention facility. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court held that the checkpoint seizure of correctional officers' cars at the entrance to a jail's parking lot were not unconstitutional, where the officers were requested to sign consent forms to have their vehicles searched or to park elsewhere. The court noted that the jail was a maximum-security facility and keeping contraband out of the jail was an imperative, and the purpose of the checkpoint was to afford an opportunity to inform officers of the activity, present consent forms, and search the vehicles of who consented. The court held that the searches of cars were not unconstitutional under the Fourth Amendment where the officers consented to the searches by signing consent forms that stated in clear and unambiguous language that the officers could deny the search at any time. According to the court, searches of correctional officers' lockers were not unreasonable under the Fourth Amendment, where the searches were conducted in the early morning hours by correctional officers of the same gender as the officers whose lockers were being searched, and the lockers were provided by the corrections department for the convenience of correctional officers. The court noted that the assigned officer and Director of the department had keys to each locker, and that locker assignments could be changed without notice by the Director. Prison regulations clearly stated that a condition of employment was that all personnel submit to a search of their person, or automobile, or place of assignment on government property, when such a search was required by department officials. (Central Detention Facility, District of Columbia)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCH

Gonzalez v. Narcato, 363 F.Supp.2d 486 (E.D.N.Y. 2005). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against prison officials, alleging violation of his First and Fourth Amendment rights. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants. The court held that the prison officials' decision to prevent the inmate from attending a ceremony in the prison chapel conducted by a Catholic cardinal was reasonable and therefore did not violate the inmate's First Amendment rights to petition the government for redress of grievances. The court found that a corrections department policy that required all inmates being admitted to a solitary housing unit (SHU) to undergo a strip frisk search to assure they had no contraband was reasonable and did not violate the inmate's Fourth Amendment right to be free from unreasonable searches. (Arthur Kill Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
BLOOD TESTS
DNA

Henderson v. Belfueil, 354 F.Supp.2d 889 (W.D.Wis. 2005). A prison inmate brought a civil rights suit against a police detective who took a blood sample from the inmate as part of a criminal investigation of a prison assault. The district court granted summary judgment for the detective in part, and denied it in part. The court held that the detective did not violate the Eighth Amendment in having the inmate's blood drawn, where the sample was not taken to cause the inmate pain, but rather to further legitimate penal and law enforcement interests. The court found that fact issues as to whether the inmate consented to the blood draw precluded summary judgment on the inmate's Fourth Amendment claim. (Redgranite Corr'l Institution, Wisconsin)

U.S. Appeals Court
STRIP SEARCH

Hicks v. Moore, 422 F.3d 1246 (11th Cir. 2005). A former pretrial detainee brought an action challenging strip search practices at a county jail. The district court denied immunity for the defendants and they appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The court held that the mere fact that a detainee was to be placed in the jail's general population did not justify a strip search, but that reasonable suspicion existed for the plaintiff's strip search because he had been charged with a family violence battery offense. The court noted that battery is a crime of violence that would permit the inference that the detainee might be concealing weapons or contraband. (Habersham County Jail, Georgia)

U.S. District Court
CELL SEARCH

Lashley v. Wakefield, 367 F.Supp.2d 461 (W.D.N.Y. 2005). A prison inmate sued officials claiming deprivation of his Eighth Amendment rights. The district court entered partial summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by material issues of fact as to whether prison officers subjected the inmate to lockdown, frequent cell searches and other forms of discipline, in retaliation for his work as a prison library clerk and his filing of numerous grievances. The court noted that prison inmates are protected, under the Eighth Amendment, from cell searches that lack any legitimate penological interest and are solely intended to harass. The inmate had been assisting other inmates with legal research and writing in the prison library. (Five Points Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCH

McRoy v. Cook County Dept. of Corrections, 366 F.Supp.2d 662 (N.D.Ill. 2005). A Muslim inmate at a county correctional facility brought a civil rights action under § 1983, alleging that his opportunities to practice his faith were restricted in violation of the Free Exercise Clause of the First Amendment. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court also found no violation in the policy of strip-searching inmates when they were leaving or returning to an inmate area, noting that the inmate could choose not to attend a service because of the policy and could pray in his cell or common area instead. (Cook County Department of Corrections, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCH

Morrison v. Cortright, 397 F.Supp.2d 424 (W.D.N.Y. 2005). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against a correctional officer and sergeant, alleging that the manner in which he was strip-searched violated his Eighth Amendment rights. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court held that the officer's alleged conduct in performing the strip-search was not objectively sufficiently serious to rise to the level of an Eighth Amendment violation. The inmate alleged that the officer shined his flashlight into the inmate's anus and ran his middle finger between the inmate's buttocks in a wiping fashion, causing the inmate to urinate on himself. The inmate also alleged that the officer rubbed his genital area against the inmate's buttocks. (Attica Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
VEHICLE

Neumeyer v. Beard, 421 F.3d 210 (3rd Cir. 2005). Prison visitors filed a § 1983 action seeking a declaration that the prison's practice of subjecting visitors' vehicles to random searches violated their constitutional rights. The district court entered summary judgment in favor of the defendants and the visitors appealed. The appeals court affirmed, holding that the prison's practice of engaging in suspicionless searches of prison visitors' vehicles was valid under the special needs doctrine. According to the court, the relatively minor inconvenience of the searches, balanced against the prison officials' special need to maintain the security and safety of the prison, rose beyond their general need to enforce the law. The court noted that some inmates have outside work details and may have access to the vehicles. The prison had posted large signs at all entranceways to the prison and immediately in front of the visitors' parking lot that stated "...all persons, vehicles and personal property entering or brought on these grounds are subject to search..." Visitors are asked to sign a Consent to Search Vehicle form before a search is conducted and if they refuse they are denied entry into the prison and are asked to leave the premises. (State Correctional Institution at Huntingdon, Pennsylvania)

U.S. Appeals Court
DNA

Nicholas v. Goord, 430 F.3d 652 (2nd Cir. 2005). Convicted felons brought a § 1983 action against state officials and others, arguing that a state DNA-database statute violated their Fourth Amendment rights. The district court dismissed the action and the felons appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the extraction and analysis of convicted felons' blood for DNA-indexing purposes constituted a search that implicated the Fourth Amendment, but that this search was justified under the "special needs" exception. (N.Y. State Dep't. Correctional Services)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCH

Nilsen v. York County, 382 F.Supp.2d 206 (D.Me. 2005). County jail inmates brought a class action suit against a county, claiming that the practice of forced disrobing of all incoming inmates, in the presence of an officer, was an unauthorized strip search. The parties submitted a proposed settlement for court approval. The district court approved the settlement, in part. The court found that the practice of having inmates remove their clothing in the presence of an officer was the equivalent of a strip search conducted without cause. The county agreed to create a $3.3 million settlement fund, from which members of the class would be compensated. The court approved higher "incentive" payments of $6,500 to the first class representative, and $5,500 and $5,000 to the other two class representatives, noting that they put considerable time into the case and were required to give embarrassing deposition testimony. They also received unfavorable publicity regarding their arrest and humiliation, due to the small size of the county and the ease of their recognition. The court noted that a privacy factor was strong in this case, and that requiring individual class members to prove damages would stifle individuals who are too embarrassed to discuss their searches. The court rejected the proposal that would have awarded twice as much to females. The proposal had been based on the assertion that females had two areas of the body subject to privacy protection. The county contended, even when the settlement was offered, that its policy was constitutional because the officers were looking for contraband in the clothing and were not intentionally viewing arrestees' naked bodies. (York Co. Jail, Maine)

U.S. Appeals Court
DNA

Padgett v. Donald, 401 F.3d 1273 (11th Cir. 2005). Incarcerated felons brought an action seeking injunctive relief, asking the court to find a state statute requiring DNA sampling of all convicted felons unconstitutional. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants and the felons appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held the statute did not violate the prisoners' rights to privacy under the state constitution nor under the Fourteenth Amendment. The court found that the state's legitimate interest in creating a permanent identification record of convicted felons for law enforcement purposes outweighed the minor intrusion involved in taking prisoners' saliva samples and storing their DNA profiles, given the prisoners' reduced expectation of privacy in their identities. (Georgia Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCH

Powell v. Barrett, 376 F.Supp.2d 1340 (N.D.Ga. 2005). Former detainees at a county jail initiated a class action complaining about "blanket strip searches" conducted on inmates when they initially entered or returned to the jail. The detainees also alleged that they were detained beyond their scheduled release dates. The district court dismissed the action in part, and denied dismissal in part. The court granted qualified to immunity to the sheriffs with respect to the Fourth Amendment claims challenging the jails search policy, which required detainees to submit to a visual "front and back" inspection upon leaving a shower, without regard to reasonable suspicion. An arrested individual would be assigned to a room with thirty or forty other arrestees, asked to remove his clothing, and instructed to place the clothing in a box. As a group, the arrestees were required to shower and then, standing in a line with others, were visually inspected front and back by deputies. The court found that the policy did not violate clearly established rights of detainees at the time the searches were allegedly performed in 2003 and 2004. The court noted that some of these searches involved persons who were returning from court proceedings and who were entitled to be released from the facility. (Fulton Co Jail, Georgia)

U.S. District Court
CELL SEARCH
PAT SEARCH

Rodriguez v. McClenning, 399 F.Supp.2d 228 (S.D.N.Y. 2005). A prisoner brought a civil rights action alleging that a corrections officer sexually assaulted him during a routine pat-frisk search and retaliated against him for filing a subsequent grievance. The district court denied summary judgment for the officer. According to the court, the prisoner did not have any constitutional right to be free from cell searches of any kind, including retaliatory cell searches. The court found that the prisoner suffered punishment as the result of the officer's alleged retaliatory issuance of a misbehavior report, when he was placed in less desirable housing. (Green Haven Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
JUVENILE
STRIP SEARCH

Smook v. Minnehaha County, S.D., 353 F.Supp.2d 1059 (D.S.D. 2005). Former detainees at a county juvenile detention center brought a § 1983 action challenging the center's policy of strip-searching all juveniles admitted to the facility, regardless of the seriousness of their charged offense or the existence of suspicion. The district court granted partial summary judgment in favor of the detainees and the defendants appealed. The appeals court held that the center's policy of strip searching minors arrest for minor or non-felony offenses, without any individualized determination of reasonable suspicion that the individual was or was likely to be carrying or concealing weapons, drugs or other contraband, violated the Fourth Amendment. The court denied qualified immunity for former and current directors of the detention center. The court noted that there was no demonstration that the incidence of smuggling weapons or contraband into the center was more than minimal, nor that any weapons or contraband could not have been discovered with less invasive searches. (Minnehaha County Juvenile Detention Center, South Dakota)

U.S. Appeals Court
SANITATION
STRIP SEARCH

Surprenant v. Rivas, 424 F.3d 5 (1st Cir. 2005). A pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against a county jail and jail personnel, alleging that he was falsely accused of an infraction, deprived of due process in disciplinary proceedings, and subjected to unconstitutional conditions of confinement. A jury found the defendants liable on three counts and the district court denied judgment as a matter of law for the defendants. The defendants appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held conditions of confinement were shown to be constitutionally deficient, where the detainee was placed in around-the-clock segregation with the exception of a five-minute shower break every third day, all hygiene items were withheld from him, he could only access water--including water to flush his toilet--at the discretion of individual officers, and was subjected daily to multiple strip searches that required him to place his unwashed hands into his mouth. (Hillsborough County Jail, New Hampshire)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCH

Tardiff v. Knox County, 397 F.Supp.2d 115 (D.Me. 2005). A class action suit was brought against a county, its sheriff, and jail officers claiming that the Fourth Amendment rights of some detainees were violated when they were subjected to strip searches without reasonable suspicion that they were harboring contraband on or within their bodies. The district court held that the county violated the Fourth Amendment by adopting a policy that allowed for strip searches of all detainees alleged to have committed felony offenses, although the sheriff was granted qualified immunity because the law on this matter was not clearly established at the time the policy was implemented. The policy provided for the strip-searching of all detainees alleged to have committed non-violent, non-weapon, non-drug felonies. The court found that the county and the sheriff were liable for a policy that called for the strip searches of detainees alleged to have committed misdemeanors, without reasonable suspicion. According to the court, the sheriff was responsible, in his individual capacity, for Fourth Amendment violations arising from strip searches of all detainees alleged to have committed misdemeanors without a showing of reasonable suspicion that they were harboring contraband on or within their bodies. The court found that the sheriff was aware of the custom of these universal strip searches and did not take effective action to halt the practice. The court noted that specific standards that described which strip searches may be undertaken in jails and prisons had been issued by the state attorney general. The state corrections department had conducted a review of the jail's policy and procedure manual and informed the sheriff that the policy pertaining to body searches needed to be revised to comply with the attorney general's rules for searches. (Knox County Jail, Maine)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCH

Thiel v. Wisconsin, 399 F.Supp.2d 929 (W.D.Wisc. 2005). A detainee held under the Wisconsin Sexually Violent Persons Law (WSVPL) brought a § 1983 action alleging due process violations in connection with his commitment. The district court denied the detainee's motion to proceed in forma pauperis and dismissed the action. The court held that no due process liberty interests were implicated by the manner in which the detainee was treated, either in regard to his commitment, or in regard to trips outside the facility to a county jail for court proceedings. The court found that the maximum security classification imposed on the detainee was an ordinary incident of such confinement and did not pose atypical or significant hardships. The court found no violations with the manner in which the detainee was strip searched, dressed in prison clothes and placed in restraints before being transported to a county jail for court proceedings. (Sand Ridge Secure Treatment Center, Wisconsin)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCH

Thomsen v. Ross, 368 F.Supp.2d 961 (D.Minn. 2005). A detainee brought a § 1983 civil rights action against a county and county employees, alleging he was wrongfully strip searched and suffered a broken hand after he arrested on driving under the influence (DUI) charges. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants in part, and denied it in part. The district court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact regarding the reasonableness of the strip search, and the existence and implementation of a county policy authorizing strip searches for all gross misdemeanant arrestees. (Crow Wing County Jail, Minnesota)

U.S. Appeals Court
PRETRIAL RELEASE

U.S. v. Scott, 424 F.3d 888 (9th Cir. 2005). A defendant who was indicted for unlawfully possessing an unregistered shotgun moved to suppress the shotgun and his statements concerning it. The district court granted the motion and the government appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that warrantless searches, including drug testing, imposed as a condition of pretrial release, required a showing of probable caused despite the defendant's pre-release consent. According to the court, the unconstitutional conditions doctrine limits the government's ability to exact waivers of rights as a condition of benefits, even when those benefits are fully discretionary. The court noted that pat-downs and similar minor intrusions need only be supported by reasonable suspicion. According to the court, searches were not necessary to ensure that the defendant appeared at trial. Among the defendant's conditions of release was his consent to "random" drug testing "any time of the day or night by any peace officer without a warrant," and to having his home searched for drugs "by any peace officer any time day or night without a warrant." (U.S. District Court, Nevada)

U.S. Appeals Court
PAROLEE

U.S. v. Trujillo, 404 F.3d 1238 (10th Cir. 2005). A parolee whose home was searched sought to suppress evidence from the search, which resulted in his conviction of being a felon in possession of a firearm and ammunition. His motion was denied and he appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the parolee's parole agreement was still in effect after he had been placed under arrest, so the warrantless search of his residence did not violate the Fourth Amendment's prohibition against unreasonable searches. (West Valley City Police Department, Utah)

2006

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCH
PRIVACY

Beasley v. City of Sugar Land, 410 F.Supp.2d 524 (S.D.Tex. 2006). An arrestee sued a city under § 1983, claiming she was subjected to a strip search in violation of the Fourth Amendment. The city moved for summary judgment and the district court entered summary judgment for the city. The court held that the municipality's policy of authorizing strip searches only when an official had reasonable suspicion that an arrestee was a threat to facility security, did not violate the Fourth Amendment. The arrestee was cited for driving her mother's car with no driver's license, no current motor vehicle inspection or registration, no insurance, and no license plate light, a few days after her eighteenth birthday. She was summoned to appear in court but mistakenly appeared five days late. She was arrested at her house on a warrant for failure to appear and she was allowed to put on shoes and socks, but was taken to jail in the clothes she was wearing--pajama pants and a cotton shirt with no bra. On the way to the city jail the arresting officer radioed for a female officer to meet him at the jail to perform a search. At the jail a female police officer told the arrestee to stand with her hands against a wall. She instructed the arrestee to lift her shirt and the officer lifted Beasley's breasts to feel beneath them. The officer then instructed the arrestee to drop her pants while continuing to hold up her shirt. The officer pulled the arrestee's panties taut and did a quick two-finger swipe across Beasley's vagina. The male arresting officer allegedly witnessed this search. The arrestee initially alleged that she was subjected to a "strip search and body cavity search," but the court found that her description of the events did not indicate that a body cavity search occurred. (City of Sugar Land, Texas)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCH
PRETRIAL DETAINEE

Dare v. Knox County, 465 F.Supp.2d 17 (D.Me. 2006). In a class action, persons strip-searched by jail officials agreed to a consent decree. The district court approved the agreement, issuing an injunction ensuring compliance with the Fourth Amendment law governing strip searches of certain arrestees. The court enjoined the county from strip searching any persons charged with a crime that does not involve weapons, violence or controlled or scheduled substances during the jail admission process, while they are being held awaiting bail or a first court appearance, or after being arrested on a default or other warrant, unless the officer or person conducting the strip search has reasonable suspicion to believe the person does possess a weapon, controlled or scheduled substances, or other contraband. The court ordered the sheriff and his successors to keep a written log that records every instance in which a newly-admitted individual is subject to a strip search procedure, with the following information: (1) the date and time of the search procedure; (2) the name of each officer participating in the search procedure; (3) a brief statement of facts found to constitute "reasonable suspicion" for a strip search, to include the crime with which the individual was charged; and (4) the name of the officer who made the determination that "reasonable suspicion" warranted a strip search and who approved the search. The agreement also provided for monetary compensation of persons who had been improperly strip-searched. (Knox County Jail, Maine)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCH

Gilanian v. City of Boston, 431 F.Supp.2d 172 (D.Mass. 2006). A detainee brought a civil rights action against a municipality, county, sheriff, and corrections officers alleging that strip searches violated her Fourth Amendment right to be free from unreasonable searches and seizures. The district court denied the detainee's motion, finding that fact issues as to whether the strip search of the detainee was justified and whether the search was conducted in a reasonable manner, precluded summary judgment. The case challenged two strip-searches of the detainee conducted while she was held in pretrial detention, and asserted claims against the City of Boston, Suffolk County, Suffolk County Sheriff Richard Rouse, and two unidentified Suffolk County corrections officers. The court suggested that the trial should focus primarily on the question of whether there was a less restrictive alternative. The court posed questions, including: could the policy change, from strip-searching to segregation, have been implemented at the time of the detainee's second strip-search; what changes, if any, in staffing, space allocation, and budget were necessary for the jail to switch to segregation after the Roberts decision; what less restrictive alternatives, other than segregation, might have been available to the Jail in March 2000; if the switch to segregation was possible in 2001, how far back in time is it proper to assume that the same switch could have been made? (Nashua Street Jail, Suffolk County, Massachusetts)

U.S. Appeals Court
STRIP SEARCH

In re Nassau County Strip Search Cases, 461 F.3d 219 (2d Cir. 2006). Arrestees brought an action against a county and others, challenging the county correctional center's blanket strip search policy for newly-admitted, misdemeanor detainees. The district court denied the plaintiffs' class certification motions, and the plaintiffs appealed. The appeals court reversed in part and remanded in part. The court held that common issues predominated over individual issues as to liability in this case, and the class action device was a superior litigation mechanism as to the issue of liability. (Nassau County Correctional Center, New York)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCH

Jean-Laurent v. Wilkerson, 438 F.Supp.2d 318 (S.D.N.Y. 2006). A detainee in a state facility sued officers and supervisors under § 1983, claiming that he was searched in violation of his due process rights. The district court held that the detainee stated a claim of unconstitutional strip search, under the Fourth Amendment, when he alleged that officers, having conducted a legitimate search in connection with prison-wide strip searches, took him out of his cell and subjected him to a second search, even though he had been in their custody ever since the first search, precluding any hiding of contraband on his person. The court also found that the detainee stated claim that the second of two strip searches violated his First Amendment rights as a Muslim, to avoid being seen naked. The court noted that while first search was in furtherance of a compelling government need to maintain order, allowing the search despite religious objection, there was no compelling government need for the second search. The court held that the detainee stated a claim that officers imposed a substantial burden on the religious exercise of the Muslim inmate, in violation of the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA), by forcing him to submit to the second strip search. (George Motchan Det. Center, New York City)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCHES

Johnson v. District of Columbia, 461 F.Supp.2d 48 (D.D.C. 2006). Pre-presentment arrestees brought a § 1983 action against the District of Columbia, U.S. Marshal's Service, and former U.S. Marshal, alleging that arrestees were subject to blanket strip searches and visual cavity searches without a reasonable individualized suspicion that the arrestees were concealing weapons or contraband. The government defendants moved to dismiss for failure to state a claim. The court denied the defendants' motion to dismiss. The district court held that: (1) arrestees' allegations that the District of Columbia knew, or should have known, that marshals were unconstitutionally strip searching arrestees supported a § 1983 claim as to the District of Columbia; (2) the alleged policy under a former U.S. Marshal, if true, violated the Fourth and Fifth Amendments; (3) the right to be free from a blanket strip-search policy was clearly established; and (4) allegations that a former marshal and District of Columbia acted in concert in developing a policy stated a claim that the marshal was "state actor." The arrestees alleged that there were blanket strip searches and visual cavity searches at Superior Court without a reasonable individualized suspicion, that subjected all female arrestees, but not male arrestees, to blanket strip searches. (District of Columbia and U.S. Marshal for the D.C. Superior Court)

U.S. Appeals Court
URINE TEST
DRUG/ALCOHOL TESTING

Louis v. Department of Correctional Services of Nebraska, 437 F.3d 697 (8th Cir. 2006). Inmates and former inmates brought an action against a state corrections department and various department officials alleging that the method of collecting and testing urine samples for drug use violated their constitutional right to procedural due process. The district court entered judgment in favor of defendants and the inmates appealed. The appeals court found that due process in connection with testing of the inmates' urine for drugs did not require that the inmates sign and seal the specimens after collection, absent evidence that the collection protocols requiring that the collector label and seal the specimens resulted in erroneous deprivations of inmates' good-time credits. According to the court, even if collection procedures did not eliminate all possibility of mislabeled samples, they conformed to the practices used in private-sector workplace drug testing, and were adequate to ensure reasonably reliable results. The court concluded that the refusal of the corrections department to fund confirmatory drug testing of a prisoner's urine sample after initial testing yielded a positive result, when the prisoner denied using illicit drugs, did not violate a prisoner's due process rights. The court noted that the initial testing was 95 percent accurate and that a prisoner had the opportunity to obtain confirmatory testing at an independent laboratory at his own expense. The appeals court upheld the refusal of the corrections department to allow inmates to call lab technicians as witnesses at disciplinary hearings to testify about procedures used for drug testing of inmates' urine samples, finding that this practice did not violate a prisoner's due process rights. The court noted that inmates could present urinalysis laboratory reports prepared by the lab technicians, and the exclusion of technicians' testimony was justified by the department's need to manage the environment of the prison and maximize the productivity of lab technicians. (Nebraska State Penitentiary)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCH

Marriott v. County of Montgomery, 426 F.Supp.2d 1 (N.D.N.Y. 2006.) Arrestees brought suit, individually and on behalf of a class of others similarly situated, against a county sheriff's department, county sheriff, county undersheriff, former county undersheriff, a jail administrator and a lieutenant, challenging the constitutionality of the search policy of the county jail. The district court held that the policy, pursuant to which arrestees being admitted to a county jail were effectively subjected to strip searches, violated the Fourth Amendment and that the arrestees were entitled to permanent injunctive relief. The court found that the arrestees were the "prevailing parties" entitled to an award of attorney fees. According to the court, the Fourth Amendment precludes officials from performing strip searches and/or body cavity searches of arrestees charged with misdemeanors or other minor offenses unless the officials have a reasonable suspicion that the arrestee is concealing weapons or other contraband based on the crime charged, the particular characteristics of the arrestee, and/or the circumstances of the arrest. The court held that the indiscriminate strip-searching of misdemeanor arrestees is unconstitutional. The policy required arrestees to remove their clothing in front of a corrections officer (CO) and take a shower, regardless of the nature of their crime and without any determination that there was a reasonable suspicion that they possessed contraband. The court found that the policy violated the Fourth Amendment, despite the claim that the written policy did not involve either a command for the arrestee to undress completely or a command for the CO to inspect the naked arrestee. The court noted that the procedure that was followed in fact by the COs required all admittees to remove their clothes, submit to a visual examination by the CO, and shower. The court held that the arrestees were entitled to a permanent injunction prohibiting county jail officials from conducting a strip search, as set forth in the jail's "change out" procedure. (Montgomery County Jail, New York)

U.S. District Court
CELL SEARCH

Navarro v. Adams, 419 F.Supp.2d 1196 (C.D.Cal. 2006). A state prisoner filed a pro se petition for a writ of habeas corpus, challenging his state court conviction and his sentence for first degree murder. The district court held that a deputy sheriff's search of his cell and seizure of attorney-client privileged documents did not warrant federal habeas relief because it did not substantially prejudice the prisoner's Sixth Amendment right to counsel. The court noted that the prisoner's cell was searched to locate evidence regarding gang activity and threats to witnesses, not to interfere with his relationship with his defense counsel, and the information seized was turned over to the trial court for an in-camera review without being viewed by any member of the prosecution team. (California)

U.S. District Court
CELL SEARCH

Pepper v. Carroll, 423 F.Supp.2d 442 (D.Del. 2006). A state inmate filed a § 1983 action alleging that prison officials violated his constitutional rights. The court granted the officials' motion for summary judgment. The court found that the officials' decision to "shake down" the inmate's cell was not in retaliation for his having filed a civil rights action, and thus did not violate the inmate's First Amendment right to access courts, where shakedowns were routine, and the inmate was thought to have prohibited materials in his cell. (Delaware Correctional Center)

U.S. Appeals Court
STRIP SEARCH
JUVENILE

Smook v. Minnehaha County, 457 F.3d 806 (8th Cir. 2006). Former detainees at a county juvenile detention center brought a § 1983 class action against a county and individual county officials, challenging the center's policy of strip-searching all juveniles admitted to the facility regardless of the seriousness of the charged offense or the existence of suspicion. The district court entered partial summary judgment for the former detainees, finding that the searches violated the minors' constitutional rights, and that the officials were not qualifiedly immune from the minors' claims. The county and officials appealed the denial of qualified immunity. The appeals court reversed and remanded, finding that requiring a juvenile to strip to her undergarments upon admission to the facility was reasonable under the Fourth Amendment. A juvenile female had been brought to the center for a curfew violation. A female staff person took her to a private restroom, directed her to remove her shorts, t-shirt, and sandals, but allowed her to remain attired in her undergarments. The staff person touched her to look under her arms, between her toes, and through her hair and scalp. The court held that the search was reasonable under Fourth Amendment in light of the state's responsibility to act in loco parentis with respect to juveniles in lawful state custody, and that the special needs for such a search outweighed the invasion of personal privacy. The court held that the officials were entitled to qualified immunity where there was no appellate decision from the Supreme Court or any federal circuit ruling on such an issue, and, although many courts had concluded that the strip search of adult offenders without individualized suspicion was unreasonable, those cases did not consider interests involved when state had responsibility to act in loco parentis. (Minnehaha County Juvenile Detention Center, South Dakota)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCH

Tardiff v. Knox County, 425 F.Supp.2d 190 (D.Me. 2006). A class action suit was brought against a county, its sheriff, and unidentified jail correctional personnel under § 1983, claiming that the Fourth Amendment rights of detainees alleged to have committed non-violent, non-weapons, and non-drug felonies, and detainees alleged to have committed misdemeanors, were violated when they were subjected to strip searches without reasonable suspicion that they were harboring contraband on or within their bodies. Summary judgment was granted in part and denied in part to the plaintiffs, and the defendants filed a motion for reconsideration. The district court held that: (1) evidence, including booking logs at the county jail, demonstrated that corrections officers routinely strip searched misdemeanor detainees without reasonable suspicion; (2) a jail administrator's letter was highly probative of what municipal policymakers knew about ongoing strip search practices at the jail; (3) intake and release log evidence provided proof that, for at least some corrections officers, strip searching was customary; and (4) the actions taken by the county in response to the unconstitutional practice of strip searching misdemeanor detainees amounted to acquiescence in it. According to the court, a county jail inspection report provided information about the circumstances surrounding search practices at the jail, as well as the knowledge of the county policymakers before the commencement of the class period, and, thus, was relevant in the class action suit. (Knox County Jail, Maine)

U.S. District Court
BODY CAVITY SEARCH

Thompson v. County of Cook, 428 F.Supp.2d 807 (N.D.Ill. 2006). A detainee held for civil contempt brought an action against a county and a sheriff, alleging civil rights violations due to invasive search procedures. Following a jury verdict for the defendants, the detainee moved for a new trial. The district court held that a jury's verdict as to an unreasonable body cavity search was against the manifest weight of evidence. The court noted that, notwithstanding the detainee's purported intermingling with others who were incarcerated, he was not charged with any crime, and there was no evidence that deputies noticed anything suspicious about detainee which would have otherwise justified a search. The detainee was subjected to an invasive urethral swabbing procedure without his consent. The detainee had been held in civil contempt and ordered held in custody after he refused to sign certain documents related to his pending divorce proceedings. Upon arrival at the jail, the detainee was processed along with approximately 250 other new inmates. After spending some time in a holding pen, the detainee and others were photographed and given identification cards. An employee from Cermak Health Services, the agency responsible for administering medical treatment to detainees at the jail, then asked Thompson a number of medical screening questions. During the interview, the detainee responded to the questions on a standard form concerning his medical history and signed the following "consent for treatment" portion of the form: I consent to a medical and mental health history and physical including screening for tuberculosis and sexually transmitted diseases as part of the intake process of the Cook County Jail. I also consent to ongoing medical treatment by Cermak Health Services staff for problems identified during this process. I understand I may be asked to sign forms allowing other medical treatments. I understand that every effort will be made by CHS staff to keep my medical problems confidential. I understand the policy of CHS regarding access to health care at Cook County Jail. The defendants presented evidence at trial that during the interview, an employee informed the detainee of his right to refuse the medical screening, but the detainee denied that anyone informed him of his right to refuse to consent. Following the medical screening interview, his personal property was inventoried and then he and other inmates then underwent a urethral swabbing procedure. He claimed that he felt pain both during and after the procedure. (Cook County Jail, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
PAROLEES

U.S. v. Massey, 461 F.3d 177 (2d Cir. 2006). A parolee was convicted in the district court of unlawful possession of a firearm, and the parolee appealed. The appeals court affirmed, holding that the search of the apartment where the parolee was living, during a home visit, was reasonable. The court noted that the parolee agreed to home visits as a condition of parole, the parolee was living in his mother's apartment, the officer designated the bedroom assigned to parolee as the room she wished to visit and immediately upon entering the apartment the officer requested to see the bedroom and proceeded directly to it, and the bedroom was the only room the officer visited during the home visit until after she discovered weapons. (New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
STRIP SEARCH
BODY CAVITY SEARCH

Way v. County of Ventura, 445 F.3d 1157 (9th Cir. 2006). A female arrestee who had undergone a strip search with body cavity inspection upon booking on a misdemeanor charge of being under the influence of a controlled substance, brought § 1983 Fourth Amendment action against a county sheriff and against the deputy who had performed the search. The district court granted summary judgment for the arrestee, and defendants appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part and reversed in part. The court held that a suspicionless strip search conducted solely on basis of the county's blanket policy for controlled-substance arrestees offended the Fourth Amendment, where the intrusiveness of the search was extreme, the county did not show any link between the policy and legitimate security concerns for persons spontaneously arrested and detained temporarily on under-the-influence charges, and the arrestee was detained only until bail was posted and never entered the jail's general population. The court held that the defendants were entitled to qualified immunity because the appellate court in the county's federal circuit had never previously addressed the constitutionality of a body cavity search policy premised on the nature of drug offenses, and had held that the nature of offense alone may sometimes provide reasonable suspicion. (Ventura County Sheriff's Department, California)

U.S. District Court
PATDOWN
STRIP SEARCH
X-RAY
VISITOR SEARCH

Zboralski v. Monahan, 446 F.Supp.2d 879 (N.D.Ill. 2006). A visitor to a state treatment and detention facility brought a § 1983 action against facility officers, alleging that she was illegally searched prior to visits. The visitor moved to proceed in forma pauperis, and the district court granted the motion. The court held that the visitor stated Fourth Amendment claims based on unreasonable patdowns and "Rapiscan" scans, an invasion of privacy claim, and an assault and battery claim. The visitor alleged that she was illegally searched prior to visits, claiming invasion of privacy under Illinois law based on intrusion upon seclusion, alleging that her virtual naked image was captured through the Rapiscan machine, kept, and viewed hours later by officers. The court noted that the visitor was neither a patient nor under any criminal investigation. The visitor also alleged that an officer caused her to reasonably believe that she would place her fingers in the visitor's vaginal area, and physically touched her in such a manner at least four times. (Illinois Department of Human Services Treatment and Detention Facility, Joliet, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
RELEASE
STRIP SEARCHES

Bullock v. Sheahan, 519 F.Supp.2d 760 (N.D.Ill. 2007). Male former inmates of a county jail brought a class action against a county and a sheriff, alleging that the defendants had a policy and/or practice of subjecting male inmates to strip-searches prior to their release, and that such differing treatment of male inmates violated their rights under the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments. The defendants moved to strike the plaintiffs' expert. The district court denied the motion, finding that the expert's testimony was admissible. According to the court, the expert testimony of a registered architect who specialized in the design of prisons and jails, concerning whether there was adequate space in the jail for the construction of additional bullpens to hold male detainees was relevant and reliable. The court noted that while the expert did not review all of the written discovery in the case, the expert reached his opinions after a tour of the jail and after reviewing other expert reports, jail floor plans, a sheriff's status report and charts summarizing certain computer records on male detainees. (Cook County Department of Corrections, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
RELEASE
STRIP SEARCHES

Bullock v. Sheahan, 519 F.Supp.2d 763 (N.D.Ill. 2007). Male jail inmates brought a class action against a county and county sheriff alleging violations of the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments based on an alleged policy and/or practice under which male inmates were subjected to strip searches upon returning to a county department of corrections for out-processing after having been ordered released. The sheriff and county moved to strike certain portions of the inmates' motion for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the sheriff and county had notice of the male jail inmates' claims challenging the policy and practice, despite allegations that the claims regarding the inmates having to strip in a large non-private group setting came as a surprise to the county and the sheriff because they were never addressed by inmates during fact or expert discovery. The court found that factual allegations contained in the complaint satisfied the notice pleading standards with respect to all claims, and that the county and sheriff did not provide specific evidence of any misrepresentations or sandbagging other than an affidavit stating that discovery did not focus on the privacy issue. (Cook County Department of Corrections, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
PRIVACY
BODY CAVITY SEARCH
STRIP SEARCHES

Campbell v. Miller, 499 F.3d 711 (7th Cir. 2007). An arrestee brought a § 1983 action against a police officer and city, alleging that a strip search violated his Fourth Amendment rights. The district court entered judgment, upon jury verdict, in favor of the defendants and denied the arrestee's motion for judgment as a matter of law. The arrestee appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part and remanded. The court held that evidence was sufficient to support a jury verdict that police officers had reasonable suspicion to believe that the arrestee was concealing contraband, as would justify a strip search and body cavity search of the arrestee, for the purpose of the arrestee's § 1983 unreasonable search claim. The court noted that the plaintiff was arrested for narcotics possession, when an officer first encountered the arrestee the officer reasonably believed that the plaintiff fit the description of a man who had just engaged in a drug transaction. The officer testified that he saw the arrestee drop a bag of marijuana and then disregard repeated commands to stop moving away. But the court found that a strip and body cavity search conducted on the arrestee in an open backyard was not reasonable, and thus, the search violated the arrestee's Fourth Amendment rights. The search involved nudity and visual inspection of the anal area, the backyard was exposed to the neighbors, the arrestee's friend was able to watch the search and others could have watched as well, and no exigency justified such a public exposure. The court concluded that the city was not liable under § 1983 for the arresting officer's unreasonable conduct. Although the city had a policy that any officer making an arrest had to conduct a body search of the prisoner, there was no policy requiring the search to be conducted in public, the decision to conduct the search in an open and exposed area was what rendered the search unconstitutional, and that decision was made by the officer. (City of Indianapolis, Indiana)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCHES

Doe v. Balaam, 524 F.Supp.2d 1238 (D.Nev. 2007). A transsexual arrestee, who was strip searched at a county jail, brought an action against the county and county sheriff seeking damages, attorney fees, and a permanent injunction prohibiting the defendants from conducting certain strip searches. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The court held that deputies at the county jail had a reasonable suspicion, based on specific articulated facts coming directly from the transsexual arrestee concealing a sock in his crotch area, that the arrestee was carrying or concealing contraband, so as to justify a strip search of the arrestee prior to being housed in the general jail population. The court noted that the arrestee had turned himself in for a misdemeanor destruction of property charge, and even though he had told deputies that he was a transsexual and that he had a rolled-up sock concealed in his crotch area, the deputies had no way of knowing whether the arrestee was truthful about what he was, in fact, concealing. According to the court, even if there had been a violation of the arrestee's Fourth Amendment rights against unreasonable searches and seizures, the transsexual arrestee failed to allege that the county sheriff knew of and failed to act or prevent any alleged violation, or that any individual employees acted pursuant to an official county policy or custom, as required to state a cognizable § 1983 claim against the sheriff and county for alleged constitutional violations. (Washoe County, Nevada)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCHES
PRETRIAL DETAINEES

Doe No. 1 v. Balaam, 494 F.Supp.2d 1173 (D.Nev. 2007). Arrestees who were subjected to strip searches when they self-surrendered at a county jail and were then released on their own recognizance, pursuant to the sheriff department's contraband control policy, brought an action against the county and county sheriff. The arrestees sought damages, attorney fees, and a permanent injunction prohibiting the defendants from conducting certain strip searches, prohibiting the defendants from engaging in similar unconstitutional conduct in the future, and requiring and ordering the defendants to institute proper training and policy changes. The inmates moved for partial summary judgment and the district court granted the motion. The court held that the county's policy of strip searching all arrestees who self-surrendered to the county jail, absent reasonable suspicion that any arrestee was smuggling contraband, was unreasonable, and thus amounted to deliberate indifference to the arrestees' Fourth Amendment rights, especially given that all of the arrestees were booked and then released on their own recognizance without ever being housed with the general jail population. (Washoe County Detention Facility, Nevada)

U.S. Appeals Court
BODY CAVITY SEARCH
STRIP SEARCH

Hutchins v. McDaniels, 512 F.3d 193 (5th Cir. 2007). A prison inmate who was subjected to strip and cavity searches by a prison officer brought suit under § 1983 to recover for alleged violation of his Fourth Amendment rights. The district court entered an order dismissing the complaint and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The court held that the inmate's allegations regarding strip and cavity searches to which he was subjected by a prison officer who never accused him of possessing contraband during the search, and who was allegedly wearing a "lewd smile" during the procedure, were sufficient to state a claim for violation of the inmate's Fourth Amendment rights. The court noted that the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA) prohibits a prisoner from recovering compensatory damages in any federal civil action absent a showing of physical injury. According to the court, the inmate's failure to allege that he had sustained any physical injury as a result of a strip and cavity search, prevented him from asserting a claim for recovery of compensatory damages for emotional or mental injuries that he allegedly suffered. The court noted that the inmate did not have to allege any physical injury in order to state a claim for recovery of nominal or punitive damages for the officer's alleged violation of his Fourth Amendment rights. (California Men's Colony East)

U.S. Appeals Court
CELL SEARCHES
STRIP SEARCHES

Hydrick v. Hunter, 500 F.3d 978 (9th Cir. 2007). Sexual offenders who were civilly confined in a state psychiatric hospital under California's Sexually Violent Predators Act (SVP) filed a class action against various state officials under § 1983, challenging the conditions of their confinement. The district court denied the defendants' motion to dismiss, and the defendants appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part and reversed in part. The court held that the First Amendment claims brought against state hospital officials were based on clearly established law for qualified immunity purposes insofar as they challenged retaliation for filing lawsuits, however, officials had qualified immunity to the extent that the plaintiffs' claim relied on a First Amendment right not to participate in treatment sessions. The court found that the plaintiffs stated a § 1983 claim for violations of their Fourth Amendment rights to be free from unreasonable searches and seizures. The court concluded that hospital officials were entitled to qualified immunity with regard to procedural due process claims, but not substantive due process claims. The offenders alleged that they were subjected to public strip searches, to retaliatory searches of their possessions and to arbitrary seizure of their personal belongings, that they were placed in shackles during transport to the hospital and during visits from family and friends, that they were subjected to restraint even if they did not pose any physical risk, and that they were force-medicated. On appeal to the United States Supreme Court (129 S.Ct. 2431) the court vacated the decision. (Atascadero State Hospital, California)

U.S. Appeals Court
PRETRIAL DETAINEES

Tabbaa v. Chertoff, 509 F.3d 89 (2nd Cir. 2007). United States citizens brought an action alleging that the Bureau of Customs and Border Protection (CBP) officials violated their constitutional and statutory rights by detaining and searching them at a border when they returned from an Islamic conference in Canada. The district court entered summary judgment in the government's favor, and the plaintiffs appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the suspicionless searches of the plaintiffs did not violate the Fourth Amendment. The court found that the burden placed on the plaintiffs' associational rights as the result of the CBP searches and detention was sufficiently significant to implicate First Amendment protections, but the searches and detention constituted the least restrictive means to protect the nation from terrorism. (U.S. Bureau of Customs and Border Protection, Buffalo, New York)

U.S. District Court
CELL SEARCH

Teahan v. Wilhelm, 481 F.Supp.2d 1115 (S.D.Cal. 2007). An indigent state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against two correctional officers, challenging the conditions of his confinement. The court dismissed the action. The court held that the prisoner's allegations that prison officials searched his cell numerous times over the course of one evening, resulting in several items of the prisoner's property being seized, did not state a claim of cruel and unusual punishment in violation of Eighth Amendment. (Centinela State Prison, California)

U.S. Appeals Court
STRIP SEARCH
BODY CAVITY SEARCH

U.S. v. Barnes, 506 F.3d 58 (1st Cir. 2008). The government appealed an order of the United States District Court for the District of Rhode Island suppressing cocaine seized from a defendant pursuant to a visual body cavity search. The appeals court vacated and remanded. The court held that the strip search for contraband and weapons was justified given the defendant's arrest for a drug trafficking crime, but that the arresting officer did not have individualized suspicion that the arrestee was "cheeking" drugs, as required to justify a visual body cavity search. According to the court, the evidence before the officer was that the arrestee was a suspected drug dealer in possession of narcotics and that some drug dealers concealed drugs between their buttocks. (Woonsocket Police Department, Rhode Island)

U.S. Appeals Court
DNA

U.S. v. Kriesel, 508 F.3d 941 (9th Cir. 2007). The government petitioned to revoke supervised release of a felon who refused to submit a DNA sample. In response, the convicted felon challenged the constitutionality of the Justice for All Act, which expanded coverage of the DNA Act to require DNA samples from all convicted felons on supervised release. The felon also challenged the regulation issued pursuant to the Justice for All Act. The district court upheld the constitutionality of the Justice for All Act and the validity of the regulation. The felon appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that requiring a convicted felon on supervised release to provide a DNA sample, even through drawing of blood, did not constitute an illegal search. The court found that the government's significant interests in identifying supervised releasees, preventing recidivism, and solving past crimes outweighed the diminished privacy interests of the convicted felon. (United States District Court for the Western District of Washington)

U.S. District Court
BODY CAVITY
USE OF FORCE

Vasquez v. Raemisch, 480 F.Supp.2d 1120 (W.D.Wis. 2007). A prisoner sought leave to proceed under the in forma pauperis statute in a proposed civil rights action for declaratory, injunctive and monetary relief brought against prison officials and corrections officers. The district court held that, with respect to three body cavity search incidents, the prisoner would be permitted proceed with his Eighth Amendment excessive force claims against each correctional officer who he alleged was either directly involved in the use of force or was present and either encouraged or failed to stop it. The prisoner alleged that there was no need for force in connection with the first search, that his constitutional rights were violated in connection with the second search when several officers, who lacked legitimate security reasons for conducting a manual body cavity search, made contact with his genitals while conducting a strip search as a means of obtaining sexual gratification or humiliating him, and other officers who were present failed to intervene, and that, with respect to the third search, an officer used a taser against the prisoner when he posed no threat. (Wisconsin)

U.S. District Court
PAROLEES

Willis v. Mullins, 517 F.Supp.2d 1206 (E.D.Cal. 2007.) An arrestee brought a § 1983 action against law enforcement officers and a parole officer, alleging Fourth Amendment violations. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motions in part and denied in part. The court held that the warrant-less entry into a motel room by the officers violated the arrestee's Fourth Amendment rights and that a genuine issue of material fact precluded summary judgment on qualified immunity. The court found that the officers' search of a briefcase did not violate the Fourth Amendment, and that the arrestee failed to state a claim against the officers upon which relief could be granted for violation of the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act. (Kern County, California)

U.S. District Court
DNA-Deoxy Ribonucleic Acid
PRIVACY

Wilson v. Wilkinson, 608 F.Supp.2d 891 (S.D.Ohio 2007). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against state officials, challenging the constitutionality of a state statute requiring the collection of DNA specimens from convicted felons. The parties cross-moved for summary judgment. The district court held that the collection of a DNA specimen was not an unreasonable search and seizure, and that a DNA sample did not implicate the prisoner's Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination. The court noted that law enforcement's interest in obtaining DNA for a database to solve past and future crimes outweighed the prisoner's diminished privacy rights. According to the court, the prisoner did not have a fundamental privacy interest protected by substantive due process in the information contained in a DNA sample and the profile obtained pursuant to the state statute. The court noted that the prisoner, as a convicted felon, did not enjoy the same privacy rights as did ordinary citizens. (Ross Correctional Institution, Ohio Department of Rehabilitation and Correction)

2008

U.S. District Court
VISITOR SEARCHES

Adeyola v. Gibon, 537 F.Supp.2d 479 (W.D.N.Y. 2008). An inmate brought a pro se action against a sheriff and correctional facility officials, alleging that they violated his constitutional rights by refusing to allow females to visit him unless they removed their head scarves for a search or presented proof that they were practicing Muslims. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the sheriff and officials. The court held that the inmate failed to allege any injury in fact and thus lacked standing. The court held that the allegations, even if proven, did not violate any First Amendment right of the inmate to have visitors, in that it was reasonable for officials to require visitors to remove scarves to determine that they were not attempting to bring in contraband, and he was not denied visitors, given that visitors were simply required to agree to certain conditions before being allowed to see an inmate. (Erie County Holding Center, N.Y. State Department of Correctional Services)

U.S. Appeals Court
OPPOSITE SEX
STRIP SEARCHES

Archuleta v. Wagner, 523 F.3d 1278 (10th Cir. 2008). An arrestee brought a § 1983 action against a jailer and others alleging her Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment rights were violated when she was strip searched. The district court denied the jailer's request for qualified immunity and the jailer appealed. The appeals court affirmed the district court decision. The court held that the jailer was not justified in conducting the strip search during booking, following the arrest pursuant to an arrest warrant for harassment, where the arrestee never intermingled with the general jail population but rather was confined in a cell by herself for several hours while awaiting bail. The court noted that three pat down searches had been performed on the arrestee prior to booking, the arrestee was wearing shorts and a sleeveless blouse at the time of booking, the jailer saw that the arrestee did not have any tattoos or moles indicating that she was the culprit, and the crime of harassment was not a crime of violence. The court found that the arrestee had a right not to be strip searched during booking when she was not going to intermingle with the general prison population. She had already been through a pat-down search, and there was no reasonable suspicion that she had a weapon. According to the court, the jailer who conducted the strip search was not entitled to qualified immunity because at the time of this incident it was clearly established that a strip search could be justified if there was a reasonable suspicion that the detainee possessed weapons and the detainee intermingled with the general jail population. The 46-year-old mother of nine had been riding in a family van with some of her children when she was stopped by an officer because there was an extra child in the back seat. The officer arrested her with the belief that she was the person for whom a warrant had been issued. After being booked at the jail it became apparent that she was not the person named in the warrant because she did not have the tattoos and moles that were described in the file. Knowing that the plaintiff was not the person named in the warrant, a jail officer nonetheless continued to process and strip search her. As she was standing naked, she began to lactate. She tried to cover herself but was told by the officer to put her arms down. She was mocked continually by the officer and a male officer during this incident. (Jefferson County Detention Facility, Colorado)

U.S. District Court
PRETRIAL DETAINEES
STRIP SEARCHES

Brazier v. Oxford County, 575 F.Supp.2d 265 (D.Me. 2008). An arrestee brought a § 1983 action against a county and corrections officers, alleging that strip searches performed upon her during two post-arrest confinements at a county jail, both relating to her driving privileges, were unconstitutional. The district court held that the strip searches violated the county's written policy, and thus the county was subject to liability under § 1983. The court noted that the county's written policy prohibited strip searches of inmates charged with misdemeanor crimes unless there was reasonable suspicion to believe that an inmate was hoarding evidence to a crime, weapons, drugs, or contraband. (Oxford County Jail, Maine)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCHES

Bullock v. Sheahan, 568 F.Supp.2d 965 (N.D.Ill. 2008). Two county inmates who were ordered released after being found not guilty of the charges against them brought an action individually and on behalf of a class against a county sheriff and county, challenging the constitutionality of a policy under which male inmates, in the custody of the Cook County Department of Corrections (CCDC), were subjected to strip searches upon returning to CCDC after being ordered released. The district court held that male inmates in the custody of CCDC who were potentially discharged were similarly situated to female potential discharges, as supported the male inmates' claim that the county's policy of strip searching all male discharges and not all female discharges violated the Equal Protection Clause. The court noted that the two groups of inmates were housed within the same facility, there were varying security classifications within each group that corresponded to each other, statistics concerning inmate violence clearly indicated that it took place among female as well as male inmates, and the county's primary justification for distinguishing between male and female discharges, namely, its alleged inability to hold them in a receiving, classification, and diagnosis center (RCDC) while their records were reviewed, was a logistical rather than a security concern. The court held that the CCDC exhibited discriminatory intent in strip searching all male inmates who were potentially discharged and not all female discharges, as supported the male inmates' claim that the county's strip search policy violated the Equal Protection Clause. The court found that the county's blanket strip search policy for male discharged inmates was not substantially related to the achievement of important governmental objectives--jail safety and security--and thus the policy deprived male discharges of their constitutional right to equal protection. The court noted that female discharges were just as capable of importing contraband into the jail as their male counterparts.

According to the court, the fact that there were a greater number of male inmates in a county jail did not legitimize an equal protection violation resulting from the county's blanket strip search policy for male discharged inmates. The court found that the county's policy of exempting male discharged inmates from obtaining privacy screens for use during strip searches violated the Equal Protection Clause. The court found that potentially discharged male inmates, for whom there was no longer any basis for detention, had a privacy interest with regard to strip searches which was arguably greater than that of pretrial detainees. According to the court, the county's policy of strip searching all male discharged inmates in large group settings in which inmates were placed at approximately an arm's length apart when searched violated the Fourth Amendment. The court found that the county sheriff was not acting as an arm of the state insofar as requiring strip searching of discharged male inmates, and thus was not entitled to qualified immunity. The court noted that an Illinois Administrative Code (IAC) provision stating that "detainees permitted to leave the confines of the jail temporarily, for any reason, shall be thoroughly searched prior to leaving and before re-entering the jail" did not mandate strip searches, just that inmates be "thoroughly searched." (Cook Co. Dept. of Corrections, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
BODY CAVITY SEARCH
STRIP SEARCHES

Collins v. Knox County, 569 F.Supp.2d 269 (D.Me. 2008). A female arrestee brought a § 1983 action against a county, sheriff, and corrections officers, alleging an unconstitutional policy and/or custom and practice of conducting a strip search and visual body cavity search of every person taken into custody at the jail. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants. The court held that the county did not have an unconstitutional strip search policy or custom at the county jail, and that the sheriff did not acquiesce to a policy or practice of unconstitutional strip searches. The court found that there was no evidence of an unconstitutional policy and/or custom and practice of conducting a strip search and visual body cavity search of every person taken into custody at the county jail, as required for the arrestee to establish a § 1983 claim against the county. The court noted that it's prior determination in an unrelated case, that the county maintained an unconstitutional policy of strip searching all misdemeanor detainees, concerned a period several years prior to the time that the arrestee was detained. The court found that the strip search of the female arrestee upon her admission to jail after self-surrendering on an outstanding felony arrest warrant was reasonable under the Fourth Amendment. The search, in which the arrestee was required to run her fingers through her hair, extend her arms out straight, open her mouth for visual inspection, spread her toes, lift each of her breasts, expose her vagina, squat on her haunches with her back to the officer and, while squatting, cough violently several times, at which time she expelled menstrual fluid, caused the arrestee humiliation and embarrassment. The court found that the search was based on a drug charge in her inmate file, the fact that she made a planned admission to jail which provided the opportunity to conceal contraband, and that she was going to be housed overnight at the jail, which had a problem with contraband. The search was performed by a female officer in the changing area of the shower stall adjacent to the booking area, which was mostly shielded from view by a plastic curtain. (Knox Co. Jail, Maine)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCHES

Craft v. County of San Bernardino, 624 F.Supp.2d 1113 (C.D.Cal. 2008). County jail inmates brought a class action alleging that a county's practice of routinely strip-searching inmates without probable cause or reasonable suspicion that the inmates were in possession of weapons or drugs violated the Fourth Amendment. After the court granted the inmates' motion for partial summary judgment, the parties entered into private mediation and reached a settlement agreement providing for, among other things, a class fund award of $25,648,204. The inmates moved for the award of attorney's fees and costs. The district court held that class counsel were entitled to an attorney's fees award in the amount of 25% of the settlement fund plus costs. The court noted that counsel obtained excellent pecuniary and nonpecuniary results in a complex and risky case involving 150,000 class members, 20,000 claims, and five certified classes, each of which presented unsettled legal issues. According to the court, tens or hundreds of thousands of future inmates benefited from policy changes brought about by the suit, and the attorneys were highly experienced and highly regarded civil rights lawyers with extensive class action experience. (San Bernardino County Jail, California)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCHES
VISITS

Davis v. Peters, 566 F.Supp.2d 790 (N.D.Ill. 2008). A detainee who was civilly committed pursuant to the Sexually Violent Persons Commitment Act sued the current and former facility directors of the Illinois Department of Human Services' (DHS) Treatment and Detention Facility (TDF), where the detainee was housed, as well as two former DHS Secretaries, and the current DHS Secretary. The detainee claimed that the conditions of his confinement violated his constitutional rights to equal protection and substantive due process. After a bench trial, the district court held that: (1) the practice of searching the detainee prior to his visits with guests and attorneys violated his substantive due process rights; (2) the practice of using a "black-box" restraint system on all of the detainee's trips to and from court over a 15-month period violated his substantive due process rights; (3) requiring the detainee to sleep in a room illuminated by a night light did not violate the detainee's substantive due process rights; (4) a former director was not protected by qualified immunity from liability for the constitutional violations; and (5) the detainee would be awarded compensatory damages in the amount of $30 for each hour he wore the black box in violation of his rights. The court noted that strip searches of a detainee prior to his court appearances and upon his return to the institution did not violate substantive due process, where detainees were far more likely to engage in successful escapes if they could carry concealed items during their travel to court, and searches upon their return were closely connected with the goal of keeping contraband out of the facility. The court held that the practice of conducting strip searches of the detainee prior to his visits with guests and attorneys was not within the bounds of professional judgment, and thus, violated the detainee's substantive due process rights, where the only motivation for such searches appeared to be a concern that a detainee would bring a weapon into the meeting, and most weapons should have been detectable through a pat-down search. (Treatment and Detention Facility, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
OPPOSITE SEX
PRIVACY
STRIP SEARCHES

Graham v. Van Dycke, 564 F.Supp.2d 1305 (D.Kan. 2008). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against medical providers working at a state correctional facility, alleging violations of her Eighth Amendment due process rights arising from a strip search conducted by a male officer. She also challenged her mental health confinement. The district court granted summary judgment for the medical providers. The court found that removal of the female inmate from her cell into administrative segregation and removal of her clothing, after she became agitated and demanded psychotropic drugs, did not violate her privacy or Eighth Amendment due process rights, even though officers who performed such tasks were all male. According to the court, the inmate was on suicide watch, which required removal of clothing to avoid self-injury, removal was done pursuant to established procedure and was videotaped, and a staffing shortage rendered it impractical to include a female officer on the removal team. (Topeka Correctional Facility, Kansas)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCHES
USE OF FORCE

Hart v. Celaya, 548 F.Supp.2d 789 (N.D.Cal. 2008). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against corrections officers, alleging excessive force and deliberate indifference to his serious medical needs. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants. The court held that the officers did not use excessive force in releasing pepper-spray into the prisoner's holding cell after he refused to submit to an unclothed body search. The court noted that the officer released pepper-spray into the cell only after the prisoner refused to comply with the direct orders of three different officers of increasingly higher rank to submit to the search, after the officer explained to the prisoner that all inmates entering administrative segregation were required to submit to an unclothed body search, after the prisoner began yelling and pushing up against his cell door causing it to shake and rattle, and after the officers were concerned that the prisoner would either harm himself or break out of his cell and endanger others. The court found that the officer did not use excessive force in requiring the prisoner to lift his genitals during an unclothed body search, even though the prisoner had pepper spray on his hands. The court held that officers did not use excessive force in violation of the Eighth Amendment when they allegedly attempted to trip the prisoner, pushed him into the frame of a holding cell door, and twisted and pulled his wrists as they put him in leg restraints in order to move the prisoner from the cell to an outside area where he could be decontaminated from the officer's use of pepper-spray. The court noted that the prisoner's medical evaluations, prior to and after the incident indicated that the prisoner did not sustain any injuries, such as cuts, abrasions, swelling or bruises. (Salinas Valley State Prison, California)

U.S. Appeals Court
STRIP SEARCHES

Hartline v. Gallo, 546 F.3d 95 (2nd Cir. 2008). An arrestee brought § 1983 and 1985 claims against a police department and others alleging her Fourth Amendment rights were violated when she was subjected to a strip search. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants and the arrestee appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, vacated in part, and remanded. The court held that there was no reasonable suspicion that the arrestee was hiding drugs on her person as required to justify the strip search and the officers were not entitled to qualified immunity. The court found that summary judgment was precluded by an issue of material fact regarding whether the jail's surveillance system telecast the strip search. (Southampton Police Department, New York)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCHES

Jean-Laurent v. Wilkinson, 540 F.Supp.2d 501 (S.D.N.Y. 2008). A prisoner in a state correctional facility brought a civil rights action against officers and supervisors claiming violation of his rights under the First, Fourth, Eighth, and Fourteenth Amendments. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants in part and denied in part. The court held that striking the prisoner in the face several times while he was standing naked in a stairwell surrounded by several officers, absent any indication that the prisoner posed a threat, was not within the corrections officer's asserted good-faith effort to maintain order, discipline, and security due to a stabbing that recently had occurred within the prison. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a fact issue as to whether the prisoner was under constant supervision by corrections officers and to what proximity he was to other inmates so as to determine whether he could have acquired contraband. The court also found summary judgment was precluded by a fact issue as to whether senior corrections officers were grossly negligent in supervising a junior officer who allegedly violated the prisoner's Fourth Amendment rights through a strip search, and as to whether the Fourth Amendment rights of the prisoner were violated during a second strip search and alleged use of excessive force. (George Motchan Det. Center, N.Y. City Department of Correction)

U.S. District Court
BODY CAVITY SEARCHES
STRIP SEARCHES

Johnson v. Government of District of Columbia, 584 F.Supp.2d 83 (D.D.C. 2008). Female former arrestees filed a class action against the District of Columbia and a former United States Marshal for the Superior Court of District of Columbia, under § 1983, claiming violation of the Fourth and Fifth Amendments. The arrestees alleged that the marshal strip searched all females awaiting presentment to a superior court judge, without reasonable and particularized suspicion that any female was carrying contraband on her person and without strip searching any male arrestees. The District of Columbia moved for summary judgment and the district court granted the motion. The court held that the former United States Marshal for the Superior Court of the District of Columbia was a federal official who was not amenable to suit, under § 1983, as an employee, servant, agent, or actor under the control of the District of Columbia, precluding the female former arrestees' class action. The court noted that the marshal was empowered to act under the color of the federal Anti-Drug Abuse Act, and a District of Columbia law provided that the marshal acted under the supervision of the United States Attorney General. According to the court, the District of Columbia lacked authority to control the conduct of the former United States Marshal, precluding the female former arrestees' class action under § 1983. The arrestees were held for presentment for an offense that did not involve drugs or violence, but they were subjected to a blanket policy of a strip, visual body cavity search and/or squat search without any individualized finding of reasonable suspicion or probable cause that they were concealing drugs, weapons or other contraband. (District of Columbia, Superior Court Cellblock)

U.S. District Court
FRISK SEARCH
PAT DOWN SEARCH

Jones v. Murphy, 567 F.Supp.2d 787 (D.Md. 2008). A male arrestee brought a class action, alleging that a booking facility's policy of frisking female arrestees while searching male arrestees down to their underwear violated the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The district court granted summary judgment for the arrestee, finding that the booking facility's gender-differentiated search policy was not reasonably related to a legitimate penological interest in preventing arrestees from bringing weapons into the booking facility, and thus violated the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The court noted that the additional staff needed to more thoroughly search female arrestees was not overly burdensome, and searching all arrestees to their last layer of clothing was a readily available constitutional alternative. (Baltimore City Central Booking, Maryland)

U.S. Appeals Court
DNA- Deoxy Ribonucleic Acid

Kaemmerling v. Lappin, 553 F.3d 669 (D.C.Cir. 2008). A federal prisoner sought to enjoin application of the DNA Analysis Backlog Elimination Act (DNA Act), alleging the Act violated his rights under the Religious Freedom Restoration Act (RFRA) and the First, Fourth, and Fifth Amendments. The district court dismissed the action for failure to exhaust administrative remedies. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the prisoner's allegation that DNA collection burdened his free exercise of religion failed to state a claim under the First Amendment and RFRA. The court found that the potential criminal penalty for failure to cooperate with the collection of a DNA sample did not violate RFRA. According to the court, the collection of prisoner DNA furthers a compelling government interest using the least restrictive means. The court also found that the DNA Act does not violate equal protection despite the fact that it requires collection of DNA only from felons who are incarcerated or on supervised release, rather than those who are no longer under the supervision of the Bureau of Prisons (BOP), where the BOP's measure of control over supervised and incarcerated felons makes it significantly easier to collect their DNA samples. The court noted that the extraction, analysis, and storage of the prisoner's DNA information did not call for the prisoner to modify his religious behavior in any way, did not involve any action or forbearance on the prisoner's part, and did not interfere with any religious act in which the prisoner was engaged. (Federal Correctional Institution, Seagoville, Texas)

U.S. Appeals Court
URINE TEST

Levine v. Roebuck, 550 F.3d 684 (8th Cir. 2008). A state inmate brought § 1983 claims against a correctional officer and nurses alleging that they violated his Fourth and Eighth Amendment rights by forcing him to undergo catheterization to avoid prison discipline when he could not provide a urine sample for a random drug test. The district court granted the defendants' motions for summary judgment and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the prison nurses' actions in attempting catheterization of the inmate were objectively reasonable and did not violate the inmate's Eighth Amendment rights against brutality. The court noted that the nurses were following a request from a correctional officer, and the inmate had undergone voluntary catheterization in the past when he was unable to urinate. (Western Missouri Correctional Center)

U.S. District Court
BODY CAVITY SEARCHES
STRIP SEARCHES

McCabe v. Mais, 602 F.Supp.2d 1025 (N.D.Iowa 2008). County jail detainees brought a § 1983 action against a county jail officer, alleging that the officer conducted illegal strip searches and visual body cavity searches. Following a jury trial, the district court granted the officer's motion reduce the jury's damages award, and after the detainees refused to accept the reduced damages award, ordered a new trial on the issue of damages. After a jury returned a verdict in favor of the detainees in the amount of $55,804, the detainees moved for new trial. The court held that a new trial on damages was not warranted and that the damages award was not so inadequate as to shock the conscience. The court noted that there was no evidence that the detainees were subjected to repeated violations of their Fourth Amendment rights, or that the illegal searches were conducted in a violent or mocking way, and detainees' own descriptions of their emotional distress was not compelling. (Linn County Jail, Iowa)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCHES

Munyiri v. Haduch, 585 F.Supp.2d 670 (D.Md. 2008). A motorist who was arrested for driving around a police roadblock and subsequently failing to stop when signaled by a pursuing squad car brought a civil rights action against an arresting officer, police commissioner and warden at central booking facility to which she was transported. She alleged she was subjected to unlawful strip and visual body cavity searches. The defendants moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that allegations in the motorist's complaint were sufficient to state a supervisory liability claim against the Secretary of the Maryland Department of Public Safety and Correctional Services (DPSCS) and the warden at a central booking facility, for intrusive searches to which she was subjected. The court found that the allegations in the offender's complaint-- that she was improperly subjected to a strip search and to a visual body cavity search as the result of a policy implemented by the Secretary of the Maryland Department of Public Safety and Correctional Services (DPSCS) and by a warden at the central booking facility-- adequately pleaded the minimum facts necessary to state a supervisory liability claim against the Secretary and the warden under § 1983. The policy allegedly authorized strip searches and visual body cavity searches of all persons admitted to the facility, regardless of the charges filed against them or circumstances surrounding their arrest. (Baltimore Central Booking and Intake Facility, Maryland)

U.S. District Court
PAROLEES

Portentoso v. Kern, 532 F.Supp.2d 920 (N.D.Ohio 2008). A parolee brought a § 1983 action against a state parole authority and officers, stemming from an alleged illegal search of his residential property and his arrest. The defendants moved for dismissal and for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the state parole officers had probable cause to search the parolee's barn, for the purposes of the parolee's Fourth Amendment claim alleging warrantless and illegal search, since the parolee's ex-wife had reported to officers that her daughter told her there were weapons in the barn. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact, regarding whether the parolee consented to the state parole officers' search of his house after searching the barn for weapons. The court found that the state parole officers had probable cause to arrest the parolee after finding ammunition in his house, since possession of ammunition contravened the parolee's conditions of supervision. (Ohio)

U.S. District Court
BODY CAVITY SEARCHES

Sanchez Rodriguez v. Departamento de Correccion y Rehabilitacion, 537 F.Supp.2d 295 (D.Puerto Rico 2008). An inmate filed a § 1983 action alleging that Puerto Rico prison officials denied him his constitutional right to enjoy daily recreational time outside of his cell because he refused to submit to visual body cavity searches. After dismissal of his complaint, the inmate filed a motion for reconsideration. The district court denied the motion. The court held that the searches did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment. According to the court, the requirement that inmates submit to visual body cavity searches in order to leave their cells for recreation was needed to preserve internal order and institutional security, and thus did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the Eighth Amendment. (Maximum Security Prison, Ponce, Puerto Rico)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCHES

Streeter v. Sheriff of Cook County, 576 F.Supp.2d 913 (N.D.Ill. 2008). Current or former pretrial detainees filed a class action under § 1983 against a county sheriff and the county, challenging a strip search policy at the county jail, alleging it violated their Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment rights. The district court denied summary judgment for the defendants. The court held that the detainees stated a claim for violation of their Fourth Amendment rights in connection with group strip searches that were allegedly conducted in an unreasonably intrusive manner and went on longer than penologically necessary. The court also found that the detainees stated a claim for violation of their rights under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment in connection with group strip searches that were allegedly conducted in a manner intended to humiliate and embarrass the detainees, and that went on longer than necessary. (Cook County Jail, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
BODY CAVITY SEARCHES
STRIP SEARCHES

Tardiff v. Knox County, 567 F.Supp.2d 201 (D.Me. 2008). An arrestee who was subjected to a strip and visual body cavity search brought a § 1983 action against a county for alleged violations of her Fourth Amendment rights. She brought the action after opting out of a class action against the county in which her claim had initially moved forward and in which she was named as class representative. The county asserted counterclaims for breach of contract and equitable estoppel and the parties cross-moved for summary judgment. The district court held that the settlement agreement in a prior class action did not contain an implied term that the arrestee, as named class representative, would not opt out of the agreement. (Knox County Jail, Maine)

U.S. District Court
BODY CAVITY SEARCH
PRETRIAL DETAINEES
STRIP SEARCHES

Tardiff v. Knox County, 573 F.Supp.2d 301 (D.Me. 2008). An arrestee brought a § 1983 action against a county alleging a strip and visual body cavity search violated the Fourth Amendment. The district court granted summary judgment for the plaintiff, in part. The court held that jail personnel did not have individualized reasonable suspicion that the arrestee was concealing contraband or weapons, as required to perform a strip and visual body cavity search of the arrestee who had been arrested for felony witness tampering. The court noted that the arrestee was not arrested for a violent felony, spending a night in jail did not implicate sufficiently serious security concerns to warrant a search, the county failed to show the underlying facts of the crime provided individualized reasonable suspicion, and the county failed to establish that the arrestee's conduct required the search. According to the court, a felony categorization alone does not obviate the requirement of individualized reasonable suspicion for a strip and visual body cavity search of an arrestee. (Knox County Jail, Maine)

U.S. District Court
BODY SEARCHES
CONTRABAND
PRIVACY

Williams v. Fitch, 550 F.Supp.2d 413 (W.D.N.Y. 2008). A state inmate filed a § 1983 action alleging that corrections officers sexually abused him. The district court dismissed the case. The court held that the officers did not violate the inmate's Eighth Amendment rights by searching and handling his penis on three occasions while searching for contraband. The court noted that X-rays showed the presence of a metal object in the foreskin of the inmate's penis, and the searches were undertaken in a private location, without undue physical intrusion, humiliation, or physical injury. (Attica Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
DNA
PRIVACY

Wilson v. Collins, 517 F.3d 421 (6th Cir. 2008). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against state officials challenging the constitutionality of Ohio's DNA Act that required the collection of DNA specimens from convicted felons. The district court granted summary judgment to the defendants and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that collection of a DNA specimen pursuant to the statute was not an unreasonable search and seizure and that the prisoner did not have a fundamental privacy interest in the information contained in a DNA specimen. (Ohio Department of Rehabilitation and Correction)

U.S. District Court
PRIVACY
VISITOR SEARCHES
X-RAY

Zboralski v. Monahan, 616 F.Supp.2d 792 (N.D.Ill. 2008). The wife of a civilly committed resident of a state treatment and detention facility brought an action against facility employees, in their individual and official capacities, alleging claims under § 1983 for violations of her Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment rights, as well as claims for invasion of privacy and assault and battery, in connection with a series of searches the employees performed on her when she was visiting a resident. The court denied the employees' motion for summary judgment, in part. The court held that a hearing was required in order to develop the record on the issue of the reasonableness of the searches. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by fact issues as to whether the wife agreed to undergo a scan each and every time she entered the facility, and as to whether one employee intentionally touched the wife's vaginal area during pat-down searches. The court denied immunity to the employee and found that, as a matter of first impression, requiring the wife to submit to a scan in order to visit her husband amounted to an unconstitutional condition. The facility employed X-ray technology to conduct a body search of visitors. The court noted that questions to be addressed at a hearing included how the machine actually worked and the quality of the images it produced, and how reasonable persons would feel being subjected to such a scan. According to the court, to determine whether a body scan of a prison visitor is akin to a pat-down or strip search, the key factor is the level of embarrassment and intrusion that the visitor searched feels. (Illinois Department of Human Services' Treatment and Detention Facility, Joliet, Illinois)

2009

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCHES

Allison v. GEO Group, Inc., 611 F.Supp.2d 433 (E.D.Pa. 2009). Arrestees detained in state custodial facilities managed by a private corporation brought a class action against the corporation, alleging the facilities' blanket policy of mandatory strip searches without individualized suspicion violated the Fourth Amendment. The corporation moved for judgment on the pleadings for failure to state a claim upon which relief could be granted and the district court denied the motion. The court held that the arrestees stated a § 1983 claim for a Fourth Amendment violation. The court noted that strip searches in a custodial facility differ qualitatively from other intake procedures which entail some incidental nudity but do not involve visual inspection of the naked body. The court said that the exposure of the naked body to scrutiny by government officers is what makes strip searches more invasive than other admission procedures at a custodial facility. According to the court, the searches involved visual inspection of the arrestees' naked bodies, the searches of named arrestees were not based on reasonable suspicion, and the purported class consisted of arrestees who were either charged with minor offenses or non-violent offenses that did not involve drugs. (George W. Hill Corr. Facility, Pennsylvania)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCHES

Bullock v. Dart, 599 F.Supp.2d 947 (N.D.Ill. 2009). Inmates filed a § 1983 action challenging the constitutionality a county's policies of performing blanket strip searches on male, but not female, inmates returning to county jail from court hearings at which charges against them were dismissed, and of providing privacy screens for female discharges but not male discharges. After entry of summary judgment in the inmates' favor, the defendants moved for reconsideration. The district court granted the motion in part. The court held that male inmates were similarly situated to female potential discharges. The court found that fact issues remained as to whether the county's policies were justified, and whether security considerations prevented the county from segregating inmates against whom charges had been dismissed before they returned to their divisions. The defendants asserted that the much greater number of male inmates in county custody and the differences in the nature and frequency of dangerous incidents in each population justified the policy. The court held that the county's policy and practice of segregating female possible discharges from the remainder of female court returns, such that female actual returns could elect to avoid strip searches, but not segregating male possible discharges in a similar manner, was not gender-neutral on its face, for the purposes of the Equal Protection Clause. (Cook County Department of Corrections, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCHES

Chehade Refai v. Lazaro, 614 F.Supp.2d 1103 (D.Nev. 2009). A German citizen, who was detained by Department of Homeland Security (DHS) officials at a Nevada airport, and later transferred to a local jail, after his name had been erroneously placed on a watch list, brought an action against the United States, DHS officials, a police department, a city, and a police chief, alleging various constitutional violations. The district court granted the DHS and United States motions to dismiss in part, and denied in part. The court held that DHS officials could not bypass constitutional requirements for strip searches and body-cavity searches of non-admitted aliens at a border by sending the German citizen to a detention facility where they allegedly knew strip searches occurred in the absence of reasonable suspicion under circumstances in which the DHS officials could not perform the strip search themselves. According to the court, regardless of any reasonable suspicion that detention center officials had for a strip search, federal officials at the border needed reasonable suspicion for a strip search. The court found that the Fourth Amendment right of a non-admitted alien to be free from a non-invasive, non-abusive strip search absent suspicion to conduct such a search was clearly established in 2006, when the German citizen was detained at an airport, and thus, a DHS officer was not entitled to qualified immunity. The court held that the German citizen who was detained after arriving at a United States airport and was asked to spy for the United States government in order to obtain an entry visa was not subjected to "involuntary servitude" in violation of the Thirteenth Amendment, where the German citizen never actually spied for the United States. The court found that the German citizen adequately alleged that the defendant's actions constituted extreme and outrageous conduct, as required to state claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress under Nevada law, where he alleged that DHS officials told him that if he did not spy for the United States government, he would never be able to return to the United States where his daughter and grandchild lived. According to the court, the detained German citizen's negligence claim, alleging that the United States owed him a duty of care not to cause him to be detained in a local jail when he had not been and was never charged with any criminal offense, was not barred by the discretionary function exception to the Federal Tort Claims Act (FTCA). The court noted that although the government claimed that immigration officials had discretion in choosing where to house aliens, under an Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS) memorandum, the alien should never have been booked into local jail. (North Las Vegas Detention Center, Nevada)

U.S. District Court
CELL SEARCHES

Cox v. Ashcroft, 603 F.Supp.2d 1261 (E.D.Cal. 2009). A prisoner brought a § 1983 action against the United States Attorney General, several federal prosecutors, and the owner and employees of a privately-owned federal facility in which the prisoner was incarcerated, alleging constitutional violations arising from his arrest, prosecution, and incarceration. The district court dismissed the action. The court held that the prisoner did not have any Fourth Amendment rights to privacy in his cell, and thus did not suffer any constitutional injury as a result of the search of his cell and the confiscation of another inmate's legal materials. The court found that the prisoner did not have any liberty or property interest in employment while in prison, and thus the prisoner did not suffer any violation of his due process right related to his termination from his prison job as a result of discipline arising from the search of his cell, precluding liability on the part of facility owner and its employees under § 1983. (Taft Correctional Institution, Wackenhut Corrections Corporation, California)

U.S. District Court
OPPOSITE SEX
PAT DOWN SEARCH
PRIVACY

Forde v. Zickefoose, 612 F.Supp.2d 171 (D.Conn. 2009). A federal prisoner petitioned for a writ of habeas corpus, alleging that she was being denied freedom of religious expression, in violation of the First and Fourth Amendments and the Religious Freedom Restoration Act (RFRA). The district court granted the government's motion for summary judgment in part and denied in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by issues of fact as to: (1) whether the prisoner's exercise of her religion was substantially burdened by the prison's non-emergency cross-gender pat-down search policy; (2) whether the prisoner's exercise of her religion was substantially burdened by the prison's policy of requiring her to carry an identification photograph that showed her without a hijab to cover her head; and, (3) whether the prisoner's exercise of her religion was substantially burdened by the prison's failure to provide an imam during Ramadan. The court held that the prison's non-emergency cross-gender pat-down search policy did not violate the prisoner's limited right, under the Fourth Amendment, to bodily privacy. According to the court, although the prisoner made a sufficient showing of a subjective expectation of privacy, the expectation would not be considered reasonable by society, since the prison had a legitimate penological interest in security and in providing equal employment opportunities to both male and female staff, and no available further accommodation was reasonable under the circumstances. (Federal Correctional Institution, Danbury, Connecticut)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCHES
USE OF FORCE

Jackson v. Gerl, 622 F.Supp.2d 738 (W.D.Wis. 2009). A prisoner brought a § 1983 action against a warden and other prison officials, alleging that the use of a stinger grenade to extract him from his cell constituted excessive force in violation of the Eighth Amendment, and that an abusive strip search following the deployment of the grenade also violated the Eighth Amendment. The defendants moved for summary judgment and the district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that a prison lieutenant's extraction of the prisoner from inside his cell by means of a stinger grenade, which when detonated created a bright flash of light, emitted a loud blast accompanied by smoke, and fired rubber balls, was not "de minimis," as would bar a claim for excessive force under the Eighth Amendment. The court found that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the extraction of the prisoner from his cell by means of a stinger grenade was malicious and sadistic, or whether the use was in a good-faith effort to maintain or restore discipline. The court found that the officials' alleged failure to give the prisoner an opportunity to strip down on his own so that officials could perform a visual inspection of his person rather than be subject to a manual strip search was for a legitimate penological purpose, and thus did not violate the Eighth Amendment as a wanton infliction of psychological pain. The officials decided to manually strip search the prisoner after he had resisted following orders along every step of the way. The court noted that the performance of the strip search in front of a cell, rather than inside a cell, was not done to demean and humiliate the plaintiff, where the cell was not in an area widely visible to prisoners, but rather was at the end of a hall with no cell across from it. (Wisconsin Secure Program Facility)

U.S. District Court
BODY CAVITY SEARCH
PRIVACY
STRIP SEARCHES

Lopez v. Youngblood, 609 F.Supp.2d 1125 (E.D.Cal. 2009). Plaintiffs brought a class action against a county, sheriff, and former sheriff, seeking injunctive relief and damages for alleged violations of his federal and state constitutional rights resulting from strip and/or visual body cavity searches of detainees and inmates of the county jail. The district granted summary judgment in part and denied in part. The court held that the policy of the county sheriff's office of subjecting to strip search all pretrial detainees who are ordered released as a result of court appearances, upon their return from the courthouse and prior to their being returned to the county jail's general population for administrative reasons pending release, violated the detainees' Fourth Amendment rights. The court found that there was no evidence that pretrial detainees at the county jail were subjected to strip searches in small groups as a means of punishment, as required to establish that the strip searches violated the detainees' due process rights. According to the court, pre-arraignment arrestees were not similarly situated to post-arraignment detainees, such that the practice of providing privacy for pre-arraignment strip and/or visual body cavity searches, but not for such searches of post-arraignment detainees, did not violate equal protection, notwithstanding the contention that the interest in maintaining the privacy of one's body cavities was the same for both arrestees and detainees. The court held that the defendants were entitled to qualified immunity because, at the time the county sheriff's office maintained the policy allowing for group strip and visual body cavity searches of post-arraignment detainees of the county jail, it was not clearly established that such searches violated the detainees' Fourth Amendment rights. (Kern County Sheriff's Department, Central Receiving Facility, Ridgecrest, Mojave, and Lerdo facilities, California)

U.S. Appeals Court
STRIP SEARCHES

Mays v. Springborn, 575 F.3d 643 (7th Cir. 2009). A prisoner brought an action against prison officials, asserting claims based on strip searches at prisons and alleged retaliation for his complaints about the searches, denial of his request for dietary supplements which he considered to be religious necessities, alleged inadequacy of his diet, failure to issue certain winter clothing items, and censorship of pages in a magazine mailed to him. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the officials on the claims about prison food and clothing and granted the officials judgment as a matter of law on the claims about strip searches, retaliation, and censorship. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, vacated in part, and remanded. The court held that whether strip searches were conducted in a harassing manner intended to humiliate and cause psychological pain, and whether guards subjected the prisoner to a non-routine search in retaliation for his complaints about strip searches, were questions for the jury. (Stateville Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCHES

Miller v. Yamhill County, 620 F.Supp.2d 1241 (D.Or. 2009). Three inmates of a county correction facility brought a class action against a county and sheriff alleging their policy of strip searching inmates at the facility without reasonable suspicion that they were carrying contraband or weapons was a violation of the Fourth Amendment. The defendants moved for summary judgment and the district court granted the motion. The court held that the sheriff supervising the deputies who conducted allegedly unconstitutional searches was not liable under § 1983, where the sheriff was not personally involved in any of the searches at issue, and there was no causal connection between any conduct of the sheriff and the alleged violations.

The court held that the strip search of an inmate at the facility, who was arrested for threatening someone with a knife and a cane, was reasonable upon the inmate's entry into the general jail population following his completion of a drug treatment program, in light of the underlying menacing charge. The court noted that the inmate was returning to the jail at the time of his choosing and therefore had knowledge that he would be entering the jail, and the inmate was returning from a drug treatment facility because of his possession and use of contraband. According to the court, the strip search of another inmate at the facility, who had been arrested on charges of driving while suspended and the felony of attempt to elude, was reasonable, in light of one of the charges being a felony, and the fact that the inmate had eluded arrest earlier in the day, and therefore knew that the police were looking for him and that he would likely be entering the jail population.

The court found that the strip search of a third inmate at the facility, who had been arrested on driving under the influence of intoxicants (DUII) charges, was reasonable, noting that after her arrest, the inmate managed to remove and conceal her handcuffs in her underwear, and after an extended search of the patrol car and booking area, and repeated denials that she had the handcuffs, the inmate removed the handcuffs from her pants, and deputy concluded that a strip search was necessary on the basis that inmate might be concealing other contraband. (Yamhill County Corrections Facility, Oregon)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCHES

Miller v. Washington County, 650 F.Supp.2d 1113 (D.Or. 2009). Inmates brought a class action against county and sheriff, alleging that the county's policy of strip searching inmates was unconstitutional. The parties cross-moved for summary judgment, and the inmates additionally moved for class certification. The district court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact existed as to whether the county's blanket policy of strip searching all individuals transported from another correctional or detention facility was justified by the need for institutional security. The court denied class certification, finding that the county's strip search policy regarding arrestees did not present common questions of law or fact. The court stayed the action, noting that the appellate court was reviewing a city's strip search policy at the time. (Washington County Jail, Oregon)

U.S. District Court
CELL SEARCHES

Proctor v. Applegate, 661 F.Supp.2d 743 (E.D.Mich. 2009). State prisoners brought a § 1983 action against Michigan Department of Corrections (MDOC) employees and multiple prison facilities, alleging violations of their constitutional rights. The defendants moved to dismiss on statute of limitations grounds and for failure to state a claim upon which relief could be granted. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that state prison regulations which permitted the confiscation of certain types of mail and prohibited "copyrighting" of names served a legitimate and neutral government purpose, and thus did not violate the prisoners' constitutional rights. The court held that allegations in the prisoner's complaint that an MDOC employee would frequently shake down his cell looking for prohibited Uniform Commercial Code (UCC) materials, and that the employee would leave the cell in disarray, failed to state a § 1983 claim against the employee for violation of the prisoner's constitutional rights, given that the prisoner failed to even allege that any legal materials were confiscated. (Michigan Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
PRIVACY
STRIP SEARCHES

Quinones-Ruiz v. Pereira-Castillo, 607 F.Supp.2d 296 (D.Puerto Rico 2009). A state inmate brought a pro se § 1983 action for injunctive and monetary relief against state prison officials, alleging that the requirement that he squat over a mirror set on the floor in order to have his anus examined when moved to different areas of the facility was conducted in a hostile and denigrating manner, and that it humiliated and frustrated him. The district court dismissed the action. The court found that the inmate's complaint failed to provide any details which could lead the court to conclude that the prison's requirement was unreasonable, or that the inmate was an inmate being held for a minor offense or one that did not involve drugs, weapons, or other forms of contraband, as required to state a § 1983 claim for a violation of the inmate's right against unreasonable searches and seizures or cruel and unusual punishment. (Las Cucharas Correctional Facility, Puerto Rico)

U.S. District Court
PRETRIAL DETAINEES
STRIP SEARCHES

Reinhart v. City of Schenectady Police Dept., 599 F.Supp.2d 323 (N.D.N.Y. 2009). An arrestee brought a § 1983 action against a city, police department and officers, alleging Fourth Amendment violations following her arrest for allegedly making harassing telephone calls. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants. The court held that probable cause existed to commence the criminal action and perform the arrest, and that the suspicionless seizure of the arrestee's brassiere while incarcerated qualified as a "special need" for Fourth Amendment purposes. The court noted that the police department had a policy of seizing brassieres purely as a safety measure to preclude their use as a suicide tool, and the policy was implemented in a manner reasonably designed to reduce intrusion on the arrestee's privacy by allowing her to remove the brassiere without disrobing. (Schenectady Police Department, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
BODY CAVITY SEARCH
PRIVACY

Sanchez v. Pereira-Castillo, 590 F.3d 31 (1st Cir. 2009). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 claims against correctional officials, a prison warden, a prison's correctional officer, and a physician, and medical battery and medical malpractice claims against the physician, relating to strip searches, x-rays, rectal examinations, and exploratory surgery to detect and recover suspected contraband. The district court dismissed the suit and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, vacated in part and remanded.

The appeals court held that the digital rectal examinations were not unreasonable where the procedures were the direct culmination of a series of searches that began when a metal detector used to scan the prisoner's person gave a positive reading, the prisoner had two normal bowel movements before the searches were conducted, a physician examined him upon arrival at the hospital and found him to be asymptomatic, and several lab tests were found to be "within normal limits." The court noted that the searches were carried out by medical professionals in the relatively private, sanitary environment of a hospital, upon suspicion that the prisoner had contraband, namely a cell phone, in his rectum, and with no abusive or humiliating conduct on the part of the law enforcement officers or the doctors. But the court found that the exploratory surgery of the abdomen of the prisoner was unreasonable where the surgery required total anesthesia, surgical invasion of the abdominal cavity, and two days of recovery in the hospital. The court noted that the surgery was conducted despite several indications of the absence of contraband, including the results of two monitored bowel movements and two rectal examinations. According to the court, an x-ray, as a much less invasive procedure, could have confirmed the results. The court held that the prisoner's signed consent form for the exploratory surgery of his abdomen did not preclude the prisoner's claim that he was deprived of his Fourth Amendment rights, where the prisoner was pressured and intimidated into signing the consent, had been under constant surveillance for more than a day prior to the surgery, had been forced to submit to searches, x-rays, and invasive rectal examinations prior to his signing the consent form, and had twice been forced to excrete on a floor in the presence of prison personnel.

The court held that the prisoner's allegations against correctional officers were sufficient to allege that the officers caused the hospital's forced exploratory surgery on the prisoner, as required to state a § 1983 claim against the officers. The prisoner alleged that the officers were directly involved in all phases of the search for contraband and in the ultimate decision to transport the prisoner to the hospital for a rectal examination or a medical procedure to remove the foreign object purportedly lodged in the prisoner's rectum. According to the court, the prisoner's allegation that correctional officers exerted pressure on hospital physicians that examined the prisoner was sufficient to allege the state compulsion necessary to state a claim of § 1983 liability against a surgeon. The court found that correctional officers' conduct, in forcing the prisoner to undergo an invasive abdominal surgery, was a violation of a clearly established constitutional right, such that the officers were not entitled to qualified immunity from § 1983 liability. (Bayamón 501 Unit of the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico Administration of Corrections, and Río Piedras Medical Center)

U.S. Appeals Court
PRIVACY
STRIP SEARCHES

Schmidt v. City of Bella Villa, 557 F.3d 564 (8th Cir. 2009). An arrestee brought a § 1983 action against a police chief and city, alleging the chief's photographing of her tattoo violated her rights. The defendants moved for summary judgment and the district court granted the motion. The arrestee appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the chief's photographing of the arrestee's tattoo was not an unreasonable search and did not violate due process, and the photographing of the arrestee's tattoo did not amount to a strip search under Missouri strip search law. The court found that the action of photographing the tattoo did not violate the Fourth Amendment, despite the fact that the arrestee was required to unzip her pants for the photograph and that the photograph was taken by male officer. The court concluded that the photograph served legitimate law enforcement purposes, the chief told the arrestee that photograph was needed for identification purposes, and the photograph was taken in private. The court noted that the arrestee gave a false date of birth and social security number. She was arrested for making a false declaration and for being a minor in possession of alcohol. (City of Bella Villa, Missouri)

U.S. Appeals Court
BODY CAVITY SEARCH
CONTRABAND
PRIVACY
SAME-SEX SEARCH

Serna v. Goodno, 567 F.3d 944 (8th Cir. 2009). A patient of a state mental hospital, involuntarily civilly committed as a sexually dangerous person pursuant to a Minnesota sex offender program, brought a § 1983 action against a program official and against the head of the state's Department of Human Services. The patient alleged that visual body-cavity searches performed on all patients as part of a contraband investigation violated his Fourth Amendment rights. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants, and the patient appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that visual body-cavity searches performed on all patients of a state mental hospital, as part of a contraband investigation following the discovery of a cell-phone case in a common area, did not infringe upon the Fourth Amendment rights of the patient involuntarily civilly committed to the facility as a sexually dangerous person. According to the court, even though facility-wide searches may have constituted a disproportionate reaction, cell phones presented a security threat in the context of sexually violent persons, there was a history of patients' use of phones to commit crimes, and the searches were conducted in a private bathroom with no extraneous personnel present and in a professional manner with same-sex teams of two. (Minnesota Sex Offender Program, Moose Lake, Minnesota)

U.S. District Court
FEMALES
STRIP SEARCHES

Tardiff v. Knox County, 598 F.Supp.2d 115 (D.Me. 2009). After granting a detainee's motion for summary judgment on liability under § 1983 for a strip search she underwent at a county jail, the county moved to exclude the detainee's evidence of lost income or profits allegedly caused by her mental distress growing out of the strip search. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the detainee's tardy pretrial disclosure of economic loss information did not prejudice the county's ability to investigate so as to warrant the exclusion of evidence of the detainee's evidence of lost income or profits. The court found that damages for economic loss based upon a lost future contract were not recoverable in the civil rights suit seeking damages allegedly caused by the detainee's mental distress, since the jury would have to speculate in order to determine whether the detainee suffered an economic loss on a future contract and, if so, how much. (Knox County Jail, Maine)

U.S. Appeals Court
PAROLES
SEARCH WARRANT

U.S. v. Warren, 566 F.3d 1211 (10th Cir. 2009). Following a warrantless search of his residence, a parolee was convicted of being a felon in possession of a firearm and possessing with intent to distribute cocaine base. The parolee appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that a police officer's warrantless search of the parolee's residence was justified under the special-needs exception to the warrant and probable cause requirements, as well as under Colorado law, where the officer searched the residence at the direction of a parole officer. The parolee had signed a written agreement which required him to allow the parole officer to search his person, residence, any premises under his control, or his vehicle. (Colorado)

U.S. District Court
PRETRIAL DETAINEES
PRIVACY
STRIP SEARCHES

Young v. County of Cook, 616 F.Supp.2d 834 (N.D.Ill. 2009). Pretrial detainees brought an action against a county, sheriff, and current and former directors of the county department of corrections, on behalf of themselves and two certified classes, alleging that the county jail's strip search policy for new detainees violated their rights under the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments. The district court granted the parties' motions for summary judgment in part and denied in part. The court held that: (1) the strip search of detainees charged with misdemeanor offenses not involving drugs or weapons violated the Fourth Amendment; (2) the strip searches of members of a class of males who were subjected to a strip search as new detainees before privacy screens were installed violated the Fourth Amendment; (3) issues of material fact precluded summary judgment on the Fourth Amendment claims for the time period after privacy screens were installed; and (4) strip searches before privacy screens were installed violated due process. According to the court, there was no evidence that blanket strip searches were necessary with respect to these class members, and there was no evidence that the strip search of individual class members was required. The court noted that although intermingling with general prisoners may be one factor in evaluating the reasonableness of a prison's strip search policy with respect to new pretrial detainees, that fact standing alone is not enough to justify strip searches of pretrial detainees in the absence of individualized reasonable suspicion. (Cook County Jail, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
PRETRIAL DETAINEES
PRIVACY
STRIP SEARCHES

Young v. County of Cook, 616 F.Supp.2d 856 (N.D.Ill. 2009). Pretrial detainees charged with misdemeanors brought a civil rights class action under § 1983 against a county, a former county sheriff, and sheriff's employees, alleging that the jail's blanket strip search policy violated their Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment rights. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the detainees on the issue of liability and the defendants moved for reconsideration. The district court denied the defendants' motion for reconsideration. The court held that the county could have forfeited its claim to raise the issue that the details of 2,000 contraband reports revealed 832 instances where persons purportedly charged with misdemeanors were found to have contraband money during strip search process, where the county failed to properly bring this evidence to the court's attention during the summary judgment briefing process. According to the court, the deference accorded to the jail's expertise in matters of institutional security did not preclude the court from determining whether the evidence supported the application of the jail's policy of subjecting newly arriving misdemeanor detainees to a blanket policy of strip/body cavity searches. The court noted that the defendants asserted that the district court had "ignored ... downplayed, and ... distorted" the evidence. In its decision, the court responded "Not so. With their submissions, defendants submitted volumes of exhibits that, if stacked up, create a pile over fifteen inches high." (Cook County Jail, Illinois)

2010

U.S. District Court
BODY CAVITY SEARCHES
OPPOSITE SEX
PRIVACY

Antonetti v. Skolnik, 748 F.Supp.2d 1201 (D.Nev. 2010). A prisoner, proceeding pro se, brought a § 1983 action against various prison officials, alleging various constitutional claims, including violations of the First, Fifth, Sixth, Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments. The district court dismissed in part. The court held that the prisoner's allegations were factually sufficient to state a colorable § 1983 claim that prison officials violated the Eighth Amendment by depriving him of needed medical care. The prisoner alleged that he was housed in segregation/isolation, leading to a mental health breakdown, and: (1) that he was seen by mental health professionals eight times over a five year period instead of every 90 days as required by administrative regulations; (2) that mental health professionals recommended he pursue art and music for his mental health but that prison officials denied him the materials; (3) and that the officials' actions resulted in the need to take anti-psychotic and anti-depression medications due to suffering from bouts of aggression, extreme depression, voices, paranoia, hallucinations, emotional breakdowns and distress, unreasonable fear, and systematic dehumanization. The court held that the prisoner's allegations were factually sufficient to state a colorable § 1983 claim for violations of his Fourth Amendment right to be free of unlawful searches and Eighth Amendment right to be free of cruel and unusual punishment. The prisoner alleged that whenever he was moved from his cell to any other location he was made to stand in a brightly lit shower in full view of female employees, made to strip naked, place his bare feet on a filthy floor covered in insects and scum, spread his buttocks, lift his penis, then put his fingers in his mouth without any opportunity to wash his hands, and that the process was unnecessary because inmates were in full restraints, escorted and solitary at all times. The court found that the prisoner's allegations were sufficient to state a colorable § 1983 Eighth Amendment claim for violation of his right to be free of cruel and unusual punishment where the prisoner alleged the exercise provided to him was to stand in a completely enclosed cage alone, in extreme heat or cold without water, shade, exercise equipment or urinals, and that as a result he suffered sunburns, cracked and bleeding lips and a lack of desire to exercise, resulting in a loss of physical and mental health. (High Desert State Prison, Nevada)

U.S. District Court
BODY CAVITY SEARCHES
PRETRIAL DETAINEE
STRIP SEARCHES

Cantley v. West Virginia Regional Jail and Correctional Facility Authority, 728 F.Supp.2d 803 (S.D.W.Va. 2010). A pretrial detainee who was strip searched and deloused brought a class action against a regional jail authority, challenging its strip search and delousing policies. The jail authority moved to dismiss. The district court denied the motion. The court held that the detainee stated a claim in regard to the strip search policy and in regard to the delousing policy. The court found that a jail authority official sued in his individual capacity was not entitled to qualified immunity. The detainee alleged that the jail had a blanket policy of conducting visual cavity strip searches of all pretrial detainees charged with misdemeanors or other minor crimes, regardless of whether the detainees were intermingled with the general population of the jail, and that there was no reasonable suspicion that he harbored weapons or contraband. The court ruled that whether the jail's delousing policy, which allegedly applied to all pretrial detainees, was reasonable under the Fourth Amendment could not be decided on a motion to dismiss. The court noted that the detainee who brought the action against a regional jail authority for alleged civil rights violations was not required to exhaust his administrative remedies under the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA), where he was no longer an inmate at the time he filed suit. (West Virginia Regional Jail and Correctional Facility Authority, Western Regional Jail)

U.S. Appeals Court
STRIP SEARCHES
PRETRIAL DETAINEE

Florence v. Board of Chosen Freeholders of County of Burlington, 621 F.3d 296 (3rd Cir. 2010). Affirmed 132 S.Ct. 1510 (2012). A non-indictable arrestee brought a class action pursuant to § 1983 against two jails, alleging a strip search violated the Fourth Amendment. After granting the motion for class certification, the district court granted the arrestee's motion for summary judgment, denied his motion for a preliminary injunction and denied the jails' motions for qualified and Eleventh Amendment immunity. The jails appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The appeals court held that as a matter of first impression in the circuit, the jails' policy of conducting strip searches of all arrestees upon their admission into the general prison population was reasonable. The court found that jails were not required to provide evidence of attempted smuggling or discovered contraband as justification for the strip search policy. According to the court, the decision to conduct strip searches, rather than use a body scanning chair, was reasonable. The court noted that the chair would not detect non-metallic contraband like drugs, and there was no evidence regarding the efficacy of the chair in detecting metallic objects. The appeals court decision was affirmed by the United States Supreme Court in 2012 (132 S.Ct. 1510). (Burlington County Jail, Essex County Correctional Facility, New Jersey)

U.S. District Court
CROSS GENDER
PAT DOWN SEARCH

Forde v. Baird, 720 F.Supp.2d 170 (D.Conn. 2010). A federal inmate petitioned for a writ of habeas corpus, alleging that she was being denied freedom of religious expression, in violation of the First Amendment and the Religious Freedom Restoration Act (RFRA). The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants, in part, and denied in part. The court held that the Muslim inmate's right to free exercise of religion was substantially burdened, as required to support her claim under RFRA, by a prison policy allowing for non-emergency pat searches of female inmates by male guards, despite prison officials' claim that the inmate's belief was not accurate. The court found that the choice offered the inmate, of violating her understanding of the precepts of Islam, or refusing a search and risking punishment, constituted a substantial burden. The court found that the prison's interest in maintaining safety and security of the female prison through the use of cross-gender pat searches was not compelling, as required to justify a substantial burden on the inmate's right of free exercise of religion under RFRA, where the prison's arguments regarding how and why the cross-gender pat searches promoted safety and security at the prison were actually related to the staffing of the facility, not to its safety and security. According to the court, the prison's interest in avoiding staffing and employment issues at the female prison through the use of cross-gender pat searches was not compelling, as required to justify a substantial burden on the inmate's right of free exercise of religion under RFRA. The court noted that even if the prison's interests in maintaining safety and security and avoiding staffing and employment issues were compelling, cross-gender pat searches were not the least restrictive means of addressing these interests, as required to justify the substantial burden on an inmate's right of free exercise of religion under RFRA, absent evidence that the prison considered and rejected less restrictive practices to cross-gender pat searches. (Federal Correctional Institution in Danbury, Connecticut)

U.S. Appeals Court
STRIP SEARCHES
USE OF FORCE

Forrest v. Prine, 620 F.3d 739 (7th Cir. 2010). A pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against a police officer alleging the officer used excessive force against him when he used a stun gun in a holding cell. The district court entered summary judgment for the officer. The detainee appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the officer did not violate the pretrial detainee's right to be free of illegal search and seizure when he used a stun gun on the detainee while attempting to conduct a strip search in a holding cell following the detainee's arrest. The court held that the officer's decision to use the stun gun on the detainee did not violate the detainee's due process guarantees, where the officer was aware that the detainee had attacked another officer earlier in the night, and the detainee appeared to be intoxicated. The court noted that the detainee was a relatively large man confined in an enclosed space of relatively small area, and he was facing the officer, pacing in the cell, clenching his fists, and yelling obscenities in response to orders to comply with the strip search policy. (Rock Island County Jail, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
CONTRABAND
USE OF FORCE

Hanson v. U.S., 712 F.Supp.2d 321 (D.N.J. 2010). An inmate brought a Federal Tort Claims Act (FTCA) action, alleging that a Bureau of Prisons (BOP) officer slammed his head on the floor and choked him in an attempt to force the inmate to spit out contraband that the inmate was attempting to swallow. The government filed a motion for summary judgment and the district court denied the motion. The court held, for the purposes of the inmate's FTCA claim, under New Jersey law the BOP officers employed unreasonable force while attempting to search the inmate for contraband. According to the court, summary judgment was precluded by material issues of fact regarding whether the BOP officers used reasonable force in holding and searching the inmate. (Federal Correctional Facility in Fort Dix, New Jersey)

U.S. Appeals Court
CELL SEARCHES

Harvey v. Jordan, 605 F.3d 681 (9th Cir. 2010). An inmate brought a suit alleging that prison officials' use of pepper spray to extract him from his cell during a building-wide search of all prisoners' cells constituted excessive force and that his right to due process was denied in connection with a disciplinary charge stemming from his refusal to comply with the search. The district court granted the defendants' motion to dismiss for failure to exhaust administrative remedies under the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA). The inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The court held that the inmate exhausted administrative process, as required by PLRA, for the claim that he was denied due process in connection with a disciplinary charge when prison officials purported to grant relief that resolved his grievance to his satisfaction, a hearing and access to a videotape. The court noted that the inmate was not required to appeal that decision. (Salinas Valley State Prison, California)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCHES

In re Nassau County Strip Search Cases, 742 F.Supp.2d 304 (E.D.N.Y. 2010). Arrestees brought a class action against a county, among others, challenging the county correctional center's blanket strip search policy for newly admitted, misdemeanor detainees. The defendants conceded liability, and following a non-jury trial on the issue of general damages, the district court held that each arrestee was entitled to the same dollar amount per new admit strip search by way of the general damages award, that it would exclude any information concerning the effect that the searches had upon arrestees in awarding general damages, and an award of $500 in general damages to each arrestee was appropriate. (Nassau County, New York)

U.S. District Court
PRIVACY
STRIP SEARCHES

Jones v. Price, 696 F.Supp.2d 618 (N.D.W.Va. 2010). A male inmate brought a § 1983 action against a correctional officer alleging that the officer violated his constitutional rights by requiring him to undergo a strip search in a non-private area in front of a female booking clerk. The district court denied the officer's motion for summary judgment. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the correctional officer conducted the strip search in a reasonably necessary manner. The court noted that the inmate's right to keep his genitals private from unreasonable exposure to members of the opposite sex was clearly established at the time of the search. (Tygart Valley Regional Jail, West Virginia)

U.S. District Court
CELL SEARCHES
USE OF FORCE

Kendrick v. Faust, 682 F.Supp.2d 932 (E.D. Ark. 2010). A female state prison inmate brought a § 1983 action against employees of the Arkansas Department of Correction (ADC), alleging various violations of her constitutional rights. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the inmate failed to allege that she sustained an actual injury or that an Arkansas Department of Correction (ADC) official denied her the opportunity to review her mail prior to its being confiscated, as required to support a claim that the official violated the inmate's constitutional right of access to the courts and her First Amendment right to send and receive mail. The court found that an ADC employee's use of force against the inmate was justified by the inmate's disruptive behavior during the search of her cell and thus did not give rise to the ADC employee's liability on an excessive force claim. The inmate alleged that the ADC employee grabbed her by the arm, dragged her from her cell, and threw her into the shower. The court note that there was no medical evidence that the ADC employee's use of handcuffs caused any permanent injury to the inmate as required to support a claim that the employee used excessive force against the inmate. The court found that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether there was a legitimate penological interest for the alleged destruction of the prison inmate's bible, precluding summary judgment as to whether ADC employees violated the inmate's right to freedom of religion by destroying her bible. (Arkansas Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
CROSS GENDER
STRIP SEARCHES

McIllwain v. Weaver, 686 F.Supp.2d 894 (E.D.Ark. 2010). An arrestee brought a § 1983 action against a city, county, and law enforcement officers challenging his strip search. The defendants moved for summary judgment, and the arrestee moved for partial summary judgment. The district court granted the motions in part and denied in part. The court held that special circumstances justified the presence of a male sheriff's deputy during the strip search of the female arrestee who was being booked into jail, and thus, the male deputy's presence during the strip search did not violate the arrestee's Fourth Amendment rights. The court noted that the male deputy came to the cell in which the arrestee was being searched only after the arrestee began physically resisting the efforts of a female officer to perform the strip search, and the female officer called for help. The court found that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to what the county policy or custom was with respect to strip searches of arrestees, and as to the adequacy of the county's training procedures for strip searches. (Sharp County Jail, Arkansas)

U.S. Appeals Court
STRIP SEARCHES

Nunez v. Duncan, 591 F.3d 1217 (9th Cir. 2010). A federal inmate brought a pro se Bivens action against prison officials, alleging he was subjected to a random strip search in violation of his First, Fourth, and Eighth Amendment rights. The district court entered summary judgment for the officials, and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the strip search of the inmate pursuant to a policy authorizing strip searches of inmates returning from outside work detail was reasonably related to a legitimate penological interest in controlling contraband within the prison, and thus did not violate the inmate's Fourth Amendment rights. (Federal Prison Camp, Sheridan, Oregon)

U.S. Appeals Court VEHICLES

True v. Nebraska, 612 F.3d 676 (8th Cir. 2010). A former correctional facility employee brought a § 1983 action against the Nebraska Department of Correctional Services (DCS) and correctional officials, alleging violations of his First, Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment rights. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants and the employee appealed. The appeals court reversed in part, affirmed in part, and remanded. The appeals court held that the former employee had standing to bring the § 1983 action against the Department and correctional officials, where the employee lost his job due to enforcement of a department policy of randomly searching employee vehicles, and the employee sought reinstatement, lost pay and an injunction prohibiting enforcement of the policy. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to the circumstances of inmate access to the correctional facility parking lot. The employee was terminated because he refused to permit a search of his vehicle. The court held that the Department's policy of random, suspicionless searches of only employees' vehicles, rather than including visitors' vehicles, was rationally related to a legitimate state interest of institutional security, contraband interdiction and administrative efficiency. The court noted that employees' vehicles were at the facility daily, making it easier to smuggle contraband. (Lincoln Correctional Center, Nebraska)

U.S. District Court
BODY CAVITY
SEARCHES

U.S. v. Ghailani, 751 F.Supp.2d 508 (S.D.N.Y. 2010). A defendant, an alleged member of Al Qaeda charged with conspiring to kill Americans abroad, moved for an order directing the Bureau of Prisons (BOP) to cease from employing visual inspection of his rectal area when entering or leaving a correctional center for court appearances. The district court denied the motion, finding that the search policy was justified by a legitimate governmental interest in protecting the safety of prison and court personnel and other inmates. The court noted that the policy was adopted at the national level in recognition of the substantial danger that inmates will secrete weapons or other contraband in body cavities, that the government made a credible showing that ready alternatives were not available to protect this important security interest, and that the defendant's Sixth Amendment rights would be protected adequately by existing procedures. (Metropolitan Correctional Center, Manhattan, New York)

2011

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCHES
PRETRIAL DETAINEES

Augustin v. Jablonsky, 819 F.Supp.2d 153 (E.D.N.Y. 2011). Arrestees brought a class action against a county challenging the county correctional center's blanket strip search policy for newly admitted, misdemeanor detainees. After the county admitted liability, the plaintiffs' class action involving more than 17,000 members was certified for the issue of general damages and the district court awarded general damages of $500 per strip search. The county moved to decertify the class for purposes of determining the issue of arrestees' special damages. The district court granted the motion. The court held that the resolution of special damages could not proceed on a class-wide basis, since questions of law or fact common to the class no longer predominated over questions affecting individuals. (Nassau County Correctional Center, New York)

U.S. District Court
CELL SEARCHES
USE OF FORCE

Bailey v. Hughes, 815 F.Supp.2d 1246 (M.D.Ala. 2011). A state prisoner brought an action against a county sheriff's department, a sheriff, corrections officers, and others, alleging unconstitutional deprivations of his rights while in custody in a county jail. The defendants moved to dismiss and for an award of attorney fees. The district court granted the motions. The district court held that: (1) neither the Fourteenth Amendment nor the Fourth Amendment's excessive force prohibition applied to the sentenced offender; (2) the sheriff and supervisory officials were entitled to qualified immunity; (3) allegations did not state an Eighth Amendment claim based on jail overcrowding; (4) the officers' alleged conduct in tasering the prisoner did not violate the Eighth Amendment; (5) allegations did not state a § 1983 claim for an unconstitutional strip search; (6) placement of the prisoner alone in closet-sized cell for eight hours after the alleged incident did not amount to unconstitutional confinement; and (7) the officers' alleged conduct in searching the prisoner's cell did not amount to retaliation for prisoner's prior lawsuit. The court noted that the prisoner admitted that he repeatedly refused the officers' verbal commands and fled his cell, he was repeatedly warned that he would be shocked if he did not comply with the officers' commands, and he was shocked by a taser only once before he fled his cell and then two to three times after he did so. (Houston County Jail, Alabama)

U.S. District Court
PRETRIAL DETAINEES
STRIP SEARCHES

Bame v. Dillard, 637 F.3d 380 (D.C.Cir. 2011). Arrestees, who were arrested while protesting International Monetary Fund (IMF) and World Bank policies in the District of Columbia, brought a Bivens action against a former United States Marshal, alleging that they had been subjected to unconstitutional strip searches upon being processed into holding cells at a courthouse. The arrestees moved for summary judgment as to liability, and the Marshal moved for summary judgment on the issue of qualified immunity. The district court denied those motions. On appeal, the appeals court reversed and remanded. The court held that there was no clearly established constitutional prohibition of strip searching arrestees without individualized, reasonable suspicion. According to the court, strip searching of all male arrestee demonstrators or protestors engaged in civil disobedience, in a locality that had a persistent problem with contraband being smuggled into a cellblock, prior to their commingled placement in holding cells, without individualized, reasonable suspicion had not been prohibited by the Fourth Amendment at the time of the incident, and therefore the supervising United States Marshal was entitled to qualified immunity. (U. S. Marshal for the Superior Court of the District of Columbia)

U.S. Appeals Court
EMPLOYEE

Braun v. Maynard, 652 F.3d 557 (4th Cir. 2011). Prison employees brought a § 1983 action against prison officials, alleging that a search using a portable ion scanning machine violated their Fourth Amendment rights. The district court granted the officials' motion to dismiss and the employees appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that it was not clearly established that the use of an ion scanning machine to detect drugs and other chemicals could not create reasonable suspicion to justify a strip search, and therefore, prison officials were entitled to qualified immunity from the § 1983 action by prison employees alleging that a strip search following a positive scan violated the Fourth Amendment. The court found that it was not clearly established that the Fourth Amendment was violated by strip searches of prison employees conducted in a restroom with a same-sex prison officer following a positive test from an ion scanning machine that could detect drugs and other chemicals, and therefore, officers and officials were entitled to qualified immunity in the employee's § 1983 action. (Maryland Correctional Training Center)

U.S. Appeals Court
OPPOSITE SEX
PRETRIAL DETAINEE
STRIP SEARCHES

Byrd v. Maricopa County Sheriff's Dept., 629 F.3d 1135 (9th Cir. 2011). A male pretrial detainee, proceeding pro se, brought a § 1983 action against a female cadet and a sheriff's department, alleging violations of the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments. The district court entered judgment in favor of the defendants. The ruling was affirmed on appeal. After granting a rehearing en banc, the appeals court reversed and remanded. The appeals court held that the strip search of the male pretrial detainee by a female cadet was unreasonable in violation of the Fourth Amendment, where the cadet touched the detainee's inner and outer thighs, buttocks and genital area with her latex gloved hand through very thin boxer shorts, the female cadet moved the detainee's penis and scrotum in the process of conducting the search, the cadet wore only jeans and a white t-shirt without any identification other than a name printed on the back of the shirt, ten to fifteen non-participating officers watched the search, and at least one person videotaped the search. (Maricopa County Sheriff, Arizona)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCHES

Johnson v. Government of Dist. of Columbia, 780 F.Supp.2d 62 (D.D.C. 2011). Female arrestees, who were arrested for non-drug and non-violent offenses, brought an action against the District of Columbia and a former United States Marshal for the Superior Court, among others, alleging that the defendants' blanket policy of subjecting them to "drop, squat, and cough" strip searches before presentment to a judicial official violated their rights to be free from unreasonable searches under the Fourth Amendment, and their rights to equal protection under the Fifth Amendment. The marshal moved for summary judgment. The court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the Marshal was entitled to qualified immunity from the Fourth Amendment claim and that there was no evidence that the Marshal implemented a policy that directed the blanket practice of strip searching female arrestees, as would support a Fifth Amendment claim, nor that the Marshal knew of a blanket practice of strip searching female arrestees. The court noted that the law at the time of the searches did not clearly establish that strip searching female arrestees prior to presentment to a judicial official violated the Fourth Amendment. (U.S. Marshal for the Superior Court of the District of Columbia)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCHES

Rattray v. Woodbury County, Iowa, 788 F.Supp.2d 839 (N.D.Iowa 2011.) A detainee sued a county, claiming that her civil rights were violated by a strip search conducted by jail employees. Following a jury verdict awarding substantial damages, the county moved for a new trial or for a reduction of the jury's award. The court granted the motion. The court held that a new trial was warranted because it was impossible to determine why the jury, in its first verdict, awarded $5,000 for past emotional distress, and then a few minutes later awarded her $250,000 for past emotional distress in a second verdict. The court noted that, after the jury learned it could not award $250,000 in nominal damages, it drastically increased its initial award of $5,000 for past emotional distress to $250,000 in the second verdict, and while the jury may have intended the $250,000 award as punitive damages, such damages were not pled, and the jury had been instructed that such damages could not be awarded. (Woodbury County Jail, Iowa)

2012

U.S. Appeals Court
STRIP SEARCHES

Beaulieu v. Ludeman, 690 F.3d 1017 (8th Cir. 2012). Patients who were civilly committed to the Minnesota Sex Offender Program (MSOP) brought a § 1983 action against Minnesota Department of Human Services (DHS) officials and Minnesota Department of Corrections (DOC) officials, alleging that various MSOP policies and practices relating to the patients' conditions of confinement were unconstitutional. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants and the patients appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that: (1) the MSOP policy of performing unclothed body searches of patients was not unreasonable; (2) the policy of placing full restraints on patients during transport was not unreasonable; (3) officials were not liable for using excessive force in handcuffing patients; (4) the officials' seizure of televisions from the patients' rooms was not unreasonable; (5) the MSOP telephone-use policy did not violate the First Amendment; and (6) there was no evidence that officials were deliberately indifferent to the patients' health or safety. (Minnesota Sex Offender Program)

U.S. Appeals Court
STRIP SEARCHES

Davis v. Prison Health Services, 679 F.3d 433 (6th Cir. 2012). A homosexual state inmate, proceeding pro se and in forma pauperis, brought an action against prison health services, the health unit manager, the public works supervisor, and a corrections officer, alleging that he was improperly removed from his employment in a prison public-works program because of his sexual orientation. The district court dismissed the complaint for failure to state a claim and the inmate appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The court held that the inmate stated an equal protection claim against prison personnel by alleging that: (1) public-works officers supervising his work crew treated him differently than other inmates, ridiculed and belittled him, and "made a spectacle" of him when they brought him back to the correctional facility after a public-works assignment because of his sexual orientation; (2) the officers did not want to strip search him because he was homosexual and would make "under the breath" remarks when selected to do so; and there were similarly situated, non-homosexual, insulin-dependent diabetic inmates who participated in the public-works program and who were allowed to continue working in the program after an episode in which the inmate believed he was experiencing low blood sugar, which turned out to be a false alarm, while the inmate was removed from the program. (Florence Crane Corr'l Facility, Michigan)

U.S. Appeals Court
CELL SEARCHES

Kendrick v. Pope, 671 F.3d 686 (8th Cir. 2012). A female state inmate brought a civil rights action against a corrections officer who allegedly confiscated religious items during a cell shakedown. The district court dismissed the inmate's claims and she appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded, finding that genuine issues of material fact precluded summary judgment. According to the court, summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the corrections officer confiscated the inmate's Catholic Bible, rosary beads, and other religious materials during a cell shakedown, and subsequently failed to return those items. (McPherson Unit, Arkansas Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
PAT DOWN SEARCHES
PRIVACY
STRIP SEARCHES

Knows His Gun v. Montana, 866 F.Supp.2d 1235 (D.Mont. 2012). Native American state prisoners brought an action against a state, the state department of corrections (DOC), a private prison facility, and wardens, alleging violations of the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA). Defendants filed motion to dismiss. The district court held that: (1) the allegations were sufficient to plead the searches were a substantial burden on their religious exercise; (2) the allegations were sufficient plead the confiscations and prohibitions were a substantial burden on their religious exercise; (3) the allegations about relieving a prisoner from the pipe carrier position were sufficient to plead it was a substantial burden on his religious exercise; (4) transferred prisoners did not have standing for claims for injunctive and declaratory relief; (5) the private facility was a state actor; and (6) the private facility was an instrumentality of the state. The Native American prisoners' alleged that the prison subjected them to en masse strip searches before and after sweat lodge ceremonies, that the searches sometimes occurred in a hallway where other inmates could see them and at least one occurred in a gym with video cameras monitored by a female guard, and that some inmates declined to participate in the ceremony due to the degrading nature of the searches. According to the court, the prisoners' allegations that sacred items were confiscated or prohibited by the prison for their sweat lodge ceremonies, including smudge tobacco and antlers, and that the items were essential for the ceremony to be meaningful and proper were sufficient to plead confiscations and prohibitions were a substantial burden on their religious exercise, as required for their claims under RLUIPA. The prisoner also alleged that they were subject to pat down searches before and after entering the ceremonial sweat lodge grounds, that they were provided insufficient water and toilet facilities, that the size of the sweat lodge and the frequency of the ceremonies was inadequate, and that they were not provided a Native American spiritual advisor. (Montana Department of Corrections; Corrections Corporation of America; Crossroads Correctional Center)

U.S. District Court
PRETRIAL DETAINEES
STRIP SEARCHES

Rattray v. Woodbury County, Iowa, 908 F.Supp.2d 976 (N.D.Iowa 2012). Misdemeanor arrestees brought a civil rights action against a county and law enforcement officials, alleging that their Fourth Amendment rights were violated when they were searched pursuant to a "blanket" policy authorizing strip searches of all arrestees facing serious misdemeanor or more serious charges. Following the grant of summary judgment, in part, in favor of the arrestees, the county moved for reconsideration. The court granted the motion, in part. The court held that the recent Supreme Court decision in Florence, which held that reasonable suspicion was generally not required to strip search pretrial detainees, subject to possible exceptions, was an intervening change in the law, justifying reconsideration. According to the court, the county's strip search policy was reasonable under the Fourth Amendment, regardless of whether arrestees would be put into the general population. But the court found that summary judgment was precluded on the arrestee's claim that the manner of a strip search was unreasonable. (Woodbury County Jail, Iowa)

U.S. District Court
DNA- Deoxy Ribonucleic Acid
PRIVACY

U.S. v. Fricosu, 844 F.Supp.2d 1201 (D.Colo. 2012). A defendant moved for an order requiring that the DNA sample taken when she presented herself to the United States Marshal for processing and any DNA profiles developed from it be destroyed. The district court denied the motion. The court held that the defendant's Fourth Amendment rights were not violated when the sample was taken and was later furnished to the FBI for analysis and inclusion in a Combined DNA Index System. The court noted that although a vast amount of sensitive information could be mined from the defendant's DNA, the statute authorizing the taking of the sample specified for the limited purposes for which the DNA profile could be used. (United States Marshal, Denver, Colorado)

U.S. Appeals Court
PAT DOWN SEARCHES
STRIP SEARCHES
USE OF FORCE

Washington v. Hively, 695 F.3d 641 (7th Cir. 2012). A federal pretrial detainee filed a § 1983 action alleging that a county jail guard improperly touched him during a pat down and strip search. The detainee alleged that while patting him down, the guard spent five to seven seconds gratuitously fondling the plaintiff's testicles and penis through the plaintiff's clothing and then while strip searching him fondled his nude testicles for two or three seconds, contrary to a jail policy which forbids touching the inmate in the course of a strip search, and again without any justification. The district court entered summary judgment in the guard's favor, and the detainee appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The appeals court held that: (1) the detainee's allegation that the guard touched his private parts to humiliate him or to gratify the guard's sexual desires was sufficient to state a claim, whether or not the force exerted by the guard was significant; (2) fact issues remained as to the guard's subjective intent in conducting the pat down and strip search; and (3) a statute barring federal civil actions by prisoners for mental or emotional injuries absent a showing of physical injury did not bar the pretrial detainee from seeking both nominal and punitive damages in his § 1983 action, even though the detainee did not claim to have suffered any physical injury. (Waukesha County Jail, Wisconsin)

2013

U.S. Appeals Court
CELL SEARCHES
CONTRABAND
DRUG TEST

Chappell v. Mandeville, 706 F.3d 1052 (9th Cir. 2013). A state prison inmate brought a § 1983 action against prison officials, alleging violations of the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments. The defendants moved for summary judgment on the ground of qualified immunity and the district court granted summary judgment as to some, but not all, of the claims. The defendants appealed. The appeals court reversed. The appeals court held that: (1) it was not clearly established that subjecting the prison inmate to a contraband watch violated the Eighth Amendment prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment, and thus prison officials were entitled to qualified immunity on the Eighth Amendment claim; (2) the contraband watch was not such an extreme change in conditions of confinement as to trigger due-process protection; and (3) it was not clearly established whether a state-created liberty interest existed with regard to the contraband watch, and thus officials were entitled to qualified immunity on the claim that the inmate's right to due process was violated because he was not provided with an opportunity to be heard by the official who ordered contraband watch.

The inmate's fiancée had visited him, and when she entered the prison she was wearing a ponytail hairpiece. The next day the hairpiece was discovered in a trash can near the visiting room. Prison officials then searched the entire visiting area and found spandex undergarments in the women's bathroom. Both the hairpiece and the undergarments tested positive for cocaine residue. Prison staff conducted a search of the inmate's cell, during which they notified him that they believed that someone had introduced drugs through a hairpiece. The officials discovered three unlabelled bottles of what appeared to be eye drops in the inmate's cell. The liquid in the bottles tested positive for methamphetamine. The inmate was then placed on a contraband watch. The contraband watch conditions included 24-hour lighting, mattress deprivation, taping the inmate into two pairs of underwear and jumpsuits, placing him in a hot cell with no ventilation, chaining him to an iron bed, shackling him at the ankles and waist, and forcing him to eat "like a dog." (California State Prison, Sacramento)

U.S. District Court
RETALIATION
PRETRIAL DETAINEES
STRIP SEARCHES
USE OF FORCE

Clay v. Woodbury County, Iowa, 982 F.Supp.2d 904 (N.D.Iowa 2013). A female arrestee brought a § 1983 action against a city, an arresting officer, county, county sheriff, and jail officers, alleging, among other things, that jail officers "strip searched" her without reasonable suspicion and in unconstitutional manner, and did so in retaliation for her vociferous complaints about her detention and the search of her purse and cell phone. The defendants moved for summary judgment, and the arrestee moved to exclude expert testimony. The district court held that the expert's reference to an incorrect standard for the excessive force claim did not warrant excluding his opinions in their entirety, although portions of the expert's report were inadmissible.

The court found that the incident in which male and female county jail officers forcibly removed the female arrestee's under-wire bra and changed her into jail attire was not a "strip search" within the meaning of the Iowa law which defined a "strip search" as "having a person remove or arrange some or all of the person's clothing so as to permit an inspection of the genitalia, buttocks, female breasts or undergarments of that person or a physical probe by any body cavity," where there was no indication that the officers inspected the arrestee's private parts or physically probed any of her body cavities. The court also found that the arrestee whose clothing was forcibly removed in the presence of male and female county jail officers in a holding cell after the arrestee refused to answer questions during the booking process and to remove her clothing herself, was not subjected to a "strip search" requiring reasonable suspicion under the Fourth Amendment. According to the court, the officers did not violate the arrestee's privacy rights under the Fourth Amendment where the officers' reason for removing the arrestee's bra-- institutional safety-- was substantially justified, and the scope of the intrusion was relatively small. The court also found that the officers were entitled to qualified immunity from the female arrestee's § 1983 unlawful search claim, where the officers neither knew, nor reasonably should have known, that their actions would violate the arrestee's privacy rights. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the amount of force used by female county jail officers during the booking process to forcibly remove the female arrestee's under-wire bra and change her into jail attire after the arrestee refused to answer questions, became disruptive, and refused to remove her clothing herself, was reasonable. The officers allegedly threw the arrestee onto the cell bunk, causing her to bang her head against the bunk or cell wall. The court found that male county jail officers did not use excessive force, within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment, in restraining the female arrestee in a holding cell after the female officers had allegedly thrown the arrestee onto a cell bunk, causing her to bang her head against bunk or cell wall, in an effort to forcibly remove the arrestee's clothing and to change her into jail attire. (Woodbury County Jail, Iowa)

U.S. District Court
EVIDENCE
RETALIATION
SEARCH WARRANT

Donahoe v. Arpaio, 986 F.Supp.2d 1091 (D.Ariz. 2013). A former member of a county board of supervisors brought an action against the sheriff of Maricopa County, Arizona, a former county attorney, and deputy county attorneys, asserting claims under § 1983 and state law for wrongful institution of civil proceedings, malicious prosecution, false imprisonment and arrest, intentional infliction of emotional distress, and unlawful search. The parties cross-moved for summary judgment. The district court denied the plaintiff's motion, and granted in part and denied in part the defendants' motions. The court held that summary judgment for the defendants was precluded by fact issues: (1) with respect to the malicious prosecution claims; (2) as to whether misrepresentations and omissions of evidence in a search warrant affidavit were material; (3) as to unlawful search claims against the sheriff and deputy county attorneys; (4) with respect to the false arrest claim; and (5) with respect to the claim for wrongful institution of civil proceedings. The court noted that a reasonable magistrate would not have issued a search warrant based on the accurate and complete representation of known evidence. The court held that the retaliatory animus of the county sheriff and prosecutors would chill a person of ordinary firmness from criticizing the sheriff and prosecutors and from vigorously litigating against them. According to the court, fact issues as to whether the county sheriff and prosecutors acted outrageously and either intended the arrestee harm, or were recklessly indifferent to whether their actions would infringe on his rights and cause him severe distress, precluded summary judgment for the defendants with regard to the claim for punitive damages in the action for unlawful search, false arrest, malicious prosecution, and First Amendment violations. (Maricopa County Sheriff and County Attorneys, Arizona)

U.S. District Court
PAT DOWN SEARCH
USE OF FORCE

Gwathney v. Warren, 930 F.Supp.2d 1313 (M.D.Ala. 2013). An inmate filed a Bivens suit against a prison officer and others for use of excessive force during a pat-down search, alleging violation of the Eighth Amendment prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment, and other claims. All claims except the excessive use of force claim were dismissed. The officer filed a renewed motion to dismiss on the grounds of qualified immunity, or in the alternative for summary judgment. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the officer. The court held that evidence did not create a fact issue as to whether the prison official maliciously or sadistically inflicted pain on the inmate while conducting a pat-down search, as required for the inmate to survive summary judgment on the defense of qualified immunity. According to the court, when the officer entered the inmate's cubicle, he observed the inmate rise from his bunk, turn, and place his hand down front of his pants, which typically signaled that an inmate was trying to conceal an object. The inmate was facing away from the officer when the officer began the pat-down and thus, the inmate could not observe any expression or movement suggesting that the officer had any malicious motive in touching the inmate's shoulders. Even after the inmate fell to his knees from post-surgery shoulder pain, the officer's statement "[o]h, you still can't raise your arm" did not indicate malice for the sole purpose of inflicting pain, but rather supported an inference that the officer still did not believe the inmate's assertion about shoulder surgery and that he could not raise his arm. (Federal Prison Camp, Montgomery, Alabama)

U.S. District Court
PRETRIAL DETAINEES
STRIP SEARCHES

Haas v. Burlington County, 955 F.Supp.2d 334 (D.N.J. 2013). Arrestees filed a proposed class action under § 1983 alleging that their constitutional rights were violated when they were strip searched at a county jail. The district court granted the arrestees' motion for leave to file an amended complaint, and the county appealed. The district court affirmed in part and reversed in part. The court held that the arrestees' proposed amendment to their complaint, in which they alleged that they were arrested for minor offenses, that they either were held, or could have been held, outside of the general jail population, and that they were subjected to strip searches pursuant to the county's blanket policy before their detentions had been reviewed by a judicial officer, stated plausible claims for violation of their rights under Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments. (Burlington Co.Jail, New Jersey)

U.S. District Court
PRETRIAL DETAINEES
STRIP SEARCH

In re Nassau County Strip Search Cases, 958 F.Supp.2d 339 (E.D.N.Y. 2013). Arrestees brought a class action against county officials and others, challenging a county correctional center's blanket strip search policy for newly admitted, misdemeanor detainees. The defendants moved for reconsideration and to vacate a prior order granting summary judgment in favor of the arrestees on the liability issue. The district court granted the motion in part and denied the motion in part. The court held that: (1) the defendants' concession of liability did not, in and of itself, divest the court of discretion to reconsider its prior order granting summary judgment in favor of the arrestees on the issue of liability; (2) the Florence v. Board of Chosen Freeholders decision was an intervening change in the controlling federal law, justifying the district court's reconsideration of a prior order granting summary judgment in favor of the arrestees on their federal claim; and (3) the Florence decision did not justify reconsideration of a prior grant of summary judgment on the New York state constitutional claim. (Nassau County Correctional Center, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
STRIP SEARCHES
QUALIFIED IMMUNITY

Johnson v. Government of Dist. of Columbia, 734 F.3d 1194 (D.C. Cir. 2013). Female arrestees who were forced to endure strip searches while awaiting presentment at hearings at the District of Columbia Superior Court filed a class action against the District of Columbia and a former United States Marshal for the Superior Court, alleging that such searches violated the Fourth Amendment. They also alleged a violation of the Fifth Amendment's equal protection guarantee, where men were not similarly strip searched. The district court granted summary judgment to the District and the Marshal. The arrestees appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court found that the former marshal who administered the Superior Court cellblock was at all times a federal official acting under the color of federal law, and, thus, the District of Columbia could not be held liable under § 1983 for the marshal's conduct. The court noted that the statutory scheme gave the District of Columbia no power to exercise authority over, or to delegate authority to, the marshal, and lacked the discretion to stop sending pre-presentment arrestees to the marshal. According to the court, any Fourth Amendment right that the former United States Marshal may have violated by subjecting detainees arrested on minor charges to blanket strip searches was not clearly established at the time of any violation, and therefore the marshal was entitled to qualified immunity on the detainees' claims alleging violations of their Fourth Amendment rights. The court also found no evidence that the marshal purposefully directed that women should be treated differently than men with respect to the strip-search policy at the Superior Court cellblock, in violation of the Fifth Amendment's equal protection guarantee. (District of Columbia, United States Marshal for the Superior Court)

U.S. Appeals Court
STRIP SEARCHES

Mays v. Springborn, 719 F.3d 631 (7th Cir. 2013). A former state prisoner brought an action against prison officials, asserting claims based on strip searches at prisons and alleging retaliation for his complaints about the searches, denial of his request for a dietary supplements which he considered to be religious necessities, inadequacy of his diet, failure to issue certain winter clothing items, and censorship of pages in a magazine mailed to him. The district granted summary judgment in favor of the officials on the claims about prison food and clothing and granted the officials judgment as a matter of law on the claims about strip searches, retaliation, and censorship. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, vacated the judgment with respect to the strip searches, and remanded. On remand, the district court entered judgment, upon a jury verdict, in favor of the officials as to the strip search claims, and the prisoner again appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The appeals court held that: (1) even if there was a valid penological reason for the strip searches conducted on a prisoner, the manner in which the searches were conducted was itself required to pass constitutional muster, and (2) a jury instruction requiring the prisoner to negate the possibility that strip searches would have occurred even if there had been no retaliatory motive was plain error. (Stateville Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
STRIP SEARCHES
PRIVACY

McCreary v. Richardson, 738 F.3d 651 (5th Cir. 2013). A Muslim state inmate brought an action against a prison captain in his individual capacity, alleging that the captain ordered an unconstitutional strip search and prevented him from attending religious services in violation of the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Person's Act (RLUIPA), and the First, Fourth, and Fourteenth Amendments. The district court denied the inmate's motion for default judgment and granted the captain's motion for summary judgment. The inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that: (1) the inmate was not entitled to monetary damages against a correctional officer under the provisions of RLUIPA; (2) the strip search did not violate the inmate's Fourth Amendment rights; (3) a reasonable officer would not know that a lengthy strip search in the presence of female officers violated clearly established law, and thus the captain was entitled to qualified immunity; and (4) the captain did not act in an objectively unreasonable manner by refusing to permit the inmate to attend a religious service after the search, where the inmate had created a disturbance during the search. According to the court, the inmate's potentially provocative questions in a public hallway constituted a disturbance, where during the strip search, the inmate asked the captain why he was singling out Muslims and subjecting them to harassment in a hallway with several other Muslim inmates who were waiting to attend a religious service. (H.H. Coffield Unit, Texas Department of Criminal Justice)

U.S. District Court
PAROLEES

Nelson v. District of Columbia, 953 F.Supp.2d 128 (D.D.C., 2013). A jury ruled in favor of an apartment resident in her and an arrestee's action against a police officer for false arrest and imprisonment and Fourth Amendment violations stemming from a search of the residence she shared with the arrestee. The officer moved for judgment as a matter of law (JMOL). The court held that the officer violated the resident's Fourth Amendment rights by detaining and handcuffing her for two hours while executing a weapons search of the apartment. According to the court, the evidence was sufficient to support the conclusion that the police officer lacked sufficient safety or efficacy concerns to justify under the Fourth Amendment detaining and handcuffing the resident's hands behind her back for two hours. The court noted that the officer did not assert that the arrestee was a gang member or express any concern that an armed cohort of the arrestee might be present, the arrestee was in jail at the time of the search, and the resident was at home alone and in underwear when the police arrived. (District of Columbia)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCHES

Page v. Mancuso, 999 F.Supp.2d 269 (D.D.C. 2013). A pretrial detainee brought an action in the Superior Court for the District of Columbia, against the District of Columbia and a police officer, alleging unlawful arrest in violation of the Fourth Amendment, and deliberate indifference to the arrestee's over-detention and strip search. The detainee also alleged that the District maintained a custom and practice of strip searches in violation of the Fourth and Fifth Amendments. The defendants removed the action to federal court and filed a partial motion to dismiss. The district court granted the motion. The court held that the detainee's complaint failed to allege that the District of Columbia was deliberately indifferent to Fourth and Fifth Amendment violations jail officials inflicted upon the detainee when they subjected him to "over-detention" and strip searches, as required to state a claim against District for Fourth and Fifth Amendment violations under the theory of municipal liability. (D.C. Jail)

U.S. District Court
OPPOSITE SEX
PRETRIAL DETAINEES
PRIVACY
QUALIFIED IMMUNITY
STRIP SEARCHES

Shaw v. District of Columbia, 944 F.Supp.2d 43 (D.D.C. 2013). A former pretrial detainee, a transgender woman, who underwent sex reassignment surgery and had her sex legally changed to female, brought an action against the United States Marshals Service (USMS), USMS marshals, District of Columbia, a police chief, and police officers, alleging under § 1983 that the defendants violated her Fourth Amendment rights in connection with her arrests, and asserting claims under the District of Columbia Human Rights Act and tort law. The police chief, officer, and USMS defendants moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The district court held that the USMS marshals were not entitled to qualified immunity from the unlawful search claim, where a reasonable officer would have known that a cross-gender search of a female detainee by male USMS employees that included intimate physical contact, exposure of private body parts, and verbal harassment, all in front of male detainees and male USMS employees, in the absence of an emergency, was unreasonable. The court also found that the USMS marshals and the police officer were not entitled to qualified immunity from a § 1983 Fifth Amendment conditions of confinement claim brought by the pretrial detainee, arising from the defendants' actions in holding the detainee with male detainees and otherwise treating her as if she were male. According to the court, a reasonable officer would know that treating the female detainee as the detainee was treated exposed her to a substantial risk of serious harm, and, therefore, would know that those actions violated the detainee's due process rights. (District of Columbia Metropolitan Police Department, Sixth District Police Station and MPD's Central Cellblock, and United States Marshals Service)

U.S. Appeals Court
STRIP SEARCHES

Stoudemire v. Michigan Dept. of Corrections, 705 F.3d 560 (6th Cir. 2013). A female former prisoner brought an action against the Michigan Department of Corrections (DOC), a warden, and other DOC-associated officers, doctors, and nurses, asserting violations of § 1983, the Age Discrimination in Employment Act (ADEA), and state law. The prisoner alleged that she underwent three separate amputations as a result of inadequate health care by the defendants and was subjected to a strip search that served no legitimate penological purpose. The district court denied summary judgment to the warden and a corrections officer on their qualified immunity defenses to the § 1983 claims against them, and they appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, vacated in part, and remanded. The appeals court held that the district court did not properly evaluate the warden's qualified immunity defense to the prisoner's Eighth Amendment claim of deliberate indifference to her serious medical needs, when it denied summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds to "defendants.," The court held that remand was warranted for the court to conduct a particularized analysis of whether the warden was deliberately indifferent to the conditions of the prisoner's confinement while in quarantine. The court noted that the district court did not mention any facts in the record that specifically pertained to the warden, nor did the court make any findings regarding the warden's knowledge or mental state.

According to the court, the prisoner established, for qualified immunity purposes, that the corrections officer violated her Fourth Amendment rights by conducting a strip search of her in her cell in view of other inmates and prison personnel. The court noted that the officer received a reprimand for violating Department of Corrections (DOC) rules by conducting the strip search in view of those not assisting in the search, the officer allegedly refused to tell the prisoner her reasons for initiating the search, and smirked during the search, which suggested personal animus and implicated the prisoner's dignitary interest. The court found that the female prisoner's right not to be subjected to a suspicionless strip search in full view of others absent a legitimate penological justification was clearly established, for purposes of the female corrections officer's qualified immunity defense. (Huron Valley Women's Correctional Facility, Michigan)

U.S. District Court
BODY CAVITY SEARCH
CONTRABAND
QUALIFIED IMMUNITY
STRIP SEARCHES

Vollette v. Watson, 937 F.Supp.2d 706 (E.D.Va. 2013). Former food service and medical care contractors who worked at a city jail brought an action against a sheriff, who oversaw the jail, and sheriff's deputies, alleging under § 1983 that their being required to undergo strip searches at the jail violated their Fourth Amendment rights, and that they were retaliated against, in violation of the First Amendment. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to what triggered the strip searches of contractors who worked at city jail, the nature of such searches, and the factual predicate for revocation of the contractors' security clearances. According to the court, at the time the contractors were strip searched, it was clearly established, for qualified immunity purposes in the contractors' § 1983 Fourth Amendment unlawful search action against the sheriff and sheriff's deputies, that prison employees did not forfeit all privacy rights when they accepted employment, and thus, that prison authorities were required to have reasonable and individualized suspicion that employees were hiding contraband on their person before performing a "visual body cavity search." The court also found that summary judgment as to the contractors' claims for false imprisonment and battery was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to what triggered the strip searches. (Aramark and Correct Care Solutions, Contractors, Portsmouth City Jail, Virginia)

U.S. District Court
EMPLOYEE

Vollette v. Watson, 978 F.Supp.2d 572 (E.D.Va. 2013). Employees of private contractors providing services to inmates housed at a jail brought a § 1983 action against a sheriff and deputy sheriffs, alleging that they were subjected to unlawful strip and visual body cavity searches at the jail. The next business day after the suit was filed, the sheriff issued a blanket order revoking the security clearances of the contractor's employees who were still working at the jail. The district court denied the employees' motion for a preliminary injunction ordering the sheriff to reinstate their security clearances at the jail pending the outcome of the litigation. The district court also partially granted and partially denied the defendants' summary judgment motion. A jury decided the constitutionality of the strip searches. This left the First Amendment retaliation claim by six of the nine plaintiffs. The district court entered summary judgment for the plaintiffs on the retaliation claim. The court held that: (1) the contractor's employees suffered irreparable injury from the sheriff's revocation of their security clearances for which there was no adequate remedy at law; (2) the balance of hardships plainly weighed in favor of a permanent injunction; (3) the public interest would be enhanced by the entry of a permanent injunction; and (4) the plaintiffs demonstrated violation of their First Amendment rights, and the sheriff had to reinstate their security clearances and update any relevant internal jail records to reflect the same. The court noted that the sheriff's candid statements that he felt betrayed by the federal lawsuits filed by the employees who were subjected to strip searches for contraband, and that the suits "pushed [him] over the edge" were an admission that the adverse employment action of revoking the employees' security clearances was taken against them in response to their exercise of their First Amendment constitutional rights to free speech and to petition the government for redress of grievances. (Portsmouth City Jail, Virginia)

2014

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCHES
OPPOSITE SEX

Baggett v. Ashe, 41 F.Supp.3d 113 (D.Mass. 2014). A former female inmate and current female inmates brought a class action against a sheriff and an assistant superintendent pursuant to § 1983, alleging that the policy of permitting male officers to videotape female inmates being strip-searched violated the Fourth Amendment. The defendants moved for summary judgment and the plaintiffs moved for partial summary judgment. The district court granted the inmates' motion and denied the defendants' motion. The court held that strip searches of female inmates being transferred to a segregation unit while male officers conducted videotaping in the vicinity were unreasonable in violation of the Fourth Amendment, regardless of whether the officers actually viewed the inmates, where the inmate being searched was fully aware that a male officer was videotaping her, the officer was within the inmate's view just a few feet away, the inmate was required to strip and manipulate her body in the officer's presence, including lifting her breasts and spreading her legs, and the videotaping by male officers was not limited to urgent situations. The court found that the policy did not have a reasonable relationship with a legitimate penological interest, and therefore, the policy was unconstitutional in violation of the Fourth Amendment as applied to the inmates, regardless of whether the officers actually viewed the inmates. The court noted that the policy of using males to tape searches applied to all strip searches upon transfer, not just emergencies, the prison did not have staffing problems, permitting males to tape the searches did not enhance employment opportunities, and the policy did not provide for alternatives. According to the court, clearly established law prohibited male officers from viewing female inmates during a strip search, and therefore, the sheriff and assistant superintendent were not entitled to qualified immunity in female inmates' § 1983 class action. (Western Regional Women's Correctional Center, Massachusetts)

U.S. District Court
CELL SEARCHES

Ballard v. Johns, 17 F.Supp.3d 511 (E.D.N.C. 2014). A civil detainee being considered for certification as a sexually dangerous person brought an action against federal employees, in their official capacities and in their individual capacities under Bivens, challenging various conditions of his detention, including claims concerning due process violations and inability to attend religious services. The employees moved to dismiss or for summary judgment and the detainee moved to overrule objections to requests for document production. The district court granted the employees' motion and denied the detainee's motion. The court held that: (1) the detainee did not show that federal employees, by following Federal Bureau of Prisons (BOP) regulations and policies, violated his constitutional rights; (2) the detainee was properly subjected to restrictions and disciplinary consequences of the BOP commitment and treatment program; (3) denial of the detainee's request to attend or receive religious services while in disciplinary segregation did not unduly burden his free exercise of religion; and (4) the employees did not violate detainee's right to be free from unreasonable searches and seizures by searching his cell and seizing his property. (Federal Correctional Institution at Butner, North Carolina)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCHES
JUVENILES

Benjamin v. Fassnacht, 39 F.Supp.3d 635 (E.D.Pa. 2014). The parents of a juvenile, who was arrested and charged with summary offenses and committed to a youth detention facility after he threatened several girls in his neighborhood, brought an action on his behalf against state troopers, a county, and county officials, asserting claims under § 1983 and state law. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motions in part and denied in part. The court held that: (1) county officials did not have the right to conduct blanket strip searches of juveniles upon admission to detention facility; (2) detention facility officials who strip searched the juvenile were not entitled to summary judgment on the unreasonable search claims; (3) county officials were not entitled to qualified immunity from the unreasonable search claims; and (4) the county was not entitled to summary judgment on the unreasonable search claims. The court found that summary judgment of the Fourth Amendment claims were precluded by fact issues as to whether the county and the facility's director had a policy, practice, or custom of conducting blanket strip searches and acted with deliberate indifference to the rights of the juveniles being detained at the facility. (Lancaster County Youth Detention Center, Pennsylvania)

U.S. Appeals Court
STRIP SEARCHES
PRETRIAL DETAINEES

Cantley v. West Virginia Regional Jail and Correctional Facility Authority, 771 F.3d 201 (4th Cir. 2014). Two arrestees brought a § 1983 action for damages and declaratory and injunctive relief against a regional jail authority and three of its former or current executive directors, challenging the constitutionality of visual strip searches and delousing of the arrestees. The district court granted summary judgment to the defendants. An arrestee appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that: (1) the post-arraignment visual strip search of one arrestee did not violate the Fourth Amendment; (2) the pre-arraignment visual strip search of the other arrestee did not violate a clearly established right where the arrestee was strip-searched in a private room, and he was to be held until the next morning in a holding cell where he might interact with up to 15 other arrestees; (3) delousing of the arrestees did not violate a clearly established right; and (4) declaratory and injunctive relief would be premature. The court noted that the delousing was done in a private room with only one officer, who was of the same sex as the arrestees, and it did not entail the officer himself touching either arrestee. (West Virginia Regional Jail and Correctional Facility Authority)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCHES

Coley v. Harris, 30 F.Supp.3d 428 (D.Md. 2014). An inmate brought a pro se action under § 1983 against correctional facility officers in their individual capacities for common law battery and violations of his Fourth and Eighth Amendment rights after he was allegedly beaten following a disagreement with one of the officers. The officers moved for summary judgment. The district court denied the motion. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether a strip search of the inmate was reasonable or motivated by punitive intent. (Eastern Correctional Institution, Maryland)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCHES

Hebshi v. U.S., 32 F.Supp.3d 834 (E.D.Mich. 2014). After she was forcibly removed from an airliner, detained, and subjected to a strip-search, a passenger brought a civil rights action against federal agents and airport law enforcement officers, alleging discrimination based on race, ethnicity, or national origin, and violations of the Fourth, Fifth, and Fourteenth Amendments. The airline law enforcement officers moved for partial judgment on the pleadings. The district court denied the motion. The court held that the passenger stated claims for unreasonable seizure and unreasonable search, and that the officers were not entitled to qualified immunity. The court held that the passenger's allegations that she was forced off an airplane by armed officers, handcuffed, briefly questioned on the tarmac, transported to a jail, locked in a guarded cell under video surveillance, detained for four hours, and strip-searched, before being extensively questioned about her involvement in other passengers' alleged suspicious activity, were sufficient to allege that the seizure was a de facto arrest made without probable cause in violation of the Fourth Amendment. According to the court, the passenger's allegations that she was arrested, detained for four hours, strip-searched by airport law enforcement officers, based on her alleged involvement in suspicious activities by two other passengers, that the officers made no effort to verify her identity or corroborate any connection between her and the other passengers, and that the strip-search was not conducted promptly, were sufficient to state a claim for unreasonable search under the Fourth Amendment. (Frontier Airlines, Federal Law Enforcement Agents, Wayne County Airport Authority Law Enforcement Agents, Michigan)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCHES
VISITOR SEARCHES

Hernandez v. Montanez, 36 F.Supp.3d 202 (D.Mass. 2014). A prison visitor brought a civil rights action against corrections officers, alleging that a strip-search violated § 1983, the Massachusetts Civil Rights Act (MCRA), and the Massachusetts Privacy Act (MPA). The corrections officers moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the officers did not have reasonable suspicion to strip-search the female prison visitor based on an anonymous tip by an inmate on the prison hotline that another inmate would be receiving drugs from an unidentified visitor. The court noted that the officers had no knowledge of the source of the single anonymous tip or how the source had received his information, and there was no evidence that the anonymous tipster or hotline had provided reliable information in the past. The court found that an objectively reasonable prison official would not have believed that he had reasonable suspicion to strip-search the visitor, and thus the prison official and the corrections officers were not entitled to qualified immunity from visitor's Fourth Amendment claim arising from the strip-search. The court noted that the officers knew that the inmate had enemies in the prison and that inmates often used the hotline to harass other prisoners, and there was no evidence that the visitor was involved in drug activity. (Souza–Baranowski Correctional Center, Massachusetts)

U.S. Appeals Court
DRUG/ALCOHOL TESTING

Holland v. Goord, 758 F.3d 215 (2nd Cir. 2014). A state inmate filed a § 1983 action alleging that prison officials burdened his religious exercise, in violation of Free Exercise Clause and Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA), when they ordered him to provide a urine sample while he fasted in observance of Ramadan, breached his due process rights, and retaliated against him. The district court entered summary judgment in the officials' favor, and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, vacated in part, and remanded. The court held that state prison officials substantially burdened the Muslim inmate's free exercise rights, in violation of the First Amendment, when they ordered him to drink water in order to provide a urine sample while he fasted in observance of Ramadan. The court noted that breaking his fast prior to sunset would have been a grave sin, regardless of whether atonement was possible.

The court found that a hearing officer at a prison disciplinary hearing did not violate the inmate's right to due process when he refused to permit the inmate to call his imam as a witness to establish that, as a practicing Muslim, the inmate was unable to drink water at the time he was ordered to provide a urine sample, where the inmate had already testified to that fact and the hearing officer did not discredit his statement. (Wende Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
STRIP SEARCHES
PRETRIAL DETAINEES

In re Nassau County Strip Search Cases, 12 F.Supp.3d 485 (E.D.N.Y. 2014). Arrestees brought a class action against county officials and others, challenging the county correctional center's blanket strip search policy for newly admitted, misdemeanor detainees. Following a bench trial, the district court awarded general damages of $500 per strip search for the 17,000 persons who comprised the class. Subsequently, the arrestees moved for attorney fees in the amount of $5,754,000 plus costs and expenses of $182,030. The court held that it would apply the current, unadjusted hourly rates charged by the various attorneys in determining counsel fees using the lodestar method as a cross-check against the percentage method. The court found that the lodestar rates were $300 for all associates, with two exceptions for requested rates below $300, and $450 for all partners. The court awarded $3,836,000 in counsel fees, which was equivalent to 33 1/3 % of the total amount recovered on behalf of the class, and $182,030.25 in costs and expenses. (Nassau County Correctional Center, New York)

U.S. District Court
CELL SEARCHES
PAT DOWN SEARCHES
STRIP SEARCHES

Karsjens v. Jesson, 6 F.Supp.3d 916 (D.Minn. 2014). Patients who were civilly committed to the Minnesota Sex Offender Program (MSOP) brought a § 1983 class action against officials, alleging various claims, including failure to provide treatment, denial of the right to be free from inhumane treatment, and denial of the right to religious freedom. The patients moved for declaratory judgment and injunctive relief, and the officials moved to dismiss. The district court granted the defendants' motion in part and denied in part, and denied the plaintiffs' motions. The court found that the patients stated a § 1983 unreasonable search and seizure claim under the Fourth Amendment with allegations that, taken together with the patients' other allegations surrounding the punitive nature of their confinement, state officials violated their Fourth Amendment rights through their search policies, procedures, and practices, and that they were subjected to cell searches, window checks, strip searches, and random pat downs. (Minnesota Sex Offender Program)

U.S. District Court
CELL SEARCHES

Little v. Municipal Corp., 51 F.Supp3d 473 (S.D.N.Y. 2014). State inmates brought a § 1983 action against a city and city department of correction officials, alleging Eighth Amendment and due process violations related to conditions of their confinement and incidents that occurred while they were confined. The defendants moved to dismiss for failure to state a claim. The district court granted the motion, finding that: (1) the inmates failed to state a municipal liability claim; (2) locking the inmates in cells that were flooding with sewage was not a sufficiently serious deprivation so as to violate the Eighth Amendment; (3) the inmates failed to state an Eighth Amendment claim based on the deprivation of laundry services; (4) the inmates failed to state that officials were deliberately indifferent to their conditions of confinement; (5) the inmates' administrative classification did not implicate their liberty interests protected by due process; and (6) cell searches did not rise to the level of an Eighth Amendment violation. The court noted that the cells flooded with sewage for up to eight-and-a-half hours, during which they periodically lacked outdoor recreation and food, was undeniably unpleasant, but it was not a significantly serious deprivation so as to violate the inmates' Eighth Amendment rights. According to the court, there was no constitutional right to outdoor recreation, and the inmates were not denied food entirely, but rather, were not allowed to eat during periods of lock-down. (N.Y. City Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
DRUG TEST
OBSERVATION BY STAFF

Meeks v. Schofield, 10 F.Supp.3d 774 (M.D.Tenn. 2014). A state prisoner, who allegedly suffered from paruresis, a mental anxiety disorder that made it difficult to urinate without complete privacy, brought an action against the Commissioner of the Tennessee Department of Correction, its Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) officer, a housing unit supervisor, a grievance board chairman, and a warden, asserting § 1983 claims for First Amendment retaliation and violation of his right to privacy, and alleging violations of the ADA and Title VII. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The court held that the prisoner failed to establish retaliation claims against the ADA officer, the housing unit supervisor, and the warden. The court found that the prisoner, who was assisting other inmates with their legal work, was not engaged in "protected conduct," as required to establish a First Amendment retaliation claim against the housing unit supervisor, where the prisoner was not authorized to help other inmates with legal work, and thus was in violation of department policy. According to the court, the state prison's decision to remove exterior bathroom doors and refusal to put at least one door back to accommodate the prisoner, who allegedly suffered from paruresis, a mental anxiety disorder that made it difficult to urinate without complete privacy, was not intentionally discriminatory and did not violate the ADA.

The court held that the transfer of the prisoner to a medical housing unit did not result in denial of access to prison programs and services available to the general population, so as to support an ADA claim of discrimination on the basis of a perceived disability. The court noted that the transfer was intended to accommodate the prisoner's complaints about bathroom doors being removed in the general housing unit, and the prisoner was allowed to continue his prison job, have access to the law library, and participate in the same activities he was allowed to participate in while he was housed with the general population. (Lois M. DeBerry Special Needs Facility, Tennessee)

U.S. District Court
X-RAY

Rahman v. Schriro, 22 F.Supp.3d 305 (S.D.N.Y. 2014). A pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against a state prison commissioner, warden, deputy warden, deputy of security, and officers, alleging they violated the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause by forcing him to go through a radiation-emitting X-ray security screening machine in order to get to and from his daily work assignment. The defendants moved to dismiss for failure to state a claim. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the detainee sufficiently alleged a serious present injury or future risk of serious injury, as required to state a deliberate indifference claim against prison officials under the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause, by alleging that he was subjected to at least two full-body X-ray scans each day, that each scan exposed him to a level of radiation that was 10 to 50 times higher than that emitted by airport scanners, that radiation damages cells of the body and that even low doses of radiation increase an individual's risk of cancer, and that federal regulations prohibited prison officials from using even non-repetitive X-ray examinations for security purposes unless the device was operated by licensed practitioner and there was reasonable suspicion that the inmate had recently secreted contraband. According to the court, the detainee's allegations that a prison officer intentionally subjected him to a higher dose of radiation through a full-body X-ray screening machine while calling him a "fake Muslim, homosexual, faggot" were sufficient to allege that the force was not applied to maintain or restore discipline, as required to state an excessive force claim under Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause. The court held that the alleged force exerted by a prison officer on the detainee by setting the full-body X-ray screening machine to a higher radiation dose on one occasion was not excessive in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause. The court noted that the alleged force was de minimis, and the use of a higher setting of radiation, which was designed to produce a better image, in a situation where detainee expressed resistance to the scanning process and could have been conceivably hiding contraband was not the type of force repugnant to the conscience of mankind. (Anna M. Kross Center, Rikers Island, N.Y. City Dept. of Correction)

U.S. Appeals Court
JUVENILE
STRIP SEARCHES

T.S. v. Doe, 742 F.3d 632 (6th Cir. 2014). Parents, on behalf of their minor children, brought a § 1983 action against the superintendent of a juvenile detention center, correctional officers, and other administrators, claiming that the suspicionless strip search of the juveniles, as part of the intake process of the detention center, violated the juveniles' Fourth Amendment rights. The district court granted summary judgment for the parents. The defendants appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The court held that the right of juvenile detainees held on minor offenses to be free from suspicionless strip searches was not clearly established at time the two juveniles arrested for underage drinking were strip searched, and thus, correctional officers who conducted searches were protected by qualified immunity from liability in the § 1983 action arising from the searches. The court noted that prior court decisions had recognized that a strip search of a person arrested for a minor offense was unreasonable, given that subsequent court decisions had found that state's enhanced responsibility for juveniles supported strip searches, and a recent Supreme Court decision had concluded that the Fourth Amendment did not prohibit strip search of all adult criminal detainees. The court found that under Kentucky law, the correctional officers' strip searches of the two juveniles, as part of the intake process of a juvenile detention center, were ministerial acts, and thus, the officers were not eligible for qualified official immunity from liability on the juveniles' claims of negligence, invasion of privacy, assault, false imprisonment, grossly negligent infliction of emotional distress, and arbitrary action in violation of state constitution, even if officers were both acting in good faith and within scope of their employment. (Breathitt Regional Juvenile Detention Center, Kentucky)

U.S. Appeals Court
STRIP SEARCHES
PRETRIAL DETAINEES

West v. Murphy, 771 F.3d 209 (4th Cir. 2014). Arrestees brought a civil rights action under the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments against a mayor, municipal council, police department, and current and former wardens of a central booking and intake center for alleged mistreatment of persons arrested and taken to the center for booking and processing. The district court granted the defendants' motions for summary judgment on the grounds of qualified immunity. The arrestees appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the law on strip searches of arrestees in jail in a dedicated search room with compelling security justifications was not clearly established at the time that the searches were conducted. (Baltimore Central Booking/Intake Center, Md.)

2015

U.S. Appeals Court
EXCESSIVE FORCE
BODY CAVITY
SEARCH

Chavarriaga v. New Jersey Dept. of Corrections, 806 F.3d 210 (3d Cir. 2015). A former prisoner brought a § 1983 action in state court against the New Jersey Department of Corrections (NJDOC), the former New Jersey Attorney General, the New Jersey Commissioner of Corrections, a correctional sergeant, and various other correctional officers. The prisoner alleged that the defendants violated her constitutional rights when they transferred her from one place of confinement to another where they denied her potable water, clothing, sanitary napkins, and subjected her to an unlawful body cavity search. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the Attorney General, Commissioner of Corrections, and correctional sergeant, and dismissed the remaining claims. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part and reversed in part and remanded. The appeals court held that the prisoner plausibly alleged that a correctional officer maliciously searched her body cavities, as required to state a claim against the officer for using excessive force in violation of the Eighth Amendment, where the prisoner alleged facts demonstrating that a cavity search was not routine, that the cavity search was conducted in a manner that violated New Jersey regulations, and alleged that the cavity search was so painful that during the search prisoner cracked a molar while clenching her teeth. The court noted that a state has broad authority to confine an inmate in any of its institutions, and thus, courts recognize that a state's authority to place inmates anywhere within the prison system is among a wide spectrum of discretionary actions that traditionally have been the business of prison administrators rather than of the federal courts. (Garrett House Residential Community Release Facility, Edna Mahan Correctional Facility, New Jersey)

U.S. Appeals Court
DNA- Deoxy Ribonucleic Acid

Crabbs v. Scott, 786 F.3d 426 (6th Cir. 2015). An acquitted defendant brought an action against a sheriff in his official capacity under § 1983 for violation of the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments, arising out of the sheriff's requiring him to submit to a cheek swab for a DNA sample before he could be released from jail, after he was acquitted of felony charges by a jury. The district court denied the sheriff's motion for summary judgment based on sovereign immunity and the sheriff appealed. The appeal court affirmed, finding that the sheriff was generally considered a county official and thus not afforded immunity as a state actor, and the sheriff was not required by state law to the collect defendant's DNA prior to releasing him from jail following his acquittal, and thus the sheriff was acting as a county official and not entitled to immunity. (Franklin Co., Ohio)

U.S. Appeals Court
STRIP SEARCHES
JUVENILE

J. B. ex rel. Benjamin v. Fassnacht, 801 F.3d 336 (3d Cir. 2015). Parents of a juvenile, who was arrested and charged with summary offenses and committed to a youth detention facility after he threatened several girls in his neighborhood, brought an action on his behalf against state troopers, a county, and county officials, asserting claims under § 1983 for false arrest, unreasonable search, false imprisonment, and violations of due process. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants, in part, and denied summary judgment on the unreasonable search claim. The officials appealed, challenging the denial of summary judgment as to the unreasonable search claim. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The court found that held that the strip searches conducted by the juvenile detention center as a standard part of the intake process for juvenile detainees before their admission to general population were reasonable. The searches required detainees to remove all clothing for close visual inspection, but did not involve any touching by an inspecting officer. According to the court, although the searches were intrusive and juvenile detainees had an enhanced right to privacy, the detainees' privacy interests were outweighed by the center's penological interests in addressing the risk of introducing contagious infections and diseases into the general population, detecting contraband, and identifying potential gang members. The court found that the searches promoted the center's responsibility to screen juvenile detainees for signs of abuse in their home and self-mutilation. (Lancaster County Juvenile Probation, Lancaster County Youth Intervention Center, Pennsylvania)

U.S. District Court
VISITOR SEARCH
STRIP SEARCH
PAT DOWN SEARCH

Knight v. Washington State Department of Corrections, 147 F.Supp.3d 1165 (W.D. Wash. 2015). A prison visitor who suffered from a seizure disorder, and was subjected to a strip search and pat-down searches, brought an action against the state Department of Corrections (DOC) and DOC officials, alleging that the searches violated the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA). The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion, finding that: (1)the strip search and pat-down searches did not violate ADA; (2) guards did not act with deliberate indifference in conducting a strip search; (3) the prison was not a place of public accommodation, under the Washington Law Against Discrimination, as to visitors participating in an extended family visitation program; (4) the guards' conduct was not sufficiently extreme to support an outrage claim; and (5) the guards' conduct did not support a claim for negligent infliction of emotional distress. According to the court, there was no showing that the guards proceeded in conscious disregard of a high probability of emotional distress when ordering the strip search, as the visitor suggested the strip search as an alternative to a pat search and the guards followed this suggestion, and all visitors were subjected to pat-down searches, which were justified on safety grounds. (Monroe Correctional Complex, Washington)

U.S. District Court
CELL SEARCH
RETALIATION

Quiroz v. Horel, 85 F.Supp.3d 1115 (N.D.Cal. 2015). A state prisoner brought an action against prison officials, alleging that the officials retaliated against him for filing a prior federal civil rights complaint and for participating in another inmate's civil rights suit. The officials moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to: (1) whether the official had a retaliatory motive for issuing a Rules Violation Report (RVR) against the prisoner; (2) whether officials had a retaliatory motive when they searched the prisoner's cell; and (3) whether prison officials had an agreement to retaliate against the prisoner by searching his cell, confiscating his paperwork, and issuing a Rules Violation Report (RVR) against him. (Pelican Bay State Prison, California)

U.S. District Court
VISUAL BODY CAVITY
USE OF FORCE

Shorter v. Baca, 101 F.Supp.3d 876 (C.D. Cal. 2015). A pretrial detainee brought an action against a county, sheriff, and deputies, alleging under § 1983 that the defendants denied her medical care, subjected her to unsanitary living conditions, deprived her of food, clean clothes, and access to exercise, and conducted overly invasive searches. The detainee had been classified as mentally ill and housed in a mental health unit at the detention facility. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to what policies governed classification of pretrial detainees who were mentally ill. The court also found fact issues as to whether the county sheriff's deputies' manner of conducting a visual body cavity search of the female pretrial detainee on three occasions exhibited exaggerated and excessive force, and was vindictive or harassing, precluding summary judgment on the detainee's § 1983 Fourth Amendment unlawful search claim against the deputies. (Century Regional Detention Facility, Los Angeles County, California)

U.S. Appeals Court
BODY CAVITY SEARCH
PRIVACY

Story v. Foote, 782 F.3d 968 (8th Cir. 2015). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against four corrections officers for violation of his Fourth Amendment rights arising from a visual body-cavity search that allegedly took place in view of a female officer and other inmates, during which the officer allegedly called the inmate a derogatory name. The district court dismissed the case and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the visual body-cavity inspection search after the inmate returned to the correctional facility from outside the institution did not violate a clearly established right, as would preclude the qualified immunity defense, and the manner in which the search was conducted did not violate a clearly established right. According to the court, such a search was not unreasonable considering the serious security dangers inherent at a correctional institution and the institution's strong interest in preventing and deterring the smuggling of contraband into the prison.

The court noted that the manner in which the search was conducted did not violate the inmate's rights. The inmate alleged that a female officer observed the search on a video screen in a master control room, that the search was conducted in the presence of other inmates, and that the officer called him a "monkey" during the search. According to the court, there was a rational connection between the sex-neutral visual surveillance of inmates and the goal of prison security. The court found that the staffing adjustments that would have been necessary to prevent the female officer from viewing the search would have interfered with the female officer's equal employment opportunities and burdened the prison. The court noted that the inmate did not allege that a more private, equally secure, and cost-effective means of conducting the search was available away from other inmates, and a single use of a term with potential racial overtones was not unconstitutional race discrimination. (Williams Correctional Facility, Arkansas)

SECTION 42: SERVICES- PRISONER

The following pages present summaries of court decisions which address this topic area. These summaries provide readers with highlights of each case, but are not intended to be a substitute for the review of the full case. The cases do not represent all court decisions which address this topic area, but rather offer a sampling of relevant holdings.

The decisions summarized below were current as of the date indicated on the title page of this edition of the Catalog. Prior to publication, the citation for each case was verified, and the case was researched in Shepard's Citations to determine if it had been altered upon appeal (reversed or modified). The Catalog is updated annually. An annual supplement provides replacement pages for cases in the prior edition which have changed, and adds new cases. Readers are encouraged to consult the Topic Index to identify related topics of interest. The text in the section entitled "How to Use The Catalog" at the beginning of the Catalog provides an overview which may also be helpful to some readers.

The case summaries which follow are organized by year, with the earliest case presented first. Within each year, cases are organized alphabetically by the name of the plaintiff. The left margin offers a quick reference, highlighting the type of court involved and identifying appropriate subtopics addressed by each case.

NOTE: Several separate chapters address topics that could also be considered to be prisoner "services." These include: 12. Exercise and Recreation; 28. Mail; 29. Medical Care; 34. Programs, Prisoner; 37. Religion; and 49. Visiting. Readers are encouraged to consult the topic index to locate other pertinent chapters.

1971

U.S. District Court
LIBRARY

Jones v. Wittenberg, 330 F.Supp. 707 (N.D. Oh. 1971), aff'd, 456 F.2d 854 (6th Cir. 1972). Arrangements must be made for library services. No censorship of books or periodicals unless they are considered "pornographic." (Lucas County Jail, Ohio)

1972

U.S. District Court
COMMISSARY

Hamilton v. Landrieu, 351 F.Supp. 549 (E.D. La. 1972). The canteen, its price list, its rate of profit, the audit of its books, its contribution to the inmate welfare and the purchases made from that fund shall be under the supervision of the city chief administrative officer. Cash in the hands of inmates shall be deposited with prison authorities, and a credit system established that would permit limited daily purchases from the commissary. (Orleans Parish Prison, Louisiana)

U.S. District Court
RIGHT TO TREATMENT

Wyatt v. Stickney, 344 F.Supp. 373 (M.D. Ala. 1972). The constitutional "right to treatment" is affirmed by the court's decision to establish minimum standards of care and treatment which patients are granted by the U.S. Constitution. (Bryce Hospital, Tuscaloosa, Alabama)

1973

U.S. District Court
COMMISSARY

Goldsby v. Carnes, 365 F.Supp. 395 (W.D. Mo. 1973). Inmates will be permitted to buy underwear from the commissary at cost. Commissary purchases of up to seven dollars a week may be made. Inmates shall be allowed to order commissary items two days a week, unless they are on restrictions. (Jackson County Jail, Kansas City, Missouri)

1977

U.S. Appeals Court

Newman v. State of Alabama, 559 F.2d 283 (5th Cir. 1977), cert. denied, 438 U.S. 915 (1977). The Constitution does not require that prisoners, as individuals or as a group, be provided with any and every amenity which some person may think is needed to avoid mental, physical, and emotional deterioration. (Alabama Penal Institution)

U.S. District Court
COMMISSARY

U.S. ex rel Wolfish v. Levi, 439 F.Supp. 114 (S.D. N.Y. 1977). The inmate's commissary requests are to be taken at least every other day, and the inmate is to be permitted to indicate his second choice of selection. (Metropolitan Correctional Center, New York)

1979

U.S. District Court
COMMISSARY

Jefferson v. Douglas 493 F.Supp. 13 (W.D. Okla. 1979). According to the U.S. District Court for the Western District of Oklahoma, prison officials' cancellation of an inmate's canteen privileges in order to insure that he remain within the bounds of a prescribed diabetic diet does not amount to cruel and unusual punishment. Halton Jefferson, an inmate at the Lexington, Oklahoma Assignment and Reception Center (LARC) filed a pro-se action under Section 1983 alleging that the decision of prison officials to refuse him canteen privileges amounted to cruel and unusual punishment.

Jefferson, a diabetic, cited medical journals which suggested that a diabetic should always carry sugar items to prevent the occurrence of a diabetic coma. Since he was restricted to nonsugar diet, Jefferson contended the canteen was the only source from which he could obtain sugar items to protect himself against a coma. A report, ordered by the trial judge in Jefferson's suit, revealed a different aspect of the matter. LARC, recognizing that Jefferson was a diabetic, had prepared a special diet for him, limiting his caloric intake to 1800 calories per day. Later, this figure was reduced to 1500 calories.

Nevertheless, Jefferson continued to gain weight. Canteen records and verbal reports showed that Jefferson made a habit of eating such items as ice cream, bread, peanut butter and jelly sandwiches, sweet rolls, Fritos, Cheetos, soda pop (sugared) and candy. The report termed Jefferson's conduct a "deliberate effort to violate the special diet ordered for him." Presented with these facts, the court noted that the decision of the LARC officials to eliminate Jefferson's canteen privileges was the type of administrative decision with which court should not interfere. Moreover, the court stated that the action falls far short of shocking the conscience, a showing which is essential to demonstrate cruel and unusual punishment. As a result of these findings, the court thus dismissed the inmate's complaint. (Assignment and Reception Center, Lexington, Oklahoma)

1980

U.S. Appeals Court
LIBRARY

Cruz v. Hauck, 627 F.2d 710 (5th Cir. 1980). For the third time in the same case, the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit has reversed a lower court's decision concerning the lack of adequate library materials in the Bexar County Jail (San Antonio, Texas). Originally filed in 1970 by several pro se jail inmates, the action had been dismissed, appealed and reinstated on two previous occasions. The plaintiff-inmates, though seemingly representing all jail inmates in their request for adequate library facilities to provide meaningful access to the courts, were never certified as a class under Rule 23 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. The most recent appeal arose when the district court, noting that none of the named plaintiffs were incarcerated in the jail at the time that class certification was finally sought (in 1976), dismissed the petition for lack of class certification. The district court also noted that a new law library had been constructed since the institution of the litigation. The appellate court reversed the dismissal, invoking the "capable of repetition, yet evading review" rule. The court found that even if none of the named plaintiffs was still incarcerated, the likelihood of the return to custody of any of them was present, and in addition, other persons not named might still be suffering from the alleged wrongs. In an attempt to guide the lower court in its ruling upon remand, the appellate court indicated that certain of plaintiff's allegations might have merit. Without actually ruling, the appellate court indicated sympathy with the following allegations:

(1) Visits to the library are limited to two or three hours weekly;

(2) The library does not stock the Federal Supplement;

(3) The library does not employ a trained librarian or paralegal capable of assisting inmates in their legal research;

(4) No assistance is given to inmates lacking the educational or linguistic skills necessary to use the library; and,

(5) Counsel is not available to assist in the preparation of habeas corpus petitions of civil rights actions.

(Bexar County Jail)

U.S. District Court
COMMISSARY

Epps v. Levine, 484 F.Supp. 474 (D. Md. 1980). Pretrial detainees transferred to the state penitentiary and classified to protective custody shall have regular commissary privileges. (State Penitentiary, Maryland)

U.S. District Court
COMMISSARY

Griffin v. Smith, 493 F.Supp. 129 (W.D. N.Y. 1980). Allegations of the proscription of radio earphones, limiting the commissary purchase to $5.00, and the denial of access to state issue tobacco for inmates in the Special Housing Unit fail to state a claim upon which relief can be granted. Allegations of inadequate out-of-cell exercise for inmates in the Special Housing Unit state a claim upon which relief can be granted. (Attica Correctional Facility, New York)

1982

State Appeals Court
COMMISSARY

Buchignani v. Lexington-Fayette Urban County Government, 632 S.W.2d 465 (Ky.App. 1982). A Kentucky county jailer cannot operate a commissary for profit. A jailer, as an elected officer of a county, may not use his office for personal profit or gain, the Court of Appeals of Kentucky ruled. Therefore, the court prohibited the jailer from operating a commissary within a county detention center for profit. The court did not level a monetary judgment against the jailer because he had relied on the advice of his own counsel and other government officials in operating the commissary. In addition to his work as the director of the detention center, the jailer ran a commissary within the Detention Center, retaining the profits from its operation. In October, 1980, the Kentucky attorney general issued an opinion stating that the jailer was prohibited from operating a commissary for profit. The jailer then filed an action seeking a declaratory judgment as to the rights of the parties. The trial court held that as a public official, the jailer could not profit from his office and awarded the county $22,397 that the plaintiff had made in past profits. The jailer appealed. The appeals court agreed with the lower court that a holder of public office may not use such office for personal gain. It disagreed, however, as to the award of monetary judgment. The court found the award inappropriate and inequitable, in view of the fact that the jailer had relied on the advice of his own counsel, the county attorney and the attorney general of the state, and upon the acquiescence and advice of county governmental officials.

1986

U.S. District Court
RIGHT TO TREATMENT

Morales Feliciano v. Romero Bercelo, 672 F.Supp. 591 (D. P.R. 1986). According to a federal court, prison overcrowding, inmate idleness, and the threat of violence among inmates, combined with the continuous frustrations of reasonable expectation produced by administrative incompetence, resulted in an ascertainable psychological deterioration in the Puerto Rican prison population. The psychological deterioration inflicted on inmates in the prison system was an unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain in violation of prisoners' eighth amendment protections against cruel and unusual punishment. Insofar as the Puerto Rican prison administration was under a statutory duty to provide rehabilitative programs through which inmates could earn time credits towards early release, unavailability of any form of useful work, study or even recreation, where none of the physical conditions of confinement met constitutional standards, combined with continuous frustrations of reasonable expectations produced by administrative incompetence, inflicted serious psychological harm on inmates, which was independently cognizable under the eighth amendment. (Commonwealth of Puerto Rico)

1990

U.S. District Court
IDLENESS

Griffin v. Coughlin, 743 F.Supp. 1006 (N.D.N.Y. 1990). Inmates in a protective custody unit brought a suit seeking injunctive relief to remedy allegedly unconstitutional conditions in the unit. The district court found that the conditions at the protective custody unit did not violate equal protection or Eighth Amendment guarantees. According to the court, the appropriate analysis for an equal protection claim is whether the unequal treatment bears a reasonable relationship to legitimate penological interests. The protective custody unit functions to protect inmates who cannot remain in the general prison population. Complaints of boredom, frustration and hostility arising out of the idleness of protective custody inmates did not amount to an Eighth Amendment violation; furthermore, neither the extent to which protective custody inmates were segregated from one another nor the noise level in the protective custody unit violated the Eighth Amendment, and protective custody inmates have no Eighth Amendment right to prison work and educational activities. (Clinton Correctional Facility, New York)

1993

U.S. District Court
COMMISSARY
COMMISSION

Griffin-El v. MCI Telecommunications Corp., 835 F.Supp. 1114 (E.D.Mo. 1993) affirmed 43 F.3d 1476. An inmate brought a Section 1983 suit against the state and a telephone services contractor. Adopting the report and recommendation of a U.S. Magistrate Judge, the district court found that the telephone services contractor's payment of a commission to the Department of Corrections' "general revenue fund" rather than the "inmate canteen fund" as contractually required did not give rise to Section 1983 liability to the inmate. The contractual obligation did not create a constitutionally protected property interest, prosecutable by the inmate, in the contractor's placing of money in the canteen fund. The inmate had no legitimate expectation that the local prison fund would ever receive any money from the contract. The telephone company which entered into a contract to provide telephone services for prisoners in state prisons was a "state actor," for Section 1983 purposes. The company and state had a symbiotic relationship for the purposes of the inmate's claim that commissions paid by the company to the state were being misallocated. (Potosi Correctional Center, Missouri)

1994

U.S. District Court
COMMISSARY
LIBRARY

Taifa v. Bayh, 846 F.Supp. 723 (N.D.Ind. 1994). Prisoners brought a class action suit challenging conditions of confinement at a prison operated by the Indiana Department of Corrections. The district court approved a settlement agreement involving assignment and transfer of prisoners, along with improvement of various prison conditions at the Maximum Control Complex (MCC). The state agreed only to assign prisoners to MCC under specified conditions and to transfer prisoners out of MCC after a specified period of time, subject to certain conditions, and agreed to alter MCC conditions in many areas. The agreement provided for a commissary with a list of particular items to be made available and an expanded law library. (Maximum Control Complex, Indiana Department of Corrections, Westville, Indiana)

1995

U.S. Appeals Court
HAIRCUT

Anderson v. Romero, 72 F.3d 518 (7th Cir. 1995). An inmate who was infected with the human immunodeficiency virus (HIV) sued prison officials alleging violation of his constitutional right of privacy and the Illinois AIDS Confidentiality Act. The district court denied the officials' motion to dismiss and they appealed. The court found that the inmate's claim to damages based on the denial of barber services was not barred. If the only reason that prison officials denied the inmate haircuts and yard privileges was that he was HIV-positive, and there was no conceivable justification for the denial as an HIV-fighting measure, then prison officials could not be immune even in the absence of a case involving this type of arbitrary treatment. (Stateville Penitentiary, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
COMMISSARY
INDIGENT

Austin v. Lehman, 893 F.Supp. 448 (E.D.Pa. 1995). An inmate filed a civil rights action against corrections officials alleging violation of his constitutional rights when his bi-weekly allotment of free cigarettes was denied to him while he was confined in disciplinary custody. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants, finding that the denial did not violate the inmate's constitutional rights. The court noted that because the inmate had fully exploited the internal grievance procedures provided by the Department of Corrections, he had received all of the process he was due. (State Correctional Institution at Frackville, Pennsylvania)

U.S. District Court
LIBRARY

Campbell-El v. District of Columbia, 881 F.Supp. 42 (D.D.C. 1995). A prisoner brought a civil rights action against prison officials, alleging violation of his Eighth Amendment rights. The district court found that the prisoner's allegation that he was not allowed to engage in work was insufficient to state a claim for cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the Eighth Amendment, absent a showing of the extent and severity of the alleged deprivation. (Maximum Security Facility at Lorton, District of Columbia)

U.S. District Court
IDLENESS

Madrid v. Gomez, 889 F.Supp. 1146 (N.D.Cal. 1995). Inmates brought a class action suit challenging conditions of confinement at a new high-security prison complex in California. The district court found for the plaintiffs in the majority of issues presented, ordered injunctive relief and appointed a special master to direct a remedial plan tailored to correct specific constitutional violations. In the beginning of its lengthy opinion, the court noted that this "...is not a case about inadequate or deteriorating physical conditions...rather, plaintiffs contend that behind the newly-minted walls and shiny equipment lies a prison that is coldly indifferent to the limited, but basic and elemental, rights that incarcerated persons--including the 'worst of the worst'--retain under...our Constitution." The court held that prison inmates established prison officials' deliberate indifference to the use of excessive force by showing that they knew that unnecessary and grossly excessive force was being employed against inmates on a frequent basis and that these practices posed a substantial risk of harm to inmates. According to the court, officials consciously disregarded the risk of harm, choosing instead to tolerate and even encourage abuses of force by deliberately ignoring them when they occurred, tacitly accepting a code of silence, and failing to implement adequate systems to control and regulate the use of force. The court found that officials had an affirmative management strategy to permit the use of excessive force for the purpose of punishment and deterrence. The court ruled that the psychological pain that results from idleness in segregation is not sufficient to implicate the Eighth Amendment, particularly where exclusion from prison programs is not without some penological justification. (Pelican Bay State Prison, California)

U.S. District Court
COMMISSARY

May v. Baldwin, 895 F.Supp. 1398 (D.Or. 1995). An inmate brought an action against prison officials alleging violation of his civil rights. The court found that evidence did not support the inmate's claim that he was deprived of basic personal hygiene items while in a disciplinary segregation unit, where it was undisputed that when an inmate arrived in the unit he is provided with personal hygiene items that consisted of a towel, bar of handsoap, comb and toothbrush, and that baking soda and toilet paper are issued following meals. The inmate alleged that he was deprived of shampoo, conditioner, and body lotion. The court found that evidence did not support the inmate's claim that prison officials discriminated against him because he was black, despite his assertion that he was not given lotion for his dry skin problem when he was in a prison infirmary, while a white inmate was given vaseline for chapped lips. Officials stated that he was denied the lotion because his dry skin was not medically serious and he was not denied the opportunity to purchase lotion from the prison canteen. (Eastern Oregon Correctional Institution)

U.S. District Court
COMMISSARY

Robinson v. Il. State Corr. Ctr. (Stateville), 890 F.Supp. 715 (N.D.Ill. 1995). A prison inmate housed in a segregation unit sued prison officials alleging violation of his civil rights in connection with his conditions of confinement. The district court dismissed several elements of his suit, but found that his complaint that inadequate heating and cooling posed a risk to his health was actionable under § 1983. The court found that neither prison regulations nor state statutes established a protected right to commissary privileges, holding that restrictions placed on the types of commissary items that could be purchased by inmates in segregation did not violate any constitutional rights. (Stateville Correctional Center, Illinois)

1996

U.S. Appeals Court
LIBRARY

Antonelli v. Sheahan, 81 F.3d 1422 (7th Cir. 1996). A county jail resident filed a pro se § 1983 action against jail officials, alleging constitutional deprivations. The district court dismissed the suit and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed the lower court decisions regarding some conditions of confinement and issues, including floor-sleeping, theft of his property, lockdowns, denial of access to courts, and denial of opportunity to participate in rehabilitative programs to earn good-time credits. But the appeals court reversed the lower court by finding that several allegations were sufficient to state claims. The court found that although the inmate had no right to leave his cell to go to a general reading library, his allegation of denial of access to reading materials and inadequate lighting for reading in the jail stated a § 1983 claim. (Cook County Jail, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
COMMISSION

Arney v. Simmons, 923 F.Supp. 173 (D.Kan. 1996). Inmates brought a § 1983 action against a state secretary of corrections, challenging expenditures from an "inmate benefit fund" for a victim notification program. The district court held that no reasonable reading of the statute defining the inmate benefit fund would give rise to a legitimate expectation that all expenditures from the fund were required in some way to directly benefit inmates, and therefore the inmates failed to establish a protected liberty interest in the funds in such a way that they were entitled to a preliminary or permanent injunction. The fund is comprised primarily of commissions paid by the long distance telephone company that provides service on inmate calls, and over $1 million currently comes into the fund each year. The corrections department used inmate benefit funds to pay for a victim notification program which notifies victims of any changes in an inmate's status; the cost of the program (for two employees) is between $40,000 and $80,000 per year. The department also used inmate benefit funds to pay for "capture stations" which are video imaging systems that cost approximately $25,000 each, which generate an inmate identification card with a photo and encoded information. (Lansing Correctional Facility, Kansas)

U.S. District Court
IDLENESS

Douglas v. DeBruyn, 936 F.Supp. 572 (S.D.Ind. 1996). An inmate who was assigned to the "idle unit" of a prison filed an in forma pauperis complaint alleging violation of § 1983. The district court found the complaint to be frivolous within the meaning of the in forma pauperis statute. The court held that the absence of a job, and the absence of vocational, educational and rehabilitation programs does not violate due process. The court noted that while such programs and activities might be useful and productive as a matter of correctional policy, the absence of them does not create any atypical and significant hardships on an inmate in relation to the ordinary incidents of prison life. According to the court, to sustain a viable Eighth Amendment violation the inmate would have to allege that conditions in the idle unit constituted an excessive risk to his health or safety. The court also noted that inmates have no constitutional right to recreation and that only the objective harm that can result from significant deprivation of movement implicates the Eighth Amendment. (Correctional Industrial Complex, Indiana)

U.S. District Court
COMMISSARY
INDIGENT

Hudgins v. DeBruyn, 922 F.Supp. 144 (S.D.Ind. 1996). Inmates brought a § 1983 action against prison officials challenging a policy modifying the manner in which inmates could obtain over-the-counter (OTC) medication. The district court held that the policy did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment. The court found that requiring inmates to purchase OTC from their own funds did not violate the Eighth Amendment, noting that if an inmate can afford medicine but chooses to apply his resources elsewhere, it is the inmate, not the official, who is indifferent to a serious medical need. The court noted that inmates' serious medical needs were met, whether they were indigent or not. (Indiana Reformatory)

U.S. Appeals Court
COMMISSARY

Keenan v. Hall, 83 F.3d 1083 (9th Cir. 1996). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against prison officials and employees. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part and reversed in part, finding that summary judgment was precluded for several allegations. Indigent inmates have a right to personal hygiene supplies such as toothbrushes and soap, and disputed issues of material fact as to whether prison officers required the inmate to buy personal hygiene items precluded summary judgment. The inmate had no constitutional right to canteen products such as birthday cards and denial of such items did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment. (Oregon State Prison)

1997

U.S. Appeals Court
COMMISSARY

Thomas v. Ramos, 130 F.3d 754 (7th Cir. 1997). A prison inmate brought a § 1983 action against prison officials alleging violation of his due process rights in connection with his confinement for approximately 70 days in a segregated cell, and for the alleged denial of opportunities to exercise in a prison yard while he was in segregated confinement. The district court entered summary judgment for the officials and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the inmate's 70-day confinement in disciplinary segregation did not implicate liberty concerns within the meaning of the due process clause. The court also held that the official who allegedly refused to allow the inmate to exercise in the yard while he was in segregation was entitled to qualified immunity because the lack of exercise did not violate the inmate's clearly established rights. According to the court, there was evidence that the inmate could have engaged in some exercise in his cell, he may have missed some opportunities for yard time by choosing to visit the medical unit, and during part of his confinement all inmates were prevented from using the yard as part of a "lockdown" status. According to the court, a prison inmate's lack of exercise may rise to a constitutional violation in certain limited circumstances where movement is denied and muscles are allowed to atrophy and the health of the inmate is threatened. The court also found that the inmate did not have a protectible liberty interest in his loss of commissary privileges. (Stateville Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
INDIGENT

Van Poyck v. Singletary, 106 F.3d 1558 (11th Cir. 1997). Inmates brought an action against the Department of Corrections challenging the constitutionality of a rule that limits free writing material provided to indigent inmates for nonlegal mail to quantities sufficient for one letter per month, and limiting the number of stamps that inmates could possess to 20. The district court entered judgment for the Department and the inmates appealed. The appeals court affirmed, holding that the rule limiting free writing materials did not violate the Sixth Amendment nor the First Amendment, The court also held that the rule limiting possession of stamps did not violate the First Amendment because it was related to a legitimate security interest in eliminating the exchange of contraband among inmates. (Florida Department of Corrections)

1998

U.S. District Court
PROBATION/REVOCATION

Lucas v. Parish of Jefferson, 999 F.Supp. 839 (E.D.La. 1998). A civil rights suit was filed by several offenders who had completed terms of probation but who had been arrested and incarcerated when an assistant district attorney filed motions to revoke probation after their terms had expired. The district court held that a Louisiana prosecutor is entitled only to qualified immunity rather than absolute immunity for his actions in seeking to revoke probation because he is performing the function of a probation officer. According to the court, an attempt to revoke probation after the probationary term had expired violated the clearly established rights of the offenders, of which the prosecutor should have known, so that the prosecutor was not entitled to qualified immunity. The plaintiffs had alleged false imprisonment and malicious prosecution. (Jefferson Parish, Louisiana)

U.S. District Court
COMMISSARY

Zimmerman v. Tippecanoe Sheriff's Dept., 25 F.Supp.2d 915 (N.D.Ind. 1998). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against county officials and employees alleging constitutional violations during his pretrial detention period in a county jail. The district court found in favor of the defendants for all but one of the allegations. According to the court, the fact that the prisoner failed to receive one of his commissary orders did not constitute a disciplinary action without due process, even if the prisoner was unable to purchase stamps and materials with which to correspond with his family and his attorney.The court noted that the prisoner had received regular commissary orders, including a large order with correspondence materials placed just before his missed order, and he received regular orders after the missed order. (Tippecanoe County Jail, Indiana)

1999

U.S. District Court
COMMISSARY

Denson v. Marshall, 44 F.Supp.2d 400 (D.Mass. 1999). A state prison inmate brought a civil rights action against prison officials claiming violation of the Free Exercise Clause of the First Amendment. Prison officials had denied the inmate's request to receive the equivalent of three days of food per month in the form of milk, bread, cereal, peanut butter, and jelly so that he could eat during particular hours of Muslim holidays. The district court denied the defendants' motion for summary judgment, noting that they apparently misunderstood the inmate's request and did not address it accurately in their presentation to the court. The court required the defendants to accommodate the inmate's request, or to file additional summary judgment materials with the court within sixty days. (Massachusetts Correctional Institution, Cedar Junction)

U.S. District Court
LIBRARY

Shabazz v. Cole, 69 F.Supp.2d 177 (D.Mass. 1999). An inmate who worked in a prison library sued the prison librarian and the prison superintendent challenging his treatment by the librarian and the propriety of a disciplinary proceeding. The district court held that there was no procedural due process violation regarding the inmate's loss of library privileges for one week, exclusive of privileges to use the law library. The court also found that the inmate failed to state a claim regarding his alleged constructive discharge from his library job. According to the court, the inmate had no vested or property interest in the right to maintain his position in the law library, and therefore failed to state a claim for alleged constructive discharge.(Bay State Correctional Center, Massachusetts)

2000

U.S. District Court
LIBRARY

Blagman v. White, 112 F.Supp.2d 534 (E.D.Va. 2000). A Muslim inmate who was participating in a boot camp program brought a civil rights action alleging denial of equal protection, violation of his free exercise rights, and intimidation. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The district court held that the defendants did not deny equal protection by treating Muslims less favorably than Christian inmates, where the Muslim inmates were given new space after the inmate complained, and officials made an exception to the camp schedule to permit weekly Islamic study sessions. The court noted that while Christian inmates are permitted to celebrate Thanksgiving and Christmas, certain aspects of Ramadan were irreconcilably inconsistent with the structure and regimen of the boot camp program. The court held that the Equal Protection Clause does not require prisons to ensure that their libraries adhere to numerical parity in books that are congenial to various religions. (Stafford Co. Det. Center, Virginia)

U.S. District Court
COMMISSARY

Bowman v. City of Middletown, 91 F.Supp.2d 644 (S.D.N.Y. 2000). An arrestee who was held for 19 days on suspicion of murder brought a § 1983 action alleging false arrest, malicious prosecution and civil rights violations while confined. The district court held that denial of commissary privileges for five days was not a due process violation, especially since the only deprivation suffered was the inability to order cigarettes, which was the sole item the detainee desired from the commissary. The court found that the jail superintendent was entitled to qualified immunity from liability for his decision to have the pretrial detainee shackled when outside of his cell based on the wording of the note that the detainee had sent to the superintendent complaining of his loss of commissary privileges, because the right to complain to prison administrators was not clearly established. The note asked "[who] do you think you are" and promised "I will see you or whomever in court." (Orange County Jail, New York)

2001

U.S. Appeals Court
COMMISSARY

Myrie v. Commissioner, N.J. Dept. of Corrections, 267 F.3d 251 (3rd Cir. 2001). Prison inmates challenged the application of a New Jersey statute that required them to pay a ten percent surcharge on their purchases from a prison or jail commissary to fund compensation of crime victims, alleging violations of their Double Jeopardy, Ex Post Facto, and Bill of Attainder rights. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants and the inmates appealed. The appeals court affirm-ed, finding that the surcharge was not so punitive in purpose or effect that it could be viewed as a "punishment" in violation of the inmates' rights. The court held that the surcharge was not an ex-cessive fine and that it did not offend constitutional due process guarantees. The court noted that purchases outside the prison context would otherwise have been subject to a 6% sales tax. (New Jersey Department of Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
COMMISSARY

Nelson v. Heiss, 271 F.3d 891 (9th Cir. 2001). A state inmate brought a § 1983 action against corrections officials after holds were placed on his inmate trust account. The district court dismissed the action on the basis of qualified immunity and the appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The appeals court held that the statute that provided for an exemption of veteran's benefits against the claims of creditors precluded officials from placing holds on the inmate's accounts, but that the officials were entitled to qualified immunity from liability because prior caselaw had not clearly established this exemption. The inmate's trust account was funded with payments of Veteran's Disability Benefits administered by the United States Veterans Administration. The court held that the officials' placement of a hold on the inmate's account, after the inmate authorized withdrawals for which he lacked funds and the officials provided the goods and services in expectation of future payments, did not violate the inmate's alleged due process right to predeprivation proceedings because the inmate knew, or should have known, that his account was depleted. (Calipatria State Prison, California)

2002

U.S. Appeals Court
COMMISSARY

Floyd v. Ortiz, 300 F.3d 1223 (10th Cir. 2002). An inmate filed a petition to enforce the terms of a prior settlement agreement and to obtain contempt citations against a state director of corrections. The district court denied the petition and the inmate appealed. The appeals court reversed, finding that the district court abused its discretion by denying the inmate's request for a rehearing. The appeals court noted that the inmate, who benefited from the settlement agreement, could invoke the district court's continuing jurisdiction over the matter even though he was not a party to the original settlement agreement. The settlement addressed procedures for handling income from the inmate canteen program and interest on individual inmate accounts. The inmates alleged that income from the operation of the inmate canteen program was being deposited in the state treasury and not properly accounted for. (Colorado Department of Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
COMMISSARY

Love v. McKune, 33 Fed.Appx. 369 (10th Cir. 2002). Four prison inmates brought a civil rights action challenging their forced participation in a prison incentive level system that tied inmate privileges to participation in programs and good behavior. The district court dismissed the action and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that forced participation did not violate the inmates' Fourteenth Amendment due process rights. The Internal Management Policy and Procedure (IMPP) system assigned inmates to one of four levels. Each level had a corresponding level of privileges, such as television ownership, handicrafts, participation in organizations, use of outside funds, canteen expenditures, incentive pay, and visitation. The system had been previously upheld by the state supreme court, which found that none of the restrictions denied to inmates on lower levels infringed on inmates' property or liberty interests and therefore did not implicate due process protection. The appeals court noted denying an inmate the use of certain electronic equipment does not impose a significant hardship, nor do restrictions on canteen purchases or the types of purchases and personal property allowed. (Lansing Correctional Facility, Kansas)

U.S. Appeals Court INDIGENT PRISONERS

Moore v. Chavez, 36 Fed.Appx. 169 (6th Cir. 2002). A state prisoner brought suits against a state corrections department and correctional officials, alleging that he was improperly denied indigent status after he dropped out of an educational course, and that the defendants denied him employment when he refused to take a qualifying exam. The district court entered judgments generally in favor of the defendants and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the denial of indigent status did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment, even though the prisoner alleged that as a result of losing his indigent status he could not receive a loan to purchase hygiene items. The court noted that the inmate did not allege that he suffered extreme discomfort or that he was completely denied the basic elements of hygiene. The appeals court held that the prisoner's claim that the defendants discriminated against him because he had to use a wheelchair and could not take tests under pressure, was barred by Eleventh Amendment immunity. (Mich. Dept. of Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
LIBRARY

Tarpley v. Allen County, Indiana, 312 F.3d 895 (7th Cir. 2002). A former inmate sued a county, alleging interference with his right to exercise his religion and denial of meaningful access to courts. The district court entered summary judgment for the county and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the inmate's free exercise rights were not violated by the county's refusal to allow him to use his own Bible and requiring him to use the jail's Bible, even though his personal Bible had commentary that the jail Bible did not have. The court found the jail policy of not allowing inmates to keep personal books to be reasonably related to its interest in maintaining safe conditions and preventing disputes over lost or damaged items. The court noted that the inmate did not assert that the commentary in his personal Bible had become part of fundamental texts of his religion as a whole. (Allen County Jail, Indiana)

U.S. Appeals Court
COMMISSARY
INDIGENT INMATES

Thompson v. Gibson, 289 F.3d 1218 (10th Cir. 2002). A state inmate brought a § 1983 action against prison officials, seeking monetary damages and injunctive relief for alleged Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment violations. The district court dismissed the action as frivolous. The appeals court dismissed the appeal, finding that the inmate's claim that prison officials were deliberately indifferent to his serious medical need for adequate portions of food was not actionable under the Eighth Amendment. The court noted that the record established that the prison was providing the inmate with a nutritionally adequate diet and doctors disagreed as to whether the inmate should receive double food portions. The appeals court found no equal protection violation, as alleged by the inmate, because inmates with funds were able to supplement their diet with purchases from the prison commissary, while indigent inmates were not. (Oklahoma State Penitentiary)

2003

U.S. District Court
HAIRCUT

Gerber v. Sweeney, 292 F.Supp.2d 700 (E.D.Pa. 2003). State prison inmates brought a § 1983 action against prison officials, alleging that they were provided with a nutritionally inadequate diet, received inadequate medical care, and were subjected to the use of excessive force. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court held that the denial of the inmates' request for hats and gloves, and for shoes instead of sandals, to wear during outdoor recreation in winter months did not violate their Eighth Amendment right to regular exercise. The court noted that the inmates failed to show that protracted periods of inclement weather, foreclosing outdoor activity, occurred with any frequency. The court found that the prison's use of unlicensed barbers to provide haircuts for inmates, and requiring inmates to share electric razors, did not place the inmates at a risk of serious or substantial harm absent any showing that the inmates were at any additional risk of contracting diseases. (Lehigh County Prison, Pennsylvania)

U.S. District Court
COMMISSARY
INDIGENT

Lebron v. Armstrong, 289 F.Supp.2d 56 (D.Conn. 2003). A state inmate petitioned pro se for a writ of mandamus to require state corrections officials to provide him, and all other inmates, with legal materials on request. The district court decided that the petition would be construed as a motion for a preliminary injunction. The court held that the inmate had no authority to appear in federal court as an attorney for other inmates, and that the inmate failed to state a claim for violation of his constitutional right of access to the courts. The court found that the delay in the inmate's obtaining of paper, envelopes and copies of legal documents, was not a violation of his rights, and denied the petition for a preliminary injunction. The court noted that the inmate's right of access to the courts did not encompass a right to an immediate and unlimited supply of pre-paid envelopes and other supplies, without any requirement that he balance his need for these items against other commissary purchases when determining how to spend his available funds. The inmate had challenged an indigency policy that requires an inmate to have less than $5.00 in his inmate account for ninety days before being considered indigent, and thereby receive free mailing services. (Connecticut Department of Correction)

2004

U.S. District Court
LIBRARY

Cline v. Fox, 319 F.Supp.2d 685 (N.D.W.Va. 2004). A federal district court determined that a West Virginia Department of Corrections policy that prohibits inmates from receiving or possessing obscene material was not unconstitutional as it was applied to the inmate. The inmate then alleged that the policy on its face violated the First and Fourteenth Amendments because it was used to purge the prison library of certain books. The district court held that the inmate had standing to challenge the policy, and that the policy was not reasonably related to a legitimate penological interest in promoting security, preventing sexual assaults, and furthering rehabilitation. The court ordered the prison to amend its publication policy and screen purged books under the revised policy before restoring them to library shelves. According to the court, the policy did not define explicit sexual activity in terms of its capacity to sexually arouse. The court noted that the policy prohibited material that contained even one depiction of sexual intercourse, regardless of its context, while it allowed certain commercial pornography. (St. Mary's Correctional Center, West Virginia)

U.S. District Court
LIBRARY

Tyler v. McCaughtry, 293 F.Supp.2d 920 (E.D.Wis. 2003). A state prisoner filed a petition for a writ of habeas corpus, claiming that his due process rights were violated when a prison disciplinary committee revoked his good time credits. The state moved to dismiss and the district court denied the motion. The court held that the summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the correctional facility's legal resources were the cause for the petitioner's default of federal claims in state court. (Dodge Correctional Institution, Wisconsin)

2005

U.S. Appeals Court
TELEPHONE

Gilmore v. County of Douglas, State of Neb., 406 F.3d 935 (8th Cir. 2005). The relative of a former jail inmate brought a § 1983 action alleging that a 45% commission, paid to the county by the jail's telecommunications providers on surcharged collect telephone calls from inmates, constituted a tax on inmates' relatives that violated the Equal Protection Clause. The district court granted the county's motion to dismiss and the relative appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the relative was similarly situated to recipients of collect calls from non-inmates. The court held that the contract which called for the commission was aimed at generating revenues to defray the costs of providing inmates with telephone service, not at treating the recipients of inmates' calls differently from others, and therefore had a rational basis. The court noted that a 15-minute inmate-initiated call from the jail cost $2.30. (Douglas County Corrections Center, Nebraska)

U.S. District Court
IDLENESS

Little v. Shelby County, Tenn., 384 F.Supp.2d 1169 (W.D.Tenn. 2005). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against a county and sheriff, alleging that he had been raped in jail in violation of his Eighth Amendment rights. The county stipulated to liability and an order of injunctive relief was issued. Later, the district court found the county in contempt, and the county sought to purge itself of the contempt finding. The court entered a purgation order. The court praised the county, noting that it had adopted a focused, systemic and information-driven structural reform based on critical exert assessment of essential institutional functions. The county adopted a 14-point remedial scheme that included implementing direct supervision management of inmate cellblocks, improving population management, collecting and utilizing data, and installing an objective inmate classification system. (Shelby County Jail, Tennessee)

U.S. Appeals Court
COMMISSARY

Purcell ex rel. Estate of Morgan v. Toombs County, 400 F.3d 1313 (11th Cir. 2005). The mother of a county jail inmate who died after he was beaten and injured by three other inmates brought a § 1983 action against a sheriff and jail administrator. The district court denied qualified immunity for the defendants, and Eleventh Amendment immunity for the sheriff, and they appealed. The appeals court reversed. The court held that the conditions at the county jail did not pose a "substantial risk of serious harm" as required to show an Eighth Amendment violation. The inmate was beaten by three other inmates in his cell over an alleged money dispute. Inmates were allowed to keep money in their cells, play cards and gamble, the jail had a history of inmate-on-inmate assaults, and the jail's layout presented some difficulty in the continuous observation of inmates. But the court noted that inmates were segregated based on particularized factors, including the kind of crime committed and personal conflicts, the jail was not understaffed at the time of the attack, serious inmate-on-inmate violence was not the norm, fights that did occur were not linked to any recurring specific cause, and jailers had a history of punishing inmate violence. The sheriff had directed that a new commissary system be instituted to manage inmate funds so that inmates would not have to keep money on their persons, but the system had not been put in place by the day of the incident. (Toombs County Jail, Georgia)

U.S. District Court
LIBRARY

Rickenbacker v. U.S., 365 F.Supp.2d 347 (E.D.N.Y. 2005). After pleading guilty to credit card fraud and being sentenced to 24 months of imprisonment, a defendant moved to vacate, set aside, or correct the sentence. The district court denied the motion. The court held that defense counsel was not deficient in failing to move for a downward departure of the defendant's sentence based on perceived hardships the defendant endured while being detained prior to sentencing. According to the court, the alleged substandard conditions, consisting of being served food that the defendant believed had been accessed by rodents, and not being provided with a fully stocked library, were not conditions that rose to the level that would warrant a downward departure. The defendant had been served bread that rodents had apparently partially eaten, and in one instance a mouse had created a tunnel inside of the bread. (Nassau County Correctional Center, New York)

2006

U.S. District Court
TELEPHONE

Harrison v. Federal Bureau of Prisons, 464 F.Supp.2d 552 (E.D.Va. 2006). A federal inmate brought an action against the federal Bureau of Prisons (BOP) and prison officials under Bivens and various federal statutes, challenging an increase in the long-distance telephone rate. The court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court held that: (1) the telephone rate increase did not implicate the inmate's First Amendment rights; (2) the inmate's procedural due process rights were not violated: (3) the inmate failed to state an equal protection violation; (4) BOP's increase in the telephone rates was not subject to judicial review; (5) the inmate failed to state a claim under the Federal Tort Claims Act (FTCA); and (6) the inmate's Freedom of Information Act (FIOA) claim would be transferred to another court. According to the court, prisoners have no per se First Amendment right to use a telephone and are not entitled to a specific rate for their telephone calls. The court found that the three-cent increase in the long-distance telephone rate charged to the federal inmate, from twenty cents per minute to twenty-three cents per minute, did not implicate the inmate's First Amendment rights. Although prisoners have a due process property interest in the funds held in their prison accounts, the court noted that the post-deprivation proceeding of the normal grievance process was available. The court also ruled that the Administrative Procedure Act (APA) precluded a judicial review of the BOP increase in telephone rates. (Federal Bureau of Prisons, Virginia)

U.S. Appeals Court
LIBRARY

Myron v. Terhune, 457 F.3d 996 (9th Cir. 2006). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against several correctional officers and medical personnel at a prison. The district court dismissed the action and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that a state regulation governing the security classification of prisoners did not give the state prisoner a liberty interest, protected by the due process clause, in the security level to which he was classified, noting that the regulation provided that prison officials retained discretion in making placement decisions. The court found that a state regulation governing prison publications did not give the prisoner a liberty interest, protected by the due process clause, in participating in the publication and distribution of an inmate publication, where the regulation granted unfettered discretion to prison officials to restrict prisoner publications. According to the court, a regulation governing library services in prisons did not give the prisoner a liberty interest, protected by the due process clause, in library access hours. The court noted that while the regulation may have created a liberty interest in requiring prison officials to have a law library, the warden was vested with discretion to regulate access to library facilities. (Salinas Valley State Prison, California)

U.S. District Court
COMMISSARY

Pepper v. Carroll, 423 F.Supp.2d 442 (D.Del. 2006). A state inmate filed a § 1983 action alleging that prison officials violated his constitutional rights. The court granted the officials' motion for summary judgment. According to the court, the prison officials' denials of several privileges while the inmate was voluntarily housed in a security housing unit, including extra visits, reading material, exercise, television, cleaning tools, boiling water, ice, razors, and additional writing utensils, were not a sufficiently serious deprivation to support the inmate's claim that the denials constituted cruel and unusual punishment under the Eighth Amendment. The court found that the inmate had no constitutionally protected right to purchase food or other items as cheaply as possible through the prison commissary, and therefore prison officials did not violate the inmate's Eighth Amendment rights by allegedly overcharging for commissary products. (Delaware Correctional Center)

U.S. District Court
TELEPHONE

Tucker v. Hardin County, 448 F.Supp.2d 901 (W.D.Tenn. 2006). Deaf detainees and their deaf mother sued a county and a city, alleging violations of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA). The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court held that a county court did not violate the ADA's Title II, which prohibits discrimination in public services, by asking the deaf mother to serve as interpreter for her deaf sons at their plea hearing, despite her contention that the request deprived her of her right to participate as a spectator. The court noted that the mother expressed no reservations to the court about serving as an interpreter, that she could have refused the request, and, even if the court were somehow responsible for her service as an interpreter, its request was based on her skill in lip-reading and sign language, not on her disability. According to the court, assuming that overnight incarceration was covered by the ADA's Title II which prohibits discrimination in public services, and assuming that placing a phone call was an "aid, benefit, or service" within the meaning of an ADA regulation prohibiting public entities from providing a disabled person aid, benefit, or service that was not as effective as that provided to others, the county did not violate ADA in using relay operators and notes to allow the deaf detainees to communicate with their mother, rather than providing them with a teletypewriter (TTY) telephone. The court noted that information was transmitted and received, which was the same benefit non-disabled person would have received. While in custody, the two brothers communicated with officers through written notes. The jail was not equipped with a teletypewriter (TTY) telephone. Instead, the officers acted as relay operators, using paper and pencil, as they spoke with an operator acting on their behalf to complete the call, which lasted 45 minutes. (Hardin County Jail, and the City of Savannah Police Department, Tennessee)

2007

U.S. Appeals Court
TELEPHONE

Robertson v. Las Animas County Sheriff's Dept., 500 F.3d 1185 (10th Cir. 2007). A deaf pretrial detainee brought suit under § 1983 and the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) against deputies and a sheriff, claiming wrongful arrest and failure to accommodate his disability. The district court dismissed all claims against the defendants on their motion for summary judgment and the detainee appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The court held that a fact issue as to whether the totally deaf detainee with a surgically implanted cochlear implant was substantially limited in his ability to hear, precluded summary judgment as to whether he was a qualified individual under ADA. The court also found that summary judgment was precluded by fact issues as to whether the jail knew, or should have been aware of, the deaf inmate's limitations. The court found that the detainee was qualified to receive benefits and services of the county jail, within the meaning of ADA, with respect to phone services and televised closed-circuit viewing of his probable cause hearing, as such services were available to all inmates. (Las Animas County Jail, Colorado)

2008

U.S. District Court
TELEPHONE

Bryant v. Cortez, 536 F.Supp.2d 1160 (C.D.Cal. 2008). A state inmate filed a § 1983 action alleging that prison officials violated his due process rights and state law by placing him in an administrative segregation unit (ASU) for eighteen months pending resolution of a disciplinary charge against him. The district court granted the officials' motion for summary judgment. The court held that the inmate's loss of telephone privileges did not constitute a due process violation, given the availability of alternative means of communication by mail or in person. (Calif. State Prison, Los Angeles County)

U.S. District Court
TELEPHONE

Douglas v. Gusman, 567 F.Supp.2d 877 (E.D.La. 2008). A deaf prisoner brought a civil rights suit alleging violation of his equal protection rights, the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), and the Eighth Amendment as the result of his limited access to a telephone typewriter (TTY) device for phone calls, lack of access to closed captioning for television, and verbal abuse from officers. The district court dismissed the action. The court held that the prisoner's civil rights claims arising from denial of full access to a telephone typewriter (TTY) and denial of closed captioning on a television in a parish prison accrued each time he was denied access to a TTY or captioning or was threatened or assaulted for requesting access. The court found that the differential treatment permitting other inmates unlimited telephone access, while permitting the deaf inmate only limited access, did not violate the deaf inmate's equal protection rights where the deaf inmate, who required the use of telephone typewriter (TTY) device for the deaf in a separate office, failed to show that limited access burdened a fundamental right. The court found that the deaf prisoner was not similarly situated to hearing inmates who could use inmate telephones, as required to support an equal protection claim based on failure to afford him the same access that hearing inmates received to the phone system.

The court concluded that the limited access provided to the deaf prisoner was rationally related to legitimate security interests of the prison, where a deputy was required to escort the prisoner outside his housing area each time the prisoner used the phone, precluding the claim that he was denied equal protection based on the greater phone privileges afforded to hearing inmates who had access to phones in the housing tier. The court held that failure to provide a telephone typewriter (TTY) device on the deaf prisoner's housing tier, while providing unlimited access to phones to other prisoners, did not discriminate against the disabled inmate in violation of Title II of the ADA. According to the court, allowing the prisoner twice daily use of a TTY device on a prison facility phone outside the housing tier was meaningful access, and lack of a TTY in the housing tier affected disabled persons in general, precluding a finding of specific discrimination against the inmate in particular. (Orleans Parish Prison, Louisiana)

U.S. District Court
COMMISSARY

Kole v. Lappin, 551 F.Supp.2d 149 (D.Conn. 2008). A Jewish inmate filed a complaint against federal prison officials alleging that a reduction in the number of kosher-for-Passover food items available to inmates for purchase for the Passover holiday violated her First, Fifth, and Fourteenth Amendment rights. The district court entered judgment in favor of the defendants. The court held that the prison's limitation on the number of supplemental kosher-for-Passover foods available for purchase by Jewish inmates did not substantially burden the plaintiff's religious practice in violation of the First Amendment, where the prison provided her with two Seder dinners during Passover, and otherwise provided her with three kosher-for-Passover meals and a box of Matzoh each day during the eight days of the holiday. The court found that the differences between food available for inmate purchase on a special holiday list available between Thanksgiving and Christmas and the more limited list of kosher-for-Passover food available for purchase did not violate the plaintiff's right to equal protection. The court noted that the prison's stated penological interests in limiting a small group of inmates' access to special goods to avoid hoarding and illegal trade, and in the efficient financial operation of the prison commissary, were logically advanced by offering a smaller number of "best sellers" for sale on Passover. (Federal Correction Institution, Danbury, Connecticut)

U.S. Appeals Court
TELEPHONE

Tucker v. Tennessee, 539 F.3d 526 (6th Cir. 2008). Deaf and mute arrestees and their deaf mother sued a city and county, alleging that denial of an interpreter or other reasonable accommodations during criminal proceedings violated the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA). The district court granted the county's motion for summary judgment and the plaintiffs appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the county's use of the deaf mother's services as an interpreter during her deaf sons' dispositional hearing on criminal charges did not violate Title II of the ADA, which prohibits discrimination in public services. The court noted that the mother voluntarily served as the interpreter and that her service was requested in light of her sign language skills, not for any discriminatory purpose. The court found that the deaf and mute arrestees were not denied a "service, program, or activity" when the city failed to provide an interpreter during a domestic disturbance call which resulted in their arrest, and the city thus was not liable under ADA's Title II. According to the court, the arrests were made not because the arrestees were disabled, but because the arrestees assaulted police officers, individual citizens, or attempted to interfere with a lawful arrest. The court concluded that the arresting officers were able to effectively communicate with the arrestees. The court held that the county did not violate Title II of the ADA, which prohibits discrimination in public services, by using relay operators to allow the deaf arrestees to communicate with their mother, rather than providing them with a teletypewriter (TTY) telephone. Jailers assisted the arrestees in making their requested phone call by utilizing relay operators, the phone call lasted nearly forty-five minutes, and the Department of Justice (DOJ) provisions did not mandate the presence of a TTY telephone. (City of Savannah Police Department , Hardin County Jail, Tennessee)

U.S. Appeals Court
TELEPHONE

U.S. v. Novak, 531 F.3d 99 (1st Cir. 2008). In an attorney's prosecution for endeavoring to obstruct justice and two counts of money laundering, he moved to suppress intercepted telephone calls with a prospective client, made while that client was in pretrial detention. The district court granted the motion, and the government appealed. The appeals court reversed. The court held that the Fourth Amendment was not violated by the jail's monitoring of the detainee's telephone calls to his attorney. According to the court, a telephone call can be monitored and recorded without violating the Fourth Amendment so long as one participant in the call consents to the monitoring. By placing the calls after being informed that they would be monitored and recorded, the detainee consented to such monitoring. The court decision begins by stating that "…the government in this case brings an extraordinary appeal: It asks us to reverse a district court ruling barring from evidence recordings of phone calls made between an attorney and his client. These calls were recorded in clear violation of state and federal regulations." The court noted that the attorney had not raised a Sixth Amendment challenge, and for Fourth Amendment purposes, his client consented to the monitoring of his calls. The court held that "On these narrow facts, we reverse the determination of the district court that the calls must be excluded." (Barnstable County Jail, Massachusetts)

2009

U.S. District Court
TELEPHONE

Cox v. Ashcroft, 603 F.Supp.2d 1261 (E.D.Cal. 2009). A prisoner brought a § 1983 action against the United States Attorney General, several federal prosecutors, and the owner and employees of a privately-owned federal facility in which the prisoner was incarcerated, alleging constitutional violations arising from his arrest, prosecution, and incarceration. The district court dismissed the action. The court held that the prisoner did not have any Fourth Amendment rights to privacy in his cell, and thus did not suffer any constitutional injury as a result of the search of his cell and the confiscation of another inmate's legal materials. According to the court, the prison facility's imposition of a 30-day suspension of the prisoner's telephone privileges related to a disciplinary action arising from the search of his cell and the confiscation of another inmates' legal papers, did not constitute an unreasonable limitation on the prisoner's First Amendment rights. The court noted that prisoners have a First Amendment right to telephone access, subject to reasonable limitations. (Taft Correctional Institution, Wackenhut Corrections Corporation, California)

U.S. District Court
COMMISSARY COMMISSION
TELEPHONE

Harrison v. Federal Bureau of Prisons, 611 F.Supp.2d 54 (D.D.C. 2009). A federal prisoner brought an action against the Bureau of Prisons, alleging that the Bureau's conduct in adopting telephone rates and commissary prices violated his constitutional due process and equal protection rights. The district court granted the Bureau's motion to dismiss in part. The court noted that the prisoner had previously litigated claims against the Bureau of Prisons arising from an increase in telephone rates, and barred the prisoner from bringing additional claims based on that same cause of action, regardless of whether the prisoner's claim invoked different provision of the Administrative Procedure Act. The court held that the prisoner did not have a constitutionally protected property or liberty interest in commissary pricing, as required to state a claim for the violation of due process based on allegedly unfair prices. The court noted that an inmate has no federal constitutional right to purchase items from a prison commissary. According to the court, the Bureau of Prisons used the same mark-up guidelines in all of its institutions to set commissary prices, and thus there was no evidence that commissary prices violated the federal prisoner's equal protection rights. (Federal Bureau of Prisons, Virginia)

U.S. District Court
TELEPHONE

Johnson v. Boyd, 676 F.Supp.2d 800 (E.D. Ark. 2009). A state prisoner filed a civil rights action against a detention center and its personnel alleging several violations. The defendants moved for summary judgment and the district court granted the motion in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether detention center personnel failed to protect the prisoner from an attack by another prisoner. The court held that the prisoner stated a free exercise of religion claim under the First Amendment by alleging that detention center personnel prevented him from practicing the central tenet of his faith of regularly reading his Bible for 19 days while he was in protective custody. According to the court, the prisoner's First Amendment freedom of association and speech rights had not been violated by denial of his visitation, phone, and mailing privileges for two days as the direct result of the prisoner committing a disciplinary infraction while he was in protective custody. (Crittenden County Detention Center, Arkansas)

U.S. Appeals Court
LIBRARY

Mason v. Correctional Medical Services, Inc., 559 F.3d 880 (8th Cir. 2009). A state prisoner brought an action against the manager of his prison housing unit and the director of prison medical services, alleging that they violated his Eighth Amendment rights by failing to facilitate or render adequate medical treatment. The prisoner also brought an action against the Missouri Department of Corrections (MDOC), alleging violations of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA). The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the director and the MDOC. Following a jury verdict in favor of the manager, the district court denied the prisoner's post-trial motion for judgment as a matter of law. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court found that recreational activities, medical services, and educational and vocational programs at state prisons are "benefits" within the meaning of the ADA, and qualified individuals with a disability are entitled to meaningful access to such benefits. The court held that the blind prisoner was provided with meaningful access to prison benefits, including library benefits, which required him to read and write, as required by the ADA. According to the court, given the sufficiency of the accommodations provided, the prison was not required to provide alternative accommodations such as Braille materials or computer software that would read written materials aloud. The prisoner was provided with an inmate reader, who was available to read to the prisoner in person and to create audio tapes of written material at the prisoner's request. The prisoner was also granted access to audio materials by mail and to a tape recorder. The court found that the prison did not deprive the blind prisoner of meaningful access to the prison's exercise and recreation facilities, in violation of the ADA, where the prison provided the inmate an assistant who walked with the prisoner, and the prisoner chose not to engage in other activities, such as weightlifting. (Northeast Corr'l Center, Missouri)

U.S. District Court
TELEPHONE

Shariff v. Coombe, 655 F.Supp.2d 274 (S.D.N.Y. 2009). Disabled prisoners who depended on wheelchairs for mobility filed an action against a state and its employees asserting claims pursuant to Title II of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), Title V of Rehabilitation Act, New York State Correction Law, and First, Eighth, and Fourteenth Amendments. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. According to the court, the inaccessibility of telephones throughout a state prison, inaccessibility of a family reunion site, inaccessibility of a law library, and malfunctioning of a school elevator, that did not cause any physical harm or pain to disabled prisoners who depended on wheelchairs for mobility, were not the kind of deprivations that denied a basic human need. (New York State Department of Correctional Services, Green Haven Correctional Facility)

U.S. District Court
LIBRARY

Zulu v. Botta, 613 F.Supp.2d 391 (W.D.N.Y. 2009). A state inmate brought a pro se § 1983 suit against the director of a city library, who was not a state corrections department employee. The director moved for summary judgment and the district court granted the motion. The court held that the director was not involved in any of the alleged violations of the inmate's rights. The court found that while there were some issues over the inmate's excessive book requests, there was no evidence that the director had anything to do with that matter, and that there was no evidence that the director conspired with corrections employees to file a false misbehavior report against the inmate in retaliation for his filing of a grievance. (Geneva Free Library, Geneva, New York)

2010

U.S. District Court
LIBRARY

Couch v. Jabe, 737 F.Supp.2d 561 (W.D.Va. 2010). An inmate, proceeding pro se, brought a § 1983 action claiming that prison officials violated his First and Fourteenth Amendment rights when they applied a Virginia Department of Corrections (VDOC) regulation to exclude the books Ulysses and Lady Chatterley's Lover from the prison library and prevented him from ordering those books from a private, approved vendor. The parties cross-moved for summary judgment. The district granted the inmate's motion, finding that the regulation violated the First Amendment, and that injunctive relief was warranted. The court held that the regulation was not reasonably related to legitimate penological interests, and thus, was overbroad, in violation of the First Amendment. The court noted that legitimate government interests in security, discipline, good order and offender rehabilitation were not rationally related to the regulation, which forbid all "explicit ... descriptions of sexual acts" including "sexual acts in violation of state or federal law," and encompassed much of the world's finest literature, but did not extend to "soft core" pornography. According to the court, while the inmate had no right to a general purpose reading library under the First Amendment, where the Virginia Department of Corrections (VDOC) decided to provide a general literary library to offenders, VDOC officials were constrained by the First Amendment in how they regulated the library. The court concluded that the appropriate remedy following a determination that the First Amendment was violated by a prison regulation, which excluded the books Ulysses and Lady Chatterley's Lover from a prison library, was injunctive relief against the enforcement and application of the regulation. (Augusta Correctional Center, Virginia)

U.S. Appeals Court
COMMISSARY

Gee v. Pacheco, 627 F.3d 1178 (10th Cir. 2010). A state prisoner, proceeding pro se, brought a § 1983 action against prison officials, alleging violations of the First, Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments. The district court dismissed the complaint with prejudice. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The court held that the prisoner's allegations that a prison official intentionally confiscated and destroyed letters sent to him by persons outside the prison "under the guise" of sticker and perfume violations, for the purpose of harassing him, were sufficient to plead violations of his First Amendment speech rights. The court also found that the prisoner's allegations that a prison official returned to him outgoing letters that had "appropriate postage affixed without reason" for failure to mail them, were sufficient to plead a violation of the prisoner's First Amendment speech rights. The court found an alleged First Amendment speech rights violation with the prisoner's allegations that he was given a letter from his sister and that it was confiscated from him due to his incommunicado status, but that it was never returned to him. The court held that the prisoner's allegations that prison officials confiscated canteen items, deprived him of hygiene items for 25 hours and incarcerated him for four weeks in an isolation cell with limited outdoor recreation and lack of access to hygiene items, were insufficient to state a § 1983 claim for violations of the Eighth Amendment. (Wyoming State Penitentiary)

U.S. District Court
COMMISSARY
TELEPHONE

Harrison v. Federal Bureau of Prisons, 681 F.Supp.2d 76 (D.D.C. 2010). A federal prisoner brought an action against the Bureau of Prisons (BOP), alleging that BOP's adoption of telephone rates and commissary prices violated his due process and equal protection rights, as well as the Administrative Procedure Act (APA). He also alleged violations of the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) and Privacy Act. After BOP's motion to dismiss and for summary judgment was granted in part and denied in part, the prisoner moved for reconsideration, and the BOP moved for summary judgment on remaining FOIA claims. The district court granted the BOP's motion. The court found no prejudicial error from the court's dismissal of his claims in connection with BOP's adoption of telephone rates and commissary prices, as would warrant reconsideration. The court held that an investigation memorandum prepared by a warden concerning a tort claim brought by the prisoner against the BOP was exempt from disclosure under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) exemption for inter-agency or intra-agency memorandums or letters which would not be available by law to a party other than an agency in litigation with the agency. The court found that BOP conducted a reasonable and adequate search for records concerning the prisoner's disability checks, and for records concerning the cost of and profits from inmates' copy cards, as required under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA). (Federal Bureau of Prisons, Washington, D.C.)

U.S. District Court
COMMISSARY

Hopkins v. Grondolsky, 759 F.Supp.2d 97 (D.Mass. 2010). A prisoner filed a petition for a writ of habeas corpus. The Federal Bureau of Prisons (BOP) filed a motion to dismiss. The district court dismissed the case, finding that the loss of 90 days of commissary privileges as a disciplinary action was not a loss of any protected liberty interest, and allegations were insufficient to plead prison regulations unreasonably burdened the prisoner's constitutional rights. (Federal Bureau of Prisons, Sex Offender Management Program, FMC Devens, Massachusetts)

U.S. District Court
COMMISSARY

Mitchell v. Dodrill, 696 F.Supp.2d 454 (M.D.Pa. 2010). A federal prisoner initiated a Bivens-type action against the Bureau of Prisons (BOP) employees, making several complaints about various conditions of his former place of confinement. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants in part, and denied in part. The court held that, absent any evidence that the alleged conditions of the prisoner's cell caused harm to the prisoner, and that the Bureau of Prisons (BOP) defendants were deliberately indifferent to that harm, cell conditions did not violate the Eighth Amendment. The prisoner alleged that his cell was in poor condition, with poor welding and rust erosion present at the base of the walls, had inadequate plumbing, was infested with "cockroaches, spiders, worms, mice and other unknown insects," and lacked ventilation. The court found that the prisoner's allegation, that as a special management unit inmate, he was not given the same commissary privileges as a general population inmate, did not rise to the level of a sufficiently serious constitutional deprivation to give rise to an Eighth Amendment claim. The court held that double celling of the prisoner did not violate the Eighth Amendment where the prisoner did not allege that he was singled out for double-celling or that his health or life was endangered by the condition. The court noted that double celling inmates is not per se unconstitutional, and that considerations that are relevant in determining if double celling violates the Eighth Amendment include the length of confinement, the amount of time prisoners spend in their cells each day, sanitation, lighting, bedding, ventilation, noise, education and rehabilitation programs, opportunities for activities outside the cells, and the repair and functioning of basic physical facilities such as plumbing, ventilation, and showers. (Special Management Unit, United States Penitentiary, Lewisburg, Pennsylvania)

U.S. District Court
TELEPHONE

Paulone v. City of Frederick, 718 F.Supp.2d 626 (D.Md. 2010). An arrestee, a deaf woman, brought an action against a state, a county board, and a sheriff alleging violations of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), the Rehabilitation Act, and related torts. The state and sheriff moved to dismiss or, in the alternative, for summary judgment. The district court granted the motions in part and denied in part. The court held that the arrestee failed to allege that any program or activity she was required to complete following her arrest for driving under the influence (DUI) and during her subsequent probation, received federal funds, as required to state Rehabilitation Act claims against the state for discriminating against her and denying her benefits because of her deafness. The court found that the arrestee stated an ADA claim with her allegations that, after her arrest and during her detention, police officers denied her the use of a working machine that would have allowed her to make a telephone call, help in reading and understanding forms, and access to a sign language interpreter. (Frederick County Board of County Commissioners, Frederick County Adult Detention Center, Maryland)

2011

U.S. District Court
TELEPHONE

Aref v. Holder, 774 F.Supp.2d 147 (D.D.C. 2011). A group of prisoners who were, or who had been, incarcerated in communication management units (CMU) at federal correctional institutions (FCI) designed to monitor high-risk prisoners filed suit against the United States Attorney General, the federal Bureau of Prisons (BOP), and BOP officials, alleging that CMU incarceration violated the First, Fifth, and Eighth Amendments. Four additional prisoners moved to intervene and the defendants moved to dismiss. The district court denied the motion to intervene, and granted the motion to dismiss in part and denied in part. The court held that even though a federal prisoner who had been convicted of solicitation of bank robbery was no longer housed in the federal prison's communication management unit (CMU), he had standing under Article III to pursue constitutional claims against the Bureau of Prisons (BOP) for alleged violations since there was a realistic threat that he might be redesignated to a CMU. The court noted that the prisoner had originally been placed in CMU because of the nature of his underlying conviction and because of his alleged efforts to radicalize other inmates, and these reasons for placing him in CMU remained. The court found that the restrictions a federal prison put on prisoners housed within a communication management unit (CMU), which included that all communications be conducted in English, that visits were monitored and subject to recording, that each prisoner received only eight visitation hours per month, and that prisoners' telephone calls were limited and subjected to monitoring, did not violate the prisoners' alleged First Amendment right to family integrity, since the restrictions were rationally related to a legitimate penological interest. The court noted that prisoners assigned to the unit typically had offenses related to international or domestic terrorism or had misused approved communication methods while incarcerated. The court found that prisoners confined to a communication management unit (CMU), stated a procedural due process claim against the Bureau of Prisons (BOP) by alleging that the requirements imposed on CMU prisoners were significantly different than those imposed on prisoners in the general population, and that there was a significant risk that procedures used by the BOP to review whether prisoners should initially be placed within CMU or should continue to be incarcerated there had resulted in erroneous deprivation of their liberty interests. The court noted that CMU prisoners were allowed only eight hours of non-contact visitation per month and two 15 minute telephone calls per week, while the general population at a prison was not subjected to a cap on visitation and had 300 minutes of telephone time per month. The court also noted that the administrative review of CMU status, conducted by officials in Washington, D.C., rather than at a unit itself, was allegedly so vague and generic as to render it illusory. (Communication Management Units, Federal Correctional Inst. in Terre Haute, Indiana and Marion, Ill.)

U.S. District Court
TELEPHONE

Hill v. Donoghue, 815 F.Supp.2d 583 (E.D.N.Y. 2011). An inmate, proceeding pro se, brought an action against an Assistant United States Attorneys (AUSA) and the United States, asserting various claims under Bivens and the Wiretap Act in relation to his jailhouse phone calls. The defendants filed a motion for judgment on the pleadings, which the district court granted. The court held that the AUSAs were entitled to absolute immunity from claims relating to their use of the tapes. The but court found that an AUSA was not entitled to absolute immunity for ordering the recordings, where the alleged order to make warrantless recordings of the inmate's jailhouse phone calls was investigative, rather than prosecutorial, and therefore, the AUSA was not entitled to absolute immunity from the inmate's Wiretap Act or Bivens Fourth Amendment claims. The court found that the inmate did not have a reasonable expectation of privacy in his jailhouse phone calls, and therefore, the warrantless recording of his calls did not violate his Fourth Amendment rights. The court noted that the jail telephones played a recorded warning that calls might be recorded and monitored, and the inmate's use of a jailhouse phone after hearing the warning constituted implied consent to the recording of his calls. (Eastern District of New York, Nassau County Correctional Center, New York)

U.S. District Court
IDLENESS

Johnson v. Florida Dept. of Corrections, 826 F.Supp.2d 1319 (N.D.Fla. 2011). A hard-of-hearing inmate at a state prison, who had allegedly been denied the benefit of television and radio services provided to other inmates, filed suit against the state department of corrections seeking accommodation in the form of volume-boosting listening devices, and alleging violations of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), the Rehabilitation Act, and the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The defendant moved to dismiss. The district court denied the motion. The court held that even though the inmate was transferred to a different prison after filing grievances and prior to filing suit, he sufficiently exhausted his administrative remedies under PLRA, since officials had been alerted to his problem and had the opportunity to resolve it before being sued. The court noted that even though the prison to which the inmate had been transferred would require him to have different adaptive technology than the type which he had originally sought, his claim arose from the same continuing failure of the prison to provide him with access to television and radio audio. (Polk Correctional Institution, Florida)

U.S. Appeals Court
COMMISSARY

Tenny v. Blagojevich, 659 F.3d 578 (7th Cir. 2011). Seven inmates incarcerated at a state prison sued current and former officials in the Illinois Department of Corrections, and the former Governor, for marking up the price of commissary goods beyond a statutory cap. The district court dismissed the cases for failure to state a claim and the inmates appealed. The appeals court affirmed and remanded with instructions. According to the appeals court, even if a statutory cap on the mark-up of the price of prison commissary goods created a protected property interest, the prisoners did not state a procedural due process claim based on the Department of Corrections' alleged cap violation where they did not allege that post-deprivation remedies were inadequate to satisfy constitutional due process requirements. (Stateville Corr'l. Center, Ill.)

2012

U.S. Appeals Court
TELEPHONE

Beaulieu v. Ludeman, 690 F.3d 1017 (8th Cir. 2012). Patients who were civilly committed to the Minnesota Sex Offender Program (MSOP) brought a § 1983 action against Minnesota Department of Human Services (DHS) officials and Minnesota Department of Corrections (DOC) officials, alleging that various MSOP policies and practices relating to the patients' conditions of confinement were unconstitutional. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants and the patients appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that: (1) the MSOP policy of performing unclothed body searches of patients was not unreasonable; (2) the policy of placing full restraints on patients during transport was not unreasonable; (3) officials were not liable for using excessive force in handcuffing patients; (4) the officials' seizure of televisions from the patients' rooms was not unreasonable; (5) the MSOP telephone-use policy did not violate the First Amendment; and (6) there was no evidence that officials were deliberately indifferent to the patients' health or safety. The court found that the (MSOP) telephone-use policy did not violate the First Amendment free speech rights of patients who were civilly committed to MSOP. According to the court, the policy of monitoring patients' non-legal telephone calls and prohibiting incoming calls was reasonably related to MSOP's security interests in detecting and preventing crimes and maintaining a safe environment. The court upheld the 30-minute limit on the length of calls, finding it was reasonably related to the legitimate governmental interest of providing phone access to all patients, and that patients had viable alternatives by which they may exercise their First Amendment rights, including having visitors or sending or receiving mail, and patients had abused telephone privileges prior to implementation of the policy by engaging in criminal activity or other counter-therapeutic behavior by phone. (Minnesota Sex Offender Program)

U.S. Appeals Court
LIBRARY

Munson v. Gaetz, 673 F.3d 630 (7th Cir. 2012). A state inmate filed a § 1983 action alleging that prison officials violated his constitutional rights by barring him from personally possessing books he had shipped to a prison. The district court dismissed the complaint, and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the decision to prohibit the inmate from personally possessing books containing drug-related information did not violate the First Amendment, the Eighth Amendment or due process. According to the court, the state prison officials had a legitimate and neutral governmental objective of restricting prisoner access to drug-related information, despite the inmate's contention that he wanted the books to educate himself about his prescribed medications, where the prison officials made an individualized determination, and the books were available in prison library. (Illinois Department of Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
LIBRARY

Toston v. Thurmer, 689 F.3d 828 (7th Cir. 2012). A state prison inmate brought a pro se civil rights complaint under § 1983 against prison officials, alleging that his rights of free speech and due process were violated when a disciplinary proceeding found him guilty of possession of gang literature and sentenced him to 90 days confinement in segregation. The inmate's due process claim was dismissed, and the district court granted summary judgment for officials on the free speech claim. The inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part and vacated in part. The appeals court held that the limitation of the state prison inmate's right of free speech, as a result of a disciplinary proceeding that found him guilty of possession of gang literature, was adequately justified by prison officials' legitimate concern that the inmate copied from a prison library book a ten-point program by the founder of a hate group's predecessor in order to show it to others that the inmate hoped to enlist in a prison gang, with the program to serve as the gang's charter. The court noted that a prison librarian's decision that on the whole a book is not gang literature does not preclude disciplinary proceedings against an inmate who copies incendiary passages from it. The inmate had purchased, with prison permission, "To Die for the People: The Writings of Huey P. Newton" the founder of the Black Panthers, and he had checked out two books from the prison library about the Black Panthers. The court vacated the district court decision regarding the alleged due process violation. The inmate alleged that his due process rights were violated because he had no notice that copying passages from prison library books or a book he had been allowed to purchase could subject him to a sentence of 90 days' confinement in segregation for possessing gang literature. The appeal court ordered the district court to determine whether a 90–day sentence to segregation was, or was not, a deprivation of liberty. (Waupun Correctional Institution, Wisconsin)

2013

U.S. District Court
TELEPHONE

Berke v. Federal Bureau of Prisons, 942 F.Supp.2d 71 (D.D.C. 2013). A deaf federal inmate brought an action alleging that the Bureau of Prisons (BOP) and its director discriminated against him in violation of the Rehabilitation Act by failing to adequately accommodate his deafness. After the court granted, in part, the inmate's motion for a preliminary injunction, the inmate moved for attorney fees and costs. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the inmate was the prevailing party, and that a forty percent reduction in the attorney fee award was warranted, where the court did not order the BOP to install videophones, only to investigate whether such a system could reasonably be installed, and the BOP had not yet decided whether the system was feasible. (Federal Bureau of Prisons, ADMAX Satellite Camp, Tucson, Arizona)

U.S. District Court
COMMISSARY

Borkholder v. Lemmon, 983 F.Supp.2d 1013 (N.D.Ind. 2013). A prisoner brought an action against state prison officials seeking declaratory and injunctive relief to challenge the officials' decision to revoke his vegan diet. Both parties moved for summary judgment. The district court denied the officials' motion, granted the prisoner's motion, and entered an injunction. The court held that the fact that the prisoner's vegan diet had been restored did not render moot his declaratory judgment action against state prison officials, in which he alleged that they violated his religious rights by revoking his vegan diet for purchasing chicken-flavored ramen noodles, because no vegetarian noodles were available to him, and his vegan diet was subject to revocation anytime he ordered ramen noodles, regardless of whether he consumed the seasoning packet containing chicken. The court found that the prisoner demonstrated a substantial burden to his religious practice, satisfying his initial burden under The Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA), where the prisoner held a religious belief that required him to adhere to a vegan diet, he purchased chicken-flavored ramen noodles from the state prison commissary, the commissary did not carry a vegetarian noodle option, the prisoner did not eat the meat flavoring packet but instead discarded it, and the prisoner's vegan diet was revoked solely due to his noodle purchase. According to the court, prison officials' revocation of the prisoner's vegan diet was not the least restrictive means to further a compelling governmental interest, and thus the officials did not meet their burden under RLUIPA to justify such action,. The court noted that although the state prison policy dictated that personal preference diet cards could be confiscated if a prisoner abused or misused the privilege by voluntarily consuming self-prohibited foods, and such policy was legitimately geared toward weeding out insincere requests, the prisoner's purchase of noodles with a meat seasoning packet did not mean that his beliefs were insincere. The district court decision opened by stating: "It is not every day that someone makes a federal case out of ramen noodles. But unfortunately that's what Joshus Borkholder had to do." (Miami Correctional Facility, Indiana)

U.S. District Court
COMMISSARY

Johns v. Lemmon, 980 F.Supp.2d 1055 (N.D.Ind. 2013). An inmate, who was an Observant Jew, brought an action against a prison superintendent and a commissioner of the department of corrections (DOC), alleging that denial of food on Friday to consume on the Sabbath violated the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA). The parties cross-moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the plaintiff's motion and denied the defendants' motion. The court held that the prison's failure to provide food on Friday to the inmate was a substantial burden on his religious exercise, and that the practice did not serve a compelling governmental interest of food safety. The inmate sought to have food provided on Friday to consume on the Sabbath, and the prison's refusal required him to buy his Sabbath food from the commissary. The court noted that the inmate's preferred practice was permitted for a period of about five months and during that time the inmate stored meals in a cooler for a day, which other prisoners were permitted to do. (Miami Correctional Facility, Indiana Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
TELEPHONE

Nelson v. District of Columbia, 928 F.Supp.2d 210 (D.D.C. 2013). A detainee brought a § 1983 claim against the District of Columbia arising from his stay in jail. The defendant moved to dismiss and the district court granted the motion. The court held that denial of one telephone call and access to stationery during the detainee's five-day stay in a "Safe Cell," which was located in the jail's infirmary, did not implicate his First Amendment right of free speech or right of access to courts. The court found that the detainee's alleged exposure to "dried urine on the toilet seat and floor" and garbage during his five-day stay, along with the denial of a shower, did not rise to the level of a Fifth Amendment due process violation. According to the court, placement of detainee in a Safe Cell was not motivated by a desire to punish the detainee, but rather by a nurse's desire to attend to the detainee's ailments after his "legs and back gave out" twice. The court noted that denial of the detainee's request to have the cell cleaned was for the non-punitive reason that the detainee would not be in the cell that long. (D.C. Jail, District of Columbia)

U.S. District Court INDIGENT INMATES

Wilbur v. City of Mount Vernon, 989 F.Supp.2d 1122 (W.D.Wash. 2013). Indigent criminal defendants brought a class action in state court against two cities, alleging the public defense system provided by the cities violated their Sixth Amendment right to counsel. The district court entered judgment for the plaintiffs, finding that the defendants were deprived of their Sixth Amendment right to counsel, and that the deprivation was caused by deliberate choices of the city officials who were in charge of the public defense system. The court noted that the cities were appointing counsel in a timely manner, but the public defenders were assigned so many cases that the defendants often went to trial or accepted plea bargains without meeting with counsel. The court required the cities to re-evaluate their public defender contracts and to hire a public defense supervisor to ensure indigent criminal defendants received their Sixth Amendment right to counsel. (City of Mount Vernon and City of Burlington, Washington)

2014

U.S. District Court
TELEPHONE

Houston v. Cotter, 7 F.Supp.3d 283 (E.D.N.Y. 2014). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against corrections officers and a county, alleging a due process violation in connection with his placement on a suicide watch while incarcerated at a county correctional facility. The parties filed cross-motions for summary judgment. The district court denied the motions, finding that summary judgment was precluded by fact issues as to whether a protected liberty interest was implicated. The inmate alleged that the county had a policy or custom permitting classification officers to keep an inmate on suicide watch as a form of punishment, after mental health personnel had deemed a continued suicide watch unnecessary. The inmate remained on suicide watch for eight days after a psychiatrist and a social worker recommended his removal from the suicide watch. The court also found a genuine dispute of material fact as to whether the inmate's conditions of confinement while he was placed on suicide watch imposed an atypical and significant hardship on him in relation to the ordinary incidents of prison life, such that it implicated a protected liberty interest. While on suicide watch, officials took away the inmate's clothing and required him to wear a suicide-safe garment-- a sleeveless smock made of a coarse, tear-resistant material and Velcro. He was not allowed to wear underwear, socks, or any other undergarment with the smock. He was housed in a stripped cell in the Behavioral Modification Housing Unit. The cell contained a bare mattress and a blanket made out of the same coarse material as the smock. Corrections officers situated immediately in front of the Plexiglass cell window constantly supervised the inmate. According to the county, suicide watch inmates have access to the yard, a plastic spoon, a rubberized pen, the law library, showers, razors, and medical and mental health services, but the inmate claimed that he had no showers, telephone calls, prescription medications, food, or access to the law library while in the BMHU. (Suffolk County Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
TELEPHONE RIGHT TO TREATMENT

Karsjens v. Jesson, 6 F.Supp.3d 916 (D.Minn. 2014). Patients who were civilly committed to the Minnesota Sex Offender Program (MSOP) brought a § 1983 class action against officials, alleging various claims, including failure to provide treatment, denial of the right to be free from inhumane treatment, and denial of the right to religious freedom. The patients moved for declaratory judgment and injunctive relief, and the officials moved to dismiss. The district court granted the defendants' motion in part and denied in part, and denied the plaintiffs' motions. The court found that the patients' allegations that, based on policies and procedures created and implemented by state officials, patients spent no more than six or seven hours per week in treatment, that their treatment plans were not detailed and individualized, that treatment staff was not qualified to treat sex offenders, and that staffing levels were often far too low, sufficiently stated a § 1983 substantive due process claim based on the officials' failure to provide adequate treatment.

According to the court, the patients stated a § 1983 First Amendment free exercise claim against state officials with allegations that MSOP's policies, procedures, and practices caused the patients to be monitored during religious services and during private meetings with clergy, did not permit patients to wear religious apparel or to possess certain religious property, and did not allow patients to "communally celebrate their religious beliefs by having feasts," and that such policies and practices were not related to legitimate institutional or therapeutic interests. The court also found that the patients' allegations that state officials limited their phone use, limited their access to certain newspapers and magazines, and removed or censored articles from newspapers and magazines, stated a § 1983 First Amendment claim that officials unreasonably restricted their right to free speech. (Minnesota Sex Offender Program)

U.S. District Court
COMMISSARY

Winder v. Maynard, 2 F.Supp.3d 709 (D.Md. 2014). An inmate, proceeding pro se, brought a § 1983 action against a prison official, asserting that the official hindered his religious practice. The official filed a motion to dismiss or, in the alternative, for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The district court held that denial of the inmate's request for pork products for a Wiccan ceremonial meal did not substantially impede the inmate's ability to practice his religious beliefs in violation of the Free Exercise Clause or the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA). The court noted that the inmate's request for a religious ceremonial meal had been approved and he was directed that while the requested pork products could not be provided through the dietary department or prepared in Department of Corrections (DOC) kitchen facilities, pork products could nevertheless be purchased through the commissary and consumed at the ceremonial meal. According to the court, the prison's accommodation of other religious prisoners through the adoption of a religious diet while allegedly refusing to provide pork products for Wiccan practitioners did not violate the equal protection rights of the inmate because: (1) the kosher Jewish diet demanded certain food preparation and food choices not required for Wiccan inmates; (2) neither Jewish nor Muslim inmates received ritually slaughtered meat; (3) no pork was prepared in Department of Corrections (DOC) kitchens in order to respect the religious dietary requirements of Jewish and Muslim inmates; (4) the prison was unable to provide pork through dietary services due to legitimate penological goals regarding budget and security; (5) the prisoner was free to purchase pork products through the commissary; and (6) prison meal plans were created in order to see that the needs of all religious groups are accommodated. (Jessup Correctional Institution, Maryland)

2015

U.S. District Court
COMMISSARY

Carter v. James T. Vaughn Correctional Center, 134 F.Supp.3d 794 (D. Del. 2015). A state prisoner filed a pr se complaint under § 1983 seeking injunctive relief against a prison. The district court dismissed the action. The court held that the prisoner's claims that the prison's business office miscalculated and deducted incorrect sums of money from his prison account when making partial filing fee payments, that there was poor television reception, and that he was not allowed to purchase canteen items from the commissary, were not actionable under § 1983, where all of the claims were administrative matters that should be handled by the prison. The court found that the prisoner's claims that he was being electronically monitored through a "microwave hearing effect eavesdropping device" and electronic control devices were fantastical and/or delusional and therefore were insufficient to withstand screening for frivolity in filings by an in forma pauperis prisoner, in the prisoner's § 1983 action. (James T. Vaughn Correctional Center, Smyrna, Delaware)

U.S. District Court
LIBRARY

Crime, Justice & America, Inc. v. Honea, 110 F.Supp.3d 1027 (E.D. Cal. 2015). The publisher of a magazine intended for newly arrested county jail detainees awaiting trial brought an action against a county alleging violation of the right to free speech protected under the First Amendment after the county barred general distribution of unsolicited paper products to detainees. After a bench trial, the district court held that: (1) the county jail's policy of limiting written publications was rationally related to legitimate a penological interest in preventing inmates from using paper to conduct illicit activity; (2) electronic touch-screen kiosks that displayed the publisher's magazine in the jail were sufficient alternative means; (3) the impact of accommodating the asserted right weighed in favor of the county policy; and (4) the policy was not an exaggerated response. The court found that a corrections officer's testimony regarding the nefarious uses of paper in county jails, including that he could not recall a time when the publisher's law-oriented magazine had been used by detainees for such purposes was not, without more, sufficient to refute the county's explanation that its policy limiting detainee's access to paper was rationally related to a legitimate penological interest. The court ruled that the publisher's proposal to provide two copies of the publisher's law-oriented magazine in the county jail law library, standing alone, was not a sufficient alternative means for the publisher to communicate the existence of the magazine to county jail detainees, where most inmates would likely have left the jail before they would receive it from the library. (Butte Co. Jail, Calif.)

U.S. Appeals Court
COMMISSARY
TELEPHONE

DeBrew v. Atwood, 792 F.3d 118 (D.C. Cir. 2015). A federal inmate brought an action alleging that the Bureau of Prison's (BOP) response to his request for documents violated the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), that the BOP and its officials violated the Takings and Due Process Clauses by retaining interest earned on money in inmates' deposit accounts, and that officials violated the Eighth Amendment by charging excessively high prices for items sold by the prison commissary and for telephone calls. The district court entered summary judgment in the BOP's favor and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, vacated in part, and remanded. The court held that the BOP did not violate FOIA by failing to produce recordings of the inmate's telephone conversations and that the inmate's failure to exhaust his administrative remedies precluded the court from reviewing whether the BOP conducted an adequate search. The court found that the Bureau of Prisons' (BOP) alleged practice of charging excessively high prices for items sold by prison commissary and for telephone calls did not violate Eighth Amendment. (Fed. Bur. of Prisons, Washington, D.C.)

U.S. District Court
LIBRARY

Koger v. Dart, 114 F.Supp.3d 572 (N.D. Ill. 2015). A county jail inmate brought a § 1983 action against a county and the county sheriff, alleging that the county jail's absolute ban on newspapers was unconstitutional under the First Amendment. The inmate moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The court held that the absolute ban on newspapers for inmates was rationally connected to jail security, where newspapers were flammable, they could cause sanitation problems because inmates could use them to clog toilets and they were issued with greater frequency than other publications, thus increasing the volume of material to be disposed, newspapers could be fashioned into weapons using paper mâché, and they could cause violence by informing inmates about the nature of other inmates' charges or outside gang activity. But the court held that the county jail's absolute ban on newspapers for inmates was not reasonably related to the jail's legitimate interest in security, and thus the ban violated the inmate's First Amendment free speech rights. According to the court, an absolute ban was the most extreme response available, as it completely extinguished the inmate's ability to exercise his right to read newspapers, and the ban was an exaggerated response to security concerns, as there were obvious, easy alternatives that would accommodate the inmate's right with de minimis impact on the jail, such as permitting newspapers only in the jail library to reduce waste generated, and not purchasing local papers to limit the risk of violence from inmates learning of local gang activity. (Cook County, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
COMMISSARY

Montalvo v. Lamy, 139 F.Supp.3d 597 (W.D.N.Y. 2015). An inmate brought an action against a sheriff, prison officials and a commissary, alleging that he was a diabetic and that, while incarcerated, he was not provided with a medically appropriate diet, was not permitted to purchase food items from the prison commissary, and was the subject of false misbehavior reports when he complained about his dietary issues. The defendants moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the inmate failed to allege that the prison commissary, operated by a private company, was acting under the color of state law, as required to state constitutional claims against the commissary. The court noted that the inmate did not allege that the commissary had a policy of denying commissary access to diabetic prisoners or had the authority to override the prison's policy with respect to inmates with dietary restrictions, and instead, alleged that the prison maintained a policy of limiting commissary access for prisoners with dietary restrictions. The court found that the inmate did not state a First Amendment retaliation claim against a sergeant who allegedly would not process the inmate's grievance related to his inability to purchase snacks from the prison commissary, where the sergeant was acting in compliance with a state regulation, which required him, as the Grievance Coordinator, to return grievances regarding issues outside the authority of the chief administrative officer to control, such as medical decisions made by health care professionals. The court held that the inmate adequately alleged that the food provided to him by the prison was not nutritionally adequate with respect to his status as a diabetic and that the diet he was provided presented an immediate danger to his health and well-being, and thus, the inmate met the objective component of an Eighth Amendment claim for medical indifference. (Erie County Holding Center, New York)

U.S. District Court
TELEPHONE
COMMISSION

Prison Legal News v. U.S. Dept. of Homeland Sec., 113 F.Supp.3d 1077 (W.D. Wash. 2015). A requester brought a Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) action against the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) and Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) for information related to prison telephone practices and policies, including those at ICE's federal immigration detention centers. The parties filed cross-motions for summary judgment. The district court granted the requestor's motion. The court held that the performance incentive rate of the phone services contractor for federal immigration detention centers was not exempt from disclosure. According to the court, the phone services contractor was not likely to suffer substantial competitive harm if the performance incentive rate from its successful bid for federal immigration detention centers was disclosed, and thus that rate, which reflected the percentage of revenue set aside in escrow and only paid to the contractor upon the government's determination that the contractor performed successfully, was not exempt from disclosure. (U.S. Department of Homeland Security, Immigration and Customs Enforcement)

U.S. District Court
TELEPHONE

Smith v. Securus Technologies, Inc., 120 F.Supp.3d 976 (D. Minn. 2015). Consumers brought a putative class action against the provider of inmate telephone services, alleging violations of the Telephone Consumer Protection Act (TCPA) and the Minnesota Automatic Dialing-Announcing Devices Law (ADAD), based on claims that the provider made automated calls with prerecorded messages to their cellular phones without their prior consent. The provider moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion, finding that the provider did not "make" calls as required to be liable under TCPA and ADAD and the platform used for inmates' calls was not an automatic telephone dialing system. The plaintiffs alleged that each call allegedly informed them about the name of the inmate trying to contact them, the name of the correctional facility from which the call was being made, and instructions on how to accept or decline the call. They argued that they did not consent to receiving any of these non-emergency calls. (Securus Technologies, Inc., and Minnesota ADAD Law)

U.S. Appeals Court
COMMISSARY

Sorrentino v. Godinez, 777 F.3d 410 (7th Cir. 2015). Two inmates purchased several items from a prison's commissary, but the prison later forbade the inmates to possess those items in their cells. Their property was removed, as the new rule required. They responded by filing a proposed class action in the district court, alleging that confiscation of their property was an unconstitutional taking and a breach of contract. The district court dismissed the action. The appeals court held that the district court was correct to dismiss the action, although the dismissal should have been without prejudice. One inmate had purchased a fan and signed a "personal property contract" which obligated him to follow all Department of Corrections (DOC) rules related to use, ownership, and possession of the fan. The other inmate purchased a typewriter and a fan, and he also signed a personal property contract for his fan. When a new policy banned these items from prisoners' cell, the new policy offered several options for inmates who owned the newly prohibited types of property. Inmates with typewriters could have them destroyed, give them to visitors, ship them to someone outside the prison at no cost, store them in "offender personal property" which is returned to inmates upon release from prison, or donate them to the prison library. Fans were simply placed in storage as "offender personal property." (Stateville Correctional Facility, Illinois)

SECTION 43: SENTENCES

The following pages present summaries of court decisions which address this topic area. These summaries provide readers with highlights of each case, but are not intended to be a substitute for the review of the full case. The cases do not represent all court decisions which address this topic area, but rather offer a sampling of relevant holdings.

The decisions summarized below were current as of the date indicated on the title page of this edition of the Catalog. Prior to publication, the citation for each case was verified, and the case was researched in Shepard's Citations to determine if it had been altered upon appeal (reversed or modified). The Catalog is updated annually. An annual supplement provides replacement pages for cases in the prior edition which have changed, and adds new cases. Readers are encouraged to consult the Topic Index to identify related topics of interest. The text in the section entitled "How to Use The Catalog" at the beginning of the Catalog provides an overview which may also be helpful to some readers.

The case summaries which follow are organized by year, with the earliest case presented first. Within each year, cases are organized alphabetically by the name of the plaintiff. The left margin offers a quick reference, highlighting the type of court involved and identifying appropriate subtopics addressed by each case.

1968

U.S. Supreme Court
CONSECUTIVE SENTENCES

Peyton v. Rowe, 88 S.Ct. 1549 (1968). A prisoner serving consecutive sentences is "in custody" under any one of them for purposes of Section 2241 (C)(3) (allowing district courts to issue writs of habeas corpus on behalf of prisoners), and may in a federal habeas corpus proceeding challenge the constitutionality of a sentence scheduled for future service. Overruling McNally v. Hill, 243, U.S. 131 (1934), Discarding of "Prematurity Doctrine". (Virginia State Penitentiary)

1970

U.S. Supreme Court
INDIGENCY
EQUAL PROTECTION
FINES

Williams v. Illinois, 399 U.S. 235 (1970). The plaintiff was given the maximum sentence for petty theft under Illinois law of one year's imprisonment and a $500 fine, plus $5 in court costs. The judgment, as permitted by statute, provided that if, when the one-year sentence expired, he did not pay the monetary obligations, he had to remain in jail to work them off at the rate of $5 a day. While in jail the plaintiff, alleging indigency, unsuccessfully petitioned the sentencing judge to vacate that portion of the order confining him to jail after the sentence expired, because of nonpayment of the fine and costs. The Illinois Supreme Court rejected the plaintiff's claim that the state statutory provision constituted discriminatory treatment against those unable to pay a fine and court costs, and affirmed the lower court's dismissal of the plaintiff's petition, holding that "there is no denial of equal protection of the law when an indigent defendant is imprisoned to satisfy payment of the fine."

The United States Supreme Court held: Though a state has considerable latitude in fixing the punishment for state crimes and may impose alternative sanctions, it may not under the equal protection clause subject a certain class of convicted defendants to a period of imprisonment beyond the statutory maximum solely by reason of their indigency. Pp. 239-245. 244 N.E. 2d 197, vacated and remanded.

1971

U.S. Supreme Court
INDIGENCY
FINES
EQUAL PROTECTION

Tate v. Short, 401 U.S. 395 (1971). The petitioner, an indigent, was convicted of traffic offenses and fined a total of $425. Though Texas law provides only for fines for such offenses, it requires that persons unable to pay must be incarcerated for sufficient time to satisfy their fines, at the rate of $5 per day, which in the petitioner's case meant an 85-day term. The state courts denied his petition for habeas corpus. Held: It is a denial of equal protection to limit punishment to payment of a fine for those who are able to pay it but to convert the fine to imprisonment for those who are unable to pay it. Williams v. Illinois, 399 U.S. 235. Pp. 397-401. 445 S.W.2d 210, reversed and remanded.

1972

U.S. Supreme Court
CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972), reh'g. denied, 409 U.S. 902. Several plaintiffs were convicted in Georgia and Texas and were sentenced to death. Certiorari was granted limited to the following question: "Does the imposition and carrying out of the death penalty in [these cases] constitute cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the eighth and fourteenth amendments?" 403 U.S. 952 (1971). The Court held that the imposition and carrying out of the death penalty in these cases constituted cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the eighth and fourteenth amendments.

1973

U.S. Supreme Court
PROBATION-
REVOCATION

Gagon v. Scarpelli, 411 U.S. 778 (1973). The plaintiff was a felony probationer who was arrested after committing a burglary. He admitted involvement in the crime but later claimed that the admission was made under duress and was false. The probation of the plaintiff, who was not represented by an attorney, was revoked without a hearing. After filing a habeas corpus petition, he was paroled. The district court concluded that revocation of probation without hearing and counsel was a denial of due process. The court of appeals affirmed. Held:

1. Due process mandates preliminary and final revocation hearings in the case of a probationer under the same conditions as are specified in Morrissey v. Brewer, 408 U.S. 471, in the case of a parolee. Pp. 781-782.

2. The body conducting the hearings should decide in each individual case whether due process requires that an indigent probationer or parolee be represented by counsel. Though the state is not constitutionally obligated to provide counsel in all cases, it should do so where the indigent probationer or parolee may have difficulty in presenting his version of disputed facts without the examination or cross-examination of witnesses or the presentation of complicated documentary evidence. Presumptively, counsel should be provided where, after being informed of his right, the probationer or parolee requests counsel, based on a timely and colorable claim that he has not committed the alleged violation or, if the violation is a matter of public record or uncontested, there are substantial reasons in justification or mitigation that make revocation inappropriate. Pp. 783-791.

3. In every case where a request for counsel is refused, the grounds for refusal should be stated succinctly in the record. P. 791.

U.S. Supreme Court
GOOD-TIME

Preiser v. Rodriguez, 411 U.S. 475 (1973). Rodriguez and two other New York state prisoners brought a 42 U.S.C. Section 1983 action, in conjunction with a habeas corpus action against Preiser, Correction Commissioner, seeking restoration of good-time credits allegedly unconstitutionally cancelled. The three inmates participated in a conditional release program by which an inmate serving an indeterminate sentence could earn up to ten days per month good behavior credit toward reduction of his maximum sentence. The credits earned were cancelled as a result of disciplinary proceedings. The requested relief, restoration of the good time credits, would have resulted in the immediate release from confinement of each of the inmates. Viewing the habeas corpus claim as an adjunct to the Section 1983 action, thereby removing the need for exhaustion of state remedies, the U.S. District Court ruled for each of the inmates entitling each to immediate release on parole. Following the Second Circuit Court of Appeal's decision affirming, Preiser sought certiorari from the United States Supreme Court. (Reversed.)

HELD: "[W]hen a state prisoner is challenging the very fact of duration of his physical imprisonment, and the relief he seeks is a determination that he is entitled to immediate release or a speedier release from that imprisonment, his sole federal remedy is a writ of habeas corpus." 411 U.S. at 500.

NOTE: A 42 U.S.C. Section 1983 action does not require that the plaintiff first seek redress in state courts. Where habeas corpus is the exclusive remedy allowed by federal laws, the plaintiff cannot seek the intervention of a federal court until he has first sought and been denied relief in the state courts, if a state remedy is available and adequate. 411 U.S. at 477, See, 28 U.S.C. Section 2254. (New York DOC)

1974

U.S. Supreme Court
INDIGENCY
LEGAL COSTS

Fuller v. Oregon, 417 U.S. 40 (1974). The plaintiff pleaded guilty to a crime and was given a probationary sentence, conditioned upon his complying with a jail work-release program permitting him to attend college and also upon his reimbursing the county for the fees and expenses of an attorney and investigator whose services had been provided to him because of his indigency. He attacked the constitutionality of Oregon's recoupment statute, which was upheld on appeal. That law requires convicted defendants who are indigent at the time of the criminal proceedings against them but who subsequently acquire the financial means to do so, to repay the costs of their legal defense. Defendants with no likelihood of having the means to repay are not even conditionally obligated to do so, and those thus obligated are not subjected to collection procedures until their indigency has ended and no manifest hardship will result. Held:

1. The Oregon recoupment scheme does not violate the Equal Protection Clause of the fourteenth amendment. Pp. 46-50.

(a) The statute retains all the exemptions accorded to other judgment debtors, in addition to the opportunity to show that recovery of legal defense costs will impose "manifest hardship." James v. Strange, 407 U.S. 128, distinguished. Pp. 46-48.

(b) The statutory distinction between those who are convicted, on the one hand, and those who are not or whose convictions are reversed, on the other, is not an invidious classification, since the legislative decision not to impose a repayment obligation on a defendant forced to submit to criminal prosecution that does not end in conviction is objectively rational. Pp. 48-50.

2. The Oregon law does not infringe upon a defendant's right to counsel since the knowledge that he may ultimately have to repay the costs of legal services does not affect his ability to obtain such services. The challenged statute is thus not similar to a provision that "chill[s] the assertion of constitutional rights by penalizing those who choose to exercise them," United States v. Jackson, 390 U.S. 570, 581. Pp. 51-54.

12 Ore. App. 152, 504 P.2d 1393, affirmed.

1977

U.S. District Court
FURLOUGH

United States v. Raunazzi, 434 F.Supp. 619 (S.D. N.Y. 1977). The sentencing judge may order that a prisoner be permitted a furlough to attend the wedding of the prisoner's daughter, and officials have no formal recourse but to comply with the order. (Federal System)

1979

U.S. Supreme Court
ORIGINAL SENTENCE

United States v. Addonizio, 442 U.S. 178 (1979). Held: A federal prisoner's allegation that a postsentencing change in the policies of the United States Parole Commission has prolonged his actual imprisonment beyond the period intended by the sentencing judge will not support a collateral attack on the original sentence under 28 U.S.C. section 2255. Pp. 184-190.

(a) The claimed error that the judge was incorrect in his assumptions about the future course of parole proceedings does not meet any of the established standards of collateral attack, where there is no claim of a constitutional violation, the sentence imposed was within the statutory limits, and the proceeding was not infected with any error of fact or law of a "fundamental" character that renders the entire proceeding irregular and invalid. The change in Parole Commission policies involved here- considering the seriousness of the offense as a significant factor in determining whether a prisoner should be granted parole- affected the way in which the court's judgment and sentence would be performed but did not affect the lawfulness of the judgment itself, then or now; and there is no claim that the action taken by the sentencing judge was unconstitutional or was based on misinformation of constitutional magnitude. Davis v. United States, 417 U.S. 333, and United States v. Tucker, 404 U.S. 443, distinguished. Pp. 184-187.

(b) There is no basis for enlarging the grounds for collateral attack to include claims based not on any objectively ascertainable error but on the frustration of the subjective intent of the sentencing judge. Under the present statutory scheme, the judge has no enforceable expectations with respect to the actual release of a sentenced defendant short of his statutory term; and while the judge may have expectations as to when release is likely, the actual decision is not his to make, either at the time of sentencing or later if his expectations are not met. To require the Parole Commission to act in accordance with judicial expectations, and to use collateral attack as a mechanism for ensuring that these expectations are carried out, would substantially undermine the congressional decision to entrust release determinations to the Commission, not the courts, and nothing in Section 2255 supports- let alone mandates- such a frustration of congressional intent. Thus, subsequent actions taken by the Parole Commission- whether or not such actions accord with a trial judge's expectations at the time of sentencing- do not retroactively affect the validity of the final judgement itself, and do not provide a basis for collateral attack on the sentence pursuant to section 2255. Pp. 187-190. 573 F.2d 147, reversed.

U.S. Appeals Court
PROBATION-
REVOCATION

United States v. McLeod, 608 F.2d 1076 (5th Cir. 1979). The Court assumes that a sincere effort in good faith to comply with the conditions of probation would be a good defense against a revocation charge, but finds that this effort was not a good faith attempt to comply. It is not necessary that a violation be proved beyond a reasonable doubt.

1980

U.S. Appeals Court
PROBATION-
REVOCATION

Banks v. United States, 614 F.2d 95 (6th Cir. 1980). The United States District Court cannot delegate the conduct of a probation revocation hearing to a United States Magistrate.

U.S. District Court
PROBATION-
REVOCATION

Campbell v. Crist, 491 F.Supp. 586 (D. Mont. 1980). Revocation of probation or modification of the conditions or length of probation does not constitute double jeopardy to the underlying offense. The records indicated that the probationer did in fact receive notice of the proposed revocation and the alleged violations. Revocation of probation on the basis of a state criminal conviction is valid. The federal courts will not inquire into the validity of a criminal conviction when reviewing a state probation revocation. (Montana)

State Appeals Court
PROBATION-
CONDITIONS

Dearth v. State, 390 So.2d 108 (Ct. App. Fla. 1980). Conditions of probation which would require the probationer to voluntarily submit to reasonable searches by a probation officer or other law enforcement officers is an invalid waiver of the probationer's right to protection against warrantless searches where the only alternative to consent to such condition is incarceration.

State Appeals Court
PROBATION-
REVOCATION

Free v. State, 392 So.2d 857 (Ct. Crim. App. Ala. 1980), cert. denied, 451 U.S. 990 (1981), reh. denied, 452 U.S. 973. The record shows compliance by the court with the due process requirements in revoking applicant's probation and sufficient evidence to support the court's decision to revoke appellant's probation for possession of marijuana.

U.S. Appeals Court
PROBATION-
CONDITIONS

Higdon v. United States, 627 F.2d 893 (9th Cir. 1980). Probation conditions must be reasonably related to the rehabilitation of the offender. Punishment is not to be a primary purpose of probation. While probation conditions requiring forfeiture and public service are not per se invalid, the court must evaluate the offender physically, psychologically and financially and not order a work schedule which prohibits paid employment or substantially interferes with the maintenance of normal family life. The court suggests that the proper method of attacking an invalid probation condition is to seek the modification thereof; raising the issue as a defense to revocation would be accepted under the circumstances.

State Appeals Court
PROBATION-SEARCH
PROBATION-
REVOCATION

Lillard v. State, 274 S.E.2d 96 (Ct. App. Ga. 1980). The search of defendant by his probation officer was reasonable where probationer had been admitted to a diversion center, had signed a consent to search at the time he entered the center, and reliable information had been received and independently corroborated that defendant was involved in drugs. Therefore, revocation of probation based on evidence obtained in that search was proper.

Imposition of a sentence greater than the term of probation and denial of credit for probation time to be applied to that sentence was in error where the original probation order stated that, if probation is revoked, the court may order "execution of the sentence originally imposed or any portion thereof after deduction therefrom the amount of time served on probation."

State Appeals Court
PROBATION-
CONDITIONS
BANISHMENT

Parkerson v. State, 274 S.E.2d 799 (Ct. App. Ga. 1980). Banishment of a third party as a condition of probation unreasonably restricts an innocent person's freedom of travel and is a condition over which the probationer has no control. Therefore, banishing probationer's wife as a condition of his probation was improper.

U.S. District Court
PROBATION-
VIOLATION

Singleton v. Hoester, 505 F.Supp. 54 (E.D. Mo. 1980). Allegations that the individual's civil rights were violated by the failure of the probation staff to recommend that the individual's probation be continued after a violation of that probation failed to state a claim upon which relief could be granted.

State Court
PROBATION-
REVOCATION

State v. Maier, 423 A.2d 235 (Sup. Ct. Me. 1980). The standard of proof at a probation revocation proceeding is a preponderance of the evidence. Where the motion to revoke probation contained the offense alleged, the indicated property alleged to have been acquired through deception, identifies the lawful owner of the property, and alleged that the deception involved arrangements for payment and where the probationer made no request for continuance or adjournment, the variance as to which individual was actually deceived was not prejudicial. Therefore, reversal of the revocation order is denied.

U.S. Appeals Court
PROBATION-
VIOLATION
PROBATION-SEARCH

United States v. Basso, 632 F.2d 1007 (2nd Cir. 1980), cert. denied, 450 U.S. 965 (1981). A probation officer may arrest a probationer for a violation of probation on a showing of reasonably satisfactory proof of a violation, which is less than probable cause, because a probable cause hearing will soon follow. A search of a probationer can only be conducted on probable cause. Even assuming that the warrant for arrest for probation violation was inadequate and therefore invalid, that fact did not preclude the revocation of probation on the basis of the incident underlying the warrant.

U.S. Appeals Court
PROBATION-
REVOCATION

United States v. Caldera, 631 F.2d 1227 (5th Cir. 1980). Revocation of probation based upon possession of drugs which is proven by a lab test which was introduced without the testimony of the individual who performed the test, and a field test which is introduced by an officer who did not perform the test, is invalid because the probationer has been denied his right of confrontation and cross-examination.

U.S. Appeals Court
PROBATION-
CONDITIONS
PROBATION-
REVOCATION

United States v. Ferguson, 624 F.2d 81 (9th Cir. 1980). Revocation of probation is not automatic upon the admission of a violation of the terms and conditions of probation. The court must give the probationer the opportunity to present evidence of mitigating circumstances and must consider such evidence.

U.S. Appeals Court
PROBATION-
REVOCATION

United States v. McDonald, 611 F.2d 1291 (9th Cir. 1980). Where the court suspends the imposition of sentence and places the individual on probation, the court may, upon revocation of that probation, impose any sentence which it could originally have imposed. Where the court imposes a sentence of imprisonment and then suspends the execution of that sentence and places the individual on probation, upon revocation of that probation the court may only impose a sentence which is not more severe than that originally imposed. Where the court has imposed and then suspended the execution of a sentence under the Youth Corrections Act, and placed the individual on probation, revocation of that probation requires that the resulting sentence be under the Youth Corrections Act.

U.S. Appeals Court
PROBATION-
CONDITIONS

United States v. Smith, 618 F.2d 280 (5th Cir. 1980), cert. denied, 449 U.S. 868. Probation conditions must be reasonably related to the purposes served by probation, to the legitimate needs of law enforcement, and should accord probationers with the rights of law-abiding citizens. A condition that the individual refrain from making any statements advocating disobedience of the law was too broad and the court reformed it to making any statements advocating violation of the Internal Revenue Code, the provisions of which the defendant was convicted of violating.

U.S. Appeals Court
PROBATION-
CONDITIONS
PROBATION-
REVOCATION

United States v. Torrez-Flores, 624 F.2d 776 (7th Cir. 1980). It is proper to condition a grant of probation upon the accuracy of the individual's representation that he has no prior record, and where the statement proves to be untrue, to revoke the probation for violation of this condition.

U.S. Appeals Court
PROBATION-
CONDITIONS

United States v. Turner, 628 F.2d 461 (5th Cir. 1980), cert. denied, 451 U.S. 988. Neither attorney fees nor travel expenses may be ordered to be paid as a condition of probation.

U.S. Appeals Court
PROBATION-
REVOCATION

United States v. Workman, 617 F.2d 48 (4th Cir. 1980). Probation cannot be revoked on the basis of evidence through a warrantless search. Probationers are entitled to the protection of the Fourth Amendment. Where an eleven-month period of incarceration was due to the improper conduct to a revocation hearing, the probation period continued to run while the individual was incarcerated.

1981

State Court
PROBATION-
CONDITIONS

Commonwealth v. McBride, 433 A.2d 509 (Super. Ct. Pa. 1981). Where the defendant had been convicted of corrupting the morals of a minor, a condition of probation preventing the probationer from having contact or communication with such minors was proper.

U.S. Supreme Court
CAPITAL
PUNISHMENT

Estelle v. Smith, 451 U.S. 454 (1981). Held: The admission of the doctor's testimony at the penalty phase violated respondent's fifth amendment privilege against compelled self-incrimination, because he was not advised before the pretrial psychiatric examination that he had a right to remain silent and that any statement he made could be used against him at a capital sentencing proceeding. Pp. 461-469.

(a) There is no basis for distinguishing between the guilt and penalty phases of respondent's trial so far as the protection of the fifth amendment privilege is concerned. The state's attempt to establish respondent's future dangerousness by relying on the unwarned statements he made to the examining doctor infringed the fifth amendment just as much as would have any effort to compel the respondent to testify against his will at the sentencing hearing. Pp. 462-463.

(b) The fifth amendment privilege is directly involved here because the state used as evidence against respondent the substance of his disclosures during the pretrial psychiatric examination. The fact that the respondent's statements were made in the context of such an examination does not automatically remove them from the reach of that amendment. Pp. 463-466.

(c) The considerations calling for the accused to be warned prior to custodial interrogation apply with no less force to the pretrial psychiatric examination at issue here. An accused who neither initiates a psychiatric evaluation nor attempts to introduce any psychiatric evidence may not be compelled to respond to a psychiatrist if his statements can be used against him at a capital sentencing proceeding. When faced while in custody with a court-ordered psychiatric inquiry, the respondent's statements to the doctor were not "given freely and voluntarily without any compelling influences" and, as such, could be used as the state did at the penalty phase only if respondent had been apprised of his rights and had knowingly decided to waive them.
Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436. Since these safeguards of the fifth amendment privilege were not afforded to the respondent, his death sentence cannot stand. Pp. 466-469.

Respondent's sixth amendment right to the assistance of counsel also was violated by the state's introduction of the doctor's testimony at the penalty phase. Such right already had attached when the doctor examined the respondent in jail, and that interview proved to be a "critical stage" of the aggregate proceedings against the respondent. Defense counsel were not notified in advance that the psychiatric examination would encompass the issue of their client's future dangerousness, and respondent was denied the assistance of his counsel in making the significant decision of whether to submit to the examination and to what end the psychiatrist's findings could be employed. Pp. 469-471. 602 F.2d 694, affirmed.

State Appeals Court
PROBATION-CONDITIONS

Fletcher v. State, 405 So.2d 748 (Ct. App. Fla. 1981). Probation condition requiring that the probationer make restitution as determined by his probation officer is invalid as delegating a judicial duty to a nonjudicial officer. Further, it deprives the defendant of his right to be heard on the reasonableness of the amount of restitution. The defendant was entitled to make a motion to have the period of incarceration as part of a split sentence reduced to one year.

U.S. District Court
PRESENTENCE REPORT

Frank v. United States, 515 F.Supp. 703 (W.D. Pa. 1981). Statements made by the individual to a probation officer for inclusion in the presentence report can be considered in determining whether to grant parole. Failure of counsel to discuss the parole guidelines with the defendant prior to the defendant's entering a guilty plea did not constitute incompetence of counsel.

U.S. District Court
PROBATION-REVOCATION

Harris v. Powers, 520 F.Supp. 111 (W.D. Wis. 1981). Because the decision as to the location of a preliminary probation revocation hearing is not discretionary, in that it must be at or near the site of the alleged violation, the decision of the probation officer to conduct the revocation hearing some distance away was not adjudication and, therefore, was not subject to a claim of immunity. Further, the imposition of liability for conduct of the hearing at some distance from the site of the violation would not undermine the authority necessary for adjudication. Therefore, absolute judicial immunity was not appropriate.

U.S. Appeals Court
SENTENCE TO PAROLE

Hayward v. United States Parole Commission, 659 F.2d 857 (8th Cir. 1981), cert. denied, 102 S.Ct. 1991 (1982). Sentencing an individual to immediate parole eligibility does not require that institutional conduct be a major factor in determining whether he should be paroled, at least where the sentence is imposed after the last modification of the Parole Act clearly emphasizing the guidelines. Factors known to the court at the time of the imposition of sentence such as participation in a criminal enterprise or the sophisticated nature of the offense may constitute good cause for a release date above the guideline date. Because the law in effect at the time of the offense did not create any expectation that the individual would be paroled, the adoption of parole guidelines to constrain the board's discretion and their application to the plaintiff's parole does not constitute a violation of the prohibition against ex post facto laws.

State Appeals Court
PROBATION-CONDITIONS

In re Jonathan M., 172 Cal. Rptr. 833 (Ct. App. 1981). While the condition of probation that a juvenile attend school regularly is proper, the provision that for each class absence that is unexcused, the juvenile must serve one day in Juvenile Hall violates the juvenile's right to a hearing prior to imposition of detention.

State Court
PROBATION-REVOCATION

L.C. v. State, 625 P.2d 839 (Sup. Ct. Alaska 1981). Juvenile who is transferred from a closed institution to a halfway house is considered to be on administrative probation. Therefore, juvenile is entitled to a disposition hearing wherein she is given the opportunity to be heard prior to ordering reinstitutionalization for violating the rules of the halfway house.

State Appeals Court
PROBATION-REVOCATION

State v. Dawson, 282 S.E.2d 284 (Sup. Ct. App. W. Va. 1981). In the absence of any showing of bad faith, double jeopardy will not be applied to prohibit multiple proceedings for revocation of parole or probation based on a single incident.

State Court
PROBATION-REVOCATION

State v. Ryan, 429 A.2d 332 (Sup. Ct. N.J. 1981), cert denied, 454 U.S. 880 (1982). The individual was sentenced, commenced to serve his sentence and then the court modified the sentence to probation. Upon revocation of the probation, considerations of double jeopardy require that the new sentence imposed not exceed the original sentence and that the time served on the original sentence be credited against the new sentence.

State Appeals Court
PROBATION-REVOCATION
GOOD-TIME

Turner v. State, 395 So.2d 1242 (Ct. App. Fla. 1981). A probation restitution center is not restrictive enough to constitute incarceration for the purposes of granting credit for time spent at the center against the sentence imposed upon revocation of probation.

U.S. Appeals Court
PROBATION-REVOCATION

United States v. Brown, 656 F.2d 1204 (5th Cir. 1981), cert. denied, 454 U.S. 1156 (1982). Where there is a clearly legally sufficient basis for revocation of probation, i.e., conviction of a new offense, the court will not inquire into the sufficiency of other bases for revocation. Withdrawal and then refiling of revocation charges does not violate due process where the obvious reasons for the procedure was to permit the individual an additional period in which to rehabilitate himself.

U.S. District Court
PROBATION-
REVOCATION

United States v. Fontana, 510 F.Supp. 158 (W.D. Pa. 1981), aff'd, 673 F.2d 1303 (3rd Cir. 1982), cert. denied, 102 S.Ct. 1468. 18 U.S.C. Section 3653 providing a 5 year statute of limitation for probation revocation proceedings permits the court to conduct a probation revocation proceeding within that limitation but after the expiration of the term of probation for acts occurring within the term of probation. The language of the statute indicated that the use of an arrest warrant to secure the attendance of the individual at the revocation proceeding is not mandatory and that habeas is an appropriate method of securing attendance.

U.S. Appeals Court
PROBATION-
CONDITIONS

United States v. Lowe, 654 F.2d 562 (9th Cir. 1981). Where the defendant was convicted of illegal entry into a military reservation, the court could as a condition of probation prevent the defendant from coming within 250 feet of the reservation fence, even though it would prevent the defendant from distributing anti-war literature at the main gate of the reservation and would prevent his attendance at anti-war meetings at a place adjacent to the reservation fence. The condition does not prohibit the defendant from engaging in anti-war activities in any manner and is reasonably directed towards preventing illegal entries.

U.S. Appeals Court
PROBATION-
CONDITIONS

United States v. Margala, 662 F.2d 622 (9th Cir. 1981). Probation conditions that an individual convicted of securities violation and mail fraud 1) forfeit all pension benefits acquired while with the corporation, 2) surrender all stock acquired in the corporation while an officer or director, and 3) that the corporation cancel a debt owed to the individual based on a loan are reasonably related to the offense and not unduly harsh.

U.S. Appeals Court
PROBATION-
REVOCATION

United States v. Martinez, 650 F.2d 744 (5th Cir. 1981). The revocation of probation is vacated and remanded because the court failed to adequately state the reasons and factual basis for the decision.

U.S. District Court
PROBATION-
CONDITIONS
RESTITUTION

United States v. McLaughlin, 512 F.Supp. 907 (D. Md. 1981). Restitution in excess of the amount involved in the crime to which the individual plead guilty may be required as a condition of probation under the language of 18 U.S.C. Section 3651 which provides for the ordering of restitution "for the crime for which conviction was had" where:

1) the amount of injury suffered and the injured party are both certain;
2) the defendant admits to causing the loss;
3) the defendant voluntarily and freely consents to make such restitution as a condition of probation.

U.S. District Court
PROBATION-
REVOCATION

United States v. Rea, 524 F.Supp. 427 (E.D.N.Y. 1981). No warrant is necessary to conduct a search of a probationer for supervisory purposes. Even if it were, the exclusionary rule does not apply to probation revocation proceedings. Failure to provide an attorney to a probationer being questioned by his probation officer does not require suppression of any statement for the purposes of the probation revocation hearing.

U.S. Appeals Court
PROBATION-
CONDITIONS

United States v. Roberts, 638 F.2d 134 (9th Cir. 1981), cert. denied, 452 U.S. 909 (1981). When suspending the sentence of an individual sentenced under the Youth Corrections Act, and placing the individual on probation, it is proper to require as a condition of probation that the individual serve a definite period of imprisonment.

U.S. District Court
PROBATION-
CONDITIONS
PROBATION-
REVOCATION

United States v. Stine, 521 F.Supp. 808 (E.D. Pa. 1981), cert. denied, 102 S.Ct. 3493. A condition of probation that the defendant submit to at least one year of psychological counseling is a condition that is reasonably related to the rehabilitation of the individual where it is based on the personal observation of the court. It does not interfere with the individual's right of privacy. An individual cannot defend against a probation revocation proceeding on the ground that the condition of probation (that the individual attend psychiatric counseling) is unconstitutional where he had not undertaken to appeal the imposition of the conditions.

1982

U.S. Supreme Court
CAPITAL
PUNISHMENT

United States v. Frady, 456 U.S. 152 (1982). In 1963, the respondent was convicted of first-degree murder and sentenced to death by a jury in the federal district court for the District of Columbia, which at that time had exclusive jurisdiction over local felonies committed in the District. The Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, which then acted as the local appellate court, upheld the conviction but set aside the death sentence, and the respondent was then resentenced to a life term. The respondent filed a motion in the district court under 28 U.S.C. Section 2255 seeking to vacate the sentence on the ground that he was convicted by a jury erroneously instructed on the meaning of malice, thus allegedly eliminating any possibility of a manslaughter verdict. The district court denied the motion because the respondent failed to challenge the instructions on direct appeal or in prior motions.

The court of appeals reversed, holding that the proper standard to apply to the respondent's claim was the "plain error" standard of Federal Rule of Criminal Procedure 52(b) governing relief on direct appeal from errors not objected to at trial, vacated the respondent's sentence and remanded the case for a new trial or entry of a manslaughter judgment. The United States Supreme Court disagreed with the appeals court, holding:

1. This Court has jurisdiction to review the decision below and is not required to refrain from doing so on the alleged ground that the decision of the court of appeals was based on an adequate and independent local ground of decision. There is no basis for concluding that the ruling below was or should have been grounded on local District of Columbia law, rather than on the general federal law applied to all Section 2255 motions. Equal protection principles do not require that a Section 2255 motion by a prisoner convicted in 1963 be treated as though it were a motion under the District of Columbia Code after 1970. Pp. 159-162.

2. The Court of Appeals' use of Rule 52(b)'s "plain error" standard to review respondent's Section 2255 motion was contrary to long-established law. Because it was intended for use on direct appeal, such standard is out of place when a prisoner launches a collateral attack against a conviction after society's legitimate interest in the finality of the judgment has been perfected by the expiration of time allowed for direct review or by the affirmance of the conviction on appeal. To obtain collateral relief a prisoner must clear a significantly higher hurdle than would exist on direct appeal. Pp. 162-166.

3. The proper standard for review of respondent's conviction is the "cause and actual prejudice" standard under which, to obtain collateral relief based on trial errors to which no contemporaneous objection was made, a convicted defendant must show "cause" excusing his double procedural default and "actual prejudice" resulting from the errors of which he complains. Pp. 167-169.

4. Respondent has fallen far short of meeting his burden of showing not merely that the errors at his trial created a possibility of prejudice but that they worked to his actual and substantial disadvantage, infecting his entire trial with error of constitutional dimensions. The strong uncontradicted evidence of malice in the record, coupled with respondent's utter failure to come forward with a colorable claim that he acted without malice, disposes of his contention that he suffered such actual prejudice that reversal of his conviction 19 years later could be justified. Moreover, an examination of the jury instructions shows no substantial likelihood that the same jury that found respondent guilty of first-degree murder would have concluded, if only the malice instructions had been better framed, that his crime was only manslaughter. Pp. 169-175.

204 U.S. App. D.C. 234, 636 F.2d 506, reversed and remanded.

1984

State Supreme Court

Cansler v. State, 34 CrL 2372 (Kan. Sup. Ct., 1984). Officials held liable for acts of escapees. The Kansas Supreme Court found that the state has a duty to securely confine inmates, and having failed to do so, resulting in the escape of seven convicted murderers, the state officials were held liable for the subsequent wounding of a law enforcement officer.

Finding that the corrections employees failed to exercise reasonable care commensurate with the risk presented by the escape of violent offenders, and having failed to prevent the escape, not notifying area residents and law enforcement agencies immediately, the court held the state liable for the subsequent incident. (Department of Corrections, Kansas)

1985

State Appeals Court

Longval v. Commissioner of Correction, 484 N.E.2d 112 (App.Ct. Mass. 1985). Certain inmates with long prison terms which they alleged exceeded their respective life expectancies brought a suit challenging the validity of a statute pursuant to which they were denied access to the whole of their funds. The Superior Court denied relief, and the prisoners appealed. The appeals court held that a "life term" within meaning of a statute establishing a system for compensating inmates who performed good and satisfactory work in certain work programs was limited to those prisoners who were sentenced to life imprisonment and did not apply to inmates whose aggregate sentences exceeded their statistical life expectancies. (M.C.I., Cedar Junction, Massachusetts)

U.S. Appeals Court

Ammirato v. Hanberry, 797 F.2d 961 (11th Cir. 1986). A decision of the United States Parole Commission did not violate due process because the Commission used the same reason, the prisoner's multiple offenses, to elevate his offense to the Greatest I category, and to set a release date beyond what the guidelines call for in Greatest I cases. Many of the 19 separate violations to which the prisoner pled guilty fell within the range of severity just below Greatest I, and his conduct went well beyond what was necessary to place his offense in that category. Moreover, the number of offenses showed that the prisoner was involved in sophisticated and continuing criminal activity. (Georgia)

U.S. Supreme Court
INSANITY

Ford v. Wainwright, 106 S.Ct. 2595 (1986). A habeas corpus petition was filed on behalf of a death row prisoner. The supreme court held that: (1) the eighth amendment prohibits the state from inflicting the penalty of death upon a prisoner who is insane, and (2) Florida's procedures for determining sanity of a death row prisoner were not "adequate to afford a full and fair hearing" on the critical issue, and therefore the habeas petitioner was entitled to an evidentiary hearing in the district court, de novo, on the question of his competence to be executed. (Department of Corrections, Florida)

State Appeals Court
PROBATION-
CONDITIONS

Hill v. State, 721 S.W.2d 953 (Tex.App.- Tyler 1986). A probationer is not required to obtain personal loans secured by his home in order to pay probation fees or fines to avoid revocation of probation. (Texas)

State Appeals Court
PROBATION
CONDITIONS

People v. Roth, 397 N.W.2d 196 (Mich.App. 1986). The defendant pled guilty to obtaining a controlled substance by fraud in the Osceola Circuit Court. The defendant appealed the addition of conditions of probation. The court of appeals held that: (1) submission to urinalysis testing was a lawful condition of probation, and (2) restriction of the defendant's right to travel was not unconstitutional. (Michigan)

U.S. Appeals Court CONSECUTIVE SENTENCE

Rothgeb v. United States, 789 F.2d 647 (8th Cir. 1986). A sentence of 210 years was within the limits of a statute allowing the court to impose "any term of years or life imprisonment" for second-degree murder. Moreover, another statute permitted the court to extend the eligibility date for parole beyond ten years. Accordingly, the sentence requiring 69 years before parole eligibility was authorized. (Missouri)

State Appeals Court
PROBATION
REVOCATION

State v. Moot, 398 N.W.2d 21 (Minn. App. 1986). Appeal was taken by the probationer from an order of the district court, revoking probation and vacating a stay of execution of sentence. The court of appeals held that: (1) revocation of probation was justified when the probationer, though told on record and in writing that he must successfully complete treatment for chemical dependency and all recommended aftercare if he wished to remain on probation, admittedly took a job which interfered with his treatment schedule and thereafter refused to comply with the program and to participate in his recovery, and (2) the failure to specifically find that the need for confinement outweighed the policies favoring probation did not preclude revocation when the probationer refused to participate in treatment for chemical dependency, and the court made it clear that the presumptive sentence was commitment to prison, and that downward departure was solely to permit one last attempt to succeed at treatment. (Hennepin County Jail, Minnesota)

U.S. Appeals Court
PROBATION
REVOCATION

United States v. Bell, 785 F.2d 640 (8th Cir. 1986). Trial court in a probation revocation proceeding must balance the probationer's right to confront witness against grounds asserted by the government for not requiring confrontation. Good cause was shown for allowing the state to present urinalysis lab reports and police reports at the defendant's probation revocation hearing without producing the persons who prepared them. Both had been prepared by out-of-state officials and both were reliable. However, good cause was not shown for admitting hearsay testimony of the defendant's having been investigated for cocaine trafficking. There was no showing that to produce the live testimony of local officers involved in the investigation would have been difficult. Some of the evidence presented was actually double hearsay. (Arkansas)

U.S. District Court
PROBATION
VIOLATION

United States v. Cummings, 633 F.Supp. 38 (E.D.N.Y. 1986). A Probation Department official did not violate the defendant's fifth amendment rights when she questioned him without giving full Miranda warnings. Thus, evidence that the defendant gave an allegedly false name in response to the routine, noninvestigatory questioning was admissible in a prosecution for perjury or false statement. The form the defendant signed explicitly informed him of his right to a lawyer, and that a false statement could result in prosecution. (United States Probation Department, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court

United States v. Fahnbulleh, 796 F.2d 239 (8th Cir. 1986). Defendant's motion for correction or reduction of sentence was denied by the district court, and the defendant appealed. The court of appeals held that defendant's sentence was not affected by an erroneous estimate that he would be eligible for parole in twenty-four to thirty-six months, and thus, the defendant had no right to be resentenced on such ground.

The defendant, who was afforded full opportunity to point out any factual errors in the presentence report and failed to do so, was not denied due process by trial court's imposition of a $20,000 fine in addition to a prison sentence, allegedly in reliance upon erroneous information in the presentence report that he owned substantial assets abroad. (Arkansas)

U.S. Appeals Court
RESTITUTION

United States v. House, 808 F.2d 508 (7th Cir. 1986). The 7th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals rejected a claim by a prison inmate that because he saved the federal government money by killing a fellow inmate, he should not have to make restitution for the victim's funeral expense. The $1,303 in funeral expenses "is peanuts" compared to the cost of feeding and housing the inmate for even one month, argued the inmate.

The inmate's principal argument was that the district court failed to comply with 18 U.S.C. Sec. 3580 (a), which requires a court to "consider the amount of the loss sustained by any victim as a result of the offense (and) the financial resources of the defendant" in deciding whether to award restitution.

Under 18 U.S.C. Sec. 3579(b)(3), the law specifically allows sentencing judges to award restitution for "the cost of necessary funeral and related services," of crimes resulting in death. (Illinois)

U.S. District Court
GOOD TIME

United States v. Lynch, 647 F.Supp. 1293 (D.S.C. 1986). The district ruled that if the plaintiff could support his claim that he was jailed by North Carolina authorities for the same offense embodied in the federal indictment, he may have been entitled to credit on his sentence for "jail time." However, such credit could not be ordered under 28 U.S.C.A. Section 2255. A challenge to the execution of a federal sentence must be brought under 28 U.S.C.A. Section 2241 in the judicial district which can acquire jurisdiction in personam over the complaining inmate or the inmate's custodian. (South Carolina)

U.S. Appeals Court
PROBATION CONDITION

United States v. Williams, 787 F.2d 1182 (7th Cir. 1986). Assuming that the taking of a urine sample entails a search or seizure, a probation condition that required the probationer to submit to urinalysis at the direction of probation authorities was reasonable. Given the probationer's status as a repeat offender and his lengthy and substantial criminal record, authorities understandably did not view even his casual use of marijuana lightly. Even if the taking of a urine sample entails a search or seizure, imposition of condition of probation that the defendant undergo drug screening was permissible under the fourth amendment in view of prior urinalysis results. (Department of Corrections, Illinois)

1987

U.S. Appeals Court
PROBATION-
CONDITIONS
PROBATION-
REVOCATION

Clark v. Prichard, 812 F.2d 991 (5th Cir. 1987). A woman who agreed to work and support her children as a condition of probation can legally be required request a judicial change in her conditions of probation before she applies for Aid for Families with Dependent Children (AFDC). The plaintiff pleaded guilty to aggravated assault and agreed to obtain work and support her six children who were in the custody of her mother as a condition of probation. Her prison sentence was suspended. She later took custody of her children and applied for AFDC without informing the court. When she was told by her probation officer of the possible results of obtaining AFDC without prior court approval, she stopped receiving the aid, and filed suit stating that the court was denying public benefits to a probationer by not allowing her to apply for AFDC. The appeals court ruled that the judge's order did not automatically deny public benefits but rather required a probationer to come before the court to seek a change in conditions of probation before applying for AFDC. By requiring a hearing before a change in probation conditions, the plaintiff Clark had a chance to explain that working to support her dependents was a hardship and that she should not be held to that condition. The provision for a hearing to consider changed circumstances instead of automatic revocation for failure to meet a condition of probation safeguarded Clark's due process rights, according to the appeals court.

Wash. Supreme Court
GOOD TIME

Petition of Johnston, 745 P.2d 864 (Wash. 1987). The Washington Supreme Court concluded that a single positive result to an "EMIT" urinalysis test, conducted to detect the presence of marijuana, was sufficient evidence of marijuana use to uphold, on due process grounds, a revocation of prisoners' good time credits or the imposition of mandatory segregation time. The Centers for Disease Control had determined that the test in question was 97-99 percent accurate. (Washington State Department of Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
PRESENTENCE REPORT

Ochoa v. U.S., 819 F.2d 366 (2nd Cir. 1987). A federal prisoner was incarcerated upon conviction of criminal contempt for refusing to testify before a grand jury petitioned for writ of habeas corpus. The United States District Court denied the petition, and the prisoner appealed. The Court of Appeals held that: (1) the prisoner was not entitled to credit on the criminal contempt sentence for any time, prior to his indictment on that charge, that he spent in civil contempt, and (2) the Parole Commission was entitled to rely on hearsay statements contained in the presentence investigation reports. The court found that the federal statute governing credit for time spent in custody prior to the imposition of sentence does not require that a person sentenced to prison for criminal contempt be given credit on that sentence for any time, prior to his indictment on that charge, that he spent in civil contempt. Therefore, according to a federal appeals court, the statute did not require that a contemnor's criminal sentence be shortened by the period he spent in civil contempt in connection with the same refusal to testify that led to his indictment for criminal contempt. The court found that the Parole Commission could consider hearsay statements contained in the presentence investigation reports, in calculating the prisoner's presumptive date of release, although sentencing court disclaimed reliance on contested statements, where the Commission found information sufficiently accurate for its own purposes. (New York State)

U.S. Appeals Court
CONSECUTIVE SENTENCES

Scales v. Mississippi State Parole Bd., 831 F.2d 565 (5th Cir. 1987). A state prisoner incarcerated on two life sentences for two counts of murder filed a pro se complaint attacking denial of parole and asserting that he was being denied equal protection and due process of law under the Fourteenth Amendment in that Mississippi parole statute was unconstitutional. The federal appeals court held that (1) the Mississippi statute conferred absolute discretion on the Mississippi Parole Board, rather than mandating action by the Board, and thus afforded prisoner no constitutionally recognized liberty interest creating a due process entitlement; (2) the prisoner was not denied equal protection by fact that only one black person was member of the Mississippi Parole Board; and (3) to the extent the prisoner was seeking reduction of length of his sentence by asserting his state sentences should not run consecutively, the issue should be determined in first instance on application for habeas corpus. (Mississippi State Prison)

State Appeals Court
PROBATION-CONDITIONS

State v. Ferre, 734 P.2d 888 (Ore. App. 1987). A condition that a probationer not enter a county without the court's permission was unnecessarily broad according to an state appellate court. The court ruled that the trial judge could have accomplished the purpose of protecting the probationer's wife and her friends by restricting the probationer's access to a more limited geographical area. (Oregon Supervised Probation)

State Supreme Court
CREDIT

Tal-Mason v. State, 515 So.2d 738 (Fla. 1987). The Florida Supreme Court held that a prisoner was entitled to jail time credit for coercive detention in a mental institution. Granting of jail-time credit is not limited to time spent in institution formally designated as a "county jail." The prisoner was entitled to jail-time credit for preconviction coercive detention in a mental institution for incompetence to stand trial since the commitment was indistinguishable from pretrial detention in "jail." Denying him jail-time credit for this period, while granting it for pre-trial jail detention, was a violation of due process and equal protection. (Department of Health and Rehabilitative Services)

U.S. Appeals Court
PROBATION-REVOCATION

U.S. v. Bell, 820 F.2d 980 (9th Cir. 1987). The standards for release set forth in 18 U.S.C.A. Section 3143(b) of the Bail Reform Act of 1984 are not applicable to probation revocation proceedings. Rather, release pending appeal from an order revoking probation is proper only upon a showing of exceptional circumstances. Examples of exceptional circumstances include raising substantial claims upon which the appellant has a high probability of success, a serious deterioration of health while incarcerated, and any unusual delay in the processing of the appeal. (California)

U.S. Appeals Court
REDUCTION

U.S. v. DeCologero, 821 F.2d 39 (1st Cir. 1987). Noting that although an inmate deserves adequate medical care, he cannot insist that his institutional host provide him with the most sophisticated care that money can buy, a federal appeals court refused to reduce an inmate's sentence. The inmate asserted that his chronic, worsening back injury was not treated in the manner he preferred by prison officials, and that he should therefore have a shorter sentence. The court stated that a correctional institution's obligation to afford decent, timely health care to inmates is met by provision of services at level reasonably commensurate with modern medical science and of quality acceptable within prudent professional standards, and noted that the inmate's health did not deter him from engaging in the felonious activities which brought about his present predicament. (Federal Correctional Institution, Lexington, Kentucky)

U.S. Appeals Court
PROBATION-CONDITIONS

U.S. v. Duff, 831 F.2d 176 (9th Cir. 1987). A probation officer had the power to order a probationer to submit to drug testing, even though the court had not explicitly imposed such a condition. Under the conditions of probation, the probationer agreed to refrain from violating any law and to follow the probation officer's instructions. The probation officer's use of urinalysis to determine whether the probationer was using illegal drugs was consistent with the condition that he not violate the law and the deterrent effect of testing was calculated to improve the probationer's conduct. The drug testing did nothing more than monitor the probationer's compliance with the express terms ordered.

U.S. Appeals Court
CREDIT

U.S. v. Figueroa, 828 F.2d 70 (1st Cir. 1987). A defendant was not entitled to receive credit against his sentence for the time he spent on conditional release pending trial. "In custody" within the meaning of 18 U.S.C.A. section 3568 means detention or imprisonment in a place of confinement and does not refer to the stipulations imposed when a defendant is at large on conditional release.

U.S. Appeals Court
PROBATION-REVOCATION

U.S. v. Warner, 830 F.2d 651 (7th Cir. 1987). A defendant's probation could be revoked for his failure to file federal income tax returns for four tax years. The defendant, whose income was legitimately earned, could not invoke the Fifth Amendment's privilege against self-incrimination on grounds that he could be subject to further prosecution if he filed an inaccurate return. The federal appeals court ruled that a district court could revoke probation and reimpose remaining, unexecuted prison term for willful failure to file federal, individual, income tax returns, where probationer had 14 months following release from prison to file delinquent tax returns and to pay court costs as required by probation. (Illinois State Prison)

U.S. Appeals Court
PROBATION-CONDITION

United States v. Grant, 807 F.2d 837 (9th Cir. 1987). A defendant's probation could not be revoked for failure to make any payments on her $20,000 fine. The defendant had been convicted of three counts of failure to file income tax returns. The payment of the $20,000 fine was not a term or condition of probation, and the defendant had complied with all of the stated conditions of her probation. Absent a fair prior warning to the defendant that nonpayment of the fine could result in the loss of liberty, the nonpayment could not be construed as a "failure to rehabilitate." (California)

1988

U.S. Appeals Court
CREDIT

Boutwell v. Nagle, 861 F.2d 1530 (11th Cir. 1988), cert. denied, 109 S.Ct. 2452. A prison inmate filed for a writ of habeas corpus, seeking credit for 31 months spent in custody in the State of Washington prior to his extradition to Alabama. The U.S. District Court denied the petition and the inmate appealed. The appeals court found that the inmate, who had escaped from custody in Alabama and was recaptured in Washington, had no due process right to credit against the Alabama sentence for the time served in a Washington jail while challenging the extradition to Alabama. (King County Jail, Seattle, Washington)

U.S. Supreme Court
CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

Franklin v. Lynaugh, 108 S.Ct. 2320 (1988), reh'g. denied, 109 S.Ct. 25. The U.S. Supreme Court upheld the Texas death penalty law in a ruling that may encourage states to limit the kind of evidence capital defendants present to juries deciding their fate. In a 6 - 3 vote the affirmed the death sentence of Donald Gene Franklin, who received the death penalty for the July 1975 murder of Mary Margaret Moran, a nurse at the Audie Murphy Veterans Hospital in San Antonio. Moran was abducted from the hospital parking lot, raped, repeatedly stabbed and left for dead in a field. She was found five days later, lying nude atop an ant hill, too weak to move. She died the next day.

Justice Byron White, author of the majority opinion, could enlist the support of only three other justices for the section of the opinion that suggests states may limit the kind of "mitigating evidence" that may be considered by sentencing juries. "Given the awesome power that sentencing jury must exercise in a capital case, it may be advisable for a state to provide the jury with some framework for discharging those responsibilities," White wrote, "...and we have never held that a specific method for balancing mitigating and aggravating factors in a capital sentencing proceeding is constitutionally required."

The Supreme Court considered whether the Texas capital sentencing system complies with Supreme Court rulings that require juries to weigh both mitigating and aggravating factors before sentencing someone to die. Franklin's lawyers argued the law is unfair because it does not clearly state that jurors must consider mitigating evidence--factors that might sway the jury to impose a life sentence, such as a defendant's youthfulness, remorse or mental state. Under Texas law, a jury that finds a defendant guilty of capital murder is asked two questions: whether the defendant's conduct was committed deliberately with the expectation death would occur, and whether there is a probability the defendant would commit criminal acts again. Juries are not specifically asked whether the punishment should be life in prison or death.

Instead, if the answer to both questions is "yes," the defendant is sentenced to death. The Supreme Court noted that Texas is the only state, of 36 that impose the death penalty, that does not instruct jurors that they can consider mitigating circumstances. Although the jury was given no specific instruction in this case, the Supreme Court concluded that Franklin had a full opportunity to present mitigating evidence, including his earlier prison records that suggested that he posed no disciplinary problems while confined. According the White, Franklin was "...accorded a full opportunity to have his sentencing jury consider and give effect to any mitigating impulse that (his) prison record might have suggested to the jury as they proceeded with their task... The jury was surely free to weigh and evaluate (his) disciplinary record as it bore on his 'character' -- that is, his 'character' as measured by his likely future behavior." Justices John Paul Stevens, William Brennan and Thurgood Marshall dissented.

In its ruling, affirming the appeals court decision, the Supreme Court held that: (1) the prisoner did not have an eighth amendment right to an instruction that a jury could consider residual doubts about guilt as mitigating circumstances in the penalty phase; (2)the special issue on deliberateness did not limit jury's consideration of any residual doubts about the prisoner's responsibility for the victim's death and the extent to which he intended death; and (3)the sentencing court's denial of requested instructions did not deprive the jury of the opportunity to give independent, mitigating weight to the defendant's prison record. (Texas)

U.S. Appeals Court
CAPITAL
PUNISHMENT

Giarratano v. Murray, 836 F.2d 1421 (4th Cir. 1988). Death row inmates initiated a class action against the governor, executive secretary, director of the Department of Corrections, and the warden of the state penitentiary, stating that the defendants were required to automatically assign counsel to represent inmates in post-conviction proceedings. Although it ordered automatic appointment of counsel upon request for the preparation of state corpus petitions, the federal district court denied appointment of counsel for the preparation of federal habeas corpus petitions. The parties appealed. The appeals court held that: (1) death row inmates were not entitled to be automatically provided counsel upon request for preparing state or federal habeas corpus petitions; and (2) the district court lacked authority to order the Commonwealth to create an agency to handle post-conviction capital cases. (Richmond State Penitentiary)

U.S. Supreme Court
CAPITAL
PUNISHMENT

Maynard v. Cartwright, 108 S.Ct. 1853 (1988). Supreme Court Halts Execution, Finding Oklahoma Sentencing Procedures Unconstitutionally Vague. In this case, the Court examined a provision of Oklahoma law allowing a jury to find that an aggravating circumstance exists whenever the facts of a case are "especially heinous, atrocious or cruel." The Supreme Court said the provision was unconstitutionally vague. To be constitutional, the court said, a jury must be required to specifically identify factors that make the crime especially heinous. The respondent in this case, a disgruntled ex-employee of a married couple, entered the couple's home, shot the wife twice with a shotgun, shot and killed the husband, and then slit the wife's throat and stabbed her twice. He was tried in an Oklahoma court and found guilty of the first-degree murder of the husband. The jury imposed the death penalty upon finding that two statutory aggravating circumstances, including the circumstance that the murder was "especially heinous, atrocious, or cruel," had been established, and that these circumstances outweighed the mitigating evidence. The Oklahoma Court of Criminal Appeals affirmed a denial of state collateral relief. The federal district court then denied the respondent's habeas corpus petition, but the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals reversed, holding that the statutory words "heinous," "atrocious," and "cruel" do not on their face offer sufficient guidance to the jury to escape the strictures of Furman v. Georgia, 92 S.Ct. 2726. The appeals court also ruled that the Oklahoma courts had not adopted a limiting construction that cured the infirmity, concluding that the construction utilized by the state appellate court, which simply declared that the facts of the case were so plainly "especially heinous, atrocious, or cruel" that the death penalty was warranted, was itself unconstitutionally vague under the eight amendment to the federal Constitution. The federal appeals court therefore enjoined the execution of the death sentence, but without prejudice to further state proceedings for redetermination of the sentence. The United States Supreme Court agreed with the appeals court ruling, finding that, as applied in this case, the statutory aggravating circumstance was unconstitutionally vague. The Supreme Court held that: (a) The State's contention that factual circumstances may, in themselves, plainly characterize the killing as "especially heinous, atrocious, or cruel" represents an improper, Due Process Clause approach to vagueness that fails to recognize the rationale of the Supreme Court's eighth amendment cases; (b) The State's complaint that the Court of Appeals erroneously ruled that torture or serious physical abuse is the only constitutionally acceptable limiting construction of the aggravating circumstance is unfounded, since, although the court noted cases in which such a requirement was held to be curative, it expressly refrained from directing the State to adopt any particular construction. (Oklahoma)

U.S. Supreme Court
CAPITAL
PUNISHMENT

Mills v. Maryland, 108 S.Ct. 1860 (1988). Supreme Court Finds Maryland Sentencing Procedures Inadequate and Reverses Appeals Court Decision. The United States Supreme Court, on a 5-4 vote, reversed the Court of Appeals of Maryland and vacated the death sentence of Ralph Mills, who was convicted of murdering a prison cellmate with a homemade knife. At issue in this case were jury instructions used during the sentencing phase that critics charged precluded a jury from taking into account "mitigating circumstances." Under Supreme Court precedents, a jury must weigh mitigating and aggravating factors before sentencing someone to die. Mitigating factors include such things as a defendant's youthfulness, remorse, mental illness or other sympathetic characteristics that might persuade a jury to show mercy.
Mills' appeal argued that, under Maryland law, a jury must unanimously agree that a certain mitigating circumstance exists, thus depriving a defendant of his right to have all such evidence taken into account. In his majority decision, Justice Harry Blackmun stated: "We conclude that there is a substantial probability that reasonable jurors, upon receiving the judge's instructions in this case, and in attempting to complete the verdict form as instructed, may well have thought they were precluded from considering any mitigating evidence unless all 12 jurors agreed on the existence of a particular such circumstance...Under our cases, the sentencer must be permitted to consider all mitigating evidence...The possibility that a single juror could block such consideration, and consequently require the jury to impose the death penalty, is one we dare not risk." Chief Justice William Rehnquist and Justices Sandra Day O'Connor, Antonin Scalia, and Anthony Kennedy dissented.

Mills was serving a 30-year sentence for murder at the Maryland Correctional Institution in Hagerstown when he stabbed his cellmate to death in 1984. Mills was tried by a state-court jury and convicted of the first-degree murder of his cellmate. In the sentencing phase of the trial, the same jury found that the State had established the one statutory aggravating circumstance it propounded, namely, that Mills "committed the murder at a time when he was confined in a correctional institution." Defense counsel sought to persuade the jury of the presence of certain mitigating circumstances, in particular, Mill's relative youth, his mental infirmity, his lack of future dangerousness, and the State's failure to make any meaningful attempt to rehabilitate him while he was incarcerated. The jury marked "no" beside each mitigating circumstance referenced on the verdict form, thereby requiring the imposition of the death penalty under Maryland's capital sentencing scheme. Mills challenged the sentence on the ground that the Maryland capital-punishment statute, as applied to him, was unconstitutionally mandatory. He asserted that the statute, as explained to the jury by the court's instructions and as implemented by the verdict form, required imposition of the death sentence if the jury unanimously found an aggravating circumstance, but could not agree unanimously as to the existence of any particular mitigating circumstance. Thus, even if some or all of the jurors were to believe that some mitigating circumstance or circumstances were present, unless they could unanimously agree on the existence of the same mitigating factor, the sentence necessarily would be death. The Maryland Court of Appeals concluded that the death sentence was constitutionally sound, interpreting the statute's unanimity requirement as applying to jury determinations of all critical issues, including the acceptance or rejection of mitigating circumstances. The court observed that the verdict form was to be regarded as requiring the jury to agree unanimously in order to mark "no" with respect to the existence of each mitigating circumstance, and that the trial judge's instructions stressed the need for unanimity on all issues presented.

The appeals court concluded that, when a jury could not agree unanimously to accept or reject a particular mitigating circumstance, the answer to that circumstance on the verdict form should be left blank and the jury should proceed to the balancing phase, where each juror should weigh the mitigating circumstances he or she found to be established and balance them against the aggravating circumstances unanimously found. On appeal to the United States Supreme Court, the lower court decision was reversed, and the Supreme Court held that: (1.) In a capital case, the sentencer may not be precluded from considering, as a mitigating factor, any relevant circumstance, including any aspect of the defendant's character or record and any of the circumstances of the offense that the defendant proffers as a basis for a sentence less than death; (2) There is a substantial probability that reasonable jurors, upon receiving the judge's instructions in this case, and in attempting to complete the verdict form as instructed, well may have thought they were precluded from considering any mitigating evidence unless all 12 jurors agreed on the existence of a particular mitigating circumstance; (a) With respect to findings of guilt, a jury's verdict must be set aside if it can be supported on one ground but not on another, and the reviewing court is uncertain which of the two grounds was relied upon by the jury in reaching the verdict. Review of death sentences demands even greater certainty that the jury's conclusions rested on proper grounds; (b) While the Court of Appeals' construction of the jury instructions and verdict form is plausible, it cannot be concluded, with any degree of certainty, that the jury did not adopt Mill's interpretation instead. Nothing in the verdict form or the judge's instructions even arguably is constructable as suggesting that the jury could leave an answer blank and proceed to the next step in its deliberations. A jury following the instructions set out in the verdict form could be precluded from considering mitigating evidence if only a single juror adhered to the view that such evidence should not be so considered. (c) There is no extrinsic evidence of what the jury in this case actually thought, but the portions of the record relating to the verdict form and the judge's instructions indicate that there is at least a substantial risk that the jury was misinformed. Moreover, since the time when this case was decided below, the Court of Appeals has promulgated a new verdict form expressly covering the situation where there is a lack of unanimity... and providing for the consideration of all mitigating evidence... shows at least some concern on that court's part that juries could misunderstand the previous instructions as to unanimity and the consideration of mitigating evidence by individual jurors. As a result of Mills' case, the sentencing form used by juries in capital cases in Maryland has been changed to ensure that all mitigating evidence be taken into account. (Maryland)

U.S. Supreme Court
CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

Thompson v. Oklahoma, 108 S.Ct. 2687 (1988). Supreme Court Bans Execution of Juveniles for Crimes Committed When 15 or Younger. The Supreme Court overturned the death penalty of a convicted murderer who was 15 when he committed his crime. In a 5 to 3 decision, the Supreme Court effectively banned the execution of juveniles for crimes they commit when age 15 or younger because at this time no death penalty law in any state sets a minimum below 16. However, the decision left open the issue of whether states may execute those who commit offenses as 16- and 17-year-olds without violating the eighth amendment. The complicated decision does not completely ban as unconstitutional the execution of offenders who were under 16 at the time of their crimes; it leaves open the possibility that states can pass new laws that specifically allow execution of juveniles.

This was an appeal by a 21-year-old death row inmate who committed a murder at the age of 15. Justice John Paul Stevens wrote for four justices that, under "evolving standards of decency," it would be unconstitutional under any circumstances to apply the death penalty to someone who was 15 years of age at the time he committed an offense. In a separate opinion, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor agreed that states cannot execute persons for offenses they commit as juveniles "under the authority of a capital punishment statute that specifies no minimum age;" she provided the crucial fifth vote to overturn the death sentence. She stopped short, however, of accepting the conclusion of the Stevens opinion that a state may not ever execute a person for a crime he committed when he was under 16. Justice Stevens cited as evidence of "contemporary standards of decency" the facts that none of the states whose death penalty laws expressly set a minimum age allows executions for crimes committed by persons under age 16 and that most other Western nations and the Soviet Union have banned executions of juveniles altogether. He also concluded that, because teenagers have less experience and education than adults, they are less able to evaluate the consequences of their actions and are more likely to act from emotion or peer pressure. Thus, executing juveniles is unlikely to serve the state's objective of deterring crime by juveniles, he said.

In this case, the petitioner, when he was 15 years old, actively participated in a brutal murder. Because he was a "child" as a matter of Oklahoma law, the District Attorney filed a statutory petition seeking to have him tried as an adult, which the trial court granted. He was then convicted and sentenced to death, and the Court of Criminal Appeals of Oklahoma affirmed. The narrow majority concluded that the "cruel and unusual punishment" prohibition of the eighth amendment, made applicable to the States by the fourteenth amendment, prohibits the execution of a person who was under 16 years of age at the time of his or her offense. The court held that: "(a) In determining whether the categorical eighth amendment prohibition applies, this Court must be guided by the 'evolving standards of decency that mark the progress of a maturing society,' Trop v. Dulles, 356 U.S. 86, 101, 78 S.Ct. 590, 598, 2 L.Ed.2d 630, and, in so doing, must review relevant legislative enactments and jury determinations and consider the reasons why a civilized society may accept or reject the death penalty for a person less than 16 years old at the time of the crime." The Court noted that relevant state statutes--particularly those of the 18 States that have expressly considered the question of a minimum age for imposition of the death penalty, and have uniformly required that the defendant have attained at least the age of 16 at the time of the capital offense--support the conclusion that it would offend civilized standards of decency to execute a person who was less than 16 years old at the time of his or her offense: "That conclusion is also consistent with the views expressed by respected professional organizations, by other nations that share the Anglo-American heritage, and by the leading members of the Western European Community."

U.S. Appeals Court
PRESENTENCE REPORT

Turner v. Barry, 856 F.2d 1539 (D.C. Cir. 1988). An inmate brought an action against the mayor of the District of Columbia and probation officers employed by the superior court for the District of Columbia. The district court dismissed the complaint, and appeal was taken. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that District of Columbia probation officers were absolutely immune from liability in a civil rights action under Section 1983 for alleged errors in the investigation and preparation of presentence reports. The court of appeals found that probation officers enjoy the same absolute immunity from liability for damages in Section 1983 actions as that granted judges when: 1) their activities are integrally related to the judicial process, and 2) they exercise discretion comparable to that exercised by a judge. "The pre-sentence report is an integral part of the judicial function of sentencing," said the court. "When preparing pre-sentence reports, the probation officer acts at the specific request of the court and submits the results of the investigation to the sentencing court for its evaluation." In carrying out this duty, said the court, probation officers typically serve as an "arm of the sentencing judge." (Lorton Reformatory, District of Columbia)

U.S. Appeals Court
PROBATION-CONDITIONS

U.S. v. Terrigno, 838 F.2d 371 (9th Cir. 1988). A condition of probation did not violate a defendant's First Amendment rights according to a federal appeals court. The condition prohibited the defendant, during the period of probation, from receiving any financial remuneration or any other thing of value from any speaking engagements, written publications, movies, or any other media coverage dealing with her involvement in the offense. The trial court had not restricted the defendant's right to speak, but had merely forbidden her to receive money for speaking about her crime. The appeals court noted that a sentencing judge had broad discretion in setting probation conditions, and exercise of this discretion is reviewed carefully where probation conditions restrict fundamental rights, but such restriction is permissible. The test for validity of probation conditions, even where preferred rights are affected, is whether the conditions are primarily designed to meet the ends of rehabilitation and protection of the public. The mere fact that a condition of probation restricts probationer's freedom to perform otherwise lawful activities is not dispositive of reasonableness of the condition, unless conditions are drawn so broadly that they unnecessarily restrict those lawful activities.

U.S. Supreme Court
PRESENTENCE REPORT

U.S. Dept. of Justice v. Julian, 108 S.Ct. 1606 (1988). According to the United States Supreme Court, federal prisoners are allowed access to pre-sentence reports as a result of the freedom of information act. Federal Rule of Criminal Procedure 32 provides that when a federal defendant is given copies of his pre-sentence report it must be "returned to the probation officer immediately following the imposition of sentence [....] unless the court, in its discretion, otherwise directs." The Court held, that, under the federal Freedom of Information Act, 5 U.S.C.A. Section 552, once the report is transmitted to the Federal Bureau of Prisons and Parole Commission for determining the defendant's postsentence placement and parole, it can be obtained by the defendant. After examining Exemptions 3 and 4 under the Act, the Court concluded that the exemptions did not prevent disclosure of such reports directly to the defendant. Nonetheless, under the Parole Commission and Reorganization Act of 1976 and Federal Rule of Criminal Procedure 32(c), information in such reports pertaining to confidential sources can be withheld. It also seems clear that requests for such reports from persons other than the subject of the report can be denied. (Federal Prison, Arizona)

U.S. Appeals Court
CREDIT
EQUAL PROTECTION
PRETRIAL CONFINEMENT

Vasquez v. Cooper, 862 F.2d 250 (10th Cir. 1988). A defendant petitioned for federal habeas relief when the trial judge denied him credit against his sentence for time spent in pretrial custody. The U.S. District Court denied the defendant's petition, and the defendant appealed. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that the sentencing practice that allegedly discriminated against those defendants unable to post bail, by denying them credit against their sentences for time spent in pretrial custody, did not interfere with any "fundamental right" or discriminate against any "suspect class." The defendant was not entitled to credit against his sentence for time spent in pretrial confinement, either as a matter of equal protection or procedural due process. (Colorado)

1989

U.S. Appeals Court
GOOD-TIME

Bergen v. Spaulding, 881 F.2d 719 (9th Cir. 1989). A prisoner has no constitutional or inherent right to be conditionally released before the expiration of a valid sentence, but state early release statutes can create a liberty interest protected by due process guarantees. A civil rights action was brought by a prisoner who alleged that his release more than 20 days after the "good behavior early release date" violated his right to due process. On appeal, the court found that the board charged with determining the prisoner's early release did not have discretion, under Washington law, to decide without a hearing that the prisoner should remain in prison beyond his good time release date. The prisoner's late release without a hearing would amount to deprivation of liberty interest without due process. Good behavior time credits cannot be denied, once they have been earned, without the benefit of minimal due process protections. (Washington State Prison)

U.S. Appeals Court
CREDIT
GOOD TIME

Lewis v. Attorney General of U.S., 878 F.2d 714 (3rd Cir. 1989). A youth offender who was sentenced as an adult during the service of the Youth Corrections Act sentence petitioned for habeas corpus relief, claiming entitlement to good time credits. The U.S. District Court denied relief, and appeal was taken. The appeals court, reversing and remanding, found that the petitioner was entitled to good time credits for a period starting from his sentencing as an adult, but not for the time allegedly served under conditions violating his youth sentence prior to adult sentencing. (Federal Correctional Institution, Petersburg, Virginia)

U.S. Appeals Court
EXPIRATION

Sample v. Diecks, 885 F.2d 1099 (3rd Cir. 1989). A former inmate brought a civil rights action against the Commissioner of Corrections and the senior records official to recover for a violation of civil rights which occurred when he was detained after the expiration of his sentence. The U.S. District Court entered a judgment in favor of the former inmate, and the defendants appealed. The appeals court, affirming in part, reversing in part and remanding in part, found that there was a violation of the inmate's eighth amendment rights. The records supervisor had a responsibility and the authority to direct the release of inmates whose time had expired. Evidence sustained a finding that the senior records clerk exhibited a deliberate indifference to the inmate's plight; but evidence was insufficient to impose liability on the Commissioner of Corrections for a violation of due process rights of the inmate. The court stated that imprisonment beyond one's term constitutes punishment for the purposes of the eighth amendment. (State Correctional Institution, Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania)

U.S. Appeals Court
CREDIT
ORIGINAL SENTENCE
REVOCATION

U.S. v. Flanagan, 868 F.2d 1544 (11th Cir. 1989). After the defendant pled guilty to one count of making a false statement to a firearms dealer, the U.S. District Court sentenced the defendant to a three-year term of incarceration, but suspended the sentence and ordered that the defendant serve six months in jail and the remainder of 30 months on probation. Thereafter, the district court revoked the probation, sentenced the defendant to three years'imprisonment and indicated that it was unlikely that the defendant would receive credit for the six months served on the split sentence. The defendant appealed. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that the trial judge properly sentenced the defendant to a full three-year term after the violation of probation, notwithstanding that the defendant had served six months on the split sentence. The defendant's claim that he was entitled to credit for time served on the six-month sentence was not justifiable based on the defendant's failure to pursue administrative remedies within the Federal Bureau of Prisons. (Florida)

U.S. Appeals Court
CREDIT
GUIDELINES

U.S. v. Harris, 876 F.2d 1502 (11th Cir. 1989), cert. denied, 110 S.Ct. 417, 110 S.Ct. 569. The defendants were convicted in the U.S. District Court of conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute more than 50 grams of cocaine and possession with intent to distribute more than five grams of cocaine, and the defendants appealed. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that the evidence supported the conviction of one defendant. It was also found that the restrictions on the judge's discretion in the Sentencing Guidelines do not violate due process in a noncapital case; and the pretrial incarceration of the defendants in state custody was to be credited against the sentence. When a convicted federal prisoner claims credit for time spent in a state jail or prison, the burden is on the prisoner to establish that the state confinement was exclusively a product of the action by federal law enforcement officials so as to justify treating the state jail as a practical equivalent to a federal one. (Florida State Jail)

U.S. Appeals Court
PROBATION-REVOCATION
PROBATION-SEARCH
FEDERAL PROBATION ACT

U.S. v. Schoenrock, 868 F.2d 289 (8th Cir. 1989). Defendants appealed from an order of the U.S. District Court, revoking their probation and requiring them to resume serving prison sentences received for violating drug laws. The appeals court, affirming the decision of the lower court, found that the probation term that allowed the warrantless searches of the defendant's premises, vehicles and persons for the presence of alcoholic or controlled substances was reasonably related to rehabilitation and protection of the public and did not violate the Federal Probation Act. The term was designed to help prevent the defendants' future alcohol and substance abuse, and only one search was carried out after the defendant had aroused suspicions of probation officers. It was also found by the court that the probation officers' warrantless search of the defendants' residence for drugs and alcohol was not unreasonable under the fourth amendment. The term was imposed only after the district court carefully evaluated the defendant's particular needs and concluded that only a condition authorizing warrantless searches would suffice to ensure the compliance with other probation terms. Even if a probation term authorizing warrantless searches of the defendant's premises, vehicles and persons for drugs and alcohol was facially overbroad, the probation officers acted reasonably in applying terms and did not violate the Federal Probation Act. The probation officers did not search the residence until the defendant aroused their suspicions by diluting his urine sample, submitting positive samples, smuggling drugs into his work release center, failing to cooperate in his treatment programs, and visiting a liquor store. (Nebraska)

1990

U.S. Appeals Court
CREDIT

Barden v. Keohane, 921 F.2d 476 (3rd Cir. 1990). A federal prisoner filed a petition for a writ of habeas corpus after the Bureau of Prisons failed to consider his request to designate a state prison as a place of confinement. The U.S. District Court denied the petition, and appeal was taken. The court of appeals found that the prisoner was entitled to have the Bureau of Prisons consider his request for the purpose of determining whether the prisoner was entitled to credit against a federal sentence for the time spent in state custody, and the Bureau had discretion to order concurrency where the federal sentence was imposed before the state sentence and the state judge clearly intended the sentences to be served concurrently. (U.S. Penitentiary, Lewisburg, Pennsylvania)

U.S. District Court
CREDIT
EQUAL PROTECTION
REDUCTION

Hattermann v. U.S., 743 F.Supp. 578 (C.D. Ill. 1990). A defendant filed a motion seeking credit toward service of his sentence for time he spent on bond between his arrest and sentencing. The district court found that the defendant's sentence, plus the time allegedly spent in presentence custody, totaled less than the maximum sentence provided for the defendant's offense and, thus, the defendant lacked a standing to assert that he was entitled to credit under a statute governing credit against a sentence for time spent in custody before imposition of a sentence. In addition, it was found that the defendant was not "in custody," within the meaning of the statute governing credit against a sentence for time spent in custody before imposition of a sentence, during the time the defendant was released on bond between his arrest and sentencing. The denial of the credit did not violate equal protection, despite the contention that a class of persons on bond had to be treated identically to the class of persons on probation or parole; equating those situations would require a finding that bond restrictions constitutionally amounted to a form of punishment, which would not have been permissible prior to conviction, but it was found that the restraints reasonably imposed for the purpose of insuring the detainee's presence at trial and reasonably related to that purpose does not rise to a level of "punishment," for the purposes of denial of liberty due process claims. (Fed. Prison, Terre Haute, Indiana)

U.S. Appeals Court
GOOD TIME

Jackson v. Thornburgh, 907 F.2d 194 (D.C. Cir. 1990), affirming, 702 F.Supp. 9 (D.D.C. 1988). Female prisoners who were housed in federal prisons after being convicted in District of Columbia courts sought a writ of habeas corpus and challenged the constitutionality of the District of Columbia Good Time Credits Act. The defendants moved for a summary judgment. The U.S. District Court granted the defendants' motion for a summary judgment, and the female prisoners appealed. The district court found that the Act, which reduces the minimum sentence of prisoners in District prisons, did not violate the equal protection rights of the female prisoners, even though long-term female offenders are housed in a federal facility and are not covered by the Act. (District of Columbia Penal Facilities)

U.S. Appeals Court
GOOD TIME
REDUCTION

Lee v. Dugger, 902 F.2d 822 (11th Cir. 1990). An inmate brought a civil rights action against a prison official, alleging that he was incarcerated longer than he should have been on a prior sentence because he was not credited with proper gain time. The U.S. District Court entered a summary judgment in favor of the official, and the inmate appealed. The appeals court found that the official was entitled to qualified immunity from the civil rights action brought by the former inmate who was allegedly not credited with proper gain time due to the official's misinterpretation of an amended gain-time statute, where only one decision by the intermediate appellate court had construed the new statute. (Per Curiam, with one Circuit Judge concurring specially.) (Florida State Prison)

U.S. District Court
CREDIT
GOOD-TIME

Stephens v. Muncy, 751 F.Supp. 1214 (E.D. Va. 1990), affirmed, 929 F.2d 694. A state prisoner filed a civil rights action in which he alleged constitutional violations in computation of parole eligibility. The district court found that the statute modifying Virginia's parole eligibility scheme with respect to repeat offenders was not "ex post facto" law, notwithstanding that it utilized offenses committed prior to its enactment to compute parole eligibility. The statute applied only to those convicted of a criminal offense after the statute's effective date. (Virginia State Prison)

1991

Brodheim v. Rowland, 783 F.Supp. 1245 (N.D. Cal. 1991), modified, 993 F.2d 716. A California prisoner filed an amended petition for writ of habeas corpus. The U.S. District Court, granting the writ, found that allowing habitual offenders to earn work time credits, but denying work time credits to prisoners convicted of murder, did not have a rational basis and violated the equal protection clause, since a murderer who had been convicted twice before of violent crimes would be better off than a murderer new to the prison system. The appeals court found that the prisoner had no due process right to continue to earn one-for-one work credits since he was ineligible for the program. (Vacaville State Prison, California)

U.S. District Court
CREDIT

Dougherty v. Crabtree, 812 F.Supp. 1089 (D. Or. 1991). A prisoner petitioned for a writ of habeas corpus, challenging a federal prison warden's refusal to credit time spent in a residential treatment center. The district court found that the prisoner was entitled to credit on his sentence for time previously spent as a resident of the treatment center as a condition of a probationary sentence. The time spent at the center was time served "in custody" in connection with crimes for which his sentences were imposed, for the purposes of the statute providing that credit shall be given for time spent "in custody," and the statute did not distinguish between time spent in custody before sentencing and time spent in custody while on probation as a condition of the sentence imposed. (Alpha House, Oregon)

U.S. Supreme Court
SENTENCE

Harmelin v. Michigan, 111 S.Ct. 2680 (1991). A petitioner was convicted of possessing more than 650 grams of cocaine and was sentenced to a mandatory term of life in prison without the possibility of parole. The court of appeals affirmed and certiorari was granted. The Supreme Court found that the sentence, without any consideration of mitigating factors, such as the fact that the petitioner had no prior felony convictions, did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment. Severe, mandatory penalties may be cruel, but they are not unusual in the constitutional sense. (State of Michigan)

U.S. Appeals Court
CREDIT
GOOD TIME
EQUAL PROTECTION

Lemieux v. Kerby, 931 F.2d 1391 (10th Cir. 1991). The petitioner sought habeas corpus relief from sentencing. The U.S. District Court dismissed the petition, and the petitioner appealed. The court of appeals found that the statute that authorizes sentencing credit for good time after sentencing, but not for good time in a county jail before sentencing, serves a rational purpose of rehabilitating criminals and complies with due process and equal protection clauses. (New Mexico State Prison System)

U.S. District Court
PROBATION-CONDITIONS
PROBATION-REVOCATION

Mace v. Amestoy, 765 F.Supp. 847 (D.Vt. 1991). Revocation of a defendant's probation on grounds that the defendant refused to admit he had sexual intercourse with his stepdaughter as required for completion of a sexual offender treatment program, which was a condition of probation, was affirmed by the Vermont Supreme Court. The defendant petitioned for writ of habeas corpus alleging that revocation of his probation violated his Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination, his due process right to fair notice of his probation conditions, and his First Amendment right against coerced speech. The U.S. District Court adopted a recommendation and report of a magistrate judge, and found that the probationer received fair notice of his probation conditions, where the defendant was told at the beginning of his attendance at the sexual therapy group that he would have to take responsibility for all of his sexual conduct in order to successfully complete the program and the probation officer, as well as therapist, put the defendant on actual notice that his failure to admit sexual intercourse was interfering with successful completion of the treatment program. Thus, revocation of probation on such grounds was not a violation of due process. However, the probationer could not be forced to incriminate himself. If a state wishes to carry out rehabilitative goals and probation by compelling offenders to disclose their criminal conduct, it must grant them immunity from criminal prosecution. The revocation of probation on grounds that the probation refused to admit to sexual intercourse with his stepdaughter violated the defendant's Fifth Amendment rights against self-incrimination. (Orange County Mental Health, Randolph, Vermont)

U.S. Appeals Court
CREDIT
EQUAL PROTECTION

Moreland v. U.S., 932 F.2d 690 (8th Cir. 1991). The defendant's request that time spent at a halfway-house prior to trial and sentencing be credited against his sentence was denied by the Federal Bureau of Prisons, and the defendant petitioned for habeas relief. The U.S. District Court refused to grant relief, and the defendant appealed. The court of appeals found that the defendant was entitled to credit for the time spent at the halfway house since he was in official detention. It is not enough to be subject to some conditions, such as electronic monitoring, a requirement to live with one's parents, and a curfew; one must also be in an institution and be subject to that institution's jail-like rules. The defendant was ordered to reside at the halfway house and was subject to 24-hour supervision. The halfway house was acting as an agent of the criminal justice system, the defendant was physically incarcerated for a substantial part of each day spent there, and was subject to a curfew. Since restrictions placed on the defendant were similar to those imposed on jail prisoners who had work-release privileges, it cannot be contended that he was not in "official detention." (Reentry Services Community Treatment Center, Minnesota)

U.S. Appeals Court
GOOD TIME

Offet v. Solem, 936 F.2d 363 (8th Cir. 1991). An inmate who lost good-time credits as a result of disciplinary action brought a civil rights action against prison officials. The U.S. District Court entered judgment in favor of the officials, and the inmate appealed. The court of appeals found that the application of a South Dakota statute providing automatic forfeiture of one day of good-time credit for every day spent in punitive confinement to inmates convicted before the statute's effective date did not clearly violate constitutional ex post facto principles, entitling the prison officials to qualified immunity in the inmate's civil right action. (South Dakota State Penitentiary)

U.S. Appeals Court
CREDIT

Randall v. Whelan, 938 F.2d 522 (4th Cir. 1991). A federal prison inmate sought credit against a prison sentence for time spent in a drug rehabilitation center prior to entering the federal penitentiary. The credit was denied by the U.S. District Court, and the inmate appealed. The court of appeals found that the inmate was not entitled to credit against his prison sentence, both before and after the imposition of the sentence, though the release to the center was by judicial order under restrictive conditions. The inmate was not in "custody" within the meaning of a statute governing credits, where he was not subject to the authority of the Attorney General, nor was he committed to a place of detention to await transportation to prison. (Federal Bureau of Prisons)

U.S. Appeals Court
CREDIT

Travis v. Lockhart, 925 F.2d 1095 (8th Cir. 1991). A state prisoner appealed from an order entered in the U.S. District Court dismissing a habeas petition on the merits. The court of appeals found that the district court should not have interpreted the state crediting statute on the merits of a habeas proceeding. The state prisoner's claim that he was entitled to credit for jail time served prior to his second murder conviction required interpretation of the state crediting statute, which was a matter of state concern and not a proper function of the federal habeas court. (Arkansas Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
REDUCTION

Tritico v. U.S. Parole Com'n., 760 F.Supp. 154 (W.D. Mo. 1991). A former inmate brought an action to determine whether he was subject to the jurisdiction of the United States Parole Commission. On the government's motion for summary judgment, the U.S. District Court found that the inmate, who was subject to mandatory release after a deduction of "good time" from days he otherwise would have served before the end of his sentence, could properly be subjected to jurisdiction of the United State Parole Commission; the release, though mandatory, was conditioned upon compliance with terms of parole. (U.S. Parole Commission)

U.S. District Court
CREDIT

U.S. v. Browning, 761 F.Supp. 681 (C.D. Cal. 1991). An inmate filed a motion to correct an illegal sentence, challenging the decision of the Federal Bureau of Prisons refusing to give him credit against his sentence for 34 days he spent at home awaiting trial. Treating the motion as a petition for habeas corpus, the U.S. District Court found that the Bureau of Prisons properly determined that the inmate was not "in custody" for purpose of credits against his sentence while he was confined to his home awaiting trial, though the inmate was precluded from leaving his home except for court appearances, visits to his lawyer to assist in his defense, or other absences approved at least 24 hours in advance, and the inmate was required to wear an ankle bracelet electronically connected to a privately operated monitoring center in order to assure his compliance with conditions of release. (Federal Bureau of Prisons)

U.S. Appeals Court
GUIDELINES
REDUCTION

U.S. v. Gonzalez, 945 F.2d 525 (2nd Cir. 1991). A defendant was convicted of importing cocaine and the court departed downward from a minimum term proscribed by the sentencing guidelines. As a result, the government appealed. The court of appeals found that the trial court's conclusion that the defendant's overall appearance and demeanor made him unusually vulnerable to physical attack warranting a downward departure from the sentencing guidelines was not clearly erroneous. The defendant was extremely small and feminine looking and had an appearance of a 14 or 15-year-old making him unusually susceptible to prison abuse, even though the defendant was neither gay nor bisexual. (Federal Bureau of Prisons)

U.S. Appeals Court
ELECTRONIC MONITORING
PROBATION-
REVOCATION
PROBATION-
CONDITIONS
PROBATION-
VIOLATION

U.S. v. Laughlin, 933 F.2d 786 (9th Cir. 1991). A defendant appealed an order of the U.S. District Court revoking his probation. The court of appeals found that the defendant's claim that he was denied effective assistance of counsel in a probation revocation proceeding would not be considered on direct appeal. It was also found that the defendant's probationary term commenced on the date the defendant was paroled from prison, where the sentencing order indicated that probation would begin upon the defendant's release from prison, not his release from detention or custody. In addition, a statute requiring the Bureau of Prisons to afford a prisoner a reasonable opportunity to adjust to and prepare for reentry into the community does not mandate that all prisoners pass through a community treatment center en route to free society. The Bureau's decision to release the defendant to his family and to supervise him through an electronic monitoring device fell within the options available to the Bureau under the statute. The court also found that the defendant whose probation was revoked based in part on attempted forgery received sufficient notice of conditions of probation so that the revocation satisfied due process standards. The district court instructed the defendant on conditions of probation at the time of sentencing, and the defendant had implied knowledge that criminal acts would violate the probation. As a result, even if the defendant's application for a credit card did not violate a condition of probation prohibiting the defendant from possessing credit cards, the defendant's forgery on a bank withdrawal slip provided independent and sufficient ground for the decision to revoke probation. (Federal Burueau of Prisons)

U.S. District Court
CREDIT
EQUAL PROTECTION
GOOD TIME

Wickliffe v. Clark, 783 F.Supp. 389 (N.D. Ind. 1991). A defendant whose murder conviction was affirmed by the Indiana Supreme Court petitioned for habeas corpus. The U.S. District Court found that there is no basic constitutional right to guarantee good time credit for good behavior while incarcerated, although states may create such statutory rights, and the denial of credit to "lifers" does not deny due process or equal protection. (Indiana State Prison)

1992

U.S. Appeals Court
CREDIT

Del Guzzi v. U.S., 980 F.2d 1269 (9th Cir. 1992). A prisoner brought a habeas corpus petition after federal prison officials denied him credit against his federal sentence for time spent in state custody. The U.S. District Court denied the petition, and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that the defendant was not "awaiting transportation" to federal prison while serving a state sentence, for the purposes of commencing his federal sentence. Although the state court sentenced him to a term concurrent with the federal sentence and recommended his transportation to the federal prison, federal officials refused to take custody of him until he completed his state sentence. Furthermore, the federal courts have no authority to violate a statutory mandate that federal authorities need only accept prisoners upon completion of their state sentence and need not credit prisoners with time spent in state custody. (California)

U.S. District Court
GUIDELINES

Huddleston v. Shirley, 787 F.Supp. 109 (N.D. Miss. 1992). A jail inmate brought a Section 1983 action against the county and sheriff, in his official capacity, alleging that the sheriff disregarded a provision of a state court order directing that the inmate be released during the day to go to work. The inmate moved for summary judgment. The district court found that the sheriff's actions violated the inmate's substantive due process rights; although the sheriff believed the order invalid, he never sought a definitive ruling on its validity through any formal means. As a result, the county and the sheriff were found liable. (Lee County Jail, Mississippi)

U.S. District Court
CREDIT

Medina v. Clark, 791 F.Supp. 194 (W.D. Tenn. 1992), affirmed, 978 F.2d 1259. An inmate filed a petition for a writ of habeas corpus seeking to obtain credit against his sentence. The district court denied the petition, finding that the prisoner was not entitled to credit against his sentence for a period of release from detention on unusually restrictive conditions. The governing statute excluded pretrial and posttrial release subject to house arrest where a defendant was not within the custody of the Attorney General or the United States Marshal. (Tennessee)

U.S. Appeals Court
CREDIT
GOOD TIME

Poole v. Kelly, 954 F.2d 760 (D.C. Cir. 1992). Inmates brought habeas petitions challenging the failure to award good time credit pursuant to a statute. The U.S. District Court granted one petition, and another district court denied another inmate's petition, and the losing parties appealed. The court of appeals found that the inmates were not entitled to good time credit under the statute. The District of Columbia Good Time Credit Act did not supersede a provision of a statute providing for a 20-year minimum year period of incarceration prior to parole eligibility for persons convicted of first-degree murder. (District of Columbia)

U.S. District Court
CREDIT

Ronchetti v. Rickards, 790 F.Supp. 117 (N.D. W.Va. 1992). A federal prisoner petitioned pro se for habeas corpus relief alleging credit should be given for presentencing time spent in a drug treatment program. The U.S. District Court found that the federal prisoner was not entitled to credit against his sentence for time spent in the drug treatment program before sentencing since he was not in "custody" or "official detention" when he was released on bond into the care of the treatment center. (Federal Correctional Institution, Morgantown, West Virginia)

U.S. Appeals Court
CREDIT

Starchild v. Federal Bureau of Prisons, 973 F.2d 610 (8th Cir. 1992). An inmate applied for a writ of habeas corpus. The U.S. District Court denied the application, and the inmate appealed. The court of appeals, affirming the decision, found that the inmate was not entitled to credit toward his sentence for time spent preconviction under house arrest no matter how restrictive conditions were, as a private home was not jail-type facility. (Federal Bureau of Prisons, Minnesota)

U.S. Appeals Court
ORIGINAL SENTENCE
REVOCATION

U.S. v. McGee, 981 F.2d 271 (7th Cir. 1992). The defendant was convicted of possession of heroine and was sentenced to twenty-seven months in prison followed by three years of supervised release. After the defendant completed his prison term, he was charged with violating conditions of his supervised release. The U.S. District Court revoked the defendant's supervised release and ordered the defendant to serve an additional two years in prison followed by five years of supervised release, and the defendant appealed. The court of appeals, vacating and remanding, found that once a court revokes a defendant's supervised release and reimprisons him, no residual term of supervised release survives revocation; consequently, there is no way for a court to create or "extend" a second term of supervised release. The defendant could be ordered to serve the entire supervised release term in prison without credit for time previously served on postrelease supervision, but could not be given an additional supervised release term following that term in prison. (Illinois)

1993

U.S. District Court
CREDIT
SENTENCE

Alexander v. Perrill, 836 F.Supp. 701 (D. Ariz. 1993). A former prisoner brought a Bivens action against prison officials, claiming that he sustained damages because of improper credit for time spent in a foreign prison. The district court found that the prison officials were liable to the prisoner, because they failed to transmit to the proper authorities the prisoner's claim that his credits for time served in a German prison had been improperly taken into account in determining his sentence. The prisoner had repeatedly objected, but the defendants took no action with respect to his complaints except to state that the sentencing complied with a memorandum they had received from the Central Office, Bureau of Prisons in Washington, D.C. The court ruled that the prisoner was entitled to notice and a hearing before recalculation of his sentence could be put into effect. (Federal Correctional Institution, Tucson, Arizona)

U.S. Appeals Court
EXPIRATION

Calhoun v. New York State Div. of Parole Officers, 999 F.2d 647 (2nd Cir. 1993). An inmate filed a Section 1983 action against prison officials alleging that when prison officials extended the inmate's maximum expiration date by five days based upon a "declaration of delinquency," without affording the inmate a final parole revocation hearing, they violated due process and the Eighth Amendment. The U.S. District Court dismissed the action based upon qualified immunity, and appeal was taken. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that without holding a final revocation hearing, the state could not constitutionally hold the defendant beyond his original, unadjusted, maximum expiration date unless a final hearing would have been impracticable. However, adding an extra five days of imprisonment on the defendant's sentence based upon a "declaration of delinquency" without holding a parole revocation hearing did not inflict harm of the magnitude that violated the inmate's Eighth Amendment rights. (Steuben County Jail, New York)

U.S. District Court
CREDIT
LIBERTY INTEREST

Chavis v. Smith, 834 F.Supp. 153 (D.Md. 1993). A Maryland inmate petitioned for writ of habeas corpus alleging that he was unconstitutionally deprived of liberty interest by Maryland's failure to credit toward the Maryland sentence time he spent in a Georgia prison. Adopting the report and recommendation of a U.S. Magistrate Judge, the district court found that the inmate was entitled to credit for time spent in the Georgia prison that was not credited to any valid conviction. (Eastern Corr. Institution, Westover, Maryland)

U.S. Appeals Court
CREDIT
HOUSE ARREST

Fraley v. U.S. Bureau of Prisons, 1 F.3d 924 (9th Cir. 1993). A federal prisoner's petition for habeas corpus was dismissed by the U.S. District Court and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that the conditions governing the defendant's pretrial house arrest did not approach those of incarceration. She was not entitled to credit for house arrest against her sentence, where she was allowed to live in her own house, though she was not permitted to leave without prior authorization from the probation office and was required to participate in an electronic monitoring program to ensure that she did not leave. (Washington)

U.S. Appeals Court
EXPIRATION

Moore v. Tartler, 986 F.2d 682 (3rd Cir. 1993). A former state prisoner brought a civil rights action against parole officials claiming violation of the Eighth Amendment due to a delay in releasing him. The U.S. District Court denied relief and the former inmate appealed. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that evidence did not show that parole officials acted with deliberate indifference to the former inmate's rights. The inmate was not subjected to cruel and unusual punishment when he was held in prison for at least three months after the expiration of his term due to the alleged failure to investigate the parole board's misinterpretation of sentencing order. The parole board had not rejected his initial complaint outright or suspended its search, although the investigation had been slow and incompetent, and the record did not establish deliberate indifference. (State Correctional Institution, Graterford, Pennsylvania)

U.S. District Court
CREDIT
EQUAL
PROTECTION

Oses v. U.S., 833 F.Supp. 49 (D.Mass. 1993). A federal prisoner brought a habeas corpus action alleging that he was entitled to credit against a federal sentence for time served on that portion of a state sentence that was effectively nullified after determination that the state conviction violated the federal constitution. The district court denied the petition, finding that the prisoner was not entitled to credit against his federal sentence for time served on an unrelated, nonconcurrent state sentence. The statute which prohibited the credit did not violate equal protection. The federal government and states are separate sovereigns and the federal government does not have to treat time served under a federal sentence as the equivalent of time served under a preceding state sentence. (Federal Bureau of Prisons)

U.S. District Court
GUIDELINES
REDUCTION

Phillips v. U.S., 836 F.Supp. 965 (N.D.N.Y. 1993). A prisoner filed a postconviction petition to vacate, set aside or correct his sentence. The district court found that the sentence, that was within the guidelines range, did not become excessive merely because the prisoner's blindness allegedly increased the severity of his punishment. (New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
INVOLUNTARY COMMITMENT

U.S. v. Evanoff, 10 F.3d 559 (8th Cir. 1993). An inmate appealed an order of the U.S. District Court committing him to the custody of the Attorney General when his prison term ended, based on a finding that he suffered from a mental disease or defect which rendered him dangerous. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that the government met its burden of establishing dangerousness by clear and convincing evidence. Evidence indicated that the inmate, throughout his incarceration, suffered from auditory hallucinations which commanded him to harm people. Because of such hallucinations he requested seclusion on at least three occasions to regain control of himself and to avoid harming others. The inmate also consistently told a psychologist that he would refuse any prescribed psychotropic drugs and would take cocaine instead of prescribed drugs. (Federal Medical Center, Rochester, Minnesota; Seagoville, Texas; United States Medical Center for Federal Prisoners, Springfield, Missouri)

U.S. District Court
REDUCTION

U.S. v. Hillstrom, 837 F.Supp. 1324 (M.D. Pa. 1993). A defendant convicted of escape from federal custody appealed his sentence. The appeals court vacated and remanded the case to determine whether the prison camp from which the defendant escaped was a "similar facility" for the purposes of a guidelines provision allowing a four-point reduction in the base offense level for escape from nonsecure custody. On remand, the district court found that the minimum security federal prison camp from which the defendant escaped was not "similar" to a community corrections center, so that a four-point reduction in the offense level did not apply. (Federal Prison Camp at Allenwood, Montgomery, Pennsylvania)

U.S. Appeals Court
PROBATION-
REVOCATION

U.S. v. Paskow, 11 F.3d 873 (9th Cir. 1993). A defendant's supervised release was revoked when random drug testing revealed that he had used marijuana and cocaine. The U.S. District Court ruled that an amendment to a supervised release statute imposing a mandatory minimum penalty for violation of supervised release for possession of a controlled substance, as applied to the defendant, did not violate the ex post facto clause, and the defendant appealed. The appeals court, vacating and remanding, found that there is no difference for ex post facto purposes between parole and supervised release. The court found that the amendment to the supervised release statute, as applied to the defendant, violated the ex post facto clause. The underlying offense was committed before the amendment was adopted, but the conduct that led to the revocation of supervised release occurred afterwards. (California)

U.S. Appeals Court
GOOD-TIME

Woodson v. Attorney General, 990 F.2d 1344 (D.C.Cir. 1993). A prisoner sought a declaratory judgment to allow her to waive good time credits to which she was entitled and to serve the full remainder of her sentence for religious reasons. The U.S. District Court granted the prisoner's cross motion for summary judgment. On appeal, the court reversed the decision, finding that the commutation statute mandated that prisoners accumulate good time credits for months in which they have faithfully observed all rules and have not been subjected to punishment, thus creating a scheme in which a prisoner automatically accumulates credits for good conduct and is mandatorily released upon accumulation of a certain amount. (District of Columbia)

1994

U.S. Appeals Court
RESTITUTION

Beeks v. Hundley, 34 F.3d 658 (8th Cir. 1994). Inmates who recovered a money judgment against a Missouri prison official under Section 1983 sought relief from seizure of the judgment proceeds by Iowa prison officials to satisfy the inmates' obligations under Iowa's victim restitution act. The U.S. District Court entered a judgment against the inmates and they appealed. The appeals court found that seizure of the inmates' Section 1983 damage recovery to pay victim restitution was not preempted by federal statute. (Iowa State Penitentiary)

U.S. District Court
CREDIT
EQUAL PROTECTION

Brooks v. State of Okl., 862 F.Supp. 342 (W.D.Okl. 1994). An offender challenged the constitutionality of the Oklahoma Prison Overcrowding Emergency Powers Act. Adopting a report and recommendation of a U.S. Magistrate, the district court found that the effect that prosecutorial discretion in determining what offenses to charge had on an offender's eligibility for emergency time credits under the Oklahoma Prison Overcrowding Emergency Powers Act did not violate the offender's equal protection rights. The offender did not claim that any discriminatory purposes motivated prosecutors in charging him with the offense for which he was imprisoned, and the conjectural connection between the prosecutorial discretion and the classification system in the Act was too attenuated to present a viable legal theory under the equal protection clause. (Oklahoma Prison)

U.S. District Court
PAROLE

Canales v. Gabry, 844 F.Supp. 1167 (E.D. Mich. 1994). A state inmate brought a federal civil rights action alleging that the parole board violated his constitutional rights by extending the time between parole reviews. On the parole board chairman's motion to dismiss the district court adopting a report and recommendation of a U.S. Magistrate, found that the inmate did not have a protected liberty interest to be conditionally released before the expiration of his valid sentence. State-created parole procedures enacted after the inmate's incarceration that increased the time between parole hearings did not violate the inmate's procedural due process rights. The rules governing the parole hearing frequency were not "laws" within the meaning of the ex post facto clause. The possibility of parole was no more than a mere hope and such hope was not protected by due process. The parole board had the discretion to grant parole, and therefore the plaintiff did not have a protected liberty interest. Even to the extent that the state statute may create a "protectable expectation of parole," no more procedural due process is constitutionally required than an opportunity to be heard, and when parole is denied, to be informed of the reasons for failing to qualify for parole. (Saginaw Regional Correctional Facility, Saginaw, Michigan)

U.S. Appeals Court
CREDIT
EQUAL PROTECTION

Charry v. State of Cal., 13 F.3d 1386 (9th Cir. 1994). A juvenile brought an action against California, the California Youth Authority (CYA), and related parties, alleging that denial of sentence credit for time spent on parole violated his constitutional and statutory rights. The U.S. District Court entered summary judgment with respect to the sentence credit claim, and the juvenile appealed. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that the denial of sentence credit did not cause the juvenile to serve a greater sentence than he would have served had he been sentenced as an adult and thereby violate his constitutional and statutory rights. (California Youth Authority)

U.S. Appeals Court
CREDIT
HOUSE ARREST
PRETRIAL
CONFINEMENT

Edwards v. U.S., 41 F.3d 154 (3rd Cir. 1994). A petitioner sought habeas corpus relief based on the Bureau of Prisons' refusal to grant sentencing credit to the petitioner for the period of pretrial home confinement he endured. The U.S. District Court denied relief and appeal was taken. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that the terms of the petitioner's pretrial home confinement were not sufficiently demanding to approach jail like confinement. Therefore, the home confinement was not "official detention" within the meaning of the sentencing credit statute. The petitioner could not leave the house without permission from Pretrial Services, but he was frequently granted permission to leave home to attend church and social events. This totaled 30 hours per week during the last four months of confinement. (Pennsylvania)

U.S. District Court
CAPITAL
PUNISHMENT

Fierro v. Gomez, 865 F.Supp. 1387 (N.D. Cal. 1994). California inmates who had been sentenced to death brought an action on behalf of themselves and all others similarly situated, challenging the constitutionality of California's method of execution by lethal gas. The district court found that the California inmates who had been sentenced to death had standing to challenge the constitutionality of California's method of execution by lethal gas, even though they could have elected to be executed by lethal injection instead. Where inmates had refused to elect the method of execution, their executions, if carried out, would be by administration of lethal gas, and their challenge to the method of execution was therefore justifiable. The court also found that California's method of execution by lethal gas is unconstitutional cruel and unusual punishment under the Eighth Amendment. Evidence strongly suggests that a condemned inmate is likely to suffer intense physical pain during the period of consciousness, which is likely to continue anywhere from 15 seconds to one minute from the time the gas strikes the inmate's face, and that there is a substantial risk that consciousness will persist for up to several minutes. Evidence of pain, when coupled with the overwhelming evidence of societal rejection of lethal gas as a method of execution, renders its administration unconstitutional. (San Quentin State Prison, California)

U.S. Appeals Court
CREDIT
GOOD-TIME

Graham v. Lanfong, 25 F.3d 203 (3rd Cir. 1994). An inmate who had served a Virgin Islands sentence in a federal prison sought a writ of habeas corpus claiming that he was entitled to good time credits provided by federal law, rather than those applicable under a territorial statute against a concurrent eight-year territorial sentence. The U.S. District Court granted relief and the Government of the Virgin Islands appealed. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that the inmate was entitled to good time credits provided by federal law, rather than those applicable under the territorial statute. The inmate was not entitled to good time credit under the Virgin Islands law for the same period. (Virgin Islands Bureau of Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
CREDIT
REDUCTION

Martinez v. U.S., 19 F.3d 97 (2nd Cir. 1994). A prisoner moved for an order granting him credit on his sentence for time he spent while released on bail following his arrest. The U.S. District Court denied the motion, and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that the prisoner was not entitled to sentencing credit for time spent during his release on bail. (New York)

U.S. District Court
CREDIT

Schmanke v. U.S. Bureau of Prisons, 847 F.Supp. 134 (D.Minn. 1994). A federal prisoner petitioned for credit against a federal sentence for days spent in federal custody while awaiting trial on federal charges. The district court found that the petitioner successfully challenged the state sentence while in federal custody. The only legitimate basis for the petitioner's confinement was a federal writ of ad prosequendum, and he was entitled to credit against the federal sentence for the period of time he spent in United State marshal keeping pursuant to the writ. (Federal Bureau of Prisons)

U.S. Appeals Court
GUIDELINES
PROBATION-
REVOCATION

U.S. v. Anderson, 15 F.3d 278 (2nd Cir. 1994). Following a finding that the defendant had violated her supervised release, the U.S. District Court revoked her supervised release and sentenced the defendant, and she appealed. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that the court may consider the offender's correctional and medical needs, including drug treatment or rehabilitation, in determining the length of time an offender shall be required to serve in prison following revocation of a supervised release. Furthermore, the trial judge, in revoking the supervised release and sentencing the defendant, properly departed from the sentencing range suggested by the guidelines manual policy statements. The defendant's failure to adjust to supervision, failure to fulfill her obligations under her sentence of probation, and need for "intensive substance abuse and psychological treatment in a structured environment," were cited. (Federal District Court, Connecticut)

U.S. Appeals Court
CREDIT
GUIDELINES
REDUCTION

U.S. v. Daggao, 28 F.3d 985 (9th Cir. 1994). The U.S. District Court found that it lacked authority under the Sentencing Guidelines to grant a downward departure for time spent under in-house detention prior to sentencing. Appeal was taken. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that the district court's determination that it lacked authority to depart downward was correct. The Attorney General has the sole authority to grant credit for time served in detention before sentencing except under exceptional circumstances such as when the defendant is sentenced erroneously and has served time under that erroneous sentence. (California)

U.S. District Court
GUIDELINES
PROBATION-
CONDITIONS

U.S. v. Humphress, 878 F.Supp. 168 (D.Or. 1994). A petition for habeas corpus relief was filed requesting that a federal district court vacate a court order which extended the petitioner's three-year term of probation. The district court found that the government did not provide any authority for extension of the three-year probationary term without a hearing and further findings by the court, given that the applicable probation guideline required that the habeas petitioner's probation term be no more than three years without an upward departure. The statute stating that if a defendant violated the conditions of probation at any time prior to the expiration of probation the court may continue him on probation was not applicable because there was no finding that the petitioner had violated a condition of probation. (Oregon)

U.S. District Court
PROBATION-
REVOCATION

U.S. v. McGregor, 866 F.Supp. 215 (E.D.Pa. 1994). After revocation of a defendant's probation and his resentencing to two-years imprisonment, the United States moved for reconsideration of the resentencing order. The district court found that the Sentencing Reform Act (SRA) provision for mandatory revocation of probation and resentencing applied to offenses committed before the effective date of the Act. The application of the SRA provision to the defendant did not violate the ex post facto clause where the defendant was a prospective probationer on the date of enactment of the provision, and the defendant was on notice that possession of narcotics would result in a mandatory term of reimprisonment. However, the defendant's two-year sentence imposed after revocation of his probation for possession of a controlled substance was reduced to one year, where the only count against him on which time remained carried a maximum of one-year imprisonment. (Pennsylvania)

U.S. Appeals Court
PROBATION-
REVOCATION
RESTITUTION

U.S. v. Webb, 30 F.3d 687 (6th Cir. 1994). A hearing was held to determine punishment for a defendant's violation of supervised release. The U.S. District Court revoked the supervised release and appeal was taken. The appeals court, affirming in part and remanding in part, found that the revocation of the defendant's supervised release for substantially ignoring reporting and monitoring requirements was not an abuse of discretion. The defendant had extensive contact with the criminal justice system and was aware of the importance of abiding by the conditions. The revocation of the defendant's supervised release did not affect his restitution obligation, where restitution was ordered as a separate component of the judgment of conviction and installments were ordered to be paid prior to the beginning of supervised release. However, the defendant could not be sentenced to an additional term of supervised release following his imprisonment upon revocation of his initial term of supervised release. (Kentucky)

U.S. District Court
CREDIT

Wright v. Baker, 849 F.Supp. 569 (N.D. Ohio 1994). An inmate brought a Section 1983 action against a prison warden and the Director of the Ohio Department of Rehabilitation and Corrections under Section 1983, asserting that the defendants refused to give him a 73-day credit against his grand theft conviction. The district court found that the proper remedy for possibility of error in a sentencing court's computation was either a direct appeal or motion for correction by the trial court. (Mansfield Corr. Institution, Ohio)

U.S. District Court
CREDIT

Burgos v. Thompson, 879 F.Supp. 37 (N.D.W.Va. 1995). A federal prisoner filed a petition challenging the decision of the U.S. Bureau of Prisons denying him credit for time served as the result of a prior detention order. The district court found that the prisoner was not entitled to credit for presentence time served at a community treatment center because the stay at the center was a condition of release on bond. (Federal Correctional Institution, Morgantown, West Virginia)

U.S. Appeals Court
CREDIT
PRETRIAL CONFINEMENT

Dawson v. Scott, 50 F.3d 884 (11th Cir. 1995). A defendant was convicted of cocaine distribution in the U.S. District Court and the defendant appealed the sentence. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that the 104 days that the drug defendant spent in a halfway house awaiting trial, and the 384 days that he spent in a "safe house" after the sentencing and while cooperating with police in drug investigations, were not periods of "official detention" required by statute to be credited against his sentence. Credit applied only to time spent "in custody," and while the defendant was confined at night, he had freedom of movement during the day. (Federal Prison Camp, Talladega, Alabama)

U.S. District Court
REDUCTION OF PAROLE

Garvin v. U.S., 882 F.Supp. 68 (S.D.N.Y. 1995). A prisoner filed a pro se motion to vacate, set aside or correct his sentence for violating special parole conditions on the grounds that additional incarceration would constitute cruel and unusual punishment since the prisoner had contracted AIDS and had a short life expectancy. The district court denied the motion. It found that the prisoner's motion was untimely under the applicable rule, where the prisoner failed to file a motion within 120 days of the sentencing. In addition, the prisoner could not have his sentence reduced or vacated under a rule permitting correction of illegal sentences where his sentence was not found to be illegal. The sentence was neither in excess of the statutory provision nor otherwise contrary to the applicable sentencing statute. The special parole term imposed was mandated by an applicable statutory provision. The court also found that, despite his claim that additional incarceration would constitute cruel and unusual punishment because of his contracting AIDS, the prisoner was not entitled to relief from his sentence. The prisoner did not attack the imposition of the special parole term on direct appeal, did not claim that the sentence for violating parole conditions was illegal or unconstitutional, and did not inform the court that he had AIDS at his sentencing. (New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
EX POST FACTO

Gilbert v. Peters, 55 F.3d 237 (7th Cir. 1995). Several offenders who were convicted for sex offenses challenged an Illinois statute that was enacted after they had been convicted, requiring all incarcerated sex offenders to submit blood specimens to the Department of State Police prior to final discharge, parole or release. The district court dismissed the action with prejudice and the appeals court affirmed, finding that the statute did not violate the ex post facto clause. The court held that the ex post facto clause does not prohibit every alteration of a prisoner's confinement that may work to his disadvantage, but that only measures which are both retroactive and punitive fall within the purview of the clause. The court held that any sanctions that might result from an inmate's refusal to comply with the statute would be disciplinary measures and would not violate the ex post facto clause. (Dixon Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
CREDIT
LIBERTY INTEREST

Herring v. Singletary, 879 F.Supp. 1180 (N.D. Fla. 1995). A state inmate filed a habeas corpus action challenging the forfeiture of 1,540 days of provisional credit against his sentence. The district court found that the revocation of the credits did not constitute an ex post facto violation. The denial of the credit did not affect the original penalty assigned to the crime at the time or the ultimate punishment meted out, regardless of whether the credit was applied prospectively or the credits were canceled retroactively. The court also found that the retroactive legislation, canceling the provisional administrative sentence credits, did not violate the prisoner's due process liberty interest. The legislature had a conceivable rational basis for revocation of credits as the state had a legitimate interest in seeing that prisoners served their sentences, and had a legitimate interest in creating a mechanism to relieve prison overcrowding when it reached crisis proportions but also in ceasing that mechanism when it was no longer necessary. In addition, Florida statutes retroactively canceling provisionally granted administrative credits against a sentence which had been implemented to achieve a federally mandated reduction in prison overcrowding did not violate the prisoner's equal protection rights. (Florida Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
RESTITUTION

Karacsonyi v. Radloff, 885 F.Supp. 368 (N.D.N.Y. 1995). A federal inmate sued a prison official alleging violation of his constitutional rights by the official's decision to penalize him for not participating in the Inmate Financial Responsibility Program (IFRP). The district court granted summary judgment for the official on issues relating to the IFRP decision, but found that the inmate's placement in a four-person cell which measured approximately 115 square feet (roughly 29 square feet of living space per man) may have amounted to cruel and unusual punishment depending upon the duration of this living situation and whether it lead to deprivations of essential needs, such as sanitation. The inmate had refused to sign a required form which the court held constituted refusal to participate in the IFRP. The court found that the inmate was correctly categorized as refusing to participate in the program where his restitution was due and payable during his incarceration. As a penalty for refusing to participate, the inmate was placed in the lowest housing status (a four-man cell), was denied the opportunity to work in Federal Prison Industries, and was denied the opportunity for a furlough. The court noted that prison officials have broad discretion in denying federal inmates the opportunity to participate in Federal Prison Industries. (Ray Brook Federal Correctional Institution, New York)

U.S. District Court
EX POST FACTO
PAROLE

Knox v. Lanham, 895 F.Supp. 750 (D.Md. 1995). A prisoner serving a life sentence with the possibility of parole brought an action against state corrections officials and parole commissioners alleging constitutional violations and seeking injunctive, declaratory, and monetary relief. The district court held that a corrections directive that moved inmates serving life sentences to higher security, combined with the parole commission's refusal to recommend parole unless inmates were on active work release--which required lower security classification, constituted retroactive "punishment" in violation of the ex post facto clause. The court noted that an unwritten policy of the parole commission requiring inmates to be on active work release was "law" for ex post facto purposes where the state had not disavowed the policy nor could the policy be deemed solely interpretive. The court found, however, that the removal of inmates from family leave and work release programs, their transfer from prerelease facilities, and their increased security levels did not violate equal protection. (Maryland Division of Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
CAPITAL
PUNISHMENT

Mann v. Reynolds, 46 F.3d 1055 (10th Cir. 1995). A class action was brought on behalf of death row and high-maximum security inmates, challenging a prison policy prohibiting barrier-free or contact visits between inmates and an examining psychologist, other health professionals, and legal counsel. The U.S. District Court determined that the policy violated the inmates' constitutional rights but that alterations of that policy unilaterally adopted by the prison during the course of the litigation were in compliance with constitutional requirements, and the court subsequently dissolved stays of execution previously ordered. The inmates appealed. The appeals court found that there were no proper grounds to stay executions of inmates challenging the prison's policy prohibiting contact visits with attorneys. Each of the plaintiffs would have ample opportunity to stay the execution upon filing of the appropriate proceeding in district court. (Oklahoma State Penitentiary)

U.S. Appeals Court
PROBATION-
REVOCATION
REVOCATION

McGrew v. Texas Bd. of Pardons & Paroles, 47 F.3d 158 (5th Cir. 1995). An inmate brought a civil rights action against the Texas Board of Pardons and Parole challenging the extension of his sentence for violating the terms of his mandatory supervision. The U.S. District Court dismissed the action and the inmate appealed. The appeals court found that the inmate failed to state a Section 1983 cause of action against the Board of Pardons and Parole challenging the Board's policy of extending his sentence after revoking his mandatory supervision, where he remained in custody and was not alleging that the sentence imposed as a result of the revocation proceedings was invalidated by state or federal court. The inmate's Section 1983 claim for damages against the Board was barred by the Eleventh Amendment. (Texas Department of Criminal Justice)

U.S. District Court
EX POST FACTO
FURLOUGH

Neal v. Shimoda, 905 F.Supp. 813 (D.Hawai'i 1995). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against prison officials alleging that their labeling of him as a "sex offender" violated his constitutional rights. The inmate had been compelled to participate in a sex offender treatment program, which required the inmate to admit his guilt. The inmate had refused to admit his guilt, affecting his chances for parole and preventing him from being transferred to a minimum security facility. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants, finding that the inmate had no constitutional liberty interest in a furlough or in freedom from being classified as a sex offender. The court ruled that the prison's policies did not create a protected liberty interest and that placement of the inmate in the prison's sex offender treatment program did not violate equal protection or the Eighth Amendment. The court also found that classifying the inmate as a sex offender, and its affect on the inmate's potential transfer to a minimum security facility and granting of a furlough, were not improper ex post facto laws. The court noted that even if an inmate was not convicted of any sex offense, the state had a legitimate interest in denying untreated sex offenders parole, furlough and minimum security classification based on their high rate of recidivism. The sex offender treatment program was not overbroad by including inmates who engaged in sexual misconduct during the course of nonsexual offenses. Denying the inmate parole or transfer to a minimum custody facility because he refused to admit guilt, which was the first step necessary for completion of the sex offender treatment program, did not violate the inmate's right against self-incrimination as the program was not a proceeding in which the answers could incriminate the inmate in future criminal proceedings. The program's requirement that the inmate not be in denial about his crime did not violate his Fifth Amendment right to be free from compelled testimony in light of the recognition that rehabilitation, including acceptance of responsibility, is an important sentencing consideration. (Halawa Correctional Facility, Hawai'i)

U.S. Supreme Court
CREDIT

Reno v. Koray, 115 S.Ct. 2021 (1995). A prisoner sought a writ of habeas corpus claiming that he was entitled to credit toward his sentence for time he had spent at a community treatment center while released on bail. The United States District Court denied relief and the prisoner appealed. The U.S. Appeals Court reversed and the government's petition for certiorari was granted. The Supreme Court found that the time spent by a prisoner at a community treatment center while "released" on bail pursuant to the Bail Reform Act was not "official detention" within the meaning of the statute entitling the defendant to "credit toward the service of a term of imprisonment for any time he has spent in official detention prior to the date the sentence commences." The phrase "official detention" did not refer to restrictive conditions of release on bail under an official order that significantly curtailed a defendant's liberty; rather, credit was available only to those defendants detained in a penal or correctional facility and subject to the control of the Bureau of Prisons. (Allenwood Federal Prison Camp, Pennsylvania)

U.S. Appeals Court
EX POST FACTO

Rise v. State, 59 F.3d 1556 (9th Cir. 1995). Prisoners filed a § 1983 suit alleging that collection of blood samples for a DNA data bank violated their Fourth Amendment rights and was a prohibited ex post facto punishment. The district court dismissed the case the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the Oregon statute which required felons convicted of murder or specific sexual offenses to submit a blood sample for a DNA data bank was rationally related to the public's interest in preventing recidivism and in accurately identifying murderers and sex offenders. The court found that requiring a blood sample from felons, even if they were convicted before enactment of the statute, did not violate the ex post facto law because its purpose was not to punish convicted felons. The court also held that the felons' due process rights did not require a hearing before being required to submit a blood sample. The court noted that gathering genetic information for identification purposes from the blood of convicted murderers or sexual offenders does not constitute more than a minimal intrusion on their Fourth Amendment rights. (Oregon Department of Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
PROBATION-
REVOCATION

U.S. v. Flynn, 49 F.3d 11 (1st Cir. 1995). A probation officer petitioned for revocation of probation which had been imposed as part of a sentence, following guilty pleas to one count of conspiracy to commit mail fraud and two counts of mail fraud. The U.S. District Court revoked the probation and imposed a sentence. The probationer appealed, asserting that his probation had expired before the initiation of the revocation proceedings. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that the sentencing order imposing the probation term consecutive to the sentence on another count delayed commencement of the probation until completion of the entire previous sentence, including the period of parole. (New Hampshire)

U.S. Appeals Court
PROBATION-
VIOLATION

U.S. v. Grimes, 54 F.3d 489 (8th Cir. 1995). Action was brought to revoke a supervised release. The U.S. District Court revoked the release and the defendant appealed. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that the filing of false monthly supervision reports with a probation office constituted a grade "B" rather than a grade "C" violation of the terms of the supervised release, for the purpose of determining the appropriate sentence. The conduct violated a statute which provided for a term of imprisonment of up to five years. (Missouri)

U.S. Appeals Court
PROBATION-
REVOCATION
PROBATION-
VIOLATION

U.S. v. Hancox, 49 F.3d 223 (6th Cir. 1995). A motion of the United States for revocation of supervised release was denied by the U.S. District Court and the United States appealed. The appeals court found that the revocation of the defendant's supervised release and imposition of a prison sentence of one third of her supervised release term was mandatory when the defendant admitted consuming controlled substances during her supervised release in violation of that release. (Kentucky)

U.S. Appeals Court
SUPERVISED RELEASE
EX POST FACTO

U.S. v. Reese, 71 F.3d 582 (6th Cir. 1995). An offender who served a sentence for conspiring to distribute cocaine and subsequently had his supervised release revoked and had a new sentence term imposed appealed, alleging an ex post facto violation. The appeals court affirmed the new sentence, ruling that the application of a sentencing statute which was enacted after the offender's initial sentence was imposed was not an ex post facto violation. The offender had served his initial term of imprisonment and began his supervised release period and then tested positive thirteen separate times for use of a controlled substance. The new sentencing statute set forth a mandatory minimum sentence--one-third of the term of supervised release--for revocation of supervised release based on possession of a controlled substance. The court noted that the inherent difference between probation and supervised release is that when probation is revoked for a violation, rules set forth in the statute limit the term of resentencing to the term allowable under the original offense; however, violation of supervised release may result in cumulative punishment that exceeds the original sentence. (U.S. District Court for the Northern District of Ohio)

U.S. Appeals Court
PROBATION-
REVOCATION

U.S. v. Taylor, 47 F.3d 508 (2nd Cir. 1995). Action was brought to revoke a defendant's probation. The U.S. District Court revoked the probation and the defendant appealed. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that the defendant's term of federal probation did not begin until he was released from the state's supervised home release program. He was still on probation when he tested positive for drug use, and his probation was properly revoked for such use. (Supervised Home Release Program, Connecticut State Department of Correction)

U.S. District Court
EX POST FACTO

Vargas v. Pataki, 899 F.Supp. 96 (N.D.N.Y. 1995). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against state officials alleging that a law prohibiting inmates convicted of homicide from participating in a work release program violated his right to equal protection. The district court held that the law was rationally related to the goal of minimizing the risk to public safety from such programs and the inmate was not denied equal protection by the law's application. The court held that the law was not an ex post facto law since participation in the program was a privilege rather than a right and the law's purpose was not to increase punishment for a crime but to regulate participation in the program. The inmate had alleged that amendments to the law governing the Prisoner Work Release Program which were applied retroactively to him violated his rights. (Bare Hill Correctional Facility, New York)

1996

U.S. Appeals Court
REDUCTION

Downey v. Crabtree, 100 F.3d 662 (9th Cir. 1996). An inmate filed a petition for a writ of habeas corpus claiming he was improperly denied a sentence reduction by the Federal Bureau of Prisons following the completion of a drug treatment program. The district court granted the petition and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the inmate's conviction for possession of more than 100 grams of methamphetamine was a "nonviolent offense" for the purposes of a sentence reduction statute. The court affirmed the grant of a writ of habeas corpus and a sentence reduction order, rather than remanding the case. (Federal Correctional Institution, Sheridan, Oregon)

U.S. Supreme Court
CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

Felker v. Turpin, 116 S.Ct. 2333 (1996). An offender sentenced to death for capital murder petitioned the U.S. Supreme Court for a stay of execution and permission to file a second federal habeas corpus petition. The Court denied the offender's petition. The Court held that a provision of the Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act, enacted in April 1996, which prevents the Supreme Court from reviewing an appeals court order denying leave to file a second habeas petition, does not repeal the Supreme Court's authority to entertain original habeas petitions. The Court held that the Act's "gatekeeping" mechanism for appeals courts does not apply to do apply to the Supreme Court's consideration of original habeas petitions, but other restrictions in the Act do inform the Court's consideration of original habeas petitions. The Court held that the Act's new restrictions on successive habeas corpus petitions do not amount to an unconstitutional "suspension" of writ, and that the petitioner's claims in this case did not justify the issuance of a writ. (Georgia)

U.S. Appeals Court
GOOD-TIME

Hamlin v. Vaudenberg, 95 F.3d 580 (7th Cir. 1996). A prisoner filed a § 1983 suit alleging that a disciplinary proceeding deprived him of due process. The district court dismissed the complaint and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court found that the loss of good-time credits was sufficient to allege a protectible liberty interest but that state postdeprivation remedies were adequate. (Green Bay Correctional Institute, Wisconsin)

U.S. District Court
REDUCTION OF SENTENCE

Hines v. Crabtree, 935 F.Supp. 1104 (D.Or. 1996). A prisoner brought a habeas corpus petition alleging that the Bureau of Prisons violated his rights by excluding him from eligibility for a sentence reduction despite his completion of a substance abuse program. The district court granted the petition, finding that the prisoner was entitled to a sentence reduction. The court held that the prisoner's conviction for being a felon in possession of a firearm was a "nonviolent" offense under the statute that permitted the prisoner to seek a sentence reduction. (Federal Correctional Institution, Sheridan, Oregon)

U.S. Appeals Court
CREDIT

Kass v. Reno, 83 F.3d 1186 (10th Cir. 1996). A prisoner who was transferred from Mexico to the United States under the terms of a prisoner exchange treaty filed a petition for habeas corpus relief challenging his Mexican conviction. The district court denied relief and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed the lower court decision. The court found that the requirement of the prisoner exchange treaty that the prisoner seeking the transfer must agree not to challenge the Mexican conviction in United States court was not unconstitutional because the prisoner relinquished no vested rights by consenting to the treaty terms; Americans incarcerated in Mexican prisons have no right to relief from United States courts and therefore they lose nothing by consenting to limit themselves solely to Mexican limits after they are transferred. The court also found that the prisoner forfeited potential early release under Mexican law when he agreed to transfer to the United States, and that Mexico had exclusive jurisdiction over the prisoner's claim that Mexican authorities miscalculated his work credits. (Federal Correctional Institution, La Tuna, Texas)

U.S. Appeals Court
RESTITUTION

Mahers v. Halford, 76 F.3d 951 (8th Cir. 1996). Corrections officials appealed a district court order that enjoined them from withholding court-ordered restitution deductions from funds inmates received from outside sources without providing individualized predeprivation hearings; the district court required the officials to repay the money that was previously deducted and the officials appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded, finding that due process was satisfied by the notice and hearing procedures provided by the Department of Corrections when engaging in the across the board policy of deducting 20 percent from all money received from outside sources. The court found that inmates are not entitled to complete control over their money while in prison and that inmates are not absolutely deprived of the benefit of their money when part of it is applied toward their restitution debts. The court noted that when an inmate leaves prison, he leaves with his restitution debts and that any payment of those debts while the inmate is incarcerated will work to his ultimate benefit. (Iowa Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
REDUCTION OF SENTENCE

Piccolo v. Lansing, 939 F.Supp. 319 (D.N.J. 1996). A prisoner filed a habeas corpus petition alleging that he was improperly denied a reduction in his sentence even though he had completed a drug treatment program. The district court denied the petition, finding that the Bureau of Prisons was entitled to determine that possession of a firearm by a felon was not a "nonviolent offense" for the purpose of eligibility for a sentence reduction. The court noted that a prisoner who completes a treatment program does not have a due process liberty interest in receiving a sentence reduction. (Federal Correctional Institution at Fort Dix, New Jersey)

U.S. District Court
REDUCTION OF SENTENCE

Sesler v. Pitzer, 926 F.Supp. 130 (D.Minn. 1996). A prisoner petitioned for habeas corpus relief alleging that the Bureau of Prisons arbitrarily and capriciously denied him a reduction in sentence following successful completion of a drug rehabilitation program. The district court denied the petition, finding that the Bureau's regulation was authorized by a sentence reduction statute and that the prisoner lacked a due process right in a reduced sentence. (Federal Medical Center, Rochester, Minnesota)

U.S. Appeals Court
EX POST FACTO
PROBATION

Taylor v. State of Rhode Island, 101 F.3d 780 (1st Cir. 1996). Probationers who were sentenced prior to the effective date of a statute which imposed a monthly civil offender fee on probationers brought an action challenging the constitutionality of the statute and Department of Corrections application of it. The district court found that the statute violated the ex post facto clause and the Department appealed. The appeals court reversed, holding that the Department's interpretation of the statute did not exceed the scope of its delegated authority, and that the statute was not punitive in intent or effect and thus did not violate the ex post facto clause. The court found that the purpose of the fee, to "reimburse" the Department for costs associated with providing goods and services to supervised probationers in the community, was not punitive and its practical effect was neither retributive nor deterrent in nature. (Rhode Island Department of Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
SENTENCE

U.S. v. Sotelo, 94 F.3d 1037 (7th Cir. 1996). An offender convicted of mailing threatening and extortionate communications appealed a sentence requirement that restricted his communications with persons outside the prison. The appeals court affirmed in part, vacated in part, and remanded, finding that the district court lacked the authority to restrict the inmate's communication but that the restrictions were modified and construed as recommendations to the Bureau of Prisons, which is authorized to restrict communications. (Indiana State Prison, and Federal Bureau of Prisons)

1997

U.S. Appeals Court
DEATH PENALTY

Austin v. Bell, 126 F.3d 843 (6th Cir. 1997). After a federal district court issued a writ of habeas corpus for an inmate who was sentenced to death, state officials appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded the case. The appeals court held that the defendant's counsel's failure to investigate and present mitigating evidence during the penalty phase of his case was ineffective assistance. The court held that the Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act (AEDPA) did not apply to the Tennessee habeas corpus petitioner absent evidence that Tennessee had complied with the statutory requirement that the state provide for the appointment and compensation of competent counsel and reasonable expenses for litigation of postconviction relief. (Tennessee)

U.S. Appeals Court
COMMUNITY SERVICE

Barry v. Bergen County Probation Dept., 128 F.3d 152 (3rd Cir. 1997). An offender who was convicted of dispensing drugs and sentenced to community service sought habeas corpus relief. The district court granted the petition and the appeals court reversed and remanded. The appeals court determined that as a matter of first impression, a community service obligation rendered the petitioner "in custody" under the habeas statute because he was subject to restraints on his liberty that were not shared by the public generally. (Bergen County Probation Department, New Jersey)

U.S. Appeals Court
REDUCTION

Cort v. Crabtree, 113 F.3d 1081 (9th Cir. 1997). Prisoners who had been convicted of unarmed robbery sought habeas corpus relief when the Federal Bureau of Prisons refused to allow a one-year sentence reduction upon completion of a substance abuse program. The district court denied the petition and the prisoners appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded, finding that the Bureau's new definition of "nonviolent offense" could not be applied retroactively to prisoners who were already in a treatment program on the date of its adoption, or to prisoners who were already found to be eligible. (Federal Correctional Institute, Sheridan, Oregon)

U.S. District Court
REDUCTION

Egan v. Hawk, 983 F.Supp. 858 (D.Minn. 1997). An inmate petitioned for habeas corpus relief challenging the denial by the Federal Bureau of Prisons (BOP) of a one-year reduction in his sentence for completing a Residential Drug Abuse Program (RDAP). The district court found invalid a section of the BOP Program Statement that stated inmates convicted of drug-related offenses who received two-level sentencing enhancements were not eligible for sentencing reductions that were available to inmates who had been convicted of nonviolent offenses. The court noted that sentencing enhancements affected the sentence only and did not transform a drug-related offense into a violent offense. The court remanded the matter to the BOP to determine eligibility because the court lacked the authority to declare the inmate automatically eligible for release. (Federal Medical Center, Federal Bureau of Prisons)

U.S. District Court
EX POST FACTO

Gardner v. Wilson, 959 F.Supp. 1224 (C.D.Cal. 1997). An inmate sued prison officials and others, challenging the constitutionality of five dollar copayments imposed on medical visits. The district court dismissed the case, finding that the copayment was not cruel and unusual punishment and did not violate equal protection. The court held that the inmate had received due process and that the law authorizing copayments was neither an ex post facto law nor a bill of attainder. The inmate was provided with due process because he was notified of the copayment policy before he initiated a medical visit, and he was provided with access to a grievance system that permitted him to challenge any erroneous charges. The court noted that assuring that inmates did not abuse their access to scarce medical services was a legitimate state purpose for requiring an inmate to pay a five dollar copayment for medical services. The inmate had requested the return of his fees because the taxpayers of California had not been provided with a rebate or the corrections department's budget had not been cut as a result of the taxpayer savings resulting from the copayment policy. The inmate also sought $1 million in damages for "stress, anxiety, suffered mentally and emotionally and in some ways, physically as well." (California State Prison-Los Angeles County)

U.S. Appeals Court
REDUCTION

Jacks v. Crabtree, 114 F.3d 983 (9th Cir. 1997). Inmates who were convicted of nonviolent offenses and who had completed a drug treatment program had applied for sentence reductions under a statute that gave the U.S. Bureau of Prisons discretion to give a one-year reduction to such inmates. The Bureau denied the applications and the inmates petitioned for writs of habeas corpus. The district court denied the petitions and the inmates appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the Bureau had the discretion to promulgate a regulation that categorically denies a sentence reduction to an inmate who had a prior conviction for a violent offense. (United States Bureau of Prisons)

U.S. District Court
REDUCTION

Johnson v. Crabtree, 996 F.Supp. 999 (D.Or. 1997). An inmate filed a habeas petition challenging the denial of a sentence reduction by the Bureau of Prisons (BOP) following his completion of a drug and alcohol treatment program. The district court granted the motion, finding that the BOP should have regarded the inmate's crime of being in possession of explosives as a "nonviolent offense" for the purposes of a sentence reduction statute. The court held that if a crime has been held "nonviolent" by the Ninth Circuit for the purposes of Sentencing Guidelines, the BOP must also consider it "nonviolent" for the purposes of the statute that authorizes the BOP to grant a sentence reduction to prisoners who successfully complete drug and alcohol treatment programs. (Federal Correctional Institution, Sheridan, Oregon)

U.S. Appeals Court
FOREIGN COUNTRIES

Kleeman v. United States Parole Com'n., 125 F.3d 725 (9th Cir. 1997). A defendant convicted of simple intentional homicide in Mexico sought to serve her sentence in the United States under the terms of a transfer treaty. Under the terms of the treaty the Parole Commission was charged with the task of translating the foreign sentence into terms appropriate to domestic penal enforcement. The United States Parole Commission set the defendant's sentence and the defendant petitioned for review. The appeals court held that the comparable United States offense was voluntary manslaughter. (United States Parole Commission)

U.S. District Court
REDUCTION

Miller v. U.S., 964 F.Supp. 15 (D.D.C. 1997). A prisoner brought a § 1983 action alleging that the Federal Bureau of Prisons violated his rights by its restrictive interpretation of a statute that permits sentence reductions for nonviolent offenders who successfully complete substance abuse treatment programs. The district court held that the crime of being a felon in possession of a firearm was not a "crime of violence" for the purposes of the statute, as it does not include as an element the use of physical force and no violence need be used in the course of committing the offense. The court found that the prisoner was entitled to be considered for a sentence reduction. (Federal Bureau of Prisons)

U.S. District Court
REDUCTION
EX POST FACTO
EQUAL PROTECTION

Paydon v. Hawk, 960 F.Supp. 867 (D.N.J. 1997). An inmate filed an application for habeas corpus alleging that the Federal Bureau of Prisons improperly denied him eligibility for a reduction in his sentence. The district court found that the Bureau's determination that the inmate was ineligible for a sentence reduction was not arbitrary, capricious or an abuse of discretion. The court found that the inmate lacked a liberty interest in a sentence reduction for the purposes of a due process analysis, and that the Bureau's decision to classify possession of a firearm by a convicted felon as a crime of violence was rationally related to the Bureau's legitimate interests. The court noted that the Violent Crime Control and Law Enforcement Act of 1994 merely conferred additional benefits to certain inmates as an incentive for participating in drug treatment and rehabilitation, and thus did not violate the ex post facto clause. (Federal Correctional Institution, Fort Dix, New Jersey)

U.S. Appeals Court
REDUCTION

Roussos v. Menifee, 122 F.3d 159 (3rd Cir. 1997). A federal prison inmate filed a habeas corpus petition challenging a Federal Bureau of Prisons ruling that he was ineligible for a sentence reduction upon his completion of a drug treatment program. The district court denied relief and the inmate appealed. The appeals court vacated and remanded, finding that a firearm enhancement under Sentencing Guidelines does not, by itself, make an inmate ineligible for a sentence reduction. According to the court, the Bureau of Prison's program statement under which the inmate was deemed to have committed a "crime of violence" was in conflict with the governing statute and implementing regulations because it categorized the inmate as ineligible due to his receipt of a two-level firearms enhancement under the Sentencing Guidelines. (United States Penitentiary, Allenwood, Pennsylvania)

U.S. Appeals Court
REDUCTION

Sesler v. Pitzer, 110 F.3d 569 (8th Cir. 1997). A prisoner petitioned for habeas corpus relief alleging that the Federal Bureau of Prisons had arbitrarily and capriciously denied a reduction in his sentence following his successful completion of a drug rehabilitation program. The district court denied the writ and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the use of a firearm during and in relation to a drug trafficking crime is not a "nonviolent offense" within the meaning of a statute allowing reduction of sentence following the completion of a treatment program. (Federal Bureau of Prisons)

U.S. District Court
REDUCTION OF SENTENCE

Sisneros v. Booker, 981 F.Supp. 1374 (D.Colo. 1997). A prisoner brought a habeas proceeding challenging the denial of his sentence reduction. The district court granted the petition, finding that the Bureau of Prisons could not adopt a rule denying a one year reduction in sentence to a prisoner who committed a nonviolent crime but whose sentence had been enhanced for the possession of unused weapons. The court equitably estopped the Bureau from denying the prisoner the one year reduction in his sentence which he had earned by completing a drug treatment program. (FCI La Tuna, Texas)

U.S. Appeals Court
REDUCTION
EX POST FACTO
DOUBLE JEOPARDY

Stiver v. Meko, 130 F.3d 574 (3rd Cir. 1997). An inmate who had been convicted of a nonviolent offense sought a sentence reduction under the Violent Crime Control and Law Enforcement Act on the ground that he had successfully completed a drug treatment program during his prison term. The federal Bureau of Prisons (BOP) denied the sentence reduction because the inmate had previous convictions for violent offenses. The district court denied the petition and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the Bureau regulation reasonably construed "convicted of a nonviolent offense," as used in the Act, to mean all convictions, and not just the conviction for which the inmate is currently incarcerated. The appeals court also held that the regulation did not violate the ex post facto clause or double jeopardy. (Federal Bureau of Prisons)

U.S. Appeals Court
REDUCTION

Venegas v. Henman, 126 F.3d 760 (5th Cir. 1997) cert. denied 118 S.Ct. 1679.. A prisoner filed for a writ of habeas corpus seeking reduction of his sentence following completion of a drug treatment program. The district court granted relief and the appeals court affirmed in part and reversed in part. The appeals court held that the Bureau of Prisons did not exceed its statutory authority to reduce sentences for nonviolent offenders who complete substance abuse treatment by excluding from the category of "nonviolent" offenders those prisoners convicted of possession of a weapon by a felon and drug possession offenses enhanced under sentencing guidelines for possession of a weapon. The court noted that the statute left to the Bureau's discretion the determination of which other offenses would be eligible for consideration. (Federal Bureau of Prisons)

U.S. District Court
CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

Williams v. Hopkins, 983 F.Supp. 891 (D.Neb. 1997). A state prisoner filed a § 1983 action against a prison warden seeking injunctive relief and monetary damages for alleged violation of his civil rights arising out of his pending execution by electrocution. The district court dismissed the action, finding that neither electrocution nor multiple applications of current violated the Eighth Amendment. (Nebraska State Penitentiary)

U.S. Appeals Court
CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

Williams v. Hopkins, 130 F.3d 333 (8th Cir. 1997). A state prisoner sentenced to death by electrocution brought a civil rights action challenging the constitutionality of electrocution in general and Nebraska's method of electrocution in particular. The district court dismissed the action as frivolous and the appeals court affirmed, finding that the action was the functional equivalent of a successive habeas action, subject to the procedural requirements of successive habeas actions. The court held that passing of more than one current of electricity into the body of a prisoner to effect his death does not support a claim of cruel and unusual punishment under the Eighth Amendment, absent any suggestion of malevolence. (Nebraska)

U.S. Appeals Court
CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

Woodard v. Ohio Adult Parole Authority, 107 F.3d 1178 (6th Cir. 1997). A convicted murderer whose death penalty had been upheld brought a civil rights action challenging Ohio clemency procedures as unconstitutional and seeking injunctive relief. The district court entered judgment against the inmate and he appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, vacated in part and remanded. The court held that the inmate did not have a protected life or liberty interest in clemency proceedings themselves, but when a state chooses to provide for clemency, the procedures used must comport with due process. The matter was remanded for determination by the district court regarding the inmate's claim that the clemency interview procedure violated his right against self-incrimination. The interview process provided for a private, uncounseled interview without a guarantee of immunity. (Ohio)

U.S. District Court
REDUCTION

Birth v. Crabtree, 996 F.Supp. 1014 (D.Or. 1998). An inmate filed a habeas petition claiming that he was improperly denied a sentence reduction by the Bureau of Prisons (BOP) following his completion of a drug and alcohol program. The district court denied the petition, finding that the BOP has the authority to promulgate program statements that deny inmates, including those with detainers lodged against them by the Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS), eligibility for drug and alcohol treatment programs if they are unable to complete the community-based phase of the treatment. The court noted that, regardless of whether they were convicted of a nonviolent offense, the BOP is not required to exempt a prisoner with an INS detainer from some of the requirements of a drug and alcohol treatment program. (Federal Correctional Institution, Sheridan, Oregon)

U.S. Appeals Court
PAROLE
EX POST FACTO

Blair-Bey v. Quick, 159 F.3d 591 (D.C.Cir. 1998). An inmate filed a habeas corpus petition challenging procedures for denying parole. The district court dismissed the petition. The appeals court affirmed in part and remanded the case for a hearing on the inmate's claim that the parole system, which was adopted after the inmate committed his crimes, amounted to an ex post facto law as applied to the inmate. The appeals court held that the inmate was entitled to a hearing so that he would have the opportunity to demonstrate that the parole board's discretion was totally or very substantially circumscribed in law or in fact, and yielded results materially harsher than those that ordinarily occurred under the prior regime. (District of Columbia Board of Parole)

U.S. District Court
PROFESSIONAL STANDARDS

Bolton v. Goord, 992 F.Supp. 604 (S.D.N.Y. 1998). Inmates brought a § 1983 suit claiming that New York's practice of housing two inmates in a prison cell previously used to house one inmate violated the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments. The district court held that double celling under the conditions set forth at trial did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment and that New York had not conferred on inmates a protected liberty interest in single-cell housing. The court held that the application of the Eighth Amendment is guided by contemporary standards of decency, but while the opinions of experts and the standards established by concerned organizations may be helpful on some questions, they do not establish constitutional minima. According to the court, public attitudes toward certain punishment, or what society is willing to tolerate in its prisons, is the more appropriate gauge of contemporary standards. The court noted that when double-celling was researched prior to its implementation, officials considered whether an inmate was violent or victim-prone before placing him in a double cell, evidence did not establish a cause and effect relationship between double-celling and an increase in violence, and guidelines for double-celling took into account medical conditions. According to the court, double-celling was in effect in most other state prison systems and in the federal system at the time it was implemented in New York. Inmates had the same access to extensive programs and services after double-celling was implemented, and there was no evidence of "overcrowding" in the sense that the facility had to compromise its services in order to handle the additional number of inmates. The court also noted that disputes between cellmates were handled quickly and never rose to more than minor incidents of physical violence, the small cell size was not shown to have resulted in the deprivation of any basic human need, and there was no indication that natural ventilation was so inadequate as to cause injury. According to the court, the Eighth Amendment does not guarantee inmates a certain type of ventilation or a certain rate of air exchange. (Woodburne Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
REDUCTION

Byrd v. Hasty, 142 F.3d 1395 (11th Cir. 1998). An inmate sought habeas corpus relief after the federal Bureau of Prisons (BOP) denied him a sentence reduction based on his completion of a drug treatment program. The district court denied relief and the inmate appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded, finding that the BOP could not rely on the inmate's firearm sentence enhancement to deny his application for a sentence reduction. The appeals court held that the BOP exceeded its authority when it categorically excluded from eligibility those inmates who were convicted of nonviolent offenses who received sentencing enhancements for possession of a firearm. (Federal Prison Camp at Pensacola, Florida)

U.S. District Court
LIBERTY INTEREST

Carter v. McCaleb, 29 F.Supp.2d 423 (W.D.Mich. 1998). A former inmate brought a § 1983 action against corrections officials and a county. The district court held that the inmate, who received a sentence that authorized him to participate in work release, did not have a liberty interest to participate in the work release program that would implicate procedural or substantive due process when the county failed to process him for work release. Although the sentencing judge indicated that he wanted the inmate to "work or seek work" the judge also cautioned the inmate "that you may be on work release, that's simply an okay that you may be put on that status. It's a sheriff's work release program. It belongs to the sheriff, not the court system. I have nothing to do with it." (Calhoun County, Mich.)

U.S. District Court
PROBATION VIOLATION

Duffy v. County of Bucks, 7 F.Supp.2d 569 (E.D.Pa. 1998). An individual who had been arrested and detained over a weekend brought a § 1983 action against the probation officer who had sought the warrant under which he was arrested, and various county officials. The district court held that the arrest and detention of the probationer pursuant to a facially valid warrant did not violate his substantive due process rights, even though the individual had informed officials that the warrant was actually for a different person who had the same name. The court found that the officials did not have a duty to take every step to eliminate the possibility that they were holding an innocent person, and that they had no authority to ignore a bench warrant. The court also held that the individual's detention over a weekend did not violate his procedural due process rights.

The court found that although the probationer failed to allege that strip searches to which he was subjected had been performed pursuant to a pattern or practice, his allegations regarding strip searches were sufficient to state a due process claim against officers of the facility. The individual was subjected to strip searches at least once daily for no apparent reason, even though he had no access to contraband or visitors.

The court held that the probation officer was not entitled to qualified immunity because a reasonable probation officer could not have believed that his actions did not violate the individual's substantive due process rights. (Bucks County, Pennsylvania)

U.S. Appeals Court
CLEMENCY
CAPITAL PUNISHMENT
EQUAL PROTECTION

Duvall v. Keating, 162 F.3d 1058 (10th Cir. 1998). A state death row prisoner brought a § 1983 action against a governor and warden, alleging that the state's clemency procedures violated his due process rights. The prisoner sought injunctive relief. The district court denied the prisoner's request for a temporary restraining order and preliminary injunction and granted judgment in favor of the defendants. The prisoner appealed and moved for a stay pending appeal. The appeals court denied the motion for stay and affirmed the district court's decision. The appeals court found that minimal application of the due process clause is only needed to ensure that a death row prisoner receives the clemency procedures set forth by state law and that the clemency decision is not "wholly arbitrary, capricious or based on whim," because clemency proceedings involve acts of mercy that are not constitutionally required. The prisoner had asserted that the governor's statements, that he would not grant clemency for murderers, deprived him of due process, but the appeals court held that due process was not denied, where the governor's discretion was never invoked because the Pardon and Parole Board did not forward any recommendation for clemency to the governor. The court noted that there was no evidence that the Board did not conduct an impartial investigation and study of the prisoner's application for clemency, or utilize procedures that were arbitrary, capricious or whimsical. (Oklahoma State Penitentiary)

U.S. Appeals Court
REDUCTION OF SENTENCE
EX POST FACTO
LIBERTY INTEREST

Fristoe v. Thompson, 144 F.3d 627 (10th Cir. 1998). A prisoner who was denied a sentence reduction petitioned for a writ of habeas corpus. The district court denied the petition, but the appeals court reversed and remanded. The appeals court held that the federal Bureau of Prisons (BOP) violated the statute authorizing early release by considering sentencing factors when it determined whether a prisoner was convicted of a crime of violence. According to the court, the plain language of the statute referred directly to the offense for which the prisoner was convicted. The appeals court held that the BOP did not violate the ex post facto clause when it denied early release. (Federal Bureau of Prisons, Oklahoma)

U.S. Appeals Court
PRE-SENTENCE REPORT

Hili v. Sciarrotta, 140 F.3d 210 (2nd Cir. 1998). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against employees of a probation department alleging that they submitted an inaccurate presentence report in connection with his conviction. The district court dismissed the case and the appeals court affirmed, finding that under New York law the employees were entitled to absolute immunity from suits for damages in connection with their preparation and submission of presentence reports. (Department of Probation, Nassau County, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
REDUCTION
PAROLE

James v. U.S. Parole Com'n, 159 F.3d 1200 (9th Cir. 1998). A prisoner who was convicted of a drug offense in a Mexican court, but was transferred to the United States under a prisoner exchange treaty appealed the decision of the United States Parole Commission which calculated his release date. The appeals court affirmed the Commission's calculation, finding that the prisoner was not entitled to a sentence reduction for acceptance of responsibility in view of the prisoner's "stonewalling" behavior, including affirmative denials of her guilt. The court also held that the Commission's alleged failure to follow its internal guidelines did not result in a denial of due process. The court noted that the guideline was not intended to have the force of law, but was instead used only as an interpretive, procedural rule to guide Commission practice. The guideline required the hearing examiner to warn the prisoner that if the prisoner continued to contest the conduct which was necessarily the basis of the foreign conviction, she would not qualify for the acceptance of responsibility adjustment. (United States Parole Commission)

U.S. District Court
CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

Jones v. McAndrew, 996 F.Supp. 1439 (N.D.Fla. 1998). Four inmates who were sentenced to death brought an § 1983 action against corrections officials seeking injunctive relief with respect to electrocution procedures. The district court granted summary judgment to the officials. According to the court, under the Farmer standard the duty to avoid inflicting serious injury at the hands of the executioner was at least as great as the duty to avoid infliction of harm by fellow inmates. The inmates alleged that there was a risk of fire about the head of the person being executed, as occurred with a previous execution. The court found that the officials were not deliberately indifferent because after the execution during which fire broke out, the officials hired experts to analyze the problem and recommend solutions, took the experts' advice in changing the procedures, and obtained a favorable ruling from a state supreme court on the new procedures. (Florida State Prison)

U.S. Appeals Court
REDUCTION

Love v. Tippy, 133 F.3d 1066 (8th Cir. 1998). An inmate who was serving sentences for conspiring to distribute cocaine and carrying a firearm during a drug trafficking offense applied for a one-year reduction of his sentence following his successful completion of a drug treatment program. The Federal Bureau of Prisons (BOP) denied the reduction, finding that the inmate's firearm conviction was not a "nonviolent offense." The inmate petitioned for a writ of habeas corpus, which was denied by the district court. The appeals court affirmed. (FCI-Waseca, Minnesota)

U.S. Appeals Court
REDUCTION

Martin v. Gerlinski, 133 F.3d 1076 (8th Cir. 1998). Federal prisoners convicted of various drug offenses petitioned for writs of habeas corpus challenging determinations by the Federal Bureau of Prisons (BOP) that they were ineligible for early release because their offenses involved possessing dangerous weapons. The district courts denied relief but the appeals court reversed and remanded with instructions. The appeals court held that the BOP's authority to define eligibility for early release was reviewable and that the Bureau's policy of considering sentencing factors in determining whether a prisoner's offense was "nonviolent" was contrary to the early release statute. The court noted that the statute referred to prisoners "convicted" of nonviolent offenses and did not address sentencing or sentence enhancement factors. (Federal Bureau of Prisons Facilities in South Dakota and Minnesota)

U.S. Appeals Court
FINES

Montano-Figueroa v. Crabtree, 162 F.3d 548 (9th Cir. 1998). A federal prisoner petitioned for a writ of habeas corpus alleging that the Inmate Financial Responsibility Program (IFRP) impermissibly intruded upon the sentencing court's responsibility to determine the amount and timing of fine payments. The district court denied the petition and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the IFRP, which allowed a prison to withhold a prisoner's wages for payment of a court-ordered fine, was not an improper intrusion upon a court's statutory sentencing authority, and that the IFRP was neither a usurpation of a sentencing court's Article III powers nor a violation of the separation of powers doctrine. (Federal Correctional Institute-Sheridan, Oregon)

U.S. Supreme Court
CAPITAL PUNISHMENT
CLEMENCY

Ohio Adult Parole Authority v. Woodard, 118 S.Ct. 1244 (1998). A state prisoner under sentence of death filed a § 1983 action alleging that Ohio's clemency process violated his Fourteenth Amendment right to remain silent. The district court granted judgment to the state but the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed in part and reversed in part. The United States Supreme Court held that Ohio's clemency procedures do not violate due process and that Ohio's voluntary clemency interview does not violate the Fifth Amendment privilege against compelled self-incrimination. (State of Ohio)

U.S. Appeals Court
REDUCTION

Orr v. Hawk, 156 F.3d 651 (6th Cir. 1998). A federal prisoner convicted of possession of a firearm by a previously convicted felon, and various drug charges, petitioned for a writ of habeas corpus seeking a reduction in his sentenced based on his completion of a drug treatment program. The district court dismissed the petition. The appeals court reversed and remanded, finding that an amendment to the Bureau of Prisons (BOP) regulation governing sentence reductions was applicable, even though it was not enacted until after the prisoner sought a reduction. The court found that the regulation was entitled to no greater deference than the BOP's internal interpretive rules, and that the felon-in-possession offense was a "nonviolent offense." (Federal Prison Camp, Millington, Tennessee)

U.S. Appeals Court
REDUCTION

Parsons v. Pitzer, 149 F.3d 734 (7th Cir. 1998). A federal inmate petitioned for a writ of habeas corpus challenging a federal Bureau of Prisons (BOP) determination that he was not eligible for early release after he completed a drug treatment program. The district court denied the petition and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that possession of a firearm by a convicted felon was a "crime of violence" that rendered the inmate ineligible for early release. (Federal Correctional Institute, Oxford, Wisconsin)

U.S. Appeals Court
PAROLE-REVOCATION
PAROLE-CONDITIONS

Robles v. U.S., 146 F.3d 1098 (9th Cir. 1998). An inmate petitioned for a writ of habeas corpus, challenging the authority of the U.S. Parole Commission to impose a second term of special parole after it revoked the original special parole. The district court denied the petition, but the appeals court reversed and remanded with instructions. The appeals court held that the Parole Commission is not authorized to impose a second term of special parole, but is confined to the imposition of ordinary parole. (U.S. Parole Commission)

U.S. Appeals Court
REDUCTION

Royal v. Tombone, 141 F.3d 596 (5th Cir. 1998). An inmate petitioned for habeas corpus relief when he was found to be ineligible for a sentence reduction following his completion of a drug abuse treatment program. The district court denied the petition and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the federal Bureau of Prison's program statement, that considered bank robbery as a crime of violence, was a permissible interpretation of a federal statute that authorized sentence reductions. (Federal Correctional Institution, Seagoville, Texas)

U.S. Appeals Court
EX POST FACTO

Shaffer v. Saffle, 148 F.3d 1180 (10th Cir. 1998). A state prisoner brought a pro se § 1983 action challenging the constitutionality of a state statute that required him to provide a deoxyribonucleic acid (DNA) sample for the compilation of a DNA Offender Database. The district court dismissed the action and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the prisoner's rights against unreasonable searches and seizures and self-incrimination had not been violated. The appeals court also held that the prisoner's rights under the Free Exercise Clause and the Ex Post Facto clause had not been violated. The court noted that the statute was neutral and generally applicable, and was not applied to him differently because of his religious belief. The court also noted that the legislature expressed its intent that the statute apply retroactively. (Mack Alford Center, Oklahoma)

U.S. Appeals Court
CONDITIONS

U.S. v. Felipe, 148 F.3d 101 (2nd Cir. 1998). A defendant who pleaded guilty in federal court to conspiracy and firearms offenses, and a codefendant, asked the district court to modify restrictions on their communications with persons outside of prison. The district court affirmed the restrictions, finding that prison officials had reasonable cause to intercept the prisoner's correspondence, given their knowledge that the prisoner was a leader of a suspect organization, had violated prison regulations relating to mail, was actively recruiting new members, and had written about the commission of illegal acts. The appeals court held that a Postal Service regulation that indicated that the Service was usually the only agency that was legally permitted to maintain postal cover did not apply to the prison officials' interception of the prisoner's outgoing mail, given the exception for correctional facilities. The appeals court found that the portion of the prisoner's sentence that restricted communications with all persons except counsel and close family members did not exceed the court's authority to limit the associational rights of defendants convicted of racketeering offenses because the conditions were reasonably formulated to prevent the defendant from continuing his illegal activities while incarcerated. The defendant had previously ordered at least six murders while in prison, resulting in several deaths and injuries to the targets and bystanders. (Collins Correctional Facility and Attica Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
CREDIT

U.S. v. Mahmood, 19 F.Supp.2d 33 (E.D.N.Y. 1998). A prisoner challenged the federal Bureau of Prisons' (BOP) computation of credit for time served during his pretrial confinement on state and federal charges. The district court held that the prisoner was not entitled to credit on his federal sentence for his pretrial confinement because that time had been fully credited toward his state sentence. (United States Bureau of Prisons)

U.S. District Court
SUPERVISED RELEASE

U.S. v. Sanchez, 30 F.Supp.2d 595 (E.D.N.Y. 1998). A defendant was charged with violation of his conditions of supervised released, citing a violation that had occurred four years earlier. The defendant asked the court to dismiss the summons because it violated his due process rights. The district court denied the defendant's motion, finding that a four-year delay between the violation of conditions and the summons did not violate due process. The court noted that revocation of supervised release entails the loss of liberty worthy of some due process protection. (Department of Probation, District of New Jersey)

U.S. Appeals Court
PAROLE TRANSFER

Verner v. U.S. Parole Com'n, 150 F.3d 1172 (10th Cir. 1998). A Canadian offender who was transferred to the United States pursuant to the Treaty Between the United States and Canada on the Execution of Penal Sentences appealed a decision of the United States Parole Commission sentencing him to life imprisonment with no opportunity for parole. The appeals court affirmed the Commission's sentence, finding that the translation of the Canadian sentence of parolable life imprisonment to nonparolable life did not violate the treaty nor the statute governing transfer of offenders serving a sentence of imprisonment. (U.S. Parole Commission)

U.S. Appeals Court
REDUCTION OF SENTENCE

Wottlin v. Fleming, 136 F.3d 1032 (5th Cir. 1998). An inmate who had completed a substance abuse program petitioned for habeas relief, challenging Federal Bureau of Prisons (BOP) regulations making him ineligible for early release. The district court dismissed the petition, the inmate appealed, and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the BOP regulation that excludes inmates who have a prior conviction for homicide, forcible rape, robbery, or aggravated assault from eligibility for early release following completion of a substance abuse treatment program was a reasonable interpretation of the Violent Crime Control and Enforcement Act of 1994. The court noted that the BOP Program Statement regarding substance abuse treatment programs did not mandate early release and inmates who completed the program did not have a due-process liberty interest in early release. (Federal Correctional Institution, Bastrop, Texas)

1999

U.S. District Court
RESTITUTION

Alevras v. Snyder, 49 F.Supp.2d 1112 (E.D.Ark. 1999). A prisoner petitioned for habeas corpus relief challenging the legality of the federal Bureau of Prisons (BOP) Inmate Financial Responsibility Program (IFRP). The district court held that IFRP did not violate a statutory subsection governing the time and method of payment of fines or Article III. The court noted that the sentencing court ordered restitution to be paid in installments, which allowed the prison to withhold wages to pay court-ordered restitution. The district court reviewed conflicting appeals court decisions regarding this issue and concluded that requiring participation in IFRP was appropriate. (Federal Correctional Institution in Forrest City, Arkansas)

U.S. Appeals Court
SENTENCE REDUCTION

Bellis v. Davis, 186 F.3d 1092 (8th Cir. 1999). Ten federal prisoners petitioned for writs of habeas corpus, challenging the policy of the Bureau of Prisons (BOP) under which they were ineligible for an early-release incentive by voluntary participation in resident drug abuse treatment programs. The district court granted the petitions, but the appeals court reversed and remanded. The appeals court held that the BOP acted within its authority by adopting regulations under which inmates who were convicted of being a felon in possession of a firearm, or had received an enhancement under Sentencing Guidelines for possession of a dangerous weapon during the commission of a federal drug offense, were ineligible for the early-release incentive. (Federal Prison Camp, Yankton, South Dakota)

U.S. District Court
CREDIT

Drummer v. Luttrell, 75 F.Supp.2d 796 (W.D.Tenn. 1999). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against corrections officials alleging that a disciplinary action violated her due process and Eighth Amendment rights. The court found that the inmate did not have a constitutional right to receive sentence credits nor to parole or early release, upholding the disciplinary decision to deprive the inmate of sentence credits. (Shelby County Correctional Center, Tennessee)

U.S. District Court
CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

Faulder v. Johnson, 99 F.Supp.2d 774 (S.D.Tex. 1999). A prisoner filed a § 1983 action alleging that he had been subjected to psychological torture as the result of repeated stays of his execution and that his right to consult with consular officials had been violated. The district court held that the prisoner's twenty-two year wait on death row did not violate the Eighth Amendment. (Texas Department of Criminal Justice, Institutional Division)

U.S. District Court
MINIMUM PRE-SENTENCE REPORT

Goldberg v. Beeler, 82 F.Supp.2d 302 (D.N.J. 1999). A prisoner filed a habeas corpus petition challenging the calculation of his minimum length of sentence. The district court denied the petition finding that even if the prisoner's pre-sentence report contained inaccuracies, the Parole Commission is required to consider the report when making parole determinations. (Federal Correctional Institution, Fort Dix, New Jersey)

U.S. District Court
CREDIT

Harris v. City of New York, 44 F.Supp.2d 510 (S.D.N.Y. 1999). A paroled state prison inmate sued city and state officials alleging that they failed to properly credit time served, resulting in an unconstitutional delay in his eligibility for parole. The district court dismissed the case, holding that the inmate was not entitled to credit for time served awaiting sentencing on a previous, unrelated charge. (New York Department of Correctional Services, New York City Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
PRESENTENCE REPORT

Hill v. Goord, 63 F.Supp.2d 254 (E.D.N.Y. 1999). An inmate sued various state and county officers and agencies under § 1983 alleging that they failed to amend an incorrect statement in a pre-sentence report that was contained in his prison records, resulting in the wrongful denial of hisrequest to be released on parole supervision. The district court dismissed the action, finding that under the "Heck rule," a prisoner must establish that his conviction or sentenced has been overturned or invalidated by an administrative board, a state court or a federal habeas proceeding as a prerequisite to maintaining a § 1983 action. (N.Y. Dept. of Corr'l Services, Co. of Suffolk, NY)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEX OFFENDER

Kirby v. Siegelman, 195 F.3d 1285 (11th Cir. 1999). In separate cases, state prisoners challenged the application of a sex offender community notification statute to them in § 1983 actions. The cases were dismissed by the district court and were consolidated on appeal. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part and remanded in part. The appeals court held that one prisoner, who had not been convicted of a sex crime, was entitled to due process before being classified as a sex offender because of the stigmatizing effect of being classified as a sex offender. The prisoner was classified based on prior sex-related charges rather than a conviction. (Alabama's Community Notification Statute)

U.S. Appeals Court
REDUCTION OF SENTENCE

MacFarlane v. Walter, 179 F.3d 1131 (9th Cir. 1999). After their state habeas petitions were denied, state prisoners petitioned for federal habeas corpus relief, challenging two counties' "good conduct" and "good performance" policies as they were applied to them. The district court granted summary judgment for the respondent corrections officials, but the appeals court reversed and remanded. The appeals court held that there was an equal protection violation in the counties' allowance of lesser good time credits for defendants who were detained pretrial in county jails because of their financial inability to post bail, than that allowed for defendants who were able to wait to serve their sentences until after sentencing to a state correctional facility. The counties' early release policies limited presentence detainees to a maximum good-conduct credit of 15% of the sentence imposed; the court noted that persons who had posted bail and served their entire sentence at a state correctional facility could end up serving 23 days less on a five- to six-year sentence. The court upheld the policies under which pretrial detainees were not eligible for participation in work and other programs through which they could earn good-performance credit, finding the counties had established a strong rational connection between the legislative means and purpose of protecting community safety. (Pierce and Clark County Jails, Washington)

U.S. Appeals Court
FINES

McGhee v. Clark, 166 F.3d 884 (7th Cir. 1999). A federal prisoner sought an injunction against the Bureau of Prisons (BOP) to prevent the collection of further sums from him in payment of his fine and special assessment. His petition was denied by the district court and the appeals court affirmed. The prisoner had been fined $5,000 and a special assessment of $50 had been imposed by the sentencing court, all due "in full immediately." The appeals court held that the sentencing court was not required to establish a schedule of installment payments, and the sentencing court did not impermissibly delegate to the BOP the timing of payment of the fine by ordering immediate payment. The appeals court held that the use of the BOP's Inmate Financial Responsibility Program (IFRP) to schedule payment was proper. The court found that IFRP regulations permitted the BOP to accelerate the prisoner's payment of his fine and to count as available resources funds that the prisoner obtained from outside sources. (U.S. Penitentiary, Terre Haute, Indiana)

U.S. Appeals Court
REDUCTION

McLean v. Crabtree, 173 F.3d 1176 (9th Cir. 1999). Federal prisoners filed petitions for habeas corpus challenging the federal Bureau of Prisons denial of their requests for early release. The district court denied the petitions and the appeals court affirmed. The court upheld the Bureau's rule that excluded prisoners with detainers from sentence reduction eligibility under a substance abuse treatment statute, and the Bureau's conditioning of sentence reduction on the completion of a community-based treatment program. The appeals court found that the Bureau's detainer policy did not violate equal protection by allegedly operating to the peculiar disadvantage of aliens. (Federal Correctional Institute, Sheridan, Oregon)

U.S. Appeals Court
CLEMENCY
CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

Moody v. Rodriguez, 164 F.3d 893 (5th Cir. 1999). After unsuccessful state and federal habeas challenges and after being denied clemency by the Board of Pardons and Paroles, an inmate filed a § 1983 action three hours before his scheduled execution. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants, finding that "the Texas clemency procedure provides the minimal procedural safeguards required by federal law." The appeals court affirmed and denied a motion to stay the execution, holding that it lacked jurisdiction to consider the inmate's § 1983 action, the only purpose of which was to delay his imminent execution. (Texas Board of Pardons and Paroles)

U.S. District Court
RESTITUTION

Phillips v. Booker, 76 F.Supp.2d 1183 (D.Kan. 1999). A prisoner filed a habeas corpus petition challenging the execution of his sentence because the Bureau of Prisons had delegated payments of court-ordered restitution through the Inmate Financial Responsibility Program (IFRP). The court denied the petition, finding that even though restitution was ordered to be paid immediately by the court it did not become void because it could not be paid in full immediately. The court found that the federal prisoner did not possess a liberty or property interest in his Federal Prison Industries job assignment and therefore he could be presented with the choice of assigning one-half of his pay to satisfy his restitution obligation or losing his job, without any violation of his due process rights. (United States Penitentiary, Leavenworth, Kansas)

U.S. District Court
EQUAL PROTECTION
SEX OFFENDER

Prevard v. Fauver, 47 F.Supp.2d 539 (D.N.J. 1999). Inmates serving indeterminate sentences under a former New Jersey sex offender statute sued the state alleging that denial of work and commutation credits available to defendants under a new criminal code was unconstitutional. The district court held that the denial of credits did not violate due process, equal protection, or prohibitions against ex post facto laws and cruel and unusual punishment. The court held that offenders serving indeterminate sentences under a former sex offender law were not similarly situated to persons serving determinate sentences under a new criminal code. The court noted that even if the state's denial of work and commutation credits to persons convicted of sex offenses affected a liberty interest, the state had a rational basis, consistent with due process, for denying the credits. (Adult Diagnostic and Treatment Center, New Jersey)

U.S. District Court
GOOD-TIME

Resnick v. Adams, 37 F.Supp.2d 1154 (C.D.Cal. 1999). A presentence detainee filed a habeas corpus petition alleging that 27 days of good time credit were unlawfully taken from him as a sanction for violating a prison regulation. He petitioned to have the 27 days restored. The district court dismissed the petition, finding that denial of good time credit as a sanction for violating a prison regulation during a detainee's presentence incarceration was not prohibited, if the sanction is not excessive in light of the seriousness of the violation. While detained in a federal detention center a routine drug screening had detected morphine in the detainee's urine. (Federal Detention Center at Dublin, California, and United States Penitentiary at Lompoc, California)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEX OFFENDERS
EX POST FACTO

Roe v. Marcotte, 193 F.3d 72 (2nd Cir. 1999). Inmates challenged a statute requiring convicted sex offenders who were incarcerated as of the statute's effective date to submit a blood sample for analysis and inclusion in a DNA data bank. The district court dismissed the case and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the statute did not violate the Fourth Amendment's prohibition against unreasonable searches and did not violate the equal protection clause. (Connecticut Department of Correction)

U.S. Appeals Court
CAPITAL PUNISHMENT
EQUAL PROTECTION

Sheppard v. Early, 168 F.3d 689 (4th Cir. 1999). A state inmate convicted of capital murder brought a § 1983 action challenging a state statute that prescribes the time for setting an execution. The district court dismissed the case and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that a Virginia statute that required the state to set an execution date approximately 60 to 70 days after receiving written notice that a federal court of appeals had denied habeas corpus relief, did not violate equal protection by limiting an inmate's time to file a petition for certiorari with the United States Supreme Court. The court found that the statute was rationally related to a legitimate state interest in the finality of its criminal judgments and in executing sentence on those who are determined by state law to be the most serious offenders. (Commonwealth of Virginia)

U.S. Supreme Court
CAPITAL PUNISH.

Stewart v. LaGrand, 119 S.Ct. 1018 (1999). An inmate who was sentenced to death petitioned for a writ of habeas corpus challenging the use of lethal gas as a cruel and unusual form of execution. The district court denied the petition but the appeals court granted a certificate of appealability and enjoined the state from executing the prisoner by means of lethal gas. The United States Supreme Court reversed the appeals court decision and vacated the injunction. The Court held that the inmate had waived his claim that execution by lethal gas violated the Eighth Amendment by choosing to be executed with lethal gas rather than by lethal injection. (Arizona)

U.S. Appeals Court
RESTITUTION

U.S. v. Ballek, 170 F.3d 871 (9th Cir. 1999). A defendant was convicted in federal court of willfully failing to pay child support in violation of the Child Support Recovery Act (CSRA) and he appealed. The appeals court affirmed the conviction, holding that a willfulness finding could be based on the defendant's failure to seek available employment which would have earned him enough money to meet his child support obligations. The court held that CSRA did not violate the constitutional prohibition against slavery, noting that not all forced employment is constitutionally prohibited. The offender had been sentenced to six months imprisonment and ordered to pay $56,916 in past due child support and restitution. (U.S. District Court, Alaska)

U.S. District Court FINE
RELEASE

Zakiya v. Reno, 52 F.Supp.2d 629 (E.D.Va. 1999). An inmate petitioned for habeas corpus relief and his petition was granted by the district court. The court ruled that the inmate, who refused to agree to pay a fine, could not be held longer than his judicially imposed sentence. The court noted that the executive branch may cut a sentence short, but altering the actual terms of the sentence and imposing a sentence in the first place are solely judicial acts. The court held that a statute that prohibited the release of a prisoner on supervision if he or she does not agree to pay an imposed fine authorizes the Bureau of Prison to deny good time credits, but does not authorize continued incarceration once the prisoner has served the entire sentence. (Federal Correctional Institution at Morgantown, West Virginia)

2000

U.S. Appeals Court
EX POST FACTO
SEX OFFENDER

Burr v. Snider, 234 F.3d 1052 (8th Cir. 2000). After his conviction for violating North Dakota's sex offender registration statute was affirmed, an offender petitioned for habeas corpus relief in federal district court. The court denied the petition and the offender appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that North Dakota's sex offender registration statute did not violate the constitutional prohibition against ex post facto punishment. The offender had moved to a new address without notifying police, in violation of the statute. (North Dakota)

U.S. Appeals Court
REDUCTION

Cook v. Wiley, 208 F.3d 1314 (11th Cir. 2000). An inmate challenged a federal Bureau of Prison (BOP) decision to deny him a sentence reduction for having completed a program because he had been convicted of being a felon in possession of a firearm. The district court dismissed the action and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the BOP reasonably interpreted the statute allowing the sentence reduction. (Fed. Prison Camp, Talladega, Alabama)

U.S. Appeals Court
RESTITUTION
PAROLE

Hutchings v. U.S. Parole Com'n, 201 F.3d 1006 (8th Cir. 2000). A prisoner petitioned for habeas corpus relief challenging the revocation of his parole for failure to pay restitution. The district court denied the petition and the appeals court affirmed. The prisoner had been paroled three times and each time his parole was revoked by the U.S. Parole Commission for failure to pay his court-ordered restitution. (United States Parole Commission)

U.S. Appeals Court
PROBATION-
REVOCATION

Jones v. Johnson, 230 F.3d 825 (5th Cir. 2000). A prisoner's petition for habeas corpus relief was denied by the district court and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that a two year delay in filing a probation-revocation charge against the probationer based on his driving while intoxicated (DWI) arrest did not violate due process, where the first seven months of the delay was attributable to the probationer's misrepresentations regarding the existence of his DWI arrest. (Texas Department of Criminal Justice)

U.S. Appeals Court
EX POST FACTO
PAROLE

Metheny v. Hammonds, 216 F.3d 1307 (11th Cir. 2000). Four Georgia state prisoners who were convicted as recidivists brought a § 1983 action challenging the retroactive application of a recidivist statute by the Georgia Board of Pardons and Paroles. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the prisoners. The appeals court vacated and remanded, finding that retroactive application of the statute did not violate the Ex Post Facto Clause or the due process clause. The statute required the Board to consider recidivists convicted of a fourth felony to be ineligible for parole. (Georgia Board of Pardons and Paroles)

U.S. Appeals Court
CLEMENCY

Roll v. Carnahan, 225 F.3d 1016 (8th Cir. 2000). State death row inmates brought a pro se civil rights lawsuit seeking to enjoin their executions. The federal district court dismissed the action and the inmates appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that neither the state governor's current candidacy for the United States Senate nor the state's failure to establish a board of inquiry denied the inmates due process or equal protection with respect to clemency proceedings. The inmates had noted that one of the campaign issues was the granting of clemency petitions. The court noted that the decision to grant or deny clemency is left to the discretion of the governor under Missouri law. (Missouri State Department of Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
SUPERVISED RELEASE
REVOCATION
EX POST FACTO

U.S. v. Bermudez-Plaza, 221 F.3d 231 (1st Cir. 2000). A district court revoked the original term of supervised release for a defendant after a probation officer notified the court of the defendant's alleged violations of supervised release conditions. The court ordered the defendant to serve nine months of imprisonment and another year of supervised release. The defendant appealed and the appeals court affirmed, finding that the imposition of a prison term and a new term of supervised release did not violate the Ex Post Facto Clause. (U.S. District Court, District of Puerto Rico)

U.S. Appeals Court
CAPITAL
PUNISHMENT

U.S. v. Hammer, 226 F.3d 229 (3rd Cir. 2000). After an appeal was initiated on behalf of an offender who had been sentenced to death, the offender attempted to stop the appeal. The appeals court dismissed the appeal, ruling that the Federal Death Penalty Act did not preclude an offender from waiving the right to appeal the death sentence and that the determination that the offender could waive the right to appeal did not violate the Eighth Amendment. (United States Penitentiary, Allenwood, Pennsylvania)

U.S. Appeals Court
GUIDELINES
SENTENCE

U.S. v. Serafini, 233 F.3d 758 (3rd Cir. 2000). A state legislator who was convicted in federal district court of perjury appealed his conviction and sentence. The appeals court held that the district court's recommendation that the defendant's term of imprisonment be served in community confinement was not a final, reviewable order because a federal district court has no power to dictate or impose any place of confinement for the imprisonment portion of a defendant's sentence. (U.S. District Court, Middle District, Pennsylvania)

U.S. Appeals Court
REDUCTION

Warren v. Miles, 230 F.3d 688 (5th Cir. 2000). An offender convicted for drug charges petitioned for habeas corpus relief and was denied by the district court. The appeals court affirmed, finding that a revised federal Bureau of Prisons program statement that prohibits inmates convicted of drug-related conspiracy from receiving early release based on the completion of a drug abuse program if they were serving enhanced sentences for a possession of a weapon, did not violate the Ex Post Facto clause. The appeals court also held that the Bureau did not abuse its discretion by relying on the prisoner's sentence enhancement to categorically deny him consideration for early release. (Federal Correctional Institute at Bastrop, Texas)

U.S. Appeals Court
CLEMENCY
CAPITAL
PUNISHMENT

Young v. Hayes, 218 F.3d 850 (8th Cir. 2000). A prisoner under the sentence of death filed a habeas corpus petition alleging that the actions of a district attorney who threatened to fire an attorney under her supervision if she provided information to the Governor in connection with a clemency petition the prisoner wished to file, violated his due process rights. The district court granted summary judgment to the defendant but the appeals court reversed and remanded, granting a stay of execution. The appeals court held that the Due Process Clause does not require that a state have a clemency procedure, but does require that if such a procedure is created the state's own officials, must refrain from frustrating it by threatening the job of a witness. (Potosi Corr. Center, Missouri)

2001

U.S. Appeals Court
EXPIRATION

Diaz v. Kinkela, 253 F.3d 241 (6th Cir. 2001). A prisoner applied for habeas corpus relief, challenging his incarceration for the "bad time" portion of his sentence. The district court dismissed the application and the appeals court affirmed, finding that the application was moot because the prisoner had been released, and that the prisoner was not entitled to a sentence reduction. The prisoner's sentence had been extended in response to his bad behavior while confined, under the provisions of a state statute that was subsequently found to be unconstitutional. (Southern Ohio Correctional Facility)

U.S. Appeals Court
CLEMENCY

Gilreath v. State Bd. of Pardons and Paroles, 273 F.3d 932 (11th Cir. 2001). A capital murder defendant moved for a preliminary injunction seeking to stay his execution. The district court denied the motion, finding that the clemency proceeding in which the defendant had unsuccessfully sought relief did not result in the violation of his due process rights, even though two members of the clemency board were knowingly under investigation by the state attorney general's office, and one member of the board was absent from the meeting of the board at which people spoke on behalf of clemency. (Georgia Board of Pardons and Parole)

U.S. Appeals Court
EX POST FACTO
FINES

Myrie v. Commissioner, N.J. Dept. of Corrections, 267 F.3d 251 (3rd Cir. 2001). Prison inmates challenged the application of a New Jersey statute that required them to pay a ten percent surcharge on their purchases from a prison or jail commissary, in order to fund compensation of crime victims, alleging violations of their Double Jeopardy, Ex Post Facto, and Bill of Attainder rights. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants and the inmates appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the surcharge was not so punitive in purpose or effect that it could be viewed as a "punishment" in violation of the inmates' rights. The court held that the surcharge was not an excessive fine and that it did not offend constitutional due process guarantees. The court noted that purchases outside the prison context would otherwise have been subject to a 6% sales tax. (New Jersey)

U.S. District Court
CREDIT

Russo v. Johnson, 129 F.Supp.2d 1012 (S.D.Tex. 2001). A state prisoner petitioned for habeas corpus relief and the district court denied the petition. The court found that absent a state statute, the prisoner had no federal constitutional right to credit for time spent in out-of-state custody while he was an absconder from the state's criminal justice system. (Texas Department of Criminal Justice, Institutional Division)

U.S. Supreme Court
SEX OFFENDER

Seling v. Young, 121 S.Ct. 727 (2001). An inmate who was being held under a state sexually violent predator statute petitioned for a writ of habeas corpus challenging the constitutionality of the law. The case eventually reached the United States Supreme Court, which held that the state supreme court's prior determination that the statute was civil rather than criminal precluded the inmate's double jeopardy and ex post facto challenge based on conditions of confinement.

According to the Court, there is no federal constitutional bar to civil confinement of sexually violent predators with untreatable mental conditions, since the state has an interest in protecting the public from dangerous individuals with both treatable and untreatable conditions. (Community Protection Act of 1990, State of Washington)

U.S. Supreme Court
PROBATION-CONDITIONS

United States v. Knights, 121 S.Ct. 1955 (2001). A sheriff's deputy, acting with reasonable suspicion, searched a probationer's apartment and found evidence later used to indict him for conspiracy to commit arson, for possession of an unregistered destructive device, and for being a felon in possession of ammunition. A federal appeals court ruled that the evidence gathered in this manner had to be suppressed, even with reasonable suspicion, because the search was for an investigatory rather than probationary purpose. The U.S. Supreme Court unanimously reversed the appeals court, finding that a warrantless search in this case, supported by reasonable suspicion and authorized by a probation condition, satisfied the Fourth Amendment. According to the Court, the judge in the probationer's criminal case had "reasonably concluded" that the condition of submitting to searches would further the two primary goals of probation--rehabilitation and protecting society from future criminal violations. No more than a reasonable suspicion, the Court found, was required to search the probationer's house, and a warrant is unnecessary. (California)

U.S. Appeals Court
SUPERVISED RELEASE

U.S. v. Loy, 237 F.3d 251 (3rd Cir. 2001). An offender challenged the conditions of his supervised release prior to his release from a 36-month term of imprisonment. The district court entered an order amending the sentence and reimposing other conditions of release and the defendant appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, vacated in part, and remanded. The appeals court held that the condition of supervised release that prohibited the defendant from possessing "all forms of pornography, including legal adult pornography" was unconstitutionally vague, but that a condition that prohibited the defendant from having unsupervised contact with minors was supported by evidence. (United State District Court for the Western District of Pennsylvania)

U.S. District Court
PROBATION-CONDITIONS

U.S. v. Replogle, 176 F.Supp.2d 960 (D.Neb. 2001). In a prosecution for drug possession, the defendant moved to suppress evidence found in his house. The district court denied the motion, finding that while the defendant had a legitimate expectation of privacy in his house and the search was not voluntary, the warrantless search was valid because it was conducted pursuant to a valid probation order. The court noted that the defendant's probation officer was authorized to conduct warrantless searches and the probation order stated that the probationer "shall consent" to such searches. The probation officer knew that the defendant had violated a condition of his probation and a judge had advised the officer that she could visit the probationer and conduct a search. (U.S. District Court, Nebraska)

U.S. District Court
CLEMENCY

Workman v. Summers, 136 F.Supp.2d 896 (M.D.Tenn. 2001). A Tennessee death row inmate brought a § 1983 action against state officials alleging he was denied due process in the state's clemency process. The district court denied the inmate's motion for a temporary restraining order staying his execution. The district court held that the inmate had received minimum due process in his clemency proceeding, and that the decision to grant clemency was a decision for the governor and was not reviewable by the federal district court. (Tennessee)

2002

U.S. Appeals Court
CLEMENCY

Anderson v. Davis, 279 F.3d 674 (9th Cir. 2002). An inmate who had been sentenced to death and who had exhausted his appeals brought an action against a state governor seeking a temporary restraining order and a permanent injunction against his execution. The district court rejected the requests and the inmate appealed. The appeals court denied the inmate's motion for an injunction. According to the appeals court, there was no evidence that showed that the governor made clemency decisions for prisoners sentenced to death on the basis of inappropriate considerations or capriciousness, as might constitute a due process violation. (California)

U.S. Appeals Court
FINES

Higgins v. Beyer, 293 F.3d 683 (3rd Cir. 2002). A state inmate brought a pro se § 1983 action against prison officials and employees, alleging violation of his statutory and due process rights arising from seizure of money derived from his veteran's disability benefits check to pay a court-ordered fine without a predeprivation hearing. The district court dismissed the case. The appeals court vacated and remanded, finding that a federal statute that prohibits attachment, levy or seizure of a veteran's disability benefits provides a federal right that is enforceable under § 1983. (ATDC, Avenel, New Jersey)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEX OFFENDER

Leamer v. Fauver, 288 F.3d 532 (3rd Cir. 2002). A state prisoner filed a § 1983 action challenging his placement on a prison's restricted activities program (RAP). The district court dismissed the case and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded, finding that the state's unique former statutory scheme for sex offenders, which predicated the term of sentence on a prisoner's response to treatment, created a liberty interest in treatment and a right to treatment for the purposes of both procedural and substantive due process analyses. (Adult Diagnostic Treatment Center, New Jersey)

U.S. Appeals Court
FINES

Matheny v. Morrison, 307 F.3d 709 (8th Cir. 2002). Two defendants appealed a district court decision that dismissed their habeas actions in which they claimed that the federal Bureau of Prisons, through its Inmate Financial Responsibility Program (IFRP), illegally set the amount and timing of payments toward the financial obligations that were a part of their federal criminal sentences. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the Bureau of Prisons had the discretion to place the inmates in the IFRP because the sentencing courts had ordered immediate payment of court-imposed fines. (Federal Correctional Institution, Forrest City, Arkansas)

U.S. Appeals Court
RESTITUTION
PROBATION-CONDITIONS

U.S. v. Braxtonbrown-Smith, 278 F.3d 1348 (D.C. Cir. 2002). An offender convicted in federal court appealed her conviction and sentence. The appeals court affirmed in part and remanded, finding that the offender's sentence could not give the Probation Office the authority to modify the monthly amount of restitution that the offender would be required to pay upon release from custody. (District of Columbia)

U.S. Appeals Court
SUPERVISED RELEASE
SUPER. RELEASE-CONDITIONS

U.S. v. Guagliardo, 278 F.3d 868 (9th Cir. 2002). A defendant convicted of possession of child pornography was sentenced to fifteen months imprisonment and three years of supervised release. The offender challenged the conditions of his supervised release and the appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part and remanded for sentencing. The appeals court held that two provisions of the offender's supervised release—prohibiting him from possessing any pornography, and prohibiting him from residing in "close proximity" to places frequented by children—were unconstitutionally vague. (U.S. District Court, Central District of California)

U.S. District Court
SUPER. RELEASE-CONDITIONS

U.S. v. Mills, 186 F.Supp.2d 965 (E.D.Wis. 2002). An offender filed an emergency motion for modification of his conditions of supervised release. The district court held that the court was not authorized to impose halfway house confinement as a supervised release condition. The sentencing judge had ordered the offender to be imprisoned for forty-six months, followed by three years of supervised release, the first three months of which was to be spent in a halfway house. The court reconsidered its sentence and concluded that it did not have the authority under federal law to order halfway house confinement as a condition of supervised release. (Eastern District, Wisconsin)

U.S. Appeals Court
SUPERVISED RELEASE

U.S. v. Reyes, 283 F.3d 446 (2nd Cir. 2002). A federal offender who was serving a term of supervised release appealed denial of his motion to suppress evidence that was identified during a home visit by probation officers. The appeals court held that the offender had a severely diminished expectation of privacy, making it reasonable and lawful for probation officers to walk on to his driveway during a required home visit and to observe what they may see in plain view. The court noted that terms of the offender's supervised release mandated home visits "at any time." (U.S. District Court, Northern District of New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
SUPER. RELEASE-CONDITIONS

U.S. v. Warden, 291 F.3d 363 (5th Cir. 2002). A defendant appealed his sentence and the appeals court affirmed the original sentence. According to the appeals court, the addition of a special condition of supervised release requiring the defendant to contribute to the costs of drug and other treatment did not create a conflict with the oral pronouncement of sentence, and the district court could delegate to a probation officer the authority to determine the defendant's ability to pay the costs. (U.S. District Court for the Southern District of Texas)

2003

U.S. District Court
CREDIT

U.S. Ex Rel. Moore v. Conner, 284 F.Supp.2d 1092 (N.D.Ill. 2003). A federal prisoner filed a petition for a writ of habeas corpus, challenging the revocation of his parole based on his alleged use of drugs, commission of murder, and possession of a firearm. The district court denied the petition, finding that the prisoner was not prejudiced by a delay in his parole revocation hearing, and that he was not entitled to receive federal sentence credit and good time credit for time he spent in state custody. (U.S. District Court, Northern District, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
PROBATION- REVOCATION

U.S. v. Stegman, 295 F.Supp.2d 542 (D.Md. 2003). The government filed a notice of violation of conditions of supervised release after an offender refused to comply with a probation officer's order to submit a blood specimen pursuant to the DNA Analysis Backlog Elimination Act. The offender moved to dismiss the case and the district court denied the motion. The court held that the application of the Act did not violate the Ex Post Facto Clause, did not violate the Fourth Amendment, did not violate the separation of powers doctrine, and did not violate the offender's double jeopardy rights. (Maryland)

2004

U.S. District Court
SEX OFFENDERS
DOUBLE JEOPARDY

Atwood v. Vilsack, 338 F.Supp.2d 985 (S.D.Iowa 2004). Pretrial detainees who were awaiting hearings on their sexually violent predator (SVP) petitions, brought a class action against a state corrections department alleging denial of speedy justice. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants in part and denied it in part. The court held that the failure of the corrections department to initiate proceedings for civil commitment of sexually violent predators until immediately prior to discharge of their criminal sentences did not violate their speedy trial rights, because the department was under no duty to minimize time in custody by ensuring that commitment proceedings overlapped substantially with criminal incarceration. The court found that a seven-month average time for trying an SVP case after appointment of defense counsel was not presumptively prejudicial. According to the court, a civil commitment candidate does not have a speedy trial right, until such time as he is identified by the statutory process to be a candidate for commitment. The court held that even though the SVP Act stated that the purpose of pretrial detention was for evaluation, and the detainees were held for periods exceeding the time needed for evaluation, the Act also provided for a safekeeping component. The court concluded that denial of bail for the detainees did not violate their due process rights, where the detention was premised upon a judge's probable cause finding and a determination of mental abnormality and dangerousness was made at the outset of confinement. The court held that the conditions of the detainees' confinement violated their due process rights because the conditions were not reasonably related to the government's objective of preventing them from harming themselves or others. The detainees were kept in lockdown the majority of the day, denied reasonable access to visitors, telephones, educational programming, mental health treatment, recreation, exercise, religious services, medical care, and hygiene. The court noted that when the detainees' conditions are harsher than the conditions of criminal inmates, due process cannot be satisfied unless the conditions are reasonably related to the purpose of confinement. The court found that the implementation of the act, which resulted in an additional period of "dead time" incarceration, violated the double jeopardy rights of detainees who had previously served criminal sentences. (Iowa Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
CREDIT

Hughes v. Slade, 347 F.Supp.2d 821 (C.D.Cal. 2004). A prisoner convicted for attempted extortion petitioned for habeas corpus relief, challenging the denial of sentence credit for time served in a Mexican jail while awaiting extradition to the United States. The district court granted the petition, finding that the prisoner was entitled to credit for time served in the Mexican jail. The court held that the prisoner was not required to have been exclusively in on federal charges relating to his sentence for extortion in order to be eligible for sentence credit. (Federal Correctional Institute, Victorville, California)

U.S. Appeals Court
PAROLE
EX POST FACTO

Mickens-Thomas v. Vaughn, 355 F.3d 294 (3rd Cir. 2004). After remand from the appeals court, a district court denied a prisoner's petition for habeas corpus relief and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court vacated and remanded. The appeals court held that a parole board's use of known but hitherto uncounted historical factors in denying the prisoner's parole application, after the prisoner brought legal actions challenging the board, created a sufficient appearance of vindictiveness to justify voiding any consideration of those newly-added factors. The court found that unconditional habeas corpus relief was the appropriate remedy for the parole board's willful failure to comply with the court's mandate not to consider factors found to be in violation of ex post facto prohibitions. (Pennsylvania Board of Pardons)

U.S. District Court
PROBATION-
CONDITIONS

Pelland v. Rhode Island, 317 F.Supp.2d 86 (D.R.I. 2004). A sex offender probationer challenged Rhode Island's enforcement of a policy that curtailed the right of sex offender probationers to travel interstate. The district court entered judgment for the state, finding that the probationer had no right to travel interstate, and the policy did not violate equal protection nor result in an Ex Post Facto violation. The court noted that the policy did not proscribe interstate travel altogether, but merely imposed various conditions that the Department of Corrections had deemed useful for monitoring the movement of sex offenders who were on probation (Rhode Island Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
CREDIT

Royal v. Durison, 319 F.Supp.2d 534 (E.D.Pa. 2004). A state inmate filed a § 1983 action alleging he was detained in excess of the statutorily prescribed maximum for the crimes for which he was convicted, and that prison officials failed to consider his request for adjustment of his pre-commitment time. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants, finding that the director of classification for a city prison system was not deliberately indifferent to the inmate's claim, that the clerk responsible for keeping records used to determine pre-commitment time had no authority to calculate the inmate's sentence, and officials had meaningfully and expeditiously considered the inmate's claim. The court noted that the director investigated the circumstances around the inmate's multiple arrests after he was notified of a possible miscalculation, and notified the inmate in two separate correspondences that he was unable to change the period of the sentence by crediting time served. (Philadelphia Prison System, Pennsylvania)

U.S. Appeals Court
GUIDELINES

U.S. v. Cuello, 357 F.3d 162 (2nd Cir. 2004). A defendant convicted of being a felon in possession of a firearm challenged his sentence. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the defendant's youthful offender adjudication under state law counted as a prior adult conviction in determining the base offense level under the Sentencing Guideline for weapons convictions. (United States District Court for the Southern District of New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
PROBATION-
CONDITIONS

U.S. v. Garcia-Mejia, 394 F.3d 396 (5th Cir. 2004). A defendant appealed a condition of supervised release that prohibited him from possessing dangerous weapons, claiming it was vague and overly broad. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the defendant would only violate the condition if he possessed a "dangerous weapon" in a context that, by the dictates of common sense, had no legitimate everyday use. The court noted that the condition would not prevent the defendant from having a steak knife to cut meat when he was eating in a restaurant, but that it would prevent him from carrying a steak knife in his pocket for protection. (U.S. District Court, Southern District, Texas)

U.S. Appeals Court
SUPER. RELEASE-
CONDITIONS

U.S. v. Gementera, 379 F.3d 596 (9th Cir. 2004). An offender who pled guilty to mail theft was sentenced to supervised release and he appealed his sentence. The appeals court affirmed, finding that a supervised release condition that required the offender to spend a day standing outside a post office wearing a signboard that stated "I stole mail. This is my punishment" was reasonably related to the legitimate statutory objective of rehabilitation. The court also held that the condition did not violate the Eighth Amendment's prohibition against the infliction of cruel and unusual punishment. (Northern District of California)

U.S. Appeals Court
RESTITUTION

U.S. v. Patrick V., 359 F.3d 3 (1st Cir. 2004). A juvenile was adjudicated delinquent under the Federal Juvenile Delinquency Act (FJDA) after he pleaded guilty to the charge of arson causing extensive property damage. The district court sentenced the juvenile to 30 months detention followed by 27 months supervised release, and made the juvenile jointly liable for restitution in the amount of $728,142. The juvenile appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part and remanded. The appeals court held that the imposition of restitution in the amount $728,142 was not an abuse of discretion. The court instructed the district court to determine the appropriateness of the detention facility based on a more developed record. (United States District Court for the District of Maine)

U.S. Appeals Court
PROBATION-
CONDITIONS

U.S. v. Williams, 356 F.3d 1045 (9th Cir. 2004). A defendant appealed a condition of supervised released imposed by the district court, which required him to take psychotropic and other medications prescribed for him by physicians treating his mental illness. The appeals court vacated in part and remanded, finding that the district court abused its discretion in imposing mandatory medication without making findings on a medically-informed record to support its condition. (U.S. District Court, Oregon)

2005

U.S. Appeals Court
DELAY

Bonebrake v. Norris, 417 F.3d 938 (8th Cir. 2005). An offender appealed her state conviction of possession of a controlled substance with the intent to deliver. The federal court granted her habeas corpus petition. The state appealed and the appeals court reversed. The court held that the state's four-year delay in incarcerating the offender did not amount to a waiver of incarceration under the Due Process Clause. Neither the district attorney's office nor law enforcement personnel took any steps to take the offender into custody after the state appellate court affirmed her conviction and sentence, and the prisoner was not in hiding. (Yell County Jail, Arkansas)

U.S. District Court
EX POST FACTO
RECOMMENDATIONS

Castellini v. Lappin, 365 F.Supp.2d 197 (D.Mass. 2005). A federal prisoner sued the director of the federal Bureau of Prisons seeking a preliminary injunction to bar the termination of the "boot camp" shock incarceration program until the Bureau complied with administrative regulations, and asking to be considered for inclusion in the program. The district court issued a preliminary injunction, enjoining the Bureau from terminating the program until it complied with the Administrative Procedures Act (APA) and instructing the Bureau to consider the prisoner's eligibility for the program in good faith. The court found that the Bureau had the discretionary authority to close the program because Congress did not make a specific appropriation covering the program. The court noted that the Bureau complied with the notice and comment requirements of APA when it created the program and when it made numerous changes in program regulations. The court found that failing to consider the prisoner for the program was a violation of the ex post facto clause because the prisoner had requested consideration before termination was announced. The prisoner's sentence included a "boot camp" recommendation. (Shock Incarceration Program, Federal Bureau of Prisons)

U.S. Appeals Court
PROBATION-
REVOCATION
PAROLE

Dawson v. Newman, 419 F.3d 656 (7th Cir. 2005). A former probationer brought a state court § 1983 action against a county superior court judge, county clerk of court, state corrections department and parole officials, alleging that his incarceration was wrongfully continued and he that he was wrongfully placed on parole supervision after his probation revocation was overturned on appeal. The district court dismissed the action and the probationer appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The court held that the district court could not dismiss claims against the clerk, who had not moved for dismissal. The court found that a county superior court judge's failure to transmit a release order to the state department of corrections for the probationer whose probation was improperly revoked, was a judicial act and was not administrative or ministerial in nature, entitling the judge to absolute judicial immunity. The court held that parole officials were not entitled to absolute judicial immunity because their acts did not involve acts analogous to those performed by judges, but involved performance of their day-to-day duties in supervising parolees. The court noted that absolute judicial immunity is not limited to government officials with the title of judge. (Indiana Department of Corrections, Madison County Superior Court)

U.S. Appeals Court
PARDON

Hirschberg v. Commodity Futures Trading, 414 F.3d 679 (7th Cir. 2005). A former commodities broker whose registration had been revoked after he was convicted of mail fraud challenged the denial of his registration by the Commodity Futures Trading Commission (CFTC) following his presidential pardon. The appeals court held that the CFTC did not violate the presidential pardon power by denying the broker's post-pardon application for registration, noting that a presidential pardon does not wipe out the lack of honesty and integrity inherent in the factual predicates that supported the broker's mail fraud conviction. (Commodities Futures Trading Commission)

U.S. District Court
SENTENCE

Moss v. Apker, 376 F.Supp.2d 416 (S.D.N.Y. 2005). A prisoner brought a habeas corpus action to challenge the application of the federal Bureau of Prisons (BOP) policy that categorically restricted prisoner transfers to community corrections centers (CCCs) to the last ten percent of their sentences, not to exceed six months. The district court denied the petition. The court held that the challenge to an earlier version of the policy was mooted, and that the new policy complied with the notice and comment rulemaking requirements of the Administrative Procedures Act (APA). The court found that the BOP reasonably interpreted the statutes as giving it discretion to limit transfers to a statutory minimum period. The court found that the retroactive application of the policy did not violate the Ex Post Facto Clause. (Federal Corr'l Institution, Otisville, N.Y.)

U.S. District Court
SENTENCE

Rickenbacker v. U.S., 365 F.Supp.2d 347 (E.D.N.Y. 2005). After pleading guilty to credit card fraud and being sentenced to 24 months of imprisonment, a defendant moved to vacate, set aside, or correct the sentence. The district court denied the motion. The court held that defense counsel was not deficient in failing to move for a downward departure of the defendant's sentence based on perceived hardships the defendant endured while being detained prior to sentencing. According to the court, the alleged substandard conditions, consisting of being served food that the defendant believed had been accessed by rodents, and not being provided with a fully stocked library, were not conditions that rose to the level that would warrant a downward departure. The defendant had been served bread that rodents had apparently partially eaten, and in one instance a mouse had created a tunnel inside of the bread. (Nassau County Correctional Center, N.Y.)

U.S. Appeals Court
CREDIT

U.S. v. Barfield, 396 F.3d 1144 (11th Cir. 2005). A defendant appealed a district court order that lifted a stay on the execution of her sentence. The district court affirmed, finding that the defendant was not entitled to credit for time spent erroneously at liberty when there was a delay in executing her sentence, and that an eight-year delay in the enforcement of her sentence did not violate due process. The court noted that the government was acting under the belief, based on representations by the defendant, that her death was imminent when it delayed enforcement to allow her to spend time with her family. (U.S. District Court, Middle District, Florida)

U.S. District Court
PLACE OF IMPRISONMENT
RECOMMENDATION

U.S. v. Guerrette, 289 F.Supp.2d 10 (D.Me. 2005). An offender was designated to be incarcerated at a certain facility and he moved to amend the judgment and to recommend incarceration at another facility that would be closer to his family. The district court denied the motion, finding that a sentencing court's recommendation to the Bureau of Prisons regarding the place of imprisonment is both non-binding and non-reviewable. The court noted that the federal Bureau of Prisons retains the statutory authority and responsibility to choose the place of imprisonment of a federal prisoner. (Federal Prison Camp, Fort Dix, New Jersey)

U.S. District Court
RECOMMENDATION

U.S. v. Paige, 369 F.Supp.2d 1257 (D.Mont. 2005). A federal prisoner filed a habeas petition challenging the Bureau of Prisons (BOP) policy that precluded his placement in a community corrections center, as recommended by the sentencing court. The district court granted the petition, finding that the prisoner was not required to first exhaust his administrative remedies before the court could consider the petition, because by the time the inmate exhausted every available administrative remedy he would nearly be done serving his entire sentence. The court held that the statutes governing placement of inmates in prerelease custody did not authorize the BOP policy, under which inmates were designated to a community corrections center only for the lesser of six months or ten percent of their sentence. The court ordered the BOP to consider the appropriateness of transferring the inmate to a community confinement center. (Federal Correctional Center, Florence, Colorado)

U.S. Appeals Court
LIBERTY INTEREST
GOOD-TIME

Wilson v. Jones, 430 F.3d 1113 (10th Cir. 2005). A state inmate petitioned for a writ of habeas corpus, challenging on due process grounds a misconduct conviction that caused him to be demoted to a non-credit-earning prisoner. The district court denied the petition and the inmate appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded, ordering the issuance of a writ on remand. The court held that the misconduct conviction reduced the inmate's credit-earning class in a manner that inevitably affected the direction of his sentence and therefore deprived the inmate of a liberty interest. According to the court, officials violated the inmate's due process rights by convicting him without any evidence. (Great Plains Correctional Facility, Oklahoma)

2006

U.S. District Court
PAROLE
EX POST FACTO

Michael v. Ghee, 411 F.Supp.2d 813 (N.D.Ohio 2006). Ohio "old law" inmates serving indeterminate sentences brought a § 1983 action, alleging that the state's parole system was unconstitutional. The state moved to dismiss and for summary judgment. The district court granted summary judgment for the state. The court held that the inmates had no valid procedural due process claim and that the state had rational reasons, satisfying equal protection, for requiring "old law" inmates to continue to serve their indeterminate sentences, subject to parole board determinations, after the law was changed to provide for exact sentences and the elimination of parole. According to the court, the parole guidelines promulgated in 1998 had a rational basis and the parole guidelines were not laws, subject to the ex post facto clause. The court noted that state law makes parole discretionary, and therefore inmates do not have a due process liberty interest in parole under state law. Since the inmates did not have a liberty interest in parole itself, they could not have a liberty interest in parole consideration or other aspects of parole procedures, and thus had no procedural due process claim. The court found that the state had several rational reasons, satisfying equal protection, for requiring so-called "old law" inmates to continue to serve their indeterminate sentences. The reasons included the desire to avoid retroactive legislation and alteration of sentences, to give "old law" inmates an incentive to obey prison regulations, and to acknowledge the seriousness of the convicted offenses. (Ohio Adult Parole Authority and Chillicothe Correctional Institution)

U.S. District Court
EX POST FACTO
PAROLE
EQUAL PROTECTION

Pennsylvania Prison Society v. Rendell, 419 F.Supp.2d 651 (M.D.Pa. 2006). An advocacy group brought an action in state court challenging the legality of proposed changes to the state constitution with regard to pardoning powers and the state Board of Pardons. Following approval of the changes by the electorate, the defendants removed the action to federal court. After state-law claims were remanded and the defendants prevailed on appeal before the state supreme court, the group filed an amended complaint, alleging that the constitutional amendments violated the Due Process Clause, the Ex Post Facto Clause, the Equal Protection Clause, the Eighth Amendment, and the Guarantee Clause. The parties cross-moved for summary judgment. The district court held that including a crime victim on a state pardon board, even when the recommendation for a pardon or commutation must be unanimous before it may be considered by the governor, does not violate due process. The court found that the retroactive application of the amendments providing for the inclusion of a crime victim on the Board of Pardons did not violate the Ex Post Facto Clause, but the court held that the retroactive application of the amendments requiring a unanimous vote for the Board of Pardons to recommend a commutation violated the Ex Post Facto Clause. The ballot question that proposed the amendments read: Shall the Pennsylvania Constitution be amended to require a unanimous recommendation of the Board of Pardons before the Governor can pardon or commute the death sentence of an individual sentenced in a criminal case to death or life imprisonment, to require only a majority vote of the Senate to approve the Governor's appointments to the Board, and to substitute a crime victim for an attorney and a corrections expert for a penologist as Board members? (Penn. Board of Pardons)

U.S. District Court
GUIDELINES

U.S. v. Shelton, 431 F.Supp.2d 675 (E.D.Tex. 2006). An inmate was convicted of forcibly assaulting a correctional officer, and a sentencing hearing was held. The district court held that a sentence of 36 months' imprisonment, exceeding the sentencing guidelines range of 12 to 18 months, was warranted for the inmate's conviction for forcibly assaulting a correctional officer by throwing feces and urine that struck the officer in the head, face, and chest. The court noted that the inmate's conduct was more than mere physical contact, and subjected the officer to the risk of a host of infectious diseases. The officer had to be treated with a cocktail of drugs to protect against such diseases, and the court held that the need for adequate deterrence was important due to prevalence of such assaults by prisoners. (Texas)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEX OFFENDERS
EX POST FACTO

Weems v. Little Rock Police Dept,, 453 F.3d 1010 (8th Cir. 2006). A registered sex offender brought a civil rights suit challenging the provisions of the Arkansas Sex Offender Registration Act that required sex offenders to register, and the provision of the statute that prohibited certain registered sex offenders from living within two thousand feet of a school or a daycare center. The district court denied the offenders' motion for class certification and dismissed the suit for failure to state a claim. The offender appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held: (1) the residency restriction did not violate substantive due process; (2) the residency restriction did not violate equal protection by treating the high-risk offenders who did not own property differently from the property-owning high risk offenders or from low-risk offenders; (3) the restrictions did not violate a constitutional right to travel; (4) the restriction did not constitute an unconstitutional ex post facto law as applied to the offenders who sustained convictions prior to the enactment of the statute; and (5) the offenders were not deprived of any liberty interest in avoiding a risk assessment without procedural due process. The court held that the statute rationally advanced a legitimate government purpose of protecting children from the most dangerous sex offenders by reducing their proximity to the locations frequented by children, that the statute was intended to be regulatory and non-punitive, and was not punitive in effect. (Arkansas General Assembly, Sex and Child Offender Registration Act)

2007

U.S. District Court
EX POST FACTO
PAROLE

Edwards v. Pa. Bd. of Prob. & Parole, 523 F.Supp.2d 462 (E.D.Pa. 2007). A prisoner filed a § 1983 suit, seeking injunctive and declaratory relief against a Board of Probation and Parole, claiming violations of the Ex Post Facto Clause and Eighth Amendment, and asserting that his parole was denied in retaliation for exercising his constitutional rights. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the board. The court noted that the Ex Post Facto Clause applies to a statute or policy change that alters the definition of criminal conduct or increases the penalty by which a crime is punishable. Under Pennsylvania law, although parole is an alteration of the terms of confinement, a parolee continues to serve his unexpired sentence until its conclusion. According to the court, under Pennsylvania law, a "parole" is not an act of clemency but a penological measure for the disciplinary treatment of prisoners who seem capable of rehabilitation outside of prison walls; parole does not set aside or affect the sentence, and the convict remains in the legal custody of the state and under the control of its agents, subject at any time for breach of condition to be returned to the penal institution. The court held that denial of the prisoner's re-parole by Board of Probation and Parole, after his conviction as a parole violator, was not re-imposition of the prisoner's unexpired life sentence, in violation of the Ex Post Facto Clause, but rather, under Pennsylvania law, the prisoner's sentence was not set aside by his parole. According to the court, the prisoner remained in the legal custody of the warden until expiration of his sentence, and the prisoner had no protected liberty interest beyond that of any other prisoner eligible to be considered for parole while serving out the remainder of a maximum sentence. The court held that changes to the Pennsylvania Parole Act did not create a significant risk of increasing the prisoner's punishment in violation of the Ex Post Facto Clause, based on the Board of Probation and Parole's denial of the prisoner's re-parole due to factors of prior parole failures and lack of remorse, since the relative weight of such factors in the parole calculus of amendments to the Parole Act did not change, and the prisoner produced no evidence that the change in the Parole Act had any effect on the Board's decision. (Pennsylvania Board of Probation and Parole)

U.S. Appeals Court
EX POST FACTO
EQUAL PROTECTION

Michael v. Ghee, 498 F.3d 372 (6th Cir. 2007). Inmates in Ohio correctional facilities who were sentenced prior to Ohio's enactment of a revised sentencing system on July 1, 1996, brought an action in state court claiming that lack of retroactivity of the new sentencing scheme and the implementation of the 1998 parole guidelines violated the Ex Post Facto, Due Process, and Equal Protection Clauses of the Constitution, as well as various provisions of state law. After the case was removed to federal district court, the court granted the state defendants' motion for dismissal and for summary judgment. The inmates appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the state's decision not to apply the new sentencing law retroactively and to adopt new parole guidelines had a rational basis, and the retroactive application of the 1998 Ohio parole guidelines did not violate the Ex Post Facto Clause.(Ohio Adult Parole Authority)

U.S. Appeals Court
PARDON

Pennsylvania Prison Soc. v. Cortes, 508 F.3d 156 (3rd Cir. 2007). State prisoners, several non-profit advocacy and prisoner rights groups, and several state voters and qualified taxpayers brought an action challenging amendments to the Pennsylvania constitution changing the composition of Board of Pardons and voting requirements for obtaining a pardon or commutation of sentence. The district court granted in part and denied in part the parties' cross-motions for summary judgment. The parties appealed. The appeals court dismissed and remanded. The court held that the parties did not have standing. According to the court, evidence tended to show that the absolute number of Board of Pardon recommendations for commutations had decreased after amendments to the Pennsylvania constitution changed the composition of the Board and voting requirements for obtaining a pardon or commutation of sentence, but this failed to meet the causation element for standing to challenge the constitutionality of amendments, where the decrease had begun two years prior to the amendments. (Pennsylvania Board of Pardons)

U.S. Appeals Court
FINES
INDIGENCY

Powers v. Hamilton County Public Defender Com'n, 501 F.3d 592 (6th Cir. 2007). A former prisoner filed a putative § 1983 class action, alleging that his constitutional rights were violated by the county public defender's policy or custom of failing to seek indigency hearings on behalf of criminal defendants facing jail time for unpaid fines. The district court granted the motion for class certification, and granted summary judgment in favor of the arrestee on the issue of liability. The defendants appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The court held that: (1) the alleged automatic incarceration of the arrestee for his failure to pay fine, without conducting an indigency hearing to determine his ability to pay the fine, violated due process; (2) the public defender's failure to request an indigency hearing was the moving force behind prisoner's failure to receive an indigency hearing; (3) the public defender acted under the color of state law; and (4) fact issues precluded summary judgment. (Hamilton County Public Defender Office and Hamilton County Public Defender Commission, Ohio)

U.S. District Court
CREDIT
ORIGINAL SENTENCE
PROBATION-
REVOCATION

Thompson v. District of Columbia Dept. of Corrections, 511 F.Supp.2d 111 (D.D.C. 2007). A federal prisoner filed a petition for a writ of habeas corpus alleging that his custody, based on a parole violator warrant issued by the United States Parole Commission, unlawfully extended his sentence beyond the expiration date. The district court denied the petition. The court held that the prisoner's custody did not unlawfully extend his sentence beyond the expiration date. According to the court, the Commission did not usurp a judicial function in violation of the separation of powers when it rescinded the prisoner's street-time credit upon each of his parole revocations. The court noted that the number of days he spent on parole was properly rescinded for each of his revocations, and therefore the days no longer counted towards the service of his prison term. (District of Columbia Department of Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
SUPERVISED RELEASE-
CONDITIONS

U.S. v. Betts, 511 F.3d 872 (9th Cir. 2007). A defendant appealed the sentence imposed by the district court for conspiracy, challenging various conditions of supervised release. The appeals court vacated the sentence and remanded the case. The court held that the conditions of supervised release improperly delegated to a probation officer the decision as to how much of any windfall received by defendant would be applied to his restitution obligation. The court also found that the condition of supervised release prohibiting the defendant from drinking alcohol was improper, where there was nothing in the record to suggest that the judge thought there was any past abuse of alcohol or any relationship between alcohol and the defendant's crime. (United States District Court for the Central District of California)

U.S. Appeals Court
SUPERVISED RELEASE

U.S. v. Kriesel, 508 F.3d 941 (9th Cir. 2007). The government petitioned to revoke supervised release of a felon who refused to submit a DNA sample. In response, the convicted felon challenged the constitutionality of the Justice for All Act, which expanded coverage of the DNA Act to require DNA samples from all convicted felons on supervised release. The felon also challenged the regulation issued pursuant to the Justice for All Act. The district court upheld the constitutionality of the Justice for All Act and the validity of the regulation. The felon appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that requiring a convicted felon on supervised release to provide a DNA sample, even through drawing of blood, did not constitute an illegal search. The court found that the government's significant interests in identifying supervised releasees, preventing recidivism, and solving past crimes outweighed the diminished privacy interests of the convicted felon. (United States District Court for the Western District of Washington)

U.S. District Court
RESTITUTION

U.S. v. Young, 533 F.Supp.2d 1086 (D.Nev. 2007). A federal prisoner who had been ordered to pay restitution in the amount of $457,740 and a penalty assessment in the amount of $3,300 moved to set aside the schedule of payments. The district court denied the motion. The court held that the defendant's participation in the federal Bureau of Prison's (BOP) Inmate Financial Responsibility Program (IFRP), which allowed the BOP to withhold $50 per month from the defendant's account, was not under duress, and that withholding 21 percent of the defendant's monthly income was not egregious or unreasonable. The court noted that the prisoner earns approximately $57 while imprisoned and that he typically receives a bonus of approximately $28 per month, bringing his total monthly earnings to approximately $85. The prisoner also receives approximately $150 per month from family members, making his total monthly income $235. (Nevada)

2008

U.S. District Court
PAROLE
CREDIT

Garner v. Caulfield, 584 F.Supp.2d 167 (D.D.C. 2008). A parolee filed a habeas petition to challenge his detention following revocation of his parole. The district court denied the petition. The court held that the parolee was not entitled to credit toward service of his sentence for his stay at a residential program akin to placement in a halfway house, which was a condition of parole. The court found that the Parole Commission issued a valid parole violator warrant before the date on which the petitioner would have reached his full-term expiration date, and therefore it was authorized to revoke the petitioner's parole. (United States Parole Commission, District of Columbia)

U.S. District Court
CREDIT
EXPIRATION

Huff v. Sanders, 632 F.Supp.2d 903 (E.D.Ark. 2008). A federal prison inmate brought a habeas corpus petition, challenging the government's designation of the date of commencement of his sentence, and seeking additional presentence detention credit. The district court granted the petition in part and denied in part. The court held that: (1) the inmate satisfied the administrative exhaustion requirement even though he failed to comply with the Bureau of Prisons' (BOP) demands as to the form of the documents; (2) the federal sentence commenced on the date that the inmate was sentenced for federal charges and remanded to the custody of United States Marshal; (3) the inmate was entitled to credit against his federal sentence for all of his presentence incarceration; but (4) the inmate was not entitled to presentence detention credit for time spent in a residential drug treatment center. (Federal Detention Center, Houston, Texas, and Federal Correctional Institution, Oakdale, Louisiana)

U.S. Appeals Court
LIBERTY INTEREST
ORIGINAL SENTENCE

Jenkins v. Currier, 514 F.3d 1030 (10th Cir. 2008). A state prisoner brought a pro se § 1983 action against state officials alleging that the officials violated his constitutional rights and state law when they took him into custody without a warrant or a probable cause hearing, and transferred him to a correctional facility in order for him to serve his previously imposed sentence. The district court dismissed the prisoner's claims with prejudice. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court noted that under Oklahoma law, a convicted defendant who is at liberty without having served his sentence may be arrested as on escape and ordered into custody on the unexecuted judgment. According to the court, state officials did not violate the Fourth Amendment when they seized the state prisoner without a warrant, after having been released from federal custody erroneously, so that he could serve the remainder of his unfinished state sentence. The court noted that the officials had reason to believe that the prisoner had not completed serving his state sentences and there were no special circumstances that would have made his otherwise permissible arrest unreasonable. The court also found that the prisoner had no due process right to a hearing when he was taken back into custody. (Oklahoma)

U.S. District Court
RESTITUTION

Johnson v. Bredesen, 579 F.Supp.2d 1044 (M.D.Tenn. 2008). Convicted felons who had served their sentences brought an action against state and local officials seeking to invalidate portions of a Tennessee Code that conditioned the restoration of their voting rights upon their payment of certain financial obligations, including restitution and child support. The district court granted judgment on the pleadings to the defendants. The court held that the statutory provision: (1) did not create a suspect classification; (2) did not violate equal protection; (3) did not violate the Twenty-Fourth Amendment; and (4) did not violate the Ex Post Facto Clause. According to the court, the state had an interest in protecting the ballot box from felons who continued to break the law by not abiding by enforceable court orders, the state had a strong public policy interest in encouraging the payment of child support and thereby promoting the welfare of children, and the state had a legitimate interest in encouraging convicted felons to complete their entire sentences, including the payment of restitution. The court also noted that there was no evidence that the state of Tennessee's re-enfranchisement scheme for convicted felons had traditionally been regarded as punitive, rather than civil, so as to violate the federal or Tennessee Ex Post Facto Clause. (Tennessee)

U.S. District Court
EX POST FACTO
PAROLE

Sellmon v. Reilly, 551 F.Supp.2d 66 (D.D.C. 2008). District of Columbia inmates, each of whom committed his crime and was sentenced prior to the date when the United States Parole Commission (USPC) took over responsibility from the District of Columbia Parole Board for conducting parole hearings for D.C. Code offenders, brought a § 1983 action against the USPC chairman and its commissioners. The inmates alleged that USPC retroactively applied its own parole guidelines and practices in violation of the Ex Post Facto Clause of the Constitution. The district court held that the inmates established a prima facie case of an ex post facto violation resulting from the retroactive application of the USPC parole regime, rather than the D.C. parole regime, to their parole applications. But the court held that only those inmates who demonstrated that the practical effect of the new policies was to substantially increase the risk that they each would serve lengthier terms of incarceration were entitled to relief on their ex post facto claims. (District of Columbia)

U.S. District Court REDUCTION OF SENTENCE

Sheppard v. U.S., 537 F.Supp.2d 785 (D.Md. 2008). A detainee brought an action against the federal Bureau of Prisons (BOP) claiming negligence pursuant to the Federal Tort Claims Act (FTCA) for his illegal detention for over nine months. The district court denied the government's motion to dismiss for lack of jurisdiction or, in the alternative, for summary judgment. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to the role and duties of BOP personnel who were allegedly responsible for the continued confinement of the detainee during his false imprisonment. The BOP asserted that the employees were "investigative or law enforcement officers" for the purposes of the government's waiver of sovereign immunity. The detainee had been sentenced to 121 months of incarceration in a federal prison in Leavenworth, Kansas. The district court granted the request of the United States Attorney for the District of Columbia to reduce his sentence to time served and ordered his release. The detainee was not released for approximately ten months after the court's order. (District of Columbia, and U.S. Penitentiary, Leavenworth, KS)

U.S. Appeals Court
COMMUTATION
EX POST FACTO
LIBERTY INTEREST

Snodgrass v. Robinson, 512 F.3d 999 (8th Cir. 2008). A state prisoner brought a suit against the Iowa Board of Parole, the Board's members and the governor of Iowa alleging that her constitutional rights were violated by applying laws and regulations governing commutation requests, even though the laws were passed after her conviction. The district court granted a motion to dismiss and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the retroactive application of an amendment to the Iowa commutation provisions did not violate the Ex Post Facto Clause and that the state prisoner had no liberty interest in commutations. The court noted that the retroactive application of the amendment to Iowa Code did not raise a significant risk that the state prisoner would be denied a commutation she otherwise would have received from the governor given the unpredictability of the wholly discretionary grant of a governor's commutation. The court noted that the new provisions limited a Class A felon serving a life sentence to commutation applications no more frequently than once every ten years rather than previous standards which provided for regular review. (Iowa Board of Parole)

U.S. District Court
RESTITUTION

Stern v. Federal Bureau of Prisons, 537 F.Supp.2d 178 (D.D.C. 2008). A federal inmate brought an action against the federal Bureau of Prisons (BOP), challenging the BOP's statutory authority to promulgate a regulation through which it had established restitution payment schedules. The district court denied the BOP motion to dismiss. The court held that the inmate stated a cognizable claim under the Administrative Procedure Act (APA). The court held that the Mandatory Victims Restitution Act (MVRA) rendered invalid the BOP regulation that established payment schedules for orders of restitution, because only the courts could set payment schedules for restitution. (Federal Correctional Institution, Jesup, Georgia)

U.S. Appeals Court
GOOD-TIME

Tablada v. Thomas, 533 F.3d 800 (9th Cir. 2008). A federal inmate sought a writ of habeas corpus, challenging the Bureau of Prisons' (BOP) calculation of good time credits in determining the length of time left to serve on his 20-year sentence. The district court denied the petition and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the BOP's program statement, calculating good time credits based on time served rather than the sentence imposed, reasonably interpreted the good time credit statute, despite the invalidity of a regulation with an identical methodology. According to the court, the inmate's good time credits were required to be calculated based on time served rather than the sentence imposed. (Fed. Correctional Institute, Sheridan, Oregon)

2009

U.S. District Court
EQUAL PROTECTION
SENTENCE

Bowdry v. Ochalla, 605 F.Supp.2d 1009 (N.D.Ill. 2009). A former state prison inmate brought a § 1983 action against attorneys employed by a county public defender's office, alleging that the attorneys' respective failure to notice and correct a mittimus error had resulted in the inmate's incarceration for an extra three months, asserting violations of due process, equal protection, and the Eighth Amendment's prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment. The district court dismissed the action. The court held that the attorneys had not acted under the color of state law in failing to correct the mittimus error, where the review of mittimus fell within the scope of a lawyer's traditional functions, contrary to the defendant's contention that it was "essentially administrative." (Cook County Public Defenders, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court CONSECUTIVE SENTENCES

Espinoza v. Sabol, 558 F.3d 83 (1st Cir. 2009). A federal prisoner convicted for drug offenses petitioned for a writ of habeas corpus. The district court denied the petition and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the prisoner was not entitled to credit for the 14-month period that he was at liberty after federal authorities inadvertently released him prior to the expiration of his sentence, and that the prisoner's sentence for escape, imposed approximately 10 years after he was sentenced on federal drug charges, was subject to the statutory presumption that the sentence should run consecutively. The court noted that the erroneous release happened only because the prisoner had escaped from his halfway house, causing the need to process him again when he was apprehended, and there was no showing that the government acted arbitrarily or intentionally to prolong the prisoner's sentence. According to the court, giving the prisoner credit for the time he was free would amount to rewarding him for his escape. (Federal Bureau of Prisons, Massachusetts)

U.S. District Court
PRESENTENCE REPORT
SEX OFFENDERS

Gilmore v. Bostic, 636 F.Supp.2d 496 (S.D.W.Va. 2009). A state prison inmate brought an action against a probation officer, the state parole board, and state correctional facility employees, asserting that his constitutional rights were violated by allegedly false information in his presentence report for a burglary conviction and in the prison file which resulted in the inmate's classification in the state penal system at a higher level than was appropriate and in a sex offender designation. The district court held that: (1) the board was entitled to absolute immunity; (2) employees were not liable in their official capacities on claims for compensatory relief but the employees sued in their individual capacities were liable; (3) the inmate stated a violation of a protected liberty interest in parole release under the state constitution; (4) the inmate stated a claim under the state constitution for violation of a protected liberty interest in not being required to undergo sex offender treatment; and (5) the inmate adequately alleged a physical injury required to recover for mental or emotional injury. (Kanawha County Adult Probation Department, West Virginia Board of Probation and Parole, Huttonsville Correctional Center, West Virginia)

U.S. Appeals Court
EXPIRATION

Hart v. Hodges, 587 F.3d 1288 (11th Cir. 2009). A former federal prisoner brought an action against a state prosecutor, the general counsel of the Georgia Department of Corrections (DOC) and the warden of a Georgia prison, alleging violations of his constitutional rights by having him transferred from federal to state custody at the end of his federal sentence. The district court granted the defendants' motion for judgment on the pleadings on the ground they were entitled to absolute immunity. The plaintiff appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, vacated in part, and remanded. The court held that the prosecutor was entitled to absolute immunity for his role in the plaintiff's transfer. But the court held that the general counsel of the Georgia Department of Corrections (DOC) and the warden of a Georgia prison were not entitled to absolute immunity from liability under § 1983 and state law for causing the issuance of a second state warrant against the prisoner prior to his release from federal prison, and issuing a notice of surrender to the prisoner and threatening further prosecution following his release. The court noted that the general counsel's role as legal advisor to the DOC and the warden's role as chief jailer of the prison where the prisoner was incarcerated were not roles intimately associated with the judicial phase of the criminal process. (Jackson State Prison, Georgia Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
EX POST FACTO
GUIDELINES
SENTENCE TO PAROLE

Smith v. Reilly, 604 F.Supp.2d 124 (D.D.C. 2009). An inmate brought a § 1983 suit against members of the United States Parole Commission (USPC), asserting an ex post facto challenge to the application of the USPC's parole guidelines. The district court granted the summary judgment for the defendants. The court held that the Ex Post Facto Clause barred application of the new parole guidelines, which increased the risk that the inmate would serve a longer period of incarceration. According to the court, the new USPC guidelines, but not the old ones, prevented a candidate who, like the inmate, had committed a crime of violence resulting in death, from even being found suitable for parole when he first became eligible after serving a minimum sentence. The new guidelines also translated disciplinary infractions directly into additional months of incarceration, and considered all disciplinary infractions were considered. (District of Columbia Board of Parole)

U.S. Appeals Court
REVOCATION
SUPERVISED RELEASE

U.S. v. Anderson, 583 F.3d 504 (7th Cir. 2009). The Government separately petitioned to revoke the supervised release of three defendants. The district court entered revocation orders and imposed new terms of imprisonment with recommendations to the Bureau of Prisons (BOP) that each defendant be placed in a halfway house during the last six months of his sentence. The defendants appealed, and the cases were consolidated for appeal. The appeals court remanded. The appeals court held that the district court had the authority to impose halfway-house confinement as a condition of supervised release. According to the court, the district courts had the authority to impose halfway-house confinement as a condition of supervised release under the catch-all provision of the supervised release statute which conferred broad discretion on district courts to fashion appropriate conditions of supervised release that complied with the broad goals of sentencing, notwithstanding the exclusion of halfway-house confinement from the statutory list of permissible conditions of supervised release. (Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
SUPERVISED RELEASE-
CONDITIONS

U.S. v. Bender, 566 F.3d 748 (8th Cir. 2009). Following revocation of supervised release, the district court imposed an 18-month sentence and special conditions on a 10-year supervised release term. The defendant appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The appeals court held that: (1) the district court did not abuse its discretion by imposing a special condition of supervised release banning the defendant's use of computers and internet access; (2) the district court did not abuse its discretion by imposing a special condition requiring the defendant to submit to "lifestyle restrictions" imposed by a therapist; (3) the district court did not provide sufficient individualized findings to support the imposition of a special condition banning sexually stimulating materials; (4) as a matter of first impression, the district court abused its discretion by imposing a special condition banning the defendant from entering any library; and (5) a special condition barring the defendant from frequenting places where minors were known to frequent without prior approval and then only in the presence of a responsible adult, imposed a greater deprivation of liberty than was reasonably necessary. (Missouri)

U.S. Appeals Court
SUPERVISED RELEASE

U.S. v. Perez, 565 F.3d 344 (7th Cir. 2009). Following violation of his conditions of supervised release, the district court imposed sentence. The defendant appealed. The appeals court vacated and remanded. The court held that the district court judge lacked jurisdiction to reopen the revocation of supervised release proceedings to make a substantive change to the sentence, and remand was required since the sentence was unclear as to whether the judge intended to impose a sentence of 12 months imprisonment regardless of the sentence imposed by another judge, or whether the judge intended the defendant to stay in jail for a total of 36 months in light of the other judge's sentence. (United States Attorney, Chicago, Illinois)

2010

U.S. Appeals Court
EX POST FACTO
HOUSE ARREST
LIBERTY INTEREST

Gonzalez-Fuentes v. Molina, 607 F.3d 864 (1st Cir. 2010). A class of prisoners convicted of murder, who had been released pursuant to an electronic supervision program (ESP), filed a complaint under § 1983, seeking a preliminary injunction against their re-incarceration pursuant to a regulation which became effective after their releases. The district court granted a preliminary injunction and the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico appealed. Another class of prisoners who had been re-incarcerated filed a separate petition for a writ of habeas corpus and the district court granted the petition. The district court consolidated the two cases, and denied the Commonwealth's motion to dismiss. The commonwealth appealed. The appeals court reversed in part, vacated in part, and remanded. The court held that re-incarceration of the prisoners convicted of murder under a new regulation eliminating the ESP program for prisoners convicted of murder, did not violate the ex post facto clause, where the prisoners had committed their crimes of conviction at times predating the creation of the ESP, so that Puerto Rico's decision to disqualify prisoners from participating in the ESP had no effect on the punishment assigned by law. The court also held the re-incarceration of the prisoners convicted of murder did not violate substantive due process. The court found that although the impact of re-incarceration on the prisoners was substantial, Puerto Rico had a justifiable interest in faithfully applying the new statute which barred prisoners convicted of murder from the ESP program. According to the court, there was no showing that Puerto Rico acted with deliberate indifference or that re-imprisonment was conscience-shocking.

But the court found that the prisoners convicted of murder, who had been released for several years pursuant to the ESP, had a protected due process liberty interest in their continued participation in the ESP program, despite the fact that their releases were premised on lower court determination, which was later overturned, that the statute eliminating such prisoners from the program violated the ex post facto clause. The prisoners were serving out the remainder of their sentences in their homes, where they lived either with close relatives, significant others, or spouses and children, and although they were subject to monitoring with an electronic tracking anklet, and routine drug and alcohol testing, they were authorized to work at a job or attend school.

The court also found that the re-incarceration of the prisoners deprived them of procedural due process, where the prisoners were not given any pre-hearing notice as to the reason their ESP status was revoked, and the prisoners had to wait two weeks after their arrest before receiving any opportunity to contest it.

The court concluded that the prisoners whose procedural due process rights were violated by their re-incarceration or their imminent future re-incarceration after determination that they had been unlawfully admitted into the ESP were not entitled to either habeas relief, for those already re-imprisoned, or preliminary injunctive relief for those yet to be re-imprisoned, where the subsequent Puerto Rico statute provided a valid, independent, constitutional basis for the prisoners' re-incarceration. (Puerto Rico Department of Justice, Puerto Rico Administration of Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
PARDON

PA Prison Soc. v. Cortes, 622 F.3d 215 (3rd Cir. 2010). State prisoners, several non-profit advocacy and prisoner rights groups, and several state voters and qualified taxpayers brought an action challenging an amendment to the Pennsylvania constitution changing the composition of the Board of Pardons and the voting requirements for obtaining a pardon or commutation of sentence. The district court granted in part, and denied in part, the parties' cross-motions for summary judgment, and they appealed. The appeals court remanded. On remand, the district court ruled that one of the groups had standing to challenge the constitutionality of the amendment and reinstated its prior summary judgment ruling, and appeal was again taken. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The appeals court held that the prisoner advocacy group had organization standing to challenge the constitutionality of the amendment, but the amendment did not violate the ex post facto clause. The court noted that allegations that the changes in the law have produced some ambiguous sort of disadvantage, or affected a prisoner's opportunity to take advantage of provisions for early release, are not sufficient grounds for bringing an ex post facto claim. According to the court, there is no constitutional or inherent right of a convicted person to be conditionally released before the expiration of a valid sentence. (Pennsylvania Board of Pardons)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEX OFFENDER
LIBERTY INTEREST

Renchenski v. Williams, 622 F.3d 315 (3rd Cir. 2010). A state inmate, who was serving a life sentence without the possibility of parole for first-degree murder, brought a pro se § 1983 action against prison officials and personnel, alleging that his forced participation in sex offender treatment therapy violated his constitutional rights. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants. The inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part and reversed in part. The court held that sex offender conditions may be imposed on an inmate who has not been convicted of a sexual offense only after due process has been afforded. The court found that the inmate had an independent liberty interest in not being labeled as a sex offender and forced into treatment, and thus was entitled to adequate process before prison officials took such actions. (Pennsylvania's Sex Offender Treatment Program, State Correctional Institution at Coal Township, Pennsylvania)

2011

U.S. Appeals Court
REVIEW

Alston v. Read, 663 F.3d 1094 (9th Cir. 2011). A former state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against corrections officials, alleging that he was over-detained in violation of his due process rights and the Eighth Amendment. The district court denied the officials' motion for summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity and the officials appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The court held that the officials did not have a clearly established duty to seek out court records in response to the prisoner's unsupported assertion that he was being over-detained, and thus, the officials were entitled to qualified immunity. The court noted that the officials relied on state law and the prisoner's institutional file in calculating the prisoner's sentence, the prisoner offered no documentation to put officials on notice that his sentence had been miscalculated, and no caselaw established that the officials were required to examine any other records. (Offender Management Office of Hawaii's Department of Public Safety)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEX OFFENDER
PROBATION-
CONDITIONS
EQUAL PROTECTION

Brown v. Montoya, 662 F.3d 1152 (10th Cir. 2011). A probationer, who had been convicted of false imprisonment under New Mexico law, brought § 1983 claims against a probation officer and the New Mexico Secretary of Corrections, alleging that he was wrongly directed to register as a sex offender and was wrongly placed in a sex offender probation unit, in violation of his rights to substantive due process, procedural due process, and equal protection. The district court denied the defendants' motion to dismiss and the defendants appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The court held that the complaint was insufficient to overcome the Secretary's qualified immunity defense, but the probation officer's alleged actions, if proven, denied the probationer of a liberty interest protected by the Due Process Clause. According to the court, the probation officer's alleged actions of placing the probationer in a sex offender probation unit and directing him to register as a sex offender, after the probationer had been convicted of false imprisonment under New Mexico law, if proven, denied the probationer of a liberty interest protected by the Due Process Clause. The court noted that false imprisonment was not a sex offense in New Mexico unless the victim was a minor. (New Mexico Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
CLEMENCY
LEGAL COSTS

Link v. Luebbers, 830 F.Supp.2d 729 (E.D.Mo. 2011). After federal habeas proceedings were terminated, federally-appointed counsel filed vouchers seeking payment under the Criminal Justice Act (CJA), for work performed on a prisoner's executive clemency proceedings and civil cases challenging Missouri's execution protocol. The district court held that counsel were entitled to compensation for pursuing the prisoner's § 1983 action for declaratory and injunctive relief alleging denial of due process in his clemency proceedings, but that counsel were not entitled to compensation for work performed in the § 1983 action challenging Missouri's execution protocol. The court noted that the prisoner's § 1983 action challenging Missouri's execution protocol was not integral to the prisoner's executive clemency proceedings. (Missouri)

U.S. District Court
HOUSE ARREST
LIBERTY INTEREST

McBride v. Cahoone, 820 F.Supp.2d 623 (E.D.Pa. 2011). A state prisoner filed § 1983 action against his probation officer, and others, alleging violation of his constitutional rights after he was sent to prison for 83 days without a hearing for violation of his electronic monitoring program. The defendants moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that: (1) the state prisoner had a due process liberty interest in serving his sentence in home confinement; (2) his claim was not barred by Heck v. Humphrey; (3) the prisoner had standing to seek injunctive and declaratory relief; (4) the claim against the director of the state probation and parole department was not barred by the Eleventh Amendment; (5) the probation officer was not entitled to qualified immunity; (6) the probation officer was not entitled to quasi-judicial immunity; and (7) the director of the state probation and parole department was not entitled to quasi-judicial immunity. The court noted that the prisoner pled guilty after a judge advised him repeatedly that if he accepted the government's plea offer, he would not serve any time in prison, but would carry out his sentence in electronically-monitored home confinement. (Delaware County Office of Adult Probation and Parole Services, Pennsylvania)

U.S. Appeals Court
LIBERTY INTEREST
ORIGINAL SENTENCE
PROBATION

Persechini v. Callaway, 651 F.3d 802 (8th Cir. 2011). A state prisoner filed a § 1983 action against prison officials for alleged deprivation of his due process rights by terminating him from long-term substance abuse treatment program that resulted in the mandatory execution of his 15-year sentence and his ineligibility for probation. The district court dismissed the claim for failure to a state claim. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the prisoner lacked a liberty interest in: (1) the outcome of a disciplinary proceeding; (2) the outcome of the action taken by a program review committee; and (3) the outcome of termination from a treatment program. The court noted that the sanction imposed by the disciplinary committee for stealing a towel, confinement to his room for ten days and referral to program review committee, was neither atypical nor significant hardships in relation to ordinary incidents of prison life. (Ozark Corr'l Center, Missouri)

U.S. Appeals Court
GUIDELINES
LIBERTY INTEREST
ORIGINAL SENTENCE

Stein v. Ryan, 662 F.3d 1114 (9th Cir. 2011). A former prisoner brought an action in state court against the state and prison officials, alleging claims for negligence and violations of his civil rights, and seeking damages for the time he spent in prison pursuant to an illegal sentence. Following removal to the federal court, the district court dismissed the complaint. The former prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed, holding that the officials had no duty to discover that an Arizona court imposed an illegal sentence, they did not violate the former prisoner's right to due process, and the officials were not deliberately indifferent to the prisoner's liberty interest, as would violate his Eighth Amendment rights. (Arizona Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
MINIMUM SENTENCE

U.S. v. Dresbach, 806 F.Supp.2d 1039 (E.D.Mich. 2011.) A defendant moved for reduction in his sentence. The district court held that the federal Bureau of Prisons (BOP) properly exercised its discretion in considering the medical condition of the defendant's wife and daughter in denying his request for compassionate release. According to the court, the BOP had noted that the sentencing court was aware of the developing medical conditions of the prisoner's wife and daughter at the time of sentencing, and that the prisoner was presumably eligible for home confinement in eight months and release six months thereafter. According to the court, the BOP has the authority to consider reasons other than a defendant's own medical condition in determining whether compassionate release is warranted. (Federal Bureau of Prisons, Michigan)

U.S. Appeals Court
DELAY

U.S. v. Ferreira, 665 F.3d 701 (6th Cir. 2011). After denial of a motion to dismiss an indictment based on violation of his Sixth Amendment speedy trial right, a defendant pled guilty in district court to conspiracy to distribute 500 grams or more of methamphetamine. The defendant appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The court held that a thirty-five month delay between an indictment charging conspiracy to distribute 500 grams or more of methamphetamine and the defendant's guilty plea was sufficient to trigger an analysis of the defendant's claim that his Sixth Amendment speedy trial rights were violated. The court found that the thirty-five month delay was caused solely by the government's gross negligence, for the purposes of determining whether such a delay violated the defendant's Sixth Amendment right to speedy trial. The defendant was serving a term of imprisonment of 110 months following his guilty plea. (U.S. Marshals Service, Bartow County, Cobb County, Georgia)

U.S. Appeals Court
GUIDELINES
SUPERVISED RELEASE-
CONDITIONS

U.S. v. Mike, 632 F.3d 686 (10th Cir. 2011). A defendant, who was sentenced for assault resulting in serious bodily injury, appealed a district court order that overruled his objections to special conditions of supervised release based on his prior sex offense. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The court held that the condition calling for monitoring of the defend ant's computer usage did not constitute an abuse of discretion, but the condition was impermissibly vague. The court also found that a condition prohibiting the defendant from engaging in an occupation with access to children was improper, where the court failed to make findings required by the Sentencing Guidelines that an occupational restriction was the minimum restriction necessary. (U.S. District Court, New Mexico)

2012

U.S. Appeals Court
SEX OFFENDERS
DOUBLE JEOPARDY
EX POST FACTO

American Civil Liberties Union of Nevada v. Masto, 670 F.3d 1046 (9th Cir. 2012). The United States District Court for the District of Nevada, issued a permanent injunction prohibiting the retroactive application of an Assembly Bill expanding the scope of sex offender registration and notification requirements, and a Senate Bill imposing, among other things, residency and movement restrictions on certain sex offenders. The State of Nevada appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, dismissed as moot in part, and remanded. The court held that the requirements of the Nevada law expanding the scope of sex offender registration and notification requirements did not constitute retroactive punishment in violation of the Ex Post Facto Clause or the Double Jeopardy Clause. The court noted that the intent of the Nevada legislature in passing the law was to create a civil regulatory regime with the purpose of enhancing public safety, and the law was not so punitive in effect or purpose that it negated the Nevada legislature's intent to enact a civil regulatory scheme. The court found that the question of the constitutionality of retroactive application to sex offenders of the residency and movement restrictions of the Nevada law was moot. (State of Nevada)

U.S. District Court
REVIEW
SUPERVISED RELEASE

Bentley v. Dennison, 852 F.Supp.2d 379 (S.D.N.Y. 2012). Parolees, on behalf of themselves and a presumed class, brought a § 1983 action against officials at a state's department of corrections and department of parole, alleging that the officials subjected them to unlawful custody by continuing to impose terms of post-release supervision (PRS) that had been declared unlawful, and arresting and re-incarcerating them for technical violations of those terms. The defendants moved to dismiss. The district court denied the motion, finding that the officials were not entitled to qualified immunity at the motion to dismiss stage, and that the parolees stated a § 1983 claim against each individual official. The officials' contended that the appeals court decision that found the practice to be unlawful created confusion about the appropriate remedy for parolees who had been given the terms unlawfully. The court held that the appeals court decision clearly established that the administrative imposition of mandatory PRS was unconstitutional, that the court clearly explained that the remedy for such a legal infirmity was that the term of PRS should be vacated and the state should be given the opportunity to seek appropriate resentencing, and the officials had an obligation to treat the appeals court decision as binding on all terms of administratively imposed PRS. (New York State Dept. of Correctional Services, Department of Parole)

U.S. District Court
PLACE OF IMPRISONMENT

Shah v. Danberg, 855 F.Supp.2d 215 (D.Del. 2012). A state inmate who pled guilty but mentally ill to a charge of first degree murder filed a § 1983 action against a state judge and prison officials alleging that his placement in a correctional center, rather than in a psychiatric center, violated his constitutional rights. The court held that the state judge was entitled to absolute judicial immunity from liability in inmate's § 1983 action despite the inmate's contention that the judge's incorrect application of a state statute resulted in violation of his constitutional rights, where there were no allegations that the judge acted outside the scope of her judicial capacity, or in the absence of jurisdiction. The could ruled that the state inmate failed to establish the likelihood of success on the merits of his claim and thus was not entitled to a preliminary injunction ordering his transfer, despite the inmate's contention that he was mentally unstable and had repeatedly caused himself physical injury during his suicide attempts, where medical records the inmate submitted were ten years old, and a state supreme court recognized that prison officials had discretion to house inmates at facilities they chose. The court ordered the appointment of counsel, noting that the inmate was unable to afford legal representation, he had a history of mental health problems, and the matter presented complex legal issues. (James T. Vaughn Corr'l. Center, Smyrna, Delaware)

U.S. Appeals Court
CREDIT

Sudler v. City of New York, 689 F.3d 159 (2nd Cir. 2012). Inmates of state and city prison systems brought an action against corrections defendants, alleging violations of their due process rights when they were imprisoned for periods of time longer than their judicially imposed sentences. The district court dismissed the claims against some defendants, and granted summary judgment as to the remaining defendants. The prisoners appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that state prison officials were entitled to qualified immunity on the inmates' claim that their procedural due process rights were violated when prison officials failed to promptly afford them PJT (parole jail time) credits for the time served in local custody on sentences ordered to run concurrently with undischarged parole revocation sentences. (New York State, New York City prisons)

U.S. District Court
GUIDELINES ORIGINAL SENTENCE

Sweat v. Grondolsky, 898 F.Supp.2d 347 (D.Mass. 2012). An inmate filed a petition for a writ of habeas corpus against a warden, alleging that the Federal Bureau of Prisons (BOP) had failed to give him credit for time he served in state custody. The warden moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The court held that the BOP was bound by a federal court's express designation that the inmate's federal sentence should run consecutively to the state sentence, and the inmate's claim that the sentencing judge incorrectly construed the facts of his case, and therefore misapplied the provisions of a sentencing guideline, had to be brought in a motion to vacate the sentence before the sentencing court. (Federal Medical Center, Devens, Massachusetts)

U.S. District Court
RESTITUTION

U.S. v. Beulke, 892 F.Supp.2d 1176 (D.S.D. 2012). After a defendant was convicted of embezzlement, sentenced to prison, and ordered to pay restitution, the Government moved to enforce collection and to order the defendant to apply all of his pension payments while in prison to the restitution order. The district court granted the motion in part. The court held that, pursuant to the Mandatory Victims Restitution Act (MVRA), the Government could seize the defendant's interest in his 401(k) and that any interest the defendant's wife had in his 401(k) account was subject to the Government's perfected lien. The court decided to exercise its statutory discretion so as to allow garnishment of 25% of the defendant's net monthly pension, while allowing his estranged wife to continue to receive half of the pension payments during the pendency of their divorce. (South Dakota)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEX OFFENDERS PROBATION-CONDITIONS

U.S. v. Juvenile Male, 670 F.3d 999 (9th Cir. 2012). Three juvenile defendants, each of whom was a member of an Indian tribe and who pleaded true to a charge of aggravated sexual abuse with children in the district court, appealed their conditions of probation or supervision requiring registration under the Sex Offender Registration and Notification Act (SORNA). The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the SORNA registration requirement as applied to certain juvenile delinquents in cases of aggravated sexual abuse superseded the conflicting confidentiality provisions of the Federal Juvenile Delinquency Act (FJDA), and that the SORNA registration requirement did not violate the juveniles' constitutional rights. (Fort Peck Tribes, Montana)

U.S. Appeals Court
GUIDELINES SUPERVISED RELEASE CONDITIONS

U.S. v. Taylor, 679 F.3d 1005 (8th Cir. 2012). Following release from prison, the district court sentenced a defendant to 24 months in prison after he admitted to violating two conditions of supervised release. The defendant appealed. The appeals court vacated and remanded, finding that consideration of the defendant's eligibility to participate in a rehabilitation program for sentencing purposes was plain error. The district court had considered the defendant's eligibility to participate in a 500–hour drug program available from the Bureau of Prisons when sentencing the defendant to 24 months for violation of supervised release. The appeals court held that this affected the defendant's rights in a manner that seriously affected fairness, integrity, or public reputation of judicial proceedings, and thus amounted to plain error. The court noted that the advisory guideline range was 6 to 12 months, and the district court may have imposed a lesser sentence if it had not focused on a particular drug treatment program within a federal institution. The defendant had failed to report to a residential facility where he was to spend 120 days and admitted to consuming alcohol. (Nebraska)

U.S. Appeals Court
INSANITY

U.S. v. Thornberg, 676 F.3d 703 (8th Cir. 2012). Following his apprehension more than six years after escaping from federal prison camp, a defendant pled not guilty, by reason of insanity, to the charge of escape from custody. The district court granted the defendant's first motion for a psychiatric evaluation, denied his second motion for a psychiatric evaluation, and sentenced him to 30 months in prison upon his conviction by a jury for escape. The defendant appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court found that although a forensic psychologist from the federal Bureau of Prisons did not review the indigent defendant's full medical history, a psychiatric evaluation determining that the defendant did not suffer from a severe mental defect was not deficient, precluding his claim of deprivation of due process by a single evaluation performed by a psychologist rather than psychiatrist, and by denial of his request for a second evaluation to assess his competency to stand trial. The court noted that the psychologist reviewed defendant's medical records dating from the time of his escape and concluded that his feelings of persecution from his family that allegedly coerced him to escape from prison were not evidence that he had delusions, as those feelings disappeared immediately after he escaped, and that his attempts to evade detection after escape could be seen as evidence of his understanding of the wrongfulness of his conduct. (Federal Prison Camp, Duluth, Minnesota)

U.S. Appeals Court
ORIGINAL SENTENCE

U.S. v. Tyerman, 701 F.3d 552 (8th Cir. 2012). A defendant was convicted in district court of being a felon in possession of a firearm and he appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. After a trial, the defendant was convicted in the district court of being a felon in possession of a firearm and ammunition, and possession of a stolen firearm. His motion for acquittal or new trial was denied and the defendant appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the government's passive conduct in receiving information regarding the location of the defendant's gun, from the defendant's counsel, did not violate the defendant's Sixth Amendment right-to-counsel. The court found that the defendant's conduct in creating handcuff keys and practicing the use of them constituted a substantial step, as an element of attempt, with respect to escaping from pretrial incarceration, for purposes of using attempted escape as the basis for a sentence enhancement for obstruction of justice. At sentencing, a U.S. Marshal testified that prison guards discovered two homemade handcuff keys in the defendant's cell. According to the Marshal, during the investigation, other inmates revealed the defendant's plans to escape from jail and his use of the law library (which lacked surveillance) to practice removing handcuffs. Finding the Marshal credible, the district court applied a two-level adjustment for obstruction of justice based on the attempted escape, sentencing the defendant 72 months' imprisonment. (U. S. District Court, Iowa)

U.S. Appeals Court
EX POST FACTO
GOOD- TIME

Waddell v. Department of Correction, 680 F.3d 384 (4th Cir. 2012). A district court dismissed a prisoner's habeas petition as time-barred, and, in the alternative, denied the petition on its merits, and the petitioner appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the state corrections department's practice of applying earned good time credits for certain identified purposes, but not for the purpose of reducing a prisoner's life sentence did not give rise to a due process protected liberty interest in a life sentence reduced by good time credits. The court also held that the corrections department's failure to utilize the prisoner's good time credits to reduce his life sentence under the eighty-year rule did not give rise to an ex post facto claim. (North Carolina Department of Correction)

U.S. District Court
INVOLUNTARY COMMITMENT REVIEW

Wiley v. Buncombe County, 846 F.Supp.2d 480 (W.D.N.C. 2012). A pretrial detainee brought an action under § 1983 and § 1985 against a county, sheriff, jail, and court official, alleging that the defendants unlawfully subjected him to multiple periods of involuntary commitment and failed to take proper action on a state habeas corpus petition that he filed challenging the periods of commitment. The defendants moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion. The court held that: (1) the detainee could not maintain a § 1983 action challenging the terms of his confinement; (2) the clerk had quasi-judicial immunity from the pretrial detainee's § 1983 claim; (3) the jail was not a "person" subject to suit under § 1983; (4) the county could not be liable to the pretrial detainee under § 1983 for the actions of the sheriff; and (5) the county could not be liable to the pretrial detainee under § 1983 for the actions of the county clerk. The court noted that under North Carolina law, the county had no control over the sheriff's employees and/or control over the jail, and therefore county could not be liable to the detainee under § 1983 for the actions of the sheriff or those of his detention officers for events that occurred at a jail operated by the sheriff. (Buncombe County Detention Facility, North Carolina)

2013

U.S. District Court
LIBERTY INTEREST
SEX OFFENDERS

Allen v. Clements, 930 F.Supp.2d 1252 (D.Colo. 2013). Inmates in the Colorado Department of Corrections (CDOC) who had been sentenced to indeterminate terms of imprisonment under the Colorado Sex Offender Lifetime Supervision Act (SOLSA) brought a class action against CDOC officials, alleging under § 1983 that the officials were arbitrarily denying them sex offender treatment and interfering with their access to counsel and courts. The officials moved to dismiss for failure to state a claim. The district court granted the motion. The court held that: (1) the inmates failed to state an Eighth Amendment claim; (2) terminating one inmate's treatment because of polygraphs did not violate due process; (3) denial of re-enrollment requests did not implicate the inmates' liberty interests; (4) termination procedures comported with procedural due process; and (5) the inmates failed to state a substantive due process claim. The court found that terminating two inmates' treatment because one had a rash and the other reported a telephone call in which his cousin mentioned seeing his children implicated the inmates' liberty interests protected by due process because the reasons for termination were not reasonably related to the goals of their treatment. But the court noted that there was no indication that the alleged deprivation extended the inmates' sentences, and that procedures providing for a treatment waitlist and for state judicial review of CDOC termination decisions existed, and the two inmates had already been able to re-enroll in treatment multiple times. (Colorado Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
SEX OFFENDERS
SENTENCE

Armato v. Grounds, 944 F.Supp.2d 627 (C.D.Ill. 2013). A former inmate, a sex offender, brought an action against Illinois Department of Corrections (IDOC) employees, alleging under § 1983 that the employees violated his rights under Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment by allowing him to be held beyond the term of his incarceration, and asserting a claim for false imprisonment under state law. The employees moved for summary judgment. The district court allowed the motion. The court held that the employees complied with the terms of a state court judge's handwritten sentencing order and the employees were not deliberately indifferent in allegedly allowing the inmate to be held beyond his release date. (Lake County Jail, Robinson Correctional Center, Illinois Department of Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
REVIEW CONSECUTIVE SENTENCES

Harrison v. Michigan, 722 F.3d 768 (6th Cir. 2013). A prisoner filed an action against a state and state officers seeking damages and injunctive relief stemming from his unlawful confinement in a prison system. The district court dismissed the action. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The appeals court found that the statute of limitations applicable to the prisoner's § 1983 complaint had not been triggered until the state court of appeals issued its holding that the prisoner had been improperly sentenced to consecutive terms for his convictions and remanded the case for entry of a corrected judgment. The court noted that although the prisoner apparently had learned that he was being held unlawfully while still in prison, he did not have knowledge of his injury until the state court of appeals established that he had suffered such an injury. (Michigan Department of Corrections, Michigan Parole Board)

U.S. Appeals Court
GUIDELINES
REDUCTION OF SENTENCE

In re Morgan, 713 F.3d 1365 (11th Cir. 2013). A prisoner serving a life sentence without parole, based on conduct committed while he was a juvenile, filed an application for leave to file a second or successive motion to vacate, set aside, or correct the sentence. The appeals court denied the motion. The appeals court held that although a decision of the Supreme Court established a new rule of constitutional law, in that it determined for the first time in Miller that the Eighth Amendment forbids a sentencing scheme that mandates life in prison without possibility of parole for juvenile offenders, the rule was not made retroactive to cases on collateral review, as would warrant granting leave to the prisoner to file a second or successive motion to vacate, set aside, or correct his sentence. (Florida)

U.S. Appeals Court
ORIGINAL SEN-TENCE
REVIEW

In re Pendleton, 732 F.3d 280 (3rd Cir. 2013). Prisoners who were convicted as juveniles applied for leave to file second or successive habeas petitions based on a new rule of constitutional law, made retroactive to cases on collateral review by the Supreme Court, that was previously unavailable. The appeals court granted the applications. The court held that prisoners made a prima facie showing that the new constitutional rule regarding imposition of life sentences on juvenile offenders was retroactive. (Pennsylvania Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
EX POST FACTO
PROBATION-CONDI-TIONS
SEX OFFENDERS

John Does 1-4 v. Snyder, 932 F.Supp.2d 803 (E.D.Mich. 2013). Sex offenders filed suit challenging the constitutionality of the Michigan Sex Offender Registry Act (SORA). The state defendants moved to dismiss the complaint. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that: (1) SORA did not violate the Ex Post Facto Clause; (2) SORA's quarterly reporting requirement did not offend due process or substantially burden registrants' rights to interstate or intrastate travel; (3) SORA did not implicate registrants' due process right to engage in common occupations of life; (4) the registrants satisfactorily alleged that SORA's loitering prohibition, which did not contain any exemption for parental activities, could be proven to infringe upon their fundamental due process right to direct and participate in their children's education and upbringing; (5) a jury question was presented as to whether retroactively extending the registration period of sex offenders from twenty-five years to life was justified by a legitimate legislative purpose; and (6) jury questions were presented as to whether provisions of SORA requiring sex offenders to report information about their online accounts and activities violated their First Amendment rights. (Mich. Sex Offender Registry Act)

U.S. Appeals Court
CLEMENCY
CAPITAL PUNISH-MENT

Mann v. Palmer, 713 F.3d 1306 (11th Cir. 2013). A death row inmate filed a civil rights action, challenging the method of execution in Florida as cruel and unusual under the Eighth Amendment. The district court dismissed the complaint for failure to state a claim. The inmate moved for a stay of execution and expedited consideration of his appeal of the dismissal of his complaint. The appeals court denied the motions. The court held that the inmate failed to establish the likelihood of success on the merits of his Eighth Amendment claim, and that the process which the inmate received in his clemency hearing satisfied due process. The court noted that Florida's substitution of pentobarbital for sodium pentothal in its method of execution did not constitute a significant alteration to the method of execution in Florida so as to commence running of a new period of limitations on the death row inmate's claim challenging the method of execution in Florida. (Florida State Prison)

U.S. Appeals Court
CLEMENCY
DEATH PENALTY

Schad v. Brewer, 732 F.3d 946 (9th Cir. 2013). A prisoner scheduled for execution moved to enjoin his clemency hearing and stay his execution, alleging that the Arizona Clemency board was biased and subject to undue pressure by the Governor, in violation of due process. The district court denied the motion. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that due process concerns were not implicated in Arizona's clemency proceedings. According to the court, the fact that members of Arizona's Clemency Board who had recommended clemency were not reappointed by the governor did not raise due process concerns. (Arizona Board of Executive Clemency)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEX OFFENDERS
SUPERVISED
RELEASE

U.S. v. Crowder, 738 F.3d 1103 (9th Cir. 2013). The United States District Court for the District of Montana revoked an offender's supervised release, imposed for failure to register under the Sex Offender Registration and Notification Act (SORNA), and sentenced the offender to two terms of 14 months' imprisonment to run concurrently, and to a lifetime term of supervised release. The defendant appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that reduction of a renewed lifetime term of supervised release by the length of time spent in prison for the violation was not warranted. (Montana)

2014

U.S. District Court
SEX OFFENDER
PROBATION-CONDITIONS
PAROLE-CONDITIONS

Reinhardt v. Kopcow, 66 F.Supp.3d 1348 (D.Colo. 2014). Inmates, parolees, and probationers, as well their family members, brought a § 1983 action against various employees of the Colorado Department of Corrections (CDOC) and members of the state's Sex Offender Management Board, alleging that the state's treatment of persons convicted of sex crimes violated their rights under the First, Fourth, Fifth, and Fourteenth Amendment. The plaintiffs sought monetary damages and injunctive and declaratory relief. The defendants moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and a denied in part. The court held that the potential penalty resulting from a Colorado policy that requires inmates in the state's sex offender treatment program to admit to prior acts, was so severe as to constitute compulsion to testify, and would violate their privilege against self-incrimination. The court noted that inmates who chose to participate in the program would be compelled to make incriminating statements that could be used against them during any retrial. The court found that individuals classified as sex offenders, both imprisoned and on probation, sufficiently alleged that Colorado policies restricting their contact with family members, and particularly with their children, were not rationally related to any legitimate penological interest, as required to support their claims that these policies violated their First and Fourteenth Amendment rights related to familial association and due process. The court noted that some of these individuals were not convicted of sex offenses involving children, and some of them were not convicted of any sex offense at all. The court held that CDOC employees were entitled to qualified immunity from liability, where the rights of individuals classified as sex offenders that were purportedly violated by Colorado policies restricting their contact with family members were not clearly established at the time of the alleged violation. (Colorado Dept. of Corrections, Sex Offender Management Board)

U.S. Appeals Court
HOUSE ARREST

Thornton v. Brown, 757 F.3d 834 (9th Cir. 2014). A state parolee filed a civil rights action against the Governor of the State of California, Secretary of Corrections, and parole personnel to challenge the imposition and enforcement of a residency restriction and a requirement that he submit to electronic monitoring using a Global Positioning System (GPS) device as conditions of his parole. The district court dismissed the action. The parolee appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The court held that: (1) neither absolute nor qualified immunity barred the parolee's civil rights claims against the State of California, Secretary of Corrections, and parole personnel that were limited to injunctive relief; (2) absolute immunity barred the state parolee's civil rights claims for damages against his parole officers for imposing allegedly unconstitutional parole conditions; (3) absolute immunity did not extend to the state parolee's civil rights claim that parole officers enforced conditions of his parole in an unconstitutionally arbitrary or discriminatory manner; and (4) the parolee could challenge a condition of parole under § 1983 if his or her claim, if successful, would neither result in speedier release from parole nor imply, either directly or indirectly, the invalidity of criminal judgments underlying that parole term. (California Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation)

U.S. Appeals Court
REDUCTION

U.S. v. Batts, 758 F.3d 915 (8th Cir. 2014). A defendant pleaded guilty in the district court to escape of a prisoner in custody. He appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the prison camp from which the defendant walked away was not a non-secure facility, as required in order to make the defendant eligible for a sentence reduction on such basis at sentencing. (Federal Correctional Institution, Forrest City, Arkansas)

U.S. Appeals Court
CLEMENCY
CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

Winfield v. Steele, 755 F.3d 629 (8th Cir. 2014). A death row inmate filed a § 1983 action alleging that state actors violated his right to due process of law by obstructing efforts to secure a grant of clemency from the governor. The district court stayed execution, and the state appealed. The appeals court vacated the stay, finding that the inmate failed to demonstrate a significant possibility of success on his claim, where the Department of Corrections furnished staff member's signed declaration in support of clemency to the governor. (Potosi Correctional Center, Missouri)

2015

U.S. Appeals Court
EX POST FACTO

Hinojosa v. Davey, 803 F.3d 412 (9th Cir. 2015). A state prisoner petitioned for federal habeas relief, challenging a state statutory amendment modifying the credit-earning status of prison-gang members and associates in segregated housing, so that such prisoners could no longer earn any good-time credits that would reduce their sentences. The district court denied the petition and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded with instructions to the district court. The court held that the amendment disadvantaged the offenders it affected by increasing the punishment for their crimes, an element for an ex post facto violation. The court noted that even if a prisoner could easily opt out of his prison gang, a prisoner who continued doing what he was doing before the statute was amended would have his prison time effectively lengthened. (Special Housing Unit, Corcoran State Prison, California)

U.S. District Court
GOOD TIME
EQUAL PROTECTION

Linton v. O'Brien, 142 F.Supp.3d 215 (D. Mass. 2015). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against the Commissioner of the Massachusetts Department of Corrections and prison officials, alleging that prison personnel violated his due process, equal protection, and 8th Amendment rights by not providing rehabilitative educational programs that awarded good time credits. The defendants moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion, dismissing the complaint. The court held that prison officials' refusal to allow the inmate, who was housed in a disciplinary unit, an opportunity to participate in educational and rehabilitative programs in order to earn good time credits to reduce his sentence, did not violate the inmate's due process rights. According to the court, the inmate did not demonstrate that the officials' exercise of discretion to not provide good time credit opportunities to inmates in a disciplinary unit constituted an imposition of an atypical and significant hardship not normally within range of confinement expected for an inmate serving an indeterminate term. The court noted that the exercise of discretion by the Department of Corrections in imposing different classifications upon inmates, with respect to restricting the ability of an inmate housed in a prison disciplinary unit to earn good time credits to reduce his sentence, did not lack a rational basis, was not otherwise based on suspect classification, and thus did not violate the inmate's equal protection rights. The court found that the DOC had a legitimate public purpose in allocating limited resources available for earned good time credit programs to inmates who were motivated to make best use of them by improving their chances for successful return to society and as an inducement to control and reduce those inmates' tendencies towards violence. (MCI—Cedar Junction, Massachusetts)

U.S. District Court
SUPERVISED RELEASE REVOCATION

Malloy v. Gray, 79 F.Supp.3d 53 (D.D.C. 2015). A District of Columbia felony offender brought a Bivens action in the District of Columbia Superior Court against the District of Columbia's mayor, the District's contractor for operation of a correctional mental health treatment facility, and the United States Parole Commission (USPC). The offender sought damages for an Eighth Amendment violation based on allegations that the offender was detained beyond the USPC-imposed term of imprisonment following revocation of his supervised release. The case was moved to federal court and the defendants filed motions for dismissal or summary judgment. The district court granted the motions, finding that the mayor and the contractor lacked statutory authority to participate in the proceedings for revocation of supervised release, and a 12-month term of imprisonment, upon revocation of supervised release, was within the authority of the USPC. (District of Columbia, Corrections Corporation of America, Correctional Treatment Facility)

U.S. District Court
RESTITUTION

Ngemi v. County of Nassau, 87 F.Supp.3d 413 (E.D.N.Y. 2015). A father brought a § 1983 action against a county, alleging he was denied due process in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment in being arrested and incarcerated for failing to meet his child support obligations. The county moved to dismiss for failure to state a claim. The district court granted the motion, finding that the father received ample process prior to his arrest. The court noted that father was present at the hearing where his failure to comply with the order of support was addressed, an order of disposition was mailed to his home after the hearing and warned him that failure to comply would result in imprisonment, the order afforded the father the opportunity to object, the order of commitment was also mailed to the father and advised him of his ability to appeal, the father never contested the orders, and the father never claimed over the course of four years that he could not pay his child support arrears. (Nassau County Family Court, Nassau County Correctional Center, New York)

SECTION 44: STANDARDS

The following pages present summaries of court decisions which address this topic area. These summaries provide readers with highlights of each case, but are not intended to be a substitute for the review of the full case. The cases do not represent all court decisions which address this topic area, but rather offer a sampling of relevant holdings.

The decisions summarized below were current as of the date indicated on the title page of this edition of the Catalog. Prior to publication, the citation for each case was verified, and the case was researched in Shepard's Citations to determine if it had been altered upon appeal (reversed or modified). The Catalog is updated annually. An annual supplement provides replacement pages for cases in the prior edition which have changed, and adds new cases. Readers are encouraged to consult the Topic Index to identify related topics of interest. The text in the section entitled "How to Use The Catalog" at the beginning of the Catalog provides an overview which may also be helpful to some readers.

The case summaries which follow are organized by year, with the earliest case presented first. Within each year, cases are organized alphabetically by the name of the plaintiff. The left margin offers a quick reference, highlighting the type of court involved and identifying appropriate subtopics addressed by each case.

1970

U.S. District Court
STANDARDS

Palmigiano v. Travisono, 317 F.Supp. 776 (D. R.I. 1970). Federal courts must articulate permissible standards where there exists deprivation of prisoners' constitutional rights. (Adult Correctional Institution, Rhode Island)

1972

U.S. District Court
STATE STATUTES

Taylor v. Sterrett, 344 F.Supp. 411 (N.D. Tex. 1972), reh'g denied, 420 U.S. 983 (1974). Where conditions of confinement do not meet the minimum requirements of state statutes, the court need not reach the subjective criteria of cruel and unusual punishment. The court found that the Dallas county sheriff and commissioners were not complying with existing state law. The court ordered the county to bring its facilities and practices in line with Texas statutes. (Dallas County Jail, Texas)

1974

U.S. District Court
STATE STANDARDS

Campise v. Hamilton, 382 F.Supp. 172 (S.D. Tex. 1974), cert denied, 429 U.S. 1102 (1976). Sheriff knew or should have known that the prisoner was kept under inhumane conditions and is liable under Section 1983, which incorporates state standards. (Brazos County Jail, Texas)

1975

U.S. District Court
STATE REGULATIONS

Padgett v. Stein, 406 F.Supp. 287 (M.D. Penn. 1975). While the federal courts will take action to protect the constitutional rights of inmates, the traditional policy of judicial restraint with respect to matters of penal administration has not been abandoned. A federal court may not direct the expenditure of funds to build new facilities, but may order the release of prisoners held in unconstitutional facilities. The federal courts' inability to compel action by state courts does not preclude enjoining judges who are acting in a non judicial capacity by managing a jail. Where state fire and safety regulations were incorporated in the consent decree, judgment would be reserved pending administrative interpretation of regulations under doctrines of comity and primary jurisdiction. (York County Prison, Pennsylvania)

1976

U.S. District Court
STATE STATUTES

Lucas v. Wasser, 425 F.Supp. 955 (S.D. N.Y. 1976). Federal court should not abstain from deciding detainee's Section 1983 claim against Commission of Correction, even though there has been no state court interpretation of the new statute, expanding the power of the commission, because the issue is essentially one of fact and not law. Failure of Commission of Correction to inspect and appraise jails in matters of health, a duty delegated to it by state law, raised Section 1983 claim. (Sullivan County Jail, New York)

1977

U.S. District Court
STANDARDS

Ahrens v. Thomas, 434 F.Supp. 873 (W.D. Mo. 1977), aff'd, 570 F.2d 288. Citation of a tentative draft or of finally approved American Bar Association standard, or the citation and approval of standards promulgated by other professional groups or organizations does not mean that the principles of law stated are the law of the land until and unless those principles are fully and directly accepted by a court deciding a particular case. In this case, the various standards set forth by professional groups are relevant and material. Evidence of failure of county jail to meet a standard promulgated by the National Sheriffs' Association is relevant and material to question of whether conditions of the jail constitute cruel and unusual punishment. (Platte County Jail, Missouri)

1978

U.S. District Court
STANDARDS

Burks v. Walsh, 461 F.Supp. 454 (W.D. Missouri, 1978). Actions were brought seeking injunctive and declaratory relief on behalf of inmates at the Missouri State Penitentiary. After a trial limited to the issues of overcrowding and unsanitary conditions, the district court held that: (1) triple celling inmates in 59.2-square-foot cells in the diagnostic center, in 65-square-foot cells in the administrative segregation unit, and in 66-square-foot cells in the adjustment unit, as well as double celling of inmates in 47.18-square-foot cells in the special treatment unit, constituted cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the eighth amendment, but (2) except in such instances, the conditions in the aggregate which presently existed at the State Penitentiary did not violate the cruel and unusual punishment clause of the eighth amendment. In examining conditions of state penitentiary, the court's inquiry had to be limited to determining whether conditions at the penitentiary caused inmates to suffer deprivations of constitutional dimensions. The eighth amendment's prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment is not limited to specific acts directed at selected individuals, but is equally pertinent to general conditions of confinement. Confinement itself will result in a finding of cruel and unusual punishment, however, only where confinement is characterized by conditions and practices so bad as to be shocking to the conscience of reasonably civilized people. In determining whether conditions at the state penitentiary constituted cruel and unusual punishment, the district court had to be cautious not to place undue emphasis upon "design capacities" and minimum square footage mandates of other courts, nor were minimum square footage standards of various professional associations dispositive; furthermore, in applying the "totality of circumstances" approach to Missouri Penitentiary conditions, the relaxed amicable atmosphere generated by the prison administration had to tip scales in favor of the state in areas of doubtful constitutionality. In the aggregate, and with certain exceptions regarding overcrowding in certain units, all conditions presently existing at Missouri State Penitentiary, including but not limited to conditions and qualities of individual cells, showers, toilets, dining halls, kitchen, windows, temperature, noise level, canteen, recreational areas, laundry service, ventilation systems, visiting room, pest control program, prison industries and other activities, are not intolerable in light of the modern conscience, or shocking to the conscience of the court, and thus do not violate cruel and unusual punishment clause of the eighth amendment. The Missouri State Penitentiary is overcrowded but, because it has so much acreage within the walls, because of the many and varied activities available to inmates, and because of the relative freedom enjoyed by inmates to utilize recreational areas and the many activities available to them, the penitentiary, viewed as a whole, is not now so overcrowded as to be intolerable, inhumane, totally unreasonable in light of the modern conscience, or shocking to the conscience of the court. (Missouri State Penitentiary)

U.S. District Court
STANDARDS

M.C.I. Concord Advisory Bd. v. Hall, 447 F.Supp. 398 (D. Mass, 1978). In a civil rights action brought to challenge conditions of confinement at a state correctional institution, the district court held that: (1) plaintiff prisoners sustained the burden of proving that incarceration of inmates in protective custody cells, in awaiting action cells and in institutional holding cells violated eighth amendment standards, but (2) plaintiffs failed to sustain their burden of proving that double celling in one area and use of a hospital wardroom for a dormitory violated eighth amendment standards. Injunctive relief was granted in part.

An eighth amendment proscription against cruel and unusual punishment is flexible, drawing its meaning from evolving standards of decency that mark the progress of maturing society, and penal measures are to be evaluated against broad and idealistic concepts of dignity, civilized standards, humanity and decency.

An equal protection challenge to a policy under which inmates undergoing classification and placement at state institutions were single-celled in contrast to double celling during classification at one institution involved neither suspect classification nor fundamental interest, and a heavy burden rested with plaintiff prisoners to demonstrate that no rational justification existed for separate classification programs.

Nothing in the constitution requires prison officials to treat all inmate groups alike where differentiation may avoid institutional disruption or violence. (Massachusetts Correctional Institution, Concord)

1979

U.S. District Court
STATE STATUTES

Holly v. Rapone, 476 F.Supp. 226 (E.D. Penn. 1979). Prisoner underwent withdrawal symptoms and receives no treatment until twenty-four hours after the onset of symptoms. This was not deliberate indifference to known medical needs because treatment was rendered within the stated time limit according to state law. (Delaware County Prison, Pennsylvania)

1980

U.S. District Court
STATE STANDARD

Hluchan v. Fauver, 482 F.Supp. 1155 (D. N.J. 1980). In October 1979, the district court for New Jersey declared unconstitutional a state standard which denied eligibility for minimum custody status to inmates who had been convicted of more than one "sex offense." Guidelines were set forth in the opinion to help in revising the standard. Within the time allotted, the defendants submitted proposed revisions to the standard. The court first stated that the definition of "sex offense" by reference to specific section of the New Jersey Criminal Code was entirely proper. Furthermore, the court agreed with the categories from which the offenses included in the standard were selected: (1) minors; (2) violence or the threat of violence; or (3) the sale of prohibited sexual goods and services in the course of a business for profit.

The court stated that the standard failed, however, because of the inclusion of certain phrases in the definition of "sex offense." One section, which provided for the hiring out or employing of minors for mendicant or immoral purposes, the court found to be irrational. This section referred to the disposing "of the child for any mendicant or slandering business." The court pointed out that "mendicant" is defined as "practicing beggary" or "begging" and that wandering business is not necessarily concerned with sex or immorality. The court stated that if such terms were applied to the definition of "sex offenders," the classification would violate the equal protection clause of the fourteenth amendment. The court then discussed other sections of the proposed standard which listed criminal conduct constituting a "sex offense." The court found it impossible to determine the meanings of these paragraphs. The court also stated that defining sexual offenses by reference to specific sections of the New Jersey code would render the standard violative of the equal protection clause since the New Jersey code differs in structure from other state codes. The court thus found the proposed standard to be unconstitutional, but granted the commissioner thirty days to make revisions. (New Jersey Department of Corrections)

1981

U.S. District Court
STANDARDS

Heitman v. Gabriel, 524 F.Supp. 622 (W.D. Mo. 1981). Standards not necessarily a constitutional minima. When jail conditions are found to be unconstitutional, as in this case, the court has the power to order correction of conditions and costs are not to deter these orders. The court must order correction of conditions falling below decent minimums; published jail standards establish goals but do not reflect constitutional minima. (Buchanan County Jail, Missouri)

U.S. Appeals Court
STANDARDS

Lareau v. Manson, 651 F.2d 96 (2nd Cir. 1981). Adopting most of the findings of the district court, the United States of Appeals for the Second Circuit has ordered major reforms in the Hartford Community Correctional Center (HCCC), dealing generally with overcrowding. The constitutional standard for the legality of conditions of confinement is different for pretrial detainees and for convicted inmates. For pretrial detainees, the test is whether the conditions amount to punishment without due process in violation of the fourteenth amendment. With respect to convicted inmates, the criterion is whether the punishment is cruel and unusual as defined under the eighth amendment.

Reviewing the numerous findings of the district court, the appellate court looked to the supreme court case of Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. 520. Viewing overcrowding at the HCCC as related to pretrial detainees, the court cited the following standard of whether such conditions amount to punishment: "It must be shown that the overcrowding subjects a detainee over an extended period to genuine privation and hardship not reasonably related to a legitimate governmental objective."

Based upon this standard the court found that double-bunking in cells originally designed for one person, compounded by overcrowded dayrooms, imposed unconstitutional punishment on pretrial detainees in all cases except where such hardship was related to a legitimate governmental purpose. The court here found that these hardships promoted neither security nor the effective management of the institution.

Other conditions were even less acceptable. The use of a glass enclosed dayroom (dubbed the "fish tank") as a dormitory room housing numerous inmates on a full time basis was held to amount to punishment and was thus unconstitutional with regard to pretrial detainees. In addition, the placing of mattresses on the floors of cells to accommodate more inmates and the assignment of healthy inmates to medical cells (sometimes with mentally or physically ill cellmates) to alleviate overcrowding were held to constitute impermissible punishment.

The court further stated that the length of incarceration of pretrial detainees becomes relevant in such determination: "Conditions unacceptable for weeks or months might be tolerable for a few days." As such, the court indicated that while double-bunking and overloaded dayrooms might be tolerable, and thus constitutionally permissible for a few days, after 154 or so days, they would become unacceptable punishment. The use of the "fish tank" and floor mattresses, however, were held to constitute punishment regardless of the number of days imposed.

Viewing the conditions as they related to convicted persons, the court pointed out that it was to be guided by a wholly different standard. Here, in order to constitute a constitutional violation, the conditions had to be such as to amount to cruel and unusual punishment. Nevertheless, the court found the overcrowded conditions intolerable. Noting that the thirty to thirty-five square feet of living space per inmate fell far short of the standards promulgated by groups such as the Connecticut Department of Corrections, the American Correctional Association, the United Nations and the National Sheriffs' Association, and further noting that the dayroom at the HCCC offered the "relief of a noisy subway platform" the court held that double-bunking, with respect to convicted inmates, was unconstitutional except where inmates are confined no more than about thirty days.

As with the pretrial detainees, the court found that the constitutional rights of the convicted inmates were immediately violated by confinement in the "fish tank" and by policies requiring them to sleep on mattresses on the floors and to be assigned to medical holding cells for no reason other than to alleviate overcrowding.

Finally, the court ordered that all newly admitted inmates, with minor exceptions, be given a medical examination within forty-eight hours of admission. (Hartford Community Correctional Center, Connecticut)

U.S. Appeals Court
STATE REGULATIONS

Ramos v. Lamm, 639 F.2d 559 (10th Cir. 1980), cert. denied, 450 U.S. 1041. While the state health code does not establish a constitutional minimum for the conditions of a kitchen, it is substantial evidence of what constitutes the humane conditions required by the eighth amendment. The record indicates that the conditions of the kitchen constitute a substantial hazard to the health of the inmates and that they, therefore, violate the eighth amendment. (State Penitentiary, Canon City, Colorado)

U.S. District Court
STATE REGULATIONS

Vazquez v. Gray, 523 F.Supp. 1359 (S.D. N.Y. 1981). Court outlines a response to overcrowding. The United States District Court found the Westchester County Jail overcrowded and determined that the proper method of determining a remedy was to examine the causes of the overcrowding. The court considered and rejected orders which reduce bail or set a population limit for the institution. Instead, it ordered:

1) that no mattresses be placed on the floor for sleeping,
2) that no more than two persons be confined in a cell,
3) that the use of day rooms for housing for more than five days be prohibited, and that the court be advised where individuals are kept in such housing for more than forty-eight hours.

The court approved using dormitories as long as the use complied with state regulations and as long as the use of the dormitories did not deviate from the plan which they provided to the court. The court refused to enter a comprehensive order regarding the general conditions of the institution until the provisions of the initial order had time to be implemented. (Westchester County Jail, New York)

1982

U.S. District Court
STATE STANDARDS

Dillon v. Director, Dept. of Corrections, 552 F.Supp. 30 (W.D. Vir. 1982). Director of state corrections agency not liable for negligent acts in local jails. Although he had a statutory duty to implement standards and goals for local correctional facilities, the court found that the Director of the Virginia Department of Corrections was not liable for isolated acts of negligence that occurred in local jails. The court held that since he had no direct control over city jail employees he could not be held vicariously liable for their negligent acts.

The plaintiff had alleged that he was the victim of a sexual assault by an adult and two juveniles while incarcerated in the juvenile section of the Roanoke City Jail as a result of various officials' negligence. He was also suing the City of Roanoke, the sheriff, and several jail personnel. The director was dismissed from the suit. (Roanoke City Jail, Virginia)

U.S. District Court
PROFESSIONAL STANDARDS

Grubbs v. Bradley, 552 F.Supp. 1052 (M.D. Tenn. 1982). Professional standards are desirable goals, not constitutional minima. While guidelines of professional organizations such as the American Correctional Association standards represent desirable goals for penal institutions, neither they nor operations experts can be regarded as establishing constitutional minima. Rather, constitutional standards are also dependent upon contemporary standards of civilized decency that currently prevail in society. (Tennessee Correctional System)

State Court
STANDARDS

Hickson v. Kellison, 296 S.E.2d 855 (W.Vir. 1982). County jail conditions are unconstitutional. General conditions at the Pocahontas County Jail were found to violate constitutional standards by a federal district court, noting that the jail failed to provide the inmates with personal hygiene supplies, bedding and towels, adequate clean clothing, communication materials for writing, visitation facilities, adequate medical care and outdoor exercise. The court stated that the legislature required counties to maintain jails at reasonable and acceptable standards. (Pocahontas County Jail, West Virginia)

1985

U.S. District Court
PROFESSIONAL
STANDARDS

Miles v. Bell, 621 F.Supp. 51 (D.C.Conn. 1985). The focus of this complaint was overcrowding, particularly in the housing unit, which once consisted of open dormitories. Pretrial detainees brought a class action suit primarily alleging that the overcrowded dorms increased the spread of disease among them and were psychologically harmful because of the stress, lack of control over their areas and lack of privacy. Most of the plaintiffs' proof on the issue was based on comparisons between illness rates in dormitories and other housing methods such as cubicles or single or double cells. Testimony did show higher levels of complaints and a higher level of illness among inmates housed in the open dorms. The court also found no constitutional violation in that the number of toilets and showers did not conform to the standards set by the American Correctional Association (ACA) and by the American Public Health Association (APHA). The ACA advised one toilet and shower facility for every eight inmates, and the APHA advised one toilet for every eight inmates and one shower for every fifteen inmates. The defendants provided one toilet for every ten to fifteen inmates, and one shower for every fourteen to twenty-four inmates, depending on the housing unit. These figures were nearly twice that advised. Still, the court found no violation absent a showing that waiting in line led to either physical or mental problems. Sanitary conditions were not challenged. (Federal Correctional Institution at Danbury, Connecticut)

1986

U.S. District Court
STATE STANDARDS

Strandell v. Jackson County, Ill., 634 F.Supp. 824 (S.D.Ill. 1986). The parents of a pretrial detainee who committed suicide brought a civil rights action against the county and the prison officials. The district court held that: (1) the parents stated a claim that the detainee was deprived of due process right to be free from punishment; (2) the parents stated cause of action under Illinois statutes and regulations; (3) the county was not immune from liability; (4) the county sheriff, jailor and superintendent were not immune from liability; (5) parents could not recover punitive damages or prejudgment interest; and (6) the district court would retain pendent jurisdiction over state law claims. Mandatory language of Illinois county jail standards providing that detainee shall be assigned to suitable quarters, that emotionally disturbed detainee shall be kept under constant supervision, and that suspected disturbed detainee shall be immediately examined by a physician creates a protected liberty interest and an expectation of certain minimal standards and treatment.

The parents of a pretrial detainee who committed suicide stated a civil rights cause of action under the fourth and fourteenth amendments by alleging that prison officials violated the detainee's liberty interest and expectation of certain minimal standards for the physical condition of the jail facility, as established by Illinois regulations, and an expectation of treatment that protects safety, health, and well-being of pretrial detainees.

No protected liberty interest could be premised on state jail standards relating to the physical condition of the jail, with respect to action based on the suicide of a pretrial detainee while confined in the county jail, where state jail standards did not require the county jail which had been built in 1926 to comply with standards regarding physical conditions until January 1986, and the death occurred in March 1984.

The fact that the individual inmate could not, under state law, demand compliance with state jail standards, did not establish that inmates had no claim of entitlement to have those standards followed, where state Department of Corrections was given right to enforce compliance with state jail standards. (Jackson County Jail, Illinois)

1987

U.S. District Court
STATE STANDARDS

Ortiz v. Turner, 651 F.Supp. 309 (S.D.Ill. 1987). A proceeding was instituted on the motion of Illinois correction officials to dismiss a complaint alleging a failure to enforce minimum physical standards for the county jail. The district court held that the obligation imposed upon correction officials by an Illinois statute to set minimum physical standards for the county jail and to petition an appropriate court in the event of noncompliance did not include enforcement and, hence, did not impose liability upon correction officials for acts of noncompliance by county officials who were given responsibility by other Illinois statutes for maintenance of the jail.

The failure of correction officials in Illinois to ensure compliance with minimum physical standards for the county jail could not be causally linked to conditions existing at the jail so as to place liability on the correction officials, notwithstanding a statement of the sheriff that he would have acted to comply with minimum standards had the correction officials threatened him with legal action, where the statement could not be given credence in view of the sheriff's repeated history of false assurances that the county jail would be brought up to minimum standards. A decision by a federal court as to whether county officials were in compliance with minimum physical standards set for the county jail would have amounted to an intrusion by the federal court into a decision making process of state officials offensive to the eleventh amendment. (Alexander County Jail, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
PROFESSIONAL
STANDARDS

Cody v. Hillard, 830 F.2d 912 (8th Cir. 1987), cert. denied, 108 S.Ct. 1078. An inmate brought a class action under a civil rights statute complaining of overcrowding and substandard living conditions. The United States District Court for the District of South Dakota ordered an end to the practice of double-celling of inmates; prison officials appealed. The Court of Appeals initially affirmed (799 F.2d 447).
After granting a petition for rehearing en banc, the U.S. Court of Appeals, Eighth Circuit, held that the practice of double-celling did not evince the "wanton and unnecessary infliction of pain" necessary to constitute a violation of the Eighth Amendment. On appeal, prison officials contended that the trial court erred in finding that double-celling of inmates at the South Dakota State Prison (SDSP) violates the eighth and fourteenth amendments to the United State Constitution. They also claimed that the district court erred in using the "rated capacities" of the American Corrections Association (ACA) as a reference for measuring the permissible capacity of the prison under the eighth amendment. The appellate court noted that the district court's remedy in its final order was based on compliance with ACA rated capacities, which in turn were based on recommendations by the South Dakota penitentiary authorities. "The Supreme Court has explicitly rejected the proposition that such standards establish a constitutional norm. In Bell v. Wolfish, the Court stated that 'while the recommendations of these various groups [such as ACA] may be instructive in certain cases, they simply do not establish the constitutional minima. Rather, they establish goals recommended by the organization in question.' 441 U.S. 520, 543-44 n. 27, 99 S.Ct. 1861, 1876 n. 27, 60 L.Ed.2d 447 (1979). In Rhodes, the court quoted the foregoing statement from Wolfish and further observed in regard to eighth amendment claims that 'generalized opinions of experts cannot weigh as heavily in determining contemporary standards of decency as "the public attitude toward a given sanction.'...We need not consider the propriety of the district court's final order mandating relief and its reference to ACA rated capacities in view of our conclusion that on the record before us double-celling at SDSP does not violate the eighth amendment." The appeals court reversed the order of the district court concerning double-celling, left undisturbed the affirmance of the district court's order rejecting the protective custody inmates' challenge to the additional restrictions attendant to their protective custody, and remanded the case to the district court and directed it to vacate its order requiring SDSP to cease double-celling and to bring its inmate population within ACA guidelines. (South Dakota State Penitentiary)

State Appeals Court
STATE
STANDARDS

DeBow v. City of East St. Louis, 510 N.E.2d 895 (Ill. App. 1987), cert. denied, 116 Il2d 552. A detainee was injured during his confinement in a city lockup. He was arrested for illegal transportation of alcohol and he was placed in the same cell with a man arrested for aggravated assault. The plaintiff was later found unconscious on the floor of the cell with a severe head injury. Blood was found on one of the boots that were in the possession of the other occupant of the cell. The injured detainee sued the city and its police chief alleging that pre-trial detainees were inadequately supervised, that officers failed to monitor their conduct and failed to segregate violent detainees from other detainees. The inmate suffered permanent brain injury from the assault and a jury initially awarded $3.4 million in damages. On appeal, the court upheld this award, noting that "specific intent" to deprive the detainee of his rights was not required. The state appeals court found that the plaintiff had established that the defendants had received numerous notices of noncompliance with minimum jail safety standards, including a warning that detainees were being inadequately supervised. Hourly visual checks of detainees were not being conducted and no one understood it to be their official duty to conduct such routine checks. According to the court, it is sufficient that the defendants acted recklessly by disregarding detainee safety. This disregard can be demonstrated either by both deliberate acts or by the failure to act. Since the repeated notices of noncompliance with safety standards provided notice of unsafe conditions, the appeals court agreed that the jury could conclude that the failure to act to correct the situation was reckless. (City of East St. Louis, Illinois)

1988

State Appeals Court
STATE STANDARDS

